18. I ask and implore you: stand firm, endure valiantly, be of good cheer, and be courageous, reflecting on the glory that awaits the thrice-blessed and holy monastics. Certainly, everyone who has pleased God in whatever way of life will receive their reward in the age to come in accordance with that. But which way of life is better?—Listen carefully! – Great are those who serve God “in the mountains, in caves, and in the caverns of the earth” (Heb. 11:38)—hermits, stylites, recluses, and others who glorify God in whatever way they live. But, as you know, our Lord Jesus Christ, the bestower of unfathomable blessings, when He came down to earth, did not choose the life of a hermit, a pillar-dweller, or any other such way of life, but was pleased to live in obedience. For He Himself said of Himself: “I have come down from heaven not to do My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me” (John 6:38). And again: “What I say to you, I do not speak on My own; but the Father who sent Me—He has given Me a commandment as to what I should say and what I should speak” (John 14:10; 12:49). He also girded Himself with a towel and, taking on the appearance of a servant, washed the disciples' feet, drying them with the towel, and said about this elsewhere: “I am among you as one who serves” (Luke 22:27). If, as you see, He—the Lord of all—was pleased, more than anyone else, to take on our monastic way of life, how can you not rejoice, how can you not exult, how can you not be filled with delight that you live—just like the Lord? After this, is there anything else for you that is more worthy of delight? And can you have a greater inclination toward other ways of life? Therefore, do not delight in any other way of life more than your own, if you live it well. That is why, in the Gerondika, or in the accounts of the holy elders among the Three Laborers, a monastic novice was revealed through divine revelation to be more glorious than a hermit or a sick person who bears his illness with good cheer and gratitude. Indeed, I tell you, our way of life is great and all-holy; and you, having lived your life well, will be glorified with Abraham, will rejoice with the martyrs, and will dwell with the righteous.

19. Run well, then, without stopping, and do not let the envious eye of the devil trip you up. Anoint your feet with the oil of patience, so that, warmed by the longings of your soul, you may be content to complete your journey. Clothe yourselves in the garments of righteousness and joy; drink the water of purity and chastity; and do not say, “How long?” For this is the speech of the lazy. We are not to live a thousand years: death is here today and tomorrow. Keeping this before the eyes of our minds every day, we do good, walking according to our fathers’ law. Our fathers conformed to this law during the few days of this life. May there be in you, through the holy prayer of my father, mercy, peace, love, lack of envy, lack of jealousy, moderation, good obedience, kind words, cooperation, mutual sympathy, and humility. Live this way, and act this way!

39. Keep the Lord before your eyes, lest you be led into anything evil; strive for what is good, remembering the Last Judgment, and even more so the dreadful judgment and its verdict.

39. Keep the Lord before your eyes, lest you be led into any evil; strive for what is good, remembering the Exodus, and even more so the dreadful judgment and its outcome. [1:43] Maintain love among yourselves in a bond of peace, and have the Lord as your right hand, so that you may not be led into lust, anger, envy, mockery, idle talk, or anything else through which you might fall into any snare of hellish bondage, however small it may be, to keep you in the power of hell. Remember what St. Dorotheus says?! He says that even if an eagle is entirely free but is caught by just one claw, it is still in the net, and the hunter can easily either capture it or shoot it down. Therefore, be mindful of yourselves and discipline yourselves; for the kingdom of heaven belongs to those who discipline themselves. – What fear and trembling await us at the end of our lives if we live carelessly, especially on that dreadful day when the Archangel’s trumpet will rouse all people—every nation, every tribe, and every tongue?! Consider what will happen then: the heavens will be torn apart; the elements will be consumed by fire; all creation will be transformed. The Judge of all will take His seat on the throne of judgment, and countless multitudes of holy angels will stand around Him, then, before all, exposing the deeds, words, and thoughts of each person—according to their kind, person, place, time, and manner of commission—and all this in a single moment; finally, Scripture says, those who have done good will go to eternal life, and those who have done evil will go to eternal torment, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth, unquenchable fire, and an unceasing worm, and the company of dreadful, hideous, and utterly malicious demons. “Where, then, shall we go?” “To eternal life, to dwell forever with the Lord, if we preserve the fear of God and love for God until the end of our lives—such that our hearts cry out: ‘Who shall separate us from the love of God?’” (Rom. 8:35).

40. The fear of God wards off the swords of our enemy

40. 1) The fear of God turns away the swords of our enemy. – 2) Endure insults. – 3) Do not boast of outward advantages, but be humble and submissive. – 4) For this, you will be with the martyrs. [1, 44]

1. Through long experience, you have fully come to know the God-pleasing way of life in monasticism. Do not waver in any way, nor stray from your sound judgment. Love what has been commanded to you and observe it in everything; remain also in love for me, just as I love you more than anything else in the world. But the enemy has many stratagems, and he readily sows evil among us and within us. And only those who are imbued with the fear of God ward off his swords—which have grown weak to the end—according to the words of the holy David (Ps. 75: 4; 88:44), vigorously devote themselves to acts of piety and wholeheartedly apply themselves to heavenly contemplations and deeds.

2. Behold, as if I were present with you, I see and hear how a harsh word has been uttered against one of the brothers—a rebuke, an insult, or something else. But you, my brother, having received such an insult, do not turn into a ferocious beast, and do not lose heart; be firm and unshakable. For reproach and shame fall upon the one who utters them, but victory belongs to the one who accepts them with equanimity; he is a man of God, while the other is an unrepentant slave, destroying himself in that very moment.

3. I urge you earnestly—do not quarrel, do not insult one another, do not raise your eyebrows in disdain, do not speak boastfully, and do not boast about being better singers, harder workers, more devout, or, at times, more noble in the eyes of the world or more handsome in appearance. There is no need to speak of such things. But in everything, clothe yourselves in humility, humbling yourselves before the Lord and before the superiors of the monastery through submission and obedience.

4. Walk in this way—and your labor will not be in vain, nor will your efforts be fruitless. I proclaim this to you before the face of the Lord our God, His holy angels, and all creation: that, having run your course well, you will rejoice with the martyrs; Abraham's bosom will cherish you for all eternity, and the choir of the righteous will receive you into their midst.

41. By treating the steward as an independent authority, you introduce dual authority and division; but where authority is divided, the kingdom cannot stand

41. 1) By treating the steward as an independent authority, you introduce dual authority and division; and where authority is divided, the kingdom will not stand. – 2) I belong entirely to the brotherhood; nothing else is required. 3) The Lord, who reigns alone, has willed that there also be a single authority in human societies. [1, 45]

5. I do not know whether out of ignorance, inattention, or malice, you praise the steward to my disgrace and hold up his face to my shame, often saying, "If the steward were here, such-and-such a matter would not have been handled this way, but much better. And where is this steward? How would he view this?"—And this is said right to my face. Others add: "Wait, wait! The steward will fix and settle all this."—But is this how it ought to be? And is this good for him, for me, and for you? You have shown yourselves to be the offspring of disobedience; him—as one capable of stepping beyond the bounds of his rank and authority; and me—as one who acted not according to God's will, but according to carnal inclination, that is, out of partiality and excessive favor toward a brother. Do you not see that in this way you are introducing two lords, two rulers, two principles? For the voice of our Lord Jesus Christ has declared that "a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand" (Matt. 12:25). Dual authority is already a form of multiple authority; and multiple authority gives rise to factions; and factions are the cause of division and decay. Why, then, do you bring trouble upon yourselves by not remaining within your proper bounds and rank, as is fitting, and by causing others to deviate from what is right?

6. I am sinful and unworthy, but, having renounced everything and laid myself bare, I boldly abide in this holy place—in my folly I dare to speak thus—departing in nothing from what is right, neither for the sake of a brother, nor for the sake of an uncle, nor for the sake of a father or mother, nor for the sake of kinship, nor for the sake of anything carnal at all; but even if I were required to surrender my body or shed my blood, I would be ready not to refuse this, with God's help and through the prayers of my father, so long as I do not do anything harmful to you or to myself.

7. There is one Lord and Lawgiver, as it is written, one authority and one divine principle over all. This single source of authority, the fountain of all wisdom, goodness, and order, extends to all creatures who have received their origin from God's goodness; yet, without their own volition, it is granted—in the image of God—to only one human being to freely arrange the order of his life. For the divine Moses, in describing the origin of the world, quotes the words that came from the mouth of God: "Let us make man in our image and likeness" (Gen. 1:26). From this stems the establishment among people of every kind of authority and power, especially in the churches of God: one Patriarch in the Patriarchate, one Metropolitan in the Metropolis, one bishop in the diocese, one abbot in the monastery, and in secular life, if you will, one king, one general, one captain on a ship. And if in all this the will of one person did not govern everything, there would be no order or discipline in anything, and this would not be for the good: for discord destroys everything.

42. Lent requires not only bodily abstinence but also spiritual abstinence

42. 1) Lent requires abstinence not only of the body but also of the soul. – 2) The measure of fasting for the community is moderate—a little each day. – 3) Let us fear God, the terrible Judge; and may death not find us unprepared. – 4) I am extremely afraid of death and all that is associated with it. – 5) Let us rise up and devote ourselves to works pleasing to God. [1, 46]

8. God, who governs all things in His wisdom and who arranges the seasons and years most excellently and wisely, has designated for us throughout the year certain days of fasting that are salvific and beneficial to the soul, so that we may dedicate them exclusively to Him and purify ourselves from the sinful defilements that befall us. And thanks be to Him who established these days and has granted us life to reach them. We must always live pure and blameless lives and observe every commandment of God; this is especially incumbent upon us now. Now is the time of purification; let us purify ourselves. Now is the time of abstinence; let us practice abstinence—and not only in eating and drinking, for that is not enough—but let us also abstain from sensuality in the heart, from shameful thoughts, from envying a brother's good reputation, from anger and displeasure toward our neighbor, from an unrestrained tongue, not allowing it to run wild, but setting a limit, a time, and a measure for it to speak only of what is proper, from the lustful glances of the eye, from listening to words that are unkind and displeasing to God. Yes, my children, yes—I implore you, attune yourselves like an organ and a sweet psalter of the Holy Spirit; guard your hands from foolish movements and lustful touches, lest you become dissolute, and be at peace with one another.

9. Let the holy Lent not be too burdensome for the body, but do not lose heart because of this; endure a little, and once you get used to it, you will cease to feel the burden, especially after the first week has passed; for us, bread and water, and something else to sustain ourselves, are enough. Our most blessed fathers, as you know, lived almost entirely without food—some for the entire forty days, some fasted for a week, some for three days, and others ate only a little each day. We eat every day, and our food is varied, but “may the Lord remember us in our humility” (Ps. 135: 23), and may He accept this little offering of ours as the work of the Great Anthony. For we live in community and walk the royal path, which the fathers preferred above all else. Just keep yourselves always pure in the innermost sanctuary of the soul and do not allow yourselves to do anything harmful to your souls.

10. Let us fear God, who is to “bring to light the hidden things of darkness and reveal the counsels of the heart” (2 Cor. 4:5), and “repay each person” not only “according to their deeds,” but also according to their words and thoughts (Rom. 2:6), and even—which is all the more terrifying—according to sins committed in ignorance. And who can stand before the fury of His wrath? Who is content to appear blameless before His face?—Who, then, will not be zealous to walk in the path of righteousness? Who will not strive to cast aside their carelessness and slumbering laziness?—Arise, you who mourn; the night is past, and the day of future judgment has already dawned. May death not find us unprepared, and may it not leave upon us any incurable and eternal wound.

11. I am poor and more wretched than any man; or rather, I am the one most deserving of every torment. I am afraid, terrified, and tremble at the thought of parting from this body, of the Holy Angels coming for my soul, and of how I will pass through the air and speak to the Ruler of the World, as is written in the life of St. Anthony? O my weakness! What awaits me? And how do I squander my days, indulging in slumber and sleep amidst my sins? What will my appearance be like before God, the Judge of all and the Lord! With what eyes shall I gaze upon Him, whose glance dries up the abysses and whose terrible word shatters the mountains? What shall I say there in my defense? What defender shall I find? How can I implore the unrelenting One? With what bitter tears, what conciliatory words, and what heartfelt sighs will I beseech the mercy of the One who is, by His very justice, unapproachable?!—Woe is me, woe is me, my brothers! I can already see my fate from here. I have but one hope—the prayers of our holy father and your blessed intercession.

12. Nevertheless, let us rise up again and again and compel ourselves to all kinds of God-pleasing deeds, bearing the present with courage and finding solace in the hopes of the future. Let us despise the flesh; let us look neither at labors, nor at sorrows, nor at insults, nor at hunger, nor at anything else but our work. — If we live in this way, we will undoubtedly be saved, and in heaven we will be received into the company of the saints, to rejoice with all the saints who have pleased Christ the Lord from of old.

43. Blessed are those who labor in community: rejoice!

43. 1) Blessed are those who labor in communal life: rejoice! – 2) We live in cramped quarters; but the ascetics of old lived this way, and those of today do as well: do not lose heart, then. – 3) Keep the commandments and rules, help one another, pay attention to the readings, work toward salvation with reverence; avoid conversations with women. [1, 47]

13. Blessed be God, who, through the abundance of His merciful love for mankind, has called us with a holy calling, according to His foreknowledge, into this holy monastic life, to devote ourselves wholly to Him and to dedicate ourselves entirely to the closest and most sincere service to Him and to the angelic praise that imitates His glory, —and who has so disposed our hearts as to renounce our parents, relatives, homeland, and all such things, and to take upon ourselves His good and saving yoke—and who has deemed us worthy, in our humility, to join you in communal life and fellowship, not, of course, in order to guide and shepherd you, which I would not dare even to think of, though it has come to pass. Rejoice always in the Lord, beloved children; rejoice, citizens of heaven and exiles on earth, inhabitants of the heavenly Jerusalem and sojourners here, heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven and those deprived of earthly blessings. Rejoice, you who journey swiftly along the path of exile and the hardships of wandering for the sake of God's commandment. Rejoice, you who are last in the eyes of the world, yet possessors of a treasure greater than wealth. Rejoice, O good and God-gathered community, united in mind and heart, a council that loves the Father and the brothers, another angelic host on earth, renewers of the ancient way of life of our most venerable fathers. Rejoice, servants of God, laborers who work day and night with your own hands, so as not to be a burden to anyone, and to provide not only for yourselves but also for the weakest of your brothers and the needy outside the community. Rejoice, unbreakable and exemplary fellowship, a community ordained by God, which was not shaken by the king's threats, the princes' fear, or the prospect of death. Rejoice, you who share in one another's joy, each of whom regards what is good for his brother as a blessing, and among whom there is neither envy, nor strife, nor rivalry, but peace, love, and unity reign. I say this not because we do not face trials: for who is crowned unless they are indomitable and combative, unless they withstand the arrows and wound the one who shoots them—but because we do not fall under Satan's blows. Truly, my children, gathered by God! You are nourished by the gift of the Spirit; you drink the water given by the Lord, and whoever partakes of it "will never thirst again," but it will be for him "a spring of water welling up to eternal life" (John 4:14–15).

14. Winter has come, and we have few dwellings, and those are poor and cramped. But do not lose heart; for despite this, you are spacious in virtue and commendable in this regard, attaching no importance to what is grievous—even though it is grievous—and caring only that you may always do what is pleasing to God. Moreover, if we recall the ancient holy fathers, or even those who labor in the faith today, we will find that we are living in palaces. Do you not see that even now some of God's servants live in the open air, others shut themselves away in caves and tombs, and still others wear chains and eat very little, contenting themselves with bread alone—or even abstaining from it—and satisfying this need with fruits of the trees every other day? This is indeed the case even now. But do not be disheartened; for you will by no means fall short of them, but will be recognized as their equals, or even superior to them, as the Fathers assure us—provided you remain diligent and willing in every task. Be filled with zeal again and again; strengthen yourselves and take courage more and more. Cast the enemy down, trampling him underfoot with your humility, with the sword of confession, and with the knife of obedience. May the sun of righteousness always shine in your hearts, driving away the darkness of passions; for when it rises, the beasts will retreat to their lairs "and lie down in their dens": understand these words spiritually. As for us, we will go forth to do the Lord's work from the morning of life until the evening of death, fulfilling our task (Ps. 103:22–23). A little while longer, and we will triumph.

15. Observe the rules, commandments, and decrees. Lift up those who have fallen; strengthen those who have grown weak; and in everything, help one another, so that the word of the Wise may be fulfilled in you as well: "Brothers help one another, for a city is strong and high" (Prov. 18:19). Pay attention to the readings, and take note of the sayings that are most beneficial to each person. Let everyone do his work with diligence, as if it were the work of God; and all of you, "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling" (Phil. 2: 12). Do not plunge a sword into your own heart, and do not neglect the affairs of the soul. It has been revealed to me about you, brothers, by some of the brethren, that you do not conduct yourselves properly in certain situations: for you gaze at women and engage in conversation with them—those who drove us out of Paradise. Or have you not heard what Eve did to Adam? Flee, then, flee from them, like the Great Martinian—if not in body, then in every way in spirit. – And what is this talk: "Why didn't so-and-so come here on Resurrection Sunday?! But surely they won't forget to come next time." – I ask and implore you, let me always hear good reports about your conduct! May God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who daily delivers me from the depths of sin by the power of His might, through the intercession of my holy father and your prayers, grant you also "to be wise and to live according to the same rule" (Phil. 3: 16), and may there be one spirit, one mind, and one purpose among you; and may you, having lived a godly and righteous life, be deemed worthy to receive the promised blessings, together with all the saints who have pleased God from of old!

44. Fear for Oneself Regarding the Abbot's Insistence

44. 1) Fear for oneself regarding the abbacy. – 2) Let us excel in detachment from all things, remembering the judgment; let us compel ourselves to do good—and it will become easy. – 3) Avoid looking at people's faces and passionate contact with others and with one's own body parts. [1:48]

16. I do not tire of speaking to you and strengthening you with words of truth as often as possible, so that none of you, through ignorance or negligence, may be stung by the sting of death—that is, by sin—by transgressing the commandment and doing what is unseemly—if, and when I do so, I find that the crafty Satan succeeds in influencing some of you, for whom I have great weeping and crushing sorrow. For everything you have sinned in any way, I, the unworthy one, will be held accountable on the day of righteous judgment and the revelation of all that people have done before the Lord God, unless I warn you beforehand, unless I strengthen you beforehand, and unless I teach you. “Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel to you!” (1 Cor. 9:16). But I am especially grieved that, though I am not worthy to be called even a sheep, I hold the office of a shepherd! What justification do I have, what excuse, to enlighten others when I myself am darkness, and to heal those weakened by passions when I myself am led astray and carried away by them?! But, out of love for you and in obedience to my Father’s command, I would rather be fuel for the fire of Gehenna than cause you harm. Every day I reflect on and ponder what God’s judgment is like, and how strictly God demands of every person that he be perfect in all things and filled with every virtue—especially if he is a minister of the Word. What, then, am I to do? To whom shall I turn? Whom should I choose as my companions? There is only one thing left—to rely on your prayers, together with the prayers of my father, so that, strengthened by them, I may be able both to guide you well and to struggle against my own passions, conforming in all things to the will of the Lord.

17. The Kingdom of Heaven lies before us. Let us attain it by keeping the divine commandments. Let us not indulge in sensual pleasures, let us not grow lazy; let us increasingly deepen our detachment from the world and all that is in the world, and overcome the spirits of deceit, until we find saving refuge in the unshakable haven of eternal life. What bitter torment awaits the negligent! What “wrath and fury against every human soul that does evil”—against the soul of every Christian, and even more so against that of a monk! (Rom. 2:8–9). For the more we are honored, the greater the purity of life required of us. The sorrow of self-discipline is fleeting, but the delight flowing from it is eternal, if through this brief self-discipline we attain a constant good disposition toward every good: this applies to food, to sleep, to irritability, to evil thoughts, and to everything else. – For if we love what is good and strive toward it, God will grant us the strength to do it; and then the path of virtue will become easy and smooth for us. Sin, however, for those who give themselves over to it, is full of difficulties, rapids, sorrows, darkness, abominations, and ruin. Come, then, my children, let us walk in the way of God—a way that is sorrowful yet joy-filled, narrow yet spacious. In your vigils, maintain a steadfast and cheerful spirit; sing well, pray well, and show love toward your brothers and sisters, along with a certain humble deference.

18. Great evil is boldness in all things and a deadly thing; and the crafty devil, if anyone is not vigilant, quickly attacks through it, sneaks in like a thief, and wounds our souls with the arrow of his malice, drawing our eyes to the beautiful faces of the young, and stirring up the fire of passion in both with sweet smiles. And when he succeeds in seducing one and inclining them toward impure love, he then attempts to entice the object of that person’s passion as well, making them become infatuated and amorously disposed toward him; then there will follow mutual exchanges of glances and gazes, outpourings of the soul, and sensual ardor; and finally, unless there is special help from God, a father’s protection, and an awareness of the temptation on the part of those who have fallen into it, there will be ruin—the burning of Sodom and the destruction of Gomorrah. But let us all flee from this! I, having been tempted myself, am the first to reach out to you who are being tempted. A great strength and protection against this is guarding one’s eyes and sincere confession. — But even in regard to ourselves, we must not allow such reckless boldness: for death lurks here as well—a matter best left undisclosed to the uninitiated. Those who have suffered know what I am speaking of; nevertheless, it behooves everyone to be on guard. Do not touch, nor sit upon it—and do not look upon your own nakedness, lest you fall under the Canaanite curse. For the pillar in the wilderness, of which Anthony the Great spoke, fell by no other cause than this, though the most wise Father did not express it in these terms. Take care, then, how dangerously you walk, lest death overtake you. Poor man! You know what the Apostle says: “Who will deliver me from this body of death?” (Rom. 7:24). You live with this flesh as with a wild beast, as with a lion. If you do not thrust your sword at it, it will snatch you away, crush you, and kill you.

45. Demons entice by stirring up passions, and they destroy: one must fight

45. 1) Demons entice by stirring up passions and destroy; we must fight. – 2) Have you fallen? Rise up, having mourned and repented: the Lord will heal you. – 3) Let us heed His voice; let us not be faint-hearted, but let us arm ourselves. – 4) Flee from everything reprehensible in communal life, and excel in everything that is required. [1:49]

19. How shall we correct our path? How, if not by keeping God's words and the decrees of His righteousness (Ps. 118:9)? But besides this, we truly have a ceaseless battle with the rulers of the darkness of this age; and their bitterness against us is great and unrelenting, as is written in The Ladder (St. 4, 35; 26:126): they attack, provoke, torment with lusts, stir up carnal desires, fan the flames of lust, multiply and diversify evil—and their temptations are deadly. A poor person is ensnared by any of these things if he does not heed himself: whether by envy—which is equivalent to murder—or by vanity, or by secret indulgence, or by associating with those who harbor evil thoughts; for even for this one thing alone, the soul that has suffered this may go to hell. But no matter which of the things mentioned above a person may be ensnared by, he no longer has God, nor does he have the Kingdom of Heaven; he is deprived of eternal life, loses endless joy, and inherits unquenchable fire, a worm that never sleeps, utter darkness, and fellowship with demons. — As for us, brothers, may we not suffer any such fate; let us strive to avoid the enemy's snares, let us fight valiantly, let us endure the fire of lust—and it will surely be extinguished. For God's almighty power does not allow us to be consumed by this fire if we fight—and we emerge into the coolness of the dew of purity, glorifying God with the holy youths. Let envy assail us, but let us arm ourselves against this passion, and it will pass after lingering a little; it may last an hour or three, or perhaps even the whole day, but on our bed it will vanish; and you, having struggled in this way, will be numbered among Christ's warriors, who are to receive not torments but crowns.

20. You have been wounded, but you have also wounded others; you have fallen—though may this never be—so rise quickly; were you led astray by words into what is unseemly, tempted by what your eyes beheld, captivated by daydreams due to the idleness of your mind, or did you burst into laughter? Return once more to what is right; restore yourself to your proper state; become a penitent; give glory to God; make your confession; shed warm tears from the depths of your soul; let sighs rise from the depths of your heart; groan; bow your head; be contrite; and practice humility. Such is the healing of the soul! For it is written: "When you return and sigh, then you will be saved and understand where you have been" (Isa. 30: 15); and: "While you are still speaking, He will say to you, 'Here I am'" (Isa. 58: 9); and again: "He was afflicted and went away, and I healed his ways" (Isa. 57:17). Behold what a gracious God we have, how merciful, how comforting, how quick to hear! "For He is the atonement for our sins" (1 John 2:2); for our sake He became poor; for our salvation He exhausted Himself; He endured wounds, insults, reproaches, and mockery, and shed His all-holy blood—and "by His wounds we are healed," as it is written (Isa. 53: 5). Come, then, let us draw near and "bow down before Him and weep before Him, for He is our God, and we are the people of His pasture, the sheep of His hand" (Ps. 94:7).

21. Today let us heed His voice, and let us no longer grieve Him; let us not be tempted, as the ancients (the Israelites in the wilderness) were, to murmur because of unbelief, but let us press on without delay toward the Promised Land, to which one arrives by a narrow and arduous path. If those people had listened to Joshua, their leader, and Caleb son of Jephunneh, they would have inherited the land promised by God. But since they were weary and fainthearted to walk that difficult path, and feared the resistance of the nations they encountered—despite the help of God's invincible power—they were delivered over to destruction, and their memory perished with a great uproar. The same will happen to us now. For if you obey us, who are unworthy, and do not stand firm, you will likewise sit down at the pots of sensual indulgence, thinking of the slavery of Egypt and the slavery to the passions of this world, from which you have been set free by God's grace and favor, but instead take heart with us and rise up vigorously, with hearts ablaze with zeal, having shod your feet with the readiness to proclaim the gospel of peace, having put on the armor of unshakable faith, and praying at all times with all kinds of prayers in the Spirit (Eph. 6, 14–18): then we, together with you, will successfully complete the spiritual journey, trampling underfoot and overcoming the foreign and barbaric passions we encounter, and we will cross the Jordan in spirit through tears, and we will inherit that land where immortal life flourishes and the mind bears the fruit of blessings beyond measure.

22. I am sowing these few and unworthy words among you now, as always, for the edification of your souls. Accept, however, even this meager offering, and through your good deeds, multiply this small number of words thirtyfold, sixtyfold, and a hundredfold. With it, I implore you, bear the hardships of your life with good cheer, and fulfill the duties entrusted to you with all your heart. Rejoice and share in my joy, all of you, and may you all prosper. Let no one grumble; let no one covet another's (duty); let no one be proud before a neighbor—for such a thing is an abomination to the Lord and to people—let no one commit shameful acts, whether in soul or body; let no one eat in secret; let no one lie; let no one condemn; let no one reproach; let no one be idle; let no one make excuses for sin; let no one be a double-tongued person, a whisperer, a braggart, a boastful person, a hypocrite, one who hates his brother, a sluggard, or a stubborn person; on the contrary, let all of you be gracious in the way of God and virtuous, even-tempered (do not stand out), self-controlled, tireless, humble before Him, obedient, friendly, haters of insolent boldness, loving toward one another, and sincere; so that, by living and conducting ourselves in this way, we may successfully accomplish the task set before us and, having pleased God, obtain the promised blessings.

46. We are called to a noble life: but do we live as we ourselves have resolved, and as others expect?

46. 1) We are called to a noble life: but do we live as we ourselves intended, and as others expect? – 2) Let us be steadfast in goodness and not be carried away by passions, not only in our actions but also in our dreams. – 3) Why did we leave the world? To live in deprivation—in hope. [1, 50]

23. “The grace of God has appeared,” as the wonderful Paul says, “bringing salvation to all, so that, having renounced worldly desires,” especially we who have chosen the monastic life, “chastely,” piously and “righteously, as we await the blessed hope and the appearing of the glory of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ” (Titus 2: 11–12), Who to some, “according to their perseverance in doing good,” will grant the Kingdom of Heaven, and to others, “according to their passion” and the desires of the flesh, who have rejected good intentions and deeds—“wrath” and unceasing torment in eternal fire (Rom. 2: 7–8). —Consider, then, whether we are living this way. Are we living according to the intention we had at the beginning? Since we have received the name and title of saints, ascetics—let us not bring shame upon our original calling through our subsequent deeds, nor become like incense, which at first spreads a sweet fragrance but in the end stings the nose with its smoke, nor like a lamp that burns brightly at first, illuminating everyone in the house, but is then placed under a bushel or allowed to go out.

24. The hallmark of true virtue is to preserve one’s character at all times; and in this lies our task. For we humans are all too easily led astray and prone to unseemly behavior, as the divine voice has declared elsewhere: “The inclination of man’s heart is evil from his youth” (Gen. 8:21). Having renounced the world, let us not again become its accomplices and slaves to passion; having restored our honor, let us not again lose it through malice; having confessed here that we have stripped ourselves of all things, let us not return to desires and blessings that are foreign to us. Why, having forgotten our vow, made in the presence of angels and men, do we seek—some leadership, some teaching, some peace? And others express extreme displeasure if, in any matter, they are shown a certain lack of attention, or are not honored as most reverend men, seeing before them not death, not the dreadful judgment and condemnation of their thoughts and deeds, nor the burden of sins that weighs upon them, but rather what the heart is drawn to and desires, and what a perverse mind conjures up below, which in its dreams ordains one to the clergy, elevates another to the position of abbot, clothes one in the word of wisdom, and entrusts another with the construction and care of the monastery’s needs. Is this not a satanic delusion and deception?! We do not reproach everyone for this, but there are some who are like this; yet our words are generally directed at all, to strengthen them in good thoughts and feelings.

25. Having regarded all honor as secondary and having bid farewell to all earthly things, we will now devote ourselves to that which we have undertaken in their place. For what reason did we leave the world? — We left to live in poverty, to weep, to hunger, to thirst, to be pure in heart and peacemakers, to be reviled, persecuted, and—if it should happen—slandered—to be the refuse of the world; and finally, if the time of persecution comes, to give ourselves up to death for the sake of Him who died for us: for those who have resolved to do this and are always ready for it belong to those who have truly suffered, and together with them they will be glorified; and they will reign with our one God and Universal King, Christ.

47. Be steadfast in the life you have chosen, and do not deprive yourself of the joys that lie before you

47. 1) Be steadfast in the life you have chosen, and do not deprive yourself of the joys that lie before you. – 2) What suffering can you endure that the Lord has not already endured before you, on your behalf? – 3) Sorrow over one who fled the monastery, and an exhortation to the elders. – 4) An invitation to pray for the one who fled. [1, 51]

26. I implore you, in the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for our sins, to be steadfast and unshakable in the faithful observance of the Lord’s holy and life-giving commandments. Let no one slumber, lest he slip into sin; let no one yield to the temptation of the devil who tempts us; let no one cunningly hide sin from us, saying one thing to us while appearing differently before God, who watches over the ways of men and sees into the secret places of the heart. Do not deprive yourselves of the joy of eternal life that lies before you; be saved from this rebellious and depraved generation; hate the world and the things in the world—all passions, sweet pleasures, your own wills, and self-indulgence. We have broken with the world; we have set out on the path of the fear of God. We have died to sin, and we must not allow anything we have rejected to return, nor follow in its footsteps again, nor accept it. You have come here, having fled from the world and worldly things—take up the good and wondrous resolve to make yourself a slave to obedience, and to endure everything willingly for Christ’s sake, even unto blood. You have already promised this in your very renunciation, before God and His angels. Whether you are such a person, you know. But take heed, O man: “God is not mocked” (Gal. 6:7). “Whoever rejects the law of Moses dies without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses. How much worse punishment, do you think, will be reserved for those who have trampled underfoot the Son of God, by breaking their vows and defiling the blood of the covenant?” (Heb. 10:28–29).

27. The Lord suffered for us; how can you, a servant, suffer as much as your Lord? Why, then, my beloved, are you angry? Why do you lose your temper? Why are you indignant? Why?—Have they reviled you? Your Lord endured that as well. Did they strike you on the cheek? Did He not turn His face to the one who struck Him? Did they mock you? The same thing happened to your Lord: for He said through the Prophet, “The insults of those who insulted You fell upon me” (Ps. 68: 10); and again: “They pierced My hands and My feet; all My bones are out of joint” (Ps. 21:17–18). What heart of stone would not be softened upon reflecting on the life-giving sufferings of Christ the Lord and on His death for us! But have you not resolved to offer yourselves as a sacrifice for Him day by day? This, indeed, is the case, and I believe you are not indifferent to what has been said, but rather imitate the Savior and seek to suffer with Him, so that you may be glorified together with Him in the Kingdom of Heaven. Of course, one of you is better than another and surpasses him, according to the virtue inherent in him. But may the Lord God grant strength and fortitude to all of you to attain, in accordance with your age, the fullness of Christ!

28. When I rejoice in something, I want you to rejoice as well; and when I grieve, I want you to grieve with me. – I am now in no small sorrow because of Brother Orsisius. He disappeared from our sight yesterday. And the reason for this is none other than my sins, as a poor shepherd who failed to foresee, warn, or prevent the infirm one’s fall. Woe is me! I rightly deserve to face judgment and condemnation and to be subjected to torment and torture. Have mercy on me; but also take care of yourselves, lest my authority over you become the cause of my eternal ruin. Let each of you remain steadfast in the proper rules; and be sure to reveal everything to me in confession. Let each one remain in the calling to which he has been called. Take heed, you elders, who have renounced the world before others, lest something similar happen again due to your recklessness, since you allow yourselves to go beyond what is proper and fail to maintain order in all things, as I want and as I desire, which should apply to every subordinate. For I hear that you are striking people; yet I have not ordered this, as it is forbidden by Divine Scripture, although it was permitted by the holy fathers, out of necessity in certain cases and for certain individuals—though without fanfare and through another’s hand, not to satisfy passions; you are scolding, and in an unseemly manner at that, and for some this has become a habit. – We must lead the brothers to what is right through persuasion, gentleness, and the demonstration of virtue; for we do not exercise tyrannical authority, but one that respects freedom and willingly elicits obedience. But abusive language—such as “foolish Galatians,” “idiots,” “spawn of the viper,” and the like—must not be heard among us, although a stern word, spoken not with embarrassment or passion but with compassion and love, can be a saving remedy. For even a doctor uses a scalpel and a cautery when these are suitable for curing the illness at hand. And we, too, have our own scalpels and cauterizers, namely penances and words of rebuke: we must use them, keeping one thing in mind—that the fallen may rise again and return to their path, and showing the depths of our generosity, especially toward the imperfect. Neither in regard to sleep, nor in regard to food, nor in regard to rest and other matters should those who are accustomed to these things be treated the same as those who are not. That is why I wish that beginners be granted leniency until they become accustomed and begin to do everything zealously on their own. Do we have brothers only for work, for the vineyards and olive groves? By no means; but to enable them to work out their own salvation. The elders must concern themselves first and foremost with this, and only secondarily with material matters. Every humble and contrite soul, according to the Gospel, brings forth good words from the good treasure of his heart, and the rebuke and reproof of such a soul are sweeter to those who receive them than the sweetness of a sweet drink; but the heart of the proud bears fruit—insults, bitter and harsh words, accompanied by fierce glances, flared nostrils, and savage grimaces. How, then, is the sinning brother healed of this?

29. Pray that the Lord may be appeased and reveal to us where our brother is; for this has brought me deep sorrow and caused bitter tears. Do not think that Orsisius's flight is of no consequence, a trivial matter, simply because he is one of the least. But for me it is a great matter; for Christ died for him.

48. Death is at hand: prepare yourselves by purifying yourselves of passions

48. 1) Death is at hand: prepare yourselves by purifying yourselves of passions. – 2) You must excel. 3) Avoid idle talk and laughter; love silence instead; and if you speak, speak of what is beneficial to you. [1, 52]

30. Day after day rushes by, flowing like a river that rushes forward swiftly and never stands still. And there lies death. And “Who is the man who will live and not see death?” (Ps. 88:49). “Man is like the flower of the field; his days pass like a shadow” (Ps. 101:12; 102:15). Let us not make ourselves a laughingstock by appearing unprepared when the holy angels come for us; but since we may be taken from this life at any moment, let us be most attentive to every deed, every movement, and every word—and let us stand well prepared, eagerly awaiting the signal from God, the Lord of all, to depart this life. If we conduct ourselves in this way, no evil will prevail within us, and forgetfulness will not shield us from God's judgment; we will no longer fight with one another or stir up quarrels; we will not seek greater honor before one another, nor grieve that we have not learned this or that, have not memorized this or that, or have not succeeded in this or that. But having “counted all these things as loss” (Phil. 3:8), we will seek only one thing—to purify our souls from passions and become God's own. – I am telling you this not to forbid you from studying; for I require this as well, and I myself have given you detailed rules on what and how to study; but to show that one thing must come first, and this afterward, and that one must be regarded as the main task, and this as an accessory. The Lord our God, who strengthens the weak, who “lifts the poor out of the dust” (Ps. 12: 7) and who, day by day, transforms us—newborns in piety—into “men of perfection,” may He fill us with the strength befitting that calling and make us appear more perfect than our worth deserves.

31. The Apostle teaches us to seek ever greater and greater perfection (Col. 3:1). Let us not cease to seek what is still lacking in us, but let us strive more and more to prosper and be enriched with every good thing. If you are a star, strive to become the sun; if you are already within the court of God and numbered among the saved, strive to attain the position of being set over five or ten cities. Multiply your talent so that you may stand above many; love abundantly, and much will be given to you; be a faithful servant of the Lord, and you will have precedence over all who are in the house. Such are the divine voices, awe-inspiring—and when you hear them, and when you reflect on them—they foretell glory upon glory to us.

32. Stand firm against the devil and repel his attacks against you. I have heard that many of you indulge in idle talk and, during evening gatherings, engage in frivolity without shame; and this is harmful both to the one who does it and to those who participate in it. If any of you utters a frivolous word, that senseless laughter immediately spreads from one to all. And the devil rejoices: for he is the ruler here, and this brings him pleasure; but the Lord, together with His holy angels, is ashamed at such wickedness on your part. Fear God and be serious. If this is not true, prove to me that I am lying, and I will be silent; but if it is true, begin to guard yourselves against this. Why do you not rein in your talkativeness and keep silent, saying nothing until you are asked? Surely you do not know the sweetness of silence, which fills the soul of the silent one with joy greater than any other joy: for such a person has the Holy Spirit as a companion. You think this is a trifle, and you do not realize that every kind of evil is found here. For, as the divine James said, the tongue is “an unrestrained evil, full of deadly poison,” and the one who restrains it is a “perfect man” (James 3:2, 8). So do not be upset with me, even though I am upsetting you. I am a father to you; and I will say to you in the words of St. Paul: “Who is there to make me glad, yet at the same time bear sorrow from me?” (2 Cor. 2:2). Have you begun to talk? – Fine; but speak about the troparia and stichera, tell holy stories, discuss useful matters and the tasks before you. But why talk about some field or vegetable garden, about an ox or a stall, or about anything else that has nothing to do with you? Who needs to ask about this, and who can give a real answer? – But one asked out of the blue, another repeated the question—and off they went rambling on, with no end in sight. You'd be better off sitting in your cell and keeping silent. I'll say it again: the one who is silent has the Spirit of God as his companion, while the opposite is clearly true.

49. The scene of our Savior's sufferings for our sake: glory and thanks be to Him!

49. 1) The scene of our Savior's sufferings for our sake: glory and thanks be to Him! – 2) On the occasion of a change in duties, a word to those who grumble about it and are disobedient. – 3) In words, everyone is ready to do everything, but in practice, not everyone is: a rebuke. [1, 53]

33. Once again we enter the holy and illustrious week of the active commemoration of Christ's Passion, and once again we learn what, how much, and for what reason the Lord of glory, our God and Creator, deigned to suffer for us. And what heart, no matter how hardened, would not be crushed and tremble at the thought of how the Lord was betrayed by His disciple, handed over to the lawless, bound by the hand of soldiers, led to trial, accused though He is the Truth, and called a flatterer and a villain. The Savior of all—He strikes His cheek and endures it, is spat upon and offers no resistance, is crowned with a crown of thorns in excruciating pain and does not rebuke the insolent, is clothed in a purple robe like a king and, like a criminal, is struck with a reed; finally, He is crucified, pierced with a spear, and tastes death for the life of all; but soon afterward He rises again, raising us up from our fall and establishing us in unending immortality. O Lord, our God and Creator! What can we—dust and ashes—offer You in return?! By Your immeasurably rich goodness, You did not despise Your perishing creation, but deigned to come and save us through the example of the utmost and ineffable humility. And now, in the sense of salvation and strength received from You, with sinful and unworthy lips, we offer You praise and thanksgiving, which fills us to the brim.

34. A change in our assignments has taken place: one has been transferred to a different assignment, and another to yet another, both new to them. This was done according to the rule handed down by our fathers: for in this way, brotherly love, unity of heart, and unity of mind are best preserved and strengthened. – But some of you accepted this without difficulty, while others found it burdensome; because the former were accustomed to setting aside their own will, while the latter were unprepared for this—the former were not attached to any particular duty and did not care where they were assigned, whereas the latter liked one duty but not another, and considered one honorable while the other humiliating. Of these latter ones, however, some, after a little sorrow, overcame themselves and came to terms with their new assignment, while others still persist and stand firm in their unwillingness to submit to the new order. “To all of you, here is my humble word! Those who have accepted our decree as if it came from God, and, having set aside their own will, have willingly set about the task assigned to them, are blessed, pleasing both to us and to the Lord, and are truly—not merely in name—equal to the martyrs.” Those who, having at first accepted it with displeasure and sorrow, soon afterward turned with humility toward what is better—these have shown themselves to be good fighters who have offered a sacrifice of blood to God. But the third group, still remaining in rebellion and concocting excuses for themselves—inspired by their passions, are the apostates, of whom it is just to say that they are not and never were of us.

35. The Lord said: “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter the Kingdom of Heaven, but the one who does the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 7:21). And again: “If you love Me, keep My commandments” (John 14:15). In this regard, I also tell you that not everyone who says to me, ‘Father, Father,’ is my disciple, and that only the one who carries out my commands loves me. Let us not be wise in words, but when it comes to action, let us not prove to be strangers to what we say. How many times have I heard you say: “We will shed our blood, we will die for you; if you wish, we will throw ourselves into the sea; if you wish, we will walk naked; if you wish, we will eat stones; if you wish, we will have our limbs cut off.” Hearing this, I used to rejoice and give thanks to God; but then, when I came and found you not living up to your words, I wept and wailed, saying, “These people bless me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me.” I do not speak this of all of you; for I have found many to be meek as angels of God, but of those others—though even they are not all, nor are they always, stubborn in their desires. I speak in general, so that we may all be blameless in everything from now on. Seek, then, the ways of our forefathers, to which our fathers always remained faithful before God. Imitate them. If you do not act in this way, then at your departure you will not be deemed worthy of the accompaniment of the holy angels, nor will you be received among your fathers; for as one is here, so will he appear there. I know that you all desire to be saved and are among those who will be saved. Let us therefore be vigilant, and when we face temptation, let us not allow ourselves to fall; and if we stumble, let us rise quickly, and if we doze off, let us awaken. I do not condemn you; rather, I regard you as servants of God and hold you dear in my heart.

50. A Lesson from Seeing the Deceased: Do Not Worry About the Body, but About Heaven

50. A Lesson from the Sight of the Deceased: Do Not Worry About the Body, but About Heaven. [1, 54] What is this mystery concerning us? What dwelling awaits us all? A three-foot coffin. Taken from the earth, we shall return to the earth: the body remains here, but the soul soars upward. What were we before, and what have we become now through our transgression of the commandment? It brought about death, and because of it we have become mortal. We too shall see ourselves in the same way; for we, too, shall die. What awaits us? Where shall we go? What shall we encounter? – Why, then, do we cherish this flesh so much—ours and not ours, our friend and enemy, our slanderer and guardian, our ruin and our salvation? No matter how much we feed it, no matter how much rest we give it, no matter how much we indulge it—will it not still turn into worms and foul mud? What good is it for me to care for ashes and struggle over dust? “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,” says Scripture (1 Cor. 15:50). For this reason, let us take good care of ourselves and not allow ourselves to live as beasts do. It is characteristic of irrational animals to love the flesh, to fill their bellies, to indulge in carnal desires, to be filled with bloodlust, to let their bodies run wild, and to gratify all their senses; but for a human being—truly honored as the image of God and desiring to live as he was created—none of this is proper. His calling—an angelic calling—is to contemplate heavenly blessings, to survey the scenes of creation, to burn with love for the true God, to hate demons, and to care little for the body, providing it only with the bare necessities in moderation and sparingly. Therefore, I beg you, let us act wisely, and we shall know that we have not sinned by doing so in the age to come, when all will be rewarded according to their deeds and undertakings—the righteous with eternal life, and the sinful with unquenchable fire.

51. Everyone in the monastery works, contributing their share to the common good; why everything produced by the monastery is considered the property of each individual

51. 1) Everyone in the monastery works, contributing their share to the common good; why is what the monastery produces appropriated by everyone? – 2) Food, drink, and wine are offered to all; but everyone is free to abstain. – 3) In what sense it is good to increase the number of brothers; with what mindset the abbot should accept them; and the brothers have a part in this; it is a duty to take in the elderly and the disabled. [1, 55]

1. “Present your bodies,” as the Apostle says, “as servants of righteousness to God” (Rom. 6:19). Embrace divine wisdom even more abundantly; truly recognize the angelic dignity of your honorable way of life. Indeed, you have already come to know this and have surrendered yourselves to God completely with humility, and you willingly endure daily labors in both your spiritual and physical endeavors: for both are equally beneficial and complement one another. One is engaged in reading, another prays; one sits at home doing needlework, another works somewhere outdoors; one digs up a vineyard, another prepares the furrows; one busies himself with errands, another does carpentry; and no one is idle, no one sits with folded hands, but all contribute labor according to their strength. In my view, neither the gatekeeper who watches over those entering nor the gardener who scares away the birds should be looked down upon: for each of them contributes to the whole body, occupying the insignificant place of a foot or a finger. – We are all one soul, one will. So let us always conduct ourselves in this way; and let no one cut himself off from cooperation and shared suffering with the brotherhood. Your hands are sanctified; your labor is an offering and sacrifice to God. And am I not right in saying this? Do you not feed the elderly? Do you not provide strangers with bread, vegetables, a cup of “cool water” or wine, and everything else that is available in the monastery? Do you not entertain visiting friends? Do you not provide for yourselves? Do you not provide for us as well?—What is all this, if not an offering to God? For it is written: “I desire mercy, not sacrifice” (Matt. 9:13). It is you who show mercy when something is given from the monastery. For when this is done, I am not the only one giving, but all of us give—whether money, clothing, or anything else. You are my children and partners in all that is mine, both spiritual and physical. My heart burns for you, and “you are not confined within my bosom” (2 Cor. 6:12). I embrace each of you with spiritual love, I have compassion for each of you, and I strive to warm and comfort each of you. Know this: if anyone is against anyone, he is against me; for he is me. Therefore, let there be peace among you, spiritual love, mutual respect, and mutual help. Honor the least as the greatest and the first, just as you would honor me, and obey them in everything with reverence and love; whoever does not obey is not my child.

2. Strengthen yourselves first with spiritual nourishment, performing the prescribed services and sacred prayers with sobriety and alertness; and then, because of the hardship of your work, with physical nourishment—bread, cooked vegetables, and wine in the prescribed measure. This is for those who are not in robust health. But whoever wishes to abstain—thanks be to the Lord!—let him abstain. Yet let not the drinker be ashamed, as though he were failing; nor let the abstainer be arrogant, as though he were doing something great; for “food does not bring us before God” (1 Cor. 8:8), especially if we boast about it. Who would dispute that drinking wine is not suitable for the young? But it is beneficial for everyone to abstain from wine, especially for those who are physically strong. I, however, deliberately allow some to drink wine, according to the rule, to humble their minds—not permanently, but for a time.

3. You know that almost every day people come to us wishing to enter our monastery. But I do not accept everyone: for I am not concerned with having more of you here than in other monasteries, nor do I wish to boast about this, even though I am vain. We want you to multiply, but to multiply for the glory of God and according to His will. Those who have gathered many into one, of course, offer greater praise to God—but only when they have gathered them in His name. It is not unknown to me that if God rejoices over a single repentant sinner, does He not rejoice all the more over many such? And if He is present among two or three gathered in His name (Matt. 18:20), does He not all the more dwell among a multitude of them? But, recognizing my own weakness and passion, I do not presume to preside over many, since I cannot even control myself. And only for the sake of the commandment that we must not turn away anyone who comes (John 6:37)—and the other: “Let the little children come to Me, for to such belongs the kingdom of heaven” (Luke 18:16)—do I humble myself and welcome young children, youths, the elderly, the married, the unmarried, those who are physically whole, the disabled, the one-armed, and the lame. I do this not of my own free will, as one who is doing something great, but as a servant obligated to do so, following the divine Fathers, so that if I do not do this, I will be found guilty of breaking the commandment. What do you say? Do you agree with me, and are you yourselves ready to participate in this?—Yes, or no? – Let each of you answer me, so that I may be all the more zealous in this work: for the fruit of your labor is what feeds and sustains them; or rather, it is a gift from God, “who fulfills every act of kindness” (Ps. 144: 17), “who provides food for the cattle and for the young ravens that call to Him” (Ps. 146: 9), and who said: “Look at the birds of the air; they neither sow nor reap, yet your heavenly Father feeds them” (Matt. 6: 26). However, I trust in your good will; I hope that together we will always diligently fulfill all the commandments and will not be found worthy of condemnation in any way. For if I do not welcome the elderly or give rest to the disabled, I will be found guilty of breaking the law—not just in regard to a single commandment; for the commandments form an unbroken chain, each one dependent on the next, and this applies equally to their fulfillment and their violation. Why, if we break even one commandment, we will be called “the least” in the Kingdom of Heaven (Matt. 5:19); and to be called “the least,” according to St. Chrysostom, means nothing other than to fall into eternal torment. – Let us therefore welcome children, the elderly, and the disabled; and the good God will not despise us, but will provide us with all that we need, both for our souls and for our bodies, just as we have already received from Him from the very first day until now.

52. Let brotherly love endure; may you all be saved by purifying yourselves; avoid idle talk and laughter; it pains me to hear when something is amiss among you

52. 1) Let brotherly love endure; may you all be saved by purifying yourselves; avoid idle talk and laughter; it pains me to hear when things are amiss among you. – 2) Do not pass food to one another without permission from the elders; this is a temptation: whoever fails to comply will receive penance—not out of anger, but out of love. – 3) Do you wish to be blameless in everything at all times? Remember death. [1, 56]

4. Do not allow yourselves to treat one another badly, but show mutual healthy competition and proper brotherly love toward one another. I say this in the hope that we may all be saved. For our Lord Jesus Christ says: “It is not the will of My Father in heaven that anyone should perish” (Matt. 18:14). Therefore, may you all be saved; to this end, strive and compete to present yourselves to God as pure, just as you were created in the beginning, bearing the likeness of the divine image. Do not be quarrelsome, and do not indulge in frivolous chatter; when you gather together in the evenings, do not engage in laughter, and when you work together, do not do so in a way that leads one another into sin. “My heart is in anguish, and the feelings of my heart are in turmoil,” says the most eloquent Jeremiah (4:19) in his godly words. Here I am, unclean and wretched, crying out to you: a deadly illness overwhelms me, and the arrows of my thoughts wound me when I hear that you are behaving badly. Fear the terrible God, my children, and do not ruin your long struggle and blessed labor through any negligence. We have completed a great voyage: shall we really be shipwrecked at the very dock? We have traveled a long path: shall we really slumber at the very threshold of the divine dwellings? Understand what I am saying: for God has given you understanding. “Be strong, and let your heart take courage” (Ps. 30:25). Strive—and clothe yourselves in humility. Do not indulge your own will, and do not thereby fail to carry out my instructions with joy. For whoever puts his own will to death, no matter how burdensome the task assigned to him may be, does not refuse, does not neglect, does not grow weary, but willingly submits and obeys, agrees and does not contradict, just as an irrational animal submits to its master, according to the word of Scripture (Ps. 72:22). Let each of you examine yourselves to see where you stand with regard to obedience. Moreover, I myself can discern from outward actions what lies within. According to St. Dorotheus, one who has no will of his own regards whatever is done in the monastery as his own task—and such a person is always at peace. But whoever is not like this appears weary and troubled, being drawn by his own desires here and there, enticed by one thing or another, and taking on one form or another. May there not be a single one like that among us; but let us all serve God with a pure heart, in one spirit. For if I am one thing and you are another, then there is strife and division. But if what I am telling you is good, why do you fight against me? Why do you cause me trouble and worry?

5. I have something to remind you of, my brothers—why do you not keep one of my commandments, as the others do? Although it may seem small, breaking it ruins all your great virtues. And why should we say, “This small commandment is great”? Every commandment of God must be obeyed, and every act of disobedience rightly has its punishment. I have said many times, with strict warning, that it is not permissible for any of you to pass on anything to another—whether food or drink. This is the sole responsibility of me, the steward, the assistant steward, the cellarer, or other senior officials to whom I have given and continue to give orders on this matter. Therefore, I reaffirm that from this day forward, no one is to do this: it is subject to any form of penance, just as secret eating is. Take care, then, not to fall into this sin through thoughtlessness. You shame one another to no good end and are gripped by fear where there is no fear. You say that you do not wish to offend a brother, yet in the meantime you offend God and me, who am unworthy. Alas for such “conscience” of yours! It is a sign of a frivolous mind, a lack of love for God, self-righteousness, and carnal fellowship. I dare say that even if someone were an angel, do not accept anything from him. After all, you often receive vegetables as a blessing: let everyone eat them; but if anyone cannot eat them, let him return them to the steward, or, if he wishes to give them to someone else, let him tell the steward about it. Whoever acts in this way is not subject to condemnation. Or do you not know that this gives rise to improper friendships? Or perhaps you are passing them on to those toward whom you harbor impure feelings. But even if there is nothing of the sort—is the act itself not tempting? And does it not give rise to whispers and resentment when one receives while the other merely watches? In every way, the latter may come to think that he is not loved. If, however, you say that you give without the other person present, then you must seek out a special time and place for this; and in this way, you are fostering secret alliances and conspiracies. – But what does St. Basil the Great say? – That exchanging glances and whispering in someone’s ear give your neighbor reason to think that some ill-intentioned scheme is afoot.⁸⁴ Therefore, you are by no means permitted to do this (i.e., to pass on food to others) apart from and without the knowledge of those appointed for this purpose. Whoever is found guilty of this is subject to penance. Do not think, however, that this will be out of anger or irritation. No, I have done this and will continue to do so, motivated by my love for you. In this, I strive to imitate the Lord, of whom the Apostle testifies: “The Lord disciplines those He loves, and He punishes every son He accepts” (Heb. 12:6)—and to this very Apostle, who says of himself: “Who is it that makes me glad, except by bearing sorrow from me?” (2 Cor. 2:2).

6. Do you wish to be blameless always and in everything?—Remember death, the separation of the soul from the body, the presence of the angels (at the hour of death), of that long journey and wandering (through the torments of purgatory), of the meeting with the Lord God and our Savior Jesus Christ, of the dreadful reckoning for all our deeds, of eternal torments, of the Kingdom of Heaven, and of the ineffable blessings promised therein.

⁸⁴ Part 5, Chapter 3 on Asceticism, p. 82.

53. I am departing, but I leave my soul with you; continue as you were with me, even without me

53. 1) I am taking my leave, but I leave my spirit with you; continue as you were when I was with you. – 2) Instructions to the steward. – 3) Lessons for the brethren on this occasion. [1, 57]

7. As I depart from you for a time, I leave my spirit with you, and I entrust you to the prayers of my Father and yours, who is able to keep you steadfast and unshakable forever. You have the commandments of the Lord and our God, the traditions of our holy fathers, and my humble instructions and exhortations. “Take heed, therefore, how you walk—not as unwise, but as wise” (Eph. 5:45)—as if I were not absent from you but were with you. The absence of a teacher brings joy to false disciples but sorrow to the true ones. You, who are worthy of God, live a pious and righteous life; continue to do so. The Lord says explicitly in the Gospel: “Blessed is that servant whom his master, when he comes, finds doing so,” as he was commanded (Matt. 24:46). We are unworthy to address such words to you; but to strengthen you in a good life, we feel compelled to add something that is beyond our understanding. May I find you, when I return, still seeking God, and united in harmony, in like-mindedness, and in unity of heart.

8. You know that Satan has many temptations, and now is the time of spring, when the days are pleasant. Be careful that the arrow of sin does not strike any of you. And first of all, you, my child, who have taken my place in leading the brethren, be helpful to them in everything, showing them leniency, meeting their spiritual needs in my stead, strictly observing the rules regarding psalm-singing and prayer, permitting one thing when possible and forbidding another when necessary; be neither too lenient nor excessively strict, but by balancing the two in all things, use both for the good; sympathize with those who are sick, grieve with those who mourn, and assist those who labor. Do you hear what Paul, the great teacher of the universe, says: “Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is led astray, and I am not outraged?” (2 Cor. 11:29). Do you understand what I am saying? May the Lord grant you wisdom in all things. But you also have our common father; follow his holy counsel and commands in everything. “Bring forth what is worthy from what is unworthy, as My mouth shall speak,” says the Lord in His divine Word. He who presides over a great brotherhood will be called great in heaven, if he governs those under him worthily. What does the Lord say to the holy and great Peter? “If you love Me more than these, feed My sheep” (John 21:15 and 9).

9. You are Christ’s sheep, my children, and my brothers. I implore you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for our sins, to submit to the elder over you; let no one oppose his commands, for whoever opposes him opposes God’s command. He will have an assistant; obey him as well, and let no one despise him because of his youth; for old age does not consist in the number of years, says the divine Scripture (Wis. 4:8). But whoever has acquired the wisdom of the elderly is also elderly. Therefore, be wise, all of you; be mature in understanding; let no one be a child in knowledge, but “understand what is the will of God—what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom. 12:2), and live according to its guidance.

54. Please God; care for one another, not seeking to please yourselves; do not be wise in your own eyes; be of one mind

54. 1) Please God; care for one another, not seeking to please yourselves; do not be self-righteous; be of one mind. – 2) Monastic life requires labor, especially humility; there is rest in the future, but here too there is the fruit of labor; and all monasteries live by labor; live peacefully, humbly submitting to this, wherever you may go. – 3) Brother Pachomius has passed away; remember his virtues—his modesty, his self-restraint, his laughter that barely reached a smile, and even then only occasionally... his sobriety... and imitate him. I thank God, who reveals worthy people among us. [1, 59]

10. You know that this is what God requires of us: that we live in a way pleasing to Him, subjecting ourselves in this present age to ascetic self-denial, in the hope of obtaining eternal life. So fear the One who is terrible in His judgments, and conduct yourselves well toward one another; do not put your carnal desires above all else, drawing one another into your passions. – I have learned that you are quarrelsome in your discussions with one another, not reasoning about or seeking what is beneficial to all, but rather following your own inclinations to please yourselves. And in this you are not fulfilling the Apostle’s command to care for one another as members of one body (1 Cor. 12: 25–26). If you are all in agreement regarding what is good, then your cause is favorable; but if you are divided in opinion—and consequently self-centered and wise in your own eyes—then you fall under the prophetic “Woe!” For the most eloquent Isaiah says: “Woe to those who are wise in their own eyes and clever in their own sight” (Isa. 5: 21). He lives well who is not stubborn in anything, and who speaks or acts not according to his own particular understanding or decision, but as the need at hand requires. If you are like this, you will not fight one against another, and you will not allow any conflicts among yourselves, nor pride, nor mockery. How many believers there were in Jerusalem at the beginning! Yet, as it is written, they were of one heart and mind, and no one had anything of his own—neither desire nor possessions.

11. My children! The life of a monk is multifaceted and arduous; it requires sweat and patience, but above all, humility. According to the Holy Fathers, one who is distinguished by this virtue is safe from falling, and, like purified gold, being suitable for every task, is of great value. I know that you labor to the point of exhaustion in your work. May the Lord grant you mercy and a good life in the life to come, after you have lived out your life here. But even here we find the fruits of our labor for our comfort and rest in the body. Be assured, moreover, that we are not the only ones who, through our labor, obtain what is necessary for life; but every monastery, too, sustains its life through labor and sweat. For can we render false the Word of our true God, who said to our forefather, “By the sweat of your face you shall eat your bread”? (Gen. 3:19). By no means. Whoever humbly submits to this law of life walks well in the way of God. You have the blessing of our father as your comfort and strength. You also have the earnest prayer of my humility, with which—though unworthy—I implore the merciful God daily to preserve you in mutual peace, forbearance, kindness, and love toward one another, so that when the time comes for each of you to depart from this body, you may, with a clear conscience and good hope, pass from this life into the next and receive there your eternal and blessed reward.

12. Yesterday our brother Pachomius passed away. Recall the virtues of this man—how humble he was, and to what extent he practiced self-restraint: for our father said that when he was a gardener, apart from what was served at the meal, he did not allow himself to touch even the most insignificant fruit; and as I have heard from others, he did not even eat in the garden what was set aside for consumption outside of mealtimes, lest anyone suspect him of gluttony. We all know, too, that he never laughed and never went beyond a smile, always maintaining strict self-discipline and a sober disposition. And he was truly a tireless servant of God, laboring, as you know, day and night—he departed in bliss. Do not cease to honor him with the highest reverence. But also strive to emulate his virtues, so that each of you, upon departing from here, may leave behind good memories and an edifying example for the entire brotherhood—for it is within your power to determine how each person wishes to be remembered after death. Whether one wishes to be honored as a blessed one, a saint, a reverend, or by some other name, this is possible for him if he already prepares himself accordingly while still here; and there is no insurmountable obstacle to this, no impossibility, as demonstrated by the examples of those who desired this and proved themselves to be such. You, too, will wish to be called blessed, angel-like, and pleasing to God; and this will be ours if we refrain from our own desires, if we love to compel ourselves to every good deed, and if we choose to be humble in all things. I am certain that you are such and will remain so—and that many of you are offered to our monastery as offerings pleasing to God. I am filled with admiration and every comfort that God, despite my great unworthiness, has granted me such brothers, —I dare say—who in nothing fall short of the ancients, but who, to the same degree, have renounced the world, submitted themselves to obedience, and devoted themselves to the name of God even unto death. Thanks be to God, who in these last days has called and revealed such chosen ones of His! For everywhere and throughout the whole earth there are many who please Him. “Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice before Him with trembling” (Ps. 2:11). Seek Him, and you will find Him—He who grants you the kingdom of heaven.

55. He expresses his favor toward zealous workers and asks them to be zealous both in spiritual endeavors and in monastic duties

55. 1) He expresses His favor toward zealous laborers and asks them to be zealous both in spiritual works and in monastic duties. – 2) Hasten to your duties, encouraging one another and not waiting for another call; overcome your passions, and even if you are wounded by them, you will not be deprived of the reward of good warriors. – 3) Be merciful not only to people, but also to animals. – 4) Take care of your belongings—even rags and scraps of wood. – 5) Always be prepared for death; set sail, keeping watch to ensure no water seeps in... This is a temptation through the senses. [1, 63]

13. St. Basil the Great said: The all-good God gave us the gift of speech so that we might reveal to one another the counsel and thoughts of our hearts. And so I reveal to you what is in the heart of my humility—that although I myself am wretched because of my many sins, setting aside my own weakness and the peril of my situation, I direct all my concern toward you; I fear and tremble for you, and strive in everything for your sake. For whoever among you cares above all else for his own salvation is not my child, but my lord, master, and father—and I mentally prostrate myself at his feet; whoever is diligent and zealous in doing his work is my strength and my fortress; whoever is silent, humble and wise, and trembles at the words of God—that one is my soul, my heart, my mind. But I am annoyed with those who do nothing, who are not even “worthy to eat,” as the divine Paul says (2 Thess. 3:10); likewise with the sluggish, the lazy, the grumbling, the sleepy, and those who slumber on the job. I beg you, therefore, to arise—my children and brothers, my fellow travelers and companions on the path leading to heaven. First of all, devote yourselves fervently and steadfastly to spiritual pursuits, burning with zeal like a fire and hastening to the nightly psalm-singing and the daily prayers; and then turn to the physical tasks at hand, rising as early as possible and not allowing the sun to find anyone still in bed, as Basil the Great commanded; during the hottest hours of the day, you may take a nap, but one hour is enough—and rise quickly thereafter. – You hear what is written in the divine Gospels: “Early in the morning the women came to the tomb” (Luke 24:1); “Very early in the morning Peter and John went out” (John 20:24); “at midnight” Paul and Silas rose to pray (Acts 16:25), imitating what is sung in the Psalms (118:62)? And what else does Paul say about himself? – “Working night and day so that we would not be a burden to any of you” (1 Thess. 2:9). Do you see?—here is the Apostle, the preacher of the Gospel, the catcher of the world, who, after such ministry through the word, turned to manual labor, setting before us an example of a life lived according to God.

14. Do not be “hearers of the word who forget” (James 1:25), but be doers of the law and fulfillers of what has been proclaimed to us by divine counsel. – Compete with one another and encourage one another. Who is quicker than others to obey? The one who does not wait for a second word from the one who commands. Who is greater in humility? The one who, at the first word, falls prostrate, asking for forgiveness, and accepts every slander. If you are such, then I know full well that you rejoice and are glad, that you are lifted up by hopes of detachment, and that you soar with expectations of heavenly bliss, remaining pure in soul, free from envy, and impervious to passions: for although you suffer the stings and torments of the passions, armed as you are with such spiritual virtues, you repel the demons that assail you. After all, which warrior does not sustain wounds, even while achieving victory? And how could the King of Heaven fail to crown such a one—even if he were covered in wounds—as long as he has not been slain by sin?

15. “Be merciful, just as your heavenly Father is merciful” (Matt. 6:36). “The wombs of the wicked,” as it is written, “are not merciful; but the righteous show mercy to the souls of their livestock” (Prov. 12:10). First, show mercy toward one another, and then toward the animals; do not leave them unfed or unwatered, but at the proper time give them food and lead them to water. This is the clearest sign that draft animals belong to monks: when they are well-fed and strong; if they are not, then they do not belong to the monastery but to laypeople—either wicked or foolish ones.

16. Show yourselves to be faithful observers of the rules of your way of life, down to the smallest details. And just as you are zealous in other matters to be faithful to these rules, so observe them with regard to material things: do not throw away vegetables carelessly, nor let fruit go to waste; do not even despise old rags or scraps a pyad⁸⁵ in size, much less clothing; for if a monk is to wear, as written in the Gerondika, such clothing—that no one would take it if it were left for three days outside the gate, then what other clothing can one despise as long as it remains on one’s shoulders? And I am not speaking of this alone, but do not neglect even a single log and do not burn it in vain, nor a scrap of a board that might still be useful for something; likewise, do not spill wine or pour out oil. Ugh! How does this accord with anything?

17. Wait daily for your release from this body. – Then we shall behold the awesome face of the Lord. – For this reason, let “tears be your bread day and night” (Ps. 41:4), and, remembering this, pour out your hearts before Him. And I hope that you will “go into the place of wonderful dwelling, even to the house of God, amid shouts of joy,” to the spiritual “echo of those celebrating in heaven” (Ps. 41:5). Therefore, do not give in to sorrow or be troubled by your passions, even if they greatly agitate you; but, having raised the sail of your soul, continue your voyage with a cheerful heart and strive to cross the vast and storm-tossed sea of this life, guided by the prayers of our Father. If, in the process, evil water enters—whether through small cracks, through the senses, through sight when you gaze passionately, even if unintentionally, or through hearing when it receives pleasant speech or melody, or through the sense of smell—whether from the fragrance of an anointed body or from some fragrant ointment, —or through taste, when it is delighted by some delicacy, or through touch that leads into captivity, when you touch your own body or the body of a neighbor, whether intentionally or accidentally—if such a thing happens, pump it out as quickly as possible through confession and tears. If passion blows too strongly, you must lower the sail—that is, embrace true humility; if the rope—that is, the strength of patience—breaks, correct it as soon as possible by restoring the strength of the mind. By acting in this way, you will safely enter, laden with virtues, into the storm-free harbor of eternal life.

56. Beginners face strong temptations due to the remnants of sinful inclinations and habits

56. 1) Beginners face strong temptations because of the remnants of sinful inclinations and habits. – 2) Our way of life is great, both because of what we now possess and because of what we hope for, when compared to worldly life. – 3) When temptations arise from without, or from the flesh and passions, stand firm and fight until you are victorious. – 4) Thoughts from the right and left sides are listed, and it is recommended to resist the latter and cling to the former. [1, 64]

18. Do not be surprised that some of you may stumble, and others may even fall away from us entirely—especially those who are still in their probationary period, having recently entered the monastery. They cannot bear the gentle yoke of Christ because of the evil dispositions and inclinations that remain within them—laziness, worldliness, and sinful habits—which is why they turn back, like “dogs returning to their own vomit” (1 Peter 2:22). The Lord’s word is not false: the flock to which His Father is well-disposed is small (Luke 12:32)—there are few who enter the kingdom of heaven through the narrow gate and along the difficult path (Matthew 7:13–14), for... “If anyone does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:25).

19. Great and sublime is the image of our angelic life; blessed is he whom the Lord has chosen for it from the lowly nothingness of the world, and who, having come running at the Lord’s call, has attained this highest order of life, hoping henceforth to behold the Kingdom of Heaven through the contemplation of the mind. For in the lower world there is darkness and gloom; and every person who chooses the vain, the perishable, the fleeting—that which delights only in this earthly life—instead of the eternal and imperishable, the ineffable and inconceivable blessings, is like one in a nighttime battle: he neither knows nor sees from where or how the blows come, nor from what or how adverse circumstances converge and strike him like waves. Whoever, having seen and understood this, breaks free from this crowd ensnared by the devil’s nets, soars like a bird upward and ascends the mental mountain of a godly life, leaving the hunter—Satan—beneath him, mocked and trampled underfoot, according to the word of the Lord, who said: “I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy” (Luke 10:19). So tread upon him, and trample his many heads and all his proud, combative power, having put on the full armor of the ascetic life. This is what testifies to your sonship through the Holy Spirit and what makes you sons of God.

20. Do not be shaken in any way by what befalls you, as a test of your godly disposition. Do not be disheartened when strife arises, whether internal or external, but stand firm in your rank even unto bloodshed, in the unshakable hope that through your patience you will be deemed worthy of the crowns. Be courageous as you resist the cunning serpent who is fighting against you. You know the rebellions of the flesh; you know these internal uprisings against the holy temple—that is, against your virtuous soul; you know the fears caused by these Arabian wolves, who, while appearing outwardly in sheep’s clothing, are inwardly malicious destroyers of all: recognize them by their fruits, according to the Holy Gospel, and stand firm in your faith.

21. When thoughts of love for God, chastity, reverence, contrition, patience, remembrance of death, the hour of death, the meeting of the angels, the standing before the Lord, and the account before His judgment arise within you, —I will add to this, placing the first in last place—and thoughts of obedience, humility, subduing one’s own will, enduring ridicule, and the like, then recognize that these are thoughts of the right hand, thoughts of the Kingdom of Heaven, which pave the way of ascent to it and accompany that ascent. The thoughts opposite to these, however, are—worldliness, love of sin, sensuality, insolence, idle talk, excessive sleep, vanity, disobedience, unbelief, and self-willed service—and why recount each of these passions? “If I were to count them, they would be more numerous than the sand” (Ps. 138:18). Knowing, then, what belongs to the right side and what to the left, flee from the latter and put it to flight, resisting it as St. James the Apostle teaches: “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you” (James 4:7); but unite with the former, be in harmony with him, and live in communion with him, and you will receive what the same Apostle promised: “Draw near to God, and He will draw near to you” (James 4:8). By no means allow pride, self-righteousness, or self-willedness, for the Father’s word regards all such things as the source of every kind of deception for the novice.

On the contrary, always cling to brotherly love, simplicity, sincerity, detachment from the world, sincerity, forbearance, obedience, godly wisdom, piety, and complete devotion to God.

57. We are in battle: I, as your commander, urge you with these words: Stand firm

57. 1) We are in a battle: I, as your commander, urge you with my words: stand firm. – 2) Our feats are not small; but do not look at what is visible, but at what is invisible, and rejoice: for the reward is great. – 3) The Lord gave Himself up for us; let us also give ourselves up for Him, remaining steadfast in our ranks. [1, 65]

22. We are at war, and it is a difficult war, one in which victory is hard-won. For what does the divine Apostle say? “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12). Just as a military commander, before engaging the enemy, inspires the soldiers under his command with words and urges them to bravely rush to defeat the foe: so too I, though weak myself, am bound, obligated, and eager to stir up and encourage you, the Lord’s army, not just at one particular time, but always, to repel the demonic hordes and the manifold passions of wickedness.

23. Your spiritual struggles involve no small amount of toil and sweat, yet they are exceedingly intense, warlike, combative, wondrous, and supernatural. For day by day you endure—as if shedding blood—the severing of your own desires;—as if suffering deep wounds—reproaches and insults;—as if engaging in competitive exercises—the imposition of obedience. And none of you is permitted to go beyond the bounds of what is due and commanded; but all of you together enter the struggle and endure hardship to the point of exhaustion, striving and compelling yourselves in every way to do all that is proper for those who labor in the faith—in hunger and thirst, in winter and nakedness, in honor and dishonor, and in everything else of which the Apostle boasted (2 Cor. 6:4–8; 11:27). But rejoice, my children, rejoice, keeping your eyes fixed not on the visible but on the invisible, for the visible is temporary, but the invisible is eternal (2 Cor. 4:18), and remembering that “your life is hidden with Christ in God” and that “when Christ, who is your life, appears” in the resurrection, “then you also will appear” (Col. 3:4), just as you are—and you will rejoice forever; for your Lord, the rewarder, will reward you for your labors in the flesh with eternal and boundless rewards.

24. Abide, my lords and masters, abide in the love of God! And just as He loved us and gave Himself up for us to the condemnation of death—a death on the cross—so too, giving ourselves up for Him, let us give thanks to the philanthropic Lord for having so deigned to grant us this: that in His name we may renounce all worldly affairs and pursuits, all indulgence of the flesh, and everything that belongs to this world. What, then, shall we offer in return to God, who has strengthened us for this? What else but this: that we may not destroy what has already been accomplished through negligence and indifference, nor lose heart in the face of the present, nor fear the future in the least; but even if it were necessary to shed blood, let this be pleasing and most desirable to us. So be steadfast and strengthen yourselves more and more, ever more, acting with greater zeal, greater vitality, in a manner more like God, and with greater love for one another, from now on and forever.

58. I remember death and all that happens at that time, and I pray that I may be granted purification and not have to endure the fire; but you, rejoice, looking forward to the reward, even though your present circumstances are sorrowful

58. 1) I remember death and all that happens at that time, and I pray that I may be purified and not experience the fire; but you, rejoice, looking forward to the reward, even though your present life is full of sorrow. – 2) This is Lent: let us welcome it with joy as a time of purification and peace of mind; let us also not forget that this is a time of spiritual sowing, and let us engage in this fruitful sowing; yet, walking the royal path of moderation in all things, let us be more concerned with progress in humility. [1, 66]

25. Recalling the death of one of our revered brothers, I groaned and my soul grieved, pondering what this passing would be like—this separation and division of soul and body, this taking of us to another land, this entering upon some other path, this passing into another world—unfamiliar, untested, unknown, inexpressible, and indescribable. For who can say what encounters we will experience there, what gatherings, what sights, and what events? What servants of God will be sent to us to take us from here to heaven? And might this delegation not consist of evil angels? Let us fear such a possibility! Who will come down to us and accompany us to that land? And where shall we enter—into the land of rest, “into a place of wonderful dwelling, even to the house of God, amid shouts of joy and praise, and the clamor of those who celebrate?” (Ps. 41:5). Or, on the contrary, into fire, darkness, to the worms, and into other countless torments? Thinking of this, I am astonished, horrified, trembling, and I pray that I may be granted here to wash away my countless sins with tears and purify myself a little, before I experience that all-consuming and endless fire. But you, since you are engaged in the struggle for virtue and, hearing and reflecting on this, rejoice, be refreshed, flourish—and live in the Lord. Although your surroundings are disheartening, look to the eternal reward and strive without laziness or faintheartedness to complete your course to the end.

26. Here comes Holy Lent, a time of enlightenment and purification filled with holy days! Let no one be afraid, let no one grow slothful. Sweet are, at this time, devotion, the reception of holy thoughts, the contemplation of heavenly visions, the purification of heart and body, the rejection of the defilement of passions, and the tearful washing of the soul in contrition before God. Let us therefore prepare to receive these days as a time of rest and consolation for both body and soul—and more so for the latter than for the former. – This is also a time of sowing. No matter how much one sows in the flesh, it all turns to decay; and from this remains, if anything, only the kindling of lusts, which stirs up the blood in an animalistic and senseless way. And how we humans err, caring for the fleeting and clinging to the impermanent! In the sowing of the soul, however, nothing that is received is lost, nothing is wasted in vain, nothing perishes, but everything is safely preserved and nourishes your noble souls with food that is truly immortal: in this lie joy, peace, faith, hope, love, enlightenment, purification, sanctification, and, finally, deification. Let us not, however, allow ourselves to indulge in excesses regarding the body or deviate from established practices as we walk the royal path—whether in eating and drinking, in vigil, in solitude, in sleeping on the bare ground, or in other matters. Let us strive all the more to humble ourselves with divine humility, and to that end, let us obey without hypocrisy and cut off our own deceitful will at the root, just as you do. By acting in this way, you will enter the bright days of Christ’s Holy Resurrection in peace and love, and guided by the Holy Spirit. As one who is indebted to you, I have reminded you of this and will continue to do so. Fulfill, then, this commandment and my humble words—and may the Holy Spirit seal you with His seal!

59. Having been amidst the vanity of the world, I gave thanks to God that we have fled from there

59. 1) Having been amidst the vanity of the world, I gave thanks to God that we have fled from there together. – 2) There is nothing more blessed than our present state, both because it is the ultimate goal and because it is granted immediately. – 3) Let us love God: for who is more worthy of love? And what is more blessed than this love? You have set out on this path and begun, but the end is still far off. – 4) The flesh must be put to death, especially its lusts, by avoiding everything that might arouse them. [1, 67]

27. The day before yesterday, by order of our lord, I left the monastery, went up to the patriarchate, and from there to the royal liturgy. I spent the whole day there, and as I looked around, I saw scenes and faces, the whirl of worldly affairs and the hustle and bustle driving people back and forth, their chatter, their many cares, and their worldly schemes—and this during the holy days of Great Lent. This distanced me from my usual state of mind; my ears were filled with strange chatter, and my eyes were distracted by many and varied fantasies. And even now I still feel this within me; and I am taking advantage of this opportune moment to share this with you. Just as raindrops fall from a thickening cloud; so, with a heavy heart, tears dripped from my eyes, and I, having sighed from the depths of my heart and calmed the turmoil of my thoughts, gave thanks to the Lord with a prayerful outpouring of sorrow and commended you for having left the midst of such people and separated yourselves from them, and have renounced even the slightest contact with the world’s impurity, remaining on the path of obedience, daily wrestling with the trials of endurance, and ascending in spirit to the heights of virtue through a God-pleasing disposition and righteous conduct.

28. What is more blessed, more desirable, more glorious than your position and state?—You are truly children of Christ, servants of God the Father, having renounced flesh and blood. The goals of worldly people lie in the earthly realm; your goals lie in the heavenly realm. For them, the world is paramount; for you, heaven is paramount. It is their nature to rejoice in this world without true joy, to grow rich in this world without a sense of wealth, and to take pleasure in this world without ever satisfying their hunger for pleasure. I cannot speak of them otherwise. – But you have joy that springs from hope—rejoicing in what is promised in the age to come—poverty in the temporary, yet riches in the eternal—and through sorrowful self-denial, the tasting of spiritual blessings of unimaginable sweetness. – Let us not, then, seek pleasure in anything else, turn our eyes and attention to anything else, or desire anything else, except what has been granted to us by divine providence and with which the Holy Spirit has blessed us.

29. Come, let us give glory to Him who has called us. Come, let us love Him who has so loved us. Come, let us serve Him as servants, that we may be made worthy of dominion over all things. Come, let us fear Him, so that the world may fear us, and the angelic hosts may love us. Come, let us purify ourselves from evil deeds and thoughts, so that He—the light that is truly unapproachable—may envelop us with the lightning of the Spirit and lift us up to the high mountain of the divine dwelling, and reveal us to people as a divine city. Have you heard what one of the holy fathers says in the Gerondika: if we honor the One—that is, God—then all will honor us, but if we dishonor Him with our sins, will we not face the opposite?—And who would not love the Lord? Who would not cling to this great and unceasing Light? Who would not rush to this great Giver of Rewards and Bestower of Crowns? Who would not desire to reign with this King of kings throughout the ages? Who would not prefer, above all else, to be adopted as a son by Him, from whom every fatherhood in heaven and on earth derives—the Father of bounties and Lord of all? Who will not yearn to share in the Father’s communion with our Lord Jesus Christ—that communion which is inexpressible in words, incomprehensible to the ear, and unfathomable to the mind? You have chosen this and loved it; you have answered the call and come; you have begun to fulfill it and continue to do so. But the feats (the contests in the arena) are not yet over; the race is not yet finished; we must still strive and strive with all our might; the hour of the contest has not yet passed, as those great and golden lips of the Spirit have declared. Do we not hear what Paul, this light of the world, the Universal Apostle: “Thus I run, not aimlessly; thus I fight, not as one who beats the air; but I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9:26–27)?

30. Do you see what the man of God has said? It is necessary to mortify and firmly subdue this untamable steed of the flesh. Let us therefore restrain it and bridle it. I, who am passionate and sinful, beg you for this, so that it does not bite the bit, throw off its rider—the mind—and make us a laughingstock to our enemies. Let us avoid the rapids, so that the journey may be safer. — You understand, of course, what I am talking about. — Woe to the deceitful gaze, for it lets the poison of sin into the soul! Woe to accursed audacity, for it quickly burns down the house of virtues! Woe to the youthful smiles exchanged between beardless and bearded youths alike, for in an instant they cast us down into the lower realms of passion! Woe to the satiation of the belly and to excessive sleep, for they give birth to and multiply the evil seeds of lust! Woe to those who pair off in twos, arranging secret gatherings and conversations, and especially to those who dare in doing so to reveal shameful thoughts to one another, as if for mutual benefit and enjoyment, for in their midst is not Christ, but Satan! But protect yourselves with the fear of God, and rise higher and higher in your heavenly ascent.

60. Arise and seek healing from the Lord, the Healer of all

60. 1) Arise and seek healing from the Lord, the Healer of all. – 2) Our life is exalted—angelic—yet we are carnal and earthly; therefore, to succeed in life, a great feat is required of us. [1,69]

1. Arise and, having set yourselves aright, walk your path well. Whoever slumbers in indifference, awaken to diligence. Whoever has let their hands droop and whose feet limp on both sides, begin to walk uprightly along the paths of the Lord’s commandments. Whoever is blinded by passionate thoughts, wash your eyes in the font of tears, and, having gained sight through dispassion, glorify the Lord. Whoever, like a leper, is covered with the scabs of sin, approach the Lord with fervor, and you will hear: “I will it; be cleansed” (Matt. 8: 3), and having been cleansed, guard yourself henceforth against this leprosy. Whoever is deaf in soul and blind in mind, seek to hear and to speak—and you will find it; for the divine Word has the power to heal all who are sick in their inner being. I address these words to you for the sake of the weak among you: for “it is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick” (Matt. 9:12).

2. The way of our life, great and glorious, does not come to perfection haphazardly, but through much toil and struggle; but the higher it is—divine and angelic in nature—the more it demands toil and effort; for we, being of the flesh, seek to become like the incorporeal, and while living in this world, we strive to lead a life as in heaven, forcing ourselves to dwell incorporeally and bloodlessly while bound by flesh and blood: for, as the Apostle says, “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable” (1 Cor. 15: 50). Therefore, we must have great steadfastness, great attention, and intense diligence: “For the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are opposed to one another,” as the Apostle says (Gal. 5:17). Take care, then, that we do not allow the better part of us to be subjugated by the worse, nor that which ought to reign within us to be enslaved by the servile passions of the flesh, lest we find ourselves walking on our heads, with our feet pointing upward.

61. The midpoint of Great Lent; we have labored, and we see the fruits: God’s mercy; having given thanks, let us press on

61. 1) The midpoint of Great Lent; we have labored, and we see the fruits: God’s mercy; having given thanks, let us press on. – 2) God and the angels and all the saints are watching our race; let us strive, overcoming obstacles and enduring hardship. [1, 69]

3. The grace of the Holy Spirit has faithfully guided us to the middle of the holy Lent with great strength and valor. I believe that it will continue to accompany us in the days ahead and lead us to the life-giving and light-bestowing day of the Resurrection, bringing about the remission of sins and further improvement in your most virtuous progress. Look back and see what your condition once was and how far it has now risen. The soul, once it has embraced the zeal for salvation, moves forward imperceptibly in this endeavor and ascends to the heights of virtue, soaring toward the heavens. So too, brothers, having entered these days together with zeal and having set aside all difficulties and obstacles, we have walked well and righteously until now and have become transformed, having come to love orderliness and the faithful fulfillment of the commandments; we have lost nothing of what we had previously gained, but have been enriched with new things; and my heart has rejoiced, and my spirit has exulted, that the fruits of your divine work have multiplied and your sacred zeal has been granted the best portion. All this, to speak in the words of the Apostle, “is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy” (Rom. 9: 16). Through Him, the weak become strong, and the powerless “are girded with strength” (Ps. 17: 33). Yet let us not be content with what has already been achieved, but let us press on with youthful zeal, “and let our youth be renewed like the eagle’s” (Ps. 102: 5); let us always press forward and prosper, not regarding as sufficient the good we have acquired or the degree to which we have advanced, until we pass through the gates of death from the temporal to the eternal. And we shall truly be blessed, brothers, and receive the lot of the blessed angels.

4. What glory and honor it is when we live, as we ought, according to our way of life. As the Lord of all beholds us, He rejoices; and all the saints rejoice and are glad. Just as we watch with our physical eyes those running in the arena, so God, the entire host of angels, and the assembly of all the saints look upon us and judge the worth of our deeds. Let us therefore persevere, my brothers, let us persevere in this great race along the path from earth to heaven; let us overcome our adversary, strike him down when he attempts to grapple with us, and cast him far away with our valiant zeal against him. He is a coward, powerless, and despicable; that is why God’s brother, James, cries out: “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you; draw near to God, and He will draw near to you” (James 4:7–8). Let us not allow ourselves to turn back in any respect; for this is unbecoming to those who run with all their might. Let us not proceed sluggishly; for this is unseemly for those who hasten to victory. But having stripped ourselves of both our deeds and our desires, and having lifted our gaze toward heaven, let us complete our race so that we too may say with Paul: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness” (2 Tim. 4:7).

62. Your order is well established: maintain it

62. 1) Your order is well established: preserve it. – 2) Let each one perform his duty—especially you, the steward, and then all those who follow you: those in authority, manage well; and those under authority, obey willingly. – 3) Love penance and changes in duties. St. Theodore’s Instructions Regarding Permissions. [1, 70]

5. Glory and thanks be to the Lord, who has gathered us together and established us in unity of mind and will. Why do I dare to say that our Head is Christ, to whom, as our Chief Commander, we will refer everything and turn everything to His glory? And who is more blessed than you, if you do not fall away from such a good disposition until the end?—May the Lord grant you always to be in harmony with one another, to be purified and enlightened more and more, and to press forward unceasingly, even through small acts of virtue. Your order is well established: preserve it.

6. Let each one carry out his duties as commanded. Let each one mind his own business and not exalt himself above another, maintaining order in every way. — Pay special attention, my child, to the responsibility that rests upon you as steward, “correcting those who oppose you with gentleness” (i.e., the disobedient) (2 Tim. 2:25), and do nothing out of partiality or anger. Persist, says the Apostle, “in season and out of season” (2 Tim. 4:2). Understand “out of season” to mean: at all times; be persistent and vigilant at all times. — In any case, be as you see me, even though I am lacking in everything. Whatever I permit, permit; whatever I forgo, forgo: if I strike, strike; if I spare, spare; if I show mercy, show mercy; if I forgive, forgive; if I love, love—so that you may hear: ‘Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a little, I will set you over much; enter into the joy of your Lord’ (Matt. 25:21). Let those who follow you act in the same way—and likewise those who follow them. Here is a wonderful law: that those under authority should be shaped by those in authority, and that, just as those in authority abound in wise care for all, so too should those under authority abound in meekness, non-resistance, humble obedience, and prompt fulfillment of what is commanded.

7. Love penances and changes in duties and tasks, confident that those who ordain them have your good in mind. — But when you fall into transgressions, due to my carelessness and my own sins, do not seek permission from me prematurely; I—though a sinner—am the guardian of these bonds before the Lord, Who, through the great and supreme Apostle Peter, said to me as well: “Whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven” (Matt. 16:19). How then—have mercy on me, my children—could I casually release what cannot be released and break what has been bound? Do you not see with what fear I must do this, so that I may always have divine justification assisting me in such bindings and releases? Where, then, can we find that light of discernment so that our imposition of penance and condemnation may be carried out, as it were, in union with God? Though it may seem bold to say so, in the essence of the matter, this is truly how it must be and how it is. I am struck with fear and overcome with shame as I speak these words, and I pray that the earth may not open up and swallow me, or that the mountains may not shift and cover me. Woe is me! Woe is me! What a task I have been assigned! Knowing this, do not press me; for it may happen that I will decide one thing, but God will not, rejecting my prayer, since the Most Pure Nature will not serve my unwise impulses and decisions, but will disapprove of my action and even take me from among the living, as He did with Elijah. May God bear witness to you, my brothers, that I speak thus not wishing to grieve you, nor to oppress you or constrain you with authority, or to “shepherd the flock of Christ by compulsion and distress” (1 Peter 5:2). May this not be so for me, O Lord! What benefit would that bring me? My sole concern is to save you, the lambs of Christ and the sheep of God, by every means possible. For the Lord established this as the first and greatest sign of love for Him in His questions to the divine Peter (John 21:15 ff.). As you treasure these words in your hearts and faithfully apply them to your lives, walk in the Lord, rejoicing in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

63. Having celebrated the Passover, let us continue in the spirit of Lent, so that we may not squander what we have gained during this time, but rather multiply it

63. 1) Having celebrated Easter, let us continue in the spirit of Lent, so that we may not squander what we have gained during this time, but rather multiply it. — 2) Keeping in mind where we are heading and what we will attain, let us not indulge in sensual pleasures or cling to physical beauty. — 3) We have received so much at Easter and before: it is not wise now to rush into the opposite. — 4) Our brothers are departing one by one; let us not remain behind either: let us therefore attend to our task. [1, 71]

8. We have now celebrated the Queen of Days, Holy Easter; we have been enlightened by the divine mysteries and have received the sanctification of the Spirit in the bond of peace and spiritual love. Now we once again mark the beginning of the rest of the year. Let us, then, be transformed for the better during these days, becoming even better than before, and let us not allow ourselves to fall back in any way, dishonoring the struggle and spiritual labor of the previous Lenten season, but rather let us build upon our previous virtues and add new ones; and whatever we have rightly acquired and attained—whether in reverence or in silence, in chastity or in sincerity, in fasting or in some other form of devotion—we will thus not only preserve daily in its integrity, but also multiply and perfect it with good additions.

9. We are flowing toward God, reaching for the Kingdom of Heaven, for the light, for life, for inexpressible joy, for that sweet and blissful paradise, for eternal dwellings, for wondrous places of glory, for the choirs of angels, for the rejoicing of the saints, for the inheritance that awaits us. Let us not allow ourselves to forget the goal that lies before us; let us not allow ourselves to slacken our efforts along the way, nor be carried away by inappropriate thoughts. Let us not indulge in sensual pleasures, nor in worldly desires, nor in carnal lusts, nor be captivated by the beauty of a face, a figure, or a smile. Let us look within ourselves, as the theologian Gregory urges. Do you see how Eve suffered, captivated by the beauty of the sinful fruit? May we never suffer anything like that!—And what do we gain from indulging our lusts and passionate desires? It would be one thing if it were nothing; but in addition to inner turmoil, there is also shame and disgrace before God and people.

10. God has led you, after the great days of fasting, into Holy Pascha, reviving you through the communion of His Holy Body and Blood: how then do you, wretched one, dare to offer the Lord something contrary? How do you allow yourself to turn back to unworthy deeds? Has God not given you a mind? Did He not create you rational? Do you not have the eyes of the mind? Why then do you remain speechless? Why do you not look to the right at the incomprehensible beauty of the Lord and strive toward it with your soul, but instead turn your gaze to base things, to the shame of sin, to the impurities of vile passions? Let us therefore be sober-minded; let us occupy our minds with that which leads to eternal bliss, and direct our intentions and efforts toward it.

11. I do not constantly speak to you merely to flatter your ears, nor simply to fulfill the duty of preaching, nor to hear the sound of praise; but because, filled with fear due to my earnestness, I tremble for your salvation. We serve the living God, and a judgment that is pure and impartial awaits us, along with an endless reward; for “there the fire never goes out, and the worm does not die” (Mark 9:44). That is why I cry out to you, and as if clinging to your groans, I implore you—let us not allow the final hour to find us unprepared, and let not the end of our lives be marked by negligence. We constantly witness the mystery of death, and right before our eyes, as you see, our brothers pass away. Seeing this, say to yourselves in your hearts: “What about us? Will it not be the same for us? Will we remain here much longer? And if we do remain, how long will we live? Does not the grave await us as well? Can we not already see our coffin—our final bed and resting place, full of worms and an unbearable stench?” For “Who is the man who will live and not see death?” (Ps. 88:49).

64. We have been granted a lofty calling; let us rejoice, give thanks, and act, undertaking every labor for its sake and enduring all things

64. 1) We have been granted a lofty calling; let us rejoice, give thanks, and act, undertaking every labor for its sake and enduring all things. – 2) Let there be many hardships; but eternal life and the kingdom of heaven await us: let us therefore love these hardships and endure them with zeal. – 3) Look to the examples of the holy fathers who were our guides. – 4) Look to the examples of those who have become renowned for their obedience. – 5) And imitate them, so that we may be deemed worthy of a share in their glory. [1, 72]

12. We should rejoice that we have been called by God and chosen for such a holy life—and rejoice so much that we forget the labors of asceticism and regard as light all the sorrows encountered on the path of the virtuous life, in anticipation of future delights. We have not received nor do we possess a military rank, a civil office, the dignity of a military commander, or the royal dominion so coveted by many, but something far greater than all of these: the highest heavenly dwelling—true not in words alone, but in deeds. For “if we suffer with Him, we will also reign with Him,” says the Apostle (Rom. 8: 14; 2 Tim. 2:12). Having thus received this advantage from God—and having received it as a gift, not through our own efforts—how much should we rejoice and be glad, give thanks and pray, and do and say everything necessary to preserve it and keep it safe from the manifold slanders of the ruler of the underworld, directed against us? Therefore, my brothers, let every sorrow be pleasant to us and every labor sweet and desirable as we fulfill the duty that lies upon us; and for this reason, let us accept every ascetic deprivation as a delight: —withdrawal from the world as drawing near to God, —detachment from pleasures as partaking of heavenly blessings, —the constraint of self-restraint as abundant nourishment.

13. Let us drink water and eat dry bread, let us toil with our own hands, let us be exhausted in our thoughts, let us be scorched by the temptations of the flesh, torn apart by desires, mortified by privations, and let us live this life without friends or companions, without kin, without father or mother: what does it matter? Eternal life lies before us, the Kingdom of Heaven is prepared for us, the enjoyment of many unfathomable blessings, all-blessed immortality, the riches of glory and honor, and a multitude of other great blessings that human language cannot describe. Let us, then, strive with vigor and perseverance; let us love the deeds of self-sacrifice and the labors of virtue, so that we may win crowns and acquire treasures that no eye has seen, of which no ear has heard, and which have not even entered the human heart (1 Cor. 2:9).

14. We must take our cue from the lives of our ancient fathers, follow in the footsteps of their virtues, love their deeds, and reflect the image of their lives within ourselves. Such was our great forerunner, Anthony the Great, the first to defeat our adversary and to pave the way for us to ascetic victories. Such is the blessed and angel-like Arsenius, who attained the highest degrees of ascetic virtue and now stands as a model of glory for us. Such is the holy and divine Pachomius, who is called our forefather. Such is the most divine Hilarion, who shone with virtues like the dawn that breaks every morning. Such is the blessed and all-holy Euthymius, whose name means “blessing,” and with him the most reverend Savvas the Sanctified, the most holy and angel-like Theodosius, and the other brightest luminaries of the universe.

15. But let us now turn our attention to those who have shown the most perfect examples of obedience; for the aforementioned were glorified because they had been prepared in advance by the grace of obedience. Dosipheus, the Son of Light, our God-given father, exhorts us to unquestioning obedience; Dometian⁸⁶, our God-enlightened father, strengthens our love for our spiritual fathers; Abba Kir⁸⁷, our God-chosen father, confirms us in patience amid insults and offenses; Zechariah⁸⁸, our most honorable father, inclines us toward humble wisdom; Silvan⁸⁹, our much-weeping and most humble father, transforms us for the better; Jonah⁹⁰, the hardworking one and a model of fulfilling the Lord’s commandments, stirs up our zeal for manual labor. How can we recall, without striving to emulate them, the godliness of Blessed Petronius⁹¹, the obedience of the divine Afre⁹², and St. Mark⁹³, the simplicity of Paul⁹⁴—all most honorable and humble in virtue?

16. But even an hour would not be enough to list them all. These alone are enough to inspire us to compete with them and to imitate their deeds. Let us, then, act as they did, laboring as if side by side with them and aided by them. And in this way, we will be enriched, just as they were, by pious and righteous deeds; and then we will be deemed worthy to share in their glory and crowns in the heavenly kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

65. Reflecting on what the Prophets, Apostles, and other Saints endured for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven, let us be filled with zeal

65. 1) Reflecting on what the Prophets, Apostles, and other Saints endured for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven, let us be zealous. – 2) What is there that another would not endure for the sake of carnal love? Should we not endure everything for the sake of the Lord? [1, 73]

17. Do not think that it is no great feat to attain the Kingdom of Heaven. For its sake, as it is written, all the saints “walked in skins of goats and sheep, destitute, afflicted, and mistreated—wandering in deserts and mountains, in caves and in the caverns of the earth—of whom the world was not worthy” (Heb. 11:37–38): Isaiah was sawed in two; Jeremiah was cast into a mud pit; Jonah was cast into the sea and swallowed by a whale; Daniel was thrown to the lions to be devoured; the three youths were cast into a fiery furnace; Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, died by the sword; John the Baptist himself was beheaded by the sword as well. And I would not have enough time to recount the story of the divine Paul, who spoke of himself, saying that he had been in hunger and thirst, in winter and nakedness, in toil and struggle, (2 Cor. 11: 27) and in countless other hardships—about St. Stephen, who was stoned to death—about James, the brother of God, who was killed at the temple. And how could I possibly list the sufferings of the other Apostles, the torments of the holy martyrs, and the feats of the venerable fathers? They are beyond number. This is how they were deemed worthy to receive the promised, ineffable blessings for all eternity! Let us, too, as humble ones, strive in the same way. For, according to the great St. Basil the Great, those honors—along with their labors and crowns—are the inheritance of the victors. Let us remain fighters; let us gird ourselves, ever ready for the contest, and resist the adversary; let us not retreat before difficulties, let us not yield to blows, and let us not turn back. May zeal, like fire, burn within us, and let nothing stand before our eyes; even the demons will flee: for, as it is written, they melt like wax before the face of this spiritual fire (Ps. 67:3); people, too, will be afraid, or at least ashamed; and we, having overcome all things, will ascend to where our life and our ineffable rest are.

18. We often see how someone, overcome by carnal love, endures everything and takes on every hardship, having but one thing in mind: to draw near to the face of the one whom he lusts after; he is not satisfied by food, nor sated by drink, nor rested by sleep, and desires nothing else that is pleasant or comforting, but this poor soul is ready for all manner of other labors and privations, even to the point of shedding blood, if it should come to that—what does he seek to gain and what does he treasure?—To destroy his soul in the hell of unending fire. Should we, for the sake of our warm love for the good, the beautiful, the ineffable, and the glorified Christ, our God, remain meekly under the yoke of this blessed and holy obedience even into old age, enduring every sorrow and every arrow—be it of thought or passion, insult or attack, temptation or deprivation, slander or contempt, humiliation or defamation, or anything else of this sort? – We, as rational beings, must not be likened to senseless beasts or become like them. But just as we have begun and, proceeding successfully thus far, have reached a certain point, so let us continue to strive vigorously so that we may successfully complete our journey in the Lord.

66. You have been entrusted to me by God; that is why I am zealous to teach you

66. 1) You have been entrusted to me by God; that is why I am so eager to teach you. – 2) I implore you: save yourselves, and by saving yourselves, save me as well. [1, 74]

19. For me, a sinner, what other task could be more important than caring for you, my flock, my portion, my inheritance? For if one to whom a mortal king entrusts the governance of the people or the command of the army devotes all his care to this matter day by day, so as not to incur any penalty or punishment by allowing anything displeasing to the king: how then could I, a poor man, having been entrusted with authority over you—who are truly Christ’s soldiers—indulge in carelessness, not to say for a year or a month, but even for a single day or hour, and fail to show my utmost concern for you in both word and deed, though I am lacking in both? That is why I—though unworthy, feeble, and inadequate—remind, proclaim, exhort, insist, and implore you, my heart, my light, my praise, to live up to your calling.

20. As great a joy as I feel when I think of the salvation of all of you and of the great reward for it, I am seized by an equally great fear and trembling when I consider what answer I must give regarding each one of you. Help me, then, my children, and—despite the weakness and blindness of your leader—be saved, so that you may save me, a wretched man, along with yourselves—be saved by zealously fulfilling all that has been commanded to you and that rests upon you: maintain unquestioning obedience, God-like humility, firm faith, enlightening revelation, steady diligence in your work, reverent attention during psalm singing, self-restraint without burden, modesty in dress, humility, avoidance of laughter and disputes, aversion to ostentation, and mutual love.

67. Because I love you, I rejoice when you prosper, and I grieve when I see what kind of spirit you are in

67. 1) Because I love you, I rejoice when you prosper, and I grieve when I see what state of mind you are in. – 2) You have been deemed worthy of a great calling and have left everything behind for its sake; for this reason, each of you must hear: enter into joy. – 3) How many there are who wish to be like you but cannot: give glory to God, then, and be upright. [1, 75]

21. Someday I will have to fall silent in complete silence. But as long as there is breath in my nostrils, I will not cease to remind you of what is proper, as is my duty, yet with warm love for you. You are my children, by God’s will and grace. Why, then, am I filled with such great joy when I see your piety, your virtue, and your godly way of life? Then I am filled with hopeful expectations and walk as if I were a king, glorifying God, and then nothing else brings me joy. But when I see disorder among you, it is as if a mountain were weighing down on my soul, and I walk, as if struck down, with my head bowed, grieving and reproaching myself for my poor guidance of you, and saying to myself: “Can anything good come from such a shepherd?” as was once said of Nazareth. Have mercy on me, then, my children, and let me always rejoice and glorify God for you, for your success, and for your blessed lot.

22. You have truly entered a holy calling, clothed yourselves in a pious way of life, and been numbered among the angelic ranks, having heeded and followed that divine voice: “If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor... and follow Me" (Matt. 19:21). Thus you have crucified yourselves to the world and are no longer "of the world." For if you were of the world, the world would love you; but since you are not of the world, "for this reason," perhaps, "the world hates you," according to the Lord's word (John 15:19). On that day you will have cause to boast, together with the holy Apostles, saying to the Lord: "We have left everything and followed You" (Matt. 19:27); and indeed, you have loved neither father nor mother, nor brothers nor sisters more than You, "but have counted all things as loss" (Phil. 3:8), considering it a great treasure to gain You alone. — Am I lying? Am I not speaking the truth? Is this not indeed what you have done? — For this reason, you will hear: "Come, you who are blessed by My Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25: 34); or: "Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, I will set you over many things; enter into the joy of your Lord" (Matt. 25: 21), or something similar to this.

23. Having been deemed worthy of such a great blessing and having entered into such a wondrous and heavenly life, do you not rejoice? Do you not exult? Do you not sing with David: "What shall I render to the Lord for all He has given me?" (Ps. 115: 3). — Yes; but add the following: "I will take the cup of salvation" (ibid.); and this means a readiness to shed one's blood as a martyr when required. — Truly, truly, there are many who long to see what you see, to hear what you hear, and to attain what you have attained; but whether for the sake of marriage, or for the sake of children, or for the sake of carnal friendships, or for the sake of worldly glory, or for the sake of wealth, or for the sake of worldly customs, or for the sake of various other established ways of outward life, they lack the strength to break away from the earthly and strive toward the heavenly—and they remain, outwardly appearing to be happy, yet inwardly burdened by many sorrows. Let us, then, give glory to God and strive always to add good to good and what is pleasing to God to what is pleasing to God, so that, prospering and perfecting ourselves in this way, we may remain, in mutual peace and harmony, in good order in everything—down to the smallest word, the slightest movement, a glance, or a step—and may we always be ready for the blessed passage through the gates of death into our blessed inheritance in heaven.

68. Peace in vain and trivial pursuits; but our goals are lofty, and our labors are fruitful

68. 1) Peace in vain vanities; but our goals are lofty, and our labors fruitful. — 2) Who gave us the strength to renounce the world? God, who blessed our desire. Let us therefore remain faithful to the path we have chosen. [1, 77]

24. Glory to God, who chose us from our mother's womb for this holy calling and called us to the wondrous and blessed heights of the monastic life. To us—though it may seem bold to say so, yet it is not foreign to the aims of monasticism—it has truly been granted to understand the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven more deeply than those living in the world, many of whom, though they see, do not see, being blinded in mind by the earthly affairs that captivate them. For what do they have? They delight in wealth and fleeting glory, rejoice in pleasures and delights, take delight in perfumes and fragrances, wine, soft garments, beautiful horses, a multitude of slaves, magnificent houses, the glitter of precious stones, and other various vanities; they laugh, dance, and leap about like goats and nanny goats, growing sated and fat, as if being prepared for slaughter. I will not mention their many other sinful customs, nor what arises from them or where they lead; let our words end here. For them, this is a source of boasting, pride, and comfort; but not for those who have crucified their flesh with its passions and desires—such as we are, "those who belong to Christ," according to the Apostle (Gal. 5:24), servants and children of our Lord Jesus Christ. We have different desires and a different inclination toward other things. We seek the consolations and delights originally intended for man in paradise, of which thoughtlessness deprived us in ancient times; and for this purpose, let us adopt the way of life of the ancient holy fathers, "who walked in skins of sheep and goats, of whom the whole world was not worthy" (Heb. 11:37), turn away from this alluring world, and draw near to God, gazing upward and striving toward Him. But by striving away from all things, we become rulers over all. Such is the greatness of our calling!

25. Who, then, has separated us from flesh and blood, from parents, relatives, and acquaintances, from our homeland, cities, and villages, and from everything with which we have been familiar since childhood? Who has led us to give ourselves as slaves to spiritual fathers and abbots and to undertake the ascetic labors of abstinence, vigil, and sleeping on the bare ground, performed day after day? Who has enlightened us and taught us to regard gold and silver, splendor and magnificence—even the very royal diadem and purple robe—

as nothing, and to consider it more worthy and more honorable to clothe ourselves in these ragged and patched garments than in shining robes? Who has given us the strength to renounce all that is sensual and carnal, to begin to conform to the heavenly through chastity, and to remain pure and uncorrupted like the angels? God has granted us all this because we have loved Him alone and desired the future blessings, eternal glory, inexpressible joy, unceasing gladness, inexhaustible riches, and all that has been promised from of old to our blessed fathers and prepared for all who zealously seek to please the One God. But if we have resolved to do this, have chosen it, and have committed ourselves to it, then let us strive with all our might to persevere in it, keeping a strict watch over ourselves, lest we somehow turn back and, on the appointed day, find ourselves lagging behind the laity. Let us take care to remain pure, to grow ever more firmly established in chastity, and not to allow ourselves to be corrupted—neither in mind, nor in sight, nor in heart, nor in body.

69. We must endure all the unpleasant things we encounter; and let us be worthy to join the ranks of the passion-bearers

69. 1) We must endure all the unpleasant things we encounter; and may we be worthy to join the ranks of the passion-bearers. – 2) Seek God, content with a humble state on earth, like the Savior. [1, 78]

26. I must watch over your souls, caring for you day and night, edifying you both in word and deed, so that I may lead you to the proper measure of perfection. But do not grow weary yourselves: for if I, unworthy as I am to be called your teacher, endure anything for your sake, then you too must endure for my sake and for one another's sake—sharing in one another's suffering and standing together, not regarding it as something alien to yourselves, not being terrified, not fleeing, and not losing heart in the face of the trials you encounter. We "have not yet resisted sin to the point of shedding blood" (Heb. 12:4), "have not yet passed through fire and water" (Ps. 65:12), as the holy martyrs have; we have not yet been wounded or put to the test, as each of the reverend and righteous ones has been. How, then, can we boast in the age to come that we, too, suffered for Christ, when we do not bear even the small troubles that come our way with courage and good cheer: any rebuke, humiliation, shame, dishonor, contempt—and I will add—a meager diet, little drink, ragged clothing, the toil of obedience, waking early for the service, standing during the psalm singing, and fulfilling the imposed penance. – Come now, my children, let us endure with good cheer all that is difficult and unpleasant, so that we may truly sing with David: "I have patiently waited for the Lord," and thereby, by God's mercy, be deemed worthy: "He attended to me and heard my prayer" (Ps. 39: 2). In the age to come, others will present different offerings: the thrice-blessed martyrs—their blood; the holy fathers—their greatest feats and virtues; and we—our humble endurance of what has been said above. And I know for certain that we will not be deprived of a share in these, as the divine Anthony attests.

27. "Seek God above all else, and your soul will live" (Ps. 68: 33). "Seek His face earnestly," that it may be reflected in your pure hearts (Ps. 104: 4). "Remember His wonders, which He has done" (Ps. 104:5) in us in years past and continues to do now, multiplying our brotherhood, nourishing us, and providing for all our needs in this life. And for all that He does for us, let us give Him due honor. Does He seek anything else from us but that we fear Him and love Him with all our heart and all our mind, and, to the best of our ability, imitate His incarnate life? Having come down from heaven, He was a stranger on earth, so that we too might turn our thoughts away from our own desires. He obeyed the Father so that you, too, might obediently listen to me, though I am unworthy. He humbled Himself even unto death so that you, too, might learn to do the same, humbling yourselves and being lowly in your thoughts, words, deeds, and actions. – What is true and divine glory, if not to be dishonored among people for God's sake? What is the honor and good name of a monk, if not to be dishonored for God's sake and counted among the dishonorable? And our Savior and God, having taken on flesh, chose what is humble and lowly in order to put to shame what is glorious and wealthy among people. For this reason, He is born in a cave, laid in a manger, called the son of a carpenter, known as a Nazarene, clothed in a tunic with a simple cloak, walks on foot, toiled, was threatened with stoning by the Jews, was reviled, arrested, crucified, pierced with a spear, laid in a tomb—and then rose again—so that He might inspire us to endure all things like Him in the presence of His angels, and then crown us in the Kingdom of Heaven.

70. What does God require of you? Renunciation of your own will and submission to the single will of your spiritual father; therefore, do not presume to set yourselves apart from others in anything, not even in doing good

70. What does God require of you? Renunciation of your own will and submission to the abbot's will alone; therefore, do not presume to set yourselves apart from others in anything, not even in doing good. [1, 79] What do I seek—or rather, what does the Lord of all and our God seek and require of you? Nothing other than that you submit yourselves well and show unquestioning obedience even unto blood, and in no way deviate from what you promised and resolved to live and act in before the holy angels. You yourselves know what your lips uttered and what vows you made when I tonsured each of you and clothed you in garments of joy and gladness, resolving your remaining unresolved transgressions, in the unshakable hope that through my humble resolution here on earth, God resolves them in heaven. Where, then, do these senseless thoughts, reckless judgments, meaningless words, and inappropriate desires for anything other than what has been commanded and established in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—through the mediation of my father and yours, with the consent of your predecessors—come from? – One wishes to fast as he pleases, another to remain silent as he sees fit, this one to study what he likes, that one to hold the office he seeks—then these are self-willed plans, furthermore, these are individual undertakings—and from this comes general decay? Is this why you came together?—“Did you partake of Christ? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul?” (1 Cor. 1:13). – These words apply well to those who, carried away by their own personal desires, do not look at or pay attention to the one thing that is made clear by my humility and thorough consideration of the matter. God does not seek or desire anything great or wondrous from you, but only that you maintain the fellowship to which He has called you—I dare not say, given my unworthiness and sinfulness—and that you live and act in accordance with the will and guidance of the shepherd given to you by Him, to the glory of His worshiped name. Here is the arena for the manifestation of your special greatness and wonder—or rather, the martyr's feat of your noble souls! If you are tempted, what is so wondrous about that? But by no means allow it to gain the upper hand over you, to the devil's delight, and do not heed the cunning and evil suggestions of this enemy of yours and of God, but focus solely on enduring everything to the end, growing rich in humility, and flourishing in love—without putting on a show, without raising your eyebrows, without seeking to be first, not to be harsh, not to stir up quarrels and arguments, to the ruin of those who hear. “Therefore, take up the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the schemes of the devil” (Eph. 6:14–15). – And may the Lord God grant you success and salvation!

71. The causes of sin are pride and disobedience; and from them comes every kind of sorrow; on the contrary, from humility and obedience

71. 1) The causes of sin are pride and disobedience; and from them comes every kind of sorrow; on the other hand, from humility and obedience comes every kind of good. – 2) You who have come to us from among the noble and the wealthy, do not exalt yourselves, but humble yourselves; imitate the Lord, who humbled Himself for our sake. – 3) Let us strive for a life that imitates God. [1, 80]

1. Let us be careful not to sicken in spirit, by distancing ourselves from the causes that give rise to these illnesses and thus avoiding the evil that accompanies them. The first cause of spiritual sickness is pride, because of which the morning star, who shone at dawn, fell; the second is disobedience, for which the first man was cast out of the paradise of bliss; and from both of these arose the darkness of the various kinds and forms of hateful sin. Does anyone, therefore, wish to enjoy prosperity? Stay far from pride and clothe yourself in humility, with unquestioning obedience; and joy and gladness will abide upon your head. For how many blessings will this good garment attract? —Peace, meekness, respectfulness, trust, unquestioning yielding—and all that is good, pleasant, and desirable, which characterizes a true man of God.

2. You who have come to us from a life of pride, do not set your minds on high things; having become humble in a life according to God, do not boast that you have come to us from a noble lineage, and do not boast about what you once had: for perhaps you are poor and lacking in divine grace. But looking to Christ, our Lord and God, the truly rich Lord of all, be humble (Rom. 12:16) in your thoughts and feelings, imitating the way He acted: He was poor in appearance, obeyed His parents, walked on foot, often grew weary, “when He was reviled, He did not revile in return; when He suffered, He did not resist” (1 Peter 2:23), endured blows to the cheek, did not distinguish Himself by His clothing, content with a single tunic and a cloak, slept on the grass or on the bare ground, and a single loaf of bread and running water satisfied His need for food. If now, having far more than all this, we are burdened and weary, what kind of imitators of the Lord are we?

3. Why do I implore you: let us strive courageously for a life that imitates God. As for us, who come from humble (by worldly standards) and not wealthy circumstances, what excuse can there be for us to be burdened and distressed over food, clothing, or other necessities, when we are provided for in all these things just as others are?—Let each of you who are in this situation remember what you were and what you have become. – Having said this, however, I do not wish to divide or distinguish between the first group and the second: for you are all one in essence. But I say this so that you may all willingly carry out what is commanded, and not speculate about my instructions—how, why, and for what purpose this or that is done.

72. How are penances and other corrective measures salvific? They are the path to paradise

72. 1) How are penances and other corrective measures salvific? They are the path to paradise. – 2) Indeed, our life of obedience in the community is more salvific than anything else. [1, 81]

4. How much better it is for us to grieve a little here and rejoice there, to endure punishment here and find joy there, to live in confinement here and in spaciousness there?! We ought to willingly submit to punishment and love those who correct us: for when we stray from God's path, should we not accept the healing remedies for the harm we have caused? For this very reason, it seems to me, our holy and compassionate fathers, moved by divine compassion, employed various strict measures for the salvation of their charges: they imposed penances, excommunications, and even corporal punishment—with what in mind? The salvation not only of those who were subjected to this, but also of those who witnessed it—both contemporaries and those who would follow—because many, even out of human fear, return to the right path. Why, if you endure my harshness, I assure you before the living God that you will be saved in the kingdom of heaven, where sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee; if you bear the yoke of submission, you will be freed from sinful passions and ascend to the sonship of God—you will quench the burning of lust and be deemed worthy to drink the refreshing and life-giving water in the eternal spring—you will successfully complete the path of obedience and receive victory wreaths from the great King.

5. So great and glorious is our communal life. Its yoke is both heavy and light, just as Christ's yoke is, which is the same, according to His word. The very reality of it bears witness to this; the truth itself reveals it. And let no one flatter or call a true obedient one—neither a pillar-sitter, nor a recluse, nor a hermit. I said “true” because a true obedient monk is only the one who has surrendered his soul to the abbot and abides in his will even unto blood. Having obtained such a blessing, we must rejoice and celebrate; for it is truly wondrous. – As for the one who lives apart, there is nothing to marvel at, even if he lives a blameless life. Let us, then, honor our way of life and maintain sincere obedience until death. We will not pay attention to whether others praise or slander us. If we fear God, we will not fear people, nor will we be defeated by their attacks. Keeping our lofty goal in mind, let us strive toward it by the Lord's way, and He will guide our course.

73. The path is arduous and sorrowful; but in return, immeasurable consolations await us: let us persevere

73. 1) The path is arduous and sorrowful; but in return, immeasurable consolations await us: let us endure. – 2) Thus did all the fathers endure; and now they find comfort, having forgotten it: let us imitate them. – 3) Have you heard a harsh word? Bear it; and since the Lord bore it, humbling Himself to the lowest place, you will endure this and every other sorrow. [1, 82]

6. Stand firm in the struggle, in your feat of submission and in your martyr-like obedience, and as day after day passes in this earthly life, enrich your souls with virtues as a pledge of the Kingdom of Heaven, and lay up for yourselves the ineffable blessings promised to us. The path of God is narrow and sorrowful; but the rest that awaits us is broad and spacious. The fiery arrows of the demons fall one after another upon the dwelling of our soul, but the dew of the Spirit, quenching them, directs the flowing water toward us into eternal life. Constriction and sorrow, despondency and faintheartedness, toil and sweat, weariness and exhaustion—and often, along with them, reproaches and rebukes. – This is our lot; yet for all this, an inexpressible joy is treasured for us, along with boundless gladness. – Come, then, let us courageously endure these few days of struggle, and be crowned with the crown of righteousness.

7. What labors did our most blessed fathers undertake as they spent their days in fasting, vigils, tears, prayers, and every kind of suffering? And now they have no sorrow left for the past: they have received unspeakable joy and all-blessed rest. So let us, too, look wisely upon the sorrows that sometimes befall us, regarding them as insignificant—or rather, as fleeting as a dream or a shadow—and let us not allow ourselves to be disheartened by them, but, undeterred, let us fulfill the Lord's commandments with youthful vigor. Let not strife grieve you, nor reproach shame you, nor rebuke disturb you, nor sorrow crush you, nor pride inflate you; but with eyes cast down and your soul set on heaven, be kind, gentle, patient, and yielding toward one another.

8. Suppose someone spoke a harsh word—so what? Why are you suffering from this insult? Christ, our God, heard, “You have a demon” (John 7:20)—and remained silent; He was accused of “casting out demons by Beelzebub” (Matthew 12:24)—and was not troubled. But we, who are by nature insignificant and in our lives worthy of every reproach, bristle like hedgehogs at the slightest offensive word. Why do we not taste more fully the sweetness of humility? Why do we not learn through experience the virtue of good submission? Why do we not take up the weapons of true monks? These weapons are not neat handwriting, not sweet singing, not a fair complexion, not tall stature, not elegance, not effeminacy, not a haughty worldly demeanor, not grandiloquence, not bold speech and retort, or anything else of the sort; but rather, to consider oneself the least of all and to regard everyone as superior to oneself; not to be quick to speak, especially harshly—not to be frivolous, but prudent; to pursue what is humble, as they say, and to be humble, be guided by it, to be accommodating, loving, and above all, free from envy. — You, however, know all this, as those taught by God, and you always do what is pleasing to God. Remain, then, as you are; be content with everyone; always be sincerely joyful, inspired by the one hope of our calling.

74. When the king summons guests to a feast, everyone hurries. The King of Heaven has called us; how can we not hurry, enduring all things? Let us not lose heart, but fight courageously against everything

74. 1) When a king summons guests to a supper, everyone hurries. The King of Heaven has summoned us; how can we not hurry, enduring everything? Let us not lose heart, but let us fight courageously against everything. – 2) Recall all that the Lord endured during His life on earth; and rejoice if you have to endure something similar. [1, 83]

9. If people, summoned by a king to glory, prosperity, wealth, comfort, and pleasure, strive toward these things diligently, wholeheartedly, and joyfully—should we not all the more so, being called by God, the King of all, not to these transient and insignificant things, but to the Kingdom of Heaven, to unceasing light, to endless life, to inexpressible bliss, to adoption as sons and the inheritance of eternal blessings—should we not, with joy and tireless zeal, day by day and hour by hour, heed this call and strive, as He directs, to overcome all obstacles, fearing nothing and stopping at nothing—neither sorrow nor hardship, nor hunger nor thirst, nor mortal dangers nor the sword—but marching courageously, alertly, and wholeheartedly along the ascetic path, bearing all things as light, for the sake of the all-blessed hope that lies before us. Losing heart and becoming faint-hearted in the face of trials happens because the soul has fallen asleep. Therefore, I implore you, looking toward the completion of your work, to take heart and patiently endure your humble and laborious station, manifesting its virtues: renunciation of one's desires, prompt action, silent endurance of sorrowful conflicts within the large brotherhood, and at times the reproaches of inferiors and rebukes from superiors—so that the words of the Apostle may truly apply to you as well: “To this very hour we go hungry and thirsty, we are in rags,” we know no rest, we are worn out; “yet in all these things we are more than conquerors through God who loved us” (1 Cor. 4:11; cf. Rom. 8:34).

10. “Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might” (Eph. 6:10), and add your present and future trials to your past feats and endurance of temptations, considering it a great joy that you have been deemed worthy to willingly endure these things for Christ the Savior and to become imitators of His sufferings: in this alone, those who understand the matter should see the greatest reward for themselves. Remember how much He suffered for us? Did He not act like a child in the flesh? Did He not flee from Herod's murderous cunning? Did He not obey His parents? At the age of twelve, did He not rebuke those gathered in the temple, even though He had not yet been taught?—He did this for those who were uneducated, so that they might not grieve. Did He not walk on foot, grow weary, and seek food from a fig tree? Was He not reviled by the Jews? Did He not hear, “You have a demon,” and, “O Beelzebub, prince of demons, He casts out demons”? Did they not want to stone Him, and did He not hide from them? And before that, during the forty-day fast, was He not tempted by the devil, just as a man is? And after that—did He not wash the disciples' feet, as one who serves? Was He not betrayed by a traitor? Was He not arrested by the Jews? Was He not mocked by Annas and Caiaphas? Was He not struck on the cheek by the hand of a servant? Was He not scourged by the hands of those whom He had created? Was He not crowned with a crown of thorns as a mockery? Did He not ascend the cross? Were His holy hands and feet not nailed to it? Did He not hear many insulting words on the cross? Were His sides not pierced by a spear? Was He not given gall to drink when He was thirsty? Was He not buried, and, as God, did He not rise again on the third day?—Can we, for our part, say that we have suffered anything like this? Show me, brother, has your back been scourged like that of your Christ? Are the marks of the blows visible on your cheeks? Have your ears been struck by countless mockeries, insults, and taunts? Have all your limbs been sanctified by suffering?—Of course, you have none of these things. So at least accept with good cheer and love the small afflictions that come your way, and the Lord, who loves mankind, in His boundless goodness, will glorify you for this in the life to come. Do this for the sake of your monastic vow: for the monastic vow is nothing other than a pledge to endure the cross and death for the Lord's sake.

75. Seeing the fruits of a good life, according to our rule, hold fast to it more strictly: and you will become a dwelling place of the Triune God

75. 1) Seeing the fruits of a good life, according to our rule, adhere to it more strictly: and you will become a dwelling place of the Triune God. – 2) Guided by the Word of Scripture, be blameless and pleasing to God in all things, shunning everything reprehensible. [1. 84]

11. Look at the state to which your unity of mind and heart has led you, and the fact that you have gradually disciplined yourselves to do every good deed. And what fruits has this not borne for you?—From this comes peace and quiet; from this comes sincere trust in one another and unbreakable unity; from this comes saving sorrow and beneficial confession; from this comes deep contrition and humility commensurate with it; from this comes brotherly love and a fatherly disposition. “In everything,” to quote the words of the Apostle, “you have shown yourselves to be pure” in all that is proper (2 Cor. 7:11). “Blessed be the Lord, for He has visited and brought salvation to His people” (Luke 1:68): “for you are His people, the chosen ones—and He has raised up a horn of salvation for you” (Luke 1:69), through your newly acquired good disposition. In this lies your joy and gladness, honor and good reputation, wisdom, sound judgment, and perfect knowledge, so that you may live a life that is praiseworthy and pure before God: of which none of those on the outside (for their judgments are sometimes applicable to our way of life) speak: “I call wise the one who leads an unblemished and blameless life, even if he is illiterate and unable to reason about the things the Greeks love to discuss.”—If even to those whose sole concern is to speak and hear it seems so, should we invent anything other than what has been established by the saints? Therefore, learn to fear and tremble before the Lord God and to keep His commandments; and grace will reveal you as “vessels chosen by Her, prepared for every good work” (2 Tim. 2:21). For where the indwelling of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit is present—for the sake of purity of soul—what goodness, what wisdom, what fervor of spirit, what instruction, edification, and guidance are there? But where this is lacking, there are only cold words, mere pretense and self-aggrandizement, and not infrequently deception and error, and always futility.

12. Pay attention to the reading, and let not the word of Scripture fall from you (let it not be forgotten). Keep your tongue from evil, especially you, the youngest ones, who are not accustomed to restraining this tongue—which is fickle and filled with deadly poison—and because of which so many of us constantly fall into sin. Let there be no deceitful associations among you; let not two of you conspire together in a way that is deceitful and Jewish in nature; let there be no falsehood or concealment among you, as with Ananias and Sapphira; let there be no secret schemes or evil plots among you, as with the Pharisees and Sadducees; let there be no “mine” and “yours” among you, filled with countless evils, as St. Chrysostom cries out: “The old has passed away; behold, all things have become new” (2 Cor. 5:17). Why should we recall the past (our former life) within ourselves only to avoid those same passions, and not to kindle in one another the fire of evil thoughts? “I hope that you are better than that and that you are holding fast to salvation” (Heb. 6:9). Perhaps this is why we fell into what was before—so that, as from the abyss and the storm, and from many tribulations, we might rush into our peaceful and quiet haven, and no longer wish to set out on a dangerous voyage amid the waves, but to remain calm and silent in this humble harbor of Christ Jesus, our Lord.

76. For those who live a holy life, every day is a feast. Do you desire this? Be zealous to please God, and endure everything for His sake

76. 1) Whoever lives a holy life always has a feast. Do you desire this? Be zealous to please God, and endure everything for His sake. – 2) Remember why we left the world, and let that be your goal; above all, guard your purity by avoiding fellowship with those who sin against it. [1, 85]

13. Whoever lives a holy life always has a feast; such a person never ceases to spend their days in celebration, being constantly enlightened, purified, and lifted up, always God-bearing and deified. If you wish to be such—be, I beg and implore you, self-motivated, eager, and enthusiastic for every good deed and every act pleasing to God, lifting your eyes to contemplate eternal blessings, and for this purpose, accept what you must accept, endure what you must endure, and bear whatever you encounter: sorrows, hardships, violence, needs, annoyances, slander, labors, toils, and everything else of this kind, so that we may attain what we desire and achieve that for which we left the world. Oh, how blessed it is, my fathers, to live righteously, wisely, and confidently! And how pious it is to spend our days in contrition, humility, and reverence, preparing for our departure, for the meeting with the dreadful Judge of all, God, and for our account before Him!

14. “Arsenius, for what purpose did you leave this world?” this venerable man would often say to himself as a saving reminder. May we, too, know why we have left the world, and may we strive with all our might to attain that end, adorning our lives with the beauty of virtues and preparing our souls as brides for the Lord—God—by observing the splendor of most holy virginity and keeping ourselves pure, spotless, and unstained: for we are called the temples of God; and “whoever destroys the temple of God, God will destroy him,” says Scripture (1 Cor. 3: 17). For this very reason I weep and wail over some, because, as they “did not deign to acknowledge God in their understanding,” the Savior, so He “delivered them over to a depraved mind, to commit what is unseemly” (Rom. 1: 28). I dare say that “you have become arrogant, and have not wept enough, so that the one who did this might be removed from among you” (1 Cor. 5: 2). From this comes negligence, and further, indifference: for you do not turn away from him as you ought. You associate with him and laugh together, becoming like the one of whom the Prophet speaks reproachfully: “If you saw a thief, you ran with him, and with the adulterer you shared your portion” (Ps. 49: 18). Do not, however, be angry with me for such a rebuke: for woe to me if I do not rebuke you and stand before you for righteous conduct; woe to you as well, if you do not distance yourselves from those who live wickedly..

77. Life is full of turmoil; but first, pray that your helmsman may be alert and wise; then take comfort in the hope of reaching a good end

77. 1) Life is full of turmoil; but first, pray that your helmsman may be alert and wise; then take comfort in the hope of reaching a good end. – 2) I hear that there is much quarreling among you over trifles—due to a lack of humility. – 3) Saints Dorotheus, Dosipheus, Akakios, and others accepted everything silently and humbly and remained at peace. – 4) We are troubled by our own desires, and their unfulfillment disturbs us: for we have forgotten the reward for renouncing them. – 5) Many among us fall ill: be patient with the sick, and those caring for them should serve humbly. See to it that there is no disorder when the doctor is called. And after recovery, do not remain idle—nor act recklessly. [1, 86]

15. Again and again, remain good-natured, be patient, and take courage as you endure the invisible and visible trials that come your way, whether from demons or from people. Who does not see how full of struggles your life is? Who will not testify to how sorrowful your path is? From there, daily, trials rise up against you, and from there, agonizing misfortunes strike—sometimes conflicts with the brethren, sometimes troubles and ceaseless jostling while fulfilling your duties, pressures from all sides—as if we were being tossed about in the depths, sailing across this vast and calamitous sea of the world, having raised the sail of hope and heading toward heaven. But pray first of all that your helmsman, by divine power and the prayers of the Father, may always keep the eyes of his mind open, and seeing, may see, and watching, may watch, so that he may steer your ship well and guide it by faith to the harbor of life; then rejoice and be glad that, having sailed this sea of life with such toil, you will inherit eternal life. Under no circumstances should you allow yourself to waver, stop, or be held back by anything, but rather proceed cheerfully, vigorously, and resolutely, moving forward and taking up everything that can be used to trample the ancient serpent—the devil—and fulfill the Lord’s commandments. Are you young and just beginning your spiritual journey? Embrace humility and obedience and hold fast to them, so that, having made a good start, you may gradually rise to perfection. Have you been wearing the monastic habit for a long time? Let yourself be recognized as such by the excellence of your virtue, not by the number of years.

16. I say this to you because I hear that there is idle chatter and quarreling among you, as well as confusion, irritation, and outbursts of anger, along with insults, cursing, and strife—though not among all of you. I ask you, brothers, where does this come from? What are the causes of this? I believe it stems from nothing other than a lack of humility. I therefore implore you with the words of the Apostle: “Do not be children in your thinking, but be infants in evil” (1 Cor. 14:20); do not engage in idle chatter without any benefit, and in your desire to have your way, do not resort to rhetoric or idle talk, wearing yourselves out with this and that and putting forward various reasons. ““Who,” asks the Prophet, “is the man who desires life and loves to see good days?” And he himself answers: “Keep your tongue from evil, and let your lips not speak deceit; turn away from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it” (Ps. 33: 13–15).

17. Why did St. Dorotheus see good days and lead a peaceful life? Why did the wonderful Dosipheus, the ever-memorable Akakios, and the entire assembly of such saints enjoy the same? Or—may this not be considered presumptuous—why did some even from our brotherhood—both those still living and those who have departed—live here blissfully, free from turmoil and anxiety? But is this the reason? Is it not because each of them considered himself nothing and was ready to submit to everyone and in every matter?

18. As for me—not to say, “as for you”—vanity, self-will, and sensuality prevent me from living in peace, from being at peace with others, or from spending the few days of this life in simplicity and without malice. Therefore, whoever is troubled and burdened should reproach himself, not his neighbor. Whoever wishes to walk righteously and live in peace should not insist on his own desires—and then sorrows will cease, disputes will fall silent, and wild beasts, as in the book of Job, will be at peace with him. Furthermore, know and believe that for wearing clothes we do not want, for mended shoes, for an unwanted cloak, for a change in obedience, for enduring abuse, for bearing slander—for all these small things—the Kingdom of Heaven awaits you. Let us therefore strive with all our strength to please the Lord! And blessed is the one who maintains, performs, and fulfills his service as if God were watching him.

19. These are trying times for us, and many of the brothers have fallen ill. Take heart, you who are sick; the time for your work has come; do not miss the opportunity to gather greater rewards for the repose of the sick, more precious than gold and precious stones. As for you who are sick, reap the fruits of patience; do not demand more than what is given, lest your soul become sick along with your body. – And why are you still so ill-mannered that, when the doctor comes, you all rush to him, asking questions, showing him your limbs, and naming your ailments? – Aren’t you ashamed before a layman? Perhaps next time, he won’t come here at all. That is why I feel particularly compelled to point this out to you and correct you. Why don’t you follow the proper order? You can all speak in turn about yourselves and your illnesses, and in case of need, you can convey your message through the hospital attendant or his assistant. But this disorder—it’s nothing but evil. Not like this, my children; and let this not happen again. – Furthermore, do not use your illness as an excuse to be idle, and after you recover, do not wander aimlessly here and there, nor be intemperate, lest you fall ill again and become a burden to the healthy. But you who are healthy, for the Lord’s sake and for the sake of brotherly love, serve patiently and bear the infirmities of the infirm.

78. Just as we take every precaution when the Arabs approach so as not to fall into their hands, so let us guard against our mental enemies, putting on the armor of God

78. 1) Just as we take every precaution when the Arabs approach, so as not to fall into their hands, so let us guard against our mental enemies, putting on the armor of God. – 2) Let us not give in, but fight courageously, and we will attain the peace of dispassion. [1, 87]

20. At the present time, the Arabs strike fear into our hearts—they attack suddenly and not only plunder our possessions but also take people captive; and those they do not take away, they mercilessly exterminate, killing men and women, the old and the young. But if we look closely, we will see that we, too, are subjected to no less terrifying attacks and tyranny—only not from people, but from demons. They wage a ceaseless and fierce war against us, knowing neither rest nor a set time: one is struck by the arrow of sin, another is bound by the snares of passions and led captive into a mental Egypt; in one, every limb of soul and body is filled with the poison of sinful desires; in another, they steal the seed of God’s saving word and torment him with hunger; and these predators and tyrants subject us to various forms of abuse and torture. – Blessed among you is such a warrior of Christ who, arming himself with the spiritual sword of faith, strikes but is not struck, inflicts wounds but does not receive them, conquers but is not taken captive. But let us all take heart, and, taking up the weapons of our warfare—not carnal, but spiritual—let us overcome those who fight against us, holding fast to the ranks and helping one another. Let no one be without armor, which, according to the Apostle, is true faith; let no one be without a shield, which is humility; no one without the sword, which is divine prayer; no one without the helmet, which is obedience; no one without the steed of the soul, which is a lively readiness for every good deed; and no one without the rest of the armor that protects our inner man. Let us not allow our enemies to wound us, strike us down, or cast us at their feet. The Lord, mighty in battle, who with the weapon of the cross struck down the principalities and powers of the ruler of this age, “has given us authority to tread on serpents and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy” (Luke 10:19).

21. Take heed, then, and do not be presumptuous; for those who give themselves over to presumption are struck down as by a spear—and die. Take care not to act according to your passions, for those who act according to their passions die an eternal death. Likewise, do not entertain wicked thoughts in your mind—for such people fall into captivity; do not fall into disobedience, for the disobedient expose themselves to the enemy’s arrows; do not be proud, for through pride you are under the sword of sin; do not be lazy, and do not neglect psalm-singing and manual labor, for by doing so you deliver yourselves into the hands of the devil; this is especially true if you secretly do evil, while outwardly appearing to be something other than what you are inside. The Apostle speaks of all this: “Be careful how you walk, not as unwise but as wise, making the most of the time, for the days are evil” (Eph. 5:16). Since we are already seasoned, we must also have sufficient military experience; and one who has learned to fight does not fear enemies. Therefore, I urge and implore you, the honorable army of the Lord, His holy people, His chosen warriors: let us not be timid or give in. But if we have been wounded, let us heal our wounds through repentance; if we have been slain, let us be revived through tears and penance; if we have been led captive to a spiritual Babylon, let us be set free through communion with the holy Body of our Lord Jesus Christ. If we thus persevere patiently in the struggle, the battle will gradually subside, the enemies will flee, the peace of dispassion will shine within us, and we will be called the Sons of God: for it is said, “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God” (Matt. 5:9).

79. Time is running out: you must be vigilant, as you are doing, taking special care to cultivate humility and meekness, imitating Christ

79. 1) Time is running out: we must be vigilant, as you are, taking special care to cultivate humility and meekness, imitating Christ. – 2) The angels and the saints are watching; it is shameful not to live as we ought: though it is difficult, “ ” a great reward awaits. – 3) Both heaven and hell lie before us: whoever chooses one will receive it. – 4) Whoever acts according to his passions—his work is wood and hay; he will burn forever without being consumed. [2, 1]

22. Time flies, carrying us toward the end of this present life. But who is wise enough to understand this and seek it—so as not to waste time in life, indifferent to the matter of salvation, due to the cunning of the devil’s schemes? Who walks, heeding himself, not succumbing to carelessness, but in daily preparation for death, presenting every deed of his—spiritual and bodily—before the face of God the Almighty? Who, lifting the eye of his soul upward to heaven and beholding the beauties of the visions there, transfers all his love to the longing for that realm, soaring together with the heavenly powers, and regarding all heavy hardships as nothing, but cheerfully enduring both reproach and humiliation and suffering—hunger and thirst, cold and heat, and moving among the brotherhood like a precious stone, as is written?—Among you, however, I see not just one or two, but many who, with sincere faith and zeal, seek what is worthy, and who are also attentive to guidance, obedient, enduring, open-hearted, trusting, and faithful—even though they have not received a formal education, nor have they made up for this deficiency through extensive reading, reflection, or memorization; they possess only one thing, which is most necessary and by which they conform themselves to Christ—namely, humility and meekness—heeding the Lord’s words: “Learn from Me, for I am meek and humble in heart” (Matt. 11:29). Turn your attention, then, to light and truth, to righteousness and meekness, humility and goodness. I beg you, refrain from all irritation and indignation. “O sons of men,” cries out St. David, “how long, O hard-hearted ones? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood?” (Ps. 4:3). “How long will the enemy mock, and the adversary provoke?” (Ps. 73:10).

23. Forgive me; I am ashamed before the Holy Angels, for they watch over us as our guardians; I am ashamed before the holy and venerable fathers, whose way of life we have taken upon ourselves and whose example we follow. Let us, then, brothers, perform what is pious in a pious manner and carry out what is holy in a holy manner. I beg you, do not be hard-hearted, disobedient, or contentious; do not be harsh in speech, quick to anger, or boastful; do not be mockers, slanderers, or defamers; do not be talkative, ridiculous, or insolent. Be God-loving, not lustful; be silent, not idle in speech; be content with simple clothing, and do not love to show off; keep your eyes downcast, but your mind on high; look around you, lest the arrow of sin strike you through your carelessness. What, then, will come of this?—Instead of toil, rest will be prepared; instead of feats of valor, crowns; instead of insults, honor and glory; instead of humiliation—praise; instead of piercing—joyful greetings; instead of slavery—rule over ten cities; instead of separation from parents and relatives—the inheritance and joint inheritance of our Lord Jesus Christ; and for renouncing your own will—a place alongside the first martyr, Stephen; and that is temporary, fleeting, and as transient as a shadow, but this is eternal, immortal, and without end.

24. If you desire to attain the Kingdom of Heaven, if you desire to taste eternal life, if you desire to receive adoption as sons, if you desire to be inhabitants of Paradise, if you desire to rest in Abraham's bosom, if you desire to be admitted into the unmade-by-hands bridal chamber, or to receive anything else of this kind, all this is possible for you, accessible, at hand, and ready. – But if you desire the opposite of all this—unquenchable fire, a worm that never sleeps, the flames of Gehenna, gnashing of teeth, the lot of the goats, the fate of the damned—you will encounter all of this; may it never befall you! But it will not be so if we do not live well, if we do not cultivate a good disposition, and if we do not remain steadfast in our calling. Whoever is like this saves his own soul, saves his brothers, and saves me, a poor man. He who acts well and walks in the fear of God is upright before the Lord; his word and his countenance are upright; he is blessed, and he will leave behind a blessed memory.

25. What good does hard-heartedness do to the hard-hearted, defiance to the defiant, disobedience to the disobedient, and pride to the proud? Is he not storing up wrath for himself on the day of wrath and the revelation of God's righteous judgment? And is not his work like wood, hay, and straw, and will not this come to pass upon him: "His work will be burned up; he himself will be saved, yet so as through fire" (1 Cor. 3:12, 15)? That is to say, in the age to come, he will be burned by the fire of hell in his body; while his soul will be tormented and his heart torn apart, immeasurably and endlessly, as he beholds the glory of the Saints, longing for it yet seeing himself deprived of it for all eternity. May such a fate and such a condition never befall any of you! Therefore, while we are still here, let us purify ourselves with the fire of the fear of God, so that we may not experience the future flame.

80. I commend your obedience: continue in this way; and both those who assign duties and those who carry them out—act with reverence toward God

80. 1) I commend your obedience; continue in this way. Both those who give instructions and those who receive them—act with reverence toward God. – 2) Abound in acts of mercy, imitating God, without pride if we succeed in what we do, and without discouragement if we do not. [2:2]

1. See how you are growing, how you are rising, how you are improving, what fruits you bear for God and for us, and how, by living a good life, you are winning your souls through obedience. In your humility, you have exalted the horn of your life; in your obedience, you have shown the testimony of your conscience, that you carry out your duties without deceit or hypocrisy. And may you always remain this way. – When, for example, one is assigned to one task and another to another, let this be done, I beg you, neither with partiality, nor with hostility, nor with negligence; but as in the presence of the all-seeing God, let one assign the task and the other accept it prudently, conscientiously, and commendably, so that on that day they may hear: "Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a little, I will set you over much; enter into the joy of your Lord" (Matt. 25: 21). Forgive me, but those who do not act in the fear of God—but rather with partiality—whether in providing what the brethren need—clothing, shoes—or in assigning duties, are unworthy of such a voice; but rather they will hear this: "Cursed is everyone who does the work of God with negligence" (Jer. 48: 10). For how much evil does this give rise to? On the one hand, servility; on the other, grumbling and the disruption of peaceful relations. I say this not so that those who receive may rebel against those who distribute, but so that you, the distributors, may act in the best possible way in the part of administration entrusted to you, out of the fear of God and out of brotherly love. If you act in this way, then order, peace, and tranquility will grow stronger and take deeper root in our beloved brotherhood.

2. I ask and implore you: fill your hearts with all kinds of good deeds, devote yourselves to mutual love for one another, rejoice in one another's success, and grieve over your neighbor's stumbling. "As is the earthly man, so are the earthly things; and as is the heavenly man, so are the heavenly things," says the Apostle (1 Cor. 15:48). But the heavenly God "loves mercy and justice" (Ps. 32:5), and "the whole earth is full of His mercy" (118:64), as St. David sings. Let us imitate Him as well, and let us do this today; tomorrow we will strive for something else, and in doing so, let us neither lose heart because of failure nor boast because of success. But for the latter, let us give thanks to the Lord: for this is "not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy" (Rom. 9:16); as for the former, let us persevere, and it will be ours: for the Lord assures us that "everyone who seeks finds, and to those who knock, the door will be opened" (Matt. 7:8). Thus, day by day you will work out the salvation of your souls, ascending ever higher and higher. Now is the time for true, imperishable acquisition—the time for a race (contest), but a spiritual one—the time for enrichment, but with eternal blessings. Blessed is the one who runs; thrice blessed is the one who endures; most blessed is the one who kindles within himself daily the fire of longing for God and love for Him.

81. Let us beware of the uprising of passion, which is more terrible than the sword, by shielding ourselves with the commandments and arming ourselves with aversion

81. 1) Let us be mindful that the uprising of passion is more fearsome than the sword, shielding ourselves with the commandments and arming ourselves with aversion to sin. – 2) Today one demon rises up, tomorrow another: we must repel them all in the name of the Lord and by compelling ourselves to do good; and do not lose heart when penance is imposed. [2, 4]

3. Let them sharpen swords against me, let them inflict wounds, let them cast me out, let them threaten me with death; I do not fear these things as much as I fear the devil's attack rising up in my humble soul, when sin, reigning in my body like an armed host, sends forth against virtue a multitude of frenzied passions. Then I dread the arrow of sinful pleasure, which wounds not the flesh but the heart; then I fear the blood that is shed not upon the earth, but upon the soul by an invisible sword. This is what I fear, and this is what makes me tremble. Let us therefore be vigilant, my brothers, and watch lest any slanderer, or proud thought, or the sweetness of sin, —a predator, or rebellious disobedience, or ruinous self-will, or unrepentant hardness of heart, or unyielding obstinacy, or unconvincing self-justification, or anything else that might disturb the soul. But let us shield ourselves with the divine commandments as if with ramparts; and we will always remain whole and safe. If, however, any such predator should happen to enter, then as soon as we notice it, let us seize it at once, bind it, and cast it far away from us. Let us arm ourselves above all against the passions, embracing the inaccessibility of the heart and the strength of the spirit, so that when we are assailed, we may not fall, but repel and cast far away those invisible enemies who rise up against us.

4. Today one such demon fights against us; tomorrow another will attack; and after that, yet another—such as fornication, gluttony, arrogance, pride, insolence, self-will, and countless other passions. We must stand against them all, wage war against them all, and defeat them all, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will crown us with the victory wreath on the day of judgment. Blessed are you, brother, who hear this, understand it, and keep it—and, I would add, who discipline yourself daily for the spiritual battle. For the work of salvation is necessary, and only those who discipline themselves will attain the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, you should not be surprised when you find yourselves in temptation; for it comes upon you to test you and to train you for battle. Do not lose heart when you are admonished, rebuked, given penance, or, if necessary, excommunicated; but be of good cheer, be alert, and take up the task with great zeal; for in this lies your salvation, in this—your success, in this—your martyrdom, and for this—your crowns.

82. The brother has left. Why? He did not heed himself and succumbed to deceptive thoughts; if he had heeded himself, the psalms' counsel would have set him straight; and his will was not firm

82. 1) The brother has left. Why? He did not heed himself and succumbed to seductive thoughts; if he had heeded himself, the psalms' counsel would have set him straight; and his will was not firm. – 2) The soldiers of the earthly king remain loyal to him for the sake of earthly benefits: should we not remain loyal to the Heavenly King for the sake of the heavenly kingdom? Let us therefore be such, following the example of our fathers. [2, 5]

5. I have urged you to be mindful of yourselves against the enemy's slanders. Now I will point out the evil fruit of not being mindful of oneself: our poor brother Avvakum has fled from us. Of course, this is because he was not mindful of himself and lacked mental vigilance. He did not hold thoughts faithful to God and pious—thoughts that could have fought for him—but rather seductive ones that hid God and His truth from his soul; that is why he suffered what he did: he excommunicated himself from our midst and followed in the devil’s footsteps. And where does he now wander, like a sheep preyed upon by wild beasts, without guidance or a shepherd?—How can he now sing praises to God, from whom he has fallen away by breaking his vows? How can he sing, “Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked,” having set out on such a path? Or how can he say, “This is my rest forever; here I will dwell, for I have chosen it” (Ps. 131: 14)? And the words, “I have waited patiently for the Lord; He has inclined to me and heard my prayer” (Ps. 39: 2), are far from him. He will find the following words from the Psalms more fitting for himself: “Cursed are those who turn aside from Your commandments” (Ps. 118:21). He is cursed, and he will remain so, unless the Lord God, through the prayers of my father and yours, and with your assistance, leads him to repentance. But why does this happen to us? Why does Satan find us as his tools and carry us off? Why do we allow ourselves not to be held fast by the fear of God, nor clothed in the armor of love for Christ our God? Why do we allow ourselves to be overcome by our lusts and thus become cold, adulterers, unstable, and—to put it bluntly—barren? Where is our faith in the fathers? Where is our love for our brothers? And how can you save yourselves from sensual and mental temptations when, at the slightest touch of adversity, you are completely overcome and, without even entering the arena of the contest, turn back?

6. Do you see the soldiers of the earthly king—how they remain loyal to him, fight for him, and shed their blood? And for what reason?—To receive some honors or ranks. Our deeds are not like that. They are for the sake of the one eternal and invisible King of all, God—not for anything earthly, but to obtain the Kingdom of Heaven, to become co-heirs with Christ the Lord, to partake of what no eye has seen, what no ear has heard, and what has not even entered the human heart. And yet we do not all, nor do we always, remain faithful to Him; we can be lured, beguiled, and carried away. But should we not remain sober? Should we not strengthen ourselves? Should we not stand firm even to the point of shedding blood? Is our birth not from above? Are we not children of the Light? How then can we fail to show ourselves to be children of obedience? How can we fail to show that we are holy seed? How can we not bring every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ? How can we not rise above worldly wisdom? How can we not die for Christ, even if we were to die for Him at least once a day?—O my children! Let us be sons of strength, warriors of Christ, truly God’s people, a choir of angels, an unshakable army, following the example of our holy fathers and those blessed ones who lived under their guidance, so that we may have Satan trampled and despised under our feet, just as Saint Silvanus, the Venerable Dosipheus, the ever-memorable Zacharias, and all the disciples of the holy fathers. For it is not only Dosipheus, nor only Silvanus, nor only Zacharias who are glorified, but all their faithful disciples and followers also share in their glory. Let us, I beg you, be like them. Let us not allow ourselves to be overcome by the enemy’s slanders; let us not be intimidated by their threats; let us not allow ourselves to be put to death by sin; but let us live out all the remaining days and hours of our lives, pleasing the Lord our God.

83. Let nothing separate us from the love of God; but let us persevere in our labors and virtues until we attain the measure of Christ

83. 1) Let nothing separate us from the love of God; but let us persevere in our labors and virtues until we attain the measure of Christ. – 2) By renouncing the world, we have accomplished a great deed; let us not bring shame upon this undertaking through negligence and self-indulgence, but rather by imitating the fathers. [2, 6]

7. When some calamity befalls the people, and all are in turmoil, we must turn to God day and night, praying with tears and sighs that He may turn His wrath into mercy and restore peace to the world, for His inscrutable wisdom is revealed through such events—without, however, neglecting our spiritual duties, but rather turning even the common calamity that befalls us to their benefit. For, as the Apostle said, “all things work together for good for those who love God” (Rom. 8:28); so that neither the present calamity nor any other more terrible one—or, to use the Apostle’s words, “neither death nor life, neither angels nor principalities, neither powers nor things present nor things to come, neither height nor depth, nor any other created thing, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:38–39). Therefore, as we lift our hearts to God and gaze upon the blessings reserved there, let us perform the task set before us with joy, steadfastness, and zeal, neither slacking off in discouragement, nor growing weary from fasting, nor becoming exhausted by vigil, nor growing bored with prayer, nor becoming numb from the labors of fulfilling other commandments; but striving and hastening toward all this, as toward some feast and rejoicing, or rather, as toward the light, as toward God Himself; and in this way we shall ascend from strength to strength in the fulfillment of the commandments, and from glory to glory in adorning ourselves with virtues, growing ever richer in divine perfections, “until we all attain to the unity of the faith, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4:13), for Whom we have been crucified to the world, and the world has been crucified to us (Gal. 6:14), for Whom we have forsaken all things and counted them as loss, that we may gain Christ alone (Phil. 3:8).

8. See, my children, what a great and momentous deed we have accomplished by fleeing from the world and renouncing all worldly things—kinship and homeland, parents, brothers, and sisters, cities and homes, and everything in general that brings comfort to flesh and blood? – Let us not bring shame upon such a work of ours through laziness, carelessness, and inattention; and this will happen if we begin to fulfill the desires of the flesh and act according to the passions of the soul. Such were not our holy and reverend Fathers, who left us examples of God-imitating humility, unquestioning obedience, sincere faith, aversion to the world, love for God, wondrous feats, and pious deeds. Let us imitate them as well, striving to follow in their footsteps, so that we may be deemed worthy of a share in their blessings.

84. Who are such wicked people? All who live wickedly; especially those dissatisfied with the meager monastic provisions, contrary to their vows

84. 1) Who is not guilty of such wickedness? All who live wickedly; especially those dissatisfied with the meager monastic provisions, contrary to their vows. – 2) One must be content with what is offered at the meal, regarding any worldly comfort as a diminution of eternal comfort, as I myself always feel. – 3) Our meals are not poor; and at the infirmary, both the meals and everything else are very good. – 4) I will add: you yourselves have brought nothing to the monastery, yet you demand this and that; meanwhile, you are capable of almost nothing, while others, who are better than you, labor in every way and endure. The righteous wrath of God is upon you. [2, 7]

9. “Do not work for perishable food,” says the Lord, “but for food that endures to eternal life” (John 6:27), that is, keep the commandments, “studying the Lord’s law day and night,” so that you may be like “a tree planted by the streams of water,” according to the words of the divine David; and may your “fruit” be “given in its season,” and may the “leaf” of your salvation “not wither” in the age to come. “Not like the wicked; not like them, but like the dust that the wind sweeps away from the face of the earth” (Ps. 1: 3–4). Let us consider “the wicked” to be not only those who believe wrongly, but also all who transgress the Lord’s commandments; and as applied to our order, these will be the disobedient, the proud, the cunning in speech, the vain, the insolent, as well as those who eat in secret, the grumblers, those who love to adorn themselves, curious (always prying and prying for information), idlers, the careless, whisperers, the wayward, slanderers, and above all, the ungrateful and those who demand more than is proper? – They are not content with the gifts given by God (i.e., what is offered to everyone in the monastery), but, having neglected the care of their souls and indulging their bodies, they seek and demand food and drink of which they are unworthy, and they quarrel over them, citing their physical constitution, habits, and infirmities as excuses. And it would be good if they were to actually fall ill; perhaps through this they would be rid of the greatest of all illnesses—ingratitude. – As if they had forgotten, those wretches, what they promised to God when they joined us, and what they confessed before many witnesses, both invisible and visible! Did they not promise to endure hunger and thirst, to bear every kind of sorrow and hardship, famine, persecution, torment, and death? And now they are waging war over wine and food! – But just as they have despised their vow, so will they themselves be despised; and since they have failed to remember that God was the witness and hearer of their promises, I fear that “He may deliver them over to a depraved mind, to do what is unseemly” and destructive (Rom. 1: 28).

10. Come to your senses, then, whoever you are; above all, rouse your souls from slumber, from neglect of the divine, from worldly inclination, from being “neither hot nor cold.” Be inflamed with divine love and fear. Accept discipline and put on the armor of righteousness. Tremble and fear, and do not quarrel over what is served at the table. I do not speak of times when there is stew, fish, and cheese, but even when only bread with oiled vegetables, overcooked beans, or something similar is offered, consider this a great comfort. And which of the humble-minded would not fear this, wondering how even such comfort might cause them to lose eternal blessings? As for myself, I consider every meal and drink to be provisions for the journey to hell, especially those given to me during my infirmity. Believe me, even though I speak in madness, that if I had not been overcome by a great fear of disobeying our common father and had not been persuaded by your wise counsel, I would never have altered my usual diet until my very death. It was for this reason alone that I ate and drank various things; but—and I will say this even in my madness—I did so with a heavy heart, with groaning and sorrow, on the one hand because of my unworthiness, and on the other because of my concern for you who are infirm and because of the scarcity in the monastery.

11. However, by the grace of Christ the Lord, we have what we need: give glory to God, you ungrateful ones! We drink wine, eat oil and fish, and rest and receive medical care in the infirmary—and this not just once or twice, but every day. —A chosen brother, who has gained experience in treating illnesses, is our chief infirmarian; he has three, four, or five assistants; a dedicated cook, a dedicated steward, and a dedicated preparer of ointments, plasters, bandages, and dressings; and the work there never ceases for a single minute. And the expenses are considerable: fish is provided every day, obtained either from the condemned prisoners—three or four fishermen—or at the market; a great deal of wine—and of what kind—has been and continues to be consumed; as well as olives, honey, fine bread, and much more. —How can we, the ungrateful, fail to give thanks for all this? How can we fail to give glory to God? How can we fail to sing His praises?

12. I'll add this: we ourselves have brought nothing to the monastery, and our work yields no profit; yet they keep asking us for this and that. —And yet we are good for nothing—neither to stand at the gates nor to serve at the refectory. But we do not even realize—insensitive and senseless as we are—that we may be the last, and that others, more honorable than we, our brothers and fathers, some outside and others inside the monastery, whether in the cold and wind or in the heat and scorching sun, like slaves, dig, plow, prune the vines, wash, sew, forge, and walk on foot on errands to the city, to the fields, to the mountains—they overexert themselves and grow weary; yet they endure it all calmly. —Truly, the Kingdom of Heaven belongs to such as these! But you, O blind one, O hard-hearted one, O deceitful one, O desperate one! Take heed, lest you hear on that day: “Bind his hands and feet, and cast him into outer darkness” (Matt. 22:13). Woe to you! You disregard God's wrath, seeing that He does not punish immediately. Truly, it is said of you: “The fool says in his heart, ‘There is no God’” (Ps. 52:2). Why? Because you “have become corrupt and detestable in your deeds, and you do not do what is good. But the Lord ‘looks down from heaven’ every day, ‘to see who understands and seeks Him’ (Ps. 13: 1, 2), and He inscribes such people in the Book of Life, while He passes over the rest. I fear that if Saint David had not come, he would not have sung of you—and the words of the psalm would not have come true for you: “I have divided them in their womb” (Ps. 16: 14). Whom?—these wicked ones from those who walk in righteousness. —But “Understand this, you who forget God: there is no one to rescue, and there will be no deliverer” (Ps. 49:22). And forgive me, my beloved children, for in my foolishness, out of love and with tears, I have spoken this to you, thinking that it is better for me now to chastise you with words than to be subjected later to eternal chastisement—from which may we all be delivered by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

85. It is bitter that two more have left

85. 1) It is bitter that two more have left. — 2) Thus, one must not rely on oneself or on others. — 3) We do very little—and yet we do not know how we exalt ourselves—which is why we fall. — 4) Take heed to yourselves; and pray for them. [2, 8]

13. Again temptation, again seduction; again I, poor soul, am in tears and lamentation, that my beloved ones have turned away (two brothers have fled), that those who lived in high esteem have fallen to the ground, that those “who thought themselves wise” have been darkened, that those who had endured a great and long struggle and the toil of piety have lost everything in a single moment, and have become for me thorns instead of grapes, sorrow instead of joy, and misfortune instead of the happiness I had hoped for. And I do not know what to say or how to speak of the fall and ruin of our brothers; except perhaps to sit and weep, saying: if this is so, then “who can be saved,” O Lord.

14. Thus, one cannot praise a man until the very end of his life. Thus, the path of our salvation is so difficult and full of trials. And who will escape so many snares of the devil? And who will not be preoccupied with himself until the very end of his life? Knowing this well, that holy father, already at the very gates of death, when the devil said to him, “You have escaped me,” replied, “I do not know.” So fearful was he for himself that even in this final hour of his life, it seemed he did not dare to have firm confidence in his own salvation, despite the great measure of his pious labors.

15. But we, if we live five or ten years in a monastery and become accustomed to the monastic rule, or memorize a few passages from Scripture, or perform so many prostrations, or pray longer and fast more, then we consider ourselves to have accomplished everything and begin to be conceited. For this reason, “we fall like leaves” (Prov. 11:14); our “bones are crushed in hell” (Ps. 140:7), and we “wither away before we can rejoice” (Ps. 128:6). We consider ourselves wise, though we are uneducated; eloquent, though we are speechless: we appoint ourselves as teachers, as zealots for piety, and as its faithful representatives; and we claim that the truth remains only in us. That is why this has happened to us; that is why we take darkness for light; that is why, as if from paradise, we have become exiles from Christ’s court and from His flock.

16. Take heed to yourselves, my brothers, I beg you, and do not let your virtue and your faith dwindle little by little, lest you be completely depleted and fall into the hands of ruin. As for those who have strayed, let us pray earnestly that the Lord may enlighten them and bring them back to us.

86. I take comfort in your steadfastness and perseverance; continue to excel and strive even more—and God’s blessing will be upon you; but those who are not like this are not of God

86. 1) I am comforted by your steadfastness and perseverance; continue to excel, even by pushing yourselves—and God’s blessing will be upon you; but those who are not like this are not of God. – 2) We have been completely transformed and made new through baptism, repentance, and our vow: let us not, then, rebuild what we have destroyed, nor return to the world from which we have come, like the Israelites who, after leaving Egypt, longed for it; may my words stir you to this, and may the Lord help you. [2, 9]

17. Every day I bless God, my Father, who gives you the strength and fortitude to stand firm in your ascetic obedience, and I humbly pray that the Lord may open your spiritual eyes more and more, so that you may see all His ways, come to perceive the longing of divine love for Him, put to sleep every carnal desire, and rise above the power of the passions, so that you “may be perfect and complete in every good work” (Col. 4: 12). – And this, as you know, does not happen without strenuous effort, nor without suffering, nor suddenly, but on the condition that, with great toil and self-exhaustion, day and night, we subdue and overcome our nature, and endure all the afflictions that befall us in our communal life, whether from people or from demons. For whoever does not faint under this burden, but with God’s help endures and perseveres through it all, will “receive the blessing of the Lord and the mercy of God his Savior” (Ps. 23:5), and will be deemed worthy of the kingdom of heaven. Therefore, it is good and blessed to bear such sufferings, to be a bearer of Christ’s passions, and not to turn away from such passions by indulging in worldly things—that is, by giving in to anger and quarreling, insolence and arrogance, conflicts and enmities, disobedience and disputes, grievances and insults, slander, falsehood, and mockery. How can such people be called Christians? Are they not rather sons of rebellion, children of wrath, and heirs not to eternal blessings but to endless torments?

18. Is not your rank, brothers, that of angels? Is not your life holy? Is not your path chosen by God?—But what does the Apostle say?—“For if I have torn it down, I am building it up again; I am making myself a transgressor” (Gal. 2:18). We have cast off the old man, decaying as a result of the serpent’s manifold deceptions; we have renounced that which was the fruit of the first bitter taste and of disobedience worthy of expulsion, and through which death, the source of much suffering, entered the world; we have laid aside the guilt of our birth, first in baptism by water and the Spirit, then—through God’s great love for mankind—in the second baptism of repentance and renunciation of the world; and your vows to God are recorded in the presence of the holy angels; they are also recorded with me, a poor man. – So you have been washed, sanctified, freed from the bonds of sin, and clothed in the new man, created in God’s image in righteousness and truth: why are you running back again? Why are you returning to your own filth? Why are you unfit for the Kingdom of Heaven when, according to the Lord’s word, having put your hand to the plow, you look back? (Luke 9:62). – The Lord is my witness that I say this out of love for you, out of compassion, and with deep anguish. What does Scripture say in the Old Testament about the Israelites? That they turned their hearts back to Egypt, for they remembered the onions, the meat, and the pots of Egypt, and their poor life there (Ex. 16: 3). So too have we turned toward the world and toward the things of the world, and what we did there before, we now do here. – Woe is me! How is it that we, who ought to be equal to the angels, are not even equal to devout laypeople, when, through negligence, we are gradually descending even to such actual falls? – May my humble instruction to you, I beg you, serve as a confirmation for those who have not fallen, as a remedy for those who have fallen, as a warning for the negligent, as an encouragement for the zealous, as a stimulus for the despondent, as help for those who are struggling, and in general—“to all, I have become all, that I might save some” (1 Cor. 9: 22). For it is for your sake that I speak and breathe; on my own, I am speechless and not even a man. May God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, correct what is amiss in us, strengthen what is sound, and make up what is lacking; and just as He led us out of the worldly Egypt and guided us through the sinful wilderness, may He carry us through the treacherous sea of passions, having parted it and dried it up, and made the path of virtue passable for us; and just as He has called us, so may He continue to call us His “chosen people” and “holy nation” (1 Peter 2:9); and may He settle us in the good land of virtues, and especially, through death, in the land of the meek.

87. Having renounced the world, yet looking back at it—you are acting both foolishly and destructively: come to your senses, I beg you

87. Having renounced the world, yet looking back at it—you are acting both foolishly and destructively: come to your senses, I beg you. [2:10] As people of sound mind, having left everything for God—including relatives, brothers, the world, and all that is in the world—and having taken upon yourselves the light yoke of Christ, why do you become disillusioned, worldly, and even more so, devilish through your own deeds? “Whoever rejects the law of Moses dies without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses. How much more severe a punishment do you think you will deserve” (Heb. 10: 28–29), you who, according to St. Basil, have torn the covenant of the Spirit by violating obedience, and have “deemed defiled” the “blood of the covenant” with which you were anointed on the day of renouncing the enemy and the world and uniting with Christ? Is this fitting? Were you truly unable to spend even a single hour of this life (—which is but a moment when compared to the endless ages—) in watchfulness with the Lord? Are these your vows, made before God as a witness, with the Holy Angels listening? Is this what the little scissors given to me by your hands signified, as if from the hand of the Lord? Were these—under the influence of the promptings you received at that time—your tearful, humble, and abasement-filled gestures and glances? O, my children, my children! How have you forgotten yourselves and strayed from your former resolutions? But I ask and implore you, my children, my own flesh and blood, my own members: come to your senses, all of you; be renewed in spirit; unite in one mind, in one hope, in one heart—you with me, and I with you—before the face of the Lord; and let us live and walk in such a way as to attain the Kingdom of Heaven.

88. I rejoice that you have settled well; but this is not my doing, but a gift from God; I rejoice because we are one with you: May the Lord keep you and help you to prosper

88. 1) I rejoice that you have settled in well; but this is not my doing, but a gift from God; I rejoice, then, because we are one with you: May the Lord keep you and help you to prosper. – 2) We have chosen the better and more valuable over the worse and the worthless: let us not lose heart. – 3) The crowns of martyrdom lie ahead: let us be courageous; let us bear the yoke of obedience and the weariness of the flesh, looking forward to the honors of our heavenly calling. [2:11]

19. It is good not to conceal God’s blessings, but to proclaim them when the time requires it, so that through this we may become even more zealous in our work. I see such a blessing upon you. For you, by the grace of Christ, through frequent teachings and reminders—all concerning the same work of ours—and through daily exhortations, so to speak, have set out on the path of spiritual progress, with a good disposition and God-loving zeal. That I speak the truth is attested by you yourselves; I also bear witness to it, having found relief from my burdensome afflictions through you, and after many cares, having entered—as into a quiet haven—into the serenity of your pious life, and rejoicing in my heart over this. Truly, the saying is not false: “No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful; later, however, it yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness” (Heb. 12:11) to those who have been trained in this way. But this fruit is not the result of my own efforts, nor of my own care and concern, but a gift from God through your zeal and fatherly assistance. And why, then, am I, an unworthy one, rejoicing and taking delight in the labors of others? It is because we are wholly one—you in me, and I in you—and the individual deeds of each are credited to both. May the Lord, awesome in power and mighty in strength, from now on and forever, grant me to be zealous and strong in the proper study, investigation, and explanation of the holy commandments, and may He preserve you in unbroken submission, in sincere obedience, and in unshakable faith, making you ever more virtuous, ever more zealous, and ready to face every spiritual struggle with courage and zeal—to endure sorrow and hardship, hunger and thirst, to undertaking every labor, and to enduring all that is burdensome and sorrowful, so that, having proven yourselves invincible, you may receive the crowns of patience on the day of the righteous Judge’s judgment.

20. Truly, your purchase is a good one, for by leaving behind the perishable, you have received the imperishable; having been separated from your parents, you have gained the Lord as your Father; having been estranged from your brothers, you have come to have the saints as your fellow citizens; you are “a chosen race, a royal priesthood” (1 Peter 2:9); instead of the homeland that begot and raised you, the heavenly city has become your homeland, of which “God is the architect and builder” (Heb. 11:10); instead of a house that is impermanent and subject to destruction—you now have the dwellings of the righteous and the holy; instead of vain glory and fleeting honor—you have divine and angelic dignity; instead of material contentment and happiness—the enjoyment of eternal blessings; instead of subjugation and the mortification of your desires—rejoicing with the martyrs; instead of solitude and rootless wandering—the closest kinship with all the Saints. Why then should we be disheartened? Why should we lose heart and grieve? Let each one cry out with the divine David: “Why are you downcast, O my soul, and why do you trouble me? Trust in God, for we will yet confess to Him” (Ps. 41: 12). “For if we suffer with Him” in asceticism, “we will also reign with Him” (Rom. 8:17; 2 Tim. 2:12).

21. The crowns of martyrdom are earned even here; and the monastic way of life is rightly called a field of struggle. How blessed, then, is the obedient one? How wondrous is the confessor (who reveals everything about himself)? How venerable is the patient one? How blessed by God is the one who is faithful and steadfast in keeping the commandments? Why should we not turn away or deviate from what we have begun, why should we not be disheartened by the established order, why should we not allow ourselves to turn back or stop, why should we not yield our backbone to our enemies, O fellow believers, O fellow travelers, O fellow fighters! Let us not spare the flesh: time is short, life is fleeting; even if life were to extend to seventy or eighty years, it is nothing compared to the endless ages. Let us give up a sheep, and we shall receive heaps of gold; let us give up a moment of time, and we shall gain endless ages; let us endure an hour’s toil, and we shall receive endless rest; let us weep, that we may rejoice forever with blissful joy; let us weep for the sake of Christ’s love, that we may exult in unending rejoicing. So, keeping your eyes fixed on the honors of your heavenly calling, strive joyfully in good works until the time of your departure arrives, and you pass from this life into eternity, through Christ Jesus, our Lord.

89. Having heeded God’s calling, like Abraham, you have left everything behind: do not grieve, but, inspired by hope, endure all things—for crowns await you

89. 1) Having heeded God’s call, like Abraham, you have left everything behind: do not grieve, but, inspired by hope, endure all things—crowns await you. – 2) Do nothing unseemly—and do not steal: for it is contrary to all that is right and will not go unpunished. – 3) During the Lenten fast: do not make your stomach your god, but rather fill yourselves with virtues. [2:12]

22. What words can I speak that are worthy of you, children of God, who obey the word of the Gospel, have forsaken the whole world, and have taken upon yourselves this great, blessed, and exalted work of obedience? – May God, who comforts the humble, also comfort you through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, may He faithfully guide you along the path of His commandments, and may He make you heirs to His Kingdom. O my brothers! What a good deed you have done, what a wise decision you have made, when, having been called by God, you set out—following the example of the forefather Abraham—from your land, from your kin, from your father’s house, and came to this place of asceticism, which the Lord Himself showed you and guided you to reach? You have overcome carnal thoughts and risen above them. For God’s sake, you did not allow familial love to hold you back, nor your accustomed way of life to stop you, nor your ancestral inheritance to bind you, nor anything else to stand in your way. Therefore, you are blessed and most blessed. Do not lose heart, do not grieve, and do not lose courage. But, soaring above your present sorrows and the hardships of your ascetic life with the hope of the blessings reserved for you, rejoicing and being glad, continue on your path, and with patience, courage, and vigor, endure day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year. – And what, then, in the end? – You will be crowned with an imperishable crown of glory when the Lord summons heaven and earth to judge His people.

23. Do not give in to laziness, do not slumber, do not be lukewarm, do not quarrel, do not argue, do not slander, do not engage in idle talk, do not indulge in gluttony—I will add something unworthy of hearing, and this applies only to some—do not steal. —He who begins by stealing nuts will go on to greater things, and he who is accustomed to stealing quills (writing feathers) will eventually reach for clothing as well.—Such thefts occur among us—of clothing, belts, shoes, and other such things. Is this right? Are these the servants of Christ? Are these those who are strangers to the world? Are these those who seek not an earthly but a heavenly inheritance? Are these the ones called saints and blessed, who receive honorable bows from people? Is this your diligence, your success, your perfection? – This, however, is by no means a widespread sin; and do not be surprised if I turn from praise to rebuke: the word is spoken one way to some and another way to others. – And even if this has happened, let it not happen from now on—I ask, I beg, I command, I threaten. If anyone does such a thing after this admonition, let him be cut off from the Church of Christ, unless he appeases God through repentance and confession. But even before this, one who has stolen can be healed only by acknowledging and revealing his sin. Just as the theft and concealment of certain items once led to Achar’s stoning (Joshua 7:21, 25), so too will those captivated by this passion and who do not confess be struck down by invisible stones; therefore, let the fallen rise up and live in the Lord.

24. Here comes the Fast of Meat. Do not turn your thoughts to what you used to indulge in, and do not imitate those who feed themselves as if it were the day of sacrifice. For whoever is enslaved to the belly, for him “the belly is his god, and his glory is in his shame” (Phil. 3:19). Take any one of such people and look at what he is like in soul and body. “Is this desirable?” tell me. “Is this worthy of imitation?” Certainly not; on the contrary, it is worthy of every kind of revulsion and contempt. As for you, be content with the modest satisfaction of your nutritional needs, without meat or wine. Do not concern yourself with filling your body, but fill your soul with the fruits of the Holy Spirit—peace, love, hope, faith, prayer, psalm-singing, recitation of verses, obedience, humility, vigilance, rising early, gentleness, simplicity, pure thoughts, contrition, and purifying tears—and let this be your constant fast.”

90. Just as it is my duty to always encourage you to fight, so it is your duty to always stand fully armed spiritually and fight

90. 1) Just as it is my duty to always inspire you to battle, so it is your duty to always stand fully armed with spiritual weapons and fight. – 2) It is inappropriate to complain that the struggle is dragging on; examples of fighters are given, and you are advised to be courageous. – 3) Do not be afraid of ghosts: fearlessness and prayer are the best remedies against them. [2, 13]

1. It is an urgent necessity for me to always extend words of comfort and exhortation to you, who labor to the point of exhaustion in God’s work, in your blessed and arduous service. If your struggle and your battle against the wiles of the adversary were to cease at any specific time, my comfort and exhortation to you would also cease. But since those efforts never cease and give you no rest, day or night, it is only right that I, in proportion to that, should have the duty to instill in your souls both comfort, encouragement, and hope, giving you strength, vigor, and zeal to destroy the invisible armies arrayed against you. A warrior, as you know, must always act in a warriorly manner and strictly adhere to all that this calling requires. That is why you, as true soldiers of Christ, must always ensure that your weapons are in order—that each of you possesses the sword of obedience, the armor of faith, the helmet of the hope of salvation, the shield of humility, the bow of prayer, and everything else necessary for our spiritual warfare. It is not as wonderful or as awe-inspiring to see a worldly warrior in full armor as it is to see a warrior of Christ possessing all of the above. Therefore, my children, arm yourselves, protect yourselves, prepare yourselves, fight, and defeat the devil who wages war against you; and do not be surprised by anything that happens to you—neither by the blows and arrows you receive, nor by the times you slip and fall—but simply get back up quickly.

2. Some are vexed, astonished, or even fall into despair because they are tormented by shameful lust, anger, blasphemy, envy, fickleness, or something similar. I, on the other hand, am astonished at them. Tell me, brother, do you expect to receive your crowns without toil and hardship, without struggles and victories?—But he says: “I am already so and so many years old; how many times have I fasted, confessed, and received Communion? I have shown this and that, overflowed with tears and sighs, and been of service to my brothers who lived with me in their infirmities.” Alas, what wisdom is this?! Tell me, how many years have you been in this struggle? Three, five, ten? But the blessed Amma Sarra valiantly fought the demon of fornication for forty years and bore it courageously. I dare to mention Abba Pachomius, and how he stripped himself naked in the Church, and another whom Abba Apollos strengthened. And why should I cite countless examples of the feats and struggles through which sincere fighters emerged victorious—one in this way, another in that—yet nowhere was there discouragement, nowhere cowardice, nowhere a loss of courage, until, in their weakness, they prevailed, warding off the enemy’s attacks by a sign from above. We, however, being fainthearted, speak and act in a fainthearted, careless, and untrained manner. – I remind you of this so that we may rise from our despondency and become alert and steadfast, trusting in God, each one saying to himself: "Though an army encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war rise up against me, in Him I will trust" (Ps. 26:3).

3. Do not be afraid of the fears and terrors that the devil sometimes conjures up in your dreams at night, showing this or that, transforming and changing his form as he pleases; sometimes he makes a sound, calls you by name, or takes the form of a lion. But strike him boldly with your fearlessness, and you will see that he will scatter like dust. If he appears to you as tall as the roof and immense, turn to prayer, and, like the great Anthony, you will see him vanish. Even if he seems to be coming toward you and attacking you, or shaking your dwelling and bringing it crashing down upon you, do not be afraid, and it will all pass like a mere dream. This happens to those who are subjected to it because they fear where there is no fear (Ps. 13:5). Pay attention, then, and do not be terrified by what is not at all terrifying. Let the one who instills fear be the one to tremble before you, by the power of your hope in God and your prayer to Him.

91. Spring has arrived: be on your guard; I advise you to abstain from wine, not to eat to excess, and to be cautious when going into town, and not to bring worldly things back to the monastery from there

91. 1) Spring has arrived: be on your guard; I advise you to abstain from wine, not to eat to excess, and to be cautious when going into town, and not to bring worldly matters from there into the monastery. – 2) Incidentally, a note is made regarding those who go to the garden and demand vegetables contrary to the rule. [2, 14]

4. Stand firm and unshakable in your hope in God, and having unravelled the devil's intricate schemes, rise above your passions, trampling underfoot the delights and lusts of the flesh, while safeguarding your virginity and purity, both in soul and body. You see, it is now springtime, when every living creature is stirred toward new life. In keeping with this, we must regulate our sleep and our food. "It is good," says the Apostle, "not to eat meat or drink wine, or to do anything that causes your brother to stumble" (Rom. 14:21). I, too, my brothers, speak in an advisory capacity, not as a rule, for the sake of your noble souls—and not to those of you who are sick, but to those who are healthy: it is good not to drink wine, especially for you younger ones; for it stirs up the passions. We already have within us the agitation caused by the pleasures natural to our nature; why should we introduce into ourselves the additional stimulants of wine? Taste it and see how good it is to abstain from wine. Those who abstain from it will find themselves not carried away by their thoughts, not inflamed in their souls, but always sober in their love for God and zealous for all that is good and conducive to salvation. Those who abstain from wine carry the Holy Spirit within them; those who drink water are clothed in the garment of humility. — And regarding food as well, I advise you, my children. Flee from senseless gluttony and constant overindulgence, from which spring the seeds of fornication and Sodom; but consume food and drink—while observing all other precautions—in such a way that you may rule over delights rather than be ruled by them, that you may reign over the flesh rather than be subject to its power. The best order in the relationship between the soul and the body is that the lower should not violate the higher. Regarding leaving the monastery, strictly adhere to the rule: do not bring into the monastery worldly conversations that might confuse the brothers.

5. I have learned that some of you, upon entering the garden, demand vegetables from the gardener, and, not receiving them according to the rule, quarrel with him. This is a satanic act and should not be tolerated. Such individuals will be subject to penance. Is what is offered not enough? How will you overcome passion when a vegetable overcomes you? You will be as light as a feather, my humble brother, if you do not strengthen yourself in thought through self-restraint. I trust that just as the intemperate have become and continue to become temperate, and the passionate have become dispassionate, so will we, if we do not grow lazy in strictly disciplining ourselves in all things. May the Lord strengthen and establish you.

92. The Suppression of One's Own Will Is Our Foremost Virtue

92. 1) The subjugation of one's own will is our foremost virtue. – 2) Time is passing; – death is imminent, and after that comes the judgment, at which only the good will be approved: let us therefore be such, avoiding all that is evil. – 3) The foolishness of grumbling that children are being raised in the monastery. [2,15]

6. There are many paths to the Kingdom of Heaven, and yet there is only one path: one, because virtue—being one in essence—is fulfilled and comes to fruition through various good deeds. Let us embrace this one, all-powerful virtue: let one follow the path of God-imitating obedience—a path unhindered and unbroken; another—along the path of Christ-bearing humility—a path that is smooth and the shortest; both the one and the other should offer the severing of their will as a spotless sacrifice. “Who is the man who desires life and loves to see good days?” I too will ask with the Prophet—and I will answer: he who truly severs his will. “This is the one who will live and not see death” (Ps. 88:49)—the fall—delivering his soul from the hand of Hades. This is the son of Light, possessing a soul purified of every passion: for he uproots every passion at its very root. Where do our sorrows, troubles, quarrels, disputes, and envy come from? Is it not because we insist on having our own way and defending our decisions and desires? Yes, this is truly so. And there is no other way to deliver us from the devil’s wiles except by this subjugation of our will.

7. Day after day flows by, coming and going; like a rushing river, our life hastens forward and draws near to death. Blessed are you, for by sacrificing what is insignificant and temporary, you gain what is eternal and heavenly. And the day will come when God will sit upon the throne of His glory, with the holy angels standing before Him; He will call you and place you in the dwelling place of the righteous. – But which ones? The obedient, the submissive, the reverent, the benevolent, the pure in heart, the contrite, the tearful, the hardworking, those who love their fathers, those who love their brothers, those who love silence, those who love prayer—and all who diligently pursue every other divine work. There are some among you who are adorned not with one, but with many virtues; and such people are more beautiful in goodness than the sons of men, shining with many gracious gifts of the Spirit. Let us not, then, allow ourselves to draw near to the hideous and corrupting shame of sin; but let us flee from pernicious insolence, malicious scrutiny of one another, unrestrained sneers, satanic grumbling, and spiteful grievances—accepting everything with a good heart—food, drink, clothing, and service—whatever they may be. This is the good deed for you; this is the testimony of your good conscience; this is your success in spiritual warfare; and this, finally, is your crown.

8. I hear that certain foolish people, seeing the children being raised here, say: “This is why we are doomed! This is why the monasteries are being destroyed!”—What madness is this? This is nothing other than a condemnation of the Lord Himself, Who says: “Let the little children come to Me, for to such belongs the kingdom of God” (Mark 10:14). Was Christ not an infant? Was He not nursed on milk? Was He not a child? Was He not a youth “twelve years old”? (Luke 2:42). Was He not a perfect man “about thirty years old” when He began to perform miracles? (Luke 3:23). Why, then, does this one remain silent, and why does he not complain even more about himself, since his ruin comes from himself?—Such people—wiser and more sensible than the abbot—follow a path that is more right than the right one, and argue that they love God more than is necessary, while straying outside established rules. – I will add, however: if there is no one who has spoken this way, let these words pass like a gust of wind, and I will not condemn anyone; but if there is, let him correct himself, lest he fall into the devil’s snare. What did that holy elder say? “Whatever a child commands me, I will accept as if the Son of my Lord had commanded me.”—Or do you not understand what you are reading?!—

93. You are striving in every good work; the labor is great, but the reward is greater; so press on more and more

93. 1) Strive to do good in everything; the labor is great, but the reward is greater; so press on more and more. – 2) You face many temptations; but do not lose heart: the Lord is near. Keep in mind also the rest that lies ahead, and you will never lose courage. [2:16]

9. As the Lord says: “By your endurance you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19); endure the toil and heat of your ascetic life without losing heart, and “meditate on the law of the Lord day and night,” so that you may be “like a tree planted by streams of water” (Ps. 1: 3). You have many labors, but God’s gifts are greater; much sweat, but your reward is eternal. I know that you strive, mortify yourselves in every way, live a life of martyrdom, are pierced as if by a spear, and are crucified by the mortification of your desires; but rejoice, for the Kingdom of Heaven is prepared for you—blessed immortality, adoption as sons, co-heirship with Christ, a life of goodness, bliss, joy, and endless peace. When such and so great blessings lie ahead, who can lose heart? Who can hesitate before any hardship or struggle, until, through death, they pass on to what they hope for? —Knowing that “the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed to us” (Rom. 8:18), have you not also endured—the heat of lust, the burden of despondency, the weariness of toil, the hunger of self-denial, and in all other things, hardship and want; so that you can say with the Apostle: “For your sake we are being put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered” (Rom. 8:36)? You do not fear demonic delusions or the rebellions of lust, but you prosper and ascend to the heights of virtue. — But these words are not meant only for those who are slothful, wavering, and wayward, but also for you, to strengthen and anoint you, so that you may complete your course of piety well. Come, then, all of you; let us add fear to fear, and let us be kind, gentle, loving, submissive, and hospitable toward one another—not envious, not demanding, not proud, not boastful, not disruptive, not grumbling—making patience the foundation of your good life.

10. You face many sorrows every day—I do not deny it—but is this not for your salvation, is it not for the inheritance of eternal blessings? If, then, for this purpose there is toil and weariness, effort and struggle, sweat and hunger, hardship and groaning, confusion of thoughts and waves of temptation—all driven upon us by invisible enemies on the sea of this life—then by no means shall we allow ourselves to lose heart, or be frightened, or fall into despair. Christ is with us; He stretches out His hand and will say to this sea, “Be still, be quiet” (Mark 4:39), and there will be a great calm. We, too, will strive again and again to persevere, again and again to hasten, again and again to press forward. And I am fully confident that we will complete our voyage successfully, be saved from misfortune, and safely enter the harbor of the Kingdom of Heaven. And there—“sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee away” (Isa. 35:10). —What could be more blessed than such a task and such labor, from which shine forth light, life, joy, peace, comfort, and immeasurable rest? Whoever walks the path of virtue with such faith and such hope never grows weary, never stops, and never turns back—neither because of the burdens and sorrows already borne, nor because of those yet to come, even if they be death, the piercing of the ribs, and the shedding of blood. For this reason, the martyrs subjected themselves to torments and endured every kind of torment; for this reason, the saints sought holiness and undertook every ascetic labor; for this reason, I too invite you and urge you to take up this struggle, so that you may be crowned for your blessed submission and martyr-like obedience. Oh, I beg you, let us not allow ourselves to be deprived of those ineffable and incomprehensible blessings—the title of sons and heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven, the joys of Christ’s bride, and the place at His right hand, where all the saints, in boundless joy, rejoicing and exulting, delighting in those indescribable divine blessings.

94. You know why we came to the monastery: do not allow anything contrary to that

94. 1) You know why we came to the monastery: do not, then, allow anything contrary to that. You are doing just that; but do not let your labors be wasted in vain. – 2) I care for you and show you the better way: why, then, do you arbitrarily invent ascetic feats for yourselves—chains, deserts? This is not for the good. Our community life is itself the most suitable for asceticism. – 3) Whoever wishes to be above others should strive to surpass everyone in ascetic virtues—both physical and spiritual—in which it is nowhere as easy to excel as in community life. – 4) A list is given of the virtues in which those in the monastery excel; and the zealous are invited to imitate them. [2, 17]

11. Why have we come here, having left the world and separated ourselves from our parents, relatives, and friends of the flesh, from cities, our homeland, villages, and homes? Is it not to save our souls? Is it not to be deemed worthy of the forgiveness of sins committed in the past? Is it not to please God? Is it not to attain eternal blessings? Is it not to live like angels, emulating the incorporeal minds of our holy and thrice-blessed fathers? – How, then, can we do the opposite of this? Laughing instead of weeping, rejoicing instead of being contrite, blaspheming instead of being reverent, busying ourselves with trivialities instead of praying, rushing about instead of resting, fussing instead of being silent, instead of purification, defile ourselves; instead of gentleness, be insolent; instead of fasting, give ourselves over to intemperance; instead of singing psalms, engage in gossip; instead of obedience, act arbitrarily; instead of humility, exalt ourselves? Indeed, our adversary usually entices those who forget their vows into deeds inconsistent with them. But you know well why you have gathered here, and with zeal you strive to achieve your goals: you are cleansing your sins and sanctifying yourselves. I therefore ask you, my children, and I implore you, do not let your labor prove in vain. – How much and in what ways do you endure? How much have you fasted and how much do you fast? How diligently have you striven—and continue to strive—toward vigilance? How much abuse, insult, and deprivation have you endured—and continue to endure? And in general, how much have you already accomplished—and continue to accomplish—in improving your lives? – Do not let apathy or some momentary pleasure ruin these fruitful and much-desired deeds of yours; but add new efforts to your previous labors, so that, having lived this brief life well, you may confidently enter the peaceful harbor of eternal life.

12. The Lord knows how I care for the peace of mind of each one of you, and I adjust my own spirit according to your state: I grieve with those who grieve; I am weak with those who are weak; I am fainthearted with the fainthearted; I fight the good fight with those who fight; I suffer with those who suffer; I am moved to anger with those who are tempted. If this is so, then why do you hinder me in this and fail to comply with what you are commanded, but instead resist and impose your own desires—or rather, your wicked lusts and your proud wills—contrary to the law of obedience and the communal order of life, inventing, according to your own whims, some new rules of your own, and arguing that these very rules are the most holy and divine—when in fact they are wickedness and lawlessness? Some, out of self-will—or rather, at the devil’s command—secretly, without my knowledge, bind themselves with chains and induce others to do the same, with the devil’s assistance in this sin; others extol the hermit’s life, submitting to the devil who seeks to make them empty; still others invent and propose this and that, certainly under the influence of our soul-destroying adversary—which I do not wish to reveal. Why is this done, without paying attention to one’s present way of life—which is appropriate, pleasing to God, and salvific?—Which of the reverend fathers acted in this way? And even if anyone did, he undertook it as a result of some instruction from above, or with the blessing of his spiritual father. But you, not yet cleansed of your past sins—or even if cleansed, yet not yet at peace within and not having tasted the sweetness of discerning things—blinded by recklessness and self-will, rush into this like a ball down a rapid, pushed there by the serpent’s temptation. Not so, my children; by no means should it be so. But believe that for you, the wisest of the wise, the holiest of the holy, and the most beneficial of beneficial deeds is to remain in the calling to which the Lord has called you—in communal life, under the guidance of a father, in fellowship with your brothers, in this God-nurtured spiritual nursery. Whoever leaves it is seized by the beast; but whoever settles in it takes on its distinctive qualities—unity of heart, unity of mind, fellowship, cooperation, shared suffering, and the glorification of God. And you must not devise anything to set yourselves apart from others.

13. Whoever wishes to surpass others in virtue should, in his own mind, consider himself lower than all; let him not contradict anyone, and let there be no flattery or grumbling on his lips; let him be “slow to anger,” quick to obey, and even quicker to say, “Forgive me,” when met with stubbornness in speech; let his countenance be bright and joyful, because of his inner good disposition and his prayerful turning to God, bowing his eyes downward while directing his mind toward God; let him always refrain from laughter, not going beyond a gentle smile; let him be restrained in speech as well, not allowing a single corrupt word, nor any that does not serve for edification; let him be content with what is offered at the communal meal, and not eat to the point of satiety; let him be content with a set amount of sleep, and let him stand before God in worship sober and alert, striving not to overlook a single verse; let him set a daily limit, and let him not extend the bounds of his life even until evening, always standing ready for the departure of his soul from his body; let him shed rivers of tears daily, especially in the evening, wetting his cheeks with sobs as he reflects on the deeds he has committed through negligence, and on the separation of the soul from the body at the hour of death—how the Angels will take and lead it, how it will pass through the demonic torments, and how it will give an account of everything done in life, in short, in deed and thought—where it will then be determined whether the poor soul will stand at the right hand, rest in the bosom of Abraham, and find bliss in the bride chamber of Christ, or depart to the goats and, together with them, hear: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41).—This is what each of you should strive to excel in, without sloth. But nowhere can you succeed in this as much as in communal life, which, according to St. Basil the Great, is the cradle of all virtues.

14. I wish to speak of the virtues of some of you, without naming them, in order to stir up emulation among those who do not live as they ought. There are some among you who, on certain days, out of sincere faith and ardent love for God, do not sleep at all; there are those who weep so much that not a single day passes without hot tears; there are those who do not even approach Holy Communion unless they have first bathed themselves abundantly in the water of their tears; there are those so devoted to purity that they do not even look at people’s faces, lest they be defiled; there are those who satisfy their need for sleep while sitting; there are those who drink or eat nothing outside of mealtimes; there are those who have never approached me with a request for clothing, or shoes, or anything else of that sort, but only to have me assign them a measure of fasting, vigil, or some other form of self-denial for the sake of salvation. — These are the righteous of heart; these are those who sincerely seek the things above; these are the ones who zealously care for their own salvation and for causing no harm to their neighbors—and not only that, but also for benefiting them in every way, reminding them of what is proper through their very deeds and thereby stirring the lazy to diligence and the fallen to rise again. Let those who wish to do so imitate such people. But if you have no such desire, be content with generally accepted good deeds: for moderation is salvific, and those who adhere to it in good conscience will undoubtedly receive crowns from the merciful and bountiful God.

95. We are the army of Christ: see to it that your full armor is ready; for the enemy does not slumber—and fight

95. 1) We are the army of Christ: see to it that your full armor is ready; for the enemy does not slumber—and fight. — 2) Perform every duty with obedience; our life is but a moment, yet in this moment we can attain eternal bliss. Therefore, labor diligently; do not be slothful. [2:18]

15. We—the army of Christ, a tribute chosen for the Lord from the whole world, an offering consecrated to God—do not wage war against enemies of flesh and blood, but against the principalities, the powers, and the rulers of the darkness of this age, against the spiritual forces of evil (Eph. 6:12). Why is it necessary for us to gather together, to consult and deliberate—not once, not twice, not three times a year, but constantly? Because our battle against our enemies is unceasing, and we are constantly subjected to temptations. See, then, soldiers of Christ, whether your souls are surrounded by trenches, whether you have the armor of faith, whether you possess the shield of humility, whether you hold the spear of obedience at the ready, whether the helmet of the hope of salvation covers you, whether the sword of courage is in your hands, and, above all, whether your noble body is well-trained and docile, trained and easily controlled, lest it—biting the bit—throw off its rider—the mind—in the face of the enemies?—Yes, you have all this; I myself will vouch for you. But acquire more and more, for “many are fighting against us from on high” (Ps. 55: 3), because the arrows of the Evil One are ablaze, and he, moreover, never slacks off for a single moment—he neither eats, nor drinks, nor sleeps, but fights day and night, as he himself once said to one of the Holy Fathers. His lifeless existence and destructive activity consist in “oppressing the poor and needy and slaying those who are upright in heart” (Ps. 36: 14). But “may his sword pierce his own heart” and “may his arrows be shattered” (Ps. 36: 15). How? By repelling him with the weapons mentioned. As this destroyer of all has himself confessed, humility crushes him, obedience defeats him, prayer puts him to flight, fasting starves him, and brotherly love and the practice of all other virtues bring him down.

16. I beg you, a prisoner of sin, to walk in a manner worthy of the calling to which you have been called. Be patient, undertaking every kind of labor with your own hands—in tilling the fields, in digging the garden beds, in making garments, in copying books, in carpentry, in baking bread, and in every other craft and service. For all this, a great reward is prepared for you in heaven. Behold, our life runs like a swift runner and flies like the soaring of birds. Yet, brothers, we can still make a good purchase. In a single moment, we can become heirs to the bliss of all ages. For truly, the span of our entire life is but a moment compared to infinite eternity. Blessed are those who have found wisdom in living as one for the common good; thrice blessed are those who have hated the world; all-blessed are those who, for the Lord’s sake, have forsaken parents, relatives, friends, brothers, and all that is in the world. – How then can you not be glorified when you have done this? For the Lord Himself said: “I will glorify those who glorify Me, and those who dishonor Me will be disgraced.”—You truly glorify God in your members, and the members of Christ are sanctified; offer yourselves as a sacrifice and continually bear fruit through your obedience. Let no one, therefore, interrupt the course of his good deeds; let no one give in to despondency or become slothful; let no one slumber or give in to sleep. Be all fellow travelers, all bound together by the bond of love, all of one mind, all of one heart; be good runners in the race of God, zealous and ever-active.

96. Let us remember what we were before, how we were called, and what we are now—and let us give thanks to God both in word and, even more so, through the righteousness of our lives

96. 1) Let us remember what we were before, how we were called, and what we are now;—and let us give thanks to God both in word and, even more so, through the righteousness of our lives. – 2) Having come out of the “Egypt” of the world, let us patiently traverse the wilderness of this life, under God’s protection and guidance, hoping to enter the Promised Land. [2, 19]

17. Having within ourselves a burning lamp—a love for the Lord and a longing for eternal blessings—we must continually pour oil of anointing into it, so that this lamp may not go out and leave us in darkness, and so that, as a result, we may not wander aimlessly in the darkness and fall into the ruinous pit of passions.

And what is this oil? It is remembrance, reflection, and contemplation of what was before, what is now, and what will be afterward. – Let us recall those days of our youth, when we either walked in ignorance, as in darkness, or were swept along by the current of vain pursuits, as by the waves of the sea, or plunged into carnal pleasures, as into an abyss of water; then let us recall how the good God called us out of that state, stretched out His hand to deliver us, showed us the path of peace, and inspired us to aspire to this bright and holy way of life; let us also add that, while so many of our relatives, acquaintances, friends, and companions remain in that same bitter condition, we alone—as if from Egyptian slavery—have been delivered from it and raised to the high mountain of this dwelling; and looking down from here, we see how people, spinning as if in some deep abyss, rush about in vain, jostling one another, knocking one another off their feet, toiling in the sweat of their brow for something great—earthly blessings that are fleeting, transient, and perishable—and, what is even more lamentable, receiving as their reward eternal torment in hell. For this deliverance alone, what thanksgiving should we feel and offer to our God, the Giver of all good things?—Let us therefore unceasingly give thanks to God, raising our praises louder than the song of Israel and singing: “Let us sing to the Lord, for He is gloriously exalted; He has cast the horse and its rider into the sea” (Ex. 15: 1). But such thanksgiving will be incomplete if we do not make proper use of this blessing—that is, by strictly keeping ourselves in detachment from the world, in separation from our own kind, in regarding earthly goods as nothing, and in blissful submission to the rules of our life.

18. Having freed ourselves from the world, its allurements, and its lusts, we must journey well through the wilderness of this life—being meek, obedient, patient, generous, and lovers of purity and the Lord’s commandments, but by no means grumbling, like that ancient people; not stubborn, not lustful, not pleasure-seeking, not insolent, not contentious, nor rebelling against the Lawgiver Himself, recalling the pots of Egypt, from which, by God’s grace, we have turned away and renounced. Let it not be so, I beg of you. But, as God’s holy people, let us be obedient, willingly going wherever and whenever the call from above commands, always walking according to God’s will, and cheerfully enduring the hardships of the journey—lack of food, scarcity of drink, and all such things. If we are so submissive, the Angel of God will go before us, and the Lord will conquer the passions for us, just as He did for foreign nations, and we will not enter the land of the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, but into the land of the meek and the righteous, into a land flowing with honey and holy milk, and we will inherit all the promised blessings, reigning with Christ the Lord. Behold, brothers, the rewards that lie before us; know the consolations prepared for us, as well as the punishments and torments opposed to them, which await those who live carelessly. Let us therefore press on along the path set before us, with all joy, with all zeal, and with unshakable patience, each of us zealously fulfilling the duty incumbent upon us as a sacred task, just as the sons of Kohath and Merari (Num. 4:15) once set up the sacred vessels. Let no one be disobedient, let no one be grumbling, let no one be insolent, no one be a liar, no one be a mocker, no one be envious, no one be a slanderer, no one be negligent, no one be lazy, no one in any way bring shame upon our holy dwelling, but let all of you strive with all your might to do what is pleasing to God, so that, having completed our good work well, we may finally receive the crown of righteousness in Christ Jesus our Lord.

97. You will undoubtedly inherit eternal bliss for your renunciation of the world, your martyr-like obedience, and your struggle against passions and invisible enemies: stand firm, then

97. You will undoubtedly inherit eternal bliss for your renunciation of the world, your martyr-like obedience, and your struggle against passions and invisible enemies: stand firm, then. [2, 20] May the gate of death serve as a passage for you all to soar into the heavenly and pre-heavenly realms—to the place from which “sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee” (Ps. 35: 10). Thus do I, unworthy as I am, hope that you will depart to that place and find yourselves there, where the dwelling of all who rejoice is found, where there are the faces of the joyful and the voices of those celebrating, having received what was promised to all the saints who have pleased Christ from of old—for your good conduct, for your praiseworthy and blessed life, for your flight from the world, for your detachment from fleshly kinship, for the severing of your own desires, for your daily steadfastness in the struggle and your endurance of martyr-like obedience, in which you truly confess the Lord and renounce the evil-minded devil, receiving and repelling the blows inflicted upon you ceaselessly, both mentally and physically—whether from carnal desires, or from demonic slanders, or from conflicts with the brethren, or from rebukes and reprimands from the stewards, workshop supervisors, and administrators in all manner of other duties—and never in anything breaking your vows before the Lord, but boldly and courageously walking the path of salvation, putting to shame and driving back the demonic hordes set against you. Such is your feat—and you may cry out with the Apostle: “Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword? As it is written, ‘For Your sake we are being put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered’” (Rom. 8:35–36). Blessed are you, indeed, and thrice blessed—but do not forget—if you continue to uphold such a feat unwaveringly before God until the end: for daily you face a struggle, though at the same time daily you receive crowns.

98. We are poor; but God provides for us; thanks be to Him; yet we must not be idle; but let each one work according to his calling: then God will multiply our little

98. 1) We are poor; but God provides for us; thanks be to Him; yet we must not be idle; but let each one work according to his calling: then God will multiply what little we have. – 2) We share everything in common; and the labor of one benefits all, and vice versa; and God’s reward awaits everyone according to their labor and diligence; and those who work externally and physically will receive no less than those who work internally and spiritually. – As for the sick, they will be rewarded for their good-natured patience. [2, 21]

19. The primary focus of my concerns and prayers is that you may be kept pure, diligent, and blameless in your holy and virtuous way of life, so that no one may be led astray by the devil’s slanders, but that all of you may remain sober and alert in performing the worthy and honorable deeds of blessed obedience. For when this is in proper order, I have no sorrow about anything else, though I am usually sorrowful—I mean the narrowness of bodily life as it has been lived until now, regarding, however, this narrowness as spaciousness, poverty as wealth, scarcity as abundance—guided in this by the hope that gives me the assurance that the Lord will not let the souls of the righteous go hungry nor forsake His holy ones, such as you are by the grace of Christ, nourished, quenched, clothed, and warmed by divine providence—not only in spirit but also in body. And who, then, can properly feed such a multitude—consisting for the most part of the poor, who have no human support—and provide them with all they need, unless the finger of God assists? – Lift up your eyes and look—how many of us have entered this royal city, and among us how many elders, the infirm, the sick, youths, and children—and the Lord provides for all their needs: is this not wondrous? Is it not worthy of praise? Indeed, my brothers and children. – Nevertheless, we too must not remain idle, but must do our part by contributing labor and sweat to meet the needs of the brotherhood. For God is moved to mercy when He sees His commandments being fulfilled by all in mutual brotherhood—and from unseen sources He sends the means of sustenance. Therefore, I implore and remind you: let everyone, whatever task they are assigned, strive with all their might to work and bear much fruit, both spiritually and physically; for here one thing is known through the other, and one who is diligent in matters of the body is likewise diligent regarding the soul, just as, conversely, one who is spiritually barren is negligent of external matters as well.

20. Everything is shared among us—not only the physical and sensory, but also the spiritual and mental—and just as the virtues and good deeds of some are shared by all others, and vice versa, so too are our labors, as can be seen from the example of the body, according to the teaching of St. Paul the Apostle: “There is one body, and many members; and all the members of that one body, though many, are one body; and if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; or if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. 12:12, 27). And just as in the body, from head to toe, on the right and on the left, every member feels a stirring need and its fulfillment—so understand this in relation to the soul as well. My Father and yours is the first member; I am the second; then, in order, all the way to the last—together, on the Day of Reckoning, we will all receive either praise or rebuke. Knowing this, my children, let us all strive, let us all labor; let each one contribute his or her share to the common cause, and let no one be diminished in this before others, in the service that belongs to him or her and according to the measure of his or her strength. But of course you know that God will not determine the ranks on that day in the same way we do here: for there is God’s judgment and there is human judgment. Perhaps He will place the three-hundredth in third or fourth place, demote the tenth to the middle, and elevate the last to first place—each according to his diligence and virtue. And though it is dreadful to say, it is possible that He might even exclude some from our ranks entirely and send them to hell—certainly those who, even here, had a different spirit, a different mindset, and a different disposition. But I dare to assure you that none of our workers labor in vain, —neither does the plowman plow in vain, nor does the one tilling the furrows till in vain, nor does the cook cook in vain, nor does the baker bake bread in vain, nor does the cellarer manage the storeroom in vain, and so on and so forth. And all these, though they devote themselves less than others to the solitary practice of psalm-singing and poetry, will be rewarded no less than those sitting in their cells at their work, provided they labor with no less zeal—and, moreover, for the Lord's sake. To whatever extent one measures out his labor and zeal for the brotherhood, to that extent will it be measured out to him. Knowing this, those who labor within should not look down on those who labor without, and those who labor without should not lose heart, as if they were of lesser worth. The measure for each is labor and zeal. But what measure is there for the sick? someone might ask, for he cannot work. His measure is gratitude, meekness, and patience.

99. Teachings are not useless: they awaken those who are asleep, and they strengthen and guide those who are awake

99. 1) Instructions are not useless: they awaken those who are asleep, and they strengthen and guide those who are awake. Thus we all move forward little by little. – 2) In this we acknowledge God's mercy: what is bad among us is diminished, and what is good is strengthened. There are some who fall; but they rise again and correct themselves. Therefore, maintain your good disposition and zeal. [2:22]

21. Some will ask, what good are these teachings if we do not put into practice what they say? For though we often hear that we must not laugh, we do not correct ourselves in this regard; though we are often taught that we must not engage in idle talk, we still do so; though we are frequently reminded not to envy our neighbor, we are still overcome by this passion; though we are frequently reminded not to stand carelessly or sleepily during the daily and nightly psalm-singing and prayers, our minds still wander and we doze off during them—in short: we improve in almost nothing. – But those who speak this way speak unjustly. First, it cannot be that no one improves in anything, and it is impossible for everyone to improve in everything at once; rather, one person today, another tomorrow, begins and continues their work on themselves; second, just as when climbing a staircase, one cannot suddenly step from the first step to the last, but by stepping in order from one to the next, we ascend: so too in the practice of virtue, progressing little by little, we reach its heights. In both of these respects, catechetical instruction is very beneficial, as it stirs up and sustains the zeal for success, offers methods and techniques for achieving it, and thereby helps your honest souls to ascend little by little from strength to strength and from earth to heaven. And here is something else that can be said: if, when so much is said and heard about what ought to be and what must be corrected, for the glory of God, we see no restraint of the passions, then what would happen, and how much worse off would we be, if silence reigned among us, and what is proper were not pointed out and explained as it should be? I, for my part, have been taught by the Fathers that words are the path to deeds—good words lead to good deeds, and bad words to bad deeds. And I know full well that this is so—that speaking of a better way of life always inclines one toward the better. I bear witness to you, my children, that through reading the divinely inspired Scriptures—and to some small extent through listening to my humble teachings—you are all rising up and pressing forward: those who are passionate are awakened from their slumber and set about correcting themselves, while those who are already doing well are inspired to greater and greater success.

22. We profess God's grace in this and do not hide His mercy. For behold, we have almost no quarrels, nor slander, nor condemnation, nor insults, nor disobedience, nor secret eating; and if such things do happen—since we bear flesh prone to evil—those who sin immediately confess, repent, and make amends through the prescribed penances: exclusion from the meal, fasting, standing, and prostrations, depending on what is appropriate for healing the weakness that has arisen. Let no one say, therefore, that there is no benefit in these teachings. We do indeed derive benefit from them and prosper through them, by the grace of Christ and the intercession of the prayers of my father and yours; and, ascending, we climb with virtuous steps the mountain of virtues, being enlightened, sanctified, and deified—which, however, is achieved with great toil and sweat. I therefore ask and implore you: let us remain steadfast in our good will and good disposition; let us cut off all double-mindedness and banish faintheartedness forever; and let us inspire ourselves with good hopes and the expectation of future rewards and eternal blessings, —and this while there is still breath in our nostrils—so that after these present sorrows and hardships, we may be deemed worthy, after death, to be heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven in Christ Jesus our Lord.

100. It is hard to lead; but for the Lord's sake—for our sake, He who suffered even unto death on the cross—I endure; you also must endure

100. 1) It is hard to lead; but for the Lord's sake—who suffered for us even unto death on the cross—I endure; you, too, must endure. – 2) Consider in your mind how the ancients endured. 3) Let us, then, imitate them. [2, 23]

1. If I were to look with my physical eyes upon the sorrowful trials that befall us almost every day, I would have long since grown weary and handed over the reins of leadership to another; but since my humble mind looks to God in all this—for whose sake you have been called here, and for whose sake I have entrusted myself to you—I do not give up or lose heart, and I am ready to endure everything, being strengthened by Christ the Lord, through the prayer of my father and yours, for you, my beloved, and for the sake of my Lord and Master. For if He, who created all things, was pleased—for my sake, by virtue of the mystery of the Incarnation—to be tempted, reviled, humiliated, mocked, crucified, pierced with a spear, and buried, then what is there that I cannot endure? Or rather, what is there that you and I would not willingly undergo? Let sorrows, hardships, wounds, deprivations, and even death come upon us. For what are all these things, given our unshakable faith, if we fight the good fight, stand firm, and resist valiantly, so that we may receive eternal blessings as our reward? When our frail flesh begins to falter, let us remind ourselves that by indulging it, we are storing up wrath for ourselves on the day of wrath and the revelation of God's righteous judgment, and let us rise up to inspired courage.

2. Oh, where are those ancient holy souls now! How the zeal that once inspired them has now dwindled! For them, bodily suffering was joy and gladness; glory and greatness were utter humiliation. They were filled with a burning love for the Lord; they were consumed by an insatiable longing—not to do their own will, but rather to refrain from doing it altogether; they sought not to rule, but to be subject and obedient until their very old age. Where is that blessed elderly abbess who humbly remained standing until the end of the meal? Where is that well-tested pearl of obedience who persevered for thirty years? Where is this one, where is that one?—For behold, like a choir of stars, the entire sacred assembly of saints, radiant with every kind of virtue, stands before my mind. Let us journey in thought through their holy dwellings. Behold the foundations of the great Pachomius. — Let us gaze there upon the ever-memorable Jonah, upon the glorious Petronius, upon the sanctified Theodore. Let us then proceed to the monastery of the great Theodosius, and there too behold the ever-living Basil, the wondrous Aetius, — and such and such a one. From here, let us move on to the sacred places of ascetic struggle of the Blessed Theoktist, the Great Euthymius, and the Sanctified Savvas; and to make a long story short, I will say: let us mentally survey everything that took place in the ancient, medieval, and later monasteries, as well as how and to what extent each one strove to live out his life well within them.

3. In the same way, we too must walk, if we wish to find true life and light, enduring everything, suffering everything, giving “no cause for offense in anything, so that our ministry may be blameless” (2 Cor. 6:3); “above all these things, taking up the shield of faith, with which you will be able to extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one” (Eph. 6:16), remaining invincible, rejoicing and sharing in one another's joy in goodwill, harmonized by the single breath of the Spirit, as the one body of Christ.

101. We are called to be purified from sin through toil, deprivation, and afflictions

101. We are called to be cleansed of our sins through labor, deprivation, and afflictions. It is difficult; but in return, eternal bliss is promised. Let us therefore rejoice in all such things. [2, 24] I wish to briefly remind you of the ascetic life to which we are called, through which we purify ourselves of our past sins and for which we suffer daily. For our path is truly narrow and sorrowful, according to the word of the Lord; but since it holds the promise of eternal life, let us rejoice and strive to walk it successfully, competing with one another in good zeal, running as in a race, and overcoming our adversary, so that we may receive the crown of righteousness on the day of judgment. For this reason, let us regard what is burdensome as light, what is unfavorable as favorable, what is sorrowful as joyful, what is accompanied by deprivation as profitable, dishonor as honor, reproach as praise, scarcity of necessities as contentment, drinking water as drinking wine, and eating late as eating early. In this lies the martyr-like character of our life, and upon this is founded our expectation and hope for future blessings. Let us not, I beg you, weep or lose heart, seeing that our life brings sorrow and grieves the heart; but rather—seeing that it holds for us the status of sonship, the Kingdom of Heaven, and blessed immortality—let us embrace it with greater zeal and be continually renewed in it, adding labor to labor, feats to feats, diligence to diligence, obedience to obedience, the mortification of our will to mortifications, prayers to prayers, vigils to vigils, contemplation of God to contemplation of God, tears to tears, love to love. Such is our life, distinct from the fleeting one and superior to it, somewhat strange and alien to the worldly wise, who are ruled by the flesh and prefer the present to the future. Such are you who have left the world and all that is in the world—parents, brothers, children, and all worldly things—and who, out of love for the Lord, are always ready to endure hardship, suffer, be reviled, tormented, and put to death. For this, a great reward is stored up for you in heaven: you will be transferred from this world to God, and, leaving behind this temporary life, you will pass into eternal life, if you continue to demonstrate faithful obedience until the end.

102. I bless you for your sincere and successful commitment to the practices of communal life

102. 1) I bless you for your sincere and successful perseverance in the labors of communal life. – 2) Do not believe those who suggest that there are many such people everywhere. – 3) Our foremost weapon is the revelation of thoughts. – 4) It enriches all our ascetic endeavors. [2, 25]

4. I bless you because, in this generation and in these days, you seek the Lord, watch over your hearts, and believe that your spirit is with God; I also commend you for living your lives sincerely and without pretense, having truly renounced the world and not merely pretended to have separated yourselves from it, and in fact being what you are called: for you have truly separated yourselves from all things, dwelling with the one God and serving Him alone in your beautiful abode. Hence your communal life, in which nothing among you is called anyone's property; hence your irrevocable separation from your parents and relatives by blood; hence your genuine faith in my humility, revealed to me through the secret desires of your hearts; hence your spaciousness in confinement, your contentment in poverty, your comfort and joy in the deprivation of bodily needs; and what more is there to say?—Hence the glory of your life and the fact that you are on everyone's lips.

5. I am not saying this to flatter you, but I remind you so that you may remain steadfast and strong, and take every care not to fall from such a height, nor to grow weak in the good resolve of your will, by giving up your monastic struggles or being led astray by corrupt sophisms and the murmurings of people who persuasively suggest that here and everywhere there are many who fear God and serve Him even better than we do. "Such are the temptations"—and for what purpose? "That your abilities may be made manifest" (1 Cor. 11:19). Therefore, holding fast to the good resolve of your will, do not neglect to love the Lord, demonstrating this through good deeds—and seek out what is necessary for our salvation; for much is hidden from us, and we stumble without knowing how, or even without realizing it, as David's word assures us: "Who can discern his own errors?" (Ps. 18: 13).

6. I wish, then, for you to know that there is no remedy more effective for salvation than the revelation of one's thoughts—something you yourselves have experienced. – Why, then, do some of you—when the Lord has given you this gift, when such a remedy is at your fingertips—hesitate to approach confession and revelation, and suffocate yourselves with silence, becoming carried away and filled, like worms, with unconfessed thoughts? I pity you, whoever you may be, and I sympathize with your weakness. Why, when you possess the means to be healed, enlightened, and cheered, do you subject yourselves to the opposite? God sees everything; for "there is no creature un , hidden from Him, but all things are naked and exposed to His eyes" (Heb. 4:13).—Moreover, I must reveal you; for I need the candor of my children so that I may know them, and they may know me.

7. And this is precisely what constitutes true spiritual kinship: unfeigned obedience, a carefree journey, sweet prayer, unceasing progress, and the ascent toward perfection. Good are the tears of contrition that flow from the eyes; good is pure prayer, whether by day or by night; good is patience in afflictions; good is engaging in needlework; good is attentive listening to readings; good is not being quick to speak and conversing without laughter; good is moderate self-restraint; good is remembering death and the lives of the saints, imitating them as much as possible; good is fleeing passionate audacity and observing divine humility; but best of all—merciless self-examination and confession of one's thoughts.—"Test everything; hold fast to what is good" (1 Thess. 5:21).

103. Thoughts and feelings, words and deeds in that world are completely different from ours: we experience all of this as if we were in paradise

103. 1) Thoughts and feelings, words and deeds in the world are entirely different from those we have here: we regard all of this as if we were in paradise. – 2) It is God who has given us what we have; both inwardly and outwardly, everything is different from what it is in the world. – 3) Nevertheless, let us be careful not to turn out to be worse than the laity. [2, 26]

8. Glory to God, who chose us from our mother's womb for this sacred calling! Thanks be to the Lord, who has called us to the blessed and wondrous monastic way of life! – To us—though it may seem bold to say so, it is not far from the truth—it has truly been given to understand the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven more than those in the world, many of whom, though they see, do not see how things really are. For look at their judgments and aspirations: they glorify wealth and fleeting glory, rejoice in pleasures and delights, are enchanted by fragrant ointments, soft garments, precious stones, beautiful dwellings, gardens, groves, and all manner of other vanities; they laugh, dance, and grow fat like animals being prepared for slaughter, and do many other things that are best left unsaid, just as the consequences that arise from these—which are not good, yet are praised by them—are best left unmentioned. This is what they praise, what they boast about, and what they rejoice in! – But all this is insignificant and worthy of contempt in the eyes of those who “have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5: 24); – such as you are in the Lord Jesus Christ, according to the Holy Apostle, having crucified your flesh. We have a different desire and a different inclination toward other things. We seek and strive for the kind of well-being that existed in the paradise of bliss from which we were cast out: for this purpose, we adopt a way of life close to the original one, turning away from the alluring world and coming to God, casting off the darkness of this life and clothed in the light of the spirit, and by renouncing everything, we become masters over all things.

9. O, what a wondrously great calling! Who has separated us from flesh and blood, from our parents, relatives, homeland, from the customs of this life, and from all that is worldly? Who has persuaded us to submit ourselves as slaves to abbots and spiritual fathers, and to undertake the ascetic feat of abstinence, vigil, and sleeping on the bare ground? Who has enlightened us to view things without distraction or attachment, and not to regard as great anything—gold, silver, beauty, worldly pomp, or even the royal diadem and purple robes—and instead to regard as more honorable and greater the act of clothing ourselves in these ragged and patched garments and taking pride in them, rather than in glittering robes? Who has given us the strength to flee from all that is material and carnal and to unite with the highest order of life, remaining pure and uncorrupted through virginity, like the angels? These are our praises! God has granted them to us, who have loved Him and longed for future blessings—the unapproachable light, eternal glory, inexpressible joy, unceasing gladness, the eternal inheritance, the Kingdom of Heaven, inexhaustible riches, and all the promises spoken of through the angels and the Fathers.

10. Since this is so, let us watch and pay close attention, lest we turn back to the opposite and subsequently find ourselves lagging behind those who live according to the ways of the world. Therefore, let us purify ourselves again and again, and again and again strengthen ourselves in chastity—and let us take care, with mind and heart, not to give the devil any leeway. A word is provoked by a word, a glance is drawn by a glance, negligence is encouraged by negligence, and little by little, as we grow accustomed to this, we find ourselves in the position of night crows, and we bring about sinful death. Not so, my children, not so—I beg and implore you. Guard yourselves from one another, for life and death come from your neighbor. A little negligence, unguarded carelessness, plunges one into the abyss of sin. Pay attention and take heed, young and old, those in front and those behind, rulers and the ruled. Above we were blessed; here we are dishonored; above we were presented as living like angels, here we are likened to Satan. It is said of a certain one that it would have been better for him never to have been born (Matt. 26:24). The same can be said of this one. – But enough of this. – And I have said these things not to sadden you, but to ward off the coming sword of sin by warning you in advance.

104. It is my duty to speak; it is yours to listen

104. 1) It is my duty to speak; it is yours to listen. – 2) You honor me with your lips, but your hearts are far from it: when I told you about our financial hardship and explained the reasons for it, you accepted our situation; but then you began to grumble, especially about why so many are being accepted. – 3) This is what I will explain to you: God is our provider and will help us. – 4) Do not grumble; otherwise, like the Israelites who grumbled in the wilderness and, because of that, did not enter the Promised Land, you too will not enter the Kingdom of God. – 5) When did anything like this ever happen to our fathers? On the contrary, they all endured hardship, yet they did not refuse others what they needed. – 6) You yourselves were supported here when you came with nothing—why then are you unwilling to show mercy to others now? Dogs dying of hunger are not driven away, yet you want to drive away those for whom Christ died. – 7) Did you not all promise to suffer with me? And now what? Or have you forgotten that suffering is our lot? – 8) Repent; as for me, I will not change; moreover, you are partners in these matters: for we are one. – 9) Recall how many times God has delivered us from need: why then should we fear acting according to the commandments? [2:30]

11. My task and my tireless endeavor are to always bring the word to you, to remind you of what is proper, and to encourage you in the patience of your godly life. For if the shepherds of a speechless flock, out of necessity, take on the labor of sleeplessness and the care of the sheep entrusted to them, leading them out to pasture and guiding them there: how much greater, then, is the need for me—a sinner who has unworthily received authority over you, the sheep of Christ—to keep a watchful eye over your souls and, through the proclamation of the word, as with a flute, to sound the call to you, pointing out what is right and beneficial, and warning you against what is wrong and harmful. But since such a responsibility rests upon me, it is not permissible for you to treat my words carelessly, but rather to listen attentively to my pastoral voice. “My sheep,” says the Lord, “hear My voice, and they follow Me. They do not follow a stranger, but flee from him, for they do not know the voice of a stranger” (John 10:27, 5). This applies to me and to you as well.

12. But why have I offered you this preface?—I will say this first, so that these words may not be a burden to you—because some of you honor me with your lips, yet your hearts are far from me. Now I will explain why. – We have faced hardship in meeting our physical needs, due to poor harvests in previous years, as well as due to the influx of people sent by God from the depths of the world to the haven of our monastery for salvation, and also due to the increase in guesthouses and other shelters, since we are located in this royal city. I announced this to everyone, and, expressing my deep sorrow and the concern weighing heavily upon me regarding how to meet our needs for the current year, I asked and implored you to be inspired by zeal to increase our handicraft production, beyond what is customary among us, reminding them at the same time that for us, who seek the Kingdom of Heaven, it is entirely fitting to endure in every way the narrow and sorrowful path, on which we face sorrow and hardship, hunger and thirst, toil and sweat, nakedness and poverty, and other such things; and adding that God often allows us to face small trials to test the depth of our love for Him and whether we willingly endure the hardships that come our way for His sake. – You proved yourselves worthy then and lived up to my expectations. But since you did not have a heart truly devoted to God and thanked Him then only with your lips, you soon afterward grumbled, burdened by what had happened, and rebelled—not against some Moses, but against me, a sinner—saying: “Why does he gather so many of these when he cannot provide for them? And what need is there for this?” And who is forcing him to gather such a multitude?”

13. It is these very words that I must address and proclaim the truth of God, and point to the sword of God coming upon such people, lest the blood of their destruction be sought from my sinful hands. — And first of all, since they were not my true sons, they did not speak in harmony with me: “Why are we accepting them?” but, like strangers’ and wicked children, they said: ‘Why does he accept them?’—and thereby excluded themselves from fellowship with me. —Furthermore, even though they spoke thus, they are still guilty and deserving of condemnation, for, as it is sung in the Psalms, ‘They slandered God and said, “Can God really prepare a meal for these people?”’ (Ps. 77: 19–20)—to such a multitude? Am I a provider of food, or do I bear fruit, or fill the granaries? And again, do I of my own accord and on my own authority welcome those who come and multiply the brotherhood? —Is not the Lord and God Himself the Provider of the world, “who opens His hand and satisfies every living thing with His goodness?” (Ps. 144: 16). Does He not Himself say: “Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you?” (Matt. 6:33). Is it not He Himself who encouraged the faint-hearted, saying: “Look at the birds of the air: they neither sow nor reap nor gather into barns, and yet your heavenly Father feeds them. How much more will He care for you, you of little faith?” (Matt. 6:26; Luke 12:28). Furthermore, through a certain wise man, does He not inspire us: “Who has put their trust in the Lord and been put to shame? Or who has sought Him and been forsaken? Or who has called upon Him, and He has disregarded them?” (Sirach 2:10). And again, through the Gospel, is it not He who promises: “Whoever comes to Me, I will never cast out” (John 6:37)? And is it not He who commands: “Let the little children come to Me, and do not hinder them; for to such belongs the kingdom of God” (Luke 13:16)? There are many other passages in Scripture that agree with this. Why, then, do you rise up against me, a poor man, and, in your tongue-tied rage, speak nonsense?

14. You are, it seems, like the Israelites, delivered from the hand of the invisible Pharaoh, from the bitter drudgery of slavery to the passions, and from the dark Egypt of worldly vanity, —who later, while traversing the desert of a sorrowful ascetic life, when they encountered heavy afflictions, did not give thanks to God nor give Him glory, so that, because of such a good disposition, what was needed might come according to God’s providence, but instead murmured against God, saying, as it were: “It would have been better for us to die in Egypt,” recalling the pots of Egypt and each one understanding by this whatever had most delighted him in the world. — But you know what happened to those who grumbled then: none of them was permitted to enter the Promised Land, and all their bones fell in the wilderness. I fear, my children, that we too might suffer the same fate if we were to do as they did. But back then it was the childhood of the Tabernacle and the Law; now, however, it is the perfection of grace and the truth of Christ. And this was done not by laypeople, but by some among us who have ascended to the heights of the angelic life.

15. When was such grumbling ever heard among our venerable fathers? Or did they ever refuse to accept anyone seeking salvation in their monasteries because of a lack of material provisions? Was not their door always open—not merely to those wishing to renounce the world, but to every poor person in need? Did they not also leave specific instructions regarding this in their wills after their deaths? You know what provisions our great luminary Euthymius made in this regard; you have read how it was with our ever-memorable fathers Savva and Theodosius the Great, and with the most blessed Pachomius. Did they ever experience want?—Not just once, and certainly not to a small degree. One of them, for example, did not even have what was necessary to celebrate the Liturgy at Easter; others experienced similar situations in different ways. Thus, they sometimes enjoyed abundance in many and varied ways, and at other times they suffered want; but in both cases they gave thanks to God and bore it with good cheer. Their true children shared in their sufferings, in joy and gladness. But those who are not like them—neither then nor now—fall under the curse and perish. This is why you must pay attention, my children and brothers.

16. And you yourselves who are grumbling, remember that you are not supported by your own labor and that, when you came here, you brought nothing with you. At that time, because you did not have to turn back, you gave thanks and praised God and us. How is it, then, you foolish ones, that you are now unwilling to show others what you yourselves received back then, and are stingy about passing on to others the gift you received? Unfriendly, uncompassionate, merciless! Even if we were to take in speechless dogs dying of hunger, we would still be worthy of praise. For it is written, “The righteous man has compassion on the lives of his animals” (Prov. 12:10). Should we not accept rational human beings—our fellow creatures, our brothers—who beg us to bring them into our harbor after their shipwreck and to save from extreme need those for whom Christ died? But such thoughts do not occur to the unwise.

17. Did you not promise to die with me for the Lord’s name? Yet now, at the slightest hardship in labor and need, you deny me and shrink back. Why do you not urge me all the more to ensure that not a single poor person who comes here leaves without having been fed, given drink, and provided with the aid they seek? But you yourselves love only to fill your bellies—and even to overeat—eating fish, drinking wine, not just two or three glasses of Krasavul, but even more, which is forbidden by the Fathers. And the saying comes true for you: “No one can serve two masters”—gluttony, I mean, and the love of God. But, O foolish and hard-hearted ones, understand that—according to all that has been commanded by the Holy Fathers, and which I, a sinner, ceaselessly remind you of—it is fitting for us to suffer and, through many sorrows, to enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

18. Therefore, repent, for you have sinned greatly and exceedingly before the Lord. — As for me, I will not refuse nor waver; but just as I have begun, so will I continue, welcoming everyone who comes with all warmth and a fervent heart; for it is not only I, but also God, who has commanded this, and then you yourselves with me: for we are all one. Whatever you do to me, you do to me: when I clothe the naked, warm the one who is cold, clothe the one who is barefoot, bring the homeless into my house, feed the hungry, and give drink to the thirsty—and all this in the name of Jesus Christ, our true God, who gave Himself as a ransom for our sins, believing in the truth of His promise that “He will not let the righteous soul go hungry” (Prov. 10:3): such are your souls, which have not murmured—for I do not accuse everyone—rejoicing in the fulfillment of God’s commandments and in the growth of brotherhood, patient in God’s trials, having renounced everything, and even ready to stand for God’s cause unto death.

19. Consider—I address you again, you who have gone unpunished—has God delivered us from extreme need only once? And what blessings has He bestowed upon us, through the prayers of my father and yours?—Did He not provide us with grain and wine in times of scarcity? Did He not move kind-hearted people to open their granaries to provide for us? Are not honey, olives, cheese, blankets, garments, and gold still being sent to us from villages, islands, and cities—from bishops, rulers, and even those clothed in purple? – May the Lord forgive you and make you stronger in the days to come, so that, by enduring and persevering with your fellow brothers, you may be deemed worthy, together with them, to receive the crown of righteousness.

105. The season is now seductive (spring); keep your body under control

105. 1) The season is now alluring (spring); keep your body under control. – 2) Moderation in drinking and eating. – 3) For self-restraint, heavenly blessings await—before which earthly blessings are nothing. – 4) Look upon the company of virtues that surrounds you; gaze upon heaven: and all will be bearable. [2, 31]

20. Goodness is hard-won, but easily stolen from the inattentive; and what has been acquired over a long time can be lost through a moment’s carelessness. Therefore, pay special attention to yourself during this springtime, when the body is agile and the flesh—being of the earth—seeks to act according to earthly desires. The earth, when fertilized and nourished, yields crops according to its nature; so too the flesh, nourished by various foods and drinks, naturally boils over with the passions hidden within it. Take control of it, then, and restrain it; and, as the Apostle says, “do not indulge it in lust” (Rom. 13:14), but, providing it with what it needs in reasonable measure, live in the Spirit.

21. There should be moderation in both food and wine. Wine should be consumed in small amounts for comfort, and then only on feast days, during extremely exhausting labor, during illness, and when the journey ahead is long; at other times, however, you should be content with a single cup, or at most two: for you know what is said about this in the Gerondikon. As for meals, I quote to you the following words of the Apostle: “Let the meals be abolished” (1 Cor. 16: 13). I do not say this to turn you away from them entirely, but desiring that you eat and drink in a proper and godly manner, for the salvation of the soul and the strengthening of the body, so that you may perform the tasks that are required of you.

22. Do you not know that through such self-restraint and abstinence from worldly pleasures—such as meat-eating, wine-drinking, baths, hot springs, and other such things—that divine paradise is being prepared for you, with the tree of life and the water of immortality, the delight of the Spirit, and the ineffable beauty of eternal blessings? Rest and every kind of comfort are treasured there for you. Very soon you will reach it through the gates of death and begin to taste and drink of these things insatiably and eternally. Here, however, even if we consider the blessings found in royal palaces, they are not delight (τρυφή) but food (τροφή) for worms—to partake of them is not a good life but lifelessness; to take pleasure in them is not joy but sorrow,—delight in them is not possession but deprivation—and their inheritance is truly vanity of vanities, as the wisest Solomon declared, having fully enjoyed the pleasures of the world.

23. You have self-restraint in your female friends, obedience in your wife, purity, virginity, and charity in your daughters, and contrition and humility in your holy maidens. Look up to the heavens of the mountains, and you will see where our dwelling is, where our Head and the Father of all is—Christ the Lord—and where our city is—the heavenly Jerusalem. Truly, if you endure all things, you will triumph; if you are content with all things, you will be crowned; if you depart this life in this way, the gates of the Kingdom of Heaven will be opened to you.

106. Let us endure all things in the hope of eternal bliss, according to the word and example of St. Paul

106. 1) Let us all endure all things in the hope of eternal bliss, according to the word and example of St. Paul. – 2) For we, like him, face trials to endure at every moment. 3) If we endure these, God’s favor will be upon us. [2:32]

24. Work hard and strive, and do not regard the afflictions you face in your life for Christ’s sake as something foreign—something strange and unexpected that has befallen you. Did you not, upon coming here from the world, confess before God and His chosen angels that you would willingly endure every sorrow and hardship for the sake of the kingdom of heaven—in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness, in insults and revilings, and in other ascetic trials? It is better not to dwell on these things at all, but simply to endure and endure, keeping your eyes fixed on the blessed end of it all. And what is this end?—The inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven, the joy of eternal blessings, the taste of immortality, the bliss of unceasing life, sonship, the sweetness of paradise, and every other consolation. Truly, the great Apostle spoke worthily and righteously of this, saying, “The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom. 8:18). He then wandered throughout the entire universe, as if among lions and tigers, dragged about and torn apart by the unbelievers, in hunger and thirst and in day and night labor, working with his own hands so as not to be a burden to anyone, but to provide through his own labor what was necessary both for himself and for those with him.

25. If, in the circumstances in which we find ourselves, we bear everything with gratitude and patience—blessed are we—we will not be deprived of a share in it. But if we prove to be fainthearted, discontented, and grumbling, what fellowship will we have with those who have fought against sin even to the point of shedding their blood? And will we not find ourselves on that day worthy of every kind of shame, when we cannot even carry out the smallest tasks calmly and properly?—that is, consistent obedience, work without grumbling, humble service, timely silence, sensible speech, a casual shift to another duty, attention and effort appropriate to the task, the subduing of our own will, the grateful acceptance of the penance imposed, unwavering perseverance in psalm-singing and prayer—both night and day—and the patient recitation of the psalms assigned for the day.

26. All this and much more that cannot even be listed—if we accept, endure, and fulfill it all with meekness, good cheer, and willingness—then our life will be beautiful, and God, being pleased by this, will look upon us with favor and bless us. – Let us not allow ourselves to stray from this way of life; and even if we were to die every day because of it, let us accept it joyfully, “giving no offense in anything, so that our ministry may be blameless” (2 Cor. 6:3).

107. It is now Lent: let each one prepare himself as it requires

107. 1) It is now Lent: let each of us prepare ourselves as it requires. – 2) It is not merely outward mortification of the flesh and physical asceticism that are required, but rather the cutting off of all that is evil and of one’s own will—humility and obedience. [2, 33]

27. Now, as you know, it is Holy Lent, which demands of us spiritual feats far greater than at ordinary times, namely: the most zealous readiness for every good deed, goodwill, courage, diligence, patience, heavenly prayer, tearful contrition, heart-rending humility, and appropriate abstinence not only from food and drink, but also from envy, hatred, anger, impetuosity, grumbling, pride, and the most detestable passions. Examine yourselves more carefully, purify yourselves according to what has been said above, and prepare yourselves as chosen vessels, as instruments that speak of God, moved by the Holy Spirit. The time calls for this; this, in fact, is fasting.

28. Let no one say to me: “I sing and recite psalms so much, I pray so much, I eat very little, I drink little, I sleep very little while sitting, I make so many prostrations, and I lift my hands to heaven for many hours.” All of this is certainly commendable. But tell me this: Is your reasoning humbled? Is your spirit broken? Have you set aside your own will so that you may always be obedient, never contradict, never grumble, never argue, never envy your brother, never be vain in thought or speech—asking, “Why this? Why that?” Why is one in such a position and another in such a one?—And because of this, to let one’s heart change, one’s face grow fierce, and to pour out—not from the good but from the evil treasure of one’s heart—words of unbelief, recklessness, and disorder, which can plunge not only oneself but also those who listen into the pit of ruin. Such are not the works of fasting, nor are such the practices of self-restraint. But if anyone possesses within himself the spirit of humility and obedience, then by these two virtues, like two wings, he soars to heaven and becomes a companion of God.

108. Let us not allow ourselves to become slothful, remembering that we work for God, who will reward us according to our diligence and zeal

108. 1) Let us not allow ourselves to become slothful, remembering that we work for God, who will reward us according to our zeal and diligence. – 2) At the same time, let us observe the entire order of life, both inwardly and outwardly, in perfection. – 3) Take courage: we have God as our helper, and the Most Holy Mother of God, and the saints of God, especially our own—St. John the Forerunner and St. John the Theologian, to whom this monastery is dedicated. – 4) Let us refrain from unseemly conversations and speak only of what is beneficial to the soul. [2, 84]

29. Take heed, lest our hearts be weighed down by despondency, laxity, and inappropriate thoughts, so that no internal calamity of spiritual downfall may result from this. But with youthful vigor and zeal, let us strive to live out together the remainder of our fleeting and ever-diminishing life, so that, having accomplished good deeds, sacred practices, and honorable virtues, and having passed from this life into the age to come, we may be deemed worthy to receive the imperishable crown of righteousness from God, the Rewarder. Let everyone therefore examine how he performs his service, and continue to do so until old age as if serving the Lord Himself—not carelessly, not listlessly, not lazily, not hypocritically—knowing that by doing so he offends not a man, but God, to whom the service is dedicated. For what are we here, if not mere fellow servants who remind others of the Lord’s commandments?—so that both those who fulfill them and those who violate them do not sin before us, nor do they please us, but the good Lord and God who gave the commandments. Therefore, whether anyone is copying books, serving, plowing, digging furrows, or doing anything else, let each one do his work as in the presence of God and not of men; and his work will be pure, being measured by God, the knower of hearts, according to the effort and zeal he has applied to it.

30. One must guard one’s tongue from idle talk, shield one’s eyes from unseemly sights, preserve one’s heart from impure thoughts, and temper all one’s senses with the fear of God; one must treat one another with humble wisdom, address one another with unassuming love, engage in proper conversation, look to what is useful, listen to what is fitting, interact with modesty, and meditate on divine things, so that, rejoicing and being glad, we may fulfill God’s commandments and bring our days on earth to a soul-saving conclusion.

31. Take courage: we have God as our helper and intercessor in this journey through life, and as a strong shield we have the intercession of the Most Holy Theotokos and the prayers of our Lords, the great saints John the Forerunner and John the Theologian, whose names our monasteries bear. But “if God is for us, who can be against us?” (Rom. 8:31). “If the Lord is the protector of our lives, whom shall we fear?” (Ps. 26:1). If we have the help of the Mother of God and the Saints, who will overcome us? No one, ever. But even demons will keep their distance from us, and people will praise us; our enemies will be astonished, and no one will stand against us. If, however, we are not such, then everything will turn out differently for us.

32. Why should we conduct ourselves with proper decorum, especially while living in such a city? Let us refrain from discussing matters foreign to us. It is foreign to us to converse about kings, to speak of rulers, or to pry into this or that. “Understand these things that have been commanded to you” (Sir. 3:22), says the wise one. We have different concerns and different conversations. Worldly people speak of worldly matters; those concerned with daily life speak of daily life; but we speak of God our Savior and of what is beneficial to the soul: of virtues, of the lives of our reverend fathers, of death, of the passing from this life, of the meeting with the holy angels, of the judgment before the throne of Christ, of righteous recompense, and of the Kingdom of Heaven. By conversing in this way, we are enlightened by the angels and enlighten the laity, if they happen to be present; but if we fall into vain conversations, we harm ourselves and expose ourselves to the ridicule and condemnation of others. – Take heed, then, from this time forward, and guard your lips from unseemly talk; rather, spread the word of our good deeds, thereby kindling an even more fervent zeal to love God and to choose even death for His truth. And God, accepting your decisions as deeds, will adorn you with martyr’s crowns on that day.

109. Seek what is not of this world with zeal and all your might: God will bless you

109. 1) Seek earnestly and with all your might what is not of this world: God will bless you. If you persevere in this way, you will prosper; for this is how all the fathers lived. – 2) Again, a rebuke to those who covet material possessions. [2, 35]

33. Some choose one thing, others another as the object of their pursuit: one seeks dominion, another glory from external office-holding, yet another contentment and abundance in homes, servants, and fields; worldly desires are manifold. But you, having left all this behind and transported your soul to another world, desire and seek what is above and heavenly, and abide in it with your heart; your entire care and labor are devoted to this one thing. Nothing troubles you or occupies you except the complete purification of the passions and the acquisition of a contrite and humble heart, unceasing prayer, constant diligence, tearful contrition, and complete detachment—not only from friends and acquaintances, but even from your very parents and all worldly vanities. – Indeed, such is God’s favor toward you! And I see how each of you persists, strives, and compels yourself to cast off the passion that torments you and to remain in communion with the one God. If, therefore, you persevere in this martyr-like struggle, Christ our God will grant you the strength and fortitude to repel every passionate and satanic opposition against you and to successfully accomplish the thrice-blessed feat that lies before you, just as the holy men and God-bearing Fathers who lived before you did. Did they, though clothed in the body and subject to our nature, pass through life without toil or struggle? By no means; but having endured and overcome many and varied trials, through every kind of obedience and humility, as well as self-control and all other virtues, having subjugated the flesh to the spirit, they ascended to the heights of the holy life and attained what they attained and for which they were glorified. Let us recall the virtues of our most reverend father Savva⁹⁵ for the edification of our souls. As a novice, as you know, he was extremely obedient, meek, and helpful; and when given the most menial tasks, he rejoiced as if accomplishing something glorious. Day and night he labored, carrying water and firewood; he was the first to arrive for psalm singing and the last to leave. Much more has been written about him, but there is no time now to list it all. Let us, then, imitate him, my children; for this is not impossible: one in one way, another in another, helping one another, competing with one another, but above all taking care not to do anything of our own accord—even that which seems good—without proper consultation.

34. I cannot remain silent about one matter; a second—I do not know how—is being committed among you by certain ignorant people who despise all order, even though it is highly reprehensible—I mean the frequent losses, or rather, thefts, that occur among us. For example, when someone leaves sandals, a pen, or other handicraft tools in their cell—whether stepping out briefly or for a longer period on business—they return to find that what they left behind is gone. This is a thoroughly devilish act, vexing and scandalous within the brotherhood: it will lead to suspicions, slander, grief, and even enmity—likely directed more at the innocent than at the guilty. “Listen, you thieves, to the stern warning of the blessed Apostle Paul: ‘thieves... and extortioners’—‘will not inherit the kingdom of God’ (1 Cor. 6:10). When he said “extortioners,” he did not specify: silver or gold, or precious garments, but he issued a general decree—whatever the object of extortion may be, even the smallest thing, the extortioner will not inherit the Kingdom. Do you hear this, thieves and plunderers?—And I beg you, stop stealing and plundering—threads, needles, awls, pens, small jugs, cups, little knives, belts—and the like: for I repeat to you, all who do such things will not inherit the Kingdom of God. – Or are you not afraid of the Apostles’ judgment? Is it I, a poor man, who utter such a threat? – Therefore, I ask you once more: let us walk in a manner worthy of the calling to which we have been called—purely, reverently, and righteously—turning away from the vice mentioned, so that we may be heirs to eternal blessings.

110. Through your fellowship, the good of each one extends to all, and the good of all to each one

110. 1) Through your fellowship, the good of each one extends to all, and the good of all extends to each one. – 2) Let us therefore neither be lazy nor act on our own; but living a communal life, let us strive to abstain from evil and to be zealous for what is praiseworthy. – 3) What we do and experience comes and goes—and is no longer felt; but it remains within, and on the Day of Judgment it will come to light for justification or condemnation. [2, 87]

1. Each of us has our own gift, as it is written: one has this, another has that. But you, brothers and sisters, bound together by the bond of love, through the power of this love, make one another’s labors and virtues your own. You, for example, bear dishonor with equanimity; another is distinguished by diligence; yet another excels in silence, and another in meekness; and through fellowship, each of you possesses not only your own but also what the others have: your goodness passes mutually from one to all, and back again. Therefore, rejoice and share in one another’s joy; and whatever gift each one has, let him excel in it, shunning pride and esteeming his brother’s virtue as greater. If, then, we are such—and so united with one another and bound together by the bond of love—let us strive more and more to excel, and God will be glorified in our work, and our way of life will become known throughout most of the universe.

2. But let no one be self-willed or eccentric. “Woe to those who are wise in their own eyes and clever in their own sight” (Isa. 5: 21). Let no one be careless or lazy, lest he hear: “Go to the ant, you sluggard” (Prov. 6:6). Nor should anyone be double-minded, lest he too hear: “A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways” (James 1:8). But always be active and quick to carry out the commandments, sincere, blameless because you confess your innermost thoughts, not driven by vanity, and not carried away by your own lusts. For such a person is like “a wave of the sea driven and tossed by the wind” (James 1:6), like one who is unstable and has no foundation in his heart. But may all such things be far from all of you; as for “whatever is honorable and praiseworthy,” strive to acquire it, to be enriched by it, and to treasure it in the treasuries of your souls, for the sake of attaining the Kingdom of Heaven.

3. Whatever any of you does each day—whether it is praiseworthy or blameworthy—all of it passes away, swept away like a stream of water, so that in your consciousness almost nothing remains from yesterday to today. Whoever suffers for the sake of the commandments—toils, weeps, endures, sweats, is torn at heart, is oppressed, grows weary, is subjected to insults, or suffers in any other way—feels it at that moment, and it passes immediately; but in the one who has experienced it, all of it remains and is preserved forever and ever for the sake of receiving a reward. On the contrary, whoever indulges in comfort, laughs, enjoys himself, acts recklessly, plays, gives himself over to idleness, disobeys everyone, acts frivolously, envies, gets angry, rages, plots, acts presumptuously, and the like—such a person not only derives no benefit from it now, but also stores up for himself an unpardonable condemnation on the day of recompense and God’s righteous judgment. Let us reflect on this, my brothers, and strive for virtue, while doing our utmost to avoid sin in every way as a calamitous and all-destructive evil, so that we may end our days in a manner pleasing to God and be deemed worthy of the promised blessings along with all who have pleased God.

111. Sermons are preached so that, by listening to them, you may be set aright, yet you all remain just the same: so stop being so inattentive and inactive

111. Sermons are preached so that, by listening to them, you may be set aright, yet you all remain just the same: so stop being so inattentive, and be active. [2, 38] I ask you, for what purpose is a sermon preached? Is it merely so that it may be read at a set hour and tickle your ears, or so that you may praise me, or simply without any specific purpose? For none of these reasons; but so that you may delve into what is said, accept the power of the word with all your soul, and bear fruit through the grace of Christ, with the assistance of my and your Father’s prayers. – Such is my intention and duty; but what do I see? – I see that as soon as the sermon ends, everything immediately vanishes from your memory without a trace, as if nothing had been said at all. That is why, as soon as we step outside after the service, we immediately fall back into the same sins as usual. One begins to talk out of turn, another grumbles, one spreads gossip, another hides in a corner to take a nap and misses the needlework class, and when he returns, his “hands are feeble and his knees weak” (Sirach 25:26). I will not speak of the rest. It should not be so, my children; it should not be so, lest you hear me say: “These people bless me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me.” But when you hear the word of salvation—whether from my teaching or from the Divine Scriptures that have been read—as soon as it happens, may a sense of the fear of God arise in your hearts, a spark of love for Him, a desire to prosper, and a resolve to faithfully fulfill His holy commandments, so that we may be made worthy of His Kingdom.

112. We are in a spiritual race: who are the spectators? What should the runners focus on? Who runs in an exemplary manner?

112. 1) We are engaged in a spiritual race: who are the spectators? What should the runners focus on? Who runs in an exemplary manner? – 2) One should not envy the customary distinctions within the monastery; everything that the discontented say in such cases is unwise: let them correct themselves, for this is a common practice. [2, 39]

4. You are the swift runners of the Lord God, and your race is not on earth, but from earth to heaven; the spectators are not people, but the hosts of angels and saints; the bestower of crowns is the Lord Himself, and the crowns are unfading. Blessed are you who have entered this arena of competition by taking the schema. But here you have only just begun; the crowns, however, are given only to those who have completed the race. Let each of you watch carefully how you are running; let you notice the markers on the racecourse that determine the success of the race—that is, progress in virtue; let each of you keep a watchful eye on the obstacles—and strive to overcome them—that is, the temptations of the flesh, the world, and the devil, drawing strength for this from the Holy Spirit; let no one look to the sides, but, fixing one’s gaze on the single point where the race ends, let each direct all their strength toward that goal. The race is not yet over. You have run well thus far; continue to run from here on with no less zeal and effort, competing with one another and helping one another. Who can outrun the others? The one who is the most humble of all. Who runs in an exemplary manner? The one who is the most obedient, the most reverent, the most patient, most psalm-singing, most silent, most hardworking, most prayerful, most sincere, most humble, most free from malice, most free from envy, most faithful, most loving toward the Father, and in every other way in which the work of perfect virtue is manifested, both in soul and in body. Let this be your course, and let this be how we ascend from strength to strength, and from the world to heaven.

5. Let love be your distinguishing mark, characterizing you as disciples of the Lord. And as you abide in love, accept with love every difference among the brothers—their preferences and promotions in ministries, crafts, positions, and ranks. Let envy, zeal, and anger give way. Let each of you accept what is favorable to your brothers as if it were favorable to yourself, and rejoice in their successes. Thus God is pleased, and complete victory over all is attained. Love is the crown of virtues. But to be distressed that so-and-so is preferred in such-and-such a matter or in such-and-such a ministry is a rotten and harmful thing and a sign of the opposing side. Not so, my children, not so. It is unjust to say, “I should be honored more than so-and-so,” or, “I am older than so-and-so—therefore, the higher place is mine.” Flee, I beg you, from such devilish snares. But whatever is good, whatever is honorable, whatever is fitting for the saints—whatever is loving toward brothers, whatever is humble and wise, whatever is most excellent—think on these things, pursue these things, strive to attain these things, acting in all things childlike, without malice, and sincerely, as the chosen people of the Lord, allowing nothing except what is commanded. And if any slip should occur, hasten to correct it and atone for it by performing penance, so that on the Day of Judgment you may hear that exalted voice: “Come, you who are blessed by my Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world” (Matt. 25:34).

113. You have set a good intention; but that does not spare you from the enemy’s temptations, which you are now experiencing

113. 1) You have set a good intention; but this does not spare you from the temptations of the enemy, which you are now experiencing. But remain faithful to your vow, and God will help you stand firm. – 2) Cast aside the works of darkness and prosper in the works of light: for the former draw God’s wrath, while the latter bring His blessing. – 3) We have many sick among us now: those who are healthy, let us serve the sick; those who are sick, be patient and content with everything. We have no servants: the brethren serve out of love and obedience. Take heart, you who labor: God sees all. [2:40]

6. By God’s grace, all of you are among those who are being saved; all of you have set out on the path to salvation, and none of you have any other desire except to attain salvation; but since the devil exists, the enemy of all that is good, many of us are subjected to his unwanted temptations: he inflames some with lustful pleasures, using the desires of youth as his tool, – others he brings down with self-will, because of which he himself fell from heaven; and still others he lulls into complacency with indifference, binds with despondency, and leads as he pleases and wherever he pleases; he unsettles us with unbelief and, having captivated us with self-will, teaches us to do inappropriate things. And why should we list, one by one, all the ways in which he attempts to pierce us daily, standing by and waiting only for the moment when we allow ourselves to slacken and give in to debauchery? But may the Lord God, who said to the sea, “Be still, be quiet” (Mark 4:39), forbid him this, and may He drive him far away from us. This is what happens when we focus on ourselves and constantly keep in mind the primary purpose of our entry into the monastery: for we, with God as our witness, have promised to endure every sorrow and hardship, even unto death.

7. Therefore, cast aside everything that is contrary to the pursuit of salvation: the faint-hearted, their faintheartedness; the domineering, their domineering; the lazy, their laziness; the pleasure-seekers, their pleasure-seeking; the proud, their pride; the vain, their vanity; the insolent, their insolence; the lawless their lawlessness, the talkative their talkativeness, the peace-loving their love of peace, the sensual their sensuality, the sorrowful their senseless sorrow; those who are envious, their envy; those who are quarrelsome, their quarrelsomeness; those who are argumentative, their argumentativeness; those who love idleness, their love of idleness. Such are the works of darkness and the forms of evil—the inventions and suggestions of the evil one! But what is pleasing to the good God is peace, gentleness, humility, obedience, lack of envy, diligence, care, vigilance, love, hope, righteousness, and prayer. Such are the works of light, such are the weapons of righteousness and the valor of the saints! I implore you, for the sake of your love for the Lord, awaken, you who are lulled to sleep by passions; take up vigilance, you who slumber under the spell of the enemy’s allure. If we desire to live a good life and if we love to see good days, let us heed the one who says: “Turn away from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it” (Ps. 33: 15). Where are the Lord’s gracious eyes? “The eyes of the Lord are on the righteous and on those who fear Him” (Ps. 32: 18). And where is the Lord’s angry face?

“The face of the Lord”—“is against those who do evil, to blot out their memory from the earth” (Ps. 33: 14). And all the following words of this psalm offer wonderful insights, if we care to ponder them.

8. In these days we have many sick brothers: such is the unhealthy state of the times. Those who are healthy—let us help the sick. Those who are sick—let us accept this chastisement from the Lord as salvific, and, bearing our illness with good grace, let us be grateful for all that is given to us. And when we are delivered from our illness, let us not rush about aimlessly here and there, but let us return to our duties. For we have no hired servants assigned solely to serve—as is the case with worldly people—but we are both servants and masters to one another, serving and being served—and each one must take care to serve more than to receive service prematurely. God sees each of you and your deeds and your service; He sees what you were before and what you have become now, how you lived in the world and how you live in the monastery, how you discipline yourself and endure everything, what you wear and put on your feet, and what labor you undertake in performing your duties—and in due time He will reward each of you according to your deeds. Therefore, let no one lose heart. We are known to God, and we will stand before His dreadful judgment seat, where, after giving an account of the life we have lived, we will receive what is due to us.

114. Let us cultivate our souls, doing in a spiritual sense everything that a farmer does when cultivating his field

114. 1) Let us cultivate our souls, doing in a spiritual sense everything that a farmer does when cultivating his field. – 2) Just as warriors conduct themselves and wage war, so shall we wage war and conduct ourselves; just as warriors endure all things in war in hope of rewards, so shall we endure all things in our obedience for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven. [2, 41]

9. A farmer, while tilling his field, does not regard the hardship of the labor, lest he slacken his hands or grow lazy, but keeps future benefits in mind and, for their sake, subjects himself to toil, sweat, and exhausting hardships. Since each of us, like a field, has received our soul to be cultivated in this age, we too must cultivate spiritual works within it; and on the Day of Judgment, God, who created us, will demand an account from us for this. Therefore, I ask and implore you: let us all together diligently cultivate the fields of our souls, renewing them according to the laws of piety, so that we may not sow among the thorns of passion; but having first cleared our fields of every weed of sin, let us sow seeds in them, then water them with the spiritual rains of God-broken tears, surround them with strong fences of the fear of God, so that the sprouts may not be devoured by the beasts of the mind, and illuminate and warm them with the sunbeams of love, so that later we may fill our wise hands with sheaves and gather a multitude of the wheat of holy deeds according to Christ’s commandments. For this purpose, the Lord God has called every soul into this life, and us in particular to a life modeled after the angels. May each of you, I pray, show through your good conduct that your fields are blooming, fruitful, and emitting a fragrance pleasing to the Lord—through a complete transformation of carnal habits and relationships, and this through humble obedience and Christ-like humility, perfecting yourselves day by day and being transformed from glory to glory, clothed in the radiant garment of good deeds, casting aside all disobedience and bringing every thought of the mind into captivity to the obedience of Christ, conforming to the common rule of the brotherhood, always embracing self-reproach, by which we may easily trample and slay the many-headed dragon of pride and self-will.

10. To what task are we especially called, brothers? To war and battle—not just any easy battle against insignificant foes, but a fierce battle against the terrifying powers of invisible spirits, as the Divine Apostle says: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12). Therefore, let no one remain unprepared for battle; let no one go out unarmed; and do not shun the marks of war. But do not be surprised when you receive wounds and injuries, or when you face clashes. All such things are inseparable from those who wage war. It is not the one who has been wounded once or has fallen under a blow who perishes, nor even the one who has been subjected to this many times or countless times, but the one who voluntarily surrenders himself to his enemies to be slaughtered. Therefore, brothers and fathers, let us pay attention and stand firm in battle, as soldiers of Christ. Every soldier, as you know, when he sets out on a campaign, encounters many hardships, labors, and troubles—whether from the scorching sun, the rain, or even the cold—he does not lead a pampered life there; at times he would wish to eat a piece of bread or drink a glass of cold water, but even that is not available; All day, or even all night, he is on the move, traveling from place to place, in dust and mud, in weariness and exhaustion—for what? To please the commander who enlisted him in the army, to avoid being placed on the list of deserters, and so that, when rewards are distributed, he may be unquestionably recognized as worthy of them. – This happens among us as well; only in a different way: theirs are temporary and fleeting rewards, while ours are eternal and imperishable, and are given by God, who reigns over all. – Therefore, let us endure again and again; let us strive and strive, each according to the ministry entrusted to him, serving the Lord purely and blamelessly: the one who manages, with wise and prudent arrangements, and the one who serves, with uncomplaining and zealous devotion. Let us also endure times of hunger and thirst, reproach and humiliation, clashes and insults; especially weariness and lethargy during nightly psalm-singing and prayers, and all manner of troubles—visible and invisible—that assail us and crush us daily as we perform our manual labor and carry out other duties; so that, through the prayers of our Father, having striven with good deeds and completed the course, we may be deemed worthy to receive the crown of righteousness on that day, through Christ Jesus our Lord.

115. Having cast aside all lust and anger, let us cling to the Lord, serving Him faithfully in the duties of our monastic vocation

115. Having cast aside all lust and anger, let us cling to the Lord, serving Him faithfully in the duties of our monastic vocation. [2, 42] Listen attentively and understand what the holy fathers tell us and command us. For this is precisely what I, though unworthy, offer you in my teachings. As for what exactly they say and instill in our souls, I will now present it in the following two passages from the Word of God: one warns: “Do not deceive yourselves: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor men who practice homosexuality, nor men who engage in sexual immorality, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6:9)—and again in another passage: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice; and be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, just as God in Christ has forgiven you” (Eph. 4: 31–32); another calls out: “Come, let us worship and bow down before Him, and weep before the Lord who made us” (Ps. 94: 6)—and yet another: “Enter His gates with thanksgiving, and His courts with praise” (Ps. 99: 4). Therefore, having been strengthened by these warnings and having taken these calls to heart, let us all come together in worship; let us bow down before the Lord and weep before Him over the life we have lived, over our daily transgressions—whether committed knowingly or unknowingly, in our deeds, words, and thoughts, and let us enter His courts with songs and praises, but not with profanity, frenzy, disobedience, or arrogance. Whoever grumbles has sin: let us not grumble, nor lose our temper, nor be self-willed, nor be vain, for we are earth and ashes, dust and ashes, especially those who, in their folly, think of themselves as glorious because of their bodily or spiritual deeds. I see that “the form of this world has passed away” from us (1 Cor. 7:31); for we are different from the laity, clothed in a strange garment of some sort, and living in a strange way: unmarried, nameless, without inheritance, elusive, and even more so, incorporeal; for “those who are in the flesh cannot please God” (Rom. 8:8)—we are crucified to the world. Since this is the life we have taken upon ourselves, we must bear its clear marks, so that we may truly—and not merely in name—be what we have called ourselves. Let us therefore be obedient, prompt, God-fearing, good, reverent, loving toward one another, diligent, patient, and grateful for everything that is given to us, so that, having lived well, we may become heirs of the Heavenly Kingdom we so desire and seek.

116. On the occasion of some people’s flight: stand firm and grow in holiness, taking great care not to act according to your own will, even in doing good

116. Regarding the flight of certain individuals: stand firm and grow in holiness, taking great care not to act according to your own will, even when doing good. [2, 43] (Some had fled the monastery: after expressing his sorrow over this, the Holy Father adds...) You, however, take heed from their example and recognize that the Lord has shown you His grace in that you were not led astray by the devil’s wiles, but stood firm through the steadfastness of your faith and did not depart from the holy commandment of obedience entrusted to you. I beg you, then, do not be like them; and as sons of the Light, do not become children of darkness and disobedience, and do not squander your many blessed labors in vain, thereby also delivering your souls to eternal condemnation. For it is written: “Whoever rejects the law of Moses dies without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses; how much more severe a punishment do you think those above will deserve?” (Heb. 10, 28–29)—those who have trampled underfoot the vows, confessions, and covenants of our holy calling and have mocked the mystery of our perfection. Therefore, I beg you to take heed and walk uprightly in the way of God, praying that they too may be raised up and turn back from the soul-destroying and deadly delusion of the devil. However, it is known that each of you reveals, by your inner disposition, what you are to be—whether a vessel of election or a vessel of perdition. For when, contrary to the common rule and not for the common good, but only by the abbot's command, something occurs among you—whether in reading, in psalm-singing, in abstinence, in vigil, or in anything else that seems good and proper—yet is done by one acting of his own accord, —which is why confusion usually arises throughout the entire brotherhood—it is clear that such a person is an instrument of the evil enemy, breaking the bonds of submission and obedience and walking in darkness in pursuit of his own lusts. Again, one must bear in mind that by righteous judgment the ungodly are separated from the godly, the false from the true, the hypocritical from the sincere, the deceitful from the genuinely devout, and the wicked from the virtuous. For “What fellowship has light with darkness? What agreement has Christ with Belial?” (2 Cor. 6:14–15). – So when we, out of forbearance and in the hope of their reformation, do not cut them off, they cut themselves off and separate themselves by their flight. If anyone wishes, let him recall what is written in the Gerondika: “The place itself drives out those who do not do the works of the place.”

117. Those Who Have Fled Again. – How can one avoid such a fall?

117. 1) Those who have fled again. – How can such a downfall be avoided? One must not heed the enemy's suggestions or the words of those he has seduced. – 2) Some, in the evening, demand bread and wine in a disorderly manner: I will issue a general order regarding this; cease your waywardness. – 3) Some arbitrarily switch from one form of obedience to another: let this not happen; one's own will is ruin. [2, 44]

11. (Again, regarding those who have fled.) How can one avoid such a fall? – Do not accept the serpent's counsel, nor harbor the serpent himself in your heart, but expose him as soon as possible—and he will flee as from a fire. If our fugitives had observed these rules, they would not have come to the point of suffering harm. But you, my children, be on guard and keep these things. As sheep of Christ's flock, do not willingly give yourselves up as prey to the devil. Having been led into the paradise of Christ's commandments, do not be deceived by the wiles of the evil serpent in any way, lest you be cast down into the gloomy darkness of sin. Living like angels, do not allow yourselves to be enveloped by the darkness of self-willed flight; but endure patiently, and faithfully fulfill the commandments. “Do not associate with the company of the deceitful, nor sit with the wicked” (Ps. 25:5). Wicked and deceitful is the one who consorts with others and conspires to flee, or to satisfy some other passion, to his own ruin and that of whoever agrees to follow him. Therefore, when such a person isolates you from others and begins to pour the poison of evil into you with his tongue, turn away and stand far from him; cover your ears to save both yourself and him. Even when he sees you grieved by the temptation that has befallen you, do not accept him as he slyly approaches you again, while you are righteously grieving and indignant: for this is the serpent, scheming to draw you to his side. When he begins to condemn your paradise—that is, the community—or to accuse those living with you, who are your brothers, saying, “So-and-so is like this, and such-and-such is like that,” or “This is not good among us, and that is bad,” push him away and rebuke him as is fitting, so that you may keep him in check and save yourself. – But what do such people say? – “Let's break away from the people here: the abbot is harsh; the head of the workshops is uncompassionate; the calligrapher is reckless; there's a lot of work, but the pay is meager; everyone gives orders, everyone commands; we don't have the strength to bear the burden of labor, and there's no way to save ourselves here. Let's run away from here.” – Where? “Wherever our eyes may lead; as long as we can just get out.” – And if any sensible person could see such people as they truly are in their hearts, they would see them as gloomy, terrifying, demonic, lacking anything sound—neither will nor mind—wandering this way and that like lost sheep. “And don't think I'm saying this just to shame them. No—no: on the contrary, there is much more evil in them—so much that it cannot even be recounted.” However, pray, pray with all your heart, that they may be found and return, either on their own or by our hands. As for our own task—may you remain steadfast, avoiding the causes of such a fall, striving in good deeds, for the heavenly reward. – But it has come to my attention that some of you are imprudently defending those who have slipped away, whereas they are unworthy not only of defense but even of being mentioned at all. It is fitting for you to simply name them with regret. For even the Apostles no longer call the traitor an apostle, but only Judas, the traitor, the betrayer.

12. I hear that there is once again disorder among you in the evening hours: some demand bread, others wine—and this during the days of Lent. You know that upon entering this city, we have already slightly altered our way of life compared to how we lived outside it; I am speaking of the consumption of oil, wine, and cooked food on the days of Lent, as well as on Wednesdays and Fridays.—And that would be enough. — But since I sympathize with you—both because of my own weakness and because of the difficulty of abstinence in the city—I hereby decree that from now on, on the days mentioned above, in the evening, all who wish may receive a cup of wine and a slice of bread. And let there be, finally, absolutely no disturbances, no quarrels—nor such foolish talk as: ‘I should have received this or that: I worked harder than the others.’ Those who violate the rules will not escape the due penances and excommunications. You, too, who oversee the guilds, the guardians of order, the building supervisors, and the other leaders of various departments, take precautions so that the same thing does not happen again.

13. I will also mention one more thing. — Some do not remain in the duties to which they are assigned, but move from one to another without good reason, out of mere frivolity and fickleness; thereby causing trouble for themselves and for those who maintain order; and they also cause the overseers of the workshops and craft rooms undue trouble and labor. — Let this not happen in the future. — But let everyone be patient with the task to which they are assigned, and let them work as prescribed. For inventing one’s own occupations and seeking to satisfy one’s own whims is a sign of disorder, ignorance, and disobedience. Now that this evil has been pointed out and forbidden, let no one act in this way anymore, lest they fall under penance for disorderly conduct. Do you not know what St. Dorotheus says? That whoever has severed his own will has attained the full measure of inner peace. Therefore, whoever wishes to enjoy inner peace should, to achieve this, follow this path—that is, the severing of his own will—and he will receive peace both during his time here and for all eternity to come. — May God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, grant you all the wisdom to be of one mind and to agree in all things—so that you may patiently endure every ascetic struggle as a preparation for eternal life and the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven.

118. The struggles are brief, but the rewards for them are eternal; the pleasures of sin are fleeting, but the torments for them are endless: the careless cannot escape them.

118. Feats are brief, but the rewards for them are eternal; the pleasures of sin are fleeting, but the torments for them are endless: the careless cannot escape them. [2, 45] This life is a time of feats, a time of sorrows and toil—not the kind of feats, sorrows, and toil that anyone would call momentary or short-lived, but those that last day and night, are long-lasting, and do not cease until the end of life. But let us not forget that this struggle of ours is not waged for the sake of any trivial, worldly, or human goals, but for the sake of the divine and for heavenly blessings. For if, through constant patience and the diligent observance of the holy commandments, we succeed in this struggle, we will inherit the kingdom of heaven, endless bliss, and the enjoyment of eternal blessings that are unspeakable, unheard of, and beyond comprehension. But if—God forbid—through negligence and laziness, through attachment to and love of the corrupting pleasures of this age, we do not succeed in it, then we will receive eternal torment, immeasurable shame, and a state of bewilderment, hearing that dreadful voice: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41). But may we never hear that dreadful voice nor experience that most wretched separation from the saints and the righteous—when they are taken into unspeakable joy, into inexpressible light, to insatiable delight, while we are led away with the demons into eternal fire, to the worm that never dies, to the gnashing of teeth, into the darkest Tartarus, into unbreakable bonds—and this not for a short time, not for a few years, not for hundreds, thousands, or myriads, but forever—for all eternity and always the same, according to the Lord’s decree. Where then, as the saints say, is the brother, or the father, or the mother, to deliver and protect?—But “a brother will not deliver; can a man deliver? No man can ransom himself, nor pay the price for the deliverance of his soul” (Ps. 48:8). I, however, must ask in another way: where, then, is the carelessness of the careless and the negligence of the negligent? Where, then, is the contradiction of the contradictory, the disobedience of the disobedient? Where, then, is the pride of the proud and the insolence of the wayward? Where is the gluttony of the gluttonous, the excuses of the liars, the renunciation of those who have renounced the vows they made before God?—Those who have trampled on the Son of God and counted the blood of the covenant as nothing, thinking that there is neither death nor resurrection, — nor judgment, nor retribution; who have severed themselves from the fellowship of the Holy Spirit, have been deprived of the Holy Spirit Himself, and wander to and fro, down the rapids and into the abysses of their lustful desires.

119. We have come out of the world: is it any wonder that we suffer in the world? But this is not a hindrance to us, but a help

119. We have come out of the world: what is so surprising if we suffer in the world? But this is not a hindrance to us, but a help. Let us therefore endure—time flows swiftly, and soon all will come to an end; the Lord sees all things and will render retribution for everything. [2, 46] According to the flesh, you have become without kin and without a city. You have but one Father, God of all; you have but one city—the heavenly Jerusalem—and your fellow citizens are all the saints of every age. What is so surprising, then, that here we suffer evil through ascetic privations and hardships, sometimes being insulted and reviled? Do not be disheartened; for this does not hinder but rather helps the truth to shine forth in us, along with an abundance of peace, light, life, inexpressible joy, and angelic gladness. Therefore, I urge and implore you: strengthen your souls in patience, ground your thoughts in the Lord, and bear and endure all things with a good spirit, in the hope of receiving the great blessings you await. Time flows swiftly, and we are drawing near to death—or rather, not to death, but to a life that never grows old: for death will have no power over you when you have died in advance by your own choice, through renunciation of the world. Let us therefore devote ourselves to our work with all diligence, and let each one strive to fulfill the duty entrusted to him, purely and reverently, presenting it with a clear conscience to God, the rewarder. For the Lord sees everyone—their deeds and their zeal, or their laziness and procrastination. He observes all things and will reward each according to their merits in the Kingdom of Heaven.

120. In our spiritual life, let us reflect the characteristics of the Lord's life on earth in the flesh

120. In our spiritual life, let us reflect the characteristics of the Lord's life on earth in the flesh. [2, 47] What can we “render to the Lord for all that He has rendered” to us (Ps. 115: 3), except to remember this and give thanks? For consider: what happened? From what height and to what degree of humiliation did He lower Himself for our sake? Though He was God and Lord of all, He took on the form of a servant; He was carried in the womb of the Most Holy Theotokos; and after being born, He was swaddled in cloths like an infant and laid in a manger; He was nursed as a child, grew little by little, and from a child became a boy, then a youth, and finally a perfect man, when He deigned to receive baptism, bestowing upon us the bath of rebirth; finally, He completed His ministry, having endured betrayal, life-giving sufferings, crucifixion, death, and the three-day resurrection. All this was done for our sake, so that we too might walk the same path spiritually. Since He, born of the Father before all ages without a body, was later born in the flesh of the Most Holy Virgin for our sake; so too are we, having first been born in the flesh, then born spiritually—all together in Holy Baptism, and especially, in a certain way, those who have taken the holy schema? Why must we act like infants—especially those who have recently received the schema—and imitate the simplicity of children, so that when someone insults or offends us, we do not become angry like wild beasts, but rather act as if we do not notice, just as children do? Christ the Lord obeyed His parents in everything, and we must obey our spiritual parents—our fathers. When Christ the Lord began His ministry, He was reviled and insulted, hearing from the frenzied scribes and Pharisees: “You have a demon” (John 8:48)—“You cast out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of demons” (Matthew 9:34)—“Is this not the son of the carpenter?” (Matthew 13:55)—and other similar reproaches; then He endured spitting, slapping, and flogging. And He did not utter a single word in protest, but only gave thanks and prayed: “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34). Let those who desire to be saved and to be co-heirs with the saints imitate Him. Take heed, then, all of you, from the first to the last; let nothing in you be motivated by zeal, self-will, or disobedience; but in everything, perform your work in a godly and loving manner, so that Christ may be pleased and glorified. May the Lord grant you strength and fortitude to purify, perfect, and enlighten yourselves more and more, so that you may shine like lights in the world.

121. Let no one set himself apart, and do not lose faith in your father; but do not listen to the enemy, the cunning inventor of evil

121. 1) Let no one set himself apart, and do not lose faith in your father; but do not listen to the enemy, the cunning inventor of evil. – 2) You will achieve this by opening your minds—which I implore you to do for your own salvation. [2, 49]

1. I rejoice and am glad when I see your progress; but just as much as I rejoice, I am also overcome by fear and trembling, lest some disorder arise and overturn all that you have acquired through much toil and sweat. That is why I address these words to all of you: be on guard, stay alert, and pray! Let no one seek to set himself apart or rely on himself; let no one move his feet from the firm rock of faith in his spiritual father; do not slacken in your ascetic labors, nor in any other way allow the many-headed serpent to enter your heart—the all-deceitful and cunning one in tempting others to sin—in this or that way, by this or that means, under this or that plausible pretext. He is a masterful inventor of sin, a sower of evil, cast down from heaven to earth, falling like lightning; he crept in like a thief into Paradise and deceived our forefather Adam, and from that time until now he has been teaching people all manner of wickedness and sin. He has also led the Christian people into heresies and immoral deeds, and he seeks to wound us with the arrows of sin and to kill us.

2. Therefore, I urge and implore you: walk steadfastly in your path, having put on the full armor of God, and do not give him any entry or even allow him to approach you. You will achieve this through good faith—as I have said—in the Father, through unwavering confession to Him and the full revelation of your innermost thoughts, and then through humility, sincere obedience, and patient forbearance. Therefore, brothers, I implore and beg you, for God’s sake, for the sake of the reward, for the sake of eternal life and its joys, and out of fear of the opposite—the unquenchable fire and other immeasurable torments—let us labor again and again, pressing on with vigor, walking uprightly, striving and doing our utmost to cross safely the great sea of this life, so that after death we may receive the crowns of righteousness and blessed immortality.

122. Travelers, looking toward the end of their journey, willingly endure all the hardships they encounter along the way; just as we must endure everything for the sake of the kingdom of heaven

122. 1) Travelers, looking toward the end of the journey, willingly endure all the hardships they encounter along the way; just as we must endure everything for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven. – 2) And all the glorified saints endured: for there is no other way. [2, 50]

3. Just as those who undertake a long journey move from place to place, sometimes along a smooth and well-trodden path, and sometimes along one crisscrossed by ravines or made muddy by rain: so too, as we live out this present life, we move from day to day, from year to year, encountering at times what is unpleasant and difficult, and at times what is pleasant and joyful. And just as they are not burdened by the length of the journey nor do they stop because of the difficulties they encounter along the way, keeping their eyes fixed solely on the end of the journey: so too we, who are striving in the virtuous endeavor of a monastic and ascetic life, and walking the good path that leads to the Kingdom of Heaven, must neither lose heart, nor turn back, nor grow weary from the troubles, obstacles, and sorrows we encounter, which are permitted for our benefit by God’s providential care for us. For if they, for the sake of the small and insignificant benefits of this temporary life, do not stop in the face of the hardships of their journey; is it not all the more fitting for us, for the sake of eternal and immeasurably great blessings, to endure everything, to accept and bear all things with good cheer, so that we may be deemed worthy to attain what we hope for? Come, my brothers and children, let us bear with the greatest courage and good cheer all that befalls us and all that is inseparably connected with our way of life: labors, hardships, fasts, vigils, kneeling, sleeping on the bare ground, heat and cold, hunger and thirst, poverty in clothing and footwear, a certain untidiness due to our labors, the urgency of obedience and prayer, and everything else connected with this in our ascetic life. Blessed are you, and most blessed, as you labor in your spiritual struggles and lovingly face the mental and sensual temptations that arise.

4. And is there anyone among the saints who have shone throughout the ages who has lived a true life without toil and hardship, without temptations and sorrows? Take, for example, Abraham, the greatest of the patriarchs, and the patriarchs, prophets, and teachers who came after him; or the Apostles—Paul and the others—or the Fathers who later became renowned: Stephen, the first martyr, and all the others who were martyred with him and after him for Christ’s sake; —Anthony the Great and all the holy fathers who labored alongside him and after him; in all of them we find immeasurable toil, sweat, struggles, weariness, sorrows, persecutions, attacks, slander, and temptations of every kind. “They wandered,” says St. Paul, “in sheepskins and goatskins, destitute, afflicted, mistreated—people of whom the world was not worthy—wandering in deserts and mountains, in caves and in the caverns of the earth” (Heb. 11:37–38). And all of them were like that. There is no other way to please God, no way to complete the path of salvation without toil, nor to achieve the desired victory without heroic deeds. How, then, can we—having undertaken the same task as they did—succeed in it any other way than by living the same kind of life that they lived and with which they spent their fleeting lives?

123. In what matters should we compete with one another, in what should we strive to surpass one another, and in what should we agree with one another

123. In what matters should we compete with one another, in what should we strive to surpass one another, and in what should we agree with one another. [2, 51] Come, let us cast aside despondency and laziness and embrace diligence and zeal for the fulfillment of all the Lord's commandments. Come, let us strive to excel one another—not in words, but in deeds; not by insisting on our own way—for that is characteristic of the side opposed to us—but by yielding, enduring insults, abuse, and mockery. – Come, let us compete with one another—not in causing offense or taking offense, nor in raising our eyebrows at those below us or proudly tilting our heads at those above us; for such is pride, which, having risen up against God the Almighty, was cast down from the heights of heaven to the earth below; – but to be peaceful and to pacify, to be gentle and to subdue, to possess the wisdom of the humble and the meek: for such is the Son of God, who became incarnate through obedience and humility and saved humanity through the cross and death. Come, let us imitate one another—not in being lazy and neglecting the divine daily services and nightly psalm-singing, for this is characteristic of the lazy and the immature—but in being eager for God's work, arriving at God's temple before the psalm-singing begins, ahead of others: for such are the zealots of piety and virtue. But, so as not to list everything one by one, I will say in general: let us all imitate one another in what is good; let us unite in humble love, peaceful goodwill, and virtuous humility; let us avoid deceit and mutual suspicion; let us strengthen our souls in mutual trust through spiritual fellowship; let no one be a traitor like Judas, nor two-faced and fickle, nor intemperate and lustful, nor harsh and cruel; Let no one by any means act or behave in this way, but let everyone excel in what is pious, righteous, and pleasing to God, awaiting day by day the hour of their death and looking forward to the day of the appearing of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, on which all things will be transformed and renewed, and we will stand before the dreadful throne of the Judge, in the presence of all the incorporeal ranks of angels, to give an account of all our deeds, words, and thoughts.

124. Be blameless in all things, both inwardly and outwardly

124. 1) Be blameless in everything, both inwardly and outwardly. – 2) Welcome not only townspeople but also villagers into the monastery. [2, 52]

5. (Written from captivity). Rejoice as true servants and ministers of Christ the Lord. He has prepared for you a crown and His Kingdom, if you, too, maintain a good disposition in your hearts and continue to lead the same way of life, living in peace, observing established rules, remaining blameless and pure, meek, humble, diligent in your work, psalm-singing, and reciting verses, opening up your thoughts, and fulfilling all else that is required of you.

6. As for the admission of new brothers, I wish that our brotherhood be filled not only with city dwellers but also with villagers, who are more suited to and accustomed to the labors and work established among us. An increase in the number of city dwellers, I believe, will not be healthy or beneficial for us, both physically and spiritually.

125. Keep God's commandments and our rules, following the example of the ancients—all as one man

125. Keep God's commandments and our rules, following the example of our forefathers—all as one man. [2, 53] (Also). May God strengthen you, my most honorable brothers, in the works of your hands and in the labors of your souls, and may He preserve you in all things blameless and unscathed, granting you, through the power of the Holy Spirit, the readiness to fulfill all His commandments and to obey in every way, keeping our eyes fixed on the blessings set before us—those reserved for those who love the Lord's coming—and regarding all earthly things as nothing—glory, pleasures, delights, and the repose of the flesh—but having crucified ourselves to the world and fixed our minds on the contemplation of the heavenly. Thus did all our ancient fathers live, having renounced the world and all that is in the world, and serving the Lord in our sacred and angelic order. Therefore, my children, hold fast to the traditions as you have received them; quench the flame of passions with the dew of chastity and purity; cut off the impulses of your desires with the sword of obedience; and be skilled in both the Lord's commandments and the works of your hands, as your leader now directs. – Let your entire brotherhood, as one soul and as if one man, perform all your works—both spiritual and physical—with vigor, goodwill, and unanimity, as if in the presence of the Lord.

126. Having put aside earthly things, strive for heavenly things, fighting especially against anger and lust

126. 1) Having put aside earthly things, strive for heavenly things, fighting especially against anger and lust. – 2) Instructions for subordinates and superiors. [2, 54]

7. (Ibid.) You have been crucified to the world, and peace be with you: therefore, turn away from earthly things and rise up to the heavenly dwelling, and live for the one God alone, having died to all else. Where your faith is, there let your eyes be turned; where you are captivated, there let your heart be watchful, as the Lord said: “For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also” (Matt. 6:21). Do you see what blessings you have been granted, and what kind of dwelling you have been deemed worthy of? An angelic one. Walk as angels do, not yielding to the influence of chance: resist anger with meekness; resist lust with chastity. May you not be overcome by that petty pleasure that troubles you every day and every hour. The weapon against it was pointed out by the one who said, “I waited patiently for the Lord; he turned to me and heard my prayer” (Ps. 39:2), and delivered me from that passion, though after quite some time.

8. You who are subject to authority know the laws of obedience; and you who are in authority know the laws of leadership—namely, to willingly be last, since you are first—approaching this with compassion and love. You must be accommodating, yet also firm; speak, yet also remain silent; smile cheerfully and warmly to offer spiritual comfort, and then resume a stern demeanor, sensibly avoiding excess on either side. May your eyes be vigilant in observing the rules, yet friendly in your responses; let your nostrils not flare in anger, your eyebrows not rise in pride, your tongue not twist in vanity; let every emotion remain humble, and every limb well-ordered; let your lips be an instrument of psalm-singing; let your mind think only of heavenly things, and your hands perform only works of piety and love. Let no one be disobedient, let no one be wayward, let no one be hard-hearted; come together with one accord, love one another without presumption, and extend your right hands to one another for your God-saved life.

127. I rejoice that you have gathered again from your dispersion and have settled in as you ought

127. 1) I rejoice that you have gathered together again after being scattered and have settled into order as you ought. Remain faithful to your order, both inwardly and outwardly. – 2) Instruction to Sophronius, the vicar—specifically; and to all other superiors and subordinates—in general. [2, 55]

9. (Ibid.) The steward who came here informed me that you have all gathered together again—both superiors and subordinates—and have restored your usual order: the superiors have begun to govern as they should and to assign to each person the obedience that is due, while the subordinates have accepted this meekly and humbly and set to work; and that in all this you are united by love, loving one another with brotherly love in Christ, so that you all have one soul, one mind, and one desire through a peaceful and well-ordered life. How my humble soul rejoiced at this, and how it gave thanks to the Lord—there is no need to speak of it. For there is nothing under heaven so pleasing and comforting to me as that you should live well, fulfilling God’s commandments and remaining faithful to the statutes of your angelic order. Since all this has now been restored among you, I ask and implore that each of you remain in good-natured patience, living day by day in a way that saves the soul through sincere obedience. Let there be no discord among you, nor self-will, nor waywardness, nor worship of one’s own will; nor grumbling, nor whispering, nor quarrels; nor effeminacy, nor insolence, nor mockery; nor idleness, nor faintheartedness, nor pride; nor anything else displeasing to the Lord. For this is why we have left the world and all that is in the world: parents, brothers, friends, acquaintances, villages, cities, marketplaces, spectacles, and all other things that stir up the passions and indulge in pleasure—so that we may acquire Christ and dwell as if in heaven, so that we may eradicate the passions and be enriched by virtues, so that, having lived piously and righteously in this present age, following the example of our holy fathers, we may be deemed worthy to receive the blessings promised to us. Since such is our calling and hope, let such also be your conduct, your manner, and your behavior; may your name and your life shine with good deeds, bestowing grace upon those of your own rank who draw near to you, as well as upon the laity, so that the name of our Father who is in heaven, so that we, the humble, may also rejoice in seeing this or knowing of it.

10. My son, Sophronius! Of all the many, I have chosen you to take my place in leading the brethren. Take care not to appear unskilled, so as not to bring shame and disgrace upon me; but let the light of your virtues shine so brightly that your name may be glorified not only among the brethren but also beyond. For whoever has God within himself through the fulfillment of His holy commandments becomes renowned both in heaven and on earth. Be attentive to the brothers; be kind and instructive; remind them wisely of what is right; gently rebuke those who act improperly; justly impose penances on those who sin; heal the weak with a fatherly hand; instruct the ignorant; and do everything for the good of the brotherhood: for this is why I have given you the authority that I myself, in humility, have received from God, through His providence. —And all the rest—both leaders and those under their care—faithfully perform your duties in the fear of God, so that God may rejoice over you together with all the Holy Angels. Work diligently, walk in gentleness, and treat one another with simplicity; do not withhold the revelation of your innermost thoughts and desires: for in this lies the salvation of the soul and deliverance from passions; observe, as is proper, the singing of the Psalms, the recitation of verses, vigils, and readings—all according to the rule—as well as the memorization of the Psalms and troparia, as directed by your spiritual fathers. —And finally, pray for my humility, that the Lord may grant me comfort and strength to endure the sorrows that lie ahead.

128. You are living well; and may there not be a single person of bad character among you

128. You are living well; and may there be not a single person of bad character among you. Labor as workers in a vineyard to receive your wages from the householder; fight as soldiers to be deemed worthy of crowns from the Giver of Rewards. [2, 56] (Ibid.) All of you live for the Lord and are storing up for yourselves the abundant fruits of salvation, turning away from all deceit and every temptation toward lawlessness. — And let there be no one among you who is wickedly bold, negligent, pleasure-seeking, sinful, self-indulgent, shameful in spirit, hateful, a thief—even of trivial things—envious, quarrelsome, hot-tempered, grumbling, sluggish, idle, disobedient, proud, disrespectful, a slanderer, a troublemaker, a lover of strife, a gossip, a sluggard, a slave to the flesh and the world, a Judas who plots the betrayal of his own soul and the exclusion of any brother from the brotherhood. Such are those who rob themselves of God, flee from Him, and wander along the byways of sin. They do not wish to endure the toil of the day; therefore, they do not receive a reward from the vineyard keeper. Or they do not wish, as soldiers of God the Almighty, to bear the hardships of battle so that, having fought valiantly, they might please the Lord; therefore, they receive no rewards but are entered on the list of deserters, and in their place they face punishment when they are caught. — Therefore, good soldiers, comrades-in-arms, fellow warriors, fellow travelers! Let us run, let us press on, let us strive and endure all things. The Lord is near—to crown us. He Himself looks down from heaven upon everyone who runs and weaves crowns for those who endure to the end. Therefore, let everyone be pure through confession, peaceful through humility, and eager through love for service. The leader, as the leader, must observe what each member needs, and after determining what each person should do, set everything and everyone in motion.

129. He invites everyone to thank God for having been delivered from prison

129. 1) He invites everyone to give thanks to God for having been delivered from prison. — 2) Our trial, he says, has separated the true brothers from the false ones. — 3) He feels compassion for the latter and prays for them, hoping for their reform; and he urges the former to remain steadfast, giving thanks to God for what they have achieved and striving to succeed in what is lacking. [2, 57]

11. (Ibid.) Our all-good God, swift to show mercy and rich in generosity, having been moved by the intercession of our Lady the Theotokos and the prayers of our patrons, St. John the Forerunner and St. John the Theologian, together with your supplications, has removed the trial and delivered us from our imprisonment. Therefore, let us all together raise a song of thanksgiving to God, the Giver of Grace, who has turned sorrow into joy and destroyed the wiles of the evil one, which were directed against us. However, whatever suffering I have endured, I have endured because of my sins, and for no other reason: with this thought I take comfort, believing that what I have endured will serve as a purification of my sins.

12. In our trial, we have all already been tested, like gold in a crucible, and especially those here. For those who previously lived in the Holy Spirit and with unshakable faith have remained the same, unchanged in the least; on the contrary, they have been further strengthened and established by the calamity that has befallen us. But those who remained cold-hearted, double-minded, carnal, and negligent—as soon as the blow of evil struck them, they fell away like leaves, and, like chaff from a sieve, they leaped out of the monastery of their own accord, so that it might be revealed who were like pure wheat. Understanding this, the divine David spoke in the psalm: “Divide them in their womb” (Ps. 16:14), that is, the sinners and the negligent from the virtuous and the pious. But—oh, what a fall!—because of their own negligence, “their bones are scattered in the grave of destruction” (Ps. 140:7).

13. Nevertheless, I grieve for them and weep, and I will not cease to cry out for their return as long as there is breath in me. Perhaps some of them, kindled by a small spark of the knowledge of God and turning to repentance, will be freed from the bonds of sin and, like sheep that have gone astray, will return from the path of the wicked. As for you, do not be disheartened by their fall, but stand with even greater boldness in the struggle for piety, in ascetic practices, in manual labor, in the sweat of your struggles, and in the courageous confrontation of the daily afflictions and temptations—even to the point of bloodshed and even to the point of death: for this is what we promised, as you know, when we took the holy schema. Now let each one examine himself and consider which of the things he promised have been fulfilled and which have not yet been. And for the former, let him give thanks to the One who gave him the strength to accomplish all that; and as for the second, let him direct the appropriate effort to bring what is lacking to fruition: so that in this way you may be worthily adorned with the crown of martyrdom; for the Lord says: “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only the one who does the will of My Father in heaven” (Matt. 7:21; Luke 6:46).

130. Therefore, we have forsaken everything to please God

130. 1) Therefore, we have left everything behind to please God. This is what we will continue to do, imitating the saints and following the royal path, on which all virtues abound, while all passions are driven away. – 2) If you are such, then God is in you, and with Him is every good thing, every help, and every protection. [2, 58]

1. (Ibid.) Greetings in the Lord, and may you continue to lead your good life in the usual manner, fulfilling the Lord’s commandments and walking in His righteousness, having nothing else in mind and desiring nothing else but to please God by mortifying your passions and cultivating virtues. For this reason, we have left the world and entered the monastery, leaving behind all worldly vanity, every attachment, every friendship and love—parental, fraternal, filial, and kinship—as well as every carnal pleasure, worldly glory, and everything else that is transitory and vain. Since we have thus resolved and desired to live in this way, we must act in accordance with this goal and this desire, following in the footsteps of the saints, heeding their instructions, and conforming to their examples—without looking this way and that, but walking the royal path, characterized by unquestioning obedience, God-imitating humility, heavenly impartiality, divine purity, angelic dispassion, meekness, righteousness, love, peace, zeal, patience, diligence, and every other God-pleasing disposition and deed; while disobedience, grumbling, pride, vanity, idleness, insolence, partiality, sensuality, and other evil deeds stand in opposition to those virtues.

2. Virtues are born of God, while passions and sins are born of Satan: for there is no communion between light and darkness, nor any harmony between Christ and Belial. Be, then, children of God, children of meekness and obedience, and not children of wrath, rebellion, and destruction. – Let no one set himself apart from others in his desires and thoughts; let no one love idleness; let no one grumble; let no one be hypocritical; but let all of you be quick to do good, all of you be grateful, kind, humble, approachable, joyful, friendly, free from envy, and free from rivalry, so that the Lord may be recognized as being among you: for if two or three are gathered in His name (Matt. 18:23); How could He not be among you, who are so many, if you are constantly zealous to keep His commandments at all times? But if God is in you, what can grieve you, or oppress you, or discourage you? Nothing; but everything will be bearable, though difficult, whether it be of the soul or of the body: for “if God is for us, who can be against us?” (Rom. 8:31).—And if He “did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how will He not also with Him graciously give us all things?” (Rom. 8:32)? Therefore, stand firm without wavering in the certainty that if you maintain your good life without change, you will undoubtedly be heirs to the Kingdom of Heaven. – O my children, I earnestly beg and implore you: kindle within yourselves the fire of divine love; be filled with zeal; strengthen yourselves with courage; establish yourselves in purity and blamelessness; illuminate yourselves with prayers, supplications, psalm-singing, vigils, contrition, confessions, tears, and sighs.

131. On the way to the monastery, pray for yourself, and ask them to pray for God’s help in their labors: for the harvest

131. 1) On the way to the monastery, pray for yourself, and ask God to help them in their labors: for the harvest. – 2) He reminds Athanasius and Ephrem to govern the brethren well, taking into account the character and weaknesses of each one. 3) He urges everyone to pursue their goal faithfully. – 4) Let us keep our fathers' commandments, compelling ourselves to do so through fear of judgment and death: here he recounts how a certain logothete died, drawing edifying lessons from that event. [2, 59]

3. (Also). As we make our way to you, hastening to the monastery, we first ask for your prayers, that the Lord may grant us success on our journey, both on land and at sea, and that He may help us to present ourselves as pleasing to Him, both in spirit and in body; secondly, we remind you that we have not been careless toward you or indifferent to your situation, but have always kept you in our humble hearts with good wishes for you, especially now, when, due to the harvest, you are facing great troubles and labors. May the Lord God strengthen you both inwardly and outwardly, and grant you the strength to bear both external and internal hardships with courage. Moreover, who can fathom the devil's schemes, his snares, and his temptations?

4. Pay close attention, my children, Athanasius and Ephrem, and lead the brotherhood in a manner pleasing to God, providing what is necessary to each and every one—both spiritually and physically—and in your dealings with them, adapt to the character and disposition of each: for not everyone needs the same thing—one needs a goad, another a bridle, one penance, another forgiveness, a third rebuke and admonition; Each has his own passion, his own habits: the methods of healing must be adapted to them.

5. Yet you, my brothers and sisters, are children of God. For His sake you have left the world and come here; for His sake you have severed all ties with flesh and blood; for His sake you have taken up His cross upon your shoulders; out of love for Him you have regarded all things as rubbish and have preferred nothing of this world to the blessings He has promised in the age to come. As pilgrims and strangers, you have come to this monastery and embraced the monastic way of life. Blessed is your choice, and holy is your decision. But, brothers, I ask and implore you to lead a life worthy of this great calling, so that, while you are outside the world, you may not act in a worldly manner, and so that, having fled from the flesh, you may not live according to the flesh—as indeed happens, and you know this even if I do not say it. For if we indulge in sensual pleasures, if we are driven by passions, if we insist on our own desires, if we seek preeminence, if we quarrel over mantles and other garments, over where to stand, over the pen and other trivial matters—are we not then carnal? Is not our struggle worldly? Let us not, brothers, under any circumstances allow our most holy calling to be reduced to ridiculous, childish quarrels. The glory of a monk is to be dishonored, reviled, and slandered for God's sake, without having done anything worthy of condemnation or revile. The adornment of a monk is to wear the ugliest of garments. I will say no more on this matter.

6. Keep your fathers' commandments; do not disregard the words of the saints; and for the sake of momentary pleasure, do not despise eternal bliss. He who is to judge all will come—at last, He will come, and He will not delay; and perhaps even before His coming, the fearsome Angel who is to separate the soul from the body will come—the time of exhaustion and the final breath will come. This, too, is terrifying and so overwhelming that, unable to bear it, we die. What, then, will happen after the soul departs, when the Angels come for it? Which realm will prevail and take us? – To answer this, I will tell you of a small incident that occurred—though involving someone not of our rank—that is nevertheless very instructive. They say that when the time came for that famous logothete Stavrikios to die, as he was taking his very last breaths—sweating, trembling, and gnashing his teeth—he cried out in a loud voice: “Help me, save me, O Lord, have mercy! What a horde of black and hideous demons is emerging from the sea and coming toward me.”—He lived on the seashore.—Although none of those present saw anything, the logothete—who had been merciless toward many—saw it and lamented bitterly. – And so, at the hour of our death, who will prevail—the angelic choir or the demonic host? Those whom we loved here will then embrace us at once. If we loved purity, obedience, humility, and other virtues, then the angels; but if we loved vanity, defiance, discord, luxury, laughter, and spectacles, then the demons. For passions are demons, just as virtues are angels. So who will prevail? Who will take my soul?—“Have mercy on me, have mercy on me, my brothers!”—But let us all love virtues together, so that the angels may triumph and take us; and not passions, lest the demons triumph and take us. And alas! It would have been better then if we had never been born. For “the strong will be severely tested” (Wis. 6:6), and especially those among us who wear the schema, the priests, the abbots, and other leaders among us. Do not rebuke me for these words: for I do not speak them to frighten you unjustly; but, fulfilling my duty, loving you, and desiring your good, I proclaim what is right.

132. He exhorts Sophronius to ensure the observance of the fathers' canons: for from this comes every good, and from the opposite, every evil

132. 1) He instructs Sophronius to ensure the observance of the patristic statutes: for from this comes every good, and from the opposite, every evil. – 2) To maintain a balance in the measure of mental and physical labor. – 3) Do not leave any misconduct unpunished. – 4) Such strictness is an act of love, not of anger. [2, 60]

7. (Ibid.) My son and brother, Sophronius! Take up your ministry not carelessly, but with all diligence and effort. – I find it necessary to always write to you about the same things, to stir up your zeal. – Pay close attention, then, and guide your brothers in all things, having Abba Akakios as your helper and counselor, my son. Observe and watch over the conduct of each one—how they behave, how they act, how they live—so that everything among you may turn to the glory of God, and your life may be established according to the rules and statutes of our holy fathers, and according to the commandments of my humility. For where people live and act in this way, there God is pleased; there light shines forth; there peace reigns; there Satan has no place; and passions are kept far away. But where they do not care about this and do not act in this spirit, there everything contrary to this takes root—evil instead of good, darkness instead of light, Belial instead of Christ. Therefore, be vigilant and attentive, scrutinizing the hearts of the brothers through confession and guiding them toward every good deed.

8. Keep the middle way: just as you must not allow silence, prayer, and reading to disrupt the affairs of your earthly life, so too must you not allow excessive labor in this latter sphere to divert your mind from the remembrance of God and the contemplation of divine things, and to plunge it into the material. Such is the law of true piety. And if you yourself were to live this way, then the brethren, following your example, would also embrace it and begin to practice it. For we did not leave the world in order to eat, drink, and clothe ourselves in peace here—or is our salvation in this?—Nor did we put on this monastic habit in order to sit idly and motionlessly, without food or clothing. But so that we might do both, each in its own time, wisely, according to the words of the Apostle: “Let all things be done decently and in order” (1 Cor. 14:40). Furthermore, this great Apostle speaks of himself, saying that he never ate his bread in idleness, but that what was earned by the labor of his holy hands was sufficient for his needs and those of those living with him (2 Thess. 3:8; Acts 20:34). Do these things, and continue in them. “Let no one despise your youth” (1 Tim. 4:12).

9. Do not overlook what requires correction, lest through such apparent kindness, some small omission, if left unchecked, lead the brothers into greater misconduct. Is anyone eating in secret? Under his penance. Does he have anything privately without a blessing, even if it is the most insignificant thing? Let him be placed under penance. Does he give food to another without authorization, exchange any item with someone, or do anything similar? Let him be placed under penance. Does he grumble? Likewise. Has he disobeyed? Let him be placed under penance. Does he refuse to work? “Let him eat humbly” (2 Cor. 3:10). Does he embezzle or steal? Let him be excommunicated. And so on... As is customary among us regarding penances.

10. Hearing this, my children and brothers, do not consider my words harsh, and do not think that all this is established out of ruthlessness. On the contrary, this is done out of a father's love, because I am concerned for your souls, for which we must give an account; and a heavy judgment will fall upon our heads if we do not teach you what is right, turn you away from evil, and strengthen you in what is good. Moreover, it is the duty of a good father not to leave his children unpunished, but to pave the way for them to attain eternal life through gentle warnings and mild punishments. Elijah, a father worthy of condemnation and reproach for failing to rebuke and punish his sons when they broke the law, lost his life along with those sons for this very reason.

133. Our labors are not great, but our rewards are immeasurable

133. Our labors are not great, but our rewards are immeasurable. Let us therefore be zealous, spurring ourselves on by the memory of death and all that accompanies it. [2, 61] (Ibid.) Blessed are we, my children, for by acting well and living well, we secure for ourselves the consolations of the Kingdom of Heaven through our small and insignificant sufferings in the monastic life; for all monastic labor is light, as the Fathers say, and is not worth mentioning compared to the endless, blissful joy. If you now endure this labor with patience, rejoice, for your reward is great in heaven. But we need to be mindful and constantly reflect on where we are and where we are to go, and what our departure from this world, the meeting with the angels, our standing before God, the judgment of the Judge, and, as a result, our being sent to the right or the left will be like. This is what you should meditate on in the morning, this is what you should reflect upon, this is what you should occupy yourselves with. I testify to you before God and His chosen angels, so that you, walking worthy of your calling, may not stray to the left, be led astray into sin, or fall into the snare of presumption. I will cry out about this and will not cease to cry out. So open your ears, let your hearts be stirred, and understand what I am saying; keep yourselves blameless, so that, as workers in God's vineyard, you may receive a great and immeasurable reward.

134. Be blameless in all things, so that you may serve as good leaven for those who are to enter the monastery after you; keep God before your eyes, along with death and the judgment of God: whether you depart or arrive

134. Be exemplary in all things, so that you may serve as a good leaven for those who are to enter the monastery after you; keep God before your eyes, along with death and the judgment of God: whether you depart or arrive. In light of this, everything else is nothing. [2, 64] (Ibid.) Be strict observers of my precepts, which you received from me upon entering the monastic life with the vow to keep them as long as you live, and make every effort to improve yourselves under the guidance of the Abbot, so that, having improved yourselves, you may be a good leaven for the brothers who are to join you, leavening them with yourselves and your way of life, baking them with the fire of love, and presenting them as bread pleasing to God for the heavenly banquet. Do not waste time on bodily rest and the fulfillment of your own desires, but seek heavenly consolation and peace of mind, after which it is fitting to enjoy moderate bodily comfort: for when such comfort is preceded by spiritual consolation, then it is blameless. Walk in godliness and righteousness, living in peace with one another, always keeping God before your eyes, remembering unceasingly death, the laying aside of the garment of the flesh, the departure from this world, the standing before God, and the hearing of His final judgment that awaits you—which will certainly be one of two: either: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels”; or: “Come, you who are blessed by My Father; inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world” (Matthew 25). Compared to this, nothing—the world, nothing—earthly goods, nothing—human glory, beautiful garments, the fragrance of perfumes, feasts, revelries, pleasures, and everything else. —But you, be filled with God and divine things; be intoxicated with the grace of the Holy Spirit; delight in the words of Scripture, sweeter than honey and honeycomb; adorn yourselves with chastity, righteousness, and self-control; grow rich in good deeds; be renowned for your humility; ascend to heaven through dispassion; glorify God with the angels; strike down the adversary with the fear of God and your holy prayer. Be enlightened more and more, be purified more and more, become more and more heavenly, so that it may be said to you, as if from the Lord's own lips: “You are not of this world” (John 15:19).

135. Strive, keeping in mind the Exodus and the Judgment: here, virtuous deeds are indicated, and especially what is necessary for the struggle against carnal lust

135. Strive, keeping in mind the Exodus and the Judgment: in this context, virtuous deeds are indicated, and especially what is needed to combat carnal lust. [2, 65] (Ibid.). Strive, my children, and walk the spiritual path, lifting your eyes of the mind on high, gazing at the heavenly, looking toward the eternal, and seeking to know when and how—in winter or at harvest, by day or by night, now or in old age, this year or next, on this day or at this hour, —my final breath will come: for death will certainly come; those who are to judge the soul will come, the adversary—the enemy—will come; and the victory or loss of all will be determined. By stirring yourselves with such thoughts, you will not be quick to sin, nor will you fall into the abyss of evil, but you will finally behold the blessings of the heavenly Jerusalem and will behold them all the days of your eternal life (Ps. 127: 6). Perform your bodily tasks as well; attend to both these and those; praise God with your lips; speak the truth with your tongue; work with your hands to the best of your ability; and walk the path of peace with your feet. Your whole body is holy, and all your members are members of Christ. “Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a harlot? Far be it!” says the Apostle (1 Cor. 6:15). Flee from immorality; let no one wrong another; let no one speak evil of another. Nothing can be hidden from God: for “the eyes of the Lord are brighter than the sun, piercing through the darkness, seeing all human ways and examining what is hidden in secret places” (Sirach 23:27–28). Do not laugh recklessly. Do not sit too close to one another when you talk. Do not inflame your blood by overfilling your stomach. Do not drink wine—I offer this as sound advice to the healthy. We have enough internal turmoil, enough natural fire; but if you add the fire of wine to it, you will kindle a disastrous blaze: the flesh will not withstand it, it will boil over and demand its due. I warn you of this, forewarning of the disastrous consequences: God has appointed a day of judgment, and He will condemn and deliver to unimaginable torments with the demons those who do such things. Anticipate the Lord in confession, revealing the suggestions instilled by the devil. Do everything in a proper manner, sleep in moderation, and, upon waking as soon as possible, perform the prescribed vigil. And you will be blessed if the Lord finds you doing so.

136. By asking questions about what is proper for them and whether anyone is straying into what is improper, remind them of the entire structure of the obligatory way of life

136. 1) By asking questions about what is proper for them and whether anyone is straying into what is improper, remind them of the entire structure of the life of duty. – 2) Then he exhorts them: you have labored—continue to labor; you have fought—continue to fight; do not let your labors go to waste, inspiring them with the promise of a fruitful harvest and God’s approval at the judgment. [2, 66]

11. (Ibid.) I greet you once again in writing—and ask, how are your affairs going? How does the peace of God protect you? How does the fear of the Lord purify you? How do His justifications gladden your hearts? How does the order of piety unite you? How does sincere faith strengthen you? How does your firmly established vow of obedience bind you together? How does sincere obedience uplift you? What is the Christ-like humility in your wisdom? What are your comings and goings? And how is the confession of your innermost thoughts going?—Furthermore, how are the works of your hands proceeding? Has the harvest begun?... Tell us these things and all the rest, and bring us joy. – We place our hope in you, yet we also fear; and at times we worry, wondering if anyone among you is acting recklessly? Is anyone grumbling? Is anyone indulging in the flesh? Is anyone becoming insolent? Are some not consorting with the devil, plotting just as those who have gathered together against the Lord and His Christ, saying, ‘Let us break their bonds and cast off their yoke from us.’ But the One who lives in heaven will laugh at them, and the Lord will mock them. Then He will speak to them in His wrath and crush them in His fury” (Ps. 2). For I have been set over you by your free consent, and you yourselves have willingly submitted to my authority. That is why I speak to you in this way, proclaiming the Lord’s command to you.

12. You have labored and still labor; you have struggled and still struggle, enduring the Lord in your asceticism, in your obedience, in the subduing of your wills, and in the suppression of your desires. Do not, then, destroy what you have accomplished before. But just as you have sown and continue to sow amid tears, sighs, and all manner of hardships, so may you reap with joy when the Judge of all rewards each person according to his deeds. “Hear, O heaven, and let the earth take note, for the Lord has spoken.” – Oh, may this word not apply to us, brothers: “I bore and raised up sons, but they rejected Me. The donkey knows its owner, and the donkey at its master’s manger; but Israel does not know Me, and My people do not understand!” (Isa. 1:2–3). But let it be this: “Your sons shall be like olive shoots around your table”—to be understood spiritually. “Thus shall a man be blessed who fears the Lord” (Ps. 127:4–5). – Listen, I beg you. Be wise in this matter, and all of you be of one mind, following the guidance of your Abbot. Live as though you were dying every day; do not worry about food and drink, do not be overly distressed, and do not grumble. What does the Apostle say?—“If bread causes my brother to stumble, I will never eat meat again, so that I may not cause my brother to stumble” (1 Cor. 8:13). Do not, then, be sons of rebellion, nor sons of fornication, nor children of wrath and sin, provoking God with shameful deeds. – Woe to your hearts! Woe to the eyes of your mind! – “God is a God of vengeance!” (Ps. 93:1). “There is no creature hidden from His sight, but all things are naked and exposed to His eyes” (Heb. 4:13). Who will not be terrified? Who will not tremble? Who will not devote himself to pleasing God “even to the shedding of blood”?

137. Instructions on how to perform services during the harvest, how to sustain oneself with food and rest, how to spend the night, and how to conduct oneself in general

137. Instructions on how to perform rituals, sustain oneself with food, and rest during the harvest; how to spend the night; and how to conduct oneself in general. [2, 67] (Ibid.) I know full well that you are now engaged in hard labor—being scorched by the sun’s rays and drenched in sweat because of the harvest and the grape-gathering. That is why I deemed it timely to tell you what is appropriate regarding these very labors of yours. – May the Lord’s blessing be upon you, my children, and may the Lord your God bless you from His holy heights, reviving you and strengthening your souls and bodies, so that you may have sufficient strength for both spiritual service and physical labor, and perform both without extreme exhaustion. I know how hot and scorching the summer days of harvest are, and what weariness they cause; so much so that if the special zeal of the laborers did not give them strength, scarcely anyone would be able to endure them. I therefore beg you, for the love of Christ, to persevere in both of these endeavors. After performing your customary psalm-singing and prayer to God early in the morning with dignity and a cheerful spirit, set about your work and labor, mentally reciting the psalms until the third hour arrives. At that point, cease your work and sing the third hour to the Lord with devotion, raising your hands to heaven to ask for the grace of the Holy Spirit to strengthen your souls and bodies; then, after making three or four—or more—kneeling prostrations with attentive prayer, partake of what the Lord has provided, except on Wednesdays and Fridays, as is our custom. – Take care, however, that during these meals there be no noise or commotion. – And during the harvest work, there must be neither quarrels nor self-will, from which come strife and shouting, nor conversations, nor laughter, nor backbiting—let there be nothing of this sort or similar among you. But may your work be blessed, as it is performed before the face of God. And you must help one another. When someone working near you falls behind, whether from exhaustion or some difficulty, stop as well—and help him, so that the harvest proceeds evenly and everyone maintains the same level of effort. When, at the direction of those supervising the work, you rest at noon, or sleep at night under the trees or under a shelter, see to it that your bodies are not close to one another and certainly do not touch, and that no two of you separate yourselves from the others to go to any secluded places. The foremen must keep watch over this. The sower of tares is here unseen; lest he creep up secretly and pour his pernicious poison into someone, and we thereby provoke the wrath of our Lord God. For this reason, be vigilant. During the service, since there are not many psalms to sing, care must be taken that even these are not performed hastily or haphazardly, but with attention, so that we may be in the right frame of mind for every good work. Let everyone be present; let no one be absent. Anyone who is absent—even if he later works as hard as ten men—is unworthy of the meal on that day. I say this out of concern for your salvation and to remind you that no one should stray from the way of God. If anyone has any sorrow, let him not hide it, but bring it before the elders: they will judge and heal what needs healing. No one should remain idle: such a person has no share with the brothers and is not counted among those who seek the Lord. – Are you too weak to chop wood, or do you not know how, brother? Take up the axe handles; can you not even take up the axe handles? Gather grapes, carry water, or perform whatever else is needed, whether outdoors or indoors. And God will accept this, according to your zeal, just as He accepted the widow's two mites.

138. Upon hearing good news about the brothers, he rejoices and encourages them to excel even more, illustrating how those in authority should act and what all the brothers should be like

138. Upon hearing good news about the brothers, he rejoices and encourages them to strive even more, illustrating how those in leadership should act and what all the brothers should be like. [2, 68] (Ibid.) The brothers came and told me how things are going with you, and this brought me unspeakable joy. For it is no small joy to me to hear that all of you are being saved by the grace of Christ, maintaining your good disposition and fulfilling the divine commandments, by which, as you are enlightened, you become children of the Light and heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven. O my children! Continue to live wisely, continue to guard yourselves, continue to spend day after day, warmed by divine love and renewed by the Holy Spirit dwelling within you, putting to death every indulgence and every lust of the corrupt flesh, and in their place planting and cultivating, like the Garden of God, the everlasting virtues, covering all things, enduring all things in submission, obedience, kindness, love, and compassion, being kind to one another, rejoicing in one another, and bearing one another's burdens. And first of all, you, my child, Varsanufius, observe the ministry entrusted to you by me without fault, before the face of the God who gives life to all, acting neither out of partiality, nor out of arrogance, nor out of indignation, nor out of foolish self-abasement, nor out of a frenzied mind, but as wisely and kindly as a nursing mother warms her children; and be willing to lay down your soul for your brothers and my children. It is a great task to shepherd Christ's flock. What did the Lord say to the Apostle Peter? "If you love Me, feed My sheep." So too, my child, if you love Christ the Lord and me, a sinner, shepherd my children well—or rather, Christ's lambs. But if some of them leap about like young goats—for I have heard such things—tame their restlessness, and explain to them that if they remain like young goats, on the Day of Judgment they will be placed on the left side of Christ the Lord, among those who are perishing, in Satan's camp; frighten their hearts with this, and strike them with this solemn warning, so that they too may become lambs: for lambs are meek, gentle, humble, obedient, and quiet, while young goats are restless, unrestrained, stubborn, and ill-tempered. Woe to such; for condemnation to eternal fire awaits them. None of you, my children, should be like this—none, I beg you; for otherwise the shepherd will be compelled either to starve them or to cast them out of his flock. But understand what I am saying, and do the will of God. – You too, my son Daniel, take care how you conduct yourself among your brothers: instruct them, season them with wisdom, and guide them; do not tolerate disorder, innovations, or outbursts; love those who are virtuous, reverent, not bold, dignified, hardworking, obedient, humble, not grumbling, not mocking; but do not tolerate those who are contrary to them without hatred, and correct them by showing them examples of what is better; let no one among you be alien to God or displeasing to Him. For the lawless, the whisperer, the complainer, the mocker, and the secret sinner are alien to God and displeasing to Him. Let no one like this be among you; but let you all be God-fearing, God-loving, and God-seeking. May the Lord preserve you, my children!

139. The fear of God and love kindle zeal and keep one on the right path; but those who lack them give themselves over to negligence and fall

139. 1) The fear of God and love kindle zeal and keep one on the right path; but those who lack them give themselves over to negligence and fall. – 2) We must care for and pray for the return of such people to the right path, while at the same time keeping ourselves more strictly in check. [2, 69]

13. (Ibid.) Grace and peace to you, in your good order, in obedience, humility, reverence, and kindness, in your day and night hymns and psalms. See to it that all this remains steadfast among you without fail. This can only be so if you have the fear of God and the fire of His love does not go out in your hearts. For when it goes out in any soul, then faintheartedness and sloth, along with other thorns and thistles of the passions, bodily laxity and licentiousness, sloth and despondency, excessive sleep, insatiable eating, and every other kind of sin—especially burning lusts, darkening thoughts, inclinations, and deeds of a ruinous life. The sign, however, that this holy and incorporeal fire has not gone out is that the soul always strives for what is good and diligently performs all that is required, without weakening or losing heart—obedience, work, psalm-singing, confession, handicrafts, prayer, prescribed abstinence, and all other deeds that fall under blessed obedience. Blessed is such a person, pleasing to God and beloved by all, who, from the good treasure of his heart, like flowers, brings forth manifestations of divine graces, reflected both on his godly countenance and in all his movements and words. Those possessed by improper thoughts, however, gradually stray from what is right, and then completely fall away from their confession (vow) and become the devil's prey.

14. But let us pray that He who daily calls back all who have strayed from the right path may also bring them back into His flock, so that sin may not utterly consume them; yet do not neglect to seek out the lost yourselves. For if those who have lost any of the irrational animals do not easily bear this loss, how much more should those entrusted with the care of rational sheep strive earnestly to seek out those among them who are perishing?—Since these have fallen, let the others stand all the more firmly and hold fast to what is right; for it is written: “When the wicked fall, the righteous are terrified” (Prov. 29:16). Take this to heart and continue to walk with greater caution; for on both sides, the devil is setting traps for you. Therefore, let no one harbor unconfessed thoughts or act according to his own will. Let no one be lustful or self-centered; for those who were possessed by these evil dispositions slipped into the pit of destruction and fled; and now, in a state of wretchedness, they wander aimlessly to and fro like lost sheep. Prayer has departed from them: for to whom will they lift up their hands, having fled from God? Psalms and songs fall silent on their lips. To whom will they sing, “I have waited patiently for the Lord,” when, through cowardice, they have destroyed themselves? Therefore, pray for their return; but at the same time, pray for your own steadfastness, saying: “If war rises up against me, in Him I will trust” (Ps. 26:3). “Many have assailed me from my youth, but they have not prevailed against me” (Ps. 128:2). “This is my rest forever; here I will dwell, for I have chosen it” (Ps. 131:14)—so that, as soldiers of Christ, fighting but not falling, you may be deemed worthy to receive the crown of righteousness for your endurance.

140. He grieves over those who break their vows and leave the monastery, and in every way urges them to return to the right path and remain steadfast in the monastic life

140. He grieves over those who break their vows and leave the monastery, and does everything in his power to persuade them to return to the right path and remain steadfast in the monastic life. [2, 70] Having now learned of what is happening among you, I was both glad and grieved: I was glad for the health and well-being of your sub-abbots, and for the brothers who are walking in the right path and those who have walked it, in pious humility, in good patience, and in a life pleasing to God; I grieved for those who have strayed from the path and fled, even though they have been called back. May the Lord preserve you more and more, and strengthen you to the fulfillment of the course of your true life; but to those who have strayed from the path, I address the following words of the Prophet: “O son of man! Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood?” (Ps. 4: 3)—seeking to fulfill your own wills, driven by your passions, without keeping before your eyes the fear of God, nor the unquenchable judgment, nor the unextinguishable fire, nor the utter darkness, nor the gnashing of teeth and the unimaginably dreadful Tartarus, but so fearlessly and brazenly, so deceitfully and frivolously judging God in your wayward undertakings. How long will you forget His judgments? How long will you fail to come to repentance? How long will you harbor deceitful counsels in your souls, inventing excuses for your sins and indulging in vain hopes? – Rise up, at last, from your fall; dispel the darkness surrounding you; put an end to your foolish desires. From whom are you fleeing? From whom are you turning away? Is it not from the Holy Spirit, whom you received on the day of your deliverance? – But enough of this for now. – Do not persist in this; do not give the devil further cause to rejoice over you; cease to please your adversary. Love the Lord who has loved us; receive the good Lord into yourselves; and He, being all-merciful, will forgive you the past for the sake of your humility. So, I beg and implore you: correct the failings of your souls, strengthen the foundations of your hearts, and gather together your scattered thoughts. Remember your vows. After making them, even if fire and the sword threatened you, even if torments and tortures lay before you, you should by no means have strayed from them; but because of a trifling matter—your own evil desire—you broke the Divine Covenant and your sacred vows; you leaped up like calves stung by a sting and rushed into waterless and impassable places; you settled in a village, associated with worldly men and women, and ate and drank as if at a feast. – What kind of fruit can come from such seeds?! Woe to me, the wretched one! I wish the earth would swallow me up. – Now is the time for me to say with the Prophet: “Let the mountains fall upon me, and let the hills cover me,” the lawless and sinful one (Hosea 10:8). For those whom I have begotten have forsaken God’s laws, defiled their bodies, betrayed their virginity, refused to obey, and become a laughingstock to the demons. For does not Satan lead those who obey him here and there, and does he not then devour them with the mouth of sin? – But let us at least come here to sober up, come to our senses, look around, examine the enemy’s deception and our own recklessness, reproach ourselves, humble ourselves, be contrite, fall down in confession, and gradually return to our former beautiful way of life. Come now! I implore all of you who stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of our God! Stand valiantly, march steadfastly, and be submissive to your leader and to the other authorities among you. Whoever rejects them rejects me, and whoever accepts them accepts me—or rather, not me, but God, for whose sake I am what I am, and you are what you are.

141. Urges one to set aside one’s own reasoning and will, and to entrust oneself with faith to guidance, for lasting success in the proper way of life

141. He urges us to set aside our own reasoning and our own will, and to entrust ourselves with faith to His guidance, for lasting success in the life we ought to live. [2, 71] Looking at the attacks being launched against us from here and there, I can say in the words of the Apostle: “Truly, a ‘thorn in the flesh,’ an angel of Satan, has been given to us, so that we may not become conceited,” but rather that we may humble ourselves, accept correction, and take refuge under the mighty hand of God, as those who cannot be saved otherwise. When, with all diligence, we subdue our rebellious reasoning and come to know ourselves—that we are utterly wretched, unable to do anything as we ought without God’s help, through the mediation of the one who guides us, whoever he may be—then an Angel will descend into the abyss of our passions, as never before into the abyss of Babylon, will uproot the flame of lust from our hearts, and will bring forth in our souls—like a dewy breeze—the gift of purity. Therefore, let us humble ourselves; down with our reasoning, down with our eyes; let our minds bow their heads; and behold, the mercy of the God who loves mankind is near. — Let no one be unfaithful, no one deceitful, no one insincere, who blesses with his lips but stands far away in his heart, as is the case with one who follows only his own nature and his own reason. “Let no one seek his own good, but that of his neighbor” (1 Cor. 10:24). Be wholly light, wholly sincere, wholly true sons; let us walk as children, as brothers, as co-heirs; let us accept nothing that might cause harm to one another, and let us not allow any new transgressions.

142. He invites us to rejoice that we are living a life of poverty, full of privations and sorrows, through ascetic labors, having renounced all worldly things; for this is the sure path to the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven

142. He invites us to rejoice that we lead a life of poverty, full of privations and sorrows, through ascetic labors, having renounced all worldly things; for this is the sure path to the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven. [2, 72] Though it may seem somewhat bold, I will say to you in the words of the Apostle: “Rejoice in the Lord always; again I will say, rejoice” (Phil. 4:4). Why? Because you are doing God’s work, because you have taken the monastic habit, because you are subject to the law of obedience and fulfill it daily—suffering, enduring hardship, living in poverty, and grieving—whether in fasting, vigils, sleeping on the bare ground, in labors and weariness, in the duties of your obedience, in the curbing of your will, in the unpredictability of commands, in the unwashing of the body, in the wearing of rags, shabby clothes, and shoes; I will add—in penances and excommunications, and even more so, —in ceaseless torments, jostling, stings, as if stabs and arrows, striking us visibly and invisibly from demons—whether through fornication, sloth, gluttony, the restlessness of thoughts and desires, or other innumerable passions. — Judge for yourselves, then, whether I have spoken rightly: “Rejoice always.” Indeed, my brothers! Blessed are you and thrice blessed, enduring all this for God’s sake, having chosen this and embracing it. And what follows from this? — In the age to come, truth and abundant peace, life, joy, and eternal rest, adoption as sons, and the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven will shine forth in your hearts: for you have so wisely, so commendably, and so divinely sought and continue to seek these things—having hated the world and all that is in the world, having turned away from parents, brothers, relatives, friends, and acquaintances, having left behind your cities, villages, fields, homes, and homelands, and having clung to the one God, the Lord and King of Glory, the good and most excellent Master, working for Him, standing before Him, serving Him, singing to Him unceasingly; and you have no word for father or mother, no concern for wife or children, no care for male and female servants, no anxiety over wealth and possessions, no strife over ranks and distinctions, no preoccupation with feasts and sparkling wines, nor any other carnal pleasures, —nor about anything earthly and transitory, but only about a life pleasing to God and the inheritance of the eternal blessings promised in heaven. Is it not fitting, then, that God should love you? Is it not fitting that He should call you His children? Is it not right that on that day He will say to you: “Come, you who are blessed by My Father, inherit what has been prepared for you from the foundation of the world”? Such are your deeds, such are your pursuits, such are your hopes!—Therefore, I say again: “Rejoice always.”

143. He compares the ascetic life to a race in the arena and gives detailed instructions on how to successfully complete this race and receive the reward

143. He compares the ascetic life to a race in the stadium and gives detailed instructions on how to successfully complete this race and receive the reward. [2, 76] Our spiritual struggle is like a race in the arena, as St. Paul pointed out (1 Cor. 9:24). But in that race, a small space is designated and a short time is allotted. In our struggle, however, the path stretches from earth to heaven, and the time spans an entire lifetime, after which crowns are awarded to the victors. Our contest is watched by thousands and myriads of holy angels—with the Lord of all, seated on His unapproachable throne of glory, as the organizer—and opposed by malicious demons who strive in every way to place obstacles in our path, to knock us down, and to destroy us. — Judging by this, you yourselves can see how attentive and cautious, diligent and tireless we must be, so that we may not only begin the race well but also complete it. Merely beginning will be of no benefit to us unless, with youthful vigor and manly perseverance, we press forward; but even this does not yet mean victory unless, with the same zeal and determination, we persevere until death itself, even if our lives were to be prolonged for a very long time. Let us therefore, brothers and fathers, persevere again and again; let us strive ever farther forward, seeking help and strength from above from the God who loves mankind, so that we may persevere well and successfully reach the appointed line or goal. The Word of God has set before us the most formidable feat, promising unspeakable joy and glory to those who run well and conquer, but threatening the most calamitous and terrifying fate to the negligent and careless, who either do not move from the spot, or stop before obstacles, or willfully stray from the path. “He who has ears to hear, let him hear,” says the Lord. Hear this, then, my children, and pay attention: run with vigor, and keep a watchful eye, knowing that cunning demons are always ready to stand in our way and set a stumbling block before us. Know that no one can serve well unless he strips himself of all that weighs him down, retaining only the breastplate of faith—by which I mean not only the renunciation of all external possessions, but also the removal of the inner diversity of earthly thoughts and desires. In our struggle, no one can succeed unless they train their body to be content with little food and drink; unless, instead of oil, they anoint themselves with steadfastness and tireless patience; unless they undergo, as if it were a course of physical training, the trials and exercises required before taking the schema. During the journey, however, no one should hinder their fellow ascetics, nor envy them, nor slander them; but they must keep their minds and eyes fixed on how to successfully reach the end of the course, adding effort to effort, zeal to zeal, and inspiration to inspiration, without looking to the right or to the left, paying no heed to praise, and not being carried away by vanity, not losing heart in the face of fatigue, obstacles, and conflicts, and not becoming disheartened by setbacks, so that, having thus fulfilled everything in a godly, humble, brotherly, and sincere manner, upon the successful completion of this journey, we may be deemed worthy to receive the promised reward from our Lord.

144. Let us strive for every virtue, and guard against all that is evil, especially that which appears to be good

144. 1) Let us be zealous for every virtue, and let us guard against all that is evil, especially that which appears to be good. – 2) The enemy has many traps. The best way to discern them is through the examination of one's thoughts. – 3) We must arm ourselves against every passion with the struggle of its opposite. The method of combating envy is held up as an example. – 4) We are urged to observe propriety in all things. [2, 77]

1. Come, moved by the desire for what is beneficial to all; let us embrace the warmest zeal for salvation; let us all do what is fitting, desire what is right, and seek what is beneficial—the young and the old, beginners and elders alike; let us purify ourselves from every defilement of the flesh and spirit, let us make ourselves vessels of election, creating holiness in the spirit, avoiding occasions of sin, not allowing pride, disobedience, sensuality, sensuality, and striving to enrich ourselves with virtues—humility, obedience, purity, and brotherly love; let us cast far from our hearts carnal and sensual inclinations, and put an end to relationships that indulge them—not only with those outside us, but also with our own inner selves—that is, let us not love one brother more than another: for such love is deceitful and hateful to God; outwardly it appears brotherly, but in essence it is satanic.

2. You know how many snares the devil has and how intricately woven his nets are—and that no one can be delivered from them except through the confession of thoughts and desires, with faith in one's spiritual father, accompanied by humility and obedience. Those who do not walk this path fall—and have fallen before, as we read; but those who follow this law have become shining lights in the world, having escaped the darkness of sin and the devil by mortifying their desires.

3. I implore you, therefore, by the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, to be wise for your own salvation. Whoever is tormented by a particular passion must undertake a corresponding struggle against it—against envy, for example, a struggle against envy—namely, hatred of this world's fleeting glory—because this passion arises from the desire to appear better than one's neighbor in some way: whether in the liveliness of the mind, or in melodious psalm-singing, or in pleasant reading, or in some other ability, spiritual or physical; and once kindled, it burns with a slow fire, exhausting and consuming us. But since we are members of one another—for we are all one body—let us rejoice with one another, regarding as our own all that distinguishes others; for when one is distinguished by one thing, another by another, and a third by yet another—yet all are one body of brotherhood—then through all these things the brotherhood is distinguished and becomes all-perfect, and the honor of this extends to each one: one is melodious, and you are loud-voiced; one reads clearly, and you quickly understand what is read; one is more quick-witted, while you are more capable of handling affairs; one is even more useful in managing tasks, while you are more eager to obey; and the latter is far better than the former, for what appears to be something before it truly is such is nothing at all. What is melody, or harmony, or reading, or speed, or calligraphy, or music compared to blessed and most lovely humility and obedience, to kindness and simplicity, before meekness and gentleness, before kindness and patience, before love of God and active prayer, and before other virtues—the acquisition of which is a matter of will and seeking—even if one were voiceless, unable to sing, a poor reader, tongue-tied, cross-eyed, ugly of face, or lame. Thus, our good God has made the gift of virtue easily attainable and accessible to all of us, making it dependent not on physical advantages but on the dispositions of the soul, in which it is sown, grows, and attains perfection.

4. Let us be content with what we have, rejoicing also in what each of our brothers possesses, uniting with one another and living according to God with every kind of order. You see, brothers, that we are growing in number; and it is necessary that everything among us be in good order: for if even a small thing strays from its proper order, the entire community is set in motion and wavers, losing its beauty of virtue, as happens and in every other community. For us, who have gathered as one in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and who live according to the order of the angelic dwelling, complete order in all things is an urgent necessity—that is, to sing and pray, to stand and change places, to sit and rise, to sleep and wake up, to go down and come up, to be silent and to speak, to eat and drink, to enter and exit, to ask and to answer, to gather and to disperse, to seek and to give, to serve and to receive service, to place and to hold, to dress and to undress, to put on shoes and to take them off—all of this is visibly done among us every day. When order is maintained in all of this, then our entire brotherhood appears like a calm sea—though in motion, its gentle waves are stirred as if by the Holy Spirit. But when, through carelessness, some disorder creeps in, then it is tossed and churns with waves, as if stirred up by strong winds and storms. Is this not what we see among us when noise, shouting, laughter, and chatter arise among you—as happened recently during the distribution of holy water and as you were leaving the refectory, when the four deans barely managed to restore proper order among you?—Not so, my children and brothers, not so. You know what is said about God’s will: that it is not only “good,” but also “perfect” and “well-pleasing” (Rom. 12:2), for the good of many. — I said this, however, not to reproach you, but as a reminder of what has happened before, so that such incidents may be avoided in the future. May the Lord of peace and the God of all comfort, who sustains all things in heaven and on earth in order, grant you strength and fortitude for every good work and endeavor, for every peace and unity of mind, for every order and tranquility, in sincere love for one another, so that on the day of His revelation we may be found among the faces of the saints and the host of the sanctified, together with all the saints who have pleased Him from of old.

145. A life of patience in communal obedience is true martyrdom

145. A life of patience in communal monastic life; this is true martyrdom. [2, 78] Guard yourselves against wicked collusion, presumptuous self-will, and the pernicious violation of monastic rules, conforming in all things to the rule handed down to us by the Holy Fathers; for what has been established for us has not been established haphazardly, but through the testing of all things from ancient times, with much toil and sweat; and what has been established has been established in accordance with the requirements and essence of our angelic way of life, and to refute those who interpret the Lord’s commandments differently. Continue, then, in your good work and walk to the end the path of the Lord, anointing yourselves with the oil of meekness and patience and enduring every kind of ascetic hardship, for which a vast enjoyment of eternal blessings is prepared. What, then, are these hardships? The very ones you actually endure every day: vigils and psalm-singing, manual labor, eating and drinking sparingly, the sequential fulfillment of one duty after another, propriety in standing in church and in the order of the procession, in gait, in clothing, in footwear, in head coverings—sorrows arising from privations, from being overlooked, from contempt, and everything of the sort. And many of the Holy Fathers rightly testify—and St. Basil the Great, above all, testifies—that the state of obedience is true martyrdom. – But look, what benefit do we derive from this? And what reward awaits us for it? – The unfading crowns of righteousness, the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven, adoption as sons, incorruption, immortality, and every other bliss beyond imagination. Having such promises, my brothers, endure again and again the labor of asceticism that lies before you, without being daunted by the occasional stumbles of some, nor losing heart because of the difficulties and sorrows you encounter, for the sake of our life according to God: for if we do not grieve here, we will not rejoice on that day—if we do not endure hardship and lament here, we will not find spaciousness and joy in the age to come. But the more we grieve and mourn here, the more we triumph and are afflicted, the greater the consolation we will find there: instead of sorrows, we will receive joy; instead of poverty, wealth; instead of meager earthly possessions—many heavenly treasures; instead of bodily sickness, spiritual well-being; instead of leaving the world, the Lord’s call to Himself: for what will it be like for us, and how great will it be, when we hear that blessed voice calling out and saying: “Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, which has been prepared for you since the foundation of the world” (Matt. 25:25). Therefore, if it were required of us to die daily for the sake of Christ’s love, we would choose this and submit ourselves to being beaten, burned, cut to pieces, and to endure every kind of torment, just as the holy martyrs endured. For it was not one thing that they were called to love and cherish, and another that we are; but we have one struggle and one aspiration, since by nature we are one—God’s creatures, brought into the world for a single purpose: to glorify God by fulfilling His holy commandments. The cutting off of limbs, the shedding of blood, and the torments of tyrants did not always occur everywhere. We have been deemed worthy to embark on this true feat of a noble life in obedience, and we undertake martyrdom in a different way: instead of the severing of limbs, we sever our own will; instead of the shedding of blood, we cast out sinful thoughts and desires; instead of tyrannical torments, we endure the attacks of demons and the hostility of the world; which is why, with hope that is not in vain, we look forward to sharing in the future age with the holy martyrs.

146. On the occasion of an earthquake, you remind us of the shaking of heaven and earth on the last day and offer instruction appropriate to that

146. On the occasion of an earthquake, you remind us of the shaking of heaven and earth on the last day and offer instruction in keeping with that. [2, 79] After the earthquake we experienced yesterday, there is nothing more appropriate for us to discuss than this very event—namely, what causes it and why does it occur? Among the Greeks, some say one thing, others another; but the divine David explains this to us when he speaks of God: “Look upon the earth and make it tremble; touch the mountains, and they smoke” (Ps. 103:32). Just as when a master casts an angry glance at a servant, the servant trembles—so the true Lord of all and Creator, before Whom all creatures stand as servants and handmaids—when He chooses to show His righteous indignation toward us for our sins, with the all-seeing eye of His power He gazes menacingly upon creation and “causes it to tremble,” so that we, terrified and trembling like servants who have brought wrath upon ourselves, may keep ourselves pure and turn to the fulfillment of His commandments.—Behold, my brothers, how terrible is His power! Such is the manifestation of His indignation, and the fury of His wrath! And if the present is such and so great, what will the future be like at the end of all things? For He Himself speaks with a threat: “I will once more shake the heavens and the earth” (Haggai 2:7), showing the extraordinary nature of that event. What terror will be seen, and what trembling will there be when the earth gives up all who have died since the beginning of time, when the heavens roll up like a scroll, the stars fall, the heavenly bodies change, and the sound of the Archangel’s trumpet resounds over all who dwell on the earth, when our God Himself will come openly, with thousands upon thousands and myriads of angels, archangels, and heavenly powers marching before His face, when the thrones are set in place, the judgment seat is established, and the incorruptible Judge and Lord will lay bare all that is hidden, all that we have experienced. When, upon the completion of all this in the twinkling of an eye, the great and terrible judgment is pronounced—calling the righteous into the Kingdom of Heaven and eternal life, while sending the wicked into eternal fire, into utter darkness, into the dreadful abyss of hell, into gloomy Tartarus, to the never-sleeping worms, to the gnashing of teeth and all the other dreadful torments? Who can bear all this, brothers? Who can endure such fears and horrors! Who can stand firm before this overwhelming and mind-numbing event! To see the heavens torn asunder, the earth shaken, a multitude of angels, and the Lord Himself, God, coming on the clouds to judge the whole earth!!! – But this long-awaited event is not far off—it is near: the Judge stands at the door! – Behold, the Bridegroom! Go out to meet Him! – But if we have bright lamps of purity and sufficient oil of mercy and love, blessed are we; we will meet the Bridegroom joyfully and enter His palace. If not, however, we will be sent away from those doors, which will not open to us when we knock, having acted wickedly, having dozed off and fallen asleep, and having proved unprepared. – Therefore, so that this may not happen to us, let us who are asleep awaken from the slumber of carelessness; let us who are slacking off rise up from despondency; let us sober up those who are intoxicated by shameful thoughts, purify our souls, which we have defiled with inappropriate desires, and strengthen our hearts with firm faith, for those whose hearts have been shaken by double-mindedness, fickleness, and sensuality. Let us, then, who are already good, become even better; let us who are already enlightened become even more enlightened; let us who are already pure become even purer; let us who are already zealous become even more zealous; let us who are already virtuous love doing good even more; let us who are already humbly wise become even more humble and wise; let us who are already obedient become even more obedient; we will do all that is good and fulfill every commandment, so that we may prove worthy to enter the palace of the Bridegroom of our souls for endless joy.

147. We will prosper more and more in every virtue, striving earnestly and avoiding all that is evil, and adorning ourselves with the deeds of angelic fellowship, following the example of the holy fathers and in the hope of the great promises

147. We will progress more and more in every virtue, striving earnestly and avoiding all that is evil, and adorning ourselves with the deeds of the angelic community, following the example of the holy fathers and in anticipation of the great promises. [2, 80] Let us not bring shame upon the deeds we have already accomplished through our present actions; as if we had only just begun, let us zealously fulfill every duty and every virtue, receiving light upon light and ascending from glory to glory: this is achieved through your good conduct in all things, when you are clothed in the garment of humility, adorned with obedience, and show active love and meekness, and shun self-will and self-indulgence—from which spring death, deceit, pride, and the love of glory—in which swift ruin lies and from which all who have fallen from the beginning until now have perished on this field of obedience. Now, having already been cleansed of all thorns, tares, and weeds, be fruitful and show forth a new life, bringing nothing into it from the speculations of those who have stumbled, lest you too suffer the same fate. Be sincere and pure in all things; bear revilement, humiliation, and abuse with good cheer; all of you show steadfastness in the struggle for what is good, self-control, and perseverance; for in this lies the martyrdom of a life of obedience; and all who endure it will receive the crown of righteousness. As those burning with love for Christ and tested by trials and tribulations, bear with courage all that that happens day by day, and follow in the truly golden life of our fathers, in which we will find no disobedience, pride, contradiction, insolence, reproach, or turmoil, but where the peaceful, angelic state reigns, resting under the breath of the Spirit. You know that what I am saying is truly good; if it is good, then it is also desirable; if it is desirable, why should we not love it, desire it, and strive to attain it?

148. Goodness is hard to instill in us, but evil is more readily accepted

148. 1) Goodness is hard for us to adopt, while evil is more readily accepted. – 2) The path of goodness is like climbing a mountain, while the path of sin is like descending from a mountain. – 3) We must look upward and not descend into earthly thoughts. – 4) We have different gifts and different thoughts; but we will receive our reward according to our zeal and labor. – 5) Let us bear all kinds of privations, inconveniences, hardships, and sorrows with good cheer; for this is what we have set out to do. But this is the sure path to salvation. [2, 31]

5. It usually happens that when someone speaks of something sinful, having mentioned it once or twice, they predispose their listeners toward evil. As for what is good, however, even after speaking many times about what leads to salvation, one barely manages to attract anyone's attention or disposition toward it. It is so difficult to instill goodness in human nature; on the contrary, evil is very easily accepted by it.

6. Walking the path of goodness is like climbing a mountain: how much toil, discomfort, and trouble is involved? In contrast, the path of sin is like descending a mountain: it is easy, and obstacles are not visible because of the speed of one's descent. Therefore, the path of goodness requires special care, guidance, and caution.

7. Here, we must not keep in mind anything earthly or transitory, but only what is heavenly and eternal, if we wish to ascend rather than descend. For just as one who is ascending to a height, if he looks down, experiences a certain dimness of vision—so too, for one who, while ascending the path of virtue, fixates his attention on earthly pleasures, the eye of the soul is dimmed. We must look upward, for there is our Head—Christ the Lord; there is our treasure and eternal life. Let us not grow weak as we ascend, nor lose heart when we see the height of the ascent. We cannot reach the end by our own strength, but God's help and His intercession are near.

8. We have set out on this path and have prospered, and each of us, according to our zeal and labor, now stands at one level or another of virtue. And we differ from one another more in our spiritual dispositions than in our physical appearance: for one loves humility and obedience more fervently, while another loves them less so; or one is distinguished by the gift of love for one's neighbor, while another by zealous care for many—whether through manual tasks, fieldwork, or household duties, or by meeting needs, such as those of the steward, cellarer, refectory attendant, shoemaker, tailor, and others. Each of us walks in the Lord's way, and this path leads everyone to incorruptible crowns.

9. Let us only patiently and humbly endure the labors, sweat, and hardships of our work, the vigils and fasting, the singing of psalms, as well as the cold, the meagerness of our clothing and footwear, and other discomforts. God is my witness that I do not view this with indifference; I pity you, I sympathize with you, and to the best of my ability, I strive to bring peace to all of you. But you yourselves can see that it is no small task to clothe, shoe, and comfort so many. – However, that is precisely why we set out—to go hungry, to thirst, to be naked, and to live in poverty for the sake of Christ’s love, by which the Divine Apostle himself lived in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness, and in other hardships (2 Cor. 11:27); and not only he, but all the saints “walked in skins of sheep and goats, destitute, afflicted, mistreated... wandering in deserts and mountains, in caves and in the caverns of the earth” (Heb. 11:37–38). If this was their lot, how can we, living differently, be deemed worthy of the same honor as they? We cannot. But if anyone finds himself experiencing any of the hardships listed, let him rejoice that he has been made a partaker of the life of the saints. This is how everyone should view everything and accept all things with gratitude, as gifts from God given through His stewards, without any grumbling or complaint. If we act in this way, we are blessed, brothers, for because of this we will be granted rest in a place where there is no sickness, toil, deprivation, or sorrow.

149. He rebukes those who yield to the enemy’s temptations and those who fall, and urges them to resist, giving them hope in the Lord’s help

149. He rebukes those who yield to the enemy’s suggestions and fall into sin, and urges them to resist such influences, giving them hope in the Lord’s help. [2, 82] Once negligence takes root, it gradually draws the inattentive person into the pit of destruction. When someone begins to find it difficult to get up and attend to their duties, resisting the call to obedience and shirking their responsibilities—then the enemy supplies them with suggestions and incitements to commit wicked deeds, and they, yielding to these, not only fall themselves but also lead others astray. Alas! What is happening?—How does the demon triumph? How do we bring shame upon our guardians, the holy Angels? How do we cast ourselves over to the side of the adversary, to the disgrace of our great God, the Good Shepherd, who gave Himself for us in atonement through the cross and death? How shall we look upon His face? How shall we endure His wrath? There is no torment commensurate with our wickedness. — Others inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, while we are carried off by our soul-destroyer. Others display the steadfastness of martyrs, while we are subject to the downfall of the rejected. Others are exalted to the heavens, while we are cast down to the depths of the earth. Others set their hearts on ascending the steps of virtue, while we arrange for ourselves a descent along the steps of ruin. Will we never come to our senses? Will we never wake up? Oh, I beg you, let us hasten to the task, let us take up our labors, let us walk in God’s way, avoiding the causes that lead to downfall and performing all that is godly and virtuous: unquestioning obedience, unceasing labor in manual work, humble faith, so that everything—both what is done and what is thought—may be revealed in confession, the swift rejection of impure thoughts, and at the very first attack of the demon, saying: “Depart from my sight, Satan”—whether he lures us toward the delights of lust, incites us to apostasy, inclines us toward sloth, instills impatience, or stirs us up against the faith. For he always and everywhere sets ambushes, lays snares, and digs pits; he never sleeps, nor is he ever idle; he seeks neither food, nor drink, nor anything else; he has but one task, both night and day—to destroy our souls. Our first and foremost weapon against him, however, is the discernment of thoughts through God’s help and intercession. Let us not, therefore, grow lax and expose ourselves to a fall. Let him be great in the power of sin, let him be cunning in his ways of luring us to evil, let him be malicious by nature and the sole inventor and architect of our ruin—but let us not fear him: for after Christ our God took on our flesh and became incarnate, he was rendered powerless, and we sing: “The enemy’s weapons have been utterly depleted” (Ps. 9:7), because the Lord who defeated him has given us the power to tread upon his head. Bolstered by faith, let us regard him as no more than a powerless sparrow, or some insignificant creeping creature, trampled underfoot.

150. By defining who we are, why we are here, where we are, and where we will go, it depicts the judgment of the Last Judgment and the fate of those on the right and those on the left, and draws an edifying lesson

150. By determining who we are, why we exist, where we are, and where we are headed, it depicts the judgment of the Last Day and the fate of those on the right and those on the left, and draws an edifying lesson. [2, 83] I remind you: let us ponder, reason, and reflect—who are we, why do we exist, where are we, and where are we headed? – We are God’s creation, the work of His hands, created in His image and likeness, having authority over all that exists under heaven; for as it is written, He “has put all things under our feet”

(Ps. 8:7). We are second only to the angels, just as they are first by nature. – Why do we exist? – For no other reason than to be for the glory of His power, like the angels, through the faithful fulfillment of all His commandments—since we are “a little lower than the angels” (Ps. 8:6), and will be even less so when we cast off corruption and put on incorruption. – Where are we? In a place of exile, because of our forefather’s recklessness, disobedience, and love of pleasure, which has passed down to us, his descendants: for which we ought to weep and wail, grieve and lament, reflecting on from what glorious dwelling we have been cast out, from what angelic abode, from what blissful, heavenly consolation. “Where shall we go?”—To the world beyond, to the thrice-blessed abode of the angels, to the land of light, to the life that never ends; for at the dreadful Last Judgment, the Judge of all and God, seated on the throne of glory, will in the twinkling of an eye judge all things and reward each person according to their deeds: to those who have kept His commandments, He will grant a place at His right hand, unspeakable joy, the enjoyment of eternal blessings, and the Kingdom of Heaven; but to those who have disobeyed Him and, through negligence or lust, have committed evil—fornication, adultery, theft, envy, murder, debauchery, impurity, apostasy, pride, vanity, and every other kind of evil—He will condemn to eternal torment: to the fire of hell, the poisonous worm, the darkening darkness, the bottomless abyss—each according to his own sins. Whoever, in wisdom, having rightly subdued his nature, endures all with courage, and if necessary, even dies for the sake of goodness—that person on that day will shine forth like the sun, will be among the saints, in the company of the angels, in the joy of the martyrs, and in the delight of the prophets and apostles. But woe to him who, for the sake of momentary carnal pleasure, a peace-loving disposition, or fleeting and trivial pleasures, finds himself there in that wretched part of the realm, subject to merciless rejection and irrevocable banishment to endless torments, in unbreakable bonds, where all that is heard is—alas and woe!—that there is no deliverance, no change, no mercy, neither from God, nor from the Angels, nor from the Saints, forever and ever! Let everyone, my children, reflect on this: those who are running well and those who are stumbling, the strong in spirit and the faint-hearted, the first and the second, the lukewarm and the cold, the rich and the poor in virtue, and indeed every person, every tribe, and every tongue. Let us, too, take this to heart, make good resolutions, and walk the path of God with vigor and diligence, rejecting every passion as a plague; let us lift up our hands to God the Savior, declaring our readiness to endure martyrdom daily: shedding of blood, the severing of limbs, the scourging of the flesh, the crushing of bones—and not merely the deprivation of food, or sweet drink, fine clothing, well-made shoes, the honor of a high position, and many other such things, which it is ridiculous even to mention; so that, having lived well here according to the calling of our vocation, in humility and obedience, and having faithfully kept our vows, we may depart from this earthly prison with joy and stand boldly before the face of God, in the blessed hope of receiving the blessings promised to those who live for His glory.

151. Drawing Lessons for Those Engaged in the Invisible Spiritual Battle from the Way Competitors Prepare for Contests in Secular Spectacles

151. From the way athletes prepare for competitions at secular spectacles, we can draw lessons for those engaged in the invisible spiritual battle. [2, 84] Let us observe how competitors prepare for contests at secular spectacles—perhaps we can learn something from their example for our own spiritual struggles. When the time for a public spectacle approaches—and for the most part, long before that—those who are to compete do not idle away their time, but practice in advance what they must do and how they should do it at the spectacle; they rehearse everything that lies ahead, follow a diet appropriate to the task that excludes foods which might hinder their success, and their conversations at this time revolve entirely around the upcoming contests—how to enter the arena and take the first step, where to go next, and who should attack whom. They have so many tasks and concerns—and for what? To win mortal wreaths through victory and receive the prescribed rewards; along with this, and in order to please spectators and friends, while putting the vanquished to shame. If they go through so much labor and discussion beforehand, what kind of feat, do you think, should we and you undertake, what diligence and prudence, and what unceasing concern for this or that? For our enemy, our adversary and opponent, is neither inexperienced, nor ignorant, nor careless; but standing opposite us, it seems he too gives no small thought to what traps to set against us, how to approach, how to attack, how to repel, how to strike, and how to bring the poor monk down? Is not the struggle that lies before us therefore a great one? Should we not exercise great care and diligence? Should we not, raising our hands, cry out in sorrow: “Look down, O Lord, from Your holy dwelling” (Ps. 32:14). “Stretch out Your power,” or “Come, O

Lord, to save us” (Ps. 79:3)? Truly so; and this with humility and a contrite heart, with hope and courage, with sincere faith and proven obedience. The Lord will not forsake the practitioner of virtue if he calls upon Him for help, saying: “My heart trusts in Him, and He will help me; and my flesh shall flourish” (Ps. 27: 7). And when He helps, who can stand against Him? Who is strong enough to overthrow Him? No one. Let there be thousands and multitudes of enemies; such a one will not fear them. In the name of the Lord, he will repel them and scatter them. “Take courage, then.”

152. Using the examples of a farmer, a swimmer, a merchant, and a traveler, he inspires zeal for the acquisition of spiritual blessings

152. The examples of the farmer, the swimmer, the merchant, and the traveler inspire us to strive for spiritual blessings; and, recalling the obstacles posed by the enemy, they give us hope for success through the help of the Lord and Savior, who has arranged and continues to arrange everything for our salvation, provided we prove ourselves worthy of His help. [2, 85] The farmer, the swimmer, the merchant, and the traveler—all labor, toil day and night, grow weary and exhaust themselves, earnestly desiring to reach their goal—and they do reach it. But our cultivation, our sailing, our trading, and our journey are as far removed from those as the east is from the west, or rather, as the heavens are from the earth. Therefore, how much more excellent, zealous, and unceasing must our labors, deeds, and efforts be than those? —For this reason, St. David exclaims in wonder: “Who shall ascend the mountain of the Lord, and who shall stand in His holy place?” (Ps. 23:3). And again: “Who will give me wings like a dove’s? Then I would fly away and rest” (Ps. 54:7). We labor, eat little, sleep little, attend services, and in our cells we pray, read, listen, sing, do needlework, humble ourselves, obey, and endure everything. But why, then, do we not attain what we desire and see no success? — It is due to nothing other than the obstacles to our salvation set by our adversary, the devil. From the beginning of this age until now, he has been rising up against our race to prevent us from entering heaven, from which he was cast down for his pride. Let us not, however, brothers, lose heart or be disheartened by the difficulties of our life. — For we have God as our helper and intercessor, the God who “lifts the poor from the dust and raises the needy from the ash heap” (Ps. 112:7), who “girdeth the weakness of our nature with strength” (Ps. 17:33), and who overcomes our enemy, the tempter. Therefore, let us not lose heart when we see how little we can accomplish on our own. Not even a bridegroom loves his bride, nor do parents care for their children, as much as the Lord of all, God, loves us and cares for us. He cares for our salvation, rejoices in our good conduct, opens the eyes of our mind, reveals to it His radiant beauty and His longed-for splendor, and, guided by the angels, lifts our minds to the contemplation of heaven and all that is in heaven, and protects them from invisible enemies under the shelter of the wings of His divine providence. And what more is there to say? —He is so full of love for us sinners that He was pleased, without leaving the bosom of the Father, to bow the heavens, and in humility to descend to us, and to become man, though He is the Lord of all. Containing all things in His Word, the Most Glorified and Exalted One became an infant, born of a humble Mother, while enriching all things. The culmination of this mystery is that He endured a crucifixion for our sake after terrible sufferings and rose again on the third day, rescuing us from the serpent’s grasp and giving us the power to trample him like a crawling worm. What father has loved his son so much, or a mother her daughter, or a husband his wife, or friends one another, as He has—who endured and suffered so much for us, whom He loves so dearly? Yet His boundless love and kindness toward us cannot be expressed in words or measured by the mind. Having loved us so much and suffered so much for us, how can He not be our helper every day and every hour? Our intercessor and refuge, unless we ourselves turn away from Him, carried away by our own passions? Knowing this, let us take care to remain faithful to the Lord, undertaking every endeavor, courageously enduring all that is sorrowful, and doing all that He has commanded;—and He will make us victorious in the struggle against the enemy and enable us to reach the goal we desire without hindrance.

153. It points out how blessed it is to work for the Lord; and, recalling that the brothers entered the monastery for this very purpose, having left everything behind, it inspires them with the Lord’s words: “Seek, and you will find.”

153. It shows how blessed it is to serve the Lord; and recalling that the brothers entered the monastery for this very purpose, leaving everything behind, it inspires them with the Lord’s words: “Seek, and you will find...”—laboring humbly in the monastic duties, which in appearance seem merely worldly, but in spirit are spiritual. [2, 85] What could be more beautiful and blissful than to serve the living God in piety and righteousness, to purify the soul and body, to guard against every sin, to be drawn by the desire for future blessings, to be constantly transported from the world to the heavenly realm, and to have a soul untrapped by any passion, like a bird flying past all the devil's snares and soaring in the highest heavens. Whoever is like this is always joyful and glad, finds delight and is filled with wonder, beginning here to taste the first fruits of future all-bliss. – For this very reason you left the world and came here; for this very reason you renounced the world and all that is in the world; for this very reason you became strangers and sojourners, estranged from your homeland, your clan, and your kin; for this very reason you became different in appearance and way of life, and bid farewell to all worldly cares and concerns: therefore, having joyfully embraced this endeavor, seek and you will find, strive and you will attain what your soul desires. For “whoever seeks finds, and to those who knock, the door will be opened” (Matt. 7:8), says the Lord. Seek, without worrying about anything else or being occupied with anything else. Although you are engaged in your usual duties of obedience, these are not worldly or mundane occupations for you, because you do not engage in them out of passion, of your own will, or to please the flesh, but for the sake of holy spiritual fellowship, out of obedience and commandment, and above all, to please God. God accepts this labor of yours as a sacrifice and a burnt offering. And blessed are you, brothers, for having chosen this angelic way of life, which leads to the heavenly Jerusalem, whose co-creator and Builder is God. Walk well, then, strengthened by grace and adorned with virtues: contrition, obedience, humility, readiness for every task, patience, vigilance, sobriety, and prayer.

154. Recalling how heavy the burden of his office as abbot weighs upon him, especially at the thought of being accountable for each one, he asks for help. How? By success in the monastic life

154. 1) Recalling how heavy the burden of his office as abbot weighs upon him, especially when he thinks of being accountable for each one, he asks for help. In what way? Through success in the monastic life. – 2) He then defines what should be considered success. – 3) Finally, he invites them to consider whether they are succeeding, pointing out the signs of those who are succeeding and those who are not. [2, 87]

1. How, do you think, does my humble soul regard my role as your superior? Perhaps it seems to you that I take pride in my modest teachings to you, and that by this alone I hope to fully fulfill my duty as your superior. Not at all. But I will tell you the truth: I spend the days of my poor life in agonizing and tormenting anxiety, not finding peace in merely telling you about a virtuous life, but desiring to see the very essence of life in you. Therefore, when I am among you, I observe your behavior every day—how you treat one another, how you conduct yourselves, how you ask questions and give answers—and from all this, as well as from the look in your eyes and the expression on your faces, I discern the state of each person's soul: in those in whom I find it to be upright, I rejoice and take comfort, and am inspired by hope; but in those in whom I find the opposite, I grieve, mourn, and sigh, being certain that passion has taken hold here. And I cannot do otherwise. For must I not give an account of each one of you? – At the very thought of this, who can remain indifferent? Who will not weep, be terrified, and tremble? – It is a great and fearful thing for a person to stand before God, the impartial Judge, and give an account of the entire flock—whether it has been kept in purity and blamelessness, and whether it has walked faithfully in all of God's commandments, in all that is proper, both toward God and toward one's neighbor? – I have told you this so that, having come to know the anguish of my soul, you might have compassion on me and help me. How, then? – By striving ever more earnestly to excel in a life equal to that of the angels.

2. We must not be content merely with distinguishing ourselves from the laity, but must perfectly follow in the footsteps of the fathers in our lives; nor must we be content merely with surpassing some of our peers, but must strive to be on par with the most perfect. For “many are called, but few are chosen” (Matt. 22:14). Nor should we measure our progress by the length of time, thinking, “We have been monastics for so many years now”; but rather, we must consider whether the number and degree of our virtues correspond to the length of time. – Nor should we focus on the fact that yet another day has passed, but rather on whether, on this day as well, any good deed has been stored in the heavenly treasury for the sustenance of the soul in the life to come, and whether even a little has been added to the purification of the soul and to the overcoming of the passions that torment us. Thus, a monk by name comes to be a monk in deed, freeing himself from the darkness of passions and the bonds of evil habits, and thereby allowing his soul and mind to freely strive toward the Lord, to soar in love toward Him alone, and to long for communion with Him alone.

3. Let each of you examine yourselves to see whether you possess this sought-after quality, or whether you are still a slave to passions, a prisoner of sins, a captive of thoughts, —which is why he is not in harmony in his words, deeds, and thoughts, revealing this through disobedience, pride, grumbling, quarrelsomeness, self-justification, self-will, and the greatest of evils, unbelief. But while this is the case with such a person, in one who strives toward the desired goal and succeeds in the struggle against passions, every good quality and every perfect gift is manifested: meekness, peace, love, compassion, patience, humility, lack of envy, gratitude, endurance, prayer, psalm-singing, vigil, contrition, tears, and every other praiseworthy deed and disposition; he does not seek preeminence but flees from it—he does not desire work that pleases him, but rather that which his father assigns, setting aside his own will, whether the task be in the kitchen, the garden, the field, or anything similar, —he does not quarrel over clothing, shoes, food, or drink, but patiently endures all things, even if clothed in rags, shivering, and starving, fixing his gaze on one thing alone—the attainment of that rest in the hereafter.

155. Just as a valiant citizen rejoices when summoned by the king to receive a reward, so too does our brother Chariton rejoice, having been called from here by the Lord, now partaking of indescribable heavenly blessings for the feats and monastic labors he has endured

155. 1) Just as a valiant citizen rejoices when summoned by the king to receive a reward, so too does our brother Chariton rejoice, having been called from here by the Lord, now partaking of the indescribable heavenly blessings for the feats and monastic labors he endured. – 2) Reflecting on this, who among us would not be inspired to do the same, paying no heed to the devil, who usually, through his suggestions, either leads us away from good deeds or tarnishes the good we do with impure thoughts and feelings, no matter what form of obedience we are practicing. – 3) Let us not forget, moreover, that virtue is rewarded even in this life—sometimes visibly, and always invisibly—as a foretaste and anticipation of future glory and bliss. [2, 88]

4. Just as in everyday life, a person accused of grave crimes and sentenced to death is overcome with fear and trembling when told, “The time has come; come out”—so too, for the sinner, the news of the transition from this life to the next is usually frightening and awe-inspiring. On the contrary, just as one who awaits rewards and crowns from the king for his valiant deeds rejoices with joy when he hears the voice summoning him to receive them, so too does the righteous person rejoice when the Angel of Death announces to him his passing from this life, confident that he is departing to receive his blessed rewards. – This is what we dare to say now about our brother Chariton: that, true to his name, he departed from his body with joy and gladness and went to his place of rest. – This, brothers, is how one should strive; this is how one should fruitfully subdue one’s nature; how beneficial it is to endure the ascetic life with patience; how blessed it is to wage the struggle in submission until one’s last breath. For in just a few years—or rather, in almost a single day (for what else is this earthly life compared to the infinite?)—this has brought our brother untold riches, unimaginable glory, incomparable joy, and an endless kingdom. And now he rejoices and celebrates, feeling no sorrow whatsoever for the labors he undertook here for the sake of such a blessing, but, having taken his place among the choirs of the holy ones, in the tabernacles of the righteous, in the courts of the martyrs, in the heavenly Jerusalem, the mother of all the saints, he contemplates the inexpressible and unspeakable blessings: that unceasing light, immortal life, and inexpressible bliss.

5. Reflecting on this, how can we, who are still in the race, fail to be inspired, not be inspired by bold hope, not be zealous, not have our hearts set ablaze, not let our minds soar, not turn our disposition from the world to the heavenly, and not vow to do everything and endure everything out of love for the Lord? Not merely fasting and vigil, not merely sleeping on the bare ground, not merely cold and heat, not merely toil and weariness, not merely humiliation and dishonor; but, if necessary, the shedding of blood, the severing of limbs, the flaying of the flesh, the crushing of bones—anything to attain what we seek. – Indeed, brothers, it is good to think this way, to be so wisely disposed to act. The devil is a predator; he is always lurking nearby, seeking to steal the beautiful thoughts from our minds and draw them into vain, worldly thoughts. But let us not allow him to deceive us; on the contrary, keeping in mind God’s divine promises—which are daily sought, praised in hymns, and depicted in prayers—let us spend day after day, week after week, month after month, year after year, striving in every way to present our deeds to God as pure, all peaceful, all loving, untainted by pride, vanity, or the desire to please others. Whether we plow, dig, cook, do carpentry, guard, work in the cellar, tend the garden, transcribe, or engage in any kind of handicraft—whether sewing, weaving baskets, or doing anything else—let us strive to do so in such a way that our work may be deemed perfect by God Himself and placed in the heavenly treasury to receive an eternal reward. But to spoil our deeds with grumbling, insolence, vanity, confusion, and contradiction is an unwise and even inhuman act—that is, unbecoming of a true human being. For a true man is a great being, like the ever-memorable Job; he “is upright and blameless, and shuns every evil thing” (Job 1:8).

6. Let everyone also take note of how a diligent and virtuous person is loved by all, honored and praised by everyone—not only among his brothers but also among those outside who hear of him. For virtue, even when it remains hidden and is practiced by an obscure person, is such by its very nature that it will inevitably be revealed, and word of it will spread and be proclaimed everywhere, according to the word of the Lord, who says: “A city set on a hill cannot be hidden” (Matt. 5:14). If we persevere a little in good deeds and strive a little, the time of rest will come—not only at the hour of death, but even before that, when dispassion is established within us. For the soul that has loved the Lord with all its heart and put its desires to death through obedience, according to the words of the Holy Fathers, has attained rest and already begins to taste the future bliss.

156. A new abbot was elected at the Dalmatian monastery, for no other reason than humility

156. A new abbot was elected at the Dalmatian monastery, for no other reason than humility alone. Such is the value of humility; it encompasses and preserves every good; and without seeking fame, it becomes known and glorified of its own accord. [2, 89] I think it would be good for me to speak to you now about yesterday’s event. By the command of our Lord, I was to go to the Dalmatian monastery for the election of a new abbot for it. There I was to ask whom the brothers of the monastery and the abbots gathered there desired. And they all unanimously, with one voice, pointed to Abba Hilarion. Why was this? What distinguished him? Not because he was learned, not because he was eloquent, not because he was known for his way of life; but solely because he was humble and wise, God-loving, and did not seek human glory, concealing his virtues through obedience. Although there was another who was more knowledgeable than he and older in years, since he was weaker in the aforementioned virtues, Abba Hilarion was deemed more pleasing to God and capable of wisely guiding the brothers. “Do you see, brothers, how precious the gift of humility is?” It is an all-encompassing virtue that cuts off all inner pride, drives away arrogance, tramples on the love of glory, strikes down self-will, and puts to death the love of pleasure—and in place of all this, it brings meekness, peace, love, compassion, patience, and wisdom; —and needless to say, it is the source of virtues, flowing with every good, or rather, a paradise planted by God, yielding the abundant fruit of immortality. But “a city set on a hill cannot be hidden” (Matt. 5:14), according to the Lord’s word: so too, one who has acquired this virtue cannot remain hidden forever, even if in the ordinary course of things he were the last, even if he were hidden underground, even if some, out of envy, slandered him: for here he is recognized all the more, like a light shining on a mountain and drawing the eyes of all who see to itself. This is precisely what happened with the current chosen one, for many, even from outside the brotherhood, expressed their approval of his election.

157. Lent has come; and it has brought order to both the external and the internal

157. 1) Lent has come; and it has brought order to both the external and the internal. Seeing this, I cannot help but say to you: make this way of life a constant habit; for otherwise, there is no way to be saved. – 2) The enemy is constantly striving to destroy us; and we must constantly resist him, for the Lord has granted us the strength to do so. – 3) The best way to overcome the enemy is to imitate the Lord in what He invites us to do: “I am gentle and humble in heart.” His entire earthly life is a testament to His humility for our sake. [2, 90]

7. How beautiful is self-restraint, and the order it manifests in acting according to the divine commandments. We have entered these holy days of Great Lent as if into a quiet harbor, having escaped the turmoil of the preceding days, and now we live in peace, in silence, in serenity; we conduct ourselves with care in the temple, sing the Psalms with devotion, remain sober in prayer, and at the table observe neither a variety of dishes nor their excess; we do all else for the salvation of our souls: no worldly people now enter our midst, nor do we go out to them. – Here I cannot resist the desire that you, drawing upon your sound understanding of what is good, make this way of life a permanent habit, so that even after this you may turn away from all paths leading to sin, and not live in such a way that you maintain a good life for five or ten days, and then, having grown weary of what is good, find yourselves once again destroying what you had previously built up, as the Apostle says (Gal. 2:18). – May it not be so with you, brothers; let us not be so easily swayed by the tempter’s slander; but let us strive to remain in the virtues we have acquired, making ever greater efforts at good deeds in our righteous conduct, knowing that it is not enough to live righteously for a short time to be saved, but that we must steadfastly hold fast to the work of salvation throughout our entire lives.

8. For such is the tempter, who neither by day nor by night leaves us free from his attacks and the setting of treacherous ambushes to our ruin; he spreads many nets everywhere and sends countless arrows at our soul: the tickling of pleasure, the burning of lust, the turmoil and contrary winds of thoughts and desires—he stirs up the bed of our mind as if on some stormy sea, so that everyone is compelled to confess: “If the Lord had not helped me, my soul would soon have gone down to hell” (Ps. 93:17); then he subsides for a time, conceals the torment of lust, and lets in the poison of vanity; or, having weakened our zeal on one hand, strikes us with the arrow of envy on the other; at other times, he stirs up dust from all sides against our humility: for he has an insatiable desire to destroy us. He rages against our Lord God and goes wild when he sees us ascending to the heavenly heights, from which he himself fell because of his pride. — What great care and perseverance are therefore required, what diligence and what strenuous effort, to defeat such a mighty serpent? — “But take heart,” says the Lord, “for I have overcome the world” (John 16: 33); and after His victory, we, by virtue of the holy Incarnation, have received power over the enemy, as the Lord again proclaims: “I give you authority to trample on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy” (Luke 10:19): so that we may trample underfoot all his attacks against us, all the manifold temptations of sin.

9. How is this possible? By imitating the One who conquered him. We become His imitators when we clothe ourselves in humility and meekness, as He Himself says: “Learn from Me, for I am meek and humble of heart” (Matt. 11:29). If He—the King and Lord of all, by nature the one who is most glorified and all-good—took on humility, “being obedient to God the Father even unto death, even death on a cross” (Phil. 2:8), what then can we say? Or to what extent, by humbling ourselves, will we become like Him, we who are by nature poor and insignificant? If He, having set aside His heavenly glory, came down to earth, to what extent must we set aside all that is ours, so that there might be at least some semblance of imitation of Him? If He became an infant and was nourished with milk, and fulfilled all that was lawful, obeying His parents as it is written, how much must we act like infants in regard to malice, and obey our abbots, so that we might appear, even in the slightest way, to be like Him? If He hungered and thirsted, walked on foot, and grew weary, how much of the same must we endure so that it might seem we are experiencing something equal to Him? And finally, if He endured insults and scorn, mockery and abuse, betrayal and standing trial, flogging and crucifixion, blasphemy and the piercing of His side, what and how much of the same must we endure to say that we are imitating Him? We must always, brothers, keep this in mind, and as we look to Him, humble ourselves immeasurably; and if we encounter something in which we can imitate Him, let us accept it gratefully; if we do not encounter it, let us seek it out—namely, hunger, thirst, mockery, insults, humiliation, hardship, poverty in clothing, footwear, and everything else—so that in this way, little by little, as we press forward and ascend, building ourselves up and edifying one another, rising higher and higher, we may “reach the measure of the full stature of Christ.”

158. Praising the monks, saying that by renouncing the world, they had turned away from pleasures and comforts such as those of the Fleshfast and were called to serve God in piety and righteousness, in which lies true joy and an unceasing feast

158. 1) He commended the monks, saying that by renouncing the world, they had turned away from pleasures and comforts akin to those of the Fleshfast and were called to serve God in piety and righteousness, in which lies true joy and an unceasing feast. — 2) He urges them not to return in thought or desire to those Egyptian cauldrons, assuring them that our lot is the most blessed of all. — 3) In which there is nothing more to desire, except for this one thing: that God may grant us the grace to bear all the sorrows and hardships of our life with equanimity, [2, 91]

10. Now is the time of the Flesh-Fasting, a time for worldly feasting and drinking, revelry, games, and all manner of merriment. What then? Should we reproach ourselves for having none of these things? No; but let us give thanks to the Lord for having delivered us from such a life, as from mire and an abyss, and brought us into our present holy calling, —to serve Him in piety and righteousness—and let us laugh at those, or rather weep for them, who, carried away by these trivial pleasures, deprive themselves of the ineffable joys of heaven. — “Come,” then, brothers, “let us rejoice in the Lord; let us shout for joy to God, our Savior: let us meet His face in confession, and let us shout to Him in psalms” (Ps. 94:1–2). Behold, a good feast, behold, praiseworthy joy, behold, a joyful celebration! And we may celebrate and rejoice in this way in the house of God—not just once or twice, but always. Such joy is the forerunner and harbinger of the most blessed destiny that awaits us there. “As for me,” says the divine David, “I will appear before You in righteousness; I will be satisfied when I behold Your glory” (Ps. 16: 15).

11. Let us not, I beg you, turn our hearts back—as if to some Egypt—to the customs of communal life, nor recall the meats and pots of that place; but let us turn our gaze upon ourselves, upon the beautiful life we are living and fulfilling: for here, above all, “the Lord has commanded blessing and life” (Ps. 132: 3), true joy, unfailing hope, and saving celebration. And if the question is one of success, then we are most successful; if the question is one of lot, then we have chosen the better part; if the question is one of bliss, then we have attained it. Having fled from the world and from everything in the world, having rejected all shameful and vain pleasures, having renounced marriage, childbearing, and worldly possessions, we have embraced virginity, poverty, and the renunciation of our own will, in which we strive, day by day crucifying our flesh and crucifying ourselves to the world and all that is in the world. Therefore, we can rightly apply to ourselves the words of the Apostle: “Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5:24).

12. Who, then, is now more blessed than we? Or what else should we seek in life that would be more pleasant and more comforting than this? Nothing, except this one thing: that for all the remaining days of our sojourn here, we may patiently and courageously endure all that is difficult and unpleasant, and, having preserved ourselves from falling when faced with visible and invisible temptations, may we confidently attain the promises set aside for us. For this reason, take courage, be strengthened, and be steadfast, and do everything in a proper and orderly manner, understanding the nature and extent of the mystery of our monastic life, the kind of life it demands, and how our ever-memorable holy fathers lived it—follow their examples, and model and transform yourselves after them, so that you may rightly be called their sons and become partakers of their future joy.

159. Watch over yourselves; for the enemy may attack suddenly and destroy you

159. 1) Be vigilant over yourselves; for the enemy may attack suddenly and destroy you. – 2) And some of you are living in a dissolute manner. – 3) Let this not happen in the future. Teachers, instill this... so that you may not turn out to be corrupters instead of guides. [2, 92]

13. Let each one look and observe whether you stand firm and unshakable on the rock of faith, fulfilling your vow, on the martyr’s path of communal life, not veering to the right or to the left, but walking the royal path, keeping your soul alert so as not to stumble with your foot over the stone of stumbling, and doing nothing out of self-indulgence or partiality. I see you, but not always and not everywhere: for this is the prerogative of the one true God alone. And I do not know—perhaps some of you, acting secretly of your own will, or rather out of passion, have plunged into the abyss of sin, to the ruin of your soul. Fear and dread this, and while you sail with a favorable wind, remember—as the saying goes—the shipwreck. For in a single moment it may happen—a wind, a storm, a hurricane, a disaster, ruin, death. At times, peace and stability seem to reign, but suddenly—alarm, strife, war, the slaughter not of the body but of the soul, which is most bitter. The Evil One lies low for a time to lull us into carelessness, and then, striking unexpectedly, to pervert our thoughts and destroy us. We have no place for carelessness, no time for rest. Many who had reached the very harbor of salvation were cast to the depths by the crafty enemy. Some who had ascended to the very vault of heaven, because of a slight lapse in vigilance, he brought down to the earth of sin. He has plundered many treasures of virtue, stolen many spiritual feats, and left those who accomplished them destitute. Knowing this, stay alert and do not let the eyes of your mind slumber.

14. But I hear that some of you, out of presumption, behave carelessly: you gaze shamelessly at one another, engage in idle talk, and laugh; while others clasp hands together, and touch lips to lips and cheeks to cheeks. This is a cause for weeping. “Can anyone kindle a fire in their bosom without their clothes being burned? Or can anyone walk on burning coals without their feet being burned?” (Prov. 6:27). Likewise, those who do such things will not escape a fall. It is also evil that some adorn their faces, strut about, paint their eyelids and eyebrows, and dress like harlots; they wear embroidered sashes, carefully embellish their clothing, adopt fashionable gestures in their gait, and speak in a affected manner.

15. To all such people I say: do not do this in the future; otherwise, “He will bind their jaws with bit and bridle” (Ps. 31: 9): for God has set us not to destroy, but to build up these people. Therefore, observe the laws. Teachers, instill what is proper in those you teach and correct them. I do not say this because I suspect any of you of being a poisoner instead of a healer, a darkener instead of an enlightener, one who leads astray from the right path instead of a guide, or a destroyer instead of a savior. For teachers stand before their students as a model of piety, an example of salvation, and a picture of every good deed. That is why students are entrusted to them—so that they may learn from the good example of their teachers. But if the opposite occurs, then let such people be rebuked and removed, lest they pass on their corruption to the healthy. “I would rather not speak of all this, but necessity compels me.” “I wish for one thing: that we all walk in righteousness, so that God may rejoice in our good life.”

160. Rejoicing in the brothers’ orderliness and in the fact that everything proceeds according to the rule and everyone is satisfied with the monastery’s provisions,” he adds, “but this is not the most important thing; the main thing is to live in such a way that after death we may enter into God’s rest: toward which we must direct everything

160. Rejoicing in the brothers’ orderliness and in the fact that everything proceeds according to the rule and everyone is satisfied with the monastery’s provisions, he adds: but this is not the most important thing; the main thing is to live in such a way that after death one may enter into the rest of God—and everything must be directed toward this end. [2, 93] Just as a farmer, seeing his field turning green—which he has cultivated and sown through his own labor—rejoices and is glad: so too do I, though not as regarding the fruit of my own labors, rejoice and take delight in your spiritual fruitfulness, because I find it right to confess the truth, seeing that, by God’s grace, you are prospering more and more and becoming better. You yourselves can bear witness to this. Do you not see what order, peace, and tranquility we have? Are you not all united as one soul and one heart, by firm faith and an unbreakable bond? Do you not all strive for an ever fuller fulfillment of Christ’s life-giving commandments? There are no private cliques among you that divide and fragment the united brotherhood to please the enemy, the devil; there is no self-indulgence or self-will among you, so that each might live and act as he pleases; on the contrary, a life in harmony with God reigns supreme; there is no one among you who wanders aimlessly here and there, causing ruin and disruption to the entire body of the brotherhood; but, by God’s grace, everything in your community proceeds according to the rule—in eating and drinking, in waking and sleeping, in work and rest, in coming and going, in conversation and silence, in reading and psalm-singing, in prayer and stillness, in clothing and footwear. Of course, not everything is distributed equally to everyone, for not all are equal in age, upbringing, circumstances, abilities, virtues, or health; but each is given due attention and provided with what is necessary: for you are all members of one body, though not all share in the same honor (1 Cor. 12: 23–24). But all this is not the most important thing; the main thing we seek is that, having done our work well, we may, through death, enter into God’s rest after the toils and labors of this life and taste the inexpressible joy and the indescribable eternal blessings. With this in hope, let us strive ever more to excel, to be mindful of ourselves, to be sober, to be watchful, to walk properly in these days, to rejoice in hope, to endure afflictions, compel ourselves to every good deed, subject the flesh to the spirit, count dishonor for Christ’s sake as honor, regard being last as a privilege, and rejoice in humiliation for the Lord’s sake; so that, having completed this path, we may dwell with the martyrs and be deemed worthy to rejoice with the saints for all eternity.

161. We sing: “I will take the cup of salvation.” This cup is the acceptance of martyrdom, which for us consists in a painful struggle against the passions

161. We sing: “I will take the cup of salvation.” This cup is the acceptance of martyrdom, which for us consists in a painful struggle against the passions. We stand on this path. – Fight the good fight, then, so that you may also be deemed worthy of such crowns. [2, 94] “What shall we render to the Lord for all that He has given us?” What else but a psalm of David, sung with true resolve and in accordance with what is sung therein: “We will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord” (Ps. 115:3–4). This cup is the acceptance of martyrdom. But our martyrdom does not lie in the shedding of blood, but in an inner, conscientious struggle, when, for example, we do not bow our knees before Baal—that is, we do not yield to carnal lust—and we overcome all temptations, visible and invisible, that are brought upon us: the turmoil of thoughts, the burning of lusts and desires, the sorrow of deprivations, misfortunes, and humiliations. Behold the good martyrs! Behold the soldiers of Christ! Behold those who are in need and the inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven! Rejoice, be of good cheer, be courageous, run the race well, grow from strength to strength, rise to the very heights of virtue, soar in the highest contemplations, and do so unceasingly until the end of your life comes and carries you to the joys and gladness prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Blessed and most blessed is the one who, hearing this attentively and putting it into practice, kindling fire upon fire in his heart, ignites within himself the flame of divine love that ascends to heaven. But woe to the one who shuts his ears, loving vanity and seeking fleeting carnal pleasures. However, let no one “seek only his own”—“these”—but also “look out for his neighbor,” considering him as his own: for we are members in relation to one another. By this, everyone pleases the Lord and makes himself better and more perfect.

162. After describing the appearance of the departed and mentioning what is seen in the tomb, and presenting a brief account of the departed’s virtuous life, the author draws a lesson on preserving the purity of body and soul, so as to become a bride worthy of Christ

162. 1) After describing the appearance of the deceased and mentioning what is seen in the tomb; and 2) providing a brief account of the deceased’s virtuous life—3) the author draws a lesson on preserving the purity of body and soul in order to become a bride worthy of Christ. [2, 95]

1. The remembrance of death always has a salvific effect, and all the more so when we stand before the face of a departed brother, as in the present case. Here again we behold a wondrous mystery! A moment ago, he was with us, but now his spirit is no longer with us; he who spoke to us with his own lips has fallen into utter silence, even as the sound of his voice still echoes in our ears. What an astonishing sight this is! We see him and yet do not see him: his body is visible here, but his spirit has departed from us. He lies motionless and lifeless, without breath, sight, or speech; all his senses are visible—yet in none of them is there any sign of life; he is like a stone, or some other lifeless object. —Let us look upon the resting place of those who have gone before us: what shall we see there, brothers? Behold and learn. Is this not dust and ashes? Are these not decayed bodies? Are these not withered skulls? Are these not bare bones?—And all this is an unpleasant spectacle, a pitiful and repulsive heap. Can one distinguish here one brother from another, the handsome from the ugly, the young from the aged? Not at all: everything has decayed; everything has lost its form. Let anyone who wishes now examine where here is sensual pleasure, where the enjoyment of feasts, where rest in sleep, and all the rest that is done to please the flesh?—where are the handshakes, the embraces, the kisses? —All has departed from here and been taken away by the one who, like a prodigal rich man, sent it ahead to hell to kindle for himself an unquenchable fire.

2. May none of our brothers suffer harm! And especially he who has now departed in a godly manner and passed into eternal life, having lived his life here well, in blameless obedience—young in years but gray-haired in wisdom—small in age, yet great in spirit, whose inner disposition is known to me, and whose outward conduct is known to you as well—for in him there is every kind of goodness and he is worthy of all praise—Raphael—kind and truly noble, having preserved the image of God and, I dare say, worthy to bear the same name as one of the foremost of the angels. – Such is my confidence in this son of mine; have it yourselves as well, for he is worthy of it. – But let us return to the subject at hand.

3. So too will we, in a little while, depart from here: we will die, be prepared for burial, have a funeral service, and be laid to rest. – Since this is so, and there is “no man who lives and does not see death” (Ps. 88: 49), I ask and implore you: let us live piously and blamelessly and conduct ourselves irreproachably and without fault, keeping not only our bodies but also our souls pure: subjugating the former to the spirit, so that it does not run wild or rebel through carnal impulses, and restraining it with the fear of God, so that it may meekly and humbly be content with the measure of food, drink, sleep, and rest prescribed by the rule and by special command; and watching over the latter, so that it does not become entangled with impure thoughts and impulses, but, soaring entirely toward God, contemplates His beauty alone, for He alone is truly beautiful and lovable, while all other beauties are but a phantom and nothing; and also shielding her with prayer and psalm-singing, so that through both she might be presented as pleasing to the gracious Bridegroom, Christ our God. If we conduct our journey in this way, blessed are we: we will not die, but will live, accompanied by a comforting song of farewell: “Blessed is the path you are walking today; for a place of rest has been prepared for you.”

163. Our Battle Against the Spirits of Malice and Their Leader, the Devil

163. 1) Our battle is against the spirits of wickedness, with their leader, the devil. – 2) They ceaselessly devise schemes to destroy us: we, too, must vigilantly guard ourselves and resist them, to the joy of the Lord and His angels. – 3) It is essential to act in this way if we wish to attain dispassion and, through this struggle, earn the martyr's crown. – 4) To succeed in this, we need humility combined with obedience, unceasing prayer, self-examination, all acts of self-denial, and the examination of our thoughts. [2, 96]

4. "For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world" (Eph. 6:12)—and against our wicked adversary, the devil, who, at the very beginning of creation, having crept into Paradise, tempted our forefather to sinfully partake of the forbidden fruit, and thereby caused his expulsion from the sweetness of Paradise to this earth. Ever since then, from generation to generation, he has persecuted the human race, teaching it every kind of evil. Even now he slanders us in every way, slithers about hissing, and fawns upon us, wagging his tail, so that he may more easily deceive us; he enters and exits stealthily, and snares souls that are not steadfast and do not heed him. That is why we need great sobriety, great vigilance, great prudence, and great care against him, so that he may not attack us or bring us down.

5. Knowing his schemes and wiles, let us arm ourselves in every way and stand up to fight and repel him, without slacking off or showing any leniency—neither toward ourselves nor toward him—just as he does not retreat or show any leniency, seeking our destruction. Even if he attacks us many times a day and is defeated, he remains undeterred, as if he had not yet begun the struggle, and attacks again with even greater force, bringing other spirits of malice with him. Likewise, we must not retreat or let up in the face of such daily and hourly attacks against us. Even if we have already shown great attention and intense effort—and with success—let us not change this; but let us always maintain the same zeal, fervor, and resistance against him, so that, seeing our strong opposition to the enemy, God may rejoice and be glad over us, as well as His holy angels, who assist us according to His inspiration and command.

6. For we have not yet attained the degree of dispassion—and with it, freedom from strife—necessary for our mind to remain still within itself, untroubled by inner conflict. This has been and continues to be attained by tireless zealots through much toil, sweat, and ascetic effort. As for us, who are still held back by passion, we must persistently remain in constant struggle and toil, without losing heart or giving up, even in the face of our own fickleness and the enemy's shifting tactics—which force us, day by day and hour by hour, to begin anew. Such is the task of those who strive sincerely: what, then, is the crown for this?—It is holy to attain the heights of dispassion; but it is also blessed not to be defeated in battle, and always to stand firm, gradually advancing toward that height and perfecting oneself. Such a one will also receive the martyr's crown, just as a warrior, upon returning from the battlefield, who shows the king his wounds and sores, is not despised or condemned, but on the contrary receives praise, gifts, and honors.

7. Let us therefore strive as soldiers of Christ, and let us regard our time as nothing other than a time of battle against our enemies, when all that can be heard is the whizzing of arrows and the clanging of swords; for "many are those who fight against us from on high" (Ps. 55: 3), as it is written—who attack us all day long and wage war, set snares, dig pits, lay ambushes, and devise all manner of other wiles. Who, then, will escape them, who will hide from them, who will not stumble and fall into their snares? Who else but one who possesses humility combined with obedience, diligent prayer, zeal for the work, consistent submission, uncomplaining diligence, constant vigilance in repelling shameful thoughts and embracing wholesome contemplations, watchfulness, psalm-singing, prostrations—and above all these, or together with all these, the confession of one's innermost thoughts, the avoidance of audacity, and moderation in speech? Through all these and similar things, our inner man is fortified as in a stronghold, and the enemy, having no power to act against him, withdraws.

164. A Description of the Outward Appearance of a Man of God, a True Monk

164. A Description of the outward appearance of a man of God, a true monk. [2, 97] Let us pay attention to ourselves, brothers, and let us not squander our days and our time in vain. Behold, this day has already passed, and we shall never see it again; but the deeds we have done during it are recorded. If they are good, well for us; but if not, alas! Let us guard our senses from being stolen away, keeping our heads bowed most of the time: let our eyes be attentive, undistracted, and not drawn this way and that; for what is seen by the eye is also seen by the soul, because the outer man reflects that to it; let the face be neither gloomy nor distracted, but dignified and gentle, and for the most part sorrowful and bathed in tears of contrition; let the gait be humble, unpretentious, and unproud, without raised shoulders, furrowed brows, loud footsteps, or the shaking of the entire body; her speech, too, should be pleasant, neither too loud nor too soft, with dignity in her eyes and other features, without flaring nostrils, waving hands, or turning her face. For the man of God is well-ordered in all things, being an instrument of the Spirit who dwells within him, guiding him in speech, in appearance, in eating, and in drinking. And we ought to conduct ourselves with dignity and propriety in all things: in our clothing and footwear, bearing in mind that the Lord our God is always with us, in all circumstances, and in all our deeds.

165. Quoting the Apostle's words, "Now is the acceptable time," he explains that by this the Apostle stirs up our zeal to work out our salvation

165. 1) Citing the Apostle's words, "Now is the acceptable time," he explains that by this the Apostle stirs up our zeal to work out our salvation. – 2) Then he adds: "You are doing just that; well done." [2, 98]

8. What does St. Paul teach us and what does he inspire in us when he says: "Now is the acceptable time; now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2)? "Let us cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light" (Rom. 13:12). – It is he, as a good father and teacher, who rouses us from sloth and drives away the drowsiness of the soul from the eyes of our minds, guiding our steps well according to God and leading them onto the path of virtue. Let us heed his divine teaching, rise up with vigor, come to our senses, and press on with ever greater zeal, for the day of each of our lives is already drawing to a close. Let us strive to prepare ourselves, so that we may be blessed and live for all eternity, enjoying unspeakable joy. For if the end of our life finds us unprepared and un ly settled in our souls—alas! alas! truly. And who will rescue us from the hands of the soul-destroying serpent?—or in what shall we find relief when we are tormented for the negligence with which we have led our earthly life in wickedness? Why—let those who forsake us forsake us, and let those who act lawlessly continue to do so—I speak of those who have strayed from us. Or better yet, let us pray for them and strive to call them back: for God does not desire the death of the sinner, but that he turn from his ways and live (Ezek. 33: 11).

9. But you, who by the grace of Christ remain steadfast in obedience and faithfully keep your vows before God and man, rejoice and be glad: for a great reward is stored up for you in heaven, if you remain vigilant to the end and faithfully fulfill all that has been commanded you concerning Christ Jesus, our Lord, as His soldiers, whom He has enlisted: for you have enlisted in His service and serve Him day and night, remembering His word: "He who does not say to Me, 'Lord, Lord,' but who does the will of My Heavenly Father—he is Mine"—and the Apostle's exhortation: "Do you wish not to fear the authorities? Do what is good, and you will have praise from Him" (Rom. 13: 3).

166. Be steadfast in life and endure all things; for when you are deemed worthy of that eternal bliss, you will still regret not having endured more

166. 1) Be steadfast in life and endure all things: for when you are deemed worthy of that eternal bliss, you will still regret not having endured more. – 2) Remember and keep in mind the day of judgment and retribution; – and you will never fall into idleness or grumbling. – 3) Whoever behaves otherwise is enslaved by passions and is like a beast; but whoever is like this is an angel. [2, 99]

10. It is not necessary to speak to you now as the ancient Prophets did: "You will hear with your ears but not understand; you will look with your eyes but not see"—for the hearts of these people have grown dull, their ears are hard of hearing, and they have closed their eyes (Isa. 6: 9, 10). For you are sobering yourselves and keeping watch, gazing with an unveiled face upon the glory of the Lord (2 Cor. 3:18), after having shaken off the sludge of worldly attachment from the eyes of your souls through your obedient, holy way of life, and having come to see things clearly, that is, the vanity of life and the ceaseless turmoil of human affairs in various directions, and have come to understand that there is but one firm, delightful, and supreme good—God—and that we must strive toward Him through a virtuous life. Blessed, therefore, is the Lord and God of our Fathers, who has made us worthy to share in this grace and to lead such a wise life. Let us therefore lift our gaze upward, toward our Head—Christ—contemplating not mere mortal and fleeting things, but heavenly and super-heavenly beauties, and the tasting and consolation of the indescribable and inexpressible blessings there, which no mind has ever conceived, no ear has ever heard, and no heart has ever dreamed of, because of their unfathomable excellence—which, as I can assure you, you too will attain if the Lord grants you the strength to patiently endure the struggle that lies before you to the very end, and you will find rest where there is neither sickness, nor sorrow, nor sighing. Then you will give loud thanks to the Lord who has called you to this holy way of life; as for the sorrows you have endured, not only will there be no memory of them, but on the contrary, you will regret that you did not have the opportunity to endure far greater trials, sorrows, and hardships than you did.

11. And what shall we see on that dreadful day of the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, when He will come openly with countless myriads of angels and archangels and sit upon the throne of the dreadful judgment, gathering from the four corners of the earth all nations and every living creature, unveiling the deeds of darkness and revealing the counsels of the heart, as a result of which some will be led to joy at the right hand of the Lord, while others will depart in shame to the left, and those will be brought into the bright abodes, into the paradise of sweetness, into the Kingdom of Heaven, while these will be cast into the unquenchable fire, to be devoured by worms, to the gnashing of teeth, into pitch-black darkness, into the depths of Tartarus, into unbreakable bonds, and all manner of torments, according to the sins of each. Then they will shine like the sun and begin to rejoice and be glad with all their hearts, and with ceaseless songs glorify the Lord, having realized what a good and noble cause they served for the Lord. — These are the martyrs who shed their blood for His confession, the Apostles, the Prophets, the confessors, the holy ones, and the righteous; following them, those who demonstrated spiritual martyrdom—bishops, priests, monks, and laypeople—all who lived lives of good deeds, endeavors, and feats. But these will begin to wail and weep, alas! —alas!—as they bring this upon themselves, calling down curse after curse upon their own recklessness, bound, beaten, and reviled by the spirits of the damned, and even more so condemning and branding themselves, tormented by despair, seeing no end to the unbearable torments decreed for all eternity, as it was declared in their hearing: “These will go into eternal torment, but the righteous into eternal life” (Matt. 25:46). Taking all this to heart, can we afford to slacken in our labors and toils? Can we lose heart because of the hardships of our present life? Should we not rather be inspired in our hearts and burn with zeal more fiercely than fire—to remain faithful to the rules of our self-sacrificing monastic life to the very end, no matter what the cost?

12. Let us, then, take all this to heart and abide in it, diligently doing whatever it prompts us to do. For whoever is indifferent to this, be assured that he is ensnared by passions, slumbers in carelessness, is hard-hearted, indulges in sensual pleasures, is envious, frivolous, and lazy, buried, like a bear in its paws, seeking only to eat and drink; roars like a lion when its evil desires are not satisfied; leaps like a leopard from one pleasure to another; schemes like a fox to attain what its heart desires; rages like a camel, in taking revenge on his neighbor for some accidental grievance, neighs like a horse, committing adultery with human and animal bodies, and acts shamelessly like a wolf, in his audacity to destroy his own soul and that of his brothers. And what is there to say about the various passions by which some not only resemble beasts but far surpass them in their bestial nature? – But he who stands on the side of good thoughts, as bright as an angel, as swift as a cherub, as many-eyed as a seraphim—so that, taking advantage of any opportunity, the soul-destroying dragon might not pounce upon him—is as courageous as a warrior, wielding the fiery sword of piercing thought against sin, and scorching demons with the heat of good thoughts; like an ever-flowing spring, he pours forth pure streams of tears of contrition; like a temple of God, he is built of the golden stones of virtue; like a meek lamb, following the example of his Lord, he will not argue or cry out, but, even if death lies ahead, he goes on, obeying his father and brothers. But here life and death are set before you; let each one choose for himself what he will.

167. Our Struggle Is Against Evil Spirits

167. 1) Our battle is against evil spirits. Why must we be on guard, having put on the full armor of the virtues mentioned by the Apostle, which have the power to repel and defeat their enemies? – 2) This battle is mental and is waged with opposing thoughts and prayer to the Lord. – 3) It arises suddenly and makes our inner state as changeable as the state of the air; but this is not a cause for fear for those who are mindful of themselves and adorn themselves with virtues, trusting in God. [2, 100]

13. Our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities and powers, and against the rulers of the darkness of this age, according to the Apostle (Eph. 6:12). Therefore, we must maintain sobriety, vigilance, careful diligence, intense effort, and protect ourselves with spiritual weapons—namely: unshakable faith as a helmet, sincere obedience and genuine humility as a shield, and every other virtue, all of which, when applied appropriately, can serve as weapons against our deceivers and have the power to repel our invisible adversaries.

14. This great and terrible battle, as you know, is always in progress, never ceasing even during prayer and Holy Communion; it stirs up and sometimes raises such thoughts that it is not even fitting to speak of them. But a humble soul, wounded by such thoughts, repels them with hatred, countering them with holy thoughts and at the same time turning in prayer to the Lord. Help from the Lord comes immediately, and the Sun from on high strikes and drives away the dragon. Why, then, should we not lose heart or yield in the face of such attacks? For when the heart is fearless, the mind remains impervious to the harm of such attacks—not only during Communion, but at all other times as well.

15. Our enemies attack at all times, and when we least expect it; but when we are in a good and peaceful state of mind—whether from the contrition that has come upon us, or from sincere prayer, or from reading, or from some other form of sacred discourse—he attacks, disturbing and unsettling the heart, as if casting us out from a harbor into the waves, or leading us from the light of day into the darkness of night in our thoughts. In this respect, what happens to us is similar to the state of the atmosphere throughout the day: at times it is clear in the sunshine, at times gloomy when clouds roll in, then it clears up again, and then darkens once more, due to various changes in the air. Is it not the same with us? At times we shine brightly, like a clear day, from good thoughts; at other times we are darkened by evil thoughts; and then we return to the realm of light by devoting ourselves to prayer or some other good practice. And this happens more than once a day. But changes in the atmosphere occur differently than they do in us: there, they happen naturally, as ordained by the wisdom of God, the Creator of all things; whereas in us, they are voluntary and, in part, the result of our own will. For although the devil attempts, through temptations, to deprive us of the light of a good state, we have the power to repel him and always have the Sun of Righteousness illuminating our minds, just as the saints did, and just as all who live righteously do. For even now there are many saints who, like precious stones, walk the earth, distinguished not by the working of signs and wonders—for holiness does not consist in this alone—but in the preservation of the true faith and the precise fulfillment of God's commandments, in sincere love for one's brothers, free from envy, in rejoicing in the well-being of one's neighbor, in rising above human glory, and in every other virtue. Thus holiness is manifested in every person. But you, having departed from the world and been crucified to it, must, above all, be distinguished by non-covetousness and chastity, by the renunciation of your own will, and by the good-natured endurance of all the deprivations and sorrows that are inseparable from our way of life. Living in this way, you will be holy and numbered among the saints, and the host of the righteous will welcome you into their midst—and you will rejoice forever in the dwellings of the martyrs.

168. As we walk our path, let us not set our eyes on what is earthly and fleeting; but let us fix our gaze on what is heavenly and eternal: for the former weakens us, while the latter fills us with courage

168. 1) As we walk our path, let us not look upon what is earthly and fleeting; but let us fix our gaze upon what is heavenly and eternal: for the former weakens us, while the latter fills us with courage. – 2) This is how all the Fathers walked; this is how we, too, should walk, adorning ourselves with every kind of goodness, renouncing all that is evil, and purifying ourselves. May our life be worthy of our name. [2, 102]

16. Our life is a journey, and not one that is completed in a single day, two days, or even many days, but one that extends throughout our entire life, until we pass from this world into the age to come. What effort, what strength, what attention, and what diligence are required so that we do not lose courage or give up walking this path, considering its great distance, while at the same time facing an enemy who sets up all manner of obstacles and stumbling blocks for our steps toward God? But never mind; for on the other hand, we have both an intercessor and a guide in our struggles, and a companion on the path—not just anyone, but the Lord and Ruler of all, with the Holy Angels as our guardians and protectors. “He who keeps Israel will neither slumber nor sleep” (Ps. 120:4). Why, then, do we devote ourselves to our path with intense zeal, with ardent desire, not looking down but fixing our eyes upward: for if we look down, we will certainly fall prey to sloth, faintheartedness, and laxity, because our thoughts wander here and there, and our hearts cling to the vanities and pleasures of this life: to fornication, gluttony, greed, spectacles, feasts, adornments, fantasies, and all other things that are fleeting and perishable. But when we fix our gaze on what is heavenly and eternal, then, even though our present is sorrowful and painful, even though there is toil and weariness here, though there be fasting and vigil, the curbing of the will and privations—all of which are inevitable in our ascetic way of life and ascetic obedience—we will not lose heart, we will not be faint-hearted, we will not falter under the weight of our present sorrows, nor will we yield to our rising passions; but with bold wisdom and a spirited resolve, we will press on and press on, walking onward, gazing toward heaven, fixing our eyes on God, striving for the Kingdom of Heaven, for heavenly consolation, for the sweetness of its imperishable glory, for the light that never sets, for the bliss of the angels.

17. Thus all the fathers walked in this way and, by overcoming, triumphed: martyrs, the venerable, the righteous, the pious, the God-loving, monks, laypeople, men, women, youths, and elders, regarding their time here as a kind of training. So too, if we desire their glory and bliss, we must also willingly suffer in this God-pleasing way of life. Let us therefore love this, brothers; let us resolve to endure and bear all things with courageous wisdom and unwavering zeal, keeping our eyes fixed on what is above, as the All-Wise One commands (Eccl. 2:14), and not casting them down to the ground. For those who think about heavenly things and are occupied with them truly have their eyes on their heads, while those who bow down to vanity and are occupied with it lower their eyes to their feet. Would it not be pitiful and monstrous if a person's feet were on top and his head below? But it is far more pitiful and inhuman to suffer this in one's soul. Let us therefore walk as befits the wise, with our eyes on our heads, meditating on God and divine things and acting accordingly. The eyes of the head are faith, hope, and love; from them spring steadfast patience, purity, brotherly love, peace, gentleness, modesty, courage, prosperity, self-control, every good deed, and the blossoming and fruiting of every virtue. But for those who think and act contrary to what has been said, the opposite occurs: unbelief, hopelessness, and hatred; from these spring impatience, faintheartedness, fornication and adultery, insolence, sensuality, gluttony, frivolity, self-adornment, mockery, quarreling, envy, murder, and every other satanic deed and act. Let us who belong to God pursue what is of God; let the pure pursue what is holy; let the blameless pursue what is chaste; let the pious pursue what is reverent; let the peaceful pursue what is brotherly; let the humble pursue what is heavenly; and let those who have renounced the world pursue what is supreme. May order not turn into disorder, lest we—who are of the light—pursue what is dark; we—who are of purity—pursue what is licentious; we—who are of piety—pursue what is disorderly; we—who are of humility—pursue what is vain; for this is pitiful, this is deceitful, this is godless, this is senseless, this is fuel for the fire of hell. Let us therefore seek God, as God's own, as we are called by our rank. We are called monks, pilgrims, anchorites, virgins, servants of God, and angels; and everyone understands that this is indeed what we are. Let none of us be unspiritual, attached to the world, or unchaste; let no one be a complainer, a fornicator, quarrelsome, despondent, or fainthearted: for the great wrath of God is near—and He will repay. God is not so much angry—though He is angry—with those who, while living in the world, are wicked at heart, as He is with us, who ought to belong entirely to Him; just as a master is more indignant at those servants who sin in his very presence than at those who, being far from him, turn out to be such. God's wrath, however, does not extend equally to all of us, but manifests itself in various ways: differently toward those who persist in evil, differently toward those who sometimes improve and sometimes fall again; differently toward those who have just taken the schema, and differently toward those long established in the schema: for the longer one remains in the schema, the more evident the distinction of his life should be; therefore, if old age brings no benefit, it becomes a cause for condemnation and a laughingstock—just as it is ridiculous to see a gray-haired man studying in school with children.

169. You are soldiers of Christ; and you must constantly be fully armed—in this way

169. 1) You are soldiers of Christ; and you must constantly be fully armed—here is how. – 2) The root of all evil is pride; but one must fight against whatever is currently battling within: for this is not always the same for everyone. – 3–16) Various thoughts on spiritual warfare. [2, 103]

18. You are soldiers of Christ; and a soldier must consider what is needed for battle and keep his full armor in order, so that he may be ready at all times to engage the enemy. – See, then, if you are ready, and in what condition your spiritual weapons are—are they sharpened, cleaned, and polished? – Namely, the sword of obedience, the armor of faith, the helmet of saving hope, the shield of humility, the quiver of good thoughts, and finally the chariot—that is, your virtuous body, which is also the horse, well-trained to be fit for everything, – and must be neither too fat, lest it be unfit for running, nor too thin, lest it be too weak for the required movement; it must bear the bridle of the fear of God well when it is applied, so that it does not stray from the proper path and does not throw the rider—the mind—off with its unbridled gallops. This is how the Word of God always desires you to be;—for your war is unceasing, your battles are hourly, and your firing is at every moment.

19. Who among you is valiant, who is strong, who is a warrior—one who cuts down opposing thoughts by the thousands and multitudes, having first cast down the proud mind, just as the divine David once cast down Goliath?—For what comes of this? – The flight of the spirits of malice, that is, the numerous and varied sinful passions. Pride of the mind is the first of evils and the last. Through it, the dragon—who now tempts us all—fell from the heavenly heights and angelic radiance, and from it, as from a root, myriads of sinful vines have sprung up. But we must strive and fight against what is now attacking us: for at every hour, one person is fought by one passion, and another by another: one is afflicted by the passion of fornication, another by gluttony; one by sloth, another by envy; one by anger, another by unbelief; one by rebellion, another by pride; one by inaction, another by frenzy. Yet all this is the work of one and the same satanic spirit.

20. Our struggle is great and varied: we must keep our eyes open everywhere, watch from every side, and surround ourselves with a protective barrier—so that the enemy does not break in, wound us, or take us captive; so that he does not lay hands on us, strike us, or kill us.

21. We must also anticipate; and for our part, we must initiate battles and fight back. It happens that we receive one blow and strike back tenfold—that we sustain a minor wound and repay it with a fatal defeat.

22. Whoever is wounded in the body seeks healing; in the same way, whoever is wounded in the spirit must seek the appropriate healing for the spirit. This healing is confession with penance. Having done this, one must go out to battle again.

23. The one who triumphs in physical battle receives a single reward; but the one who triumphs in spiritual battle receives countless crowns: so there is daily battle, daily crowns, and daily rewards.

24. And blessed are you if you prevail and do not give in, if you remain steadfast and do not lose heart, until the war ends with your departure from this world.

25. Take courage, then, my beloved children and brothers; take courage, for you have God as your helper, an Angel as the guardian of your life, the saints—whose names you invoke—as your intercessors, and the sign of the Cross of Christ as your invincible weapon.

26. Let us not be intimidated by the invisible enemies that assail us from all sides through evil thoughts; let us not bow our knees before the Baal of carnal pleasures; let us not betray to our enemies our chastity, which Christ has betrothed to Himself in the sanctuary; let us not make our members—which belong to Christ, the most pure and immortal Bridegroom—into instruments of fornication and vessels of impurity.

27. Let us not accept the serpent as our counselor, who plots to drive us out of our paradisiacal garden; let us not open the door to thieves—the demons—and let us not allow them to steal the treasure of our soul.

28. How good it is for us to dwell in the city that the Lord our God has built for us out of a variety of virtues! How blessed it is to preserve the dignity of our soul, unenslaved by sin! A soul not enslaved by passions is wholly free, wholly God-like, wholly sovereign, wholly radiant, wholly enlightened, gathered by God, created by God, and heavenly.

29. Not so is the soul enslaved and dominated by passions—those tyrants. It is seen to suffer greatly and terribly, dragged hither and thither by the work of every passion and every reprehensible deed. Taking its behavior from the demon, it unquestioningly does as commanded. It is ruled over by the demon of carnal lust, the demon of envy, the demon of hatred, the demon of rashness, the demon of gluttony, the demon of sloth, the demon of unbelief, the demon of blasphemy, the demon of anger, the demon of pride, the demon of falsehood, the demon of theft, and all the other demons of the passions—whose names can anyone enumerate?

30. By whatever demons one is deceived, by those he is enslaved. His poor soul languishes under their yoke; his life is wretched. It is entirely poor, entirely shabby, gloomy, lightless, godless, hideous, and repulsive to the sight of all right-thinking people.

31. Let us not debase our dignity, my children; let us not sell our freedom. Having become masters, let us not become slaves (1 Cor. 7:22–23). Let us not turn our light into darkness, let us not transform our beauty into ugliness, let us not turn our faces away from God to turn them toward the shameful image of sin; let us not cast off the bright garments of virtue to clothe ourselves in the gloomy rags of lawlessness; being sons of God, let us not transform ourselves into the offspring of the devil.

32. Who, being in their right mind, would dare to enslave themselves while being a master?—Who, having been adopted as a child of God, would agree to be called a spawn of the devil? Who, having cast aside the ineffable nobility of virtue, would choose to be counted among those living a base, passion-driven life? Who, having spiritual wealth, would choose to fall into poverty and spiritual destitution? Who would prefer to lose the Kingdom of Heaven in order to gain fire and darkness, and other dreadful eternal torments? This is not the act of the sane, nor the step of those who have not lost their reason, but of certain madmen and the insensitive—so that those created in the image and likeness of God to inherit eternal blessings might, of their own free will, through senseless sensuality, descend into the depths of hell for eternal condemnation.

33. Let us awaken, O sleepers; let us open our eyes that have been closed; let us listen, O those who do not hear; let us strengthen our weakened bodies; let us rise up with courage; let us be inspired and set out on the path of salvation. Let us cry out to the Lord—and He will act. For “the Lord is near to all who call upon Him in truth, and He will save those who are humble in spirit” (Ps. 144:18; 33:19).

170. Compares the care of the soul to the care of a vineyard

170. 1) He compares the care of the soul to the care of a vineyard. – 2) He invites us to such care for the joy of our Lord, the Vine-Grower. – 3) He acknowledges that we have already labored sufficiently in this regard; but he says, “We will labor still more, walking blamelessly in the monastic rules and ascetic labors.” [2, 104]

1. Yesterday, while harvesting grapes, you blessed the vines that bore much fruit and lamented those on which there were no clusters. What does this signify? – It means that you, having become the Lord’s grapes, when you bear spiritual fruit and are, as it were, laden with clusters, are worthy of admiration in the eyes of the Cultivator of our souls; but when you do not, you are worthy of condemnation and cutting off: “for,” as the Lord says, “every branch that does not bear fruit is cut off and thrown into the fire” (John 15: 6). You see that a vine does not bear fruit by chance; but first it is planted with great labor, tends to grow, reaches maturity, and only then begins to bear fruit; and when it bears fruit, it is pruned, dug around, fenced in, cleared of dry branches, and cleansed of everything that might hinder fruit-bearing—as vine-growers know from experience—and in this way it bears fruit again. – Can we not see the same thing in ourselves? For who will ever bear fruit without having gone through something like this—that is, without having been planted and nurtured, and without having matured to full spiritual maturity in Christ, and for that purpose not having been pruned, weeded, and protected by Christ’s commandments? – Whoever does not go through all this always remains immature and barren; and he is devoured by all the destructive demons passing by on the path.

2. Let us, I beg you, set about cultivating the soul and caring for it diligently; that is, for the ascetic practices and customary disciplines of the ascetic life: the burden of abstinence, the labor of vigil, the shame of confessing inner failings, the wounds of penance, guarding one’s lips, a heart free from daydreaming, unshakable faith, and the unperturbed settlement of one’s thoughts. Whoever does not do all this cannot bear fruit; and such a one should not be called a branch of Christ. – Why have we come here, brothers? Is it not to bear much fruit and to nourish the Lord with our spiritual fruitfulness? The good Lord longs for our salvation, and if He finds us being saved, He rejoices, tasting of this fruit; but if not, He condemns us like a barren fig tree. Every day He comes here and observes what we are like. Therefore, we need: zeal, diligence, a fervent spirit, care, humility, obedience, attentiveness, hymns, meekness, prudence, a love of work, brotherly love, patience, steadfastness, and hope—so that we may prepare ourselves as chosen vessels, perfected in the Holy Spirit.

3. You have labored—I acknowledge this—you have triumphed in the past, endured much, traveled a long journey, put the evil one to shame, repelled attacks, renounced passions, stripped yourselves of the world, crucified your desires, kept the commandments, preserved the faith of your fathers, have become unafraid of human fears, and have prepared yourselves from the heart for death for the sake of love for the Lord; all that you have done is pleasing to God and praiseworthy, all is holy and heavenly. – But just a little longer—if only, if only we can endure—I beg you, most honorable brothers, let us stand firm in the faith, let us stand fearlessly in the face of invisible and visible temptations, let us not yield to the great enemy in his daily battle, for: “The Lord is my helper; I will look upon my enemies” (Ps. 117: 7). “The Lord is the protector of my life; whom shall I fear? When those who seek to harm me draw near to destroy my body—those who insult me and my enemies—they will be overwhelmed and fall” (Ps. 26:1–2). “But we have risen and stood firm” (Ps. 19:9). So let us sing in our minds, so let us be courageous in spirit; let us diligently fulfill our duties, observing piety in all things, without uttering words that are corrupt, grumbling, abusive, judgmental, rebellious, or insolent; let us willingly gather for work, for vigils, and for psalm-singing, let us be in harmony with one another in meekness and humility, in goodwill, in detachment from the world, in striving toward heaven, in brevity of speech, in sobriety, in overcoming through yielding when we hear, “Forgive me”—which is a great weapon against the devil—in kindness and peacefulness.

171. We must be vigilant so as not to stray from the path of the commandments, from which the enemy strives in every way to push us off; and to succeed in this, let us guard our senses

171. 1) We must be vigilant so as not to stray from the path of the commandments, from which the enemy strives in every way to push us off; and to succeed in this, we will guard our senses. – 2) If we guard ourselves in this way, the enemy will retreat in defeat and be tormented, while our soul will rejoice; otherwise, the opposite will follow. – 3) But may this not happen to us; and if it does, let us hasten to heal ourselves through repentance, guarding ourselves thereafter against falling. [2, 105]

4. We must always be mindful of ourselves and, in every circumstance, keep ourselves within God's law, deviating neither to the right nor to the left from the commandments, but walking the royal middle path, where salvation, steadfastness, and prosperity abide. We must keep this in mind, pay attention to it, and understand it; for the cunning serpent, the thief of souls, the devil, is always watching vigilantly, seeking to lead us astray from this path and, by casting us into the torrent of some passion, to take us as his most wretched prey. We will, however, overcome him and remain on the right path if we stay alert and sober, and guard our senses: our eyes from seeing what should not be seen; our ears from hearing the seductive words and whispers of the dragon; our hands from touching, whether our own bodies or those of others, out of passion or lustful impulse; our feet from straying onto treacherous paths and into hidden places, both mentally and physically.

5. If we act in this way and guard ourselves thus, with proper confession, the necessary humility, and the proper disposition, then the dragon will be defeated, and the evil one driven from the heart; and he will gnash his teeth, standing at a distance, for the all-malicious one never loses heart, no matter how many times he is defeated and driven away. The soul, however, rejoices and takes courage, and ascends even more toward God, dwelling in the light, in the highest and most sublime contemplations, being deified and heavenly. But if it behaves contrary to what has been said, it suffers the opposite—that is, it is taken over and enslaved by the very passion that has conquered it, and, darkened by evil thoughts, descends into a certain abyss of evil, being tormented and racked, finding no rest anywhere or in anything, and even here tasting the fruit of the sorrow that awaits her in the age to come.

6. But may we never have to endure anything like that. Let us not allow ourselves to be carried away by the allurements of sin, and if such a thing should happen, let us cut it off at once and cast it aside like an arrow that has inflicted a wound, while healing the wounded place with the medicine of repentance—whether it be the eye, the ear, or the hand—and thereafter guard ourselves carefully. For even irrational animals, having slipped once or twice in a certain place, avoid it or carefully go around it so as not to fall into the same misfortune. But we, who are honored as the image of God and taught by the word of wisdom, will we allow ourselves to prove worse than irrational creatures, loving the very passion from which sin arose and seeking the same precipice and the same chasm where the fall took place? That would be terrible and disastrous. No, but as wise people, let us walk wisely; as pure people, let us live in chastity, so that we may prove stronger and more steadfast even against external temptations. A soul that guards itself in every way and thereby remains invincible against the onslaught of passions fears neither fire, nor sword, nor beast, nor kings, nor authorities, nor sorrow, nor hardship, nor persecution, but is always ready to cry out: “I will not fear when the earth is shaken, and the mountains are overturned into the heart of the sea” (Ps. 45:3). Let us guard against internal temptations, and we will not fear external ones.

172. Our daily bread must be to do the will of the Heavenly Father, living according to the rules of asceticism and the order of monastic obedience

172. 1) Our duty is to do the will of the Heavenly Father, living according to the rules of asceticism and the monastic order of obedience. – 2) The enemy is vexed when he sees your integrity and tranquility and finds no way to approach you. – 3) Take courage, then, in resisting the enemy, and do not listen to his whispers; rather, pay close attention to your Guardian Angel. [2, 107]

7. The Lord says: “My food is to do the will of Him who sent Me and to complete His work” (John 4:34). O brothers! He has granted us, too, the privilege of calling God “Father.” Therefore, our food must also be to do the will of our heavenly Father. What, then, exactly should we do? And what must we do?—You have already shown this through your previous life, living according to the vow you made; and I can answer you: Live as you have lived; continue to bear with cheerful patience the hardships of self-denial, the burden of obedience, the weariness of vigil, the invisible arrows of thoughts, the fire of lust, the gloom of despondency, the wounds of envy, and everything else with which the devil, the destroyer of our souls, seeks to cast us into the depths of hell.

8. Be bold: for he attacks; but he is repelled by the power of God within you, and does not overcome you; he gnashed his teeth, seeing what a peaceful and steadfast life you lead, but he fails to harm you; he strives to invade you and carry off your soul to destruction, but finds no place from which to enter you, seeing that you are protected, like a wall, by the law of the Lord; He sets snares and lays traps, trying to lure you into them, but failing to do so, he is torn apart by malicious vexation, seeing how you thwart all his schemes through confession. And in general, he has no place where the fear of God is strong, where the commandments are observed, where all the customary rules of our life are in effect, and where penances are willingly accepted and carried out.

9. Therefore, rejoice and remain encouraged; be of good cheer and take courage; be strengthened and grow in strength, by no means giving the frenzied demon a foothold, by no means allowing this crafty serpent to whisper into the ear of your soul; and if he approaches, drive him away and repel him. You know how he deceived the first man, and how he continues to deceive even now those who yield to his temptations. He instills only evil, no matter how plausible a guise it may take—only that which leads either to pride, or to envy, or to carnal lust, or to intemperance, and to everything that defiles the soul. But listen more closely to what the Preserver of your life rightly reminds you of, inspiring thoughts of chastity, courage, and virtue—thoughts of death, of the passage into the next life, of future eternal blessings, as well as of the endless torments opposed to them, and how and in what way you may be deemed worthy of the former, and how to avoid the latter, so that, by constantly engaging in this, you may be increasingly established in virtue and walk more zealously along the path of our Lord God, until the end of our life appointed for us arrives; and the Lord, well-pleased with us, will lead us from here to eternal rest.

173. The cultivation of the soul does not require a specific time or preparation, as does the cultivation of the land: it is suitable at any time, and all the preparation here consists in the desire and determination to suppress all that is evil and to foster all that is good

173. 1) Cultivating the soul does not require a specific time or preparation, as does cultivating the land: it is suitable at any time, and all the preparation here consists in the desire and resolve to suppress all that is evil and to foster all that is good. – 2) Let us therefore set about this, imitating the fathers who sought and found, who knocked and the door was opened to them. [2, 110]

10. Any time is suitable for cultivating the soul, unlike the cultivation of the land. Here, neither oxen nor plows nor other farming implements are needed; all that is required is a single act of will and a wholehearted desire, through which good seeds are sown and good fruits are reaped for eternal joy and rest; and this is true not only by day but also by night, in the morning and at noon, while eating and drinking, while sitting and standing, while speaking and in silence, while walking and standing still, while acting and at rest—provided, of course, that we remain sober and alert. This requires that we not wander or be led astray by our own thoughts, letting our minds—or even our bodies—dart here and there; that we not seek to satisfy our carnal desires; that we not engage in disputes and quarrels with one another over such matters; and that we not fall into disobedience and grumbling, into vanity and pride, or into the temptation to have our own way and prevail, regardless of the consequences. For all such things prevent our minds from abiding with the Lord, from meditating on what is fitting, from being humble and contrite, and from accepting all that is sorrowful with patience and joy.

11. Let us not, then, brothers, allow the days of our salvation to pass in idleness, laziness, and neglect, nor spend the time of our lives in vain; but let us engage in the pursuit of virtues and acquire the wealth of heavenly blessings, gaining wisdom as our holy fathers did, who wasted neither a single day nor a single hour, but steadfastly and earnestly strove for the purification of the soul, the banishment of passions, and the cultivation of virtuous dispositions, and who, sparing neither toil nor sweat, sought the one God with all their hearts. They sought and found; they knocked, and it was opened to them: the doors of love, the gates of righteousness, and the entrance to Christ through the path of dispassion were opened to them; they entered and found unfading and eternal joy and gladness. – Come, then, you who are being saved; let us walk in the way of our fathers, keep their commandments to us, and preserve our hearts pure and blameless. “Let us not envy the deceitful, nor be jealous of those who do iniquity; for they will wither like grass, and like the flower of the field, they will fade away” (Ps. 36: 1–2). Let us not look to those who are many but live carelessly, but to those who are few yet zealously strive for salvation and God's favor. Let us imitate them, follow in the footsteps of their virtues, look upon all things through their eyes, reason about everything with their minds, speak with their tongues—and may we be made worthy of their lot, which is blessed and full of joy.

174. Having received, for the sake of renouncing the world and entering a monastery with vows, the strength for a life pleasing to God, give thanks to the Lord who has called you to this—not in word, but in the deeds of the life you have chosen: in this lies victory over the world

174. 1) Having received, for the sake of renouncing the world and entering the monastery with vows, the strength to live a life pleasing to God, give thanks to the Lord who has called you to this, not in word but in the deeds of the life you have chosen: in this lies victory over the world. – 2) The Lord triumphed through His sufferings, the cross, and death, showing us the way to complete victory: following in His footsteps, the Apostles, then the martyrs, and then the holy ones triumphed over the world in this way. – 3) Such is the way to God; and there is no one who does not walk it. – 4) Do not be surprised when you encounter afflictions; rather, rejoice and be of good courage. [2, 111]

12. Nothing is more desirable or joyful to me than to hear and see that you walk piously and conduct yourselves in a godly manner, fulfilling all the Lord's commandments and sincerely observing the monastic life, in which you have been reborn in the Spirit and through which you have been freed from your former sins; and not only that, but you have also received the spirit of strength against visible and invisible enemies, and to face fearlessly whatever may come while serving the living God and keeping His holy commandments. Give thanks, glorify, and sing praises to the Lord who has called you, repaying Him with nothing other than patient perseverance in your ascetic struggle and ensuring that, just as you have striven well thus far, you may continue to stand firm in this even more so, burning with love for God. From the Lord, crowns are woven for you day by day, if in your good will you hold fast to the firm resolve to endure everything rather than change anything of what has been commanded to us. For the Lord's commandment is eternal life, but to violate it is death; therefore, we must confess the truth and not agree with those who oppose it, sacrificing for this sake all worldly advantages, glory, and honor from kings, bishops, and others. For "what good is it," as it is written, "if a man gains the whole world but forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16: 26). This is the purpose of our steadfastness and our deeds.

13. But "be of good cheer," says the Lord, "for I have overcome the world" (John 16:33). He conquered so that we, following in His footsteps, might also conquer it. As God, He is always the conqueror of the world; but He now specifically says that He has conquered as a man. And immediately after Him, the Apostles conquered the world; after them, the martyrs; then the saints; and all who lived piously and in the image of God. But how was this victory won—both by the Lord Himself and by His saints?—Without a struggle? Without suffering? Without the shedding of blood? Without exile?—No; not only was it not without these things, but it was also achieved through the cross and death. You know of the insults against the Lord, His revilings and mockeries—that He was betrayed, condemned, flogged, spat upon, and crucified—but having risen, He saved the world. Likewise, the Apostles also suffered. And who can describe the sufferings and torments of the martyrs? Or the feats and privations of the holy ones?

14. The Word of God says, "All who desire to live godly lives will be persecuted, but evildoers will go from bad to worse, deceiving and being deceived" (2 Tim. 3: 12). The path leading to the kingdom is narrow and difficult; the path of destruction is broad and smooth (Matt. 7:14). On the latter—worldly joy, carnal pleasures and delights, contempt for God's laws, carelessness about death, and human fear; and on the former—sorrows from the world, voluntary labors, and all manner of privations, as the Apostle says of those who walk in it: "those who were persecuted, afflicted, and tormented, wandering in deserts and mountains, in caves and in the caverns of the earth" (Heb. 11: 37). And there is not a single saint who has walked this path without suffering.

15. Therefore, do not be surprised when you encounter afflictions; rather, rejoice that they have not passed you by, and let your love for God burn ever more fiercely, so that through this you may subdue your passions and drive out the demons. For whoever loves the One leaves all others behind; and whoever fears the One cannot fear anyone else. He who has God is above all others. Be wise, maintain piety, and offer prayers and supplications for everyone. Christ is in your midst: for if He is present where two or three are gathered, how could He not be among you who fulfill His commandments, when there are so many of you?

175. When taking a temporary leave, he asks superiors and subordinates to act and live according to the rules, specifying exactly how

175. 1) When leaving for a time, he asks superiors and subordinates to act and live according to the rules, specifying exactly how. – 2) To encourage this, he emphasizes especially that God sees everything and will hold everyone accountable for everything. [2, 112]

16. As I am away for a time, I ask you, in the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, to observe the usual rules of communal life during the few days of my absence, in obedience and humility: superiors, do not rule arbitrarily, presumptuously, in a mercantile manner, or in any other human way, but in a godly and beneficial manner, salutary, as those who are seen and judged by God, and who must give an account to Him for everything you say and do; subordinates and novices, carry out what is commanded of you meekly and without complaint, whether from my deputy or from other superiors. You are children of God; walk as children of light. You are Christ's lambs; feed as His lambs do, gently and meekly. Let no one act recklessly or leap about like a young goat, feeding on the thorns of passion; let no one act like Judas, appearing to be a brother among the brethren while secretly plotting betrayal to the ruin of his own soul; let no one be like Esau, despising his salvation and selling its benefits for some stolen food and drink. Let no one remain idle, loitering here and there, nor waste the day in vain, while other brothers labor diligently, enduring the heat of the day and the cold of the night—whether they are on guard duty, serving in the infirmary, working in the shoemaker's workshop, the carpenter's shop, or in some other form of service. It is a terrible offense when, as the Apostle says, such people are "not even worthy to eat" (2 Thess. 3:10).

17. Walk in all things according to God's ways, and let not your feet set foot in secret places for evil counsel and vain schemes; for "the eyes of the Lord, brighter than the sun in the darkness, see all your ways"; "and they scrutinize in secret places" (Sirach 23:27). Therefore, even if you are in a hidden place, the watchful eye sees you there—with whom you stand, what you speak, and what you do. Take care, then, lest it see you conversing with Satan, plotting wicked deeds, or committing anything shameful. And even if the Lord does not mete out the proper punishment to you at that very moment, He will in every way command that your sin be recorded and your fall be noted—unquestionably and invisibly proclaiming to you: "You have done this, and I have remained silent; you have committed iniquity, thinking, 'I am like You.' I will rebuke you and set your sins before your face" (Ps. 49:21). This will be on the Day of Judgment. —Where, then, can we flee from the hands of the One who rules over all? Can we do anything evil that would go unnoticed? Do not even entertain such thoughts; but act in all things in a way that is salvific and pleasing to God, so that, seeing you, the Lord may rejoice and be glad, and may inscribe your good deeds in the Book of Life, and on the day of the revelation of all things may crown you with the unfading and eternal crown of righteousness.

176. Stand valiantly, gazing upward, and with divine contemplations—like arrows—repel the enemies of salvation

176. 1) Stand valiantly, gazing upward, and with divine contemplations—like arrows—repel the enemies of salvation. – 2) If you are troubled by passion, do not give in, but reflect on the shame you will suffer if you yield, and on the fact that the enemy is deceiving you by presenting evil as good. – 3) And in general, discern from your inner stirrings which spirit is near you—good or evil—and listen to the one, while driving the other away. [2, 114]

18. Stand firm, "having your loins girded with truth, and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace" (Eph. 6: 14–15), looking upward, striving toward the things above, seeking the heavenly, keeping your mind occupied with heavenly things, caring for your departure from the body, and for the future meeting with the Judge and your account before Him—studying the Divine Scriptures and the lives of the saints, and using what you find that is beneficial to the soul and salvific as arrows against the enemy.

19. Let anyone troubled by passion not lose heart or yield to it: for "the Lord is near to all who call upon Him" (Ps. 144: 18), and the soul that seeks Him will find Him (cf. Sir. 6: 16); but let it stand firm, let it sigh and groan, let it shed tears, raising its hands to heaven, let it beat its breast, reflecting on the shame that covers a sinful act—not only before the dreadful throne of God, but before itself and before people—and thereby turn itself away from sin and be established in goodness. For what is written? "My son, do not despise the Lord's discipline, nor lose heart when rebuked by Him. For the Lord disciplines the one He loves, and He chastises every son He accepts" (Prov. 3: 11, 12). And again in another place? "Do not be disheartened in times of trial" (Sirach 2:2). It is the Lord who tests our love—whether we are steadfast in it, whether we prefer

His love to a shameful delight, one that is calamitous and deadly, sweet to the taste yet terribly bitter when swallowed—and not as our soul-destroyer presents it: he pretends to be light, but he is darkness; spiritual love, on the surface, seems to be lacking, yet it is the most hateful of hatreds. But you, warrior of Christ, do not be ignorant of his schemes or his wicked plots. If you desire life, seek the light, for God and His commandment are light.

20. By the state of your soul, discern who has approached you—one of ours, or one of the adversaries? If your soul remains serene, unshaken, not neglecting heavenly contemplations, and full of longing for the blessings reserved for us, then by all means, open the doors of your heart to him, welcome him, and spend the evening with him, so that he may nourish you even more toward a greater love of God and divine things. But if his presence troubles your soul, fills it with a multitude of thoughts, turns your eyes toward flesh and blood, toward worldly ties and passions, and toward immediate pleasure, stirring your soul to frenzy and, as it were, bringing it to a boil with the heat of lustful delights: alas! —step back and drive this dragon away. It has come to destroy in a single moment your many years of labor, your ascetic efforts, your many tears, prayers, and valiant struggles and victories over enemies; he has come to make you, a warrior of Christ, a prey to the fleeting delight of lust; he has come to kill such a valiant man for all eternity by making him drink from a cup of sinful delight steeped in poison. – I write this not as one who is dispassionate, but as one who has been tempted, and even more so as one who is full of passions; some things I have learned from what I have read, others from my father’s teachings, and still others from what I have heard from many others.

177. Many passions assail us through the work of the enemy. We must fight, keeping ourselves clothed in the full armor of God

177. 1) Many passions attack us through the work of the enemy. We must fight them by keeping ourselves clothed in the full armor of God. 2) Among these weapons, the knowledge of divine truths—gained through listening to teachings, which, unfortunately, we make so little use of—is by no means the least. 3) Because of this, we are wayward and cling to what is evil, even though all it takes is a desire, and we can spend the whole day doing what is right. 4) So begin to act in this way. [2, 115]

21. Stand valiantly in your arduous life, enduring both the heat of the day and the chill of the night, mentally and physically; but more so mentally, because the fire of lust is inherent in us, stoked more fiercely than the Chaldean furnace by the invisible Nebuchadnezzar; other passions also assail us, each one drawing the poor soul away from the other: anger, rage, vindictiveness, pride, sloth, laxity, partiality, self-love, and the greatest of all evils, unbelief. We need much courage and magnanimity, much unwavering fortitude and strength, patience, good cheer, sobriety, and alertness, so that we may repel the temptations and wiles of the devil raised against us, so that we may not bow the knee before the Baal of lust, so that we may not worship the image of the passions, so that we may not destroy what we have gathered well, so that we may not ruin what we have created with God’s help. How else can we avoid these passions, if not by wholeheartedly relying on the Lord and putting on all the spiritual armor to defeat the forces hostile to us?

22. These spiritual weapons are: prayer and hope, humility and obedience, love and faith, impartiality and the complete turning of the mind away from all worldly things, constant instruction and discourse on salvation, a view and hearing that are neither indifferent nor indiscriminate toward all things, as well as the use of the mouth and hands, constant protection of oneself through the fear of God and meditation on God, with an unquenchable longing for future blessings: for if this is not present in us, how can we avoid falling into the ruin of sin? How can we avoid falling into the hands of enemies who hate us?—Alas! How much do we hear? How much do the Scriptures inspire in us? How much do the godly fathers teach? Yet we forget it all and care not a whit about it. Just as a seed sown on the surface of the ground by a farmer, before the plow buries it beneath the earth, is snatched away by birds: so the cunning birds of the enemy snatch the divine word from us, as if from our very lips; and the spiritual seeds remain inactive within us, and we too remain barren, bearing no fruit of virtue. What else can one think but this, when the fathers preach to us about chastity, courage, truth, or some other virtue, and we, immediately after listening—as if we had heard nothing—find ourselves acting in complete opposition to it? They tell us about judgment and tears, yet as soon as we leave, we begin to laugh and guffaw. They rein in our souls with stern words about purity, yet immediately after hearing them, we give in to lust, casting lewd glances at one another and uttering and accepting the most brazen words. They urge us toward humility and meekness, yet immediately after such a discourse, we become arrogant, act brutally, and show disobedience. They urge us toward moderation, yet we overeat; toward vigilance, yet we immediately fall asleep; toward gentleness, yet we immediately fly into a rage; to silence, yet we engage in idle talk; to increased labor, yet we shirk our duties; and to put it simply, it is as if on purpose we turn to a path opposite to the one indicated by the instruction. And I am speaking not only of novices, but also of those who presume to be something, and those called to leadership in any capacity, and those ordained as ministers. – Alas! What suffering do we endure from Satan the deceiver?

23. Why do we turn our faces away from the living God, from that unfathomably sublime beauty, and turn toward what is vain and fleeting? Why do we love and cherish what is bitter and temporary, forsaking what is sweetest and eternal? Truly, the eyes and ears of our souls are not purified, so that we fail to see true goodness and deprive ourselves of its enjoyment. Come, then, let us set to work again, though we have already grown completely weak; let us come alive again, though we have already become completely dead; let us stay awake again, though we have already almost fallen asleep. All we need is to desire it—and everything would be accomplished. On the very day we set a good and firm intention, we will attain the measure of salvation. For we are not bound by the affairs of daily life, so that it would be difficult for us to undertake good deeds. But it is convenient for us to devote the whole day to the work of salvation, if only we so desire: in the morning, to sing wisely that psalm of David: “In the morning hear my voice; in the morning I will appear before You and You will see me” (Ps. 5: 6); at the third hour: “Do not take Your Holy Spirit from me” (Ps. 50:13); at the sixth hour: “Deliver me from the attack of the midday demon and from the arrows flying by day” (Ps. 90:5); at the ninth hour: “Incline Your ear, O Lord, and hear me” (Ps. 85:1); in the evening: “Bless the Lord, O my soul...” and the verses that follow (Ps. 103:1). If we act this way every day, encouraging one another and enlightening one another with good words and deeds, rather than relaxing and casting a shadow of careless indifference and empty talk; then we may be saved in this way, for from morning till evening we may perform one worthy deed. Of course, it is impossible not to stray—whether toward a thought that is unwise, a wish that is inappropriate, or some other passionate impulse—but each time this happens, it is atoned for through a heartfelt prayer to God. Thus, as day follows day, let us walk in God’s way, awaiting the time of deliverance from the body, after which come crowns, joy, and gladness for all who labor and discipline themselves for the Lord.

24. Pay close attention, then, to your labor, your struggles, and your battles, casting aside carelessness and embracing zealous diligence, confident that it is possible for everyone who desires it to live a good life, to ascend to perfection, and to be adorned with every virtue. If God is light, life, and truth, how can we not long to strive toward Him, seek living communion with Him, and attain it? And if Satan is truly death, falsehood, and ruin, how can yielding to his influence be anything other than death, darkness, and ruin? Thus, life and death lie before each of us. Let us cling to life, cling to the light, cling to immortality; and let us flee from darkness, gloom, and ruin, that we may be made worthy of the kingdom of heaven in Christ Jesus our Lord.

178. You have now successfully completed Holy Lent and have been enriched with spiritual fruits... Keep them, then, by watching over yourselves closely

178. 1) You have now successfully completed Holy Lent and have been enriched with spiritual fruits. 2) Preserve them, then, by keeping a close watch on yourselves, especially during the days of Easter, when certain comforts are permitted according to the rules. [2, 116]

25. You have labored in good deeds throughout Holy Lent: you fasted to the best of your ability and even beyond, kept vigil as is fitting, studied with sobriety, worked diligently, kept your minds pure, guarded your tongues from condemnation, your lips from idle talk, and all your members from every sin, making them instruments of righteousness and organs of a virtuous and God-pleasing life. You have now observed the fast so well and so favorably as, it seems, never before. Why is this so? Because of your strict attention to yourselves and to the business of your lives, and even more so because of the special grace of God drawn down by this, from which “every good gift and every perfect gift” comes, as it is written (James 1:17). In this way, you have prospered in life and been enriched with spiritual fruits.

26. May your wealth be preserved, and may your storehouses of spiritual blessings remain inaccessible to the enemy’s predatory slanders. May grace be granted to you upon grace, and riches upon riches, until the end of your life.—“And so it shall be”—but how?—“If you do not relax the strictness of your vigilance and do not allow slackness or negligence in the days to come, especially when Holy Pascha arrives, when, according to the rule, psalm singing, the usual hours, kneeling prayers, and intensified night vigils are set aside, and at meals wine, oil, cooked food, and the like are permitted, as well as an afternoon nap, two meals a day, walks, and other such things: so that if the mind does not remain sober and do everything according to the rules with strict attention, it is in danger of ruining what it has rightly acquired, turning a rich man into a poor one, and casting him from the heights of glory into the abyss of a disgraceful fall. That is why I ask and implore you: keep yourselves strictly in check, as if under lock and key, until we escape from the enemies here and the treacherous accidents, and move to a place where we will be safe from falls and theft.

179. Let us not heed the enemy's temptations: our forefather heeded them and was cast out of paradise

179. 1) Let us not heed the enemy's temptations: our forefather heeded them and was cast out of Paradise. – 2) The enemy offers us his temptations at every opportunity: let us always be ready to reject them. [2, 117]

27. "Be still, and know that I am God" (Ps. 45:11). Thus, we are called to detach ourselves from all things and to devote ourselves solely to what is necessary. In the course of our lives, we need: an insatiable desire for goodness, unwavering sobriety, steadfast patience, and unceasing resistance to our enemies and adversaries; for always near us are these mental beasts, the kidnappers of our souls, the demons from whom come sins, lawlessness, and all manner of debauchery. Let no one, therefore, through negligence, slacken in their spiritual struggles; let no one wander wilfully here and there, driven by sensuality and self-love, but in all things let them submit to the Lord's commandments, and not to foreign influences. For the Lord Himself says: "My sheep hear My voice. They do not follow a stranger, for they do not know a stranger's voice" (John 10:27, 5). Where Christ is, the devil has no place. Where His voice calls the sheep, the hissing of the serpent is not heard. And our forefather Adam, as long as he kept the ears of his soul healthy, dwelt within Paradise, listening to the divine voice, and received lofty contemplations. But when he accepted the serpent's whisperings and tasted of the tree of sin, he immediately felt the shame of his nakedness and hid from God. When asked, "Where are you?" "I heard your voice," he said, "and I hid because I was naked." Who, then, instilled this fear in you, O Adam? And who pointed out that you were naked?—A deceitful ear and a departure from God's commandment. This was followed by his expulsion from that blessed place and his condemnation to toil, sorrow, and deprivation in this life. – Therefore, let us henceforth keep away from the serpent's counsel.

28. Let us not accept the promptings of the passions, which he has prepared through his malice. Having prepared little vessels with various potions, this loathsome instigator of all lawlessness goes about, as one of the saints (St. Macarius the Great) observed, and, seeing which passion each of us is most prone to, offers each person the corresponding potion and makes them drink it; and upon tasting it, that person is inflamed by passion: to one he gives the potion of fornication, to another of envy, to a third of gluttony, to yet another of arrogance, to another of celibacy—in short, to this one this, to that one that, and to each his own. We must therefore be vigilant, brothers, and always be ready to repel such attacks from our fierce enemy; and to that end, we must be constantly armed spiritually, wearing the armor of faith, the shield of humility, the helmet of obedience, and the full armor of all other virtues. Let each one, knowing his own station, act according to his station with a clear conscience. Let us love one another in spirit, not in the flesh. Eyes downcast, mind lifted up.

180. Fasting is pleasing to God when we abstain both in spirit and in the flesh; but if it is only in the flesh, it is displeasing to Him.

180. Fasting is pleasing to God when we practice self-restraint both in spirit and in body; but if it is only physical, it is displeasing to Him. Strive to be faithful in this. [2, 120] The time of fasting is already drawing to a close: examine yourselves, then, to see if you have fulfilled all that is fitting and proper: have we, together with you, attained unquestioning obedience, sincere humility, contrite reverence, unceasing prayer, weeping pleasing to God, deep lamentation, unshakeable faith, hope that brings no shame, good-natured patience, and all-encompassing self-restraint—from every word of opposition, from offensive speech, from arrogance, quarreling, and self-will. —All this is required by self-restraint, and by refraining from these things, we truly walk the path of piety and strive through good deeds in the hope of eternal, ineffable blessings. But if there is anything contrary to this—disobedience, pride, grumbling, backbiting, self-will, licentiousness, quarrelsomeness, hard-heartedness, hatred, anger, and other vile passions of depravity—then even though we fast physically, we do not offer God a pleasing fast, but an impure one—one that is not pleasing to God and is rejected by Him. Having come to know this, strive to keep all the Lord's commandments blamelessly; reject all that is reprehensible, shameful, and disgraceful, and do everything in a proper and orderly manner: for even what is good is not good if it is spoken or done improperly. “Do not be foolish, but understand what the will of God is” (Eph. 5:17)—“good, pleasing, and perfect” (Rom. 12:2).

181. Strive to fulfill God’s commandments and the vows of communal life, and you will be filled with indescribable joy from the Lord

181. 1) Strive to fulfill God’s commandments and the vows of communal life, and you will be filled with indescribable joy from the Lord. – 2) Such is the essence of our calling and the hope it holds: let us not grow weary in fulfilling our duties. – 3) These acts of obedience are not in vain; and none of us serves people, but God, who accepts them—and will reward them: so strive in this spirit, and fulfill the work of your calling to perfection. – 4) In this way, let us become imitators of the fathers and of the Lord Himself. – 5) May the Lord establish you in this and keep you. [2, 123]

1. I urge and implore you: stand firm in the holy calling to which you have been called, unshakable and steadfast, fulfilling God’s commandments and His righteousness; always abide in the most zealous and fervent love for the Lord, banishing every foreign passion from your hearts; grow stronger in the fortitude of your asceticism, passing each day with ever greater diligence and sobriety, in vigil and psalm-singing, in obedience and humility, in service and reverence, and in all else, regarding this perseverance in labor and struggle, and this sweat-soaked life of yours, as proof of your success in working out your own salvation. Take heart: eternal peace will finally shine forth for you in place of your present suffering, and unceasing joy in place of your present sorrows. This is how the Apostle encourages us, urging us not to look at the present, because it is temporary and fleeting, but at the future, because it is eternal and blessed (2 Cor. 4:18).

2. Therefore, since we have been deemed worthy of this gift of the angelic monastic habit, since we have desired eternal life and imperishable crowns, since we have ardently loved adoption as sons and the kingdom of heaven—behold, you have both the time and the arena at your disposal. – Let us not lose heart, let us not spare our strength; but even more than those who seek gold and silver, precious stones, and other perishable treasures, let us wholeheartedly and zealously strive for the attainment of the Kingdom of Heaven and heavenly blessings. Success in this will come only if we constantly examine ourselves and, continually learning from the Divine, take care to fulfill the obedience entrusted to us in the best possible way, for it is neither carnal nor human, but holy and salvific, if it is performed with excellence.

3. For none of us serves flesh and blood, but the Lord God, who accepts this as a pleasing sacrifice and promises to reward us worthily in the age to come. Let no one think that he is serving a human being, even if he has been assigned the humblest duty, but rather the Lord Himself, who accepts it through His brothers. Therefore, perform it with fear and trembling, having Him Himself as your overseer, “who sees in the secret places of darkness and reveals the counsels of your hearts” (1 Cor. 4:5). If each of us thinks this way—as it truly is—and performs our mutual service to one another as divine ministry, then we will perfectly fulfill the work of our calling.

4. From this, the rays of all virtues—love, peace, meekness, gentleness, and humility—will shine forth in us, and we will then realize that we are truly following in the footsteps of our holy fathers, emulating their way of life. Remember, then, those blessed lives, their journey along the path of submission and obedience, the remarkable excellence of their humility and submission—and how zealously they served the Lord, Who Himself said: “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart” (Matt. 11:29), even though, according to the Apostle, “He did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in human likeness; and being found in human form, He humbled Himself by becoming obedient to the point of death—even death on a cross” (Phil. 2:6, 8). And consider: who is among the saved, or the blessed? Only those who imitated Him, who humbled themselves, who were obedient and submissive, who endured all manner of afflictions, humiliations, insults, mockery, or even beatings, exile, and imprisonment—just as some of you, or even all of you, have done; for in one member, the whole body either receives glory or suffers disgrace.

5. May the Lord preserve you more and more as His valiant warriors, as His faithful servants, as men of desire, as a chosen people, as a holy assembly, so that, appearing in this age—truly adulterous and sinful—as unashamed doers of God’s commandments, you may be deemed worthy to be co-heirs with Christ the Lord in the Kingdom of Heaven.

182. You heed neither my teachings, nor my fatherly admonitions, nor the word of God, and you remain unrepentant: the cause of this is your indulgence of the flesh and your indifference toward salvation

182. 1) You do not listen to my teachings, nor to my fatherly admonitions, nor to the word of God, and you remain unrepentant: the cause of this is your indulgence of the flesh and your indifference toward salvation. – 2) We ought to be zealous for all that is good, but what are we like? – 3) Why, then, are we so negligent and have fallen so low? Let us at least make amends from now on. [2, 124]

6. For what other purpose does a farmer sow, if not to reap later? For what purpose does a merchant labor, if not to make a profit? Likewise, for what other purpose does one who is appointed to teach the word of instruction do so, if not in the hope of the success and improvement of those who hear? – As for you, however, because of my sins, my word remains completely ineffective. I sow abundantly and labor hard, yet I see no fruit. I speak, I proclaim, I remind—and sometimes, for a moment, the power of my word reaches the ear of your soul, but you immediately forget it all again and remain in those same transgressions. I weep over this and my heart is torn, having no strength to put an end to your disorder. Of course, such futility stems from the powerlessness of my humble words. Let the blame for this, however, rest with me. But do you not hear the words of Divine Scripture? Do they not proclaim to your ears, day after day, the saving doctrines?—What, moreover, do the holy fathers cry out? What do they proclaim? What do they testify to? What do they warn against? – Do they not bring before your eyes that dreadful and inescapable judgment, that shattering final decree of God, that devastating rejection and endless torments, the unquenchable fire, the poisonous worm that never dies, the pitch-black darkness, the Tartarus of the underworld, and all else that comes to mind in this regard? – Do they not, on the contrary, show you the Kingdom of Heaven—eternal life, ineffable glory, unspeakable light, the unimaginable beauties of paradise, the bosom of Abraham, the tabernacle of the saints, the courts of the righteous, the ranks of the angels, and inexpressible joys? – And yet, we see no sign of reform in you, not even repentance. – What words, however, can we heed when all we seek is to satisfy our carnal passions and inclinations, when we have sunk so low with nothing on our minds but what to eat and drink, what funny remark to utter for the ruin of our own soul and the soul of the listener, what to invent to cover up our guilt, or to shift it onto another—and, generally speaking, when we have made our souls not a garden of piety and truth, but of every kind of lawlessness and injustice?

7. We ought to look upward with sorrow, to seek heavenly wisdom, to seek and behold the things above, to consider what rank and station we have assumed, to whom and in what way we have become bound thereby, for how many and what sins of our former life we have received forgiveness, and for what faults of negligence, after taking the schema, we have been granted absolution? – We ought to tremble, lament, humble ourselves, and be contrite; we ought to walk with a heavy heart and downcast eyes, remembering death, which is ever at hand; remembering our appearance before the Judge upon leaving the body and our encounter with the fearsome Angels. – We ought to imitate our holy fathers, who were extremely strict with themselves in everything—even down to a casual word—and were in all things cautious, sincere, well-ordered, free from malice, meek, peaceful, not quarrelsome, not lustful, not worldly, silent, hymn-singing, grateful, obedient, humble and wise—truly chosen vessels, prepared for every good work—having the Holy Spirit dwelling within them.

8. Why, then, are we so negligent, we wretched ones? Why are we so lazy? Why have we sunk so low? Why does the word of God not touch our souls? Why do we not shed tears? Why do we not soften our hardened hearts? Why are we not transformed by a complete change? Why do we not strive daily for the better, so that it may be evident that we have fled from the world and risen above all ordinary human wisdom?—The dreadful and terrifying day and hour of our passing will come, will come, and will not be delayed. Then we will groan bitterly, painfully, and inconsolably, lacking the boldness to say, “My heart is ready, O God; my heart is ready” (Isa. 107:2). But come, if you will listen to me, let us worship and prostrate ourselves before Christ Himself, our King; let us groan and lament before Him with all our hearts—and He who is near to all who truly call upon Him will grant us help and strength to cast aside sinful habits and enter into a life of virtue, sparing no sacrifice. I am not saying: do not eat, do not drink; I am not saying: do not lie down to rest; I am not saying: “Do not seek comfort or gather with the brethren for conversation”; but I demand that all this be done in a proper manner, in moderation, at the appropriate time and in a fitting place, so that, adding virtue to virtue and progress to progress, we may live a life that is peaceful and angelic.

183. Many of you are as you ought to be: why, then, are not all of you so?

183. Many of you are as you should be—so why aren't all of you? But come, let us all rise up while there is still time. [3 1, 2]⁹⁶ Some of you are as the Word of God requires; but they are not the majority. Why, then, should we not all rise up and, awakening from the deep sleep of carelessness, strive toward the light of knowledge and desire eternal bliss? Why not "put to death the earthly parts of our nature—sexual immorality, impurity, every kind of passion, and evil desire" (Col. 3: 5), so that we may become temples of God, in which the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit would be pleased to dwell? Why not observe the monastic rule in word and deed, with the utmost diligence, so as not to dare to engage in mockery, deceit, grumbling, pride toward our neighbor, or boastful speech, by which people say, "I was such-and-such and such- ; I had this and that"? – How long will the demon of idle talk have power over us? How long will we be instruments of the flattering spirit of disobedience? How long will our hearts be puffed up, boasting of small and insignificant things and condemning our brothers for lacking them? – But come, my children, listen to me: let us embrace the fear of the Lord and join hands with one another to work together for our salvation. While we are still in the flesh, while the time of our sojourn here still continues, while prayers and supplications, tears and repentance are still appropriate, let us strive to achieve this: that, having despised the whole world, cast aside all carnal wisdom, and put to death all earthly desires, we may direct all our affections toward what is holy, good, and divine.

184. The way of asceticism in communal novitiate is superior to every other: it is Christ-like

184. The form of asceticism in communal monastic life is superior to any other: it is Christ-like. Run this path well, then. [31, 9] Stand firm, be courageous, and endure all things in the course of your life. Lift your thoughts to the heights and contemplate the heavenly with a godly mind. There, together with Isaiah, you will behold the Lord seated on a high and exalted throne, surrounded by the Cherubim and Seraphim standing before Him and by all the hosts of angels. Thus will we behold Him on the dreadful day of His second coming. – Then those who have faithfully accomplished the task set before them—rejecting bodily pleasures and refusing to let the delights of this age take hold of them—will hear His most blessed voice. Then the righteous will be enlightened like the sun in unspeakable joy, when our Lord and God, the Giver of rewards, distributes gifts according to merit to each and every one. Oh, my brothers, what bliss all the saints will taste, receiving the blessings of that realm in accordance with how they pleased Him here! Great indeed are those who, for God's sake, took refuge in the mountains, caves, and chasms of the earth—the stylites, the cave dwellers, and the hermits. – (I do not intend to speak here of the highest ranks—the holy Apostles, the judges of the universe, nor of the all-blessed martyrs, the divine Prophets, or certain other kinds of righteous people.) But our rank is in no way inferior to theirs. – You know that the Giver of gifts Himself, having come down to earth, did not choose for Himself a life of the desert, nor one of pillar-standing, nor any other such life, but was pleased to live in obedience, as He Himself says in the Gospel: "I have come down from heaven not to do My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me" (John 6:38). And again: "The words I speak, I do not speak on my own; but the Father who sent me has himself given me a commandment—what I should say and what I should speak" (John 14:10; 12:49). Then, at the Last Supper, having girded Himself with a towel and taken on the role of a servant, He washed the disciples' feet, and shortly afterward said: "I am among you as one who serves" (Luke 22:28). Thus the Lord, having become incarnate, chose to embrace none other than our humble way of life. Is it not comforting and joyful for us that we spend our lives imitating Him? Is it therefore appropriate for us to favor other forms of ascetic life over our own? Indeed, if you live this life properly and faithfully, you yourselves will not wish to favor any other. This is why the Gerontikon contains a story in which, of three ascetics, the one living in obedience according to revelation is preferred over the hermit and the sick man who joyfully endures his illness. Indeed, my brothers, our life is truly great, and those who live it will undoubtedly be glorified with Abraham, the martyrs, and the righteous. So walk well. May the devil, who envies you, not stop you, and do not stop yourselves out of laziness. Anoint your feet with the oil of patience, clothe yourselves in the tunic of joy, and drink the water of purity and chastity. Let no one say, "How long?"—for that is the word of the sluggard.

185. By comparing those who strive to fruitful grapevines, he stirs up zeal for bearing the fruit of virtue

185. 1) By comparing those who strive to fruitful grapevines, it stirs up zeal for the fruitfulness of virtue, and concludes. – 2) I would like to bring joy to some and bring others to their senses. [31, 13]

9. The vine-grower rejoices when he sees the vine bearing fruit. I, too, rejoice when I see any of you bearing spiritual fruit. Blessed is the branch rich in spiritual clusters, yielding the wine of repentance and bringing joy to God and to people. But let it not be said of any of us that the Prophet Moses spoke of certain people on behalf of God: “Their vine is from Gomorrah; their cluster is a cluster of gall, a cluster of bitterness” (Deut. 32:32). For a terrible warning is proclaimed in the Gospel: every branch that does not bear good fruit is cut off and thrown into the fire (John 15:2–6)—a fire that is, of course, unquenchable. By the grace of Christ, there are various branches in our God-planted vineyard. One, for example, possesses both deeds and words seasoned with the salt of the Holy Spirit; another is adorned with deep humility. Yet another, through its abundance of fruit, spreads out in branches. Understand by this one who grows stronger and matures spiritually, adding one spiritual feat to another. Another has taken deep root in the earth with many roots; he is abundant, tall, and lush, so that cuttings for other vines are produced from him. Such is the one who, while firmly established in the good ways, also benefits his brothers when he sees someone falling or being afflicted by the enemy’s attacks. But the branches of the vine, having no feeling, do not compete with one another; but you, as living beings planted by God, compete with one another, grow together, and bear fruit together, so that none of you may remain barren, but all may be filled with the fruits of divine cultivation and be pleasing because of the multitude of spiritual clusters—that is, virtues—upon you.

10. With such parables, I wish to bring joy to some and to bring others to their senses. For all of you, I would like to erect a ladder from earth to heaven with my humble words, so that you may ascend to the highest contemplations and descend to the depths of the heart, to the realization of the impermanence and transience of human life, and the vanity and fragility of human affairs. In short, I would like to transport you to the world beyond and show you its ineffable and innumerable blessings. I would like to present you before the face of the living God, the Creator of all things and the Lord—and to help you understand what that realm is like—what eternal rest is there, what indescribable joy, the insatiable joy, the all-blessed fellowship with the Angels and all the Saints—so that, having been captivated and enlightened by this, you may turn away from all that is vain, regarding as true only that eternal good reserved for you, and considering everything here—which is received and vanishes in an instant—as nothing.

186. Remembering why we left the world and entered the monastery, let us strive earnestly to attain that goal, avoiding the stumbling blocks indicated by experience

186. Remembering why we left the world and entered this monastery, let us strive zealously to attain that goal, avoiding the stumbling blocks indicated by experience. [31, 15] Now I proclaim the words of the blessed Arsenius: “Arsenius, why did you come here?” And I invite you to ask yourselves, together with me, why did we leave the world and come here?—I will answer for all: certainly in order to gain God, so that, having become sons of God, we may inherit the kingdom of heaven, and in order to cease being “flesh and blood, which cannot inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 15:50). The Lord has called us to this through the holy calling. Therefore, take up the cross of Christ, and follow in His footsteps without hypocrisy, not dividing yourselves between Him and the world, but surrendering and dedicating yourselves entirely to Him alone. Strive in the good struggle; persevere and complete your journey, bravely enduring every hardship and sorrow that comes your way, drawing comfort from the hope of the inheritance of the promised blessings. A multitude of evil spirits assail and attack us both from within and from without. “For from within, out of the heart,” says the Lord, “come evil thoughts, adultery, sexual immorality, murder, theft,” and so on (Mark 7:21). Against the wind of these spirits, let us hoist the sails of our souls to sail our own course, with caution, lest we immediately fall into trouble by running aground on a shoal or striking a submerged rock—which are: ignorance, and especially the failure to confess our thoughts and the concealment of ourselves. We must guard against the dangerous places indicated by experience with all our might, so as not to perish if we encounter them. One must not veer to the right or to the left, but must follow the royal middle path. Therefore, let us not be sluggish in doing good, as if frozen in place—nor too impetuous in the heat of the moment, straying from the middle path as if to the right of the right. What happens when we love to appear better than others, inflamed by conceit, and thus inherit—alas! and woe!—“wisdom in our own eyes and intelligence before us” (Isaiah 5:21).

187. Let us all walk in harmony, each excelling in her own virtue, yet not seeking our own interests, and not shirking any labor, confident that for this we will undoubtedly receive the kingdom of heaven.

187. Let us all walk in harmony, each excelling in her own virtue, yet seeking not our own interests and shunning no toil, confident that for this we will undoubtedly receive the kingdom of heaven [31, 15]. Come, let us walk together; let us walk thus: some through obedient submission, some through unwavering patience, some through Christ-like humility, some through guarding their thoughts, some through painful contrition, some through purifying tears, some through brotherly love free from envy (), some through the gift of grace from God—whether through instructive words, edifying psalm-singing, or demonstrating how to act. Let everyone do what they can: if you are able to study, study; if to compose poetry, compose poetry; if to pray, pray; if to bow, bow—but do everything reverently and with patience. Let no one seek his own advantage or follow only his own inclinations; for in this way he will alienate himself from the very best obedience. Let no one among us say, “I cannot,” “I don’t feel like it,” or “I’m not well”—even if someone could truly say such things. I give you my solemn word, before the invisible God and His chosen angels, that by forcing yourselves—according to the Lord’s words that “the kingdom of God is taken by force”—by exerting yourselves and restricting yourselves in everything, just as you restrict yourselves because of the narrowness and hardship of your path—you will pass from death to life, from corruption to incorruption, from darkness to light, from slavery to adoption as children of God, from the valley of tears to the heavenly kingdom, which is most radiant and full of joy.

188. Just as the enemy deceived our forefather, so he deceives us, falsely presenting evil as good

188. Just as the enemy deceived our forefather, so does he deceive us, falsely presenting evil as good. Our forefather was deceived by listening to him; we too will be deceived if we listen to him. Let us not listen to him, but let us close our ears to every suggestion of his. [31, 16] Whether we recall our first dwelling in Paradise and our expulsion from there—or the reordering of all things in the age to come—both are matters of the utmost importance for us to understand. You are well aware of how our forefather Adam was expelled. But what was the reason for this? Pride and insolent disobedience toward God, who had given him very existence and life. He did not remain faithful to the commandment given to him, having been led astray in his heart by the eyes that craved sensual pleasure and thinking only that the fruit was good for food and pleasing to the eye; at his wife’s instigation, and even more so through the serpent’s temptation, he tasted of the forbidden fruit and thereby fell from light into darkness. Thus, the bitter taste of what appeared to be sweet disobedience drove him out of paradise and cast him down into a life full of toil and sorrow. But let us take care to avoid what he suffered, paying close attention so that we do not fall into the same snares. – Let us not allow ourselves to be carried away by the allurements and beauties that lead to sensual pleasure, whether by internal mental imaginings or by external, chance impressions on the body and the senses. For although what we see sometimes seems beautiful and good, in reality it is not so; and if we partake of it, it brings about in us what it brought about in Adam—death, decay, and condemnation. He believed the serpent that whispered to him: “On the very day you eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God” (Gen. 3:5). The dragon whispers the same to us—that if we fulfill such-and-such a desire, we will receive boundless joy and complete freedom from all that weighs us down. But he who listened to him was not only deceived in his expectations but lost entirely what he had, having fallen away from God in a disastrous way. And what about us? Should we really listen to him?—Or do we “not understand his schemes” (2 Cor. 2:11) and his deceptive lures? Therefore, no matter how much he entices us, no matter how much he calls out to us, no matter how much he stirs up our souls, let him be cast far away from us. For he seeks to deprive us of our divine and most blessed virginity, to expel us from the paradise of the Lord’s commandments, and to strip us of the angelic garment given to us by God, so that he may then cast us into the depths of the earth. Let us therefore bar the gates of our thoughts, shut the doors to them, and refuse to engage in conversation with them. But “when the sinful devil rises up against us,” “we will be still and humble ourselves” (Ps. 38: 2, 3) before God, and without even thinking that the enemy has approached, let us arm ourselves with the invincible weapon of the cross, and with the words of the God-inspired Scriptures let us strengthen ourselves in the work of our salvation. Let us strive to excel day by day, never growing weary in doing good and in asceticism, not content with what we have managed to accomplish, not regarding it as significant in any way, and not thinking that we surpass so-and-so in anything; but let us strive to fulfill all of God's commandments perfectly, in every respect. This is our noble endeavor. This is our blessed ascent, our praiseworthy acquisition, our imperishable treasure, and the pledge of our future inheritance of eternal blessings.

189. If the experiences of the harmful consequences of indulging in self-gratifying desires do not teach us to abstain from this

189. 1) If the experiences of the harmful consequences of satisfying self-indulgent desires do not teach us to abstain from this—2) then may the memory of death, ever at hand, teach us: for it inspired the martyrs and strengthened the holy fathers in the rigors of self-denial. [31, 17]

11. Rejoice and be glad; run the race well, and rise above the deceptive allurements of the world, keeping your thoughts fixed on heaven and on the unspeakable glory that awaits you there. You know that all our labor in asceticism is nothing compared to the kingdom of heaven, that the sorrow and need of this life, in the face of eternal rest, are like an unpleasant dream. We have judged well, and we have done well, to have departed from this world by the power of Him who called us into His heavenly kingdom. But let us also live well, gradually progressing in good deeds, and learning from our experiences not to allow vanities to overcome us. “How many times have we indulged in pleasures?”—and nothing of that remains? “How many times have we filled our bellies?”—But we satisfied our bodily desires, and set nothing aside from that satisfaction, except the heaviness of the body. If we indulged in shameful thoughts, we later cursed ourselves, reaping sorrow instead of joy; if we indulged in sleep, we later condemned ourselves as senseless; if we acted rudely, we later reproached ourselves; if we gave ourselves over to laughter, we later mourned it; and in general, there is no good for a person in sensual pleasures. If we wish to always experience comfort and joy, let us keep the commandments: this will be an inexhaustible pleasure for us, bearing abundant fruit of righteousness with the testimony of our conscience.

12. Listen, brothers and sisters—let us not give in to sleep and indifference, nor waste our time in vain. The hour of our departure is coming; or has it not already come?—and an angel is sent for us by God, who will immediately take our soul and lead it away.—But where?—Are we not terrified upon hearing this? Do we not tremble when we think of this? Remembering this, the holy martyrs joyfully surrendered their bodies to torture, to the severing of limbs, to the crushing of bones—truly “a spectacle to the world, to angels, and to men” (1 Cor. 4:9); but for this they were later crowned. Our reverend fathers, the holy monks, labored as if the body were their enemy—they found delight in hunger; enduring the cold, they felt as if in warmth; enduring privations, they were as if they had everything in abundance; they were not bound by the love of their parents; the affection of their children did not divert them from their purpose; the goodwill of their brothers did not distract them; neither gold nor silver did they covet, nor fine garments, nor food that stirs up the body, but they ate and clothed themselves only to live, and endured all manner of hardships as if they were incorporeal. Let us also strive to imitate them, suffering all manner of hardships—enduring hunger, cold, insults, mockery, and every other affliction—so long as we do not lose the kingdom of heaven.

190. It is difficult for us: the enemy devises schemes everywhere to deceive us; but knowing this, let us be vigilant and resist

190. 1) It is difficult for us: the enemy is everywhere devising schemes to deceive us; but knowing this, let us be vigilant and resist. – 2) Taking heart from the fact that it is only a little while longer—and we will enter into rest. – 3) And drawing wisdom from the Word of God and the writings of the Fathers. [31, 19]

1. Our struggle is great, our enemy is formidable, his malice against us is strong; he neither sleeps at night nor slumbers by day, nor is he distracted by any other concerns, but prowls constantly around our flock gathered by God, seeking to snatch some careless and unsteady soul and devour it. You know his wiles; beware, therefore. — He is the instigator of sin: he casts a thought like a fishing line, disguised as the bait of sweetness. Do not be foolish—like fish, to use the Apostle's words, “not understanding his schemes” (2 Cor. 2:11)—do not be deceived by outward appearances; rather, expose his cunning and drive him away; and he, having failed, will return to his own with bitterness. Here are his tempting suggestions: to one he instills envy, to another laziness; to one, a desire to move elsewhere; to another, pride; or both to the same person—in every way drawing them into the snare of death. Let us therefore be vigilant, and—with the Lord at the right hand of our soul, the One Beloved and Desired—let us avoid his snare. May anger—intended only against the enemy, the serpent—not tyrannize you; and may the fire of lust not have the freedom to inflame your hearts toward shameful and unseemly deeds; but, adorned with meekness and clothed in beautiful dispassion, love one another.

2. Endure a little while longer, and you will be called blessed; strive a little longer—just a little—and you will soon reach that heavenly city, resplendent and adorned, where lies the indescribable bridal chamber of virginal souls, where is the bosom of Abraham, the divine paradise, the kingdom of heaven. Keep this city in mind; let us inspire ourselves to hasten along the path toward it, paying no heed to toil and weariness.

3. Pay attention to the God-inspired words of the Gospels, the Apostles, the Prophets, and the soul-saving writings of the Fathers, and nourish and satisfy your souls with them. As for the tasks and labors—which are given to each of us, let us carry them out cheerfully with patience, brotherly love, mutual aid, and compassion, so that the name of our God may be glorified in all and by all, and to Him alone we serve and worship.

191. Through patience we will overcome the enemy and be deemed worthy of the ineffable blessings for which the martyrs subjected themselves to torments, and the holy ones to every kind of austerity and self-denial

191. 1) Through patience we will defeat the enemy and be deemed worthy of the ineffable blessings for which the martyrs subjected themselves to torment and the holy ones to every kind of self-denial. – 2) Let us imitate them by turning away from all that is evil and striving for all that is good, thereby ascending to perfection. [31, 24]

4. In ceaseless struggle, you stand in the arena of obedience, enduring blows in deprivation and scourging in the afflictions of sorrow, shedding blood in the mortification of your will. – But take courage, for by doing this you are preparing for yourselves crowns, honors, and rewards for a righteous victory. “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you; draw near to God, and He will draw near to you” (James 4:7–8); “Put on,” as the great teacher of the universe, Paul, commands, “the full armor” of the Holy Spirit, “so that you may be able to stand firm against the schemes of the devil” (Eph. 6:11). By your patience he is repelled, defeated, and cast down as powerless, and trampled under your feet: so that the promise is fulfilled in you: “to tread upon the serpent and the scorpion and all the power of the enemy.” Oh, my children! If we strive a little longer, what blessings will we receive, what glory, what joy?—Words cannot express this, nor can the mind comprehend it. For this reason, the martyrs, like sheep, gave themselves up to slaughter; for this reason, the saints took upon themselves the most rigorous ascetic practices and carried them out.

5. Let us imitate them as well, encouraging one another toward this and helping one another. May there be no place among us—I humbly beg you—for the disobedience that drove Adam out of Paradise, nor for the pride before Almighty God that caused the morning star to be cast down from heaven, nor for the gluttony that led Esau to sell his birthright, nor for the lust which, through the cunning Delilah, made the invincible Samson a laughingstock before foreigners, nor the envy that made Cain a fratricide. Let us, then, embrace virtue all the more, drawing examples—from one, meekness; from another, zeal; from one, patience; from another, invincibility; from yet another, brotherly love; from another, humility, obedience, and love of God—so that you may be sons of light and of the day, and co-heirs of those whose lives you have emulated. Ascend, my brothers, ascend the lofty mountain of virtues; let the ascent of the Spirit dwell in your hearts, be heavenly ladders; rise like the cedars of Lebanon, seeking the heights, meditating on heavenly things, and gathering your minds there, so that, finding you in such a state, the end of this earthly life may lead you directly into the blessed paradise for eternal life.

192. Let us cry out, and the Lord will deliver us from the bondage of sin and our enemies

192. 1) Let us cry out, and the Lord will deliver us from the bondage of sin and our enemies. – 2) But once you have been delivered, hold fast;—otherwise you will fall back into bondage: to avoid suffering this, have the fear of God and love for the Lord, sustaining them through contemplation of God’s wondrous works, His creation, providence, and redemption. – 3) If you vividly impress upon yourself that the Lord suffered for our sake, then no sorrows or hardships will shake you or lead you astray from God’s path. [31:25]

6. Again and again, “let us seek God, and our souls will live” (Isa. 68:33). Let us call upon Him earnestly, and He will look upon us as He did upon ancient Israel, and He will hear the cry and groaning of our sorrowful souls. And although He will not send Moses, He Himself will certainly deliver us from the hands of the Pharaoh of our minds and from the bitter labor of his passions. As long as we remain under sinful

Egypt, so long will the thoughts that serve it inevitably drive and persecute us. But when the good God looks upon our endurance with signs and wonders of His presence within us, He will then deliver us from the ten plagues that afflict us into the land of dispassion; and we will then sing to Him, in all-satisfying joy, a song of victory over our liberation.

7. But know also that a person may once again fall into the hands of his enemies if he grows complacent and fails to remain steadfast in the initial good disposition that reigned within him during and after his conversion—may this never happen to any of you. – The beginning and source of inner transformation for the better and of steadfastness within a person is the instilling of the fear of God in the heart, arising from the knowledge and contemplation of God’s wondrous works and decrees—namely, how He brought all things into being from nothing, and moreover with a single word; how He established the light; how He spread out the heavens, as a vault, how He “gathered the waters of the sea into a skin,” as it is written (Ps. 32: 7), how He spread out the air for all living things to breathe, how He established the sun and the moon—like two bright eyes with a multitude of varied stars—in the firmament of heaven, how He brought forth from the earth every fruit-bearing tree, every kind of grass and flower, how He commanded all the beasts to come forth from the earth, and all the fish and birds from the sea, how He created our forefather Adam with His own hands and placed him in the paradise of delight, how He ordained the sun to rise and set, —from which we have day and night, by which the course of our lives is measured—especially from contemplating how great He is and how profound His wisdom is! Let us fear Him alone and tremble before Him alone. But let us also love Him because, for our sake, He became man and was like us in every way except sin; for our sake, He was betrayed and brought to trial; for our sake, He endured scourging, spitting, mockery, flogging, and finally crucifixion and death. He endured all this as a man, yet He rose again as God, having defeated the devil, the destroyer of souls, and saved His beloved creation.

8. Who, after this, thinking that God was reviled, will not accept every reviling not only without distress but even with joy? Who, remembering how the Lord was reviled and slandered, will not willingly endure every kind of slander? Who, seeing the Lord struck on the cheek, will not wish to endure the same with joy, and having received a blow to the right cheek, will not turn the left cheek as well? Who, mentally picturing God crucified, pierced with a spear, tasting gall and vinegar, will not keep himself ready for any kind of death? – Come, my children! Come, I beg you, let us crucify ourselves to the world and our passions, and if need be, let us surrender ourselves even to beatings; and if not, let us meekly endure at least the wounds—the verbal piercings caused by reproaches and slander, and the shedding of blood from the severing of our own wills; and let us be like Christ, suffering for the sake of His love for humanity. Let us all be stirred to the selfless fulfillment of our duties; let us be inspired to prayer, inflamed in them by the fire of the Spirit, with an outpouring of tears and with the groans of humility.

193. Remembering how our life will end, let us be zealous to please God, imitating our fathers

193. 1) Remembering how our life will end, let us be zealous to please God, imitating our fathers. – 2) Though in practice this is rarely seen in anyone, by mutual counsel and cooperation we will not fall short of them, even if not to the full extent. – 3) To this, if you will, there are no insurmountable obstacles, for it depends on our own will. [3 I, 28]

9. Let us recognize, my children, what our life is, whom we serve in this flesh, and to what the mystery of our union with the body leads. Keeping this in mind, let us be diligent in fulfilling God’s commandments and tireless in working out our salvation. Let us show ourselves in this carefree world to be zealous for a life pleasing to God, just as in ancient times our fathers did, who flourished here like a lily of the field and like a paradise planted by God; watered by the waters of the Spirit, they bore the fruits of every virtue and were deemed worthy to be called friends of the Lord. They pleased God, and remaining pure in life and nourished by lofty contemplations, they attained heaven; and making wise use of their sojourn on earth, they formed a single choir with the angels and dwelled with God. 2) Who walks in this way today? “Who shall ascend the mountain of the Lord,” as it is written? (Ps. 23: 3). Who, taking “wings like a dove,” flies by the Spirit and “rests” on the mountain of perfection? (Ps. 54: 7). Who is such that “righteousness shines forth in his days”? (Ps. 71:7).—But we, by common counsel and mutual exhortation, will take up the task and not fall behind them. We will not allow ourselves to be called “a stubborn and bitter generation” (Ps. 77: 8), a people who have not controlled their hearts; but rather, “a blessed people of the righteous” (Ps. 101: 2). Let us demonstrate virtues worthy of reward; let us walk in the holy way of our fathers, treading in their footsteps, measuring the stages of their journey and examining their lives, striving to emulate their deeds and imitate their manner of action—albeit poorly and imperfectly—yet to the extent sufficient for a disciple to demonstrate the practice of imitating his teacher. They are painters of the Godlike image, artists of virtue; as for us, let us at least reflect their shadow; they are pilgrims; let us also become pilgrims; their homeland is heaven—may the heavenly Jerusalem also be our homeland; their treasures are the Lord’s commandments—let us also seek them; they were not bound by love for flesh and blood (of kinship), nor did they delight in the pleasures of this age—let us desire the same. They strove and became such; let us exert ourselves, and we too shall become the same; so that, just as in ancient times their deeds were proclaimed far and wide because of their wondrous lives and reached us, inspiring us to do the same, so may our name also become known to future generations to foster wholesome competition. And what could be more blessed and more comforting than this?

10. And if you wish, there is no obstacle to this. The God of that time is the same as He is now: the Gospel has not become obsolete, the commandments have not changed, and time has not been altered. He who provided for us then and continues to care for us all today. Are not night and day, sowing and reaping, the same even now?—This God of ours, unchanging and immutable, always the same as He was from the beginning, still preserves His creation, illuminating all people with the same rays of love and not desiring the eternal death of the sinner. – Yet it is not uniformity or changeability that determines our free will; that is, it depends on us—and this applies both for the good and for the bad. For what prevents us, having been stirred by a zeal to imitate our fathers, from embracing their deeds and shining with their way of life? We, too, who live in community, can shine in this way if, together with others, we make our lives conform to the lives of the fathers. And this will come to pass if, above all else, we compel ourselves to guard our hearts with every possible care against the slightest deviation from the Lord’s commandments.

194. You are like a good garden, bearing various fruits of virtue: take care, then, not to let yourselves wither

194. 1) You are like a good garden, bearing various fruits of virtue: take care, then, not to let yourselves wither. – 2) These are holy days (Lent), and everything contributes to your spiritual renewal—abstinence, worship, readings, and spiritual competition. – 3) Make use of all these things; above all, be at peace. [31:29]

11. Timely rain is very beneficial for good soil, helping it to bear abundant fruit necessary for the nourishment of living creatures. Whenever our weekly teachings flow from my humble lips, may they also be beneficial for the growth and renewal of the virtues that your honest souls cherish, just as rain is necessary for the growth of nourishing fruits. Indeed, you seem to me like a paradise filled with diverse vegetation: one delights me with humility and obedience, another nourishes me with diligence in his work; one exudes a devout disposition, another delights me with lofty virtues, like a cypress raising its branches high into the mountains; in short, each of you is distinguished by some virtue, producing deeds commensurate with it. Take heed, then, my children: let no one remain barren of fruit; do not allow yourselves to be consumed by the fire of lust, nor be rendered fruitless by pride, which devours every fruit. Let us spur one another on and warm one another’s hearts; with one mind, let us build for ourselves a pillar reaching from earth to heaven, or let us attain virtue that reaches to the heavens.

12. Now are the holy days—and you are being sanctified; fasting and abstinence—and you are being purified in both soul and body; harmonious psalm-singing and readings—and you become a melodious lyre, played by the Spirit; you gather quickly for the services—and form an angelic choir; you embrace one another with love, casting out envy, and are moved by a single desire—to be all together inscribed in heaven; without quarreling with one another and living in sincere peace among yourselves, you imitate the unity of mind of the incorporeal ones; You have but one concern, and in this one thing you strive with others to fulfill what has been commanded as best as possible—and are therefore sons of obedience; you do not grow rich through the accumulation of material goods, having everything and yet possessing nothing, as rulers of the world and heirs to the kingdom of heaven.

13. Above all, you demonstrate in your deeds the truth of the prophetic saying: “What is good, or what is beautiful, but for brothers to live together?” That is why I call you a “fragrant offering,” “descending upon Aaron’s beard, and the dew of Hermon, descending upon the mountains of Zion” (Ps. 132:1, 2, 3). See what names adorn you and what praises crown you. Take heed, then, and show that you do not bear names that are not your own, and that you do not live in a manner unworthy of such praise. And now you receive this from me in words, but then—in the age to come—you will receive a righteous reward in deeds from the righteous Judge and the all-generous Rewarder.

195. You are to be named after your spiritual fathers and live in a unified monastic spirit according to the established rules

195. 1) You are to be named after your spiritual fathers, and live in a single monastic spirit according to the established rules. – 2) Remember the vows you made at your tonsure; and be such both outwardly and inwardly: and let this unity be your distinguishing mark from the laity. – 3) For this, God will grant you rest in His wondrous dwellings. [31, 30]

14. Having left your parents, brothers, relatives, and the whole world, you have come here and become my spiritual children, transforming yourselves through a life pleasing to God. Therefore, you should no longer be called by the names of those who gave you physical birth, but by the names of our spiritual fathers and forefathers, thereby showing that you have completely separated yourselves from the natural order and have taken on a new birth—a spiritual one—of your own free will. Moreover, no one here has a will of their own or acts according to their own reasoning, but we all think as one, all striving with one accord toward God. And what is recounted in the Acts of the Apostles is now being fulfilled in us: “The community of believers was of one heart and one soul; and no one claimed that any of his possessions was his own, but they had everything in common” (Acts 4:32). Do you understand what you are hearing?—Examine yourselves, “whether you are firm and steadfast” (1 Cor. 15:58). I say this to impress upon you that you must not even entertain the thought of deviating in any way from monastic rules: this is the enemy’s whispering. Let me remind you of one more thing: “If anyone competes, he is not crowned unless he competes according to the rules” (2 Tim. 2:5). And a monk will not attain perfection nor receive a crown if he undertakes spiritual struggles contrary to the established rules.

15. You know and have often heard how the brothers are instructed when they take the schema. The meaning of it all is that here a vow is made and a covenant is established between God and man—to hunger, to thirst, to go without, to endure slander, revilement, and insults, and, if necessary, to shed blood for Christ. Therefore, do not shy away when you have to endure such things, for you are subjected only to what you have vowed to endure. Was what was said then merely a childish joke? Far from it. Those are sacred words, to which God and His chosen angels bear witness. On the contrary, when faced with such trials, we should rejoice that an opportunity has arisen to fulfill a part of what we promised. Just as praise, pleasure, and contentment are attractive to the world, so the opposite of these is desirable and joyful for us. This is what monasticism shows us. They rejoice in worldly things, but we rejoice in divine things; they rejoice in the flesh, but we rejoice in the spirit; they rejoice in pleasures, but we rejoice in self-restraint. What separates and distinguishes us from them? Do you really think that a black cassock and a long beard make one a monk?—Not at all.—But here is who a true monk is: one whose inner disposition and state of mind are in harmony with his outward appearance, so that he can say, “This is exactly who I am, and I will not change.” Come now, I beg you, be wise—and embrace self-restraint, silence, poetry, mutual respect, confession, diligence, and every other praiseworthy quality. Let us cultivate these traits within ourselves—and we will bear good fruit. Let everyone compete with his brother in goodness and imitate him without envy. And—as I live, says the Lord—I will glorify those who glorify Me, and I will prepare for them a place of rest, the land of the living, the “wondrous dwelling place” (Ps. 41:5). May you hear this and see the light of the world—and behold the Sun of Righteousness, and enjoy His ineffable joy; for He is all sweetness and desire. Let us therefore pray, and add zeal to our zeal, that we may attain that bright day with joy. Blessed is the soul that has gained the Lord through its good life and has found in Him a gracious benefactor, for He will receive it into His eternal dwellings.

196. Sermons speak of the most important matter—the salvation of the soul; therefore, they must be listened to with full attention and eagerness

196. 1) Sermons speak of the most important matter—the salvation of the soul; therefore, they must be listened to with full attention and eagerness. – 2) Otherwise, their teachings will have no effect on the soul; and even if they do, it will be only for a short time; then they will vanish entirely. – 3) Let us, then, listen, keep, and fulfill them; and we will reap good fruits both here and, even more so, in the age to come. [31, 32]

16. When the preached Word of God enters a soul that is sober and vigilantly concerned for its salvation, it immediately warms it and stirs it to greater and more perfect diligence in keeping the commandments; but if it enters a soul—like mine—that is asleep and carelessly dwelling in evil, it remains fruitless, dissipating idly into the air. Why, I beg you, do not look upon me as insignificant, but upon the dignity of the Church's teaching, for it offers reminders that are of universal benefit—not about some trivial matter, but about the most important matter of all: the matter of our salvation. How can we be saved? How can we walk in God's way? How can we avoid the enemy's snares? How can we purify ourselves of passions? How can we excel in virtue, so that through it we may ascend to the heights of perfection? What and how many good deeds must we perform to attain the Kingdom of Heaven?—Given these subjects, our teaching should be desirable to you and held in high esteem by you.

17. Moreover, if you view him in this way, you will hardly be able to find the benefit you seek in such conversations and gain it. For there is an adversary who opposes us in everything and distracts us from what is right, unless we heed his evil suggestions for the sake of good. Consequently, when our nature is drawn toward what is improper, it fails to retain the teachings with the same disposition or regard for them. But after hearing some edifying discourse, or a reflection on the passage from this life through the gates of death into the next, or on standing before the judgment seat, or on hearing the final verdict regarding our eternal destiny as recompense for our entire life, he immediately becomes contrite, sighs, weeps, and groans; but then, as soon as a little time has passed, everything is forgotten again, and instead of contrition, he becomes hardened; instead of shedding tears, he gives himself over to laughter; instead of groaning, he scatters his attention, turning his face and eyes this way and that. And all that remains is to cry out with the Apostle: "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" (Rom. 7:24).

18. Oh, no, my brothers, no. But we will listen, and we will be contrite, and we will strive for what is best, and by kindling fire upon fire, we will set our souls ablaze with love for God and for one another, mutually stirring one another up and encouraging one another toward obedience, humility, diligence, and every other good deed of our heavenly life. Now we are only sowing, and as a result we labor, grow weary, and weep; but soon we will rejoice, for with joy we will reap what was sown with tears and begin to reign with the Lord of all and with God, provided we persevere earnestly in our self-sacrificing obedience. – Why should I cease to call out to you? Let us strive while there is still time; let us labor a little longer, let us endure as much as we can, until this life, which is like a dream, comes to an end. And I dare to assure you in the name of God that you will be crowned, enter the choirs of the heavenly hosts, and there begin to rejoice and be glad for all eternity.

197. During war, soldiers have no peace while fighting; they find peace only when they return home

197. 1) During war, soldiers have no rest while fighting; they find peace only when they return home. And we are engaged in a spiritual war, a war that lasts a lifetime: rest from it comes in the next life. – 2) Let us therefore fight with vigor, yielding nothing to the enemy, and fearing none of his illusory threats. [31, 33]

19. For those who are constantly at war, as long as the war rages, there is almost no rest except in battles against enemies both great and small: they are either preparing their weapons for action, standing guard duty, or going out on reconnaissance missions; meanwhile, they sleep little, eat little, are always on alert, and always live in fear of a sudden attack. But when, at the end of the war, they return home, only then will a time of peace, tranquility, and joy come for them; only then will they receive their rewards for military valor and the king's gifts. We can see the same thing here: for are we not in a state of constant war, and do we not maintain military discipline? "Yes," I tell you, "and even more so than they; for everything about us is unique: our weapons are unique—'not of the flesh, but powerful through God to the point of destroying strongholds'" (2 Cor. 10:4); and a special enemy—the fallen spirit, the devil, whose army consists of all those who have fallen away with him and through him, and the powers cast down from heaven. Therefore, our present time is not a time of peace and carefree complacency, but a time of struggle. We must therefore arm ourselves with the full armor of God and, taking up the spiritual sword, wage battle. When a certain time of struggle—more or less successful—has passed, then our Creator and God will bring the battle to an end and call us from our earthly sojourn and exile to our true dwelling place and homeland. Of this the Law speaks; of this the Prophets, Apostles, and Teachers write and describe.

20. You now know, brothers, the battlefield; you also know the battle. Let us therefore stand firm and fight valiantly. We are at war with all forms of wickedness—our own: a war against despondency, a war against gluttony, a war against excessive sleep, a war against impure lust, a war against idle talk, frivolity, laughter, insolence, and every other impure passion. Whoever stands firm, fighting and resisting—through reflection, unceasing prayer, and revelation—and ultimately overcomes the enemy and triumphs—that person, as a warrior of the Lord, will be awarded an unfading crown of glory in the Kingdom of Heaven. I therefore beg you, brothers, my spiritual companions: let us not lose heart, let us not be deceived, let us not grow weary as we cast down the adversary, and let us not fear his powerless scarecrows and spectres. He sometimes appears to be preparing to do something great and terrible, but to those who pay attention, these are mere phantoms and shadows. Was not the one who once rose up against the great Anthony—sometimes slithering like a serpent, sometimes like a lion or a wolf, or some other dangerous beast—just such a thing? Before this courageous young man, he proved to be nothing but darkness and deception, and was cast far away by his prayers. When the enemy subsequently sends something similar against us—raising mountains of thoughts and presenting the rapids of passions—we must not be afraid; but let us make the sign of the life-giving cross in a peaceful manner, and he will flee. At present, brothers, patience is required, as has been said; let us therefore be patient and strive. Each of you, take care how and where you direct your steps: if you act according to my humble commandment, or according to the communal rule, and moreover by setting aside your own will, good for you; he eats without tasting, drinks without getting drunk, sleeps without resting; though he lives in the world, he is above the world, and in the city he dwells as if in the wilderness. But enough of this.

198. We are in a contest on the arena: we must strive; otherwise, we will gain nothing

198. 1) We are in a contest on the arena: we must strive; otherwise, we will gain nothing. – 2) Do not slumber: see, one after another they are departing; hurry to prepare what is necessary for that life. – 3) You seek a great task: to be in communion with God; and you will find it. How? By remaining faithful to your vows. – 4) It was easy in the wilderness; now you have entered the city, and a trial lies ahead of you. Do not bring shame upon yourselves. – 5) I am telling you how you should conduct yourselves. [31, 34]

21. Knowing that a priceless reward awaits us—the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven and eternal life—let us not be negligent; let us not succumb to the slumber of laziness while we live in this age. The arena is open; the tracks are cleared and marked; the prizes are laid out, and the judges are in their places. “Step forward, wrestlers, to compete.” The diligent one, filled with zeal, prevails and is crowned. But the slothful one not only loses the crown but also destroys his priceless soul and, departing from this life with nothing, is sent to eternal torment.

22. Do you not see and take notice of how, day after day, one after another departs from here and, having served in this life, goes to their Lord—the old and the young, the king and the slave, the archbishop and the priest, the abbot and the novice? Whoever sought here finds there; whoever sent treasures ahead from here meets them there; whoever renounced all that is here receives an abundance there. — You have been given the grace to flee from the world and be alone with God.

23. Before you lies closeness to God and the most sincere service to Him in joy and gladness. Your task and your feat, however, is to remain faithful to your vow. Therefore, whatever rank you hold and whatever virtue you are cultivating, remain in them without yielding more and more, and offer your souls as temples to the Lord and Almighty God.

24. I conclude that God accepts you in your good disposition from the fact that you remain the same even after moving from the most silent places (among the mountains) to the noisy and crowded ones (in Constantinople), from the desert to the city. Indeed, virtue, when offered as a sacrifice to God, is honored everywhere like gold—and glory from it and for its sake ascends to God. It has ascended from here as well. “Some,” whether well-meaning or ill-intentioned, “said the very same thing: ‘Well, we’ll see if they remain true to their resolve.’” “But I hope that you will persevere and remain steadfast in it—and, while in the city, you will conduct yourselves as if in the desert, and amid the city’s clamor, preserve peace and serenity in your souls. And this is where your true test lies; and you will truly be worthy of admiration if you endure it.” St. Theologian says somewhere: What is so surprising about winter’s frost and the sun’s rays? They do this involuntarily. So it is with us: there is little praise in remaining silent in the desert or in preserving serenity in solitude. But it is another matter to live in the city as if in solitude and, amid the noisy crowd, to be as if in the desert. Thanks be to God, through the prayers of my father and your father, who keeps you unharmed and steadfast in your calling.

25. Your glory and praise lie within yourselves. — Since this is so, strive, when you go out on the monastery’s business, to carry it out with a reverent attitude, showing godliness in your gait, your bearing, your gaze, your demeanor, your speech, and in everything. Oh, my children, oh, I beg you. Do not allow anyone to speak ill of you. Many eyes are watching us, many mouths are speaking about us and against us. “Will they not say, ‘Where is their God?’” (Ps. 78:10) Where is their virtue? And who is guiding them there?—How shamelessly they behave, casting their eyes this way and that and bursting into laughter, as if they were some harlot?” Take care not to bring trouble upon the entire brotherhood; fear the immortal God! But speak every word as if the Lord Himself were hearing it, and do every deed as if you were performing it before His eyes, as He looks upon you. In this way, your state will be sufficient; and you yourselves, like stars, will be in the midst of the royal city.

199. The sayings point out monastic virtues and deeds, encouraging one to excel in them

199. The sayings highlight monastic virtues and deeds, encouraging one to excel in them. [31, 35] Abstinence is a monk’s greatest weapon: it is the gateway to every other virtue. But he who has attained obedience is a follower of Christ; the humble-minded are like angels; he who reveals everything to his spiritual father is as pure as the sun. Therefore, let no one be secretive, lest he become incurable. Seek, then, what is beneficial and what would incline you toward humility. Do not allow anything contrary to this. You know where we are and where we will move shortly, and what will become of us after we part from the body. Therefore, let us be attentive and sober-minded; may our mind always turn to God and contemplate there the eternal blessings and the blissful enjoyment of those who are deemed worthy of them, as well as the bitterness of the fate of those who have fallen into hell, where there are terrible and immeasurable torments. The Lord lives, and God be blessed—that we may not come to regret having taken up this holy monastic life, having renounced all worldly things and, as with a sword, cut off all that is carnal; for if we persevere in our good struggle, we shall rejoice and be glad for all eternity. This struggle consists of fasting, vigil, and courageous readiness for all that the ascetic life requires; to this I add—gracious endurance of all afflictions and slanders—insults, beatings, exile, and betrayal for the sake of God’s love. Strive, all of you—great and small, new and old—run the race well; always hasten willingly to vigils, to acts of obedience, and to work. May sloth, anger, impetuosity, envy, discord, suspicion, and all other passions be banished from you. Excel even more in mutual love for one another, “burning with zeal, serving the Lord: rejoicing in hope, enduring tribulations, abiding in prayer” (Rom. 12:11–12).

200. Having commended the brothers for their strict monastic life and pointed out the characteristics of martyrdom in it, he urges them to continue in this way, assuring them that in the future they will be counted among the martyrs

200. 1) After commending the brothers for their austere monastic life and pointing out the traits of martyrdom in it, he urges them to continue in this way, giving them hope that in the future they will be united with the martyrs. – 2) Assuring them that in the future, everything we voluntarily deprive ourselves of here, we will receive in its most perfect form, he encourages them to rejoice in all their privations and to hold fast to their path. – 3) Recalling mortality, he invites them to prepare for death; and asks them to pray for the deceased brother who had not cleansed his conscience of greed (since two silver coins were found in his cell)—and prescribes prostrations. [31, 36]

1. I thank you, my children, that, out of your warmest love for God, you are progressing day by day in pleasing the Lord, constantly being devout, showing goodwill, striving, practicing self-restraint, and being content with what is given, bread in moderation and a little wine, while at the same time not lagging behind others in taking up the labor of work, in not neglecting the rule, in rising early and coming to the assembly, in patiently standing until the end of the service—showing meekness, kindness, and uncomplainingness: for if anyone complains, it is a sin for him. Such are the feats of those leading the monastic life in the subjugation of their own will: in their martyrdom, instead of fire, cauldrons of pitch, arrows, claws, swords, and crosses, the aforementioned feats serve, as well as the following: insults, dishonor, a diet of dry bread, the exhaustion of the flesh through abstinence, self-denial, and endurance of scarcity in all things—in clothing, footwear, shelter, and everything else necessary for life. Since crowns await us for enduring afflictions and sufferings, let us courageously carry out our martyrdom in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, so that we may find ourselves there in the same rank as the holy martyrs, where, instead of the sorrows, deprivations, and lamentations of this life, we will be rewarded with: eternal life, inexpressible joy, and indescribable gladness.

2. We have no city here, because of our renunciation even of our homeland, but there we will be citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem; we should not call anyone “father” according to the flesh, but in that age we will find a Father in God; we are without inheritance on earth, but there we will be given an inheritance with Christ; we deny ourselves the comforts of the flesh—food, drink, and all other sensual pleasures—but you know that there you will enjoy what no eye has seen, what no ear has heard, and what no human heart has conceived. Therefore, rejoice, and as you contemplate these things, do not lose heart, do not grow complacent, and do not fear either present or future hardships, however much heavier they may be. — But what am I saying? Whether fire, the sword, or death—regarding all these as nothing—hold fast to your path.

3. With the passing of our brothers, you see that we are drawing nearer to death with every hour: yesterday one departed, another a few days before—and there is already someone else at the gates; and who will be next? “Perhaps I,” let everyone say—and begin to prepare. – I wish to share with you the sorrow in my soul over the passing of Brother Vasily, for he departed without having cleansed his conscience, since two pieces of silver were found on him. Alas! What blindness! What did the devil use to ensnare him? He considered two pieces of silver more valuable than the kingdom of heaven. More than once I told him that whether it be a rope, a needle, a pen, or anything else that someone takes and hides away, by this alone he fills the entire space with sin. You have certainly seen this yourself at in the writings of St. Cassian, who says that, according to St. Mark, a single sin fills the place of eleven (measuring the fullness of sinfulness by twelve). By regarding something as his own and possessing it, he has invested his soul and heart in it: for where the treasure is, there also is the soul. Where, then, is renunciation?—Let us pray for him, and for one week let us offer three prostrations for him each day and say thirty prayers, that the Lord may forgive him his transgression.

201. Having portrayed the brothers as perfect in all monastic practices, he adds: let us always be like this, each doing his own work in his own time

201. Having portrayed the brothers as perfect in all monastic practices, he adds: “Let us remain so forever, each doing his own work in his own time.” [3 1, 37] May God look with favor upon your planting, and may He Himself, who planted this true vineyard of yours, water you with the waters of the Holy Spirit, and bring you to the measure of perfection for every true fruitfulness. As for me, this task is beyond me; the very attempt at it is beyond my weakness. And “who am I, O Lord?” it is fitting for me to cry out, and “the house of my Father”—that You have so exalted me, wretched and unclean, unworthy even to be among the flock? – Yet He accepts me and is long-suffering toward me, seeking and awaiting my conversion and reformation. For who can stand before Him and make atonement for sin? Who can shepherd His flock in safety? Who is so close to God as to bring others to Him? – I am far from this, as far as the heavens are from the earth. – But I rejoice that you are walking in the right path, following God’s commandments, and, imitating one another in goodness, you are all together rising to perfection. Truly, God dwells within you, blessed and served by you, and the Holy Spirit rests upon your assembly. Your singing is the singing of the angels, your psalm-singing is the singing of incorporeal beings, and all your conduct is truly heavenly, in which there is not even a shadow of flesh and blood, nor self-willed desire, nor concern for the perishing, nor vain worry, nor consolation for the outcast, nor anything alluring, nor anyone being allured; but all is filled with silence and peace; you have but one desire, one will, one soul and heart, one course, one aspiration—to attain God; one life—truly, you are a brotherhood called by God, angel-like, which, though existing in the flesh, is above the flesh, and though existing in the world, is outside the world, through dispassion. You have attained a sound balance and, walking the royal middle path, avoid the rapids on either side. Your deeds and your self-restraint, your sleep and wakefulness, your silence and speech, your labor and rest, your prayers and supplications are pleasing to God. If at times we act a little more moderately and leniently toward our own weakness, we soon return to strictness; if the present moment disturbs us a little, the next one will set everything right again: Matins begins, then the Liturgy, the reading of a saint’s life, the sermon, and those who have strayed somewhat from the order return to their proper place. And we are a help to one another, a protection for one another; and there is no place for the devil among us, with God’s help and the prayers of our father. Come, then, let each of us take up our own ministry; let no one perform the Lord’s work carelessly, fearing the punishment pronounced upon the negligent and the complainers. Let everyone act, observing the proper time for each task. When it is time to work, work; and when it is time to rest, rest; when it is time to sleep, sleep; when it is time to pray, pray with purity, weep, and shed tears, for we are called to weep; when it is time to eat, partake of the food offered with gratitude; when it is time to speak, speak wisely: for there is a time for everything, according to the word of God. He who spends his days in this way walks the path well. May the Lord our God establish, strengthen, and sustain you in such deeds and dispositions, to the glory of His Holy Name.

202. By renouncing your own will, offer yourselves as a sacrifice to God: be always like this in everything, and God's mercy will be with you

202. 1) By renouncing your own will, offer yourselves as a sacrifice to God: be always like this in everything, and God's mercy will surely be with you. – 2) Just do everything purely, humbly, and in a proper manner. – 3) Grow rich in virtues, each according to his or her own gift: for not everything is given to everyone, but we all partake of the fruits of everything, because we are all one body. [31, 38]

4. I pray that you may obtain the blessings you hope for, and that through your obedience you may be a fruitful and pleasing sacrifice to God; for by mortifying your own will, you constantly offer yourselves as a sacrifice and present it on the spiritual altar as a fragrant offering to the Lord God. Why do I burn with divine zeal? May your offering and service be blameless, unblemished, and not deprived of God's gracious favor. – This will come to pass if you remain zealous, patient, and steadfast in prayer, humility, contrition, godliness, self-control, and in the struggle against adversaries and overcoming them. – I therefore implore you: be such, and endure; run and walk in the paths of virtue; fight and conquer—and you will receive heavenly crowns.

5. Do not run in vain or labor in vain, but take care not to stumble, and do not let even small lapses of negligence or minor slips cause you to cast down your hope from on high, and ultimately ruin the spiritual house of your virtues. Therefore, as you are pure, do everything purely for the pure Lord; humbly offer everything to the Lord, who opposes the proud; consecrate everything that is innocent and blameless to Christ the Bridegroom. “Let your speech always be with grace, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how you ought to answer each person” (Col. 4:6); may your character be adorned with kindness, so that it may be a blessing to those who approach you; may your movements, your conduct, and your conversation—as if guided by God—be edifying to those who see you. I wish that all of you would be, not like me—for I am impure and unwise—but like our holy fathers: like Akakios, like Dositheos, like Abba Kyr, like Antiochus, like Petronius, and then, like Euthymius and Savvas—I will add—and like Anthony the Great.

6. Therefore, enrich yourselves with virtues; fill your treasury with tears, contrition, long-suffering, toil, and sorrow, according to the grace given to you; for one person has one thing, another has another—by nature and by God's gift. And if you excel in one area but fall short of your neighbor in another, do not grieve or envy: “For to each one God has apportioned a measure of faith,” and so it is. Moreover, no one is deprived of anything: for you are all one body, though many in number, and your virtues pass from one to another and back again, by the boundless goodness of God, Who regards each of us as all, and all as each.

203. I praise you for leaving everything behind and willingly walking the narrow path

203. 1) I commend you for leaving everything behind and willingly walking the narrow path. – 2) Rejoice in this; for the reward is great. – 3) Knowing this, take courage to humbly endure whatever comes your way, in accordance with the rules of our way of life. [31, 39]

7. I praise you before God and men for your faithfulness to our rules and your patient following in the footsteps of our ancient fathers. By the power of God and the intercession of our Father's prayers, you have been able to embrace the best life, and, gathered as one, you live a life set apart from everyone and everything, having renounced flesh and blood and been born from above by God. – Thus, though you still live, you have died in spirit; and though you still dwell in the flesh, you strive for what is above the flesh. Love for your parents has not held you back and does not hold you back; home and homeland no longer concern you, and the words of the Apostle are fulfilled in you: “Our citizenship is in heaven” (Phil. 3:20). Furthermore, you endure sorrows, suffer afflictions day and night, fast, keep vigils, keep yourselves pure, mortify the flesh, and struggle to subdue your desires. This is the narrow path that leads to life, which few walk, while very many rush along the broad and spacious path that leads to destruction.

8. Rejoice, then, rejoice and be glad, for a great reward is stored up for you in heaven. Therefore, if by persevering in obedience to the end you attain the ineffable light, what could be more desirable than this? If you are deemed worthy to dwell with the angels, what could be more blessed than this? If you become inhabitants of paradise, where there is incorruptibility and an abundance of eternal blessings, where water flows into an endless life—what could be more wondrous and marvelous than this? If, together with all the righteous, you appear shining like the sun, as co-heirs of Christ—what could be more magnificent than this?

If, at the gathering of all creation before the awesome throne of Christ our God, when He comes openly in glory with countless hosts of angels, and when some hear: “Come, you who are blessed,” and others: “Depart, you who are cursed,” and you are found among the former—what could compare to your joy and astonished rapture at that moment?

9. For this reason, I appeal to you: let us bear all present afflictions with courage; let us bravely resist the battles of the flesh and quench the fire of lust when it flares up in our members; let us patiently endure the labors of vigil, fasting, obedience, and manual work; let us willingly subdue our own wills and humbly bear the insults of our brothers; let us reverently stand firm in the church gatherings of psalm-singing and prayer; let us be content with simple clothing and footwear; let us not love human glory; let us quell anger, drive away despondency and sloth, restrain the impulses of the soul, and silence our talkative tongues, training them to speak only what is necessary and useful—and do all else as befits one in the presence of the all-seeing God. – Above all this, may the Lord our God, who is strong and mighty, and wonderful in His saints, through the prayers of our father, grant us one soul and one heart, preserving us unblemished before Him by the one Spirit.

204. Avoid everything that might stir up impure desire, and endure all that is unpleasant: for this the reward is great

204. 1) Avoid everything that might stir up impure desire, and endure all that is unpleasant: for the reward is great. – 2) How much do laypeople endure while serving vanity? We, however, serve God for the sake of the kingdom: how then can we fail to endure everything that befalls us on this path? [32, 1]

10. I would like to see each of you personally and, if possible, speak with each of you, anxious as I am for your salvation. But since the present persecution does not allow me to do so, I ask all of you in writing—both those who are still here and especially those who are scattered—to watch yourselves more carefully, allowing yourselves nothing except what is commanded, especially insolence in your relationships with one another; do not speak at length with children, and even less so with women; but if it becomes necessary to see them or speak with them, do so with the utmost caution: keep your mind humble, your eyes downcast. For Scripture says: “Do not gaze upon virgins; do not mingle with singers” (Sir. 9:5, 4). But since you are aware that God is present and observes your every movement and action—both physical and spiritual—conduct yourselves accordingly wherever you may go, bearing all the hardships of persecution with gratitude, in anticipation of the reward reserved for you because of your patience. “For God is not ungrateful; He will not forget your work and the labor of love you have shown for His name’s sake” (Heb. 6:10), from the very first day of your renunciation, when you left the world and all that is worldly—parents, children, and brothers, kin and homeland—and subjected even your own body to the burden of obedience. – How great is your calling! And how much greater still is the reward that awaits you!

11. Do you not see those living in the world, how they are crushed and suffer: some, engaged in agriculture and subject to public taxes and demands, so that they themselves have barely enough to live on; others, entering military service on land or at sea, where they attack and are attacked, strike and are struck. We, however, being free from all this, are deemed worthy to serve the One living and true God. Is this not enough for us as a source of comfort, thanksgiving, and joy?—For if we live attentively, doing everything properly and in order, abstaining from carnal desires that wage war against the soul, immediately repelling their assaults, and preserving the purity of the soul, then we will undoubtedly be deemed worthy of eternal blessings.

205. During Meatfare Week, we must not give in to intemperance, but rather delve deeply into the Gospel we read and, in accordance with it, resolve to live more holy lives, so that we may inherit the kingdom of heaven

205. During Meatfare Week, one must not give in to intemperance, but rather delve deeply into the Gospel that is read, and accordingly resolve to live more holy a life, so that we may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven. [32, 2] It is a common practice among believers that, on this day (Meatfare Sunday), worldly people begin their fast from meat. But what do we see? We see that they now indulge in unrestrained meat-eating and wine-drinking, along with various games and entertainments that are not “fit to be seen or spoken of.” They ought to partake in moderation of what is offered with thanksgiving to the Lord, preparing for the stricter abstinence in all things that lies ahead; but they, obeying the devil’s promptings, do the exact opposite. – I will tell you, however, that we monks should not even entertain the thought of going there, nor desire what they covet—for such desires are not worthy of us but deserve every condemnation and abhorrence. – On the contrary, let us devote ourselves all the more to attention and reflection on the Gospel now being read, concerning the great and dreadful day of the Second Coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, when He, as the most righteous Judge, will place the sheep at His right hand and the goats at His left; and to those on His right He will proclaim that blessed and longed-for call: “Come, you who are blessed by my Father; inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world”; but to those on the left He will pronounce that bitter and devastating judgment: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:34, 41). Reflecting on this judgment—which fills us with fear, trembling, and dread—it is incumbent upon both us and them to fall down in tears and implore the merciful God, before the hour comes to experience what we have heard in reality. – Why, while those people go about their days as they please, should we—having come to our senses through the Gospel sermons we have heard—resolve in our hearts, with great fear and trembling, to serve our Lord, driving every evil out of our souls and replacing it with a disposition of a wealth of generosity, kindness, humility, gentleness, patience, and every other good and praiseworthy quality—so that, having lived in a manner worthy of the Gospel of Christ, we may be deemed worthy to inherit the kingdom of heaven, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

206. Although we are always in a state of fasting, let each one nevertheless set aside something for the coming fast as well

206. Although we are always in a state of fasting, let each one add something to it, even as the coming fast approaches. Above all, take up the shield of faith and the helmet of salvation. [32:3] Let us not put off our repentance from day to day, as the enemy teaches us: “Do not know what the coming day will bring” (Prov. 3:28).—The most longed-for days of Holy Lent are already at the door, bringing with them the gift of fasting.—Our Lord fasted for this very length of time, defeating the tempter who tried Him with this weapon. We, however, are not like that; but we spend all the days of our lives in fasting: for we have no sumptuous meat dishes; we do not rush to drink wine in the morning; we do not seek out where feasts are held; we do not sleep on beds of ivory; we do not eat kid goats still being weaned; we do not drink sparkling wines—all of which the eloquent Isaiah attributes to those who are wise in the eyes of the world. All such things are far removed from the devout, and even more so from our honest communal monastic life. We have only a few simple dishes, and there is nothing else that irritates the soul to the point of madness: just bread, and that in moderation, and some vegetable dishes, and even those in small quantities. Therefore, the Most Holy Lent does not daunt us, since its diet is almost identical to that of our other days. Nevertheless, let each of us add a little something to one or another of our Lenten virtues: in devotion, solitude with needlework; in obedience, unflappability; in silence, meekness; in psalm-singing, quiet harmony. Let one devote himself to work with great zeal; let another adorn his silence with timely action; let yet another be a source of joy and comfort to sorrowful brothers: for great is the praise due to the one who speaks if he soothes a brother’s heartache; let another still multiply his bows, or his service, or his necessary arrangements; and in general, let no one be idle or without work. Even if someone contributes only a little, it will be pleasing to God if it is done with zeal, as the widow’s two mites demonstrated; strive also in vigil, in singing, and in every act of piety. Above all these things, take up the shield of faith, so that you may be able to stand firm against the schemes of the devil and extinguish all the fiery arrows of the evil one—and cover your head with the helmet of salvation, being established in Christ Jesus our Lord.

207. One person observes one thing, another another, according to the rule; but let this be common to all: do nothing of your own will, and be mindful not to allow the enemy to enter your mind through your thoughts, so that you may prosper unhindered in every good work

207. One practices one thing, another another, according to the rule; but let this be common to all: to do nothing of one’s own will, and to be vigilant so as not to allow the enemy to enter through one’s thoughts, and to prosper unhindered in every good deed. [32, 4] Our gracious God, who gives us life and guides us year after year along the path of this life, has led us, out of His love for humanity, into this present season of fasting, during which each of the zealous, as has been said, multiplies his spiritual struggles according to his own will: the one who is zealous for abstinence fasts for two or three days; those zealous for vigil spend so much and so much time in vigil; those practicing prostration now perform them in greater numbers; others do the same with other ascetic practices; and, to put it simply, great zeal and diligence in ascetic deeds can be seen in everyone during these days. But the true monastic, who always acts in accordance with the law of obedience—not just at certain times, but always—maintains the same pattern of ascetic practice. What is this? It is not to walk according to one's own will, but to be guided in one's actions by the direction of one's spiritual father: this is the highest of all devotions practiced with zeal, and it brings with it the martyr's crown. This is what the zealous do. Moreover, who does not know that for this fast, according to ancient tradition, the rule prescribes for all a change in meals, an increase in prostrations, and an intensification of psalm-singing? Therefore, I beg you, let us joyfully accept the gift of fasting, and let us observe it not with a frown but with a cheerful countenance—without malice, without judgment, without anger, without deceit, without envy, and above all in peace and love toward one another, in meekness, in obedience, and in the multiplication of mercy and good fruits. Above all, let us keep a watchful eye on the movements of our thoughts, so as not to open the door to passions and not to let the devil in, as Scripture teaches, saying: “If the spirit of the ruler rises up against you, do not leave your place” (Eccl. 10:4): for the enemy has the power to plant thoughts, but he has no power to enter. We are our own masters; if we do not open the door, he will not enter. Let us therefore guard our soul, as the bride of Christ, and preserve it unharmed by the arrows of thoughts; for through this we may become a dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, and be deemed worthy to hear: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5: 8). And in general, “Whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is commendable—if there is any excellence and if there is anything worthy of praise,”—I speak with the words of the Apostle—“think about these things and do them, and the God of peace will be with you” (Phil. 4:8–9).

208. Lenten practices are made easier by habit, with patience and perseverance; but above all by godly contemplation, through which the objects of such contemplation are revealed

208. Lenten practices are made easier by habit, with patience and perseverance; but above all by godly contemplation, through which the objects of such practices are revealed. [32, 5] Just as every beginning is difficult, so too the beginning of fasting—due to changes in diet and in the objects of our activity—encounters a certain discomfort and difficulty; but through patience and perseverance in maintaining it, they are made easier and more bearable, as it is written: “No discipline (training) seems pleasant at the time, but painful; yet afterward it yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it” (Heb. 12:11). Therefore, having been deemed worthy to observe a week of fasting—and having already gained some experience in it—we must be all the more zealous in continuing it, knowing that this zeal strengthens both soul and body, whereas, on the contrary, laziness makes what is light become heavy and what is easy become difficult. However, let us not overexert ourselves in our efforts, so that we may successfully preserve both spiritual well-being and physical health. For what good is it to start off quickly only to weaken completely and come to a halt? It is better to exert ourselves with prudence and moderation, keeping in mind the distance to the finish line. Since a full day of exertion in labor and concentration usually gives rise to a need for some respite; let us (both during and at the end of our work) nourish the soul with godly thoughts and spiritual contemplation, meditating not on worldly and vain things—which are troubling and bitter—but on heavenly things, which are sweet and joyful. “I remembered,” as it is sung in the Psalm, “God, and I rejoiced” (Ps. 76:4). For our minds are directed toward God, toward heavenly contemplations, toward the beauties of paradise, toward eternal dwellings, toward the assemblies of the angels, and toward our migration there—to the place where the souls of the righteous and the sinful now dwell—when the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ takes place, when, according to the word of God, the heavens will pass away, the elements will be dissolved, and the earth and all that is on it will be burned up—how the soul will receive its body again—what that gathering of people will be like, from Adam to the end of the age; what the face of Christ the Lord will be like, shining brighter than the sun, glorious and awe-inspiring;—what voice of His we will hear—and finally, what the final judgment will be, calling the righteous into the kingdom of heaven and sending the sinners to eternal torment.—This is what we ought to ponder and be concerned about, and on what we should turn our minds, as those who are outside the world and have nothing in common with those who live according to the flesh—and from these reflections to come to contrition and tears, and to be enlightened, learning to lead our life here peacefully and serenely, in the hope of being deemed worthy of the future eternal blessings.

209. First and foremost, we must give thanks to God—for our very existence, for our adoption as children of God through Holy Baptism, for monastic life, and for our witness before the iconoclasts

209. 1) First and foremost, we must give thanks to God—for our very existence, for our adoption as children of God through Holy Baptism, for monastic life, and for our witness before the iconoclasts. – 2) And for the faith, from which all things come, and which manifests itself in varying degrees but is accessible to all, despite poverty and ignorance. [32, 6]

12. God has shown us many virtues that aid us in our salvation; one of the foremost among them is gratitude. The Apostle Paul says: “First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for all of you, because your faith is proclaimed throughout the world” (Rom. 1:8). And everywhere he is seen giving thanks to God for everything. But just as he himself gave thanks for everything, so he commanded everyone: “Give thanks in all circumstances”; and lest anyone think that this was merely his own good advice, he added: “For this is the will of God in Christ Jesus” (1 Thess. 5:18). It is also said in The Ladder that thanksgiving must precede everything in prayer: “First of all,” he says, “let us inscribe sincere thanksgiving to God on the scroll of our prayer.” Having stated what must follow this in prayer, St. John Climacus concludes: “This form of prayer was shown to one of the brothers by the Angel of the Lord” (Ladder 28, ch. 7). Let us therefore give thanks to God, first of all for bringing us from non-existence into existence, “having created us for good works, which He prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them” (Eph. 2: 10). Let us give thanks to Him for bringing us into adoption as sons through Holy Baptism, as the Gospel says: “But to all who did receive Him, He gave the right to become children of God—to those who believe in His name—who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of a man, but of God” (John 1:12–13). Let us also give thanks that He has granted us entry into the most perfect monastic life, having foretold it in His word to a certain young man: “If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor; and come, follow Me, taking up your cross” (Matt. 19: 21; Mark 10: 21). Let us also give thanks that He has led us into the coming martyrdom (in connection with the iconoclastic controversy), preventing us from being deceived and falling into heretical error: for we knew and confessed that the only-begotten Son of God, having taken on flesh, is depicted according to the flesh, has a form, and in this form receives worship. How many people are outside the Gospel, in error and unbelief? How many others, even among those who accept the Gospel, are there who have gone astray in the faith and suffered ruin, just like the iconoclasts, who do not confess that Christ is depicted in the flesh and has a form, and that His form is to be worshiped, and thereby deprive themselves of the salvation of His incarnate economy? – Reflecting on this, we have reason to thank the Lord from the heart, to come before Him in gratitude and contrition, to shed tears in contrition, to be enlightened through our tears, and to prosper in the work of our salvation through this enlightenment.

13. Let us give thanks to God for faith, and for the measure of faith that we possess. For faith is one in and of itself, but, depending on the extent to which we embrace it, it is sometimes great and sometimes small. Thus the Lord says to Peter: “You of little faith, why did you doubt?” (Matt. 14:31). Elsewhere: “O woman, great is your faith; let it be done for you as you wish” (Matt. 15:28). And again: “I have not found such great faith even in Israel” (Matt. 8:10). Thus, faith is sometimes great and sometimes small. But let no one say, “I am a simple person; how can I possibly comprehend faith?” The All-Good God extends the rays of His goodness to all. – What does the Apostle say? “Consider your calling, brothers: not many are wise by human standards, not many are powerful, not many are of noble birth; but God has chosen the foolish things of the world to put the wise to shame; and God has chosen the weak things of the world to put the strong to shame; and God has chosen the lowly things of the world and the despised, and the things that are not, to bring to nothing the things that are” (1 Cor. 1: 27, 28). Do you not see how these words apply to you as well? Do you not remember our blessed brother Thaddeus, to say nothing of others? Was he not a Scythian? Did he not serve as a slave to men? And did he not enter the monastic life only after being freed from slavery? – And yet, how did he prove himself both in his past and present witness? – Since he embraced his faith and was embraced by it, and having embraced it as he ought, proved himself a perfect man, he was deemed worthy to be adorned with the crown of martyrdom, passing from this life to the next three days after his suffering. – Let us be the same; let us not use our ignorance as an excuse, but let us seek to know and increase our faith. And this will be so if a good life accompanies our faith. For faith, accompanied by love, brings about our salvation. Both of them bring about the salvation of the soul; neither faith alone nor love alone saves, but both together, when observed and combined. May we, too, be so disposed that we may attain to the fullness of manhood, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, and be made worthy, together with all the saints, of the promised eternal blessings.

210. Let the following serve as inspiration to bear the burden of fasting: its benefits—while maintaining, however, a peaceful and loving disposition; and the great promises for those who endure its hardships

210. Let the following serve as inspiration to bear the burden of fasting: its beneficial effects—while maintaining, however, a peaceful and loving disposition; and the great promises for those who undertake its labors. [32, 7] Fasting is good if, while observing it, one maintains a peaceful, gentle, benevolent, obedient, humble, compassionate state of mind, and every other good disposition. But the devil devises every possible means to instill in those who fast the opposite of this, to make them insolent, angry, fierce, and arrogant, and to ensure that fasting brings them more harm than good... But we, “not understanding his schemes” (2 Cor. 2:11), will conduct ourselves peacefully, quietly, meekly, and in good order, “bearing with one another in love” (Eph. 4:2), knowing that this is pleasing to God. But if you lack such dispositions, then even if you were to bend your back like a bow, clothe yourself in sackcloth, and sprinkle ashes on your head, you would not be pleasing to Him. Fasting certainly afflicts and withers the body; but it expands and nourishes the soul; “Therefore we do not lose heart; even though our outer self is wasting away, our inner self is being renewed day by day. For our light and momentary affliction is producing for us an eternal weight of glory far beyond all comparison” (2 Cor. 4:16–17): so that, looking forward to the reward, we may cheerfully endure the hardships of virtue, “giving thanks to God the Father, who has called us to share in the inheritance of the saints in the light: who has delivered us from the dominion of darkness and transferred us into the kingdom of the Son of His love” (Col. 1: 12–13). – Do we not frequently partake of His most pure Body and Blood? And what could be more pleasing and sweet than this, when in it lies eternal life for those who partake with a clear conscience? Do we not converse daily with the divine David and with the other holy fathers through listening to the readings; and what could be more comforting to the soul than this? Have we not severed all ties with the world and with our kinsmen according to the flesh; and what, again, could be more blessed and exalted than this? “For our citizenship is in heaven, and from there we also await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will transform our lowly body to be like His glorious body, by the power that enables Him to subject all things to Himself” (Phil. 3:20–21). Therefore, let us rejoice and be glad, despising every carnal pleasure: “For all flesh is like grass, and all the glory of man like the flower of grass; the grass withers and its flower falls away, but the work of virtue endures forever.” “Is anyone among you suffering? Let him pray,” as the brother of God says: “Is anyone in good spirits? Let him sing” (James 5:13). Is anyone tempted by an evil passion?—(since the tempter never ceases to tempt us)—let him endure, obeying the one who says: “Blessed is the man who endures temptation, for when he has been tested, he will receive the crown of life, which God has promised to those who love Him” (James 1:12). “If you know these things, you are blessed if you do them” (John 13:17).

211. An Exhortation on Peace and Harmony; on ardent love for God; on zealous labor in working out one’s salvation; and, in general, on the proper monastic life

211. An Exhortation on Peace and Harmony; on ardent love for God; on zealous labor in working toward salvation; and, in general, on the proper monastic life. [32, 8] I rejoice over you, that you walk in unity of mind, live in peace, and patiently endure the season of fasting. This is for your salvation and for the strengthening of your hope. How great a blessing is peace and unity of mind in brotherhood?—By removing the evils of disorder and fickleness, contradiction and condemnation, disobedience and pride, and every other form of deceit, they first bring benefit to themselves, and then to others, setting an example of virtue for them, and thereby gaining even more: for just as those who cause stumbling inherit “woe,” so those who inspire virtue inherit blessing. And may we never stray from such a good disposition and such praiseworthy conduct, or cease to love God. For it is written: “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength, and with all your mind” (Luke 10:27). One who loves in this way knows neither satiety, nor weariness, nor exhaustion; but rather adds fire to fire, stokes zeal with zeal, setting in his heart an ascent from virtue to virtue, and passing from spiritual strength to spiritual strength—and this unceasingly. Do you not see those who labor in the flesh, how they toil for what is fleeting and perishable? Do you not see here before your very eyes those building ships, how they spend entire days on this, allowing themselves not even a moment’s rest? For what reason? To earn a little money and provide for their families what is needed to satisfy their needs. But what of us, who seek to be enriched by what is divine, to attain the kingdom of heaven, to enjoy eternal blessings, and to avoid eternal torment—do we not long to undertake all this with readiness and zeal, willingly sacrificing even our blood, if it were necessary to shed it for the Lord? Therefore, my brothers, let us stand firm, “rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, faithful in prayer,” attending to our spiritual exercises—psalm-singing, recitation of verses, and readings—keeping our minds from wandering after vain things through such activities: for idleness is the mother of evil, and work is the guardian of the mind. Let us not allow ourselves to stray from our good disposition, preferring obedience, order, the peace of our neighbor, and everything else that contributes to our salvation, praying always for our brothers who are here and those scattered in various places: for my heart aches for them as well, not seeing with my own eyes how each of them is being saved.

212. I deliver sermons as my duty; but for them to bear fruit, help me through your progress in response to the sermons

212. I preach sermons out of duty; but so that they may bear fruit, help me through your progress, aided by the sermons. — Your progress is mine as well: for we are one. — You have demonstrated this through your confession before the iconoclasts and by enduring their torments. Do not, then, bring shame upon this virtue of yours. [32, 9] One thing is needed to sustain you in the flesh, and another to sustain you in the spirit: the former is provided by the steward and consists of food, drink, and clothing, while the latter is provided by me, in humility, and consists of the word and teaching. And just as that is provided not of my own volition, so this is fulfilled out of duty: so I am doing nothing great by giving you these brief and meager teachings; on the contrary, I fear and tremble, for I must give an account of your souls—not to a king, a governor, or a magistrate, but to the Judge of all and to God, before whom every knee in heaven, on earth, and in the underworld will bow, and every tongue will confess. But please help both yourselves and me, as brothers who love one another: help yourselves by excelling in every virtue, and help me through your prayers. After all, your success is my success, and vice versa: for “we are all one body, and each member belongs to the whole” (1 Cor. 12:27); and “if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; and if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. 12:26). And just as I care for yours, so you ought to care for mine: for I am in you, and you are in me, by virtue of our mutual love. Such is the law of true brotherhood. Maintain your good obedience toward me—not a false or insincere one—in which you were born into this new life, grew up, were perfected, and attained maturity, by the grace of Christ in accordance with the measure of your confession of Him. (—This is in connection with iconoclasm.) You did not fear kings, you were not intimidated by rulers, you did not shrink from suffering, wounds, exile, prisons, or death, and through this you have become renowned, as is known to all. Do not, then, betray your virtue, do not bring shame upon your praise, and let your good name not be turned into a bad reputation, but build upon your previous praise with further praise, always guarding yourselves both within and without, and protecting yourselves by keeping the commandments, overcoming every temptation, and enduring every sorrow patiently. Know also that we are still in the midst of struggle and persecution, and we do not know what the coming day will bring. However, “if God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all—how will He not also graciously give us all things with Him?” (Rom. 8:31–32). So hope, and be confident; and by living in this hope and this confidence, I assure you, you will receive an inheritance and a share with all the saints.

213. Death is near: we must prepare. How? By doing everything for the glory of God

213. Death is near: we must prepare. How? By doing everything for the glory of God; by being of one mind and showing mutual respect; by guarding our emotions; by restraining our thoughts; by zealously pursuing all that is good, in the hope of dispassion. [32, 10] Day by day our life grows shorter, and we draw nearer to death. We are about to depart from this world and join our brothers and fathers; therefore, great sobriety, attentiveness, and heartfelt preparation are required of us. We hear the biblical account of the Flood, and how the Lord applies what happened then to the circumstances of His second coming, saying: “Just as in the days of Noah people were eating, drinking, marrying, selling, buying—and suddenly the Flood came—so it will be at the coming of the Son of Man” (Matt. 24, 37–39; Luke 17:26–28). We marvel at how indifferent and carefree the people of that time were toward the approaching flood, rather than being filled with fear and trembling. But let us take a closer look: are we not ourselves in the same state of carelessness that we condemn in them? We are not building an ark that took a hundred years to construct; yet every day we see a tomb being filled, into which we too will be laid; almost every day death snatches away one of our brothers, and he departs. But what happens to us now is far more terrifying than what happened then (during the Flood). That is why we must be vigilant. And I am not saying: do not eat, do not drink, do not clothe yourselves—that is not what I am saying, but “whether you eat or drink or whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God; so that you may be blameless before Jews and Greeks and the Church of God,” as the Apostle teaches (1 Cor. 10:31–32). Come now, brothers and sisters—I urge and implore you, “make my joy complete,” as the blessed Paul says again, “be of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind; do nothing out of rivalry or conceit, but in humility honor one another above yourselves” (Phil. 2: 2, 3). Let us guard our senses—sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch—through which death enters; let us rein in the mind so that it does not wander where it ought not to, does not dwell on what is inappropriate, does not conjure up evil images within itself, and does not give rise to sinful desires from which there is neither benefit nor pleasure. On the contrary, let us be all the more earnest and contrite, keeping one thing in mind and finding comfort and pleasure in it alone, so that we may purify our souls and excel in dispassion. Let us not lose heart, having the hope of tasting dispassion and the joy of attaining it; but let us hasten, pursuing it with all our strength and without ceasing; for zeal corrects and makes up for what is lacking, and God is its helper. “The Lord is near to those who call upon Him, and the soul that seeks Him will find Him.”—Living in this way, we will undoubtedly attain the kingdom of heaven.

214. As you remember God, remember death as well

214. As you remember God, remember death as well. – Do not become attached to this life, nor to anything that is valued in it. This is especially required of us who have renounced the world. [32, 11] This teaching is beneficial, like a saving reminder that disposes us to remain sober and vigilant as we perform the duties required of us, and never to cease doing so, nor to stray from thoughts of God, nor from loving Him, nor from the memory of our separation from the body. For very soon we will be separated from it and die, like all our forefathers, and pass into another world, entering into another life that has no end. This earthly life is like a shadow and a dream, and is limited to a few years. I do not mean the time from the creation of the world until the end of the age, but the life of each person, which nowadays rarely even reaches David’s limit, and even more rarely goes beyond that limit, as something extraordinary: All the saints meditated on this throughout their lives. “They died in faith,” as the Apostle testifies, “without having received the promises, but having seen them from afar, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and sojourners on the earth. For those who speak thus make it clear that they are seeking a homeland. And if they had been thinking of that country from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return; but now they desire a better one, that is, a heavenly one. Therefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He has prepared a city for them” (Heb. 11:13–16). Behold, this is our city! Behold our homeland! In it are our fathers and brothers, both in the flesh and in the Spirit. Why, then, do we still consider this temporary life here worthy of reverence? Why do we cling to its customs? Why do we find the departure from it undesirable?—It is foolish not to desire a return from a foreign land to one’s own, or to turn from war to peace. But we, beloved brothers, as wise people—having renounced the world and all that is in the world, and having fled from them—will keep the thought of death in our minds throughout our lives, and with this thought we will ward off every desire, every sloth, every laxity, every despondency, every evil, so that, by acting in this way to the Lord’s pleasure, we may become heirs to heavenly blessings.

215. The Lord has given us peace, obliging us to live in peace with everyone outwardly, and inwardly to be at peace within ourselves, free from passions and pangs of conscience

215. The Lord has given us peace, which obliges us to live in peace with everyone outwardly, and inwardly to find peace within ourselves from passions and pangs of conscience. [32 12] Sunday is a day of peace; for on that day, having defeated the enemy, the Lord said to His disciples, “Peace be with you!” (John 20:20). Having said this, He did not give peace as an inheritance only to them, nor for just one day; but He proclaims the same peace to everyone always, just as He does to us who are humble. Let us therefore have peace and live in peace within ourselves. — As for our outward nature, let us not allow ourselves to harbor ill will toward any of our brothers, but let us be loving in all things; for the Lord says: “By this all will know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another” (John 13:35); as for the inner person, let us preserve peace and tranquility from destructive passions. Then we too can say with the Apostle: "We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Through Him we have also obtained access by faith into this grace in which we stand, and we rejoice in the hope of the glory of God" (Rom. 5: 1:2). Since, however, we are of a changeable nature, we are sometimes subject to calamitous and sorrowful fluctuations and disturbances. Then we will immediately hasten to return to our former state, having peace with God: "For He is our peace, who has made the two one and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility, having abolished in His flesh the law of commandments expressed in ordinances, that He might create in Himself one new man in place of the two, thus making peace, and might reconcile both to God in one body through the cross, thereby putting to death the hostility on it" (Eph. 2: 14–15). So says the Apostle. And this is the work that the Lord accomplished, as He says to His Father: "I have finished the work You gave Me to do" (John 17: 4). That is, I have reconciled the earthly and the heavenly—making us, too, sons of peace and love. If anyone were to ask, "How can this be? Are we not in constant warfare?" as the Apostle says: "For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 5:12). To such a person we must say that these words point to the nature and extent of the battle, not to the fact that we are waging it; for he himself says elsewhere: "The weapons of our warfare are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down arguments and every lofty thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and being ready to avenge every disobedience" (2 Cor. 10:4–5). In this same frame of mind, he has clearly subdued strife and brings about peace.

216. One must listen to teachings and, having believed them, carry out what they inspire

216. We must listen to the teachings, and, having believed them, carry out what they inspire. [32:13] I now present to you, as is my duty, a brief and meager measure of the word—though not to be delayed—so that I may not be condemned for my silence, and you may not be deprived of any edification. For although you are mostly edified through reading the Holy Fathers, you nevertheless have a need for my humble teaching—I dare even say that you have a greater need for it than for theirs: for there are general discussions, whereas here something is said that pertains directly to the individual, something that convicts and corrects. "I will rebuke you," He says, "and set your sins before your face" (Ps. 49:21). And the Lord: "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not have had sin; but now they have no excuse for their sin" (John 15:22) May it not be that this could apply to you as well: for I speak to you not as to the disobedient and those guilty of sin, but as to sons of obedience, as to beloved children, as to like-minded fellow workers and fellow combatants—may you be of good cheer, may you prosper, "that you may be pure and blameless on the day of Christ, filled with the fruit of righteousness through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God" (Phil. 1: 10–11). And my word is for you. I trust that He who of old brought water from the rock for Israel will also bring forth a brief word from my stony heart, by which, as we are watered, we may give thanks to the Lord who nourishes, quenches, and guides our lives in this present sojourn, as in the wilderness. But since this ancient story has come to mind, let us pause for a moment to consider what happened then to the disobedient, of whom the Apostle says: "But God was not pleased with most of them; for they were struck down in the wilderness. Now these things happened as examples for us, so that we might not desire evil things, just as they did. Do not become idolaters, as some of them did; for it is written: 'The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play.' Nor commit sexual immorality, as some of them did, and twenty-three thousand fell in a single day. Nor should we test Christ, as some of them did, and were destroyed by serpents. Nor should we grumble, as some of them did, and were destroyed by the Destroyer" (1 Cor. 10:5–10). Reflecting on this, brothers, let us flee from the causes of God's wrath; let us flee from evil desires; let us flee from grumbling; let us be careful not to tempt Christ.—"But how can we tempt Him?"—By falling into thoughts of unbelief and saying: "Will we have enough for our needs?"—"Will we withstand the enemy's attack?" Will we endure this or that?"—No, my brothers, no. These are words of unbelief and doubt, to which we must give no place. For by believing with firm faith, we can endure all things. Thus Noah believed and escaped the destruction of the flood; thus Abraham became the father of many nations; so Moses crossed the Red Sea as if on dry land; so the three youths and the prophet Daniel remained unharmed; and, in a word, so all the saints were vindicated. So too, by believing, we will endure everything and triumph with Christ, and we will be deemed worthy of the crowns of righteousness.

217. Having been freed from the bonds of worldly, secular, and sinful life, let us not allow ourselves to return to them

217. 1) Having been freed from the bonds of worldly, secular, and sinful life, let us not allow ourselves to return to them again. – 2) And let no one think to combine service to God with slavery to sin and passions. [31, 14]

1. To dispel our sloth and stir up our zeal, the Apostle said: “The Lord is near; do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God” (Phil. 4:5–6). Let us not, then, be slothful, but let us be strengthened and take courage to do the work to which the Lord has called us. For it is He who has called us from the common life of the people to the monastic life; it is He who has clothed us in the robe of salvation and adorned us with garments of joy; it is He who has redeemed us from the legal oaths, having become an oath for us. “For freedom Christ has set us free; therefore stand firm and do not submit again to a yoke of slavery” (Gal. 5:1). Let us not allow ourselves to become voluntary slaves to our passions again. A slave, ransomed with gold, would never agree to return to slavery; but, having gone far away from the place of his bondage, he rejoices there that he has been granted freedom from the tyranny of slavery—even though slavery is no longer anything particularly evil. For the Apostle says: “Were you called while a slave? Do not be distressed; but if you can gain your freedom, make the most of it. For a slave who has been called in the Lord is the Lord’s freedman; likewise, a freedman who has been called is Christ’s slave” (1 Cor. 7:21–22). And yet it is still true that it is not desirable for one who has been set free to live again under the yoke of slavery. – How much more, then, should we—having been freed from sin—keep ourselves as far away from it as possible? Or do we not know what it has done to us? Was it not sin that cast us out of paradise? Did it not make us mortal instead of immortal? Did it not lead us into this life of many sorrows? Is it not through sin that every evil has come and continues to come? Let us therefore avoid it as our worst enemy; let us hate it as something worthy of hatred. Let us love virtue all the more, for it makes people into angels, and even more than that—into gods, as it is written: “I said, ‘You are gods, and all of you are children of the Most High’” (Ps. 81:6).

2. But what is the essence of virtue?—It is turning away from the world and clinging to God. “No one,” says the Lord, “can serve two masters... You cannot serve both God and Mammon” (Matt. 6:24). We cannot cling to virtue and to sin at the same time; for “what fellowship has light with darkness?” (2 Cor. 6:14). Moreover, Christ’s commandments are light and uplifting; but sins are heavy and burdensome. It is even more difficult that we strain to reconcile opposites and suppose it possible both to indulge in carnal desires and to engage successfully in spiritual pursuits. But let us turn to ourselves: if we have attained a measure of perfection, thanks be to God, from whom “every good gift and every perfect gift” comes; and take care to remain steadfast, guarding ourselves with the fear of God so that we remain unchanging and unwavering in our most virtuous disposition; but if not, and we are lacking in many ways, then let us hasten and strive to attain perfection while there is still time for action, —being strengthened by faith, inspired by hope, united by love, adorned with humility, rejoicing in obedience, tested by patience, enlightened by confession, and through all our other deeds bearing witness to ourselves that we are true monks, sincere novices, and skilled servants of the Lord in Christ.

218. We must listen attentively to the Word of God: for from it come all spiritual dispositions

218. 1) We must listen attentively to the Word of God, for from it come all spiritual dispositions. – 2) This is what all the saints did, and they bore witness to the good fruits of this. – 3) Let us do the same, remembering how the Lord has blessed us. [32, 15]

3. All people have both eyes and ears, but not all hear and see; only those who have ears to hear and eyes to see do so. That is why the Lord said, “He who has ears to hear, let him hear” (Matt. 11:15). The prophet also speaks of those who are hard of hearing: “God has given them a spirit of stupor, eyes that cannot see, and ears that cannot hear” (Isa. 6:9; Rom. 11:8). Therefore, let us listen attentively—and not haphazardly—to what is read to us, so that we may not fall under the threat, but rather so that we may say: “The chastening of the Lord has opened my ears” (Isa. 50:5). Thus, the listener pays attention, is humbled, is purified, is enlightened, rejoices, regards all earthly things as shadows, and sets his mind on Christ, when he hears Him saying to His disciples: “I will not leave you as orphans; I will come to you” (John 14:18). And again: “You are My friends if you do what I command you” (John 15:14). And again: “A little while longer, and the world will no longer see Me, but you will see Me; because I live, you will live also” (John 14:19). And again: “You have stood by me in my trials; and I bestow upon you, just as my Father has bestowed the kingdom upon me, that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom” (Luke 22:28–30). Hearing such things, a lover of God is ready every day to die willingly for Christ.

4. This is how all the saints lived, and with such resolve they solemnly expressed their love for the Lord. Jeremiah says: “I have not grown weary of following You, nor have I desired the life of man” (Jer. 17: 16). St. David says: “What shall I render to the Lord for all that He has given me?” (Ps. 115:3). The Apostle says: “For it has been granted to you on behalf of Christ, not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake” (Phil. 1:29). In the same way, all the Apostles rejoiced, for “they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the name of the Lord Jesus,” as the Acts of the Apostles say (Acts 5:41). In short, each of the saints expressed his sincere love for Christ the Lord through such exclamations.

5. Let us also, brothers, listen attentively to what is being read, and let us love our beloved God with all our hearts, always giving Him thanks for all the blessings He has bestowed upon us—that He chose us from the beginning for salvation in the holiness of our present calling—that He has granted us to serve Him in the Orthodox faith—that the teaching of the saints has been entrusted to us as a bountiful feast. It is fitting for us, then, to say in the words of the Apostles: “If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all—how will He not also with Him graciously give us all things? Who will bring a charge against God’s elect? It is God who justifies; who is he who condemns? Christ Jesus died—more than that, He was raised to life—and is at the right hand of God, interceding for us” (Rom. 8:31–34). He intercedes before God the Father, Who grants us the eternal Kingdom.

219. Let us celebrate the Memorial not only outwardly but also spiritually—remembering in doing so that we, too, will depart; and—inspired by this, let us prepare for our departure

219. 1) Let us celebrate the memorial service, not only outwardly but also spiritually;— 2) remembering in doing so that we too will depart; and— 3) being inspired by this to prepare for our departure. [32:16]

6. Yesterday we commemorated our father, and we did so as is fitting; for spiritual children must honor their father. However, one must not think that in the matter of commemoration it is enough to perform the memorial services and then find comfort in the flesh; rather, one must also generate spiritual consolations. Physical comfort, having stirred the emotions for a short time, flees, but spiritual comfort is insatiable and enduring. If any of you wept, if any of you were moved to compassion, if any of you were brokenhearted, then you have succeeded in properly commemorating your father or brother. Recall the days of old, when we had our father with us, conversing and sharing his thoughts with us; then let us imagine where he is now, with whom he dwells, and with whom he shares his thoughts—he and each of our departed brothers. Is it not this—both what is thought and what is heard—that always fills the soul with rapture?

7. Let us then turn our attention to ourselves and consider: will we not, in a short time, depart from here as well, and be remembered by others just as we now remember our predecessors? Indeed, it is so. Such is our lot: we are mortal beings—unaware of what tomorrow will bring. For what is our life? — A vapor that appears for a moment and then vanishes; a spring flower that blooms in the morning but withers by evening. “Man is like grass; his days are like a flower of the field—it blooms and then fades” (Ps. 102: 15). “Man is like a breath; his days pass like a shadow” (Ps. 143:4). “All flesh is like grass, and all the glory of man is like the flower of the field” (Isa. 40:6); “The sun rises with its scorching heat and withers the grass; its flower falls off, and the beauty of its appearance perishes” (James 1:11). Thus we will wither away; thus we will depart from here, as the saints have said. These are their parables, spoken before this.

8. “But blessed is the one who understands; blessed is the one who seeks God” (Ps. 13:2). Blessed is the one who daily exerts himself in the labors and toils of obedience—not contentious, not grumbling, meek, prompt in his deeds, not negligent in service, contrite in heart, and always preparing for his departure. For the end will come; it will come and will not be delayed. The dreadful day of death will come; the royal messenger, descending from heaven, will also come—and will say to the soul: “Come now, the King and God of all is calling for you.” But may we, through the prayers of our Father, find ourselves ready at that hour and, without fear, depart from here and pass into eternal life.

220. The end of Lent brings us face to face with Easter; but our whole life, too, stands face to face with Easter—not the temporary one, but the eternal one, immeasurably better

220. 1) The end of Lent brings us face to face with Pascha; but our whole life also stands before the face of Pascha—not the temporary one, but the eternal one, which is immeasurably better. – 2) Look upon it, recalling what the Lord has said about it, and be inspired to undertake ascetic labors, imitating the saints. – 3) Do not pay attention to the crafty serpent, who attempts to lure us with deceit toward what is pleasing and sweet to the flesh. [32, 17]

1. Lent is drawing to a close, and the soul rejoices at the approach of Easter, as a time of rest and of tasting the fruit of the labors undertaken. But why have I spoken these words?—To remind you that our entire life is turned toward the eternal Passover and awaits its coming. This earthly Passover, though great and venerable, is, as our Fathers teach, only a foreshadowing of that Passover. This earthly Passover lasts but a single day—and then passes; but that unceasing Passover is the one from which sickness, sorrow, and sighing have fled, where there is joy, gladness, and eternal comfort, where there are the voices of those celebrating and the faces of those rejoicing, and the vision of the everlasting light, where there is Christ's blessed feast, a table full of eternal blessings and the new drink, of which Christ said: "I tell you, I will not drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it anew with you in My Father's kingdom" (Matt. 26:29).

2. As for this kingdom, when He was about to be taken up into heaven, He said to His disciples: "I am going to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and take you to Myself, so that where I am, there you may be also. 'You know the way to the place where I am going'" (John 14:2–4). And in another passage He says again: "On that day you will realize that I am in My Father, and you are in Me, and I am in you" (John 14:20). And again in another passage: "Father, I desire that those whom You have given Me may be with Me where I am, so that they may see My glory, which You have given Me, because You loved Me before the foundation of the world" (John 17:24). And to make it clear that these words were not spoken only of the Apostles, but of all believers, He said again: "I do not pray for these alone, but also for those who will believe in Me through their word, that they may all be one: just as You, Father, are in Me, and I am in You, that they also may be one in Us" (John 17:20–21). What could be more comforting than these words? And what could be more convincing? What soul could these words fail to soften? What heart would they not break? Some would rightly call such a heart stony, rather than human. – Reflecting on this, the saints cheerfully endured all that they endured, regarding sorrows as joys, confinement as spaciousness, sufferings as delights, ascetic labors as consolations, and death as life. Therefore, since we, too, strive toward the same goal as they did and seek the same of the Resurrection, let us courageously endure all that is unpleasant, not succumbing to its weight or losing heart, but rather being stirred to even more ardent zeal.

3. Do not heed the crafty serpent, who devises various schemes against us through our passions, transforming himself into an angel of light and disguising things as what they are not, presenting darkness as light and bitterness as sweetness. Thus he deceived our first parents, bewitching their eyes and presenting to them as beautiful what was not beautiful, and then, through the act of eating, cast them out of paradise. But we, knowing from experience that he is a flattering deceiver, will not allow ourselves to be driven out of the paradise of the commandments; and when he shows us a beautiful fruit, we will not fix the gaze of our soul and body upon it, but will avoid looking at it in every way, lest we be deceived. What, then, is this fruit that appears red? Carnal love, the evil lust of each of the destructive passions; by avoiding it, we will be saved and will be deemed worthy to celebrate the eternal Passover with all the saints.

221. Just as the plant kingdom blossoms and bears fruit after winter, so too does the soul, after privations, sorrows, and hardships, blossom spiritually and bear spiritual fruit, by which the Lord is delighted and nourished

221. 1) Just as the plant kingdom blossoms and bears fruit after winter, so too does the soul, after privations, sorrows, and hardships, blossom spiritually and bear spiritual fruit, by which the Lord is delighted and nourished. – 2) Let us therefore endure all the sorrows and hardships of our ascetic life, so that we may bear fruit, delight the Lord with it, and nourish Him: for nothing could be more blissful than this. – 3) And the Lord Himself has confirmed that this is so: how then can we not bear every sorrow of our life with all joy [32, 18]

4. Winter has passed; spring has come, and we see God's creation coming to life: plants are blooming, the earth is covered with greenery, birds are singing, and everything else is being renewed—and we take delight in this and glorify the all-wise Artist of all things—God, who, as it were, recreates and transforms His creation every summer, thereby tangibly confirming that “His invisible attributes—His eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly perceived since the creation of the world through the things He has made” (Rom. 1: 20). We should not, however, stop at this alone, but rather extend our mental gaze further and see within ourselves a reflection of what is happening in creation. — How? Through the following comparison: just as the renewal of this visible creation is caused by winter, during which the earth and everything on it is subjected to the harsh effects of snow, rain, and storms; so it is with the soul; for if it does not first endure the winter of sorrows, deprivations, and calamities, it will bear neither flowers nor fruit; but if it endures all these things, it bears the expected fruit and receives a blessing from God in return, as it is written: “The earth that drinks in the abundant rain that falls upon it and produces a crop useful to those for whom it is cultivated receives a blessing from God” (Heb. 6:7).

5. Let us, then, endure every sorrow, every deprivation, and every temptation—whether visible or invisible—that assails us during this Lenten season we are passing through, in hunger and thirst, and in all other afflictions, so that we may prove fruitful and receive God’s blessing; and not only that, but also so that we may nourish and welcome the Lord Jesus: for just as we take delight in the sight of creation growing green, blooming, and bearing fruit, so does He take delight in the sight of our souls, spiritually blooming and bearing fruit. – What, then, are these fruits? “Love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control” (Gal. 5:22–23). This is what He feeds on, what delights Him. And blessed is the one who nourishes Him in this way, for he will in turn be nourished by Him with eternal blessings. Blessed is the one who welcomes Him in this way, for he too will be welcomed by Him in the kingdom of heaven. If someone welcomes an earthly king into his home, how much does he rejoice and be glad?—Is it not all the more so for the one who welcomes the King of kings and Lord of lords?

6. And that He is truly received is evident from the words He Himself spoke: “If anyone loves Me, he will keep My word; and My Father will love him, and We will come to him and make Our home with him” (John 14:23). And again: “Whoever has My commandments and keeps them is the one who loves Me; and whoever loves Me will be loved by My Father, and I will love him and reveal Myself to him” (John 14:21). – If such are the promises, then let us not only endure everything, but do so with joy, hearing what the Apostle says: “Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and in my flesh I am filling up what is lacking in Christ’s afflictions for the sake of His body, which is the church” (Col. 1: 24); and what St. James says: “Consider it pure joy, my brothers and sisters, whenever you face various trials, knowing that the testing of your faith produces endurance; and let endurance have its full effect, so that you may be mature and complete, lacking nothing” (James 1:2–4). Do you see that there is joy in trials and gladness in sorrows?—This is how the saints lived; let us also compel ourselves to live this way, so that, by following in their footsteps, we may inherit the kingdom of heaven together with them.

222. After listing the ascetic virtues in which one particularly excelled during Lent, he adds: “Remain this way forever, without changing with the passage of time.”

222. After listing the ascetic virtues in which some particularly excelled during Lent, he adds: “Remain this way forever, without changing with the passage of time.” [3 2, 19] We have now reached the very end of Lent: for, as you can see, it is coming to a close. Written accounts handed down to us from ancient times confirm that at this time the blessed fathers, who had spent Holy Lent in the deserts within the boundaries of the Holy City of Jerusalem, having spent Holy Lent in the deserts, and now offering as firstfruits to the bountiful Lord and God the lofty virtues in which each had excelled, especially in these ascetic feats. You, too, offer something not insignificant and not unworthy, each according to your strength: one offers the queen of all virtues—love; another, God-illuminated humility; one, Christ-like obedience; another, unceasing vigilance in prayer and psalm-singing during vigils; yet another, special zeal in performing manual labor; nor are the following unworthy of praise: the suppression of distraction, the restraint of untimely glances, modesty in demeanor, prudence in responses and mutual interaction; I will not speak of curbing insolence, of refraining from verbosity, of moderation in food, of avoiding excessive sleep, of attention to the verses, and, finally—which ought to be placed first—of the blessed and martyr-like severing of one’s own will, which, as the one true sacrifice, the Lord demands of us above all else. Each of the qualities listed is a good and pious offering; and I dare say that none of you will appear empty-handed before God, but each will bring his own good deeds. You have thus, through your asceticism, laid up “gold, silver, and precious stones”—deeds that will not be consumed by the fire of the coming trial, and not those which the Apostle likens to “hay, wood, and straw” (1 Cor. 3:12)—such as love of sin, slavery to passions, obscene speech, impure thoughts, secret indulgence, falsehood, hatred, and everything else of this sort. Since you have, during these few days of fasting, become possessors of such spiritual treasures, let us not allow ourselves to squander them; let us not, through change or because of the changing times, yield to the adversary and our enemy. Let the times change and let different days come; but remain steadfast in your submission to God’s will and in your love for Him. Or, perhaps, be changeable—but only for the better—replacing lesser perfection with greater, becoming a burning lamp from a spark, transforming from a star into the moon, and from the moon into the sun. Just do not stand still or turn back to the comforts of the world, which are as fleeting as a dream but subject one to eternal burning in the fire. Therefore, I ask that, just as you have thus far remained in a godly disposition, so let us celebrate the Feast of Vay, and let us open the gates of the monastery, welcoming those who wish to enter, and arrange our meetings and conversations in such a way that all may serve to the glory of God, and that those who see you may say that God is in you, as in His Temple, according to the divine Apostle (1 Cor. 3:16). – By acting in this way, we will also celebrate the Holy and Great Pascha in a manner pleasing to God, in harmony with the Passion of Christ and illuminated by the light of the Resurrection.

223. It recalls a certain event, as a trial for all, which was well endured by everyone

223. 1) It serves as a reminder of a certain event—a temptation for all—that everyone has successfully overcome. – 2) It explains how the temptation to sin arises and how one should resist sin accordingly: by warding off evil thoughts and so on. – 3) To avoid even the temptation, one must not return to one’s former ways—not even in thought—and outwardly must strictly adhere to the rules of good conduct. – 4) Above all, be careful not to leave the monastery. – 5) In general, may everything among you be orderly and proper—do everything as in the presence of the Lord. – 6) Lent has ended; let us give thanks to the Lord; but let us not cease to improve ourselves.

7. The Lord said in the Gospel: “Simon, Simon, Satan has asked to sift you like wheat; but I have prayed for you, that your faith may not fail” (Luke 22:31–32). Something similar has happened to us, the humble ones. But the all-gracious God did not leave us to be grieved more than we can bear, but “has provided a way out along with the temptation, so that we may be able to endure it” (1 Cor. 10: 13). You know what I am talking about. I have accepted your brotherly suffering as pleasing to God, salutary, and praiseworthy, as the Apostle says: “For what is this, that you were grieved by God, as much as He intended? But a response, but indignation, but fear, but longing, but zeal, but vengeance; in everything you have shown yourselves to be blameless in this matter” (2 Cor. 7:11). Such is your attitude—truly brotherly, as the word of truth requires; for it says: “If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. 12:26).

8. But consider for me how diligent and cunning the devil is; how he “roams about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour” (1 Peter 5:8), seeking to seize someone—whether in part or entirely—as his prey. For when he seizes someone in part, he is not content with that, but always strives for the worst, until he brings about spiritual death—namely: first, he attempts to make us accept a temptation, then to conceive something evil in our hearts; and having thus defiled and infected the soul, he tempts it to step outside the bounds of nature, and renders it mad, speechless, and blind, striving toward what is unworthy: toward darkness instead of light, toward sorrow instead of sweetness, toward death instead of life. Such is the calamity wrought by the tempter. – But we, brothers, will guard our souls with every means, giving no place to the devil, but immediately driving away even the slightest thought; if we are overcome in this, at least we will not defile ourselves by sympathizing; and if we fail even here, we will not allow ourselves to remain long in that state of mind, lest we be led into sin.

9. This happens to us because of past passions and memories. But let us flee from passions; let us flee from the memories of our youth: for to wander there and dwell there in our imagination is nothing other than a return of the heart to Egypt, which we must guard against through the inner man; as for the outer man, let us do what the Apostle teaches: “Let no corrupt word proceed out of your mouth, but only such as is good for edifying, that it may impart grace to those who hear. And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, by whom you were sealed for the day of redemption. Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice. Be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, just as God in Christ forgave you” (Eph. 4:29–32).

10. At the same time, let us avoid leaving the monastery, as this is a cause of falling away. Alas! Are your brothers within the courtyard, while you are outside? Are your brothers in silence, while you are in idle chatter? Your brothers are at rest, but you wander from place to place, here and there? From this come temptations; from this come falls. What happens to a sheep that has strayed from the flock? Does it not become prey to wild beasts? So it is with one who flees from the brotherhood. But may this not happen, brothers; by no means may it happen.

11. Yet let everything among you be done in a proper and orderly manner; let everything be done with care and caution; all as in the presence of the Lord, who sees both our hidden and our open deeds, and what we do by day and by night, and everything that occurs in every movement of our body and mind; let us thus give no offense to Jews, Greeks, or the church of God. – And that is enough on this subject.

12. Since Lent is coming to an end, let us give glory to God, who has enabled us to complete it and has given us the strength to undertake the customary ascetic practices throughout its duration. The labor has passed, but the reward remains; the body has been refined, but the spirit has been strengthened. Grow stronger and be sanctified more and more, and “may your whole spirit, soul, and body be kept blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Thess. 5:23).

224. Let us not cease to remember the Passion and Resurrection of the Lord, lest we be ensnared by passions

224. 1) Let us never cease to remember the Lord’s Passion and Resurrection, so that we may not be ensnared by passions. – 2) Now it is spring, which revives all that is carnal: let us therefore be cautious and strict with the body. – 3) We have labored during Lent; but when Lent is over, the labor is not over: we must labor on ourselves throughout our entire lives. – 4) Let us do so, then. [4, 1]

13. Having been granted by Christ’s grace to celebrate Holy Pascha, let us return to our duties, yet in such a way that we may both work and at the same time remember the life-giving sufferings of our Savior Jesus Christ and His glorious Resurrection; for we must by no means allow the memory of these events to fade away with the passing of Pascha. But let us always bring to mind the Lord’s saving sufferings—His crucifixion, burial, and resurrection—so that, by constantly occupying our minds with such thoughts, we may remain impervious to the passions. But if, through inattention, we are ever caught off guard, let us quickly look upon Jesus the Crucified, the Lord of glory, and healing will immediately shine upon our souls. So too, in ancient times, when Israel was bitten by serpents, they looked upon the bronze serpent and were immediately healed (Num. 21, 11–19). You know well that evil thoughts bite like serpents, pouring poison into the soul, which must be removed as quickly as possible with the utmost care as soon as this happens, lest delay make the wound difficult to heal.

14. You see, it is now spring. Spring is the mother of blood (and blood is the mother of the flesh). “For the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh” (Gal. 5: 17); thus, the strengthening of the flesh weakens the Spirit, and the strengthening of the Spirit weakens the flesh. – Let us therefore be prudent and, in our eating, drinking, sleeping, and everything else, observe strict moderation, lest the body gain the upper hand over the soul, but rather that the soul may triumph over the body.

15. A runner in a race is not declared the winner after running just one or two stages, but only after running the entire course (and reaching the designated finish line first). So too, we are not victors merely by observing Lent or Pentecost as we ought; but I tell you that unless we remain vigilant throughout our entire lives, we will not escape the devil’s snares and will not receive the victor’s reward.

16. Why, then, will we strive again and again in good deeds, sweat again and again to acquire virtues, mortify the flesh again and again, subdue the body again and again, and drive away passions again and again—always “bearing in our bodies the death of the Lord Jesus” (2 Cor. 4:10), “always carrying about in our bodies the death sentence” (2 Cor. 3:7). For, of course, we too will die just as our fathers and brothers did, and we will depart from here—and go to strange places, and see sights we have never seen. This thought is terrifying and drives those of sound mind into a state of ecstasy. —Therefore, while abiding in fear and trembling, let us keep our senses in strict order and guard ourselves in every way against vain hearing, harmful sights, intoxicating scents, and every dangerous step, devoting ourselves entirely to the Holy God, so that, having pleased Him, we may become heirs of eternal blessings.

225. Easter has passed, and the Passion has passed; but the joy of Easter and the memory of the Lord's Passion must remain alive within us; so that, while we live, we may not live for ourselves, but for the Lord who died for us and rose again

225. 1) Easter has passed, and the Passion has passed; but the joy of Easter and the memory of the Lord's Passion must remain alive within us; so that, while we live, we may not live for ourselves, but for the Lord who died for us and rose again. – 2) Therefore, even after Easter, we must persevere in spiritual struggles, without inventing any excuses to stray from them. – 3) He rebukes them, saying that he had told them not to meet privately in secret places, yet some still did so; and he instructs them on how to conduct themselves when they gather together openly for conversation, and how to behave at all other times. – 4) He urges them to remember the good brothers who have departed and to imitate them, citing Brother Dometian as an example [4:2].

17. Easter has passed, and the feast is over; but the joy—or celebration, if you will—has not passed: for spiritually we must always rejoice and celebrate, according to the words of the Apostle: “Rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, rejoice” (Phil. 4:4). And Holy Week has passed, but may the memory of the sufferings of Christ our Savior always be fresh and alive within us—that is, the memory that the Lord of glory was crucified for us, was buried, and rose again on the third day, raising us up with Him and giving us life with Him, “so that we who live no longer live for ourselves, but for Him who died for us and was raised” (2 Cor. 5:15), so that we may boldly speak the words of the Apostle: “I no longer live, but Christ lives in me; and the life I now live in the flesh, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself up for my sake” (Gal. 2: 20–21). And here is the conclusion to be drawn from this Sacrament: we must be dead to the world and live for the One God.

18. Therefore, even after Easter, we must remain sober and vigilant, pray and repent, shed tears and be enlightened, always bear in our bodies the death of the Lord Jesus, die daily by our own will, and always separate ourselves mentally from the body and turn to the Lord by turning away from the desires of the flesh. – Do not say, “It is not Lent now”: for the sober-minded, it is always Lent. Do not say, “I have been striving for a long time now, and I need rest”: there is no rest here on earth. Do not say, “I am seasoned in virtue, and I am not afraid”: the fear of change and falling must never depart, for Satan has cast many who were seasoned in virtue into the pit of sin in the blink of an eye; so “Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall” (1 Cor. 10:12), and let him who thinks himself well-protected take heed lest he be left without any protection at all. Let us therefore always be on guard and vigilant, exercising strict self-control—in sleep, in eating, in drinking, and in everything else—so that the body may always be kept under control and in subjection, lest it, like a young colt, rear up and cast us into the torrent of sin.

19. In a recent sermon, I warned you not to isolate yourselves or remain alone in secluded places, yet some of you have been there again. “What do you want? Shall I come to you with a club, or with love and a spirit of gentleness?” (1 Cor. 4:21). I have spoken to you in every way, and you have not listened; you have seen with your own eyes that your brother suffered penance for this, and yet you have not restrained yourselves. Take heed, lest anyone fall into the same kind of sin. It is not in vain, nor is it everywhere, that these teachings are given. “For God is not a God of disorder but of peace” (1 Cor. 14:33). “Let all things be done decently and in order” (1 Cor. 14:40), so that in everything the Lord may be glorified through us. Brothers coming from here and there, be mindful of where and how you sit, and how you conduct yourselves—not as those who have been given free rein to do whatever they please, but as those bound by the Spirit; not as those unobserved by anyone, but as those observed by the Lord, who sees every movement and every action of yours; do not wander aimlessly, as if driven by some force, but be at rest in your wanderings; pay attention to your work, your prayers, and your psalm-singing; do not hoard anything for yourselves here out of greed, but be content with what you have. For the Lord Himself said, “I will not leave you nor forsake you” (Josh. 1: 5); so that each of us may say with boldness, “The Lord is my helper; I will not fear what man can do to me” (Ps. 117: 6).

20. Remember your brothers, “looking to the end of their journey, imitate their faith” (Heb. 13:7). Such was the blessed Dometian, whom we have praised, and whose memory is with the saints. What price did he pay? What kind of life did he lead? —With what labors and deeds did he acquire his eternal inheritance? He was a poor and humble man in the flesh; but since he chose virtue and loved God, God exalted him, according to the word of Scripture: “I will exalt those who exalt Me, but those who despise Me will be brought low” (1 Sam. 2:30). We ought to rejoice and be glad over such brothers. But what good is this if we do not contribute something of our own to it? Having contributed according to our strength, we will share in the lot of the saints, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

226. Let us conduct ourselves in the world in such a way as to silence those who are eager to slander our way of life

226. 1) Let us conduct ourselves in the world in such a way as to silence those who are eager to slander our way of life. – 2) Let our motivation for this be the love for the Lord that inspired all the saints. – 3) If we sometimes give in to our passions, it is because of the lukewarmness of our love for the Lord, which we must therefore renew and strengthen. [4, 3]

21. We, the humble ones, rejoice with joy at seeing you come here every year, and we celebrate your arrival as if it were a second Passover. But just as you bring us earthly gifts—each according to what his hand has found—so we, as if in a kind of exchange, will offer you spiritual gifts. – Therefore, I beg you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: walk in a manner worthy of the monastic calling, worthy of the confession we have made, and of the persecution we have endured for the Lord, “that your good conduct in the world may be a witness,” even “when they slander you as evildoers,” they may be put to shame when they see your good conduct in action (1 Peter 2:12). Let us strive, both for our own sake and for the sake of those who oppose the truth, to conduct our lives in a steadfast and orderly manner, maintaining good conduct in our dealings with one another and being guided by sound principles in our good deeds. Whether we gather in church, let us observe the Apostolic rule. “Let each one of you,” says the Apostle, “have a psalm, have a teaching, have a tongue... but let all things be done for edification” (1 Cor. 14:26); or if we are going somewhere out of necessity, let us walk reverently, so that a certain grace may, as it were, shine from our faces for the edification of those who see us; or if we happen to converse with a woman, let us speak to her with full attention, modestly averting our eyes from gazing, lest we receive thorns and arrows in our hearts.

22. In a word, “everything” must be “done for the glory of God, who loved us and gave Himself up for us” (Gal. 2: 20). Whose love drives the lover to ecstasy, not allowing him to belong to himself, but only to the one he loves: something that can also be seen in those who love themselves emotionally or carnally. – When a husband loves his wife, he gives his whole self to his beloved, breathing, as it were, only for her, and dreaming of her ceaselessly. Even if you point out the sun to him, he will not want to look at it, but only at his beloved; even if you offer him a meal, he will not want to partake of it, out of his desire to be with his one and only beloved. – But what is more beautiful than the Lord Christ? What is sweeter than His blissful love? Is He not “fairer in goodness than the sons of men?” (Ps. 44:3). Is He not “sweetness and all desire?” (Song of Songs 5:16). Demonstrating this—that is, the warmth of their love for Him—the saints cry out: some, “As the deer s for streams of water, so my soul longs for You, O God” (Ps. 41:2); Others again: “The love of God has taken hold of us, who have been entrusted with this ministry: for if one died for all, then all have died; but Christ died for all, so that those who live might no longer live for themselves, but for Him who died for them and was raised” (2 Cor. 5:14–15). Behold what love with which God loved the world! And behold how strongly and irresistibly He Himself was loved by the saints!

23. But since we do not love Him fervently, we are captivated by evil thoughts and carnal desires, and thus encounter sorrow instead of pleasure, bitterness instead of sweetness, and anxiety instead of peace. – But we must awaken and come to our senses, brothers, and purify our souls of such destructive desires, so that Christ may dwell within us: for where there is purity, there is Christ. Such is the blessed and longed-for life; and by living in this way, we will inherit the Kingdom of Heaven through Christ Jesus, our Lord.

227. Through fasting you have gathered spiritual blessings; now strive to preserve them

227. 1) Through fasting you have gathered spiritual blessings; now strive to preserve them. – 2) To this end, do not give in to carelessness, but pay close attention to yourselves and act with vigilant caution. – 3) Avoid occasions that provoke sin, guard your emotions, and especially purify your thoughts. – 4) If you do not do this, you will fall into sin; and how much harm has sin done to us, and continues to do? [4, 4]

24. Now that the Feast is over, the time calls us back to our discussions and regular teachings; and I set about this with zeal, knowing that I have been appointed for this, and that woe to me if I do not proclaim the words of truth to you with all my strength. – What, then, should I say to you at this time? I will say that, just as before, during Holy Lent, each of you, having gathered spiritual riches as if into a safe harbor, entered into Holy Pascha, bringing with you many and good acquisitions of virtues, such as fasting, vigil, prayer, diligence, and other similar pious endeavors: so now the object of your care and concern—not just some of it, but all of it—must be the preservation of all these things.

25. For one should not assume that what happens in a visible, physical harbor also applies to a spiritual one. There, as soon as someone enters the harbor and settles in, they give themselves over to inactivity and carefree ease, unconcerned about the waves of the sea and other calamitous accidents; here, on the contrary, the passions rage more fiercely because of the flesh's repose, and the spirits of malice attack more uncontrollably, like storms: the spirit of fornication, the spirit of gluttony, the spirit of greed, the spirit of sloth, the spirit of sorrow, the spirit of pride. And in this situation, fear is very appropriate, lest one sink even in the harbor. Once, St. David cast a careless glance at Uriah's wife, and readers know what he suffered as a result (2 Sam. 11:1 and 4); "Jacob ate and was satisfied; he grew fat and rejected his God," says Scripture (Deut. 32:15); someone acted recklessly, was consumed by lust, and gave birth to lawlessness.

26. Hearing this, pay attention; avoid places and sights that are dangerous because they stir up sin; bind with strict rules your eyes, ears, sense of smell, taste, and touch, as well as your eating, drinking, and sleep, so that the waves of passions do not overwhelm you. You must also know that one who sails the sea of the senses is inevitably exposed to storms and turmoil; but one who crosses the sea of the mind is master of both storms and calm. For if he courageously drives away inappropriate thoughts, he is filled with stillness, having the Holy Spirit as his fellow traveler, as is told of St. Arsenius. But whoever lets his senses run wild, and who does not prevent lusts from rising within him like waves—such a person stirs up the worst storm for himself; and if he does not quickly subdue his agitated thoughts, he will come to the point of crying out in a plaintive voice: "I have sunk into the depths of the sea, and the storm has overwhelmed me" (Ps. 64: 3). By this I mean: let good thoughts reign, and let the better not be overcome by the worse; let the spirit reign and be guided toward what is best.

27. Or do you not know what sin has wrought? Has it not brought death into the world? Has it not corrupted the earth? Has it not filled the universe with graves, from the beginning of the world until now?—For man was incorruptible until he transgressed the commandment. And none of what has been said had yet come to pass while the first-created remained steadfastly faithful to the commandment given to him. He is the cause of eternal torments; he is the arsonist of the unquenchable fire of Gehenna; he is the food of the endless worm; he has made man, who was once honorable, like senseless beasts. Since he is so calamitous and deadly, we must flee from him with all our strength; and choose virtue, which makes people like angels, resists demons, drives away all passions, and finally receives the kingdom of heaven as a reward—may we all attain it through the grace and love of our Lord.

228. Do not give in to carelessness: for death is always near; and after death comes judgment and retribution

228. 1) Do not give in to carelessness: for death is always near; and after death come judgment and retribution. – 2) If those who serve an earthly king strive with fear to fulfill everything, both great and small, should not those who serve the Heavenly King do so all the more? – 3) Let us therefore diligently fulfill everything, both in worship and in obedience; above all, let us live in peace with one another, and do so sincerely. [4, 5]

28. The brevity of this life should not give rise to boredom, idleness, or apathy in us, but rather to zeal and the most earnest striving to please God, since we are always close to death. No servant, when approaching his master, nor any messenger sent to give an account to the one who sent him, acts carelessly, but is so preoccupied that he seems beside himself. – What of us? We, too, are approaching our Lord—or rather, the Lord is approaching us—and His dreadful judgment, before which we will all stand naked and exposed, to give an account of our lives and receive either the eternal kingdom or eternal torment. Thinking of this, who can afford to be careless? And will not everyone burn with a zeal even greater than fire to do the will of their Lord, so as not to end up like that servant who, bound hand and foot, was cast out of the wedding hall? (Matt. 22:13).

29. If these examples do not strike fear into us, let us try to picture the future more vividly by comparing it to what happens in the present. Do we not see how the King's enemies—some are tormented in dungeons, others are flogged, some are exiled, some are blinded, and still others are in danger of losing their very lives? – But even those who have done nothing wrong—with what fear and trembling do they stand before him and serve him, being sent here and there to war and other arduous tasks? And there is no one who objects, no one who disobeys. If this is the case with a mortal king, how much more so with the immortal and one King of kings and Lord of lords—should this not be done with fear and trembling, and should nothing be done except what is commanded? Do you hear what the Word of God says?—“Or do you disregard the riches of His kindness, forbearance, and patience, not realizing that God’s kindness is meant to lead you to repentance? But because of your hard-heartedness and unrepentant heart, you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each one according to his deeds” (Rom. 2:4–6).

30. Let this serve as a warning to us; and let us spend every day with full attention and vigilant self-discipline, rising early in the morning at the signal, immediately and briskly, driving away sleep, and after sober prayer in the cell and in the common assembly, each one taking up his own task—the cell attendant in the cell, the cook in the kitchen, and all the others, each in his own place: nowhere shall there be grumbling, disobedience, shouting, or conflict—nor malice, secretly harbored, so as to appear peaceful on the outside while nurturing hatred within, and, as soon as the opportunity arises, to strike like a viper or take revenge like a vengeful camel. – An offense occurred and has passed. But was there sincere repentance or forgiveness? Do not let your thoughts flare up again, and do not be tempted to “repay evil with evil, or insult with insult; on the contrary, bless, knowing that you were called to this, so that you may inherit a blessing.” For whoever desires to love life and see good days must keep his tongue from evil and his lips from speaking deceit. Let him turn away from evil and do good; let him seek peace and pursue it. For the eyes of the Lord are on the righteous, and His ears are open to their prayer; but the face of the Lord is against those who do evil” (1 Peter 3:9–12).

229. All creation celebrates Christ’s Resurrection, adorned with flowers and spreading a sweet fragrance; and we, too, ought to celebrate this feast of feasts by spreading a spiritual fragrance from ourselves, having prepared it within ourselves through the combination of every virtue

229. 1) All creation celebrates Christ’s Resurrection, adorned with flowers and spreading a sweet fragrance; and we, too, ought to celebrate this feast of feasts by spreading a spiritual fragrance from ourselves, having prepared it within ourselves through the combination of every virtue. – 2) But in these days we ought to exude the fragrance of Orthodoxy all the more, in light of iconoclasm, which is rebuked by the Lord Himself. – 3) Let us, then, hold fast to the true faith and exude the fragrance of a virtuous life. [4, 6]

31. On the feast of Christ’s Resurrection, all creation—as if shedding a kind of lifelessness, a sad winter cloak—blooms anew and, as it were, comes to life: the earth is covered with greenery, the trees with leaves, animals leap about in play, the sea has calmed, and everything has been transformed into a better state. – But why did this come to mind? – Here is why: if even soulless and speechless creatures rejoice so greatly in the most glorious Resurrection and take on such a festive appearance, should we not all the more—we who are honored with reason and the image of God—adorn ourselves with a good life and exude a fragrant spirit? – For truly, the fragrance of Christ is one who is adorned with virtue, as the Apostle testifies, saying: “For we are the fragrance of Christ to God among those who are being saved and among those who are perishing: to the one a fragrance leading to death; to the other a fragrance leading to life” (2 Cor. 2: 15:16). In this regard, it is also fitting to say that Adam, before transgressing the commandment, was a fragrance to God, being adorned with immortality and incorruptibility and enveloped in heavenly contemplations. For, like any tree that is truly flowery and fragrant, he was planted in Paradise, exuding virtues. We may also recall here that Isaac the Patriarch, sensing a pleasant fragrance in his son Jacob, said precisely: “This is the fragrance of my son, like the fragrance of a field which the Lord has blessed” (Gen. 27:24), certainly understanding this fragrance in a spiritual sense. – Let us, then, brothers, also exude a spiritual fragrance, which we shall prepare within ourselves through the combination of all virtues, like a skilled perfumer. Such myrrh is blessed; such myrrh is pleasing to God; such myrrh attracts the angels and drives away demons; the pure souls drawn by this myrrh followed in the footsteps of Christ the Lord, as is sung in the Song of Songs (1:2, 3). So it must always be.

32. But in these times, we must above all exude Orthodoxy, in the face of iconoclastic impiety. The iconoclasts cry out: “God is incorporeal; it is impossible to depict Him.”—And they think they are uttering words of wisdom, not realizing what wisdom they are speaking of.—O foolish ones! Do you confess the Lord Jesus as God? I suppose you will say, “Yes.”—Listen, then, to what He Himself says: when He appeared to the holy Apostles after His resurrection and, by His ineffable condescension, initiated them into the most secret and wondrous mysteries of the saving faith, He touched food, to confirm the truth of His resurrection, even though His holy flesh after the resurrection had no need of it—He ate and drank, and was tangible, and to those who thought He was a spirit, He said: “See My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself: touch Me and see; for a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see I have” (Luke 24:39).—What will the iconoclastic Christ-fighter say to this?—Does the Lord have flesh and bones? And can He therefore be depicted in an icon?—If the latter is not possible, then the former never was. But by saying that He has flesh, He—whether silently or implicitly—testifies Himself that He can be depicted in an icon: for these two characteristics presuppose one another. Why will these iconoclasts, like the Manicheans, “suffer torment and eternal destruction,” as it is written (2 Thess. 1:9)?

33. We, however, brothers, in orthodox wisdom, believing that we can see our Lord Jesus Christ in an icon and worship Him there, and resting in this, we will direct all our zeal toward living a life worthy of our faith—pure, blameless, and spotless—so that we may not stumble on either side, but by treading skillfully on both, may attain the kingdom of heaven.

230. Reflecting on how highly our nature has been exalted by the ascended Lord, let us not allow it to be tarnished by an unworthy life

230. Reflecting on how highly our nature has been exalted by the ascended Lord, let us not allow it to be tarnished by an unworthy life. [4, 7] The Feast of Feasts for us, and the Ascension of our Savior, Jesus Christ, which is at hand, is a great and supernatural mystery: for our nature is lifted beyond the bounds of the visible heavens, as it is written: “God, who is rich in mercy... has made us, who were dead in our trespasses, alive together with Christ... and raised us up with Him, and seated us with Him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus” (Eph. 2: 4–6), “seated at His right hand in the heavenly realms, far above every rule and authority, power, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this age but also in the one to come; and He has put all things under His feet; and He has appointed Him head over all things for the church, which is His body, the fullness of Him who fills all in all” (Eph. 1: 20–23). Do you see to what heights of glory human nature has been raised? Is it not from earth to heaven? Is it not from corruption to incorruption? How many others labor to become friends of an earthly and mortal king? But we, who were “once alienated and enemies in our minds through wicked deeds” (Col. 1: 21), have not only been reconciled to God the Father through our Lord Jesus Christ as a gift, but have also been exalted to the status of sonship. And now our nature is in heaven, worshiped by every visible and invisible creature. Such is the greatness of the ineffable love for mankind of our good God! Reflecting on this, and knowing that it is beyond the grasp of our minds, the blessed Paul prays, “May the God of our Lord Jesus Christ grant to the believers the spirit of wisdom in the knowledge of Him.... that He may make known to us what is the hope of His calling, and what are the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what is the surpassing greatness of His power toward us who believe, according to the working of His mighty strength, which He worked in Christ” (Eph. 1: 17–21). – But that is exactly what happened! – He came to us, the All-Blessed One, through the virgin birth; He submitted Himself to the laws of nature; He ascended the cross, “nailing to it the handwritten code of debts against us” (Col. 2: 14), descended into the depths of the earth, healing mortal infirmities, rose again, having restored human nature in Himself, and finally ascended in glory, revealing Himself as our Advocate before God the Father—such, in short, is the meaning of this holy feast! – As we contemplate this and realize that we are the body of Christ, let us reverently honor this gift, preserve our nobility, not betray grace, “not turn the members of Christ into members of immorality” (1 Cor. 6:15), but even more so, we will purify ourselves in both thought and deed; even more so, we will renounce the carnal desires that wage war against the soul, keeping “our life’s treasure” within ourselves (1 Peter 2:12)—a life that is peaceful, meek, obedient, humble, and well-ordered—for such a life is indeed a blessed life. But pleasures and amusements, laughter and intemperance, we must leave to those who love the flesh and love life—those who, though they see, do not see, and though they hear, do not hear, having hearts of stone and ears that are heavy, so that they cannot distinguish good from evil, light from darkness, life from death. But we, brothers, will hold fast to the confession “in which we stand, and in which we boast of the hope of God’s glory” (Rom. 5:2). Taking inspiration from the ascetic labors in which the saints toiled—among them the blessed Pachomius, whom we now praise in song—let us see soundly, hear soundly, feel soundly, and use all our members soundly, so that we may be heirs to eternal life according to the promise.

231. In the Lord's Ascension, our nature has been exalted: let us honor the greatness of this gift and adorn ourselves with every virtue

231. 1) In the Lord's Ascension, our nature has been exalted: let us honor the greatness of this gift, and let us adorn ourselves with every kind of virtue. – 2) Whoever is not like this is not a member of Christ: therefore, whoever is enslaved by any passion, repent and become like Him; whoever is occasionally subject to the stirrings of the passions, hasten to restore your spiritual serenity at all times. – 3) Hasten; for death is always near, and after death comes condemnation for those who have not repented. [4, 8]

1. We celebrate the Ascension of the Lord, the culmination of the incarnate work of our Lord Jesus Christ. Having accomplished all according to the Father's will, He ascended in glory, and, having raised us with Him, seated us in the heavens in His holy flesh. What "riches of His glory, and what surpassing greatness of His power" (Eph. 1:18–19), that He has exalted our humble and insignificant nature to the divine Royal Throne, and every heavenly power worships Him. As we reflect on this, let us be filled with awe and reverence, let us reverently honor the greatness of this gift, and let us live in a manner worthy of our Head, as members of Christ, as His co-heirs, "in purity, in knowledge, in patience, in kindness, in the Holy Spirit, in sincere love, in the word of truth, in the power of God" (2 Cor. 6: 6:7), with all obedience and humility, with all diligence and attentiveness, speaking nothing out of place and doing nothing contrary to the commandment.

2. Therefore, one who defiles the body is no longer a member of Christ; one who harbors malice is no longer a member of Christ; anyone else possessed by any passion is no longer a member of Christ; and therefore is no longer worthy to partake of the Holy Mysteries. For the Apostle says: "Let a person examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread and drink from the cup; for whoever eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment upon himself, not discerning the Lord's body. That is why many among you are weak and sick, and a number have fallen asleep. For if we were to judge ourselves, we would not be condemned; but when we are judged by the Lord, we are disciplined so that we may not be condemned with the world" (1 Cor. 11:28–32). Therefore, let us make ourselves worthy and purify ourselves, so that we may be rightly called members of Christ and may worthily partake of the Holy Mysteries. – If, however, through inattention we happen to be consumed by evil desire, or anger, or envy, or hatred, or anything else that is abhorrent to God, let us not be surprised. But let us quickly restore ourselves to our former good state of mind, come to our senses, and not linger in this evil; for willful delay in this matter brings inexcusable condemnation.

3. Moreover, might death not come unexpectedly?—Just yesterday we visited a sick bishop and found him in great distress, completely emaciated by fever, his gaze wandering here and there, finding no help anywhere. Could we not suffer the same fate at any moment?—And what are these torments compared to those to come? A dream and a shadow. That fire does not go out, that worm does not die, the darkness does not dissipate, the bonds are not loosened, the gnashing of teeth does not cease, and all other torments are eternal. If we reflect earnestly on this, brothers, we will cease to be lustful, envious, angry, judgmental, or slanderous, and we will do no other evil; but rather, let us be peaceful, maintain a good disposition, repent, do good deeds, love one another as God commands, and do all that is commanded with zeal and willingness, so that we may avoid eternal torment and attain eternal life.

232. The Lord promised to send another Comforter: this was fulfilled on Pentecost; this is a great thing

232. 1) The Lord promised to send another Comforter: this was fulfilled on Pentecost; this is a great thing. – 2) How, then, shall we respond? Let us confess the greatness of the King: let us be inspired to do every good deed and to oppose all that is passionate and carnal; in which there is only bitterness, but every comfort is found in God alone. – 3) Let us therefore flee from everything that is unlike Him. [4, 9]

4. We celebrate Pentecost and the coming of the Holy Spirit, of whom the Lord says: "You have the Holy Spirit, and I am going away; for if I do not go away, the Comforter will not come to you, but if I go, I will send Him to you. And when He comes, He will guide you into all the truth" (John 16:7, 13). What a promise! What an honor bestowed upon us! He promised not to send an angel or a man, but the Spirit of the same essence as Himself. Thus, the Only-Begotten Son of God, having fulfilled the Father's work, ascends into heaven, and the Holy Spirit descends—not another God—far be it from Him!—but another Comforter, as it is written. And—oh, ineffable love for mankind! God Himself is our Comforter. And He comforts the sorrowful and tormented soul, keeping it from losing heart in difficult circumstances, as the holy Apostle testifies, saying: "Outwardly we are in conflict, inwardly we are in fear; but God, who comforts the humble, comforts us...." (2 Cor. 7:5). He comforts the heart, terrified by demonic fears, lifting it through bold hope to invincible courage, as Saint David testifies: “You, O Lord, have helped me and comforted me” (Ps. 85:17). – He comforts by inspiring the troubled mind, assuring it that it has been granted peace with God and rest, as the Apostle testifies, saying: “We implore you on behalf of Christ, as though God were imploring through us: we implore you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God” (2 Cor. 5:20). – Do you see this unfathomable mercy? Do you see this incomparable gift? The Only-Begotten Son intercedes for us before the Father, as it is written: “He who is at the right hand of God, who also intercedes for us” (Rom. 8:34). Here on earth, the Holy Spirit comforts us in many ways.

5. What, then, shall we give to the Lord in return for this?—All that remains for us is to take up the psalmist’s song and cry out: “All my bones say: ‘O Lord, O Lord, who is like You? You who deliver the poor from the hand of those who are stronger than they, and the poor and needy from those who plunder them’” (Ps. 34:10). And again: “My help comes from the Lord, who made heaven and earth” (Ps. 123:8). And further: “If the Lord had not helped me, my soul would soon have gone down to the grave” (Ps. 93:7). And: “The Lord is my helper; I will not fear what man can do to me” (Ps. 117: 6). Having, then, such a Comforter, the Holy Spirit, an invincible power, the Great Defender—God—and a fellow warrior, we will not fear the enemy’s terror nor be daunted by opposing forces, but, having Him as our helper and ally, we will courageously and steadfastly rush into the struggles of asceticism and confession, enduring them day after day, not being deceived by the serpent’s temptations, and not growing weary under his ceaseless attacks; we will extinguish carnal love, which fills the house of our soul with fire. I assure you that this is not pleasure, but a dangerous disease; not sweetness, but a frenzy of the mind and an evil darkening. Those who have subdued the frenzy of the flesh, washed away its defilements, and clung with all their hearts to the one God—who is the sweetest and most desirable—know this. – Whoever has attained this dwells in the flesh and above the flesh, in the world and above the world; he abides here and lives beyond the visible; in him, the waves of grace, stirred by the gentle breezes of the Spirit, fill the soul with stillness as much as is possible.

6. Why, then, do we allow sensuality, having conquered us, to distort us to such an extent and change us so thoroughly that, bowing down to the earth, to flesh and blood, we become completely estranged from our all-good God? – Let us flee from every passion: let us flee from the love of money, the source of betrayal; let us flee from unbelief, which cuts us off from communion with the Lord; let us flee from every other passion, whatever form it may take in our souls—anger, envy, hatred, pride, self-righteousness, and isolation—so that death may not find us unprepared and alienate us from God; and alienation from God is alienation from the Kingdom of Heaven as well. No one who does not do what is pleasing to God can escape this. May we, therefore, be able to avoid the wrath to come against the sons of disobedience; let us begin to please God unceasingly, purify ourselves, and renew our souls. Take courage! The Lord is near to all who call upon Him.

233. The Feast of All Saints. – Who are they? All the martyrs: some martyrs of the blood, and others—of self-denial

233. 1) The Feast of All Saints. – Who are they? All the martyrs: some martyred by blood, others through acts of self-denial. – 2) We, too, are counted among them: our tyrants (– passions, passionate people, and demons –) demand that we turn away from God and join their side; since we refuse, we endure the sorrows of external deprivations and internal struggles. – 3) But let us remain steadfast to the end; and we shall be deemed worthy of the lot of the martyrs. [4, 10]

7. We have been deemed worthy to celebrate the feast of feasts, Holy Pentecost; now the feast of All Saints lies before us. – How many and what kind of saints are commemorated today? Who can count the stars of heaven and the sand by the seashore? – So countless are the saints of God, the witnesses to God’s truth and the martyrs, who faithfully resisted the hostile power of tyrants opposed to that truth and endured every kind of torment courageously and with joy—fire, swords, wild beasts, wheels, iron claws, and everything else that malice could devise, regarding their torments as comfort and the shedding of their blood as joy—and with this conviction, walking upon burning coals, quenching blazing fires with their blood, and accomplishing many things in their human nature that transcended human nature, thereby striking fear into the hearts of tyrants and kings—as a testimony to what? —That Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and that eternal life is given through His name, as it is written. But are those who shed their blood the only witnesses to the truth? —No; so too are all those who lived the divine life, of whom the Holy Apostle says that they “went about in sheepskins and goatskins, destitute, afflicted, and mistreated—of whom the world was not worthy—wandering in deserts and mountains, in caves and in the caverns of the earth.” And a little further down: “Since we are surrounded by such a great cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin that so easily entangles us, and let us run with endurance the race set before us, looking to the author and perfecter of our faith, Jesus” (Heb. 11:37–38; 12:1–2). Do you see how he calls all those who love piety—who willingly endure a life of sorrow with patience—martyrs?

8. Thus, brothers, we too are numbered among the host of martyrs: for by loving and patiently walking the sorrowful path of the cross-bearing life, by keeping the vow of chastity, and by not denying the many struggles of the obedience that lies before us, we bear witness that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, we bear witness that there is a judgment and a recompense; we bear witness that we must give an account before the dreadful judgment seat of Christ of how we have lived, resisting the devil, the enemy of Christ, who torments and scourges us with the temptations of evil thoughts and deadly lusts, compelling us to renounce God. And truly, those who, having become corrupted by their lawless thoughts and passions, obey and follow the adversary, declare by their very deeds and their very disposition that there is no God for them, as St. David said: “The fool says in his heart, ‘There is no God’” (Ps. 52:2). For unless the enemy first instills in people’s souls a forgetfulness of God—and, as it were, a renunciation of Him—he cannot incline the mind toward the lusts of the flesh, toward a license to sin, toward drunkenness, toward debauchery, toward feasting, toward greed, toward idolatry, and toward all manner of other improprieties; but having succeeded in this, he takes possession of the soul, and having torn it away from God, casts it into the unquenchable fire for eternal torment along with himself. How disastrous is such deception, and how dreadful is its end!

9. But we, as witnesses of Christ, will continue to bear good witness; we will continue to profess the true faith, rejoicing with all the saints that we have been deemed worthy to bear witness to Christ, without bowing the knee to Baal—that is, without yielding to the lusts of the flesh and other sinful pleasures; we will not believe the enemy when he plants thoughts of renouncing obedience in our minds, but we will valiantly resist him, being struck down but not defeated. – What fruit does such a martyr’s witness bear? Know this: the witnesses of Christ, who bore witness to Him before all and endured unimaginable torments for their true testimony, will be declared His co-heirs in the age to come, as the Apostle says: “When Christ, our life, appears, then you also will appear with Him in glory” (Col. 3:4). Together with them, may we, having continued our witness until the end of our lives, be deemed worthy to receive eternal rewards and to dwell with Christ forever in joy and gladness.

234. On Sunday, may the remembrance of the blessings that the Lord has secured for us through His resurrection serve as a lesson for us

234. 1) On Sunday, may the remembrance of the blessings the Lord has bestowed upon us through His resurrection serve as a lesson for us. – 2) When we recall them, we cannot help but feel moved to love the Lord who has loved us so much, demonstrating this love by keeping His commandments and turning away from everything displeasing to Him. – 3) To strengthen this impulse, let us reflect on mortality; the death of our brother Eudokimus now provides us with an occasion for this. [4, 12]

10. The very day of the Resurrection, which we celebrate today, provides us with sufficient instruction (Κατήχησις), if we pay attention. For on this day our Lord Jesus Christ raised us up, who had been cast down by sin; on this day He brought us back to life, we who had been put to death by our transgressions and by the uncircumcision of our flesh; on this day, He has once again opened paradise to us so that we may partake of the tree of life, which is His life-giving body and blood; on this day, having been raised from the dead, we can cry out with the prophetic word: “O death, where is your sting? O Hades, where is your victory?” (1 Cor. 15:55). You have been defeated by the One who said, “Take heart; I have overcome” (John 16:33); on this day, speaking through the words of the Apostle, God the Father “raised us up with Him and seated us with Him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus, so that in the ages to come He might show the surpassing riches of His grace through His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus” (Eph. 2:6–7). O inexpressible gift! From what and to what has He led us? From death to life, from darkness to light, from slavery to freedom, from enmity to sincere fellowship—and He has extended His mercy so far as to make us “conformed to the image of His Son” (Rom. 8:29). What ineffable grace this is! What overflowing greatness of His love for us! That He gave His only-begotten Son as a ransom for all of us. And how can we not cry out at this: “Who can declare the mighty acts of the Lord? Who can recount all His praises?” (Ps. 105:2).

11. Let us therefore love Him who has so loved us, and die for Him who died for us—not returning to flesh and blood, not being deceived by the serpent’s temptations, not being carried away by the pleasures of this life, and not allowing ourselves to taste the fruit of sin, from which comes death; for it is written: “For those who sin willfully after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there is no longer any sacrifice for sins; but a fearful expectation of judgment, and a fiery indignation that will devour those who oppose Him” (Heb. 10:26–27). Therefore, let us serve the Lord with caution and reverence; let us lead our lives with wisdom and good order; let us fulfill the duties entrusted to us with prudent patience, strictly adhering to what has been commanded—not only in spiritual matters but also in physical ones, even down to kindling firewood and drawing water.

12. Above all, let us remember that death is inevitable for us. – Even now, our brother Eudokim has departed to the Lord. – If the death of a brother does not bring us to our senses, what will finally turn us around? If the mystery of death does not convince us, what else can keep us from destructive passions? Is it not known that, even while we are speaking and deliberating about this or that, the dreadful hour of death may suddenly overtake us? – A dreadful and unbearable hour for those possessed by sin, for those whose failings have not been cleansed by repentance, for those who live in disorder, who are lawless and wayward—but a sweet and longed-for hour for those who love God, the pious and virtuous, the meek and humble. Therefore, I urge and remind you, brothers, to take these thoughts to heart: let us turn away from passions as much as we can, and, embracing Christ with love, excel in virtue, so that, having lived our entire lives in this way, we may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

235. Recalling how a certain man, as he was dying, cried out, “I am taken by surprise,” and breathed his last before he could finish his words—he draws the lesson: to live in such a way as to always be ready for death

235. 1) Recalling how a certain man, as he was dying, cried out, “I am taken by surprise,” and breathed his last before he could finish his words—he draws the lesson: to live in such a way as to always be ready for death. – 2) Then, hinting that this is most easily achieved in a communal setting, he expresses sympathy for those who live alone and praises those who live in pairs or threes, but especially those who live in a community. [4, 13]

13. Today is Sunday; and I am to speak to you about death. You see how often our brothers and fathers, one after another, depart from us. For us, this is nothing other than a reminder that we, too, will soon pass from here—not to some earthly and perishable place, but to incorporeal and eternal dwellings, from which there is no return for anyone who has once entered there. – Truly, death is terrifying when one hears of it; but it is incomparably more terrifying when one sees it with one’s own eyes, as we experienced six days ago at the death of the Abbot of Chalkis. We were with him as he drew his last breath, and we were astonished by what had happened—how he had been with us one moment and, in the next, had departed from us, having succumbed to death. Truly a terrifying account and a spine-chilling sight! While still breathing, the blessed one uttered these words: “I have been taken by surprise”; and with these words, shaking his head and hand slightly, he fell silent, not having had time to explain what had happened. – But we sensed what this astonishing event meant. I have told you this not to cast any shadow upon the departed; far be it from me! – But to warn ourselves and to inspire you—to ensure that the final hour does not catch us off guard, and that the same cry does not burst from our throats at the moment of our passing; but let us always be ready for that hour, and meet it without confusion. For it is written: “I have prepared myself and have not been dismayed” (Ps. 118: 60). But we will not achieve this unless we are always mindful of ourselves, and unless we steadfastly preserve the good we do and correct through repentance the sins we commit, always ordering our lives as if we were to be taken up to heaven at once. – For before whom must we appear there? Is it not before the Judge of all and before God, “to whom every knee in heaven, on earth, and under the earth will bow, and every tongue will confess”? (Phil. 2: 10). And what answer must we give? Is it not for everything we have done in life—in deed, word, and thought?

14. Whenever I recall this, it fills me with dread and nearly robs me of my senses. But you may contemplate this without fear—you, I say, who are obedient and have entrusted all your care to the power of obedience; for such is indeed the life of true obedience. But what defense will those who turn away from obedience and live in isolation, wandering here and there and finding no firm ground to stand on, prepare for themselves before the dreadful Throne of Christ? Alas, what sorrow! How alluring is evil! How have those who were walking rightly along the path of the monastic life turned back? “For it would have been better for them never to have known the way of righteousness than, after knowing it, to turn back from the holy commandments entrusted to them. For they have become a true parable: a dog returns to its own vomit, and a pig, after washing itself, returns to wallowing in the mud" (2 Peter 2:21–22). What is this, my friend? Are you bearing the yoke of a slave?! This is how those who leave the monastery to live alone justify themselves, saying that the monastery is slavery. You, who have cast off the yoke of the world, fled from it, and freed yourself from all carnal customs? Are you not going to take a wife as well?! For these two things are inseparable: the things of the world and the things that belong to the world. — But for those who lead a life of the cross, both are foreign. — Yet the reason for this, as usual, is sin. Since we are lustful and greedy for money, a love of women naturally follows. So that there may be no witness or accuser of what happens in secret, we do not want to have a brother as a companion, but choose solitude—or, more accurately, the slavery of greed—as those who have already completely sold themselves to sin and become slaves to flesh and blood. Hence the decay of our inner order; hence the temptations; hence the falls. For me, this is a cause for weeping and lamentation. I denounce and forbid such things; but they do not listen. Yet let such people heed what the Lord says: "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not have had sin; but now they have no excuse for their sin" (John 15:22). I am innocent of the blood of such people. I could cut them off entirely from our community, according to the command, "Treat them as pagans"; but since there is persecution now, I am postponing this; "lest, having escaped the devil's snares, they be caught alive by him and fall into his will" (2 Tim. 2:26). But you are blessed by the Lord—those who live together in pairs or threes, and, what is even more praiseworthy, those who live according to the monastic rule, staying at home and refraining from unnecessary outings except when absolutely necessary, especially to markets and festivals, serving one another, and thereby reigning over the world, doing all things in a godly and orderly manner—may grace and peace be multiplied to you, and may you behold the blessings of the heavenly Jerusalem, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

236. Let us be watchful, nourishing this watchfulness with the word of God and with the expectation of the Lord's sudden coming, when those who are watchful will be caught up to meet Him

236. 1) Let us remain vigilant, nourishing our vigilance with the Word of God and with the expectation of the Lord's sudden coming, when those who are vigilant will be caught up to meet Him. — 2) Who are these people? Those who are adorned with the virtues mentioned in the Lord's Sermon on the Beatitudes. Let us therefore diligently work out our salvation in this way, without fear of the coming persecution, whatever form it may take. [4, 14]

15. We must speak, and by no means remain silent for long. For silence lulls the soul to sleep, and such sleep is the cause of death; praying for deliverance from it, Saint David says: "Enlighten my eyes, lest I fall asleep unto death" (Ps. 12). But the Word moving within the heart is a spring of water welling up to eternal life: what could be more beneficial than this? And knowing this, the blessed Apostle said: "Let the Word of Christ dwell in you richly, teaching and admonishing one another in all wisdom" (Col. 3:16). See how he commands us to teach and admonish one another, and not to be content with our own reminders alone. I humbly confess that every time I speak to you, I derive great benefit from it: I pull myself back from the turmoil of this life, become more sober-minded, and come to realize my own sins. For truly, life here is full of turmoil; every day, evil words and vain rumors are poured into our ears, and moreover, the devil attacks us with thoughts opposed to what is good. All this must be driven away by the word, and we must keep our conscience pure, paying attention to what we are committed to. To what, then, are we committed? —To "serve the living and true God" (Heb. 9:14), "and to wait for His Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead—Jesus, who delivers us from the coming wrath," as it is written (1 Thess. 1:10). But no servant slumbers, rests, or sleeps while awaiting his master, to whom he is accountable, but rather stays alert and watchful, anxious about meeting him—about which the Apostle again speaks clearly: "For the Lord Himself will descend from heaven with a command, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ will rise first; then we who are alive and remain will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and thus we will always be with the Lord" (1 Thess. 4:16–17).

16. But who are these? The poor in spirit, those who mourn, the pure in heart, the meek, the peacemakers, the merciful, those who have borne the yoke of obedience, and those who have kept their confession unbroken—these will be with Him; but those who have committed evil deeds, the disobedient, the rebellious, those who have fallen away from the faith, those who refuse to obey, and the perpetrators of every other evil—these will neither be caught up in the clouds nor be with the Lord, but—and this is the most tragic thing— “they will suffer punishment, eternal destruction away from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of His power” (2 Thess. 1:9): may such a thing never be thought or spoken of us! —Why, then, must we take every possible care to ensure our salvation, knowing that persecution lies before us and that trials are drawing near? But let us not be intimidated or afraid of the trials that rise up against us. “If God is for us, who can be against us?” (Rom. 8:31). If He was with us in past persecutions, why would He not be with us, the humble, in the present ones as well, granting us strength and power for everything, according to His promise? And what can our enemies do to us?—Will they banish us again? But “The earth is the Lord’s, and everything in it” (Ps. 23:1). Will they imprison us again? But there is nothing sweeter than prison when one is there for Christ’s sake. Will they flog us again? But all the more will they grant us crowns. What if they even put us to death? For our Lord Himself was put to death. That is why the Apostle says: “If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we endure, we shall also reign with Him” (2 Tim. 2:11–12). Such was the blessed Theodore, the greatest witness of Christ, whose memory we now celebrate. He endured everything with joy for Christ’s sake. With the same faith, we too, in our humility, will continue to serve the Lord; with the same hope, we will endure every sorrow and hardship of our present afflictions, so that, both for our obedience and for our confession, we may be deemed worthy to be heirs of the kingdom of heaven, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

237. Scattered. Encourages us to rejoice in this

237. 1) Scattered. It inspires us to rejoice in this. – 2) It exposes the absurdity of iconoclastic judgments. – 3) It justifies what is said against them. – 4) And it invites us to serve the truth not only in word but also in deed, or by a life worthy of it. [4, 15]

17. Yesterday we celebrated the feast of St. John the Forerunner of the Lord, and in doing so we reflected on our monastic life. But back then we were all together, “and in the house of God we walked in one accord” (Ps. 54:5). Now, however, we are scattered—each to his own place—across various locations and settlements. Nevertheless, since this scattering is for God’s sake, we must rejoice, in accordance with the commandment given; for the Lord said: “Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven” (Matt. 5:12). Moreover, through this we become like the Lord, who said: “If they have cast Me out, they will also cast you out; if they have kept My word, they will also keep yours. But all these things they do to you for My name’s sake, because they do not see Him who sent Me” (John 15:20–21).

18. And truly, just as the Jews, by not receiving the Son, showed that they did not know the Father, so too the iconoclasts, by not receiving the icon of Christ, show that they do not know Christ. The truth is plain; yet only one in a thousand knows it. See how their wicked reasoning is twofold: at one moment they say that it is absolutely forbidden to place an icon of Christ; at another, they say that it is permissible—but only on the same level as the symbols used in war and hunting; but they insist that one must not worship them, just as one does not bow down to the image of a horse, an ox, a lion, a tiger, a snake, a fish, or a bird. Hearing this, who would not groan, who would not shed tears, that they are not ashamed to equate the icon of Christ—before which angels revere and demons tremble—with images of four-legged animals, reptiles, fish, and birds, and, like them, do not consider it their duty to honor it? “What a terrible fabrication, and what an even more terrible audacity!” “And what else?” “They call an image of a man a man, an ox an ox, a camel a camel—and in general, they name the image after the one depicted—but they absolutely refuse to allow the icon of Christ the Lord, the Mother of God, or any of the saints, they absolutely refuse to call by their names, not even figuratively, but simply say “icon,” without adding whose it is, so that, as they think, they may not sin. They are filled with such folly and such blasphemy! But you, brothers, heed what has been said by our holy fathers and know that if the places where Christ was born are holy and venerated and named as such, and anyone—whether they receive a grain of sand or a stone from there—accepts, preserves, and honors it as a sacred treasure; is not the icon of Christ all the more worthy of honor and worship, in which He is clearly seen, as in a mirror, and evokes feelings befitting Him, as if He were present? For such is the nature of an image that it represents the person depicted.

19. Therefore, I, the humble one, grieving in my heart over the iconoclastic delusion and fearing punishment for my silence, am compelled to say what I say, though it is little and brief. If those of other faiths do not cease, in private and in public, in writing and orally, to direct their blasphemous tongues against Christ; why should we, sitting at home, not converse among ourselves about what is fitting under the present circumstances?—And how shall we endure the Lord’s wrath if we act otherwise? And what kind of imitators of our fathers will we be, who rightly called silence and hiding in such a case a betrayal of the truth?

20. Therefore, we must speak and listen, serving the truth in both word and deed. The holy Apostles conquered the world not only through divine preaching but also through their blameless lives, enlightening those who were in darkness and seasoning those who were corrupted with the salt of wisdom, carrying with them only a loaf of bread and a staff. By imitating them, brothers, we too will earn approval, being content with what we have, not coveting silver, but showing ourselves to be ungreedy, not making untimely departures, and not associating with women, from whom comes death. If we conduct ourselves in this way, God will be glorified in us, our confession will be exalted, and our adversaries will, if only a little, be put to shame and be inclined toward conversion. If not, however, there is a danger that, instead of receiving blessing, we may incur eternal condemnation. May God Himself, the God of peace, who transforms all things and turns them to the best, bring peace to His Church; may He keep us faithful to the truth and lead us into His heavenly kingdom.

238. Now is the time of harvest. Our spiritual harvest is similar to it

238. 1) Now is the time of harvest. Our spiritual harvest is similar to it. – 2) Our fruits are virtues. – 3) The granary is humility. – 4) The time is our entire life. – 5) The methods are all our deeds and acts of obedience. [4, 16]

21. The present time is the time of harvest, the time of toil and sweat, when the words of the Psalm are fulfilled: “Man goes out to his work and to his labor until evening” (Ps. 103: 23), giving himself no rest until he has finished the harvest, threshed the reaped grain, and brought the harvested seeds into the granary. – What can be said to this? – If such labor is required for earthly gain, is it not all the more necessary for spiritual gain? We, too, have a harvest ahead of us, as the Apostle says: “Whoever sows sparingly will also reap sparingly, and whoever sows generously will also reap generously” (2 Cor. 9:6). Again, the Lord said to His disciples: “Do you not say, ‘There are still four months until the harvest’?—I tell you, lift up your eyes and look at the fields, for they are already ripe for harvest. The reaper receives wages and gathers fruit for eternal life; so both the sower and the reaper rejoice together” (John 4:35–36). Here the harvest is pointed out to us.

22. Let us therefore go out with all our zeal to the harvest, to gather fruits—not carnal and fleeting, but spiritual and enduring for eternal life: sanctification and peace, love and joy, kindness and patience, mercy and gentleness, and every other virtue. These are the spiritual fruits that must be gathered with discernment—so that nothing evil is mixed in with the good; that is, to love without partiality, to strive for goodness without envy, to speak of one’s brother without hostility, and in general to sincerely “do the will of God, which is good, pleasing, and perfect” (Rom. 12:2).

23. As for bringing in the fruits into the granary, this will be their secure storage in the treasury of humility, as the Lord Himself indicated, saying: “When you have done all that is commanded you, say, ‘We are unworthy servants; we have done what we were obliged to do’” (Luke 17:10); and as the Apostle also instructs us, saying: “What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?” (1 Cor. 4:7).

24. Such is our harvest, and such is our labor—not one that lasts two or three months, but one that extends to the very end of our lives; yet, when compared to the age to come, it will be counted as a single day: for there is no end there; there, everyone will feed on the fruits of their labor for all eternity and will rejoice in this forever.

25. Let us “put to death the earthly parts of our nature: sexual immorality, impurity, passion, evil desire, and greed” (Col. 3:5); only let us humbly bear the yoke of obedience, supporting one another, and “bearing one another’s burdens, and thus fulfilling the law of Christ,” as it is written (Gal. 6:2). And blessed is the one who reverently bows his head to all; blessed is the one who has labored the most: for the greater the labor, the greater the reward; and the one who takes upon himself the last service will be honored with the first place, as the Lord says: “Whoever among you wishes to be great must be the least of all and the servant of all. For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve and to give His life as a ransom for many” (Mark 9:35; 10:44–45). Let us reflect on this, brothers, and strive to act accordingly, so that we may be worthy to hear that voice: “Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, I will set you over many things; enter into the joy of your Lord” (Matt. 25: 21).

239. The Harvest. Everyone works without growing weary: so must we—each one working at his own task

239. 1) The Harvest. Everyone works without growing weary: so must we—each one working at his own task. – 2) There, they may cite their infirmities, but we must not; for all that is required is: desire it and seek it. – 3) This is how the fathers acted, and now they are reaping the fruits of it. [4, 17]

26. It is harvest time, as you can see, and every farmer sets out to gather the grain. Neither the strenuous labor nor the scorching sun wearies the worker; but from morning till evening he toils, now bending, now straightening, until he finishes the task set before him. “And we, who call ourselves servants of Christ and lead a monastic life, do we also have a harvest?” “Yes, we do”—and such a harvest as our Lord Jesus Christ indicated to His disciples, saying: “Do you say, ‘There are still four months until the harvest comes’? I tell you, lift up your eyes and look at the fields, for they are already ripe for harvest. The reaper receives wages and gathers fruit for eternal life; so both the sower and the reaper rejoice together” (John 4:35–36). It is evident, then, that we have both sowing and reaping, and moreover, these do not last for a fixed period of time, but lie before us continuously and forever. Let us therefore, brothers, reap diligently—the teacher in teaching, the overseer in caring for all, the steward in stewardship, the servant in service, the novice in obedience, the one who keeps silence in silence, the one who prays in patient perseverance in prayer—all in everything, to the best of our ability. It would be entirely incongruous if, while those engaged in physical labor devote themselves so diligently to their tasks, we were to approach our spiritual endeavors with laziness and carelessness; if, while they persevere, drenched in sweat, without shirking their labors, we were to feel aversion toward ascetic practices. Is it not the Kingdom of Heaven that lies before us? Is it not eternal life? Is it not inexpressible joy?—And is it even possible, by giving in to laziness, to attain anything great and desirable? By no means. Therefore, we must rouse ourselves from the slumber of laziness and indolence and set to work with all our zeal; for what we seek is not something perishable and fleeting, but something imperishable and eternal; so that it may be said of us: “You shall reap the fruit of your labor; blessed are you, and good will come to you” (Ps. 127:2).

27. Let no one say, “I am weak; I cannot reap.” One who is weak in body cannot bear physical labor; but in spiritual work, desire it, and you will be strong to do good: you have tears, you have contrition, you have a sound mind, you have peace, and you have holiness—all of which are most pleasing to God (Heb. 12:14). Let no one say, “I have been crushed by a fall; I cannot rise or walk upright.” You need only desire and seek—and He will lift you up, “He who lifts the poor from the dust and raises the needy from the ash heap” (Ps. 112:7). “Does one who falls not rise again? Or does one who turns away not return?” (Jer. 8:4). “As I live,” says the Lord, “I have no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but that the wicked turn from his way and live” (Ezek. 33:11). What blessed pretext, then, can we have—what plausible excuse—for not approaching the fulfillment of the commandments with all our zeal, so as to thus obtain the promised blessings?

28. Behold how the holy fathers labored, sowing, reaping, and gathering into their granaries, and now they rejoice, awaiting the coming of the last day, on which they will shine forth like the sun. Let us not, then, brothers, allow ourselves to be separated from those blessed ones, nor let us sell our salvation for a few insignificant and fleeting pleasures, only to be tormented for eternity; but, with all our strength, let us strive to follow in their footsteps, enduring and suffering all things, so that we may inherit the kingdom of heaven in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

240. Laypeople, when they die, leave a will; and monks, too, sometimes leave a will; what kind?

240. 1) Laypeople, when they die, leave a will; and monks, too, leave a will; what kind? – That we are strangers and sojourners here, and must not seek what is of this world. – 2) Let us heed this testament and set about fulfilling it, – 3) imitating the fathers, who all acted in this way. [4, 18]

1. Harvest time weakens the body, makes vigil-keeping difficult, and sometimes even makes one lazy when it comes to listening to teachings. But since, according to the Apostle’s teaching, we must be as though we were dying every day—and a dying person usually speaks his final words, his parting words—and thereby makes his listeners attentive; let us not be lazy in listening either, but let us pay attention to what is being said, as if we were present at the reading of a will. – The will of those who live according to the flesh, like , is carnal and speaks of carnal matters—namely, what inheritance is left to the wife, children, brothers, and relatives, and what other dispositions are made, as is customary. In our way of life, however, a will does not state anything of the sort; but what does it state?—That we are strangers and sojourners on earth, and that, as “we brought nothing into this world, and it is evident that we can carry nothing out” (1 Tim. 6:7), passing from corruption to incorruption, from dishonor to glory, from mortality to immortality; so that one would not be wrong to call such a will the Gospel: for even the Apostle acknowledged that “to depart and be with Christ is far better” (Phil. 1: 23). And again in another place: “I am already being poured out as a drink offering, and the time of my departure has come: I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that Day—and not only to me, but also to all who have loved His appearing” (2 Tim. 4: 6–8).

2. You see that he is speaking of our departure from this life, as if preaching the Gospel. Therefore, since our testament is the Gospel, let us listen with delight to what is said in it and by its power, and let us zealously strive for spiritual deeds, turning neither our attention nor our hearts to anything of this world—neither to parents, nor to brothers, nor to relatives, nor to anything created at all, imitating a certain holy father who, when he left his cell, would place a veil over his head so as not to look at the sun’s radiance, and who, when asked the reason for this, replied: “Why should I desire to see this temporary light?” This God-loving man, having stepped beyond the bounds of all creation, is consumed by a single love for God and the contemplation of divine things. He contemplates the creatures beneath the heavens, marveling at and praising the supreme Artist—God; but soon, having left behind all that is sensory, he immerses himself in the contemplation of invisible things, drawing from this the most exquisite spiritual joy and delight.

3. Such was also Patriarch Abraham, for it is written: “By faith Abraham went into the land of promise as into a foreign land, and dwelt in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise; for he was looking forward to the city that has foundations, whose architect and builder is God” (Heb. 11:9–10). Such was also the great Moses, who “by faith left Egypt, not fearing the king’s anger; for he endured as seeing Him who is invisible” (Heb. 11:27). Such were also all the saints, who did not look at the visible but at the invisible, and who sought not the temporary but the eternal, thereby forming themselves in divine imitation, as far as it is possible. – Let us, too, embrace this aspiration, and never allow ourselves to covet the splendors of this age, or to marvel at those who live according to the flesh; but rather, let us lament for them, that, having received the gospel of the inheritance of the promised blessings, they are preoccupied with the acquisition of gold and silver, and with perishable pleasures. But we, brothers, speaking in the words of the Apostle, “gazing with an unveiled face at the glory of the Lord” (2 Cor. 3: 18), will seek what is above and will set our minds on what is above, “where Christ is seated at the right hand of God” (Col. 3: 1:2), so that it may also be said of us: “You are not of this world” (John 15:19), “and your citizenship is in heaven” (Phil. 3:20), where may we stand uncondemned on the day of God’s righteous judgment, before the dreadful throne of Christ, and hear the longed-for voice calling us to the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven.

241. Patience is the greatest virtue; it is the path of the saints; let us also excel in it

241. 1) Patience is the greatest virtue; it is the path of the saints; let us, too, excel in it. – 2) Do you wish to excel? – Subdue your will, – and you will easily endure everything; furthermore, – be zealous in patience; for the more you endure, the better and higher you will become. – 3) He reports that, although they are in exile, they live a monastic life and accept those who wish to join them; and he adds: “You who are older and more senior, set an example for the younger ones in everything.” [4, 19]

4. Let us joyfully endure all that is difficult and sorrowful for God’s sake, in the hope of a reward. “For hope that is seen is not hope,” as the Apostle says: “For what does one hope for that he already sees? But if we hope for what we do not see, we wait for it with patience” (Rom. 8:24–25). Thus, patience is the greatest of all virtues; for their patience, the martyrs are adorned with heavenly diadems; through patience, the saints have earned the crowns of righteousness. Let us, too, show patience in obedience, in humility, in forbearance, in performing our duties, and in everything that requires the exercise of patience; and we, too, will receive a reward equal to theirs.

5. I know the yoke of obedience; I know the pain of having one’s will cut off; but I also know the sweetness of such a life. For when one’s own will is cut off, the path is easy, and salvation is at hand; so that as soon as one’s will is cut off, a peaceful and blessed life appears at the same time. In communal life there are labors, but there are also consolations. Who labors more than his brother?—but he will also receive a greater reward. “Each will receive his own reward according to his own labor,” says the Apostle (1 Cor. 3:8). Who submits to another out of love? Yet he will be honored with preeminence in due time. For the Lord said, “Whoever wishes to be first among you must be your servant” (Matt. 20:27). Is anyone unable to take on tasks that are too heavy? Let him not neglect those that are within his power; so that God may be glorified in all things, and no one may be unfit for anything useful to the brotherhood. Although this has often been said, it is still necessary to remind you now: for the task before us is no small one. “Behold, I have set before you life and death,” says Scripture (Deut. 30: 19). So that we may cling to life and avoid eternal death—for this purpose are our words and our comfort, our teaching and our exhortation. And I know and am convinced that what is spoken is not in vain, neither for me, the humble one, nor for you who hear it.

6. I do not want you to be unaware that, although we are in exile for the sake of the Word of God, we live as if in a monastery: we do not turn away those who come with a desire to renounce the world. We accomplish this through our brothers scattered throughout the land, who are commanded to receive such people, as far as possible, and to admit them into the brotherhood. It is true that many have departed from us, but many have also joined us; and our brotherhood is growing. God is glorified in us; He will also glorify us in Himself, according to His promise. But as the leaders are, so are those under them—therefore I ask you, who stand at the head as an example to others, to live in a reverent, righteous, and godly manner, guiding others toward righteousness through your own lives, both in word and deed. Let there be no unseemly shouting among us, nor contentious talk; and “let no corrupting talk come out of your mouths, but only such as is good for building up, as fits the occasion, that it may impart grace to those who hear” (Eph. 4:29), so that your work among them may not be defiled by this, but that, having pleased the Lord, our good God, in everything, we may be deemed worthy to receive the promised blessings.

242. The Transfiguration—a foreshadowing of the age to come... We are destined for such radiance and beauty, just as we were originally created

242. 1) The Transfiguration is a foreshadowing of the age to come. We are destined for such radiance and beauty, just as we were originally created. – 2) Since this is so, let us love this radiance and beauty, turning away from all that is ugly, passionate, and impure. – 3) If, however, such a thing should happen, let us hasten to purify ourselves;—and let no one say, “I cannot,” for God has promised to do this for those who seek Him; and we have many examples. — 4) Therefore, if anyone remains alien to this, it is solely due to willful indifference and carelessness. [4, 20]

7. As we are now privileged to celebrate the vigil of the Divine Transfiguration, we have composed this sermon from it, fulfilling our duty with a few words. All the Lord’s feasts commemorate the mysteries of the incarnation of our Savior Jesus Christ—namely, that He was born, baptized, crucified, buried, rose on the third day, and ascended in glory; but the Feast of the Transfiguration depicts the state of the age to come. For just as at the Transfiguration the Lord’s face shone like the sun, and His garments became white as light, so He will come again from heaven like lightning, in great power and glory, to judge all; and just as Saint Peter, James, and John were with Him on the mountain; so too will the elect be with Him in the kingdom of heaven, rejoicing in the ineffable Theophany and inexpressible joy. – And who is worthy of such power? Who is worthy to partake of that joy? Who else but one who has a pure and blameless life? For our God is pure, like the brightest light, and accepts only the pure to Himself; and having placed a pure soul within us, He will demand that same purity from us. For if it is created in the image and likeness of God, it is clear that, being a reflection of divine beauty, it too shares in this beauty. And knowing this, the Psalmist says: “O Lord, by Your will, grant strength to my goodness” (Ps. 29:8), that is, to the beauty of the soul, so that, having otherwise succumbed to hideous sinful passions and become hideous itself, it may not fall away from God and be deprived of divine rewards.

8. Since it is thus confessed that we possess such a soul—beautiful and good—and must present it to God as a pledge on the last day of the resurrection; I therefore ask and implore that we love this beauty of hers and preserve this goodness of hers, turning neither our attention nor our hearts toward the beauties of this age or the pleasures of flesh and blood; for these are not true beauties, but mere idols of beauty—or rather, decay and dust. We see this even in what happens before our very eyes: for today’s most virtuous and beautiful person will tomorrow lie in a coffin, emitting a foul odor and repelling everyone. Thus, there is nothing here that is virtuous or truly lovely, except for one wondrous virtue, which we must strive for above all else.

9. If, however, as is often the case, an unstable soul becomes defiled by ungodly thoughts—for “who can claim to have a pure heart?” (Prov. 20: 9)—then it must be cleansed as soon as possible and restored to its former good state, lest, by lingering in evil, it bring about death. —And let no one say, “I cannot be cleansed, being burdened by many sins,” upon hearing what the Lord says: “Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red as crimson, they shall be as white as wool” (Isa. 1: 18). Do you see God’s ineffable love for humanity, by which He promises not only to cleanse the repentant but also to raise them to the heights of noble beauty? – And examples of this are right before our eyes. The prophet David fell into the sins of adultery and murder, yet he did not despair; rather, having quickly turned to repentance, he regained his prophetic gift. – King Manasseh led Israel astray from the true God for fifty-five years; but he repented—and found salvation. The Chief of the Apostles, after denying the Lord, used the healing power of tears and once again took up the burden of the Apostleship. Mary of Egypt—I will pass over in silence many other countless examples—who had reached the very depths of carnal impurity, yet because she repented as she ought, subsequently ascended to the very heights of virtue.

10. Thus, there is not a single excuse for claiming powerlessness or impossibility, provided that one sincerely desires to be saved and eagerly sets about this task. It is impossible only for those who are utterly insensitive and willfully surrender themselves to death. – Why do we hear: “Why do you all die, O house of Israel?” says the Lord (Ezek. 18:31). Why, when immortal life lies before us, do we choose eternal death? Our good Lord cries out daily: “Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Matt. 11:28). But we do not want to cast off the burden of our sins. He cries out: “I am the light of the world; whoever follows Me will not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life” (John 8:12). Yet we turn in the opposite direction, our very deeds spewing out blasphemous words: “Depart from us; we do not wish to see Your ways” (Job 21:14).—After this, all that remains for us is to hear the verdict of condemnation and rejection: “Walk by the light of your fire and by the flame you have kindled” (Isa. 50:11). Let us know, however, that “those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God” (Gal. 5: 21), as the Apostle says. – But let it not be that this might justly be said of us as well. – “You are my friends if you do what I command you,” says the Lord (John 15:14). Let us, then, do all that is commanded, so that we may be deemed worthy to be friends of the Lord and to inherit the kingdom of heaven.

243. Blessed Michael, Metropolitan of Synada, has departed this life: let us honor his memory, for he is still an intercessor for us

243. 1) Blessed Michael, Metropolitan of Synada, has departed this life: let us honor his memory, for he is still an intercessor for us. – 2) But let us also learn a lesson from his passing—to always keep ourselves ready for the end; for death can come suddenly, as we see in countless examples. – 3) Let no one say, “I cannot”; for this is within our power. [4, 21]

11. Our spiritual father, His Holiness Metropolitan Michael of Synada, has departed to the Lord. His life was praiseworthy, and his word was powerful; and we believe that in the coming judgment, together with other fathers and confessors, we will have him as our intercessor before the Lord. Therefore, let not the infamous iconoclasts exalt themselves, saying that the confessors of Christ are grieved (by the death of St. Michael); but rather let them recognize that the passing of such individuals is an unshakable stronghold for the Church of God, for us who remain a confirmation of the truth, and a rebuke to their deluded falsehood.

12. But since it is “faith working through love” that saves a person (Gal. 5:6), I ask you now, as always, to faithfully fulfill the divine commandments and to keep yourselves ever ready for the journey home, since the hour of death is unknown. For you know that our father, mentioned earlier, suddenly seized by severe pains and a burning fever, fell silent the very next day, and on the third day gave up his spirit to the Lord. But even before him, Athanasius, the renowned Abbot of Pavlo-Petrovsky, did not spend even a single day in sickness, but was almost immediately taken from among men. We hear that some, struck by lightning, die; others drown at sea; in short, there are many unexpected accidents, because of which we must be vigilant and fearful, lest the devil, deceiving us day by day with forgetfulness of death, suddenly bring us to our final hour in utter astonishment, after which we will be unable to do anything in the matter of repentance. – Do these examples not frighten us? Does it not fill us with dread when we consider that at that hour our tongue will be tied and unable to utter a sound? And how the soul, separated from the body, will depart, when there may be many present and weeping, yet no one to help but a good conscience? Therefore, I urge and implore you: let us always strive to remain in confession, in tears, in prayer, in obedience, in humility, in diligent obedience, and in every good deed, so that in the final hour, if we are caught unawares by it in negligence and carelessness, we may not “fall asleep in eternal death,” from which Saint David prays for deliverance (Ps. 12:4).

13. But perhaps someone will say: I want to, but I cannot. – What kind of talk is this? – If the matter concerns something that goes against the natural order, I agree that it is impossible, for example, for us to fly through the air, walk on the sea, or speak through our noses and smell with our tongues; all such things are impossible and unnatural. But if the matter concerns something that is natural and depends on our free will, then such a statement is false; for just as we can behave frivolously and laugh, so can we be dignified and shed tears; just as we can defile ourselves with sinful desires and the entanglements of inappropriate thoughts, so can we keep ourselves blameless and pure from passions; and just as we can become hardened and persist in evil, so can we be moved to compassion and repent. Even if evil lust, having become a habit within us, has rendered us powerless to do good and strong in evil; yet we must not despair—far be it from us—but willingly take up the task once more, and strive in every way not to spend even a single day, let alone an hour, carelessly, but always to be sober and watchful, to be blameless and pure, and clinging to God, so that we too may say: “My soul clings to You; Your right hand upholds me” (Ps. 62:9); and in this way, having lived our life here well, to depart from here with good hope, and there to receive the Kingdom of Heaven.

244. 1) Returning from the funeral of Saint John of Chalcedon, he praises the brothers for finding them in their usual good order and expresses his wish that they always remain so. – 2) He then denounces the folly of certain interpretations he has heard. The first rumor: the saint was holy both in faith and in life, so how could he have died like that? (from diarrhea). The second rumor is that after the Resurrection we will not recognize one another, for these bodies decay and are scattered to who knows where. – 3) At the end, he offers an exhortation: to keep the faith—for you see how many deviations there are—and to live holy lives—for you know by what winds and how many the enemy blows against us. [4, 22]

14. Having been away from you for only a short time in recent days, and now having returned, I found you living in harmony with one another and in good spirits, and I gave thanks to the Lord for your orderliness, —which is characteristic of skilled and steadfast disciples of the Lord; may you be strengthened in it again and again by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, so that, both in my humble presence and in my absence, you may always remain sound and unharmed. The reason for my absence, as you know, was the death of the blessed Metropolitan John of Chalcedon, who, having striven in good works, completed his course, and kept the faith, departed to the Lord to receive the crown of martyrdom with the holy fathers and brothers who preceded him.

15. But since he died of a debilitating bout of diarrhea, some, marveling at this, say: “If he was a good man, how could he have died such a bad death?” – Such people are troubled by ignorance of the matter: for whether a death is good or bad is not determined by the manner in which someone died, but by whether one kept the Orthodox faith and led a blameless life; and the deceased was precisely such a person. Whether someone dies of dropsy, of diarrhea, or of some other destructive ailment—on land or at sea—there is nothing to reproach in this; for it does not depend on us, but lies in God’s hidden judgments. God knows what is best for each person and arranges it accordingly, whether it be the prolongation of life or its end. Others, however, insist on a different view to the ruin of those who hear them—namely, that in the last days, when the Son of God comes to judge all, we will not recognize one another; for, they say, how is this possible when we, who are mortal as we are, will become incorruptible and immortal, and when there will be no longer Greek, Jew, barbarian, Scythian, slave, free, male, or female, but all will be angelic in form? – I, however, maintain that it will be possible for us to recognize one another, and first of all, recall that “what is impossible for man is possible for God” (Luke 18:27); for we confess the resurrection itself, not basing our belief on human reasoning. For human reasoning cannot comprehend how a body that has decayed and been scattered far and wide—devoured by beasts, pecked at by birds, or swallowed by fish—could possibly be gathered together as one and rise again on the last day; and yet, by the ineffable power of God, every body will be gathered into one and will rise again, and every soul will recognize its own body, with which it lived on earth; and if it recognizes its own body, there is no doubt that it will also recognize the body of its brother. Furthermore, such reasoning leads to the denial of the future Judgment: for judgment is passed on known persons; no one brings before a court people who do not know themselves and are not known, but only those who are known, as it is written: “I will rebuke you and set your sins before your face” (Ps. 49:21). So, if we do not recognize one another, we will not be judged; and if we are not judged, we will not receive a fitting reward for our deeds. Moreover, how will the words spoken by the Lord to the Apostles be fulfilled: “You will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Matt. 19:28), if they do not know those whom they are to judge? Thus, it is proven from every angle how inappropriate such an assumption is, and how it is as ungodly as Origen’s fable. But we, brothers, will continue to believe that we will rise again, and that we will recognize one another not in our present corruptible state, but in the beauty of incorruption, according to God's ineffable will, just as our first parents in Paradise knew one another before the Fall, being incorruptible, and after the Fall, having been subjected to corruption, also knew one another. Why must we believe that in the age to come a brother will recognize a brother, a father his child, a wife her husband, and one another—I will add further, —an ascetic will recognize an ascetic, a confessor will recognize a confessor, a martyr will recognize his fellow sufferer, an Apostle will recognize a fellow Apostle—all will recognize all, so that the dwelling place of all who rejoice may be in God, who grants all other blessings and the recognition of one another.

16. I urge you, then, to hold fast to the holy faith: for you see how many deviations there are from it, and how much we ought to thank God that we have not fallen into any error, but have received and hold fast to the Orthodox faith. Likewise, let us lead a blameless life: for you know what winds the devil blows upon us day and night; but he can do us no harm, finding us always protected by faith and love for Christ the Lord. Why should we stand still any longer? This dragon will flee from us; let us weep and quench the fiery arrows of lust; let us humble ourselves under God's mighty hand, and He will exalt us;—let us remain in perfect patience, and the devil will vanish, and we, having been saved, will enter the kingdom of heaven.

244. Returning from the funeral of Saint John of Chalcedon, he praises the brothers for finding them in their usual good order, and wishes that they may always remain so

245. A feast is both ordinary and spiritual; a purchase is both ordinary and spiritual

245. 1) A feast is both ordinary and spiritual; a purchase is both ordinary and spiritual. – 2) And we are merchants; pearls for us are virtues; the priceless pearl is Christ the Lord. May each of us, then, be a wise merchant. – 3) Our marketplace consists of acts of obedience, which are all at once the pearls, the purchase, and the price. [4, 23]

17. Here and there, festivals are held from time to time, as is now the case in Nicomedia. People flock to these festivals to buy and sell. But this does not last long; for soon everyone disperses. But there is one spiritual feast, unceasing and extending throughout the life of every person, in which the objects of buying and selling are not gold, nor silver, nor clothing, nor any other of the transitory and perishable things, but the salvation of the soul, eternal life, and the kingdom of heaven—things for which people ought to make every effort, yet few care about them, and even fewer do so; instead, they direct all their attention and all their efforts toward vain and perishable things.

18. But we, brothers, will not allow ourselves to stray from our main goal and from this good bargain; rather, hearing the Lord say, "The kingdom of God is within you" (Luke 17: 21), we will strive with all our hearts every day to attain it—not by hoarding gold and silver, but by cultivating true faith and a blameless life, obedience, patience, humility, generosity, and "love, which is the bond of perfection" (Col. 3: 14). The Lord Himself demonstrated this in the Gospel, saying: "The kingdom of heaven is like a merchant seeking fine pearls, who, upon finding one pearl of great value, went and sold all that he had and bought it" (Matt. 13: 45–46). You are good merchants who have left everything behind and, in exchange for it all, have purchased the good, most excellent, and most precious pearl—Christ—when you decided to take up the cross and follow Him in holiness and righteousness. – But since a feast is a time of joy and watchful vigilance, let us also be joyful and alert, purchasing our salvation at this feast here on earth. Good is the seller who acts with reverent care in all things and never loses his composure; good is the buyer who joyfully accepts insults; good is the money-changer who gives his blood and receives the Spirit—through the patience with which he fulfills his duty.

19. But since our discourse has turned to obedience, let us honor those in the kitchen who carry out their duties, as those who labor more, bearing one another's burdens and thus fulfilling the law of Christ through love; let us also honor those who provide for the necessary needs of the brethren, as good and experienced stewards of the Lord; let us also honor those who sing in the psalmody with joy and reverence, as worthy of greater reward. And consider what our life is like, what our deeds are like, and what a blessed purchase our holy fathers made with full zeal—which, having performed well and brought to a successful conclusion, we too will return home with joy, as the holy David said: "Return, O my soul, to your rest, for the Lord has dealt bountifully with you" (Ps. 114:7). And may we all, at the hour of death, utter such a cry as a final prayer, and thereby attain eternal life in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

246. God sent His only-begotten Son into the world as the healer of all our spiritual and physical infirmities and the giver of all good things: what He did while He was on earth, He continues to do now, as everyone knows for themselves

246. 1) God sent His only-begotten Son into the world as the healer of all our spiritual and physical infirmities and the giver of all good things: what He did while He was on earth, He continues to do now, as everyone knows for themselves. – 2) How can we not love such a benefactor with all our hearts? And how can we not hate our enemy, the evildoer and destroyer? [4, 24]

20. The beginning of a new summer has arrived, when the following words are read from the Gospel on this day: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me; for He has anointed Me to preach good news to the poor, He has sent Me to heal the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives and sight to the blind, to set the oppressed free, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord” (Luke 4:18–19). Therefore, since the Only-Begotten Son of God was sent by the Father into the world as a healer, let us seek from Him the opening of our eyes as the blind, liberation as captives, and comfort as the brokenhearted. – But who is blind? Who is blinded by passion? Who is a captive? Who is led astray by improper thoughts? Who is broken-hearted? Who is burdened by sins?—The Lord heals all such people: for He is not only a physician of the body, but also of the soul; He was not present in the flesh only to those who lived in the past, but is present now to all invisibly, continuing to preach the Gospel, taking away the sin of the world, and healing every disease and every infirmity. Let no one, therefore, remain unenlightened or unhealed; but let him approach with faith, “and he shall receive a blessing from the Lord, and mercy from God his Savior” (Ps. 23:5). O, ineffable love for mankind! He brought us into being from nothing, raised us up again after our fall, and granted us a third grace—monastic perfection. But even if we still sin, He does not turn away from us but welcomes those who come to Him: when we are broken, He gives us comfort; when we weep, He consoles us; when we bleed, He anoints us; when we are fainting, He strengthens us; when we are wounded, He heals us; and when we are ready to plunge into the very depths of hell, He stretches out His hand and, in His love for mankind, rescues us from such distress; so that, in all fairness, it would be fitting for everyone to say: “If the Lord had not helped me, my soul would soon have dwelt in hell” (Ps. 93: 17). “I turned aside to graze, and the Lord received me” (Ps. 117:13). And everyone knows what temptations they have fallen into, and how they immediately found God as their helper in their afflictions. Moreover, He nourishes us who hunger—both physically with the annual fruits of His bounty and spiritually with the most pure mysteries—more than a mother or a nurse, desiring us and embracing us lovingly. A mother nourishes her child with milk for a time; but our true Lord and Father gives us His own body as food and drink—and this is always, O unfathomable goodness! O unsurpassable gift!

21. How can we not love such a Benefactor? How can we not long for Him? And how can we not cling to Him until we are inseparable?—And truly, if we are not so disposed toward Him, heaven will cry out and the earth will groan against us, and even the stones will accuse us of insensitivity. Therefore, to prevent this from happening, let us cling firmly to His love, hating the devil with all our hearts and turning away from him. For just as a benefactor should be loved and desired in proportion to his good deeds, so too should the wicked one be hated and shunned in proportion to his evil deeds. For he is the destroyer of our lives; he is the “murderer from the beginning,” according to the word of the Lord (John 8:44); he has divided our race into countless sects according to their schemes, wounds it with many arrows of sin, and seeks to devour it entirely. If we do not hate him, there will be no punishment that, as we deserve, would torment us for this—for yielding to our enemy, the destroyer of souls. But let us flee from him, brothers, let us flee with all our strength. What, then, is this flight? It is abstaining from evil deeds and thoughts, as well as clinging to God and devoting ourselves to good works. Why do we strive for goodness, serving the Lord with all humility, meekness, and obedience, confident that any good not fortified by humility is immature and unstable? If, however, there are those who hold a haughty opinion of themselves, let us humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, so that we may not run in vain, but may be deemed worthy of the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven.

247. Now is the time to gather the grapes: from this we learn a lesson, for we too are grapes

247. 1) Now is the time to gather the grapes: from this we learn a lesson, for we too are grapes. – Like God’s grapes, we must bear clusters of virtues, devoting ourselves entirely to the Lord. – 2) Let us not turn back, nor walk two paths. – 3) When the enemy begins to tempt us, let us enter the battle and defeat him. [4:25]

22. Now let us briefly touch upon what is before our eyes. What is it? The grape harvest has come; and we see that where the branches are laden with clusters, there is joy and blessing, but where they are scarce, there is sorrow and grief. “What does that have to do with us?” someone among the listeners might say. – It matters very much, because, figuratively speaking, we too are called the Lord’s vineyard. Or do you not know what song is sung during the rite of monastic tonsure? And do we not all join in singing it? – “O Lord, O Lord! Look down from heaven and see, and visit this vineyard, which Your right hand has planted” (Ps. 79: 15–16). And does not the Lord say in the Gospel? “I am the vine; you are the branches. Whoever abides in Me, and I in him, bears much fruit; for apart from Me you can do nothing” (John 15: 5). Let us therefore be like vines planted by our good Lord—as if planted by Him—and let us bear clusters of virtues for Him, that we may be deemed worthy of His blessing. And may we not, by yielding to the thorns and thistles of our passions, fall under such a condemnatory judgment: “Every tree that does not bear good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire” (Luke 3:9). As for us, this will mean “cut down” through death, and “thrown into the fire”—undoubtedly into the eternal fire—into which all will be cast who commit evil deeds, who fall away from the faith, who corrupt their bodies with vices, “waterless clouds, carried about by the wind: autumn trees, barren, twice dead, uprooted; raging waves of the sea, foaming up their own shame; and wandering stars, for whom the gloom of utter darkness has been reserved forever” (Jude 12–13). Why does the Apostle Paul cry out: “Flee from sexual immorality; for every other sin a person commits is outside the body, but the sexually immoral person sins against his own body. Or do you not know that your bodies are a temple of the Holy Spirit who dwells in you, whom you have from God, and that you are not your own? For you were bought with a price” (1 Cor. 6:18–20).

23. How, then, can we—who have been bought with the precious blood of Christ—not be ashamed before heaven and earth to turn back again? How can we not blush before ourselves, appearing holy on the outside while being filled with every kind of impurity on the inside? How long will we limp on both feet? When will we finally settle on a single path? For, as the wise one says: “Woe to the sinner who walks on two paths” (Sir. 2:12)—sin, that is, and virtue; for they have nothing in common with one another. A household servant who serves his master one moment and his enemy the next cannot be called prudent. We must devote ourselves entirely to God: for only in this way can we become partakers of the life according to God. Why should we not remain fixed on the sensual, like speechless animals, but rather, with the powers of the soul, ascend to the contemplation of the heavenly, turning our senses from the perishable to the imperishable, from the fleeting to the enduring?

24. Nor shall we allow our sophistical weaver of evil to corrupt our hearts with the poison of wicked thoughts; but as soon as he sows the sweetness of lust, or any other evil, let us hasten to cast aside the crafty flatterer. How? Through prayers and supplications, tears and sighs, and heartfelt contrition. Such is our invisible battle, such is our unheralded struggle and feat. Let us, then, imitating earthly warriors and burning with zeal, drive away our invisible enemies—and just as they do not retreat, even when wounded, in the hope of a reward, so too will we, even if covered with countless wounds, not turn back, but will stand and stand, fight and fight, strengthened by God’s help. I implore you regarding this: for this is why I labor, offering you these brief exhortations. – And so I rejoice over those who walk in righteousness and sigh for those who stumble. But let us all walk uprightly, do good, endure with humility, in psalm-singing, in prayers, in worship, in obedience, in humility: and the God of peace will be with us.

248. Having received the gift of sanctification, let us preserve it, fleeing above all from carnal lust; for it is contrary to the state of grace; it casts us into bondage; it fills us with dread

248. Having received the gift of sanctification, let us preserve it by fleeing above all from carnal lusts; for they are contrary to the state of grace; they cast us into bondage; they fill us with dread. Mortifying them, however, brings about the exact opposite. [4, 26]

25. We rejoice with joy when any of the Lord’s feasts arrives. And rightly so: for on such occasions we are enlightened, entering into the contemplation of the mystery for which the feast was established. So it is now, on the day of the Exaltation of the honorable and life-giving Cross. For what joy, and what wonder, that the tree—upon which stood the feet of our Lord Jesus Christ, upon which He, crucified, shed His life-giving blood—that we have been deemed worthy not only to see this tree, but also to kiss and embrace it?

How many others toil to amass as much perishable gold as possible? But for us, the gift is immediate: for as soon as we kissed the Cross, we received enlightenment, sanctification, and deliverance. So swift is grace, so effortless is the gift! – But to preserve such grace, the labor of prayer and vigilant attention is urgently needed, especially because what is easily obtained is usually taken lightly and not properly cherished. That is why I appeal to you: let us guard against such a mistake, and let us carefully preserve this gift. Let us not defile our consecrated lips with false words and vain talk; let us not darken our consecrated eyes with lustful glances; let us not blacken our purified hearts with impure memories. And “let not sin reign,” cries the Apostle, “in your mortal body, so that you obey it in its lusts; nor present your members as instruments of unrighteousness to sin; but present yourselves to God as those who have been brought from the dead to life, and your members as instruments of righteousness to God. Let not sin have dominion over you, for you are not under the law but under grace” (Rom. 6: 12–14). Do you see that under the law sin reigned, but in grace righteousness, having reigned, delivers us from every sin? —as it is written: “But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God” (1 Cor. 6:11). Let us, I beg you, honor our cleansing and preserve our sanctification. Why do we bring dishonor upon ourselves, having been made honorable? Why do we take such excessive care of the body, which we will soon leave in the grave? Why do we consider the pleasure of lust to be delightful, when it is in truth a deadly disease? The pleasure of lust is the devil’s bait; it is the kindling of an unquenchable fire; and yet we, as human beings, are drawn to it like slaves who have given themselves up into captivity. I have heard someone possessed by this passion say that it is better to have a noose around one’s neck than to grovel before this sin; for it, like a cruel despot, commands its slave: “Go,”—and he goes; “Come,”—and he comes; ‘Do such-and-such,’—and he does it; in the same way, this sin commands its subject to do something even far worse, namely: ‘Speak shamefully,’—and he speaks; ‘Do evil,’—and he does it. Usually, such a person groans and trembles like Cain: if he sails the sea, he fears shipwreck; if he travels through the desert, he fears he will fall into the hands of robbers; when thunder strikes, it seems to him that it happened specifically for him; when lightning flashes, he fears it might scorch him; he sees but does not see, and hears but does not hear, his senses being disturbed. What could be more dreadful than such a life? It seems to me that it would be better to be devoured by wild beasts than by destructive passions, because in that case only the body perishes, whereas here both soul and body are lost. But it is quite different for the virtuous person. Being free from sin (I speak not only of the pleasure of lust, but of every other passion as well), he rejoices and finds pleasure within himself: he reigns in righteousness; he fears neither the sea nor the land: for he has God dwelling within him, to whom he cries out in times of danger: “I will not fear evil, for You are with me” (Ps. 22: 4); “I will not fear those who surround me and attack me” (Ps. 3: 7); “I will not fear when the earth is shaken, and the mountains are overturned into the heart of the sea” (Ps. 45:3). Do you see what a good life means? It is the true blessed life. We, too, have received it by God’s grace; it is now the focus of all our care and concern. Let us therefore strive ever more to excel in it, submitting to everything with reverence, demonstrating in our actions every kind of obedience, every kind of humility, and every kind of purity of soul.

249. Observing how fields are sown, let us learn to sow ourselves with the seeds of spiritual dispositions

249. 1) Observing how fields are sown, let us learn to sow ourselves with the seeds of spiritual dispositions. – 2) The nights have grown longer: take care to refrain from sleeping too much, as well as from any excessive indulgence in other bodily needs. – 3) The king has returned from his campaign; but do not lose heart: let us cast our sorrow upon the Lord. [4:27]

26. Now is the time for us to sow material seeds—wheat and others—and we see how people rush to this task from early morning and labor tirelessly until nightfall, doing their utmost both to sow well and to ensure a sufficient harvest for their annual physical needs. But what of us, the sowers of spiritual seeds—why do we sleep and remain unplanted, as we ought to be? And how will we then endure eternal hunger? And what excuse will we offer for our inaction?—Let us rather awaken from our slumber and begin to work even more diligently than those who sow material seeds. “For whoever sows sparingly will also reap sparingly, and whoever sows generously will also reap generously” (2 Cor. 9:3).—But what should we sow?—Prayers, supplications, petitions, thanksgiving, faith, hope, and love. These are the seeds of piety; this is what nourishes the soul. But in material sowing, the farmer is patient, waiting for rain, whether it comes in the morning or in the evening. In our spiritual sowing, however, we ourselves are the masters of bringing the rain and watering the soil—that is, of weeping and lamenting whenever we wish and as much as we please. If, then, this matter is in our power, I urge you: let us sow as much as possible, water more abundantly, and multiply the fruits of our righteousness, so that when the spiritual harvest comes, we may fill both our hands and our bosoms with spiritual harvest, and be deemed worthy to hear: “The blessing of the Lord be upon you” (Ps. 128: 8). “We have blessed you from the house of the Lord” (Ps. 117: 26). “Bring in the fruit of your hands; you are blessed, and it will go well with you” (Ps. 127: 2).—And this is our message on this matter.

27. But I wish to remind you, brothers, that our nights are now growing longer as the days grow shorter. You know well that just as staying awake drains the body, so sleeping too much fattens the flesh; and along with the fattening of the flesh, the passions are nourished. — On this occasion, I have something to say to you. What, then? “Let each of you have a psalm, have a teaching, have a prayer”: let all things be done in moderation, “so that all may contribute to the edification” of the soul (1 Cor. 14: 26), to the well-ordered life of the spirit, “so that Satan may not tempt you through lack of self-control” (1 Cor. 7:5). I say this not only with regard to sleep, but also with regard to food and drink, and to everything else; for everything done in moderation is good, because it keeps us safe from straying in one direction or another and from stumbling.

28. Now a word about this: since the sovereign (the king) has returned from his campaign, perhaps thoughts are arising in your hearts about how the affairs of the church—and ours in particular—will proceed from here on. We have guidance on this in Scripture: “Cast your cares on the Lord” (Ps. 54:23), and He will provide a way out; and “if God is for us, who can be against us?” (Rom. 8:31). Just as in previous years He has preserved our lives, delivering us from various temptations and sorrows, so too, we hope, will He continue to protect us from now on. Let us live in a manner worthy of the Gospel, having our life in heaven, as strangers and sojourners on earth. For who among those who have entered this life from the beginning has remained in it forever? Have not all who came departed again, as from a foreign land? Thus, our sojourn here is but a temporary stay; our true dwelling place and inheritance lie in the life to come—into which, having passed, may we be deemed worthy, together with all the holy heirs, to inherit the kingdom of heaven.

250. Points out how great a blessing we have in Christ Jesus

250. 1) It points out how great a blessing we have in Christ Jesus—the renewal of life. — 2) What is the purpose of the three powers of the soul, and how their fall has perverted them. — 3) It calls us to act rightly with all our powers and to preserve the nobility with which we have been ennobled in the Lord. — 4) In conclusion: this is how the fathers acted; this is how we too shall act. [4, 30]

1. Great and ineffable is the love of our Lord Jesus Christ for us, in that He not only “came to preach peace to us who were far off and to those who were near,” as it is written (Eph. 2:17); but also, having ascended into heaven, He left the holy Apostles to preach the same message to us—as Blessed Paul writes: “For we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God were making His appeal through us; we implore you on Christ’s behalf: Be reconciled to God. He who knew no sin became sin for us, so that we might become the righteousness of God in Him” (2 Cor. 5:20–21). What boundless care for us! What inexpressible love for mankind! “He who knew no sin became sin on our behalf.” How and in what way?—He is not speaking of sin as a justly condemned, lawless act. Far be it!—For “He committed no sin, and no deceit was found in His mouth” (1 Peter 2:22). But He is speaking of the fact that He took on our sin-corrupted nature, that “He bore our infirmities and carried our sorrows” (Matt. 8:17), that He was crucified for us and suffered the most dishonorable death. This is what it means: “He committed sin for us!” For what purpose? “That we might become the righteousness of God in Him.” How? By being freed from sin and the condemnation we deserve, and by living and moving in Him. That is why He urges us, saying, “We also, as fellow workers, entreat you not to receive the grace of God in vain” (2 Cor. 6: 1). Do you see how He persuades and convinces us?—What does it mean to “not receive the grace of God in vain”? It means that we should not turn back, that we should not succumb to the very passions we have renounced, and that we should not break the vows we made before God and the holy angels. — But what? But “that we may walk in newness of life” (Rom. 6: 4)—a life that is pure and blameless, virtuous and heavenly.

2. Having come to this point, I wish to show you a certain most hidden power of the word. What exactly is this?—The human soul has three powers: the rational, the irascible, and the appetitive. The task of the thinking power is to believe in the Holy Trinity; the task of the irascible power is to be angry at the serpent, the tempter, and by no means to let him near us; the task of the desiring power is to long for and love God, who created us. But the devil, having corrupted and perverted these powers of the soul, began to bring about our ruin through them. How? By tempting the desiring power in our forefather Adam to taste the forbidden fruit; by stirring up the irascible power in Cain to kill his brother Abel; and by using the thinking power to lead humanity into idolatry. Such is the modus operandi of our envious enemy!

3. We, however, will remain true to the purpose for which we were created: by strengthening ourselves in goodness through all three faculties and being adorned by the Spirit, we will not allow ourselves to destroy the nobility with which the Lord has ennobled us, having made us children of God the Father. “But to all who received Him,” says the Gospel, “He gave the right to become children of God” (John 1:12). Since, in this way, we have become children of God, we will not allow ourselves to become children of wrath; since we are called heirs of God, we will not allow ourselves to become heirs of unquenchable fire; since we are recognized as members of Christ, let us not make ourselves members of a harlot; let us not set our sights on the world or on the things in the world; let us not turn our eyes to the allurements of this life, which are vain and fleeting. Suppose, I say hypothetically, that we were to satisfy the lusts of the flesh and the blood: “What profit is there in the blood, when we are destined to decay?” (Ps. 29: 10). Let us look into the graves, and we will see how the pleasure of lust ends. Let us be surrounded by wealth and money; so what? Did we not enter this world naked?—Naked we will leave it, taking nothing with us except our righteous or unrighteous deeds. That is why St. David cries out: “One thing I ask of the Lord, this I seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to visit His holy temple” (Ps. 26:4).

4. Behold, a blessed life! Behold, the good portion chosen by our holy fathers, as well as by Paul, the blessed confessor whom we now commemorate—whose struggles and feats we have heard only a little about, and by imitating whom we will zealously continue the labors of our asceticism and bear the burden of the persecution to which we have been subjected, without departing from our usual deeds; let us tirelessly press on in our path; and if we stumble, let us hasten to rise again, overcoming our adversary, the devil, so that we too may receive the crown of righteousness with all the saints, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

251. From his illness—he turns to thoughts of death, and from the suffering of his illness—to eternal torment

251. 1) From his own illness, he turns to thoughts of death, and from the sufferings of his illness, to eternal torment. – 2) He recounts how, during the persecution of that time, some were glorified, while others were put to shame and were completely lost. – 3) To the latter, he addresses words of regret, rebuke, and a warning of the consequences. [4, 31]

5. I was ill, and through your prayers I was restored to health. But how long will we continue to be restored to health in this way?—The hour of death will surely come, when such a restoration will no longer be possible; it will come and take me away from you and send me from here to another place. However, you should not therefore worry about being left orphaned: for He who said, “I will not leave you as orphans” (John 14:18), and, “I am with you always, even to the end of the age” (Matthew 28:20), did not lie. Moreover, we will see one another on that day—but, if only one could say, in unspeakable joy and in eternal life!—And you know what I endured during my illness: how, seized by chills, I was subjected to unbearable tremors, and how soon afterward I was overcome by scorching fever for an entire day. “Suffering thus, I thought to myself at the time, ‘Is it not so that in the age to come, people will be transferred from the torments of Tartarus to the fiery Gehenna, so that the poor soul will be subjected to two, or even more, torments?’ But whether one or two torments await those there, from the sufferings here we can conclude how unbearable God’s wrath is toward sinners; and, seized by fear and trembling at this, I resolved to do everything in my power to avoid falling into those unbearable torments.

6. Thus, the present persecution “for some” has served as an occasion for the manifestation of virtue, and they “shone like lights in the world, holding fast to the word of life, to my praise,” so to speak, “on the day of Christ” (Phil. 2:15–16). How much good did they do? And what perfection did they attain? Not only did they save and continue to save themselves—having gained experience through enduring trials and having been purified, like gold in a crucible, by being refined in the fire of sorrows and sufferings—but they also draw others to the same path, thus becoming saviors of many, both their own and strangers. “For others,” however—and these are very few—persecution was a pretext for evil deeds, due to their self-indulgent way of life, unrestrained by the law of obedience and leaving them free to commit their shameful acts. Why is it so fitting to speak of them in the words of Scripture: “Their appearance is darker than soot” (Lamentations 4:8)?

7. To such I also cry out: lawless sons, you have forsaken the Lord, violated the laws of the monastic life, and do not know how to walk uprightly, but stagger here and there like the lame; you have fallen behind your companions and become lustful; some of you live alone; others hire servants and even engage in trade, driven by the love of money. Neither the prophet's punishment, nor the apostle's threat, nor my humble exhortations frighten you. One of you, captivated by beauty, has stooped to theft and even to renouncing God. "What are you doing, wretched son of perdition?" "How many times have you sung: 'Where can I go from Your Spirit, and where can I flee from Your presence?'" (Ps. 138:7). Or, having been completely carried away, do you wish to befriend the serpent who seduced Eve and, together with her, cast our forefather Adam out of Paradise? Do you not yet intend to renounce Christ, with whom you were united through the vow of virginity, and to unite yourself with sin, through which death entered the world? Do you not hear the Gospel crying out about those who act in this way: "Their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched"? (Mark 9:44) Do you not heed what the Apostle says: "God judges the sexually immoral and adulterers"? (Heb. 13: 4)? What do you gain by committing sin? Is it not darkness and a heart pierced as by a sword? Is it not a plunge into the depths of despair? Is it not Satan himself, who deceived you, who now compels you to grasp the noose, as he once did with Judas? Come to your senses, you who are in darkness; flee from the snare of death, O doomed one; do not let yourself be entangled in the net of hell, lest you then live here the life of Cain—groaning, trembling, and fleeing from every familiar face—and in the age to come be condemned to the fiery Gehenna; when the Lord "comes to be glorified in His saints and to be marveled at among all" (2 Thess. 1:10), to those who have faithfully walked according to His commandments—rewarding them with fitting rewards, while sending those opposed to them to the endless torments prepared for them.

252. The Epiphany brings to mind the greatness of the blessings resulting from the Lord's coming to earth in the flesh

252. 1) The Epiphany brings to mind the greatness of the blessings resulting from the Lord's coming to earth in the flesh. – 2) What shall we offer in return? – We offer our life of cross-bearing in our struggles, and our present witness before the iconoclasts: let us simply stand firm in both. [4, 32]

8. The Feast of the Epiphany is approaching—and a day of joy is at the door, a joy truly great, the like of which has not been seen since time immemorial. For the Son of God is coming to us, not in prophecies and symbols, as we see He appeared to the Old Testament fathers: but by being born of the Virgin, descending and revealing Himself personally to us—a event more blessed than any in the course of generations, and more wondrous than all the miracles God has wrought since the beginning of time. Therefore, the angels proclaim the mystery that has been fulfilled; the star indicates that the One from heaven has been born on earth; the shepherds hasten to see the salvation announced to them; the Magi bring royal gifts, and an extraordinarily new song is sung about God's extraordinarily new work, through which God is glorified in the heavens, while peace is established on earth, as the Apostle also testifies, saying: "For He is our peace, who has made the two one and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility, having abolished in His flesh the law of commandments expressed in ordinances, that He might create in Himself one new man in place of the two, thus making peace, and might reconcile both to God in one body through the cross, thereby putting to death the hostility" (Eph. 2: 14–16). This is what the prophets and the righteous had longed to see from of old, but they saw it only by faith. But we have "seen Him and touched Him with our own hands," as it is written—"we have seen and proclaim" this "Word of life: life has appeared," and we have received the status of sonship (1 John 1:1, 2).

9. But what "shall we render to the Lord for all that He has given us?" In answer to this, St. David had already proclaimed: "I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord" (Ps. 115: 3). But let us rejoice, brothers and sisters—that we, too, have been deemed worthy to give thanks to the Lord for all that He has given us. What, then, is this thanksgiving? The cross-bearing life we have embraced, and "the confession in which we stand and boast in the hope of God's glory" (Rom. 5:2). — And this we ought to celebrate not just for a single day, but throughout our entire lives. Those who are ruled by the flesh and held captive by their passions can neither celebrate—though they may appear to be celebrating—nor be free, since they are slaves to their passions, sold into sin, as it is written: "Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin. A slave does not remain in the house forever; a son remains forever" (John 8:34). Since we, too, have been deemed worthy to be called sons by grace, we will remain in the house forever, "if only we hold fast to the beginning of our confidence until the end" (Heb. 3:14). Therefore, strengthened by the Holy Spirit, let us stand firm in our monastic way of life “and encourage one another in love and good deeds” (Heb. 10:24)—in obedience, humility, meekness, and in all other noble endeavors, not wavering in our good resolve, but adding effort upon effort, all the more so as we see the Day of the Lord drawing near. For that great and glorious day is drawing near, on which the Judge of all will appear openly and will be seen in the glory in which He was seen by the Apostles at the Divine Transfiguration—and He will reward each person according to his deeds.—May we, too, together with all the saints, behold Him as He looks upon us with a gracious countenance and welcomes us into His heavenly kingdom.

253. Rest was promised to Israel as they wandered in the wilderness; but not all entered it

253. 1) The Israelites wandering in the wilderness were promised rest; but not all entered it. We, too, are promised rest; and not all of us may enter it. – 2) How can we enter it? – We must not act as they did. [4:34]

10. Thus we move from year to year, from one season to another, from one holiday to the next, and there is no respite throughout this life. – Yet we must certainly reach its end and enter into our rest. “For whoever has entered His rest has also rested from his works, just as God did from His,” as it is written (Heb. 4:10). What kind of rest is this?—The Kingdom of Heaven, toward which the Apostle urges us, saying: “Let us therefore strive to enter that rest, so that no one may fall into the same pattern of disobedience” (Heb. 4:11). – What does he mean by this? That just as God promised the Israelites He would bring them into the Promised Land—but because they later proved disobedient and grieved Him, they were not allowed to enter—so too, if we are disobedient to His commandments, we will by no means enter the Kingdom of Heaven. “For forty years,” says the Lord, “I was angry with them and said, ‘They are always going astray in their hearts; they have not known My ways.’ Therefore I swore in My wrath, ‘They shall not enter My rest’” (Ps. 94:10–11). That was the case with them; for us, however, it is not just forty years, but obedience is expected throughout the entire life of each person. For if we do not strive to fulfill all of God’s commandments, He will say of us as well: “They shall not enter My rest.” But the bones of those who did not enter fell in the wilderness; if we do not enter, then both our bodies and our souls will be cast into the fiery Gehenna; and this punishment is incomparably more severe than that, for it is written: “Whoever rejects the Law of Moses; shall die without mercy on the testimony of two or three witnesses; how much worse a punishment will be deserved by those who have trampled underfoot the Son of God, and have regarded as defiled the blood of the covenant by which they were sanctified, and have insulted the Spirit of grace” (Heb. 10:28–29).

11. What, then, was the cause that barred their entry? Unbelief, grumbling, blasphemy, rebellion, hardness of heart, pride, and sexual immorality. This is what destroyed them. – Let us therefore flee from these passions as from a face of fire, not doubting God’s promises, but believing that He is able to fulfill what He has promised; and let us not murmur (1 Cor. 10:10), nor blaspheme, nor harden our hearts, nor rebel; “Let us, then, be kind to one another, compassionate, forgiving one another, just as God in Christ has forgiven us” (Eph. 4:32), “always bearing in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus” (2 Cor. 4:10), always being ready to die for Christ, always being renewed by prayers, supplications, tears, and the contemplation of heavenly visions. Living in this way, we will enter not a land flowing with milk and honey, as the ancients did, but the land of the meek—the place where the source of life and immortality is found, where the beauty of the heavenly Jerusalem dwells, where there is joy and gladness, where the radiance of the blessed and life-giving Trinity shines!

254. Virginity Is Superior to Married Life

254. 1) Virginity is superior to married life. – 2) Giving thanks to God for deeming us worthy of this calling, let us be vigilant so as not to fall. – 3) What is the means to this end? Struggle and the overcoming of the lower by the higher—toward which all our efforts are directed. – 4) I will add one more word: Brother Memnon has returned; receive him with brotherly love, just as in the parable the father received his son who had strayed from him. [4, 35]

12. Those who compete in races at the arena do so once a year—and even then for a very short time; after that, the competition ends: the victors, the vanquished, and the spectators all go their separate ways. But those who run the race of virginity do so not for a single day, but for their entire lives; and their path, and their progress along it, are invisible, just as the battle they wage against invisible enemies is invisible. Chastity is the greatest virtue, reaching the very heights of heaven. – People are divided into two groups according to their way of life: some live in marriage, and others without marriage. Those who live in marriage constitute the lower world, and those without marriage fill the higher world. The former are subject to decay, while the latter are made worthy to shine with incorruptibility. And just as if someone were to see a man with wings, they would rightly be amazed that he appears at times as a man and at times as an angel: so too, one who preserves chastity through asceticism presents a wondrous sight to both angels and people—in the flesh yet above the flesh; in the world yet above the world; which is why, when someone renounces the world, they say that he has chosen a life of excellence: and the Lord, speaking in the Gospel, said: “There are eunuchs who were born that way from their mother’s womb; and there are eunuchs who were made eunuchs by men; and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven,” He added: “Let the one who can accept this accept it” (Matt. 19:12). You see that for many this gift is too great to bear, and it is reserved only for those who crucify themselves through their way of life.

13. Let us therefore rejoice and be glad for one another—let us give thanks, immeasurable thanks, that, through God’s love for humanity, we have been called to such a worthy calling, by which God is glorified and at which people marvel. And not only that, but let us also lead our lives as carefully as possible, for many have fallen from such heights—both in times past and now—some having become puffed up with pride, others having been struck down by carelessness and negligence, both of which bring ruin to the soul.

14. What, then, is the means of deliverance from this?—A bird in flight has a means of deliverance from danger; for when it senses the nearness of a hunter, it spreads its wings, flies to another place—and avoids being caught. So too, when the devil, the hunter of our souls, approaches, then, as if winged by the Spirit, soaring in contemplation of the heights, “let us seek the things that are above and set our minds on things above” (Col. 3:1–2). Does he offer the sweetness of lust? We will raise up the nobility of the soul. Does he put forth the work of sin? We will embrace the severity of judgment with all our thoughts. Thus, by setting one thing against another and repelling thoughts with thoughts, we will be saved from the destroyer of all. What, then, is the outcome of these struggles? For those who fight for the flesh—a perishable crown; for us, an imperishable one; for them—temporary joy; for us—eternal joy. And blessed are we “if we hold fast to the confidence and the boast of our hope until the end” (Heb. 3:6). Therefore, I urge you, let us persevere in prayer and supplication, in contrition and tears, in humility, obedience, confession, and other ascetic practices, and with God’s help, let us gain the victory over the enemy. But enough of that.

15. Now regarding Brother Memnon. Since he has, in some way, come to his senses and returned, we must accept him, “so that such a one may not be devoured by excessive sorrow” (2 Cor. 2:7). – I must, however, tell you this: “Everyone who commits sin is not only a slave to sin” (John 8:34), according to the Lord’s word, but is also an abomination to lovers of virtue, and perhaps some would be ashamed to embrace him, lest they be defiled by his sin. But since our Lord Jesus Christ did not reject the prodigal son—who had squandered everything on harlots—when he returned, we too will not turn him away, but will welcome this brother with kindness, rejoice at his return with gratitude, and pray for his salvation. – Thus, by fulfilling this commandment as disciples of our Lord and Savior, we will be worthy to inherit the kingdom of heaven.

255. How many of our brothers have died in exile for icon veneration and from torture? They are witnesses to the truth of Orthodoxy

255. 1) How many of our brothers have died in exile for icon veneration and from torture? They are witnesses to the truth of Orthodoxy. Heretics offer nothing of the sort: for they sense how unsteady their foundations are. We, however, are built upon the foundation of the Apostles and prophets. – 2) For our salvation, all that remains for us is to build upon this foundation with gold, silver, and precious stones—that is, a holy and blameless life—purifying it through repentance whenever we happen to sin in any way. [4, 36]

16. Our brother Theodore has fallen asleep—one of the best, skilled in obedience and steadfast in confession, who bore wounds for Christ and ended his life in prison and in exile. What could be more joyful than this? So many of our brothers—their number reaching nearly a hundred and more—were cast into various places, where, shining like stars, they left their holy bodies as a testimony to Orthodoxy for those living today and for future generations. I speak not only of our own brotherhood, but also of the brothers from other monasteries who ended their lives in exile. This is the greatest affirmation of the Church of God! She possesses such a host of witnesses to the veneration of the icon of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Most Pure Theotokos, and all His saints: so that, even if we had nothing else in our hands, this alone would suffice as proof of the truth for those who possess sound minds. Let the opponents of Orthodoxy be put to shame! For which of them, fighting for their faith, has ever endured such sufferings? None, ever; but they, like nocturnal beasts, prowl and grow bold in the darkness of their heresy; yet when the light of day appears and Orthodoxy shines forth like the morning star, they hide in the burrows of their deceitful scheming. – And let them be led astray by the light of their own fire, which they themselves have kindled. As for us, appointed by the Lord upon the foundation of the Apostles, the Prophets, and our God-bearing Fathers, we will remain firmly rooted for the time to come, without wavering in the least from human threats.

17. To attain salvation, we must still, according to the Apostle's command, build upon the foundation of our true faith with gold, silver, and precious stones—not with wood, hay, and straw (1 Cor. 3:12)—which are fuel for the fire. Whoever is thus established can be shaken by nothing in his faith in the Lord. "Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the Law, having become a curse for us," as it is written (Gal. 3:13). Let us not, then, allow ourselves to fall under the curse again. Christ has washed us clean in His blood, through the bath of rebirth and the renewal of the Holy Spirit; let us not, under any circumstances, return to the shameful deeds we have renounced. If we do not do this, then on the day of His revelation, He may say to us: "I made you My pillars, but you have turned My members into the members of a harlot; I washed you from your sins, so that you 'might be without spot or blemish, or anything of the sort' (Eph. 5:27)—yet you have once again burdened yourselves with the stench of passions and defiled yourselves with the filth of sin; I have filled you abundantly with the light of wisdom through the Holy Spirit, yet you have made your minds a dwelling place for wild passions; I have made you co-heirs of eternal blessings, yet you have chosen rather to be co-heirs of My adversary: "Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. 25:41). But may we never hear such a terrible voice or experience such unbearable wrath. Therefore, let us zealously strive to attain purity, tears, and a contrite heart, fulfilling our duties without complaint, keeping watch in God's work day and night, so that the enemy, creeping in, may not devour an inattentive soul. If only we could avoid the serpent's wiles even while keeping vigil! But how can we achieve this while dozing off? But someone will say: our nature is weak and prone to sin. I agree with this—being of the same nature myself. But here is what I ask: as soon as something like this happens, let there be immediate repentance, confession, contrition of heart, and a lively desire to restore our former good state. By acting in this way every day, we will attain what we seek; and having attained it, we will be deemed worthy to hear the longed-for voice saying, "Come," and we will become heirs to the Kingdom of Heaven.

256. We ought to celebrate feasts with spiritual consolation

256. 1) We should celebrate feasts in spiritual comfort. – 2) Feasts pass, and all of life will pass: let us not forget this, and let us always be ready for our departure. – 3) By ordering our lives accordingly, both outwardly and, even more so, inwardly. – 4) And let us not neglect anything that is necessary for this. [4, 37]

18. The feasts have passed—both Christmas and the Epiphany—which we were deemed worthy to celebrate in honor of the Lord our God, even in our present circumstances. We do not grieve over this, however, but rejoice greatly that for the sake of Him who "humbled Himself and took the form of a servant" (Phil. 2:7), we endure exile and live in a foreign land. And what else does it mean to celebrate, if not to cling to God through detachment from the material world and indifference toward the world and all that is worldly? For what shall we say of those who live in the deserts, mountains, and ravines of the earth? "Do they not celebrate?" "Yes, they celebrate even better than others in their silence—more exalted and more godly than those who have the opportunity to spend their feasts in pleasures, feasts, feasting, and drinking, forgetting that they are deceiving themselves—whom Scripture therefore condemns, saying: "You have feasted and reveled on earth; you have fattened your hearts as on the day of slaughter" (James 5:5): for such people have become like pigs ready for slaughter; "whose god is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame" (Phil. 3:19); so that we celebrate the feasts better if we keep ourselves in check and lead a life worthy of our calling and of our confession of Christ.

19. Let us not, however, lose sight of the fact that our days fly by as if on horses, and time, like a spinning wheel, bringing some into life through birth and taking others from it through death—not at the same age or at the same time, but sometimes the elderly before the young, and the young before the elderly; fathers before their children, and children before their fathers; and at times, many people of every age together. Thus has God seen fit to ordain that, because we do not know the hour of our death, we should prepare ourselves for our departure at every moment. Let us therefore be sober and watchful, lest death, coming unexpectedly, find us unprepared; for then we will repent, but to no avail and without fruit. Do you not know how, just a few days ago, I suddenly fell ill? And how my soul nearly descended into hell? And although I have now recovered, this is certainly not for good. It will surely be time for me, now that I am growing old, to finally leave you and go to be with my fathers and brothers; only pray that this may happen while I am fully conscious in Christ, and with a completely clear conscience for my entire life. At that time, wracked with the torments of my illness, I reflected and said to myself: if this suffering is such, what then will it be like in the age to come? If we cannot bear these three or four days of suffering, how can we endure eternal torments?

20. I advise you to reflect on this as well, and to live mindfully, always keeping this in mind—externally, with all reverence and humility, diligence, and patience—and internally, —with all guarding of the heart, not allowing the great, cunning, and evil serpent to whisper to us or attack us, and not making the temple of God a dwelling place for passions, but striving in every way to present ourselves pure before the Lord, and even here, before the age to come, to begin living a blessed life. For what could be more blessed than to live at peace with God with a pure heart? Yet this is impossible without prior toil, prayer, tears, contrition, zeal, and fervor of the spirit; even with these, the enemy does not cease to attack us and stir up strife within us—unannounced, unexpected, and invisible. He does this because he sees that we strive to ascend to heaven and be made worthy there of unspeakable joy. — But since, in truth, “the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom. 8:18); let us strive with all our might, with all the strength of faith and hope, to wage this battle so as to thwart all the devil’s schemes, imitating those who compete in the arena, who exert themselves so fiercely in the race that at the end of the race they are out of breath and near fainting. But their race lasts only an hour, and their crown is perishable; whereas our battle lasts a lifetime, which is why our crown is imperishable, and all our other rewards are eternal—may we be granted to receive them through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

257. One must imitate the holy fathers; but imitate those who share your way of life: otherwise, harm will result

257. 1) We must imitate the holy fathers; but imitate those who share your way of life: otherwise, harm will result. — 2) Here are some examples... which are cited. — 3) Do not take on what is not yours: are you a Kinovite? — Imitate the Kinovites... specific individuals are indicated. — 4) The desert is for hermits; but you must endure the hardships of communal life, just as I do. [4, 38]

21. As we read the lives of our fathers and contemplate them, we marvel at them. And rightly so. For truly our fathers are wondrous, because, dwelling in this flesh like angels with complete dispassion, they pleased the Lord. But we must not only marvel at them but also imitate them as much as possible; and imitate them with discernment—that is, let a cenobite imitate a cenobite, a silent one a silent one, a hermit a hermit, and an abbot an abbot. For what good is it to imitate someone who lives a life of a different order than ours? Not only will we derive no benefit from this, but we will also suffer clear harm. Many, out of love for God, having abandoned their way of life and striving for another, have lost their own and failed to attain the one they desired.

22. As proof of this, setting aside the ancient accounts on this matter, let us recall what has happened in our own lineage. What benefit did climbing the pillar bring to the so-called psalmist? Was he not carried down from there in a fit of madness?—And now he is neither a Kinovite nor a pillar-ascetic. What benefit did that same pillar bring to a certain Saprith? Did he not descend from it for the sake of orthodoxy, only to later fall into heresy, becoming a traitor, and is he not now the most ruthless among the persecutors?—But let us also look at our own brotherhood: did not our Peter, having spent many years as a novice and having excelled in that life, go into the desert, drawn by piety? But how he returned from there, and what became of him, you know, having seen it with your own eyes. Likewise, Amphilochius, who is still alive today—did he not first become a pillar ascetic, then a hermit, and now he brings shame upon himself, staggering back and forth?

23. All this has happened and continues to happen because of the temptation of the devil, who instills the desire to take what is not one’s own, so as to lead one to the loss of even what is one’s own. For this reason, the Apostle cries out: “Brothers, let each one remain before God in the state in which he was called” (1 Cor. 7:24). Are you called to be a silent monk?—you need not think about communal life; are you called to be a Kinovite? You need not wonder about silence. Each one, in his own state, should please the Lord. Each one, in his own state, has examples by which he must order his life. Follow the example of those who have shone forth in the monastic community. Who are they? Not only the ancient saints, but also those who have been and are still among us in our brotherhood. Strive to be like Blessed Domitian, whose faith is fiery. Strive to be like Blessed Zosimus, whose obedience is sincere. Strive to be like Blessed Mark, who, accepting insults and humiliation as a noble honor, knew how to keep his resolve unshakable. Take Terentius as your example, who, having served the sick in the kitchen for many years, never succumbed to faintheartedness nor shirked his labor; indeed, even when offered the chance to transfer to another duty, he refused, preferring to endure hardship in his usual duty. Take as your example also the other brothers, many of whom distinguished themselves in their duties, whose names are written in the Book of Life. These are the ones you should imitate, not the hermits.

24. Let the desert and the mountains be for Abba Ioannikios and those like him; but you, love obedience and the mortification of your own will. He is not currently enduring persecution, but you are being persecuted for the sake of the truth. He is not imprisoned, but you are in prison for the Lord's sake. He is not beaten, but you have endured beatings for Christ. All that you have endured is incomparably greater than a peaceful life in the desert. — I, too, will say something about myself, humble as I am. — Since I have been unworthily placed at your head, should I resign my office and withdraw to the desert, or begin some other way of life, whatever may present itself? But to act in this way is unbecoming both to a leader and to a shepherd, who must lay down his life for his sheep. Nor is it fitting for you to either plan or do anything different from what you are now. For from this comes the barrenness and disorder of the life to come, but from patiently abiding in the established order of the monastic life comes every spiritual fruitfulness. Therefore, let everyone—as God has shown him mercy and as the Lord has called him—walk in that way, live in that way, and please the Lord in that way, so that he may be deemed worthy to hear: “Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a little, I will set you over much; enter into the joy of your Lord” (Matt. 25:21).

258. Having explained what a monk is, he describes in what ways today's monks have fallen short of their predecessors

258. 1) Having defined what a monk is, he—2) describes in what ways today's monks have fallen short of their predecessors,—3) reminds us that this is contrary to the word of God, and—4) explains how one may remain upright in this matter,—with exhortations to that end. [4, 39]

25. There is nothing more blessed than our life, nothing more exalted than our way of life; provided only that we live as we are called, and that our way of life is in harmony with our name. A monk is one who looks to God alone, desires God alone, clings to God alone, strives to please God alone, is at peace with God, and is a source of peace among others. But whoever lacks these qualities and instead harbors zeal, envy, and division is “blind and dim-sighted” (having closed his eyes), “having forgotten the cleansing of his former sins,” as it is written (2 Peter 1:9).

26. You who are at fault know why I said this. And I say that I did not do this to upset you again, but to strengthen you so that in the future you will not fall into the same errors. In the days of our fathers, slander was not tolerated; but whoever heard slander would either cover his ears or turn the slander into something good. Now, however, we readily lend an ear to the slanderer and listen to him with such eagerness as we never listened to the readings proclaimed in church. In the days of our fathers, nothing was spoken in an unseemly manner, but always quietly and decorously; now, however, people speak with anger, shouting, and a contorted face: what could be more disgraceful? In the days of our fathers, there was no grumbling; rather, everyone accepted with gratitude what was given, and because of this, what was bitter became sweet and what was unpleasant became pleasant; but now we grumble, condemning this and that—not only within ourselves but also in public—so as to create more grumblers and to grieve God all the more.

27. This should not be so, my brothers; it should not be so. This is not a monastic way of life, nor is it a small sin—it is the sin of condemnation and vexation: for it is written that “the vexers shall not inherit the kingdom” (1 Cor. 6:9). But grumbling is no small sin either—as it is written: “Do not grumble, as some of them” (the Israelites in the wilderness) “grumbled, and were destroyed by the Destroyer” (1 Cor. 10:10). And slander is no small vice; for it is written: “Let no corrupting talk come out of your mouths, but only such as is good for building up, as fits the occasion, that it may impart grace to those who hear; and do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption” (Eph. 4:29–30). Do you not see what the Apostle warns us about?—that by speaking idly, we provoke the Holy Spirit to anger. Or are we not afraid that on the Day of Judgment we will have to give an account for every idle word, as the Lord Himself said?

28. Why, then, do we not take this to heart? Why do we not prepare ourselves to be in good standing before what is to befall us? Have you been rebuked? Bear the annoyance magnanimously, suppressing your distress—as St. David did: “I was confounded,” he says, “and I did not speak” (Ps. 76:5). The insult will thus pass, but your virtue will endure forever. Is the food offered not what you would like? Give thanks even for what is there; for what you condemn, considering it unwholesome, others would gladly taste. Moreover, if we never encounter such things, how will we prove our obedience? Why boast of it? For neither by abstinence, nor by vigil, nor by sleeping on the bare ground, nor by any other feat can we prove ourselves as skillful in the way of life as by the subjugation of our will—this martyrdom, inseparable from the monastic life. “Put away, then, all malice, all deceit, hypocrisy, envy, and all slander,” as St. Peter the Apostle commanded, “and like newborn infants, love the pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up into salvation” (1 Peter 2:1–3), if we have tasted that the Lord Christ is good, if we desire eternal life, if we do not refuse to follow good counsel, if we do not grow weary or lose heart, always turning away from our sins and failures. For by being thus well-trained, we will undoubtedly be deemed worthy of eternal life in Christ Jesus.

259. Remembering what has been granted to us through the Incarnation—let us live in the renewal of life, according to His Spirit—fleeing from the old nature

259. 1) Remembering what has been granted to us through the Incarnation— 2) let us live in the renewal of life, according to His Spirit— 3) fleeing from the old nature, namely, the pleasures of lust and envy, from which all evil springs—and— 4) zealously pursuing every good, loving it and grieving over its loss. [4, 40]

29. Just as those who are thirsty desire to drink and those who are hungry desire to eat, so must we long to hear the word of God. For by hearing it, we gain very much: from being careless, we become zealous; from being zealous, we become even more zealous. What word do we hear now?—“Thus,” it says, “God so loved the world that He gave His only-begotten Son, so that everyone who believes in Him may not perish but have eternal life” (John 3: 16). And not merely “gave,” but “even unto death, even death on a cross” (Phil. 2:8). How so? We were enslaved to the devil through Adam’s disobedience, subject to death, sold into sin, and destined for decay. The Only-Begotten Son of God came, giving Himself as a ransom for all, and not only delivered us from the power of death, but, having washed us from our sins with His blood (Rev. 1:5), made us heirs of His kingdom, as it is written. Do you see His steadfast and powerful love? Do you see the boundless mercy of His love for humanity? How unfathomable are His mercies, and how inexhaustible are His bounties, which He has poured out abundantly upon us through Jesus Christ, our Savior!

30. What, then, shall we—poor as we are—say to this, and what shall we think? Shall we return to sin? Shall we desire slavery? Shall we choose dishonor, corruption, and condemnation?—Far be it from us.—“For if we have died to sin, how can we still live in it? Or do you not realize that, inasmuch as we were baptized into Christ Jesus, we were baptized into His death? We were therefore buried with Him through baptism into death, so that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too might walk in newness of life” (Rom. 6:2–4). – Let us therefore, brothers, walk in this new life, just as we promised again when we took the schema; let us live “in righteousness and godliness, as befits the saints” (Eph. 5: 3), in peace and harmony, in honesty, in nobility and reverence, in holiness and self-control, not being carried away by “the desires we once had in our ignorance” (1 Peter 1:14), but fleeing from our former passions as from a fire, having been established on the rock of our faith.

31. This is what renewal is! What, then, is corruption? —The sinful temptation by which our forefather Adam was ensnared, became an exile from Paradise, and fell under the yoke of our present, most sorrowful life—envy, by which Cain, in his pride, killed his brother Abel because his offerings were preferred, after which he spent his entire life groaning and trembling. From these two passions, an innumerable number of evils entered the world: hence the Flood, which destroyed all living things on earth; hence the bitter fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, reduced to ashes by fire and brimstone as a warning of their wickedness. Do you see what sin, lust of the eyes, and worldly pride have wrought?

32. But as has already been said, by God’s grace we have been called, have obtained freedom, and have been raised to the status of sonship. Let us therefore stand firm in the freedom to which Christ has set us free, and in the glory with which He has glorified us, let us preserve ourselves, turning away from all that is vain, and regarding everything as nothing for Christ’s sake, —regarding dishonor as honor, sorrow as joy, wounds as delight, persecution as bliss, and death as life, just as our holy fathers and brothers, whose names are written in the Book of Life, regarded these things and are now commemorated. Living in this way, we too will “shine as lights in the world, holding fast to the living Word” (Phil. 2:15), and in the age to come we will be deemed worthy to be heirs of the kingdom of God.

260. Having shown how the contemplation of the lives of the holy fathers revives all that is good within us and separates us from all that is evil, he invites everyone, according to the nature of their obedience, to imitate them

260. 1) Having shown how the study of the lives of the holy fathers revives all that is good within us and separates us from all that is evil, – 2) he invites everyone to imitate them, according to the nature of their obedience, – 3) so that we may be free from disobedience, laziness, and grumbling. [4:41]

1. In these days, when the lives of our holy fathers are being read, it is impossible to express what great benefit we derive from this, and what joy we experience. For tell me, what could be sweeter than contemplating their immortal deeds, miracles, and victories over demons! It seems to me that even stones feel this benefit, not just rational human beings. Through this, the human mind is enlightened, casting aside the darkening speculations of the flesh; through this, the soul is moved, soaring toward divine love. It can truly be said that this (i.e., the assembly of the saints) is God’s Garden of Eden, filled and adorned not with material plants but with a variety of spiritual fruits, where the breath of life exudes fragrance, where the serpent does not wound but is wounded, does not drive out but is driven out, as is fitting. And if the kingdom of God is within us, then I think no one will err in calling the saints the kingdom of heaven, upon whom the all-good God, like a generous king, bestows gifts upon His servants. What do earthly things matter to me after this kingdom? What is vain glory and a belly doomed to perish? What are gold and silver, and fine garments, and every other vanity?—And all these things are not even worth comparing, just as light cannot be compared to darkness, life to death, or truth to a dream.

2. If all this is so, let us “rejoice with an inexpressible and glorious joy” (1 Peter 1:8) that we have obtained the better part and have come to belong to a chosen race, radiant with heavenly nobility; and not only will we rejoice in this, but we will also strive to imitate their virtues to the best of our ability, so that it may be evident that we do not bear an empty name, “having a form of godliness but denying its power” (2 Timothy 3:5). Just as when one goes to a pharmacy, each person chooses a remedy according to their illness; in the same way, we, desiring to imitate the saints well, will choose examples that are suited to each person’s way of life and thus draw benefit for ourselves from their lives. I, being unworthy, will look to those who have pastored worthily; the steward—to those who have managed faithfully and wisely; the cellarer—on those who managed the cellar judiciously and conscientiously. Let the canon, the host, the cook, the refectory attendant, and all others think the same, whatever duty they may have been assigned. Good examples can be found for everyone, if we are willing to see them and imitate them.

3. Let there be no disobedience in anyone. As soon as you are called, appear immediately. To say, “Wait a moment, and I will come”—especially to the steward—is a sin and a matter worthy of condemnation. Nor should anyone refuse to fulfill their duty, but carry it out meekly, even unto death: this will be true monastic perfection. And let no one be grumbling, condemning our place as lacking this or that. Such a one is subject to the judgment of those who grumbled in the wilderness, whose destruction is astonishing (Num. 16).—“But who are these people?” – The ignorant, the impatient, the infantile in mind—unworthy even to breathe the air, let alone to receive so many consolations. – Nevertheless, may our all-good God give understanding to the unwise, increase the wisdom of the wise, and save all in His kingdom, through Christ Jesus, our Lord.

261. Everything desired according to the spirit of the world is fleeting; only virtue is eternally blissful

261. 1) Everything desired according to the spirit of the world is fleeting; only virtue is eternally blissful. – 2) It brings bliss even here, as we see from the daily commemoration of the saints in the church. – 3) What, then, will it be like there? There the saints will be like the sun, and they will be with Christ. – 4) Let us strive to be deemed worthy of this, and to avoid its opposite. [4, 42]

4. Among people, some find bliss in wealth, others in power, some in success, and still others in pleasures. But none of these is worthy of bliss, because nothing lasts forever; rather, it perishes along with this present age. Even here, however, it does not comfort many for long; it merely appears and then vanishes at once, like a dream. Only virtue is worthy of delight, as an eternal possession that makes its possessors blessed.

– Let us recall how many rulers and comforters there have been throughout the ages—and not a single one of them is remembered with praise; but the glory of the virtuous is unquenchable.

5. And this is evident from what we do. Yesterday we glorified Saint Chrysostom; today we glorify the ever-memorable Ephrem; tomorrow we will glorify another saint. Thus, like the heavenly bodies, they shine one after another throughout the year upon the firmament of the Church; in remembrance of them, our lips are opened to glorify them, and they illuminate our steps as we walk with God. Truly, therefore, the sacred word holds true: “For those whom He foreknew, He also predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son, so that He might be the firstborn among many brothers; and those whom He predestined, He also called; and those whom He called, He also justified; and those whom He justified, He also glorified” (Rom. 8:29–30). What shall we say to this? Are we not partakers of such a calling and glory? Of course we are. And to us, the humble, neither the life of the cross nor the prize of blessedness is foreign; for we have endured persecution up to this very hour, in addition to our previous struggles in the good confession of the faith. And oh, how wondrous is the power of virtue! And what does it bestow upon those who strictly adhere to it!

6. But that is here; what of the age to come? Oh, who can describe that bliss and that glory! The Lord says this: “Then the righteous will shine like the sun” (Matt. 13:43). Since He Himself is the Sun of Righteousness, He has promised that the righteous, being like Him, will shine like the sun, as the Apostle affirms: “For if we suffer with Him, we will also be glorified with Him” (Rom. 8:17). And as the Lord Himself prayed to the Father: “Father, those whom You have given Me, I desire that wherever I am, they also may be with Me, so that they may see My glory, which You have given Me, because You loved Me before the foundation of the world” (John 17:24). Do you see where we will go?—“Where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God” (Col. 3: 1), where there is joy and gladness, where the host of angels dwells, and the church of the firstborn whose names are written in heaven—where our brothers and fathers of the same order as us are—there we will go shortly, and there “we will begin to rejoice with Him, Who reigns over the ages with His dominion,” as the blessed David sings (Ps. 65: 7)—not over an age of a thousand or ten thousand years, but over an age that never grows old and has no end.

7. And who is content with this?—The one who is so zealous that he remains sober and vigilant all day and every hour, so as not to let his soul slumber: for, during such slumber, the passions, like beasts, attack us and take possession of the soul. But as long as we remain on guard and watch over ourselves, the predator will not steal from us, nor will the serpent carry us off. – Therefore, we must stay alert and consider with our minds what has been said above, as well as its opposite—the torments that threaten those who oppose God’s will: unquenchable fire, utter darkness, the never-sleeping worm, and all the rest; so that, being filled with and embraced by such thoughts, we may avoid the enemy’s snares, pass from here blamelessly, and attain the kingdom of heaven.

262. We have received many blessings from the Lord during our journey from the desert to this place: we must give thanks not only in words but also in deeds

262. 1) We have received many blessings from the Lord during our journey from the desert to this place: we must give thanks not only with words but also with deeds. – 2) What, then, shall we offer in return? – Let us live for the glory of God—let us be the fragrance of Christ; let us ascend the mountain so that others may see. – 3) To this end, let us leave behind the things of this world and adorn ourselves with heavenly things. – 4) This is not far from us, for it is within us. [4, 43]

8. Always rejoicing in God’s blessings, we must always thank Him from a warm heart in earnest prayer. For consider what a blessing we have even now! When we were forced to flee, fearing the Agarians, did He not sustain us, just as in the desert, in that place where we were cast out—and this for many days? Did He not then open the door of rest for us here, where there is a beautiful temple and suitable dwellings; the very one who welcomed us—our brother of one mind? – How great is God’s care for us! Is there anything He ought to have done that He did not do? – Throughout our flight, He provided us with bread, wine, fish, and other necessities—as much as we needed, and even more than we needed—so that those who witnessed it were amazed. For all this, we poor souls must not only give thanks, but also lay down our very lives. Therefore, I beg you, let us kindle within ourselves the strongest love for Him, cling to Him with all our hearts, and offer Him the most gracious thanksgiving.

9. How, then, shall we repay Him?—Let us live here as well for the glory of His name, so that what He said may be fulfilled in us: “Let your light shine before men, so that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father in heaven” (Matt. 5:16). Elsewhere, the Apostle says: “Thanks be to God, who always leads us in triumph in Christ Jesus and reveals through us the fragrance of His knowledge in every place. For we are the fragrance of Christ to God among those who are being saved and among those who are perishing.” (2 Cor. 14: 15). Do you see that the virtuous person is the fragrance of Christ, wherever he may live? Virtue, by its very nature, is not something to be hidden; but whoever practices it becomes evident to all: for it is written, “A city set on a hill cannot be hidden” (Matt. 5:14). The city is the human soul; the mountain is the height of virtues, upon which those who have ascended “shine like lights in the world, holding fast to the word of life for their own praise on the day of Christ” (Phil. 2:15). Let us, then, brothers, also ascend this holy mountain.

10. But we cannot ascend there unless we first leave behind the things of this world—that is, the desires of the flesh and the thoughts of the mind, and the pernicious pleasures of this life, from which turning away is the ascent to virtue. Therefore, let the heart be cleansed of impure thoughts, let the eye be chaste in its gaze, let the ear be closed to evil speech—let the tongue be forbidden to speak vainly, let the hand be restrained from improper touch, let the foot be directed toward the path of peace, and let all the members be trained in the corresponding good and sanctified by the beauty of Christ. The earthly king graciously welcomes the one who is beautiful and adorned in body; but the Heavenly King favors the one who is adorned in spirit, even though, outwardly, he may be poor, blind, lame, or have other visible defects that people consider despicable. In this sense, the ignoble become noble, the inglorious become glorious, and the poor become rich; for this very reason, the blessed Apostles, who were fishermen, became leaders throughout the earth; hence St. Anthony, though uneducated, was wiser than the wise; hence—to take an example closer to us—our Thaddeus, a Scythian and a slave, as you know, rose to the heights of confessing Christ and became renowned throughout the world.

11. And oh, the ineffable love for mankind shown to us by our good God! What a convenient way He has granted us to come to Him! For this requires neither a mediator nor money, nor waiting for some favorable opportunity; one need only desire it—and all is done. – So, do you wish to be great in heaven? Choose to be the least here. Do you wish to be called a son of God? Calm your soul from its passions. Do you wish to be seen by the eyes of God? Stand up for the truth. – But who is content with these things? – Those who willingly accept the teaching, who love to do what is right, who strive to be enriched with heavenly blessings. – May we, too, by fulfilling the life-giving commandments in this spirit, attain the kingdom of heaven with all the saints, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

263. Let everyone perform his duty wholeheartedly, as before God

263. 1) Let everyone perform his or her duties wholeheartedly, as before God. – 2) I will do mine, and you will do yours: and we will be a help to one another, working together for the common good. [4:44]

12. Both those who carry out their duties and those who oversee them must, with all attention and diligence, —with ascetic devotion—carry out their duties—whether steward, assistant steward, cellarer, cook, refectory attendant, or anyone performing any other task—so as not to fall under the terrible curse that declares: “Cursed is the man who does the Lord’s work carelessly” (Jer. 48:10); but rather, that they may become most worthy of the Lord’s favor, Who said: “Who is the faithful and wise servant, whom his master will set over his household? Blessed is that servant whom his master, upon coming, finds doing so. “Truly I tell you, he will put him in charge of all his possessions” (Matt. 24:45–47). Do you see what kind of honor and how great an honor He bestows upon those who serve well? It is clear, then, that those who do not serve well will receive the opposite fate. Therefore, I urge each of you to faithfully fulfill the duty entrusted to you, thereby glorifying God and securing your own salvation. Steward, provide for the physical needs of the community with prudence, giving each person what is due—not out of favoritism or partiality, but always with goodwill and brotherly love. Steward, see to it that the brotherhood is provided with food, performing your duties sincerely with the sole desire to comfort them, and keeping nothing spoiled in the storeroom. Cook, keep a clear conscience in preparing and seasoning the food, as if you were offering your service to God Himself. Refectory attendant, keep the refectory and all the vessels needed there clean, serving the brothers as you would serve the Lord. Let the others also act in this way in their respective duties.

13. I say this not to set some of you against others, but so that each one, in whatever role he has been called to, may strive to fulfill his duty to serve others, keeping God before his mind’s eye, from whom all reward is to be expected. – “And have I, a humble one, not been entrusted with the building up of my own household?” – “Yes, and indeed the greatest task of all.” – “Therefore, just as it is my responsibility to care for and watch over your souls, to entreat and instruct each one, and to proclaim to you—both privately and in public—the truth of God and the coming sword, so too must you fulfill your duties without laziness.” – And in this way we will be one body and one spirit, just as we are called in the one hope of our calling—loving one another as members of the same body, bearing with one another, caring for one another, and bearing one another’s burdens; so that at the time of our departure we may not regret the time wasted in negligence; but let us always be well prepared for this departure, and sincerely confident that, having departed from here with a clear conscience, we may attain the kingdom of heaven.

264. They got into a fight: this exposes

264. 1) They quarreled: he rebukes them. – 2) He points to pride as the cause, which first instills the thought: “Go ahead, touch him; I’ll get him”—and then manifests itself in action. – 3) The remedy for this is to root good intentions in the heart. [4, 45]

14. I was away from you for only a short time; but upon my return, I found disorder among you, which I deem necessary to make known to all—such disorder that some, stretching out their hands, seized one another frantically, with anger and shouting. – As for one of them, this is not entirely surprising, since he is still a layperson and has not been accepted into the brotherhood; but as for the other, this is extremely surprising, since he did this while already a monk, who ought to have crucified the world and had his flesh nailed to the cross. How is it, then, brother, that you came down from the cross, as if freed from the nails, and laid your hands upon Christ Jesus in the Jewish manner? For He Himself said, “Whatever you did for one of the least of these My brothers, you did for Me” (Matt. 25:40). And were you not afraid of the One who spoke these words? Were you not ashamed before the Angel, the guardian of your life? Were you not afraid of the brothers and bystanders watching you? “Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven,” the Lord commanded (Matt. 5:16). But your evil deed has instead shrouded you in such darkness that through you the name of God has been blasphemed. Woe to me, a sinner! To what heights of life are we called, and to what depths have we fallen, bringing shame upon ourselves like wicked laypeople. You say that he started the fight; but have you not heard how gently the Lord said to the servant who struck Him on the cheek: “If I have spoken wrongly, bear witness to the wrong; but if I have spoken rightly, why do you strike Me?” (John 18:23). And again on the cross: “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34). Knowing this, you ought to have blessed those who rebuke you, prayed for those who strike you, and remained silent when blasphemed (1 Cor. 4:12–13). But you, not imitating the good—whose imitator have you become? – Look at the commandment given by the Apostle: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice” (Eph. 4: 31); yet you have come to blows, pulling each other’s hair and choking one another? – Thus has God’s law been despised. “The blacksmith forges silver in vain,” as the prophetic word says (Jer. 6:29). In vain do I, too, labor humbly until I am exhausted. Nevertheless, even so, I will not cease to do my work, all the more so because at times I have many attentive listeners.

15. But where, then, lies the cause of such wickedness? For one must not only expose sin but also point out the remedy. An evil conscience has devised this wicked innovation—a proud self-assertion, a scheme of an evil heart. “If he says such-and-such to me,” says the impetuous one in his heart, “I will answer him this; if he treats me this way, I will repay him in kind.”—Then, when irritation arises for whatever reason, we bring out into the open what we had been pondering in secret. For it is true what was said: “Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks. A good person brings forth good things from the good treasure of the heart, and a wicked person brings forth wicked things from the wicked treasure of the heart” (Matt. 12:34–35).

16. Let us make our hearts a treasure trove of good intentions. Then not only will we bear no malice and refrain from fighting, but even if someone strikes you on the right cheek, we will turn the other to him as well (Matt. 5:39), and whatever else may happen, we will act in accordance with the Gospel commandment. – “Why are you perishing, O house of Israel?” (Ezek. 33:11). It is fitting for us to ask ourselves the same question here. Why do we spend our lives day after day in vain and idleness, showing ourselves to be connoisseurs of food and drink, yet remaining ignorant when it comes to keeping God’s commandments? Would it not be better for us to strengthen ourselves from now on: not to be distressed, not to be angry, not to rage, and not to shout—for from these, like arrows, offensive words fly forth, and sometimes even something worse than that. – This I “command” you “before God, who gives life to all things, and before Christ Jesus, who testified the good confession before Pontius Pilate: to keep” you “the commandment unstained and blameless” (1 Tim. 6: 13–14), so that I may not be compelled to subject you to the most severe penances, but rather that, by always acting in every way with propriety and in accordance with the rules, you may bring peace to me, a sinner, please God, and be made worthy of eternal blessings.

265. He further rebukes those who have quarreled; and—he invites everyone to peace, drawing inspiration for this from Holy Communion

265. 1) He further rebukes those who have quarreled; and—2) he invites everyone to peace, drawing inspiration for this from Holy Communion.—3) To this he subtly adds a word about virginity, which he praises, and—4) for which he prescribes repentance in the fire of the fear of God and self-sacrifice in tears. [4, 46]

17. Neither should I ever feel sated by this salvific discourse, nor should you by this soul-nourishing listening. But both of us must have an insatiable longing for both, like those thirsting to draw water. And this is a sign of progress, a condition, and an act of salvation. For words lead to deeds—good ones to good deeds and the opposite to the opposite. Since we desire to do good, we must make use of good teachings and wholesome conversations, so as not to err in what is right. Teaching this very thing, the Apostle says: “Let no corrupt word proceed out of your mouth, but only such as is good for building up faith, that it may impart grace to those who hear. And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, with whom you were sealed for the day of redemption.” And further: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice. Be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, just as God in Christ forgave you” (Eph. 4:29–32). Do you see what He commands? How precise is the definition of this commandment?—Here is what He says even more strictly in another passage: “Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5:24), that is, they remain, as it were, unmoved by sinful actions. If this is so, then consider what condemnation our quarreling brothers deserve. They not only quarreled but also laid hands on one another. And you, still a layperson, merely counted among us, are you raising your hands against a monk?—And you, a monk, dare to strike with a stick one who is preparing for the vows of obedience?—No; you are no longer a monk, but a gladiator; not an ascetic, but a robber; not a son of peace, but a child of wrath. Did not the blows arise from abusive words, and do blows not sometimes lead to murder?—Why should those who have acted thus be subjected to the appropriate penance, lest they come to something worse?

18. But you, beloved, as disciples of the meek and peace-loving Lord, live meekly and peacefully among yourselves—“Pursue peace with all people, and holiness, without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14). Be mindful of the Lord’s body and blood, which we are deemed worthy to partake of. A soul that receives these most pure gifts must not allow turmoil, frenzy, or inappropriate desires to enter it. The mouth, drawing from the immortal spring, must not utter unclean and foul words. The eyes, sanctified by precious blood, must not gaze with beastly intent or allow lewd images to be imprinted upon them. The hand that has received the divine treasure must not touch anything unworthy.

19. But all the members, as the limbs of Christ, must be kept and preserved in purity. Certainly, every virtue is great and desirable, but none as much as virginity. Virginity first shone forth in Paradise, before the serpent deceived our first parents with his sophistry; virginity was deemed worthy to be the mother of Christ; virginity makes people into angels; virginity elevates the world to incorruptibility.

20. At this point, someone will ask, “How, then, are we to attain it?”—How else, if not through countless labors and sweat?—For where a great task lies ahead, there must also be great diligence and no small amount of toil. Just as a sharp sword effectively cuts down attackers, so too must the soul—in the fear of God, as if forged in fire and tempered in the water of tears—cut down demonic thoughts, seizing them as prey. If it becomes dull, it must be sharpened again, so that it may slay not by the thousands, but by the multitudes, as is sung of David; for “many are those who fight against us from on high” (Ps. 55: 3), and the spirits of wickedness, waging war against us, are innumerable; resistance to them until the end reveals the true warrior of Christ and makes him a crown-bearer. May God’s mercy grant forgiveness to those who have sinned, and to you who are walking in righteousness, may He strengthen your zeal, so that you may fulfill every commandment of God again and again, and thereby attain the kingdom of heaven.

266. The zealous person refrains not only from evil deeds but also from evil thoughts; through this he attains the peace of God, in which he delights through divine contemplations

266. 1) The zealous person refrains not only from evil deeds but also from evil thoughts; thereby he attains the peace of God, in which he is delighted by divine contemplations. – 2) Let us therefore be mindful of ourselves and not allow thoughts to linger in our souls—especially lustful and angry ones. [4, 47]

21. The careless and the well-off consider it a sin to actually commit lawless acts, such as adultery, fornication, sodomy, impurity, and every other evil deed, against which the law is severe. But the zealous person, desiring to conform to the commandments in every detail, does not consider even unseemly and improper mental fantasies—from which unwholesome bodily movements arise—to be blameless, and strives in every way to destroy all of this within himself and to remain at peace from destructive passions: which is to have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Apostle says (Rom. 5: 1), in which, having found her rest, the soul rejoices with great joy and is delighted by an insatiable sweetness, loving to dwell in thoughts of God and to delve into the contemplation of His ineffable greatness, to the point of forgetting herself. But when it happens that the soul emerges from this state and is stirred by unspoken desires, it is then tossed and agitated like a ship in distress on a stormy sea; and if the Lord does not come to its aid, it is in danger of suffering shipwreck.

22. Therefore, we must be vigilant, not allowing wicked thoughts to linger within us, but immediately uprooting them. For if the serpent finds a place to penetrate and gradually make its way in, it will not depart until it has brought about death. Why does Scripture say that the serpent will strike at the heel of man—that is, the end of his actions—while man will strike at the head of the serpent—that is, the first intrusion of a sinful thought into the soul (Gen. 3:15)? Let us therefore stand valiantly against the invasion of thoughts, destroying them before the lust they kindle can take hold, and thereby stemming the flood of sin, so that we too may say with St. David: “We have gone through fire and water, and You have brought us to a place of rest” (Ps. 65:12). – However, it is not this one passion (i.e., lust) alone that disturbs and corrupts the soul; but even more so, anger; for it is said: “My eyes are troubled by wrath” (Ps. 6:8), and again: “Their wrath is like that of a serpent” (Ps. 57:5); and again: “Fury lies in the hearts of fools” (Eccl. 7:10); and finally: “The rush of fury leads to his downfall” (Sir. 1:22). From what, then, does such a passion arise? From a mindset that is proud of itself and contemptuous of others, thinking itself to be something (Gal. 6:3), towering above those below. For the one who is humble of heart, imitating the Lord, is meek and gentle, not quarrelsome or loud; and if it happens, he would rather suffer an offense than cause one—he accepts a blow but does not return it.

267. Acts of obedience are interconnected; why we must help one another and always, without refusal or delay, obey those in authority through acts of obedience

267. 1) Acts of obedience are interconnected; therefore, we must help one another and always, without refusal or delay, obey those in authority through acts of obedience. – 2) Do not give in to disturbing thoughts: for they come from the evil one. – 3) To this end, cultivate patience, which is necessary in all things. [4, 48]

23. What shall we discuss today? I will speak about the outward appearance of our life, or life according to the rule: for although we are in exile, we live as in a monastery—not just one or two of us, but many together. And although we do not have the comforts of a monastery, we manage to obtain what is necessary, albeit with difficulty—and not only for ourselves, but also for others. For brothers and fathers, as well as travelers and the poor, constantly come to us. To welcome and provide for everyone requires no small measure of spirit and no small amount of labor. Therefore, the steward must be prudent and vigilant, as a steward of God. But this will serve no purpose if the steward does not have an assistant steward who is in harmony with him and equally vigilant. Nor will the assistant steward succeed in anything if he does not have a storekeeper who follows his lead in everything. Nor will the steward’s affairs proceed as desired unless he has a good assistant in the cook. Nor will the cook’s affairs—and by extension those of the others, and through them, all the rest—go smoothly unless each of them has fellow workers among the others. Just as there are many members in a single body; yet the members care for one another, so that if one member suffers, all members suffer with it, and if one member is honored, all members rejoice with it: so too in the brotherhood, if the same order is not observed, there will be no fellowship, no peace, and no unity of mind, but there will be outcasts, divisions, and decay. – If this is indeed the case, how dare anyone act according to their own private desires, or, when it has become necessary to attend to their private affairs or handicrafts, fail to engage in the common and beneficial work? Or how dare anyone, when called upon for any task, refuse and disobey those in authority over them? Such a person is no longer a disciple but a rebel, no longer a brother but a stranger. But if this has happened, beware of it in the future, so that whoever falls into such guilt will not have to bear the penance prescribed for such misconduct. – Do you not hear what the Apostle commands? “Be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, just as God in Christ has forgiven you” (Eph. 4:32). Let us, then, be like this toward one another, bearing one another’s burdens and thus fulfilling the law of Christ, as it is written (Gal. 6:2).

24. I have asked you before, and I ask you now: let us not allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by the weight of our thoughts, but with the joy of the Holy Spirit let us carry out the struggle set before us, looking to the Author and Perfecter of our faith, Jesus, who grants prayer to the one who prays and victory to the one who desires to win. Do you not remember how, not long ago, a storm suddenly arose, and then the air cleared up again immediately? So it is with thoughts: they disturb us a little, and then they pass away again. Oh, if only they would never trouble us at all! And why shouldn’t we always have peace in our souls? But this is impossible, because we are fickle, and we do not even remain the same from one day to the next; how much less can this be the case always. But look, my friend, at the devil’s relentless malice: even when driven away, he returns; and though he is darkness, he transforms himself into light before the Angel, attempting to deceive us. But may the serpent depart from us, and may we always say: “We will not deny You, Christ, nor will we make our confession false.” Or do you not know from what state we have passed into what state? Have we not passed from the unseen to the seen? From ignorance to knowledge? From dishonor to honor? And we have the word, and knowledge, and praise; and you are sons, truly honorable, clothed in gold, according to your golden obedience.

25. What, then, is still lacking?—Patience, “for you need patience,” says the Apostle, “so that, having done the will of God, you may receive the promise” (Heb. 10:36). What, then, is this promise?—The Lord Himself said: “I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I prepare a place for you, I will come again and take you to Myself, so that where I am, there you may be also. And you know that I am going, and you know the way” (John 14:2–4). “And no one will take your joy from you” (John 16:22). Reflecting on this and beholding the glory—inexpressible and beyond comprehension—that is to be revealed in the saints, let us endure everything with a generous spirit: if we must go hungry, we will go hungry; if we are to have enough of everything, we will be content; if we are to die, we will die, so that we may inherit eternal life in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

268. During Shrovetide, the indulgence in sensual pleasures is contrary to the spirit of Christianity

268. 1) During Shrovetide, the indulgence in sensual pleasures is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. – 2) Let us give thanks to the Lord for leading us out of the world and into our quiet life, from which so many saints have shone forth, whom we also imitate. – 3) Let us therefore be faithful to Him, preparing ourselves for the upcoming trials of our confession. [4, 49]

26. The coming days (Shrovetide) are usually regarded by people as some sort of holiday, because of the feasts and revelries that take place during this time, without realizing that these days, through abstinence from meat, proclaim general self-restraint, not gluttony and drunkenness. For these are characteristics of a Hellenic festival. As for Christians, although they may consume everything in moderation, they must not indulge the flesh in lust, as the Apostle teaches (Rom. 13:14). Evil, however, having entered into the laws of daily life, leads the world wherever it pleases. We, however, will avoid intemperance even in those things whose use is permitted to us, knowing that intemperance is the mother of sin. Thus, our forefather Adam, as long as he refrained from tasting what was forbidden, rejoiced and was glad in Paradise, filled with divine insights and inspirations. But when he broke his self-restraint and tasted from the tree of disobedience, he was immediately cast out of the Paradise of bliss. And intemperance became for him the mother of death. So the Sodomites, raving with shameful passions from their satiety with bread, brought upon themselves the wrath of God and were consumed by fire and brimstone. So the detestable Esau, carried away by his greedy eyes, gave up his birthright for a single meal. So it is with the people of God: “The people sat down to eat and drink, and then rose up to play” (Ex. 32:6). The same is true even today: feasts and drunkenness, shouts and demonic dances, not only by day but late into the night. Such is the evil of intemperance; through it, death entered the world.

27. We, however, must thank God that He has delivered us from such vanities and led us into a blessed life, where there is not intemperance but moderation, not drunkenness but sobriety, not riot but peace, not noise but silence, not obscenity but thanksgiving, not lewdness but purity, holiness, and chastity. It is from this very life that all our divine fathers shone forth, who, with God's help, subdued their passions, cast out demons, became like angels, performed miracles, attained heavenly glory, and became objects of wonder in the world—among whom was the blessed Anthony, whose life we have just read and seen how God glorified him in heaven—so much so that earthly kings considered it a great honor to write to him and to read the words he wrote. We, too, the humble ones, follow in the footsteps of these blessed ones; and that we also strive to emulate them in deed is attested to by the perfection of our monks, their renunciation of the world, their separation from their homeland, their kin, and all their acquaintances, their humility and obedience—this is the confession set before us, for which we also endure persecution.

28. Let us therefore rejoice and share in one another's joy, that God has granted us all these things, and that we lead a spiritual life in which, if we so desire, we may celebrate every day and rejoice with unfading joy. Therefore, I urge you: let us hold fast even more firmly to our struggle and to the confession that lies before us; for word has already spread that the ruler is examining our case, and it seems the king's envoy may arrive soon. But let us not be intimidated by such rumors: "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. 8:31). If He has helped us in past circumstances, He will certainly help us in the future as well: let us only stand firm, let us heed only ourselves, and He will give us strength in all things, so that we may live as is pleasing to Him until the end and attain the kingdom of heaven.

269. Persecution at the door: let us face it with equanimity, trusting in God's help and taking heart from the promises for enduring persecution—for the sake of the faith

269. 1) Persecution at the door: let us face it with equanimity, trusting in God's help and taking heart from the promises for enduring persecution—for the faith. – 2) We must not associate with heretics, and especially avoid those who are faithful in word but heretics at heart. – 3) Iconoclasm wages war against the dogma of the Incarnation of the Word of God and against the commandment to honor and worship God. [4, 51]

29. We ought now to be speaking about abstinence, since Holy Lent is just around the corner. But the rumors spreading everywhere prevent us from doing so and divert both our thoughts and our words to other matters. I have already told you that the ruler is examining our case; and now, as they say, he is issuing threats through the governor of Nicomedia—to which, if we respond in a godly manner, he will not tolerate it and will hasten to carry out what he has planned. There is nothing to say in response to this, but we must prepare for new persecution, confident that where sufferings abound, there also the consolations of the Holy Spirit abound, as the Apostle says: "For just as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so also through Christ our consolation abounds." If we are grieved, it is for your comfort and salvation, which are brought about through the endurance of the very sufferings we ourselves endure; and our hope for you is well known. If we are comforted, it is for your comfort and salvation, knowing that just as you share in our sufferings, so also you share in our comfort" (2 Cor. 1:5–7). In these words, the Apostle has shown us that we share with one another in sufferings and consolations, as though we were one body and one Spirit, "just as" we are "called to the one hope of our calling" (Eph. 4:4). Let us not lose heart or become discouraged, but let us resolve to stand firm together for God's cause, as good soldiers of Christ, taking up our weapons—"not of the flesh, but powerful through God for the destruction of strongholds" (2 Cor. 10:4)—that is, prudence, courage, chastity, and truth—and thereby fulfilling what the Lord said: "When they persecute you in one town, flee to another" (Matt. 10:23)—and as we go there, let us not "worry about what we will eat, or what we will drink, or what we will wear" (Matt. 6:31). For He Himself said: "I will not leave you nor forsake you" (Joshua 1:5); so He will open the doors of mercy for us there as well, and He will be our helper in all things. How then can we not rejoice, having such promises? How can we not be glad that we are disciples of the Lord? The holy Apostles were also persecuted, to whom the Lord said: "Blessed are you when they revile you and persecute you and utter all kinds of evil against you falsely for My sake. Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven" (Matthew 5:11–12). Therefore, the present is joyful and gladdening: for it brings us inexpressible joy, eternal life, and an everlasting kingdom.

30. "Do not go into the roads of the Gentiles, and do not enter any town of the Samaritans" (Matt. 10:5). We must understand this in relation to heretics: therefore, we will not enter their churches or their homes. But wherever there is a son of peace, a seed of piety, there we will stay, and there we will receive food, just as in previous years. Let us guard against those who pretend to hold the truth, who claim to be righteous leaders but are not such, but are led astray, “deceiving and being deceived” (2 Tim. 3: 13), “whose judgment is just” (Rom. 3: 8). Let us preserve an unwavering faith and a blameless life, neither diminishing nor offending one another, but remaining whole and perfect in both.

31. The subject of the present confession is the dogma of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. Whoever does not confess that our Lord Jesus Christ may be depicted in a painting does not confess that He was visible in the flesh; for to be visible in the flesh and to be a subject suitable for iconographic representation are one and the same thing. Furthermore, whoever does not worship the holy icon of the Lord does not worship the Lord Himself. For what is depicted on the icon is the original, and whoever looks at the icon sees the original before him. Therefore, whether one honors or dishonors an icon, or worships or does not worship the image, this applies equally to the original and—if the icon depicts the Lord—to the of the Lord. Thus, whoever venerates the icon of the Lord and worships His image venerates the Lord and worships Him; but whoever does not venerate this icon and does not bow before the image does not venerate the Lord and does not worship Him. – Although iconoclasts claim to worship the Lord, they are lying. The words of Scripture apply to them: “They claim to know God, but by their deeds they deny Him” (1 Tim. 1:16). We, however, worship Christ and His icon—we worship the Mother of God and her icon—and the saints and their icons. And this is the apostolic teaching that we have received from our holy fathers. I urge you, my children and brothers, through the Holy Spirit who dwells in us, to preserve this pledge of faith whole and unharmed. —Pray, then, for us who are humble, that the Lord may grant us “the word” to “open our mouths” (Eph. 6:19), with boldness to speak the truth, so that we may not put our hope to shame, and together with you may flawlessly accomplish the task set before us, and that all of us may attain the kingdom of heaven.

270. Another rebuke of the excesses of the Olive Feast, and of worldly life in general, and thanksgiving that God has delivered the monastics from this

270. 1) Another rebuke of the excesses of the Feast of Olives, and of worldly life in general, and thanksgiving that God has delivered the monastics from this. – 2) We must grieve for the laity who live according to the spirit of the world, imitating the Apostles, the Prophets, and all the saints. [4, 52]

1. I often speak well of your life; but I do so not out of flattery, but in truth, desiring to express my pity for those who live according to the world, and with the aim of making you even more zealous. You yourselves know what is happening there now: feasts and drunkenness, songs and dances, and all the other such inventions of the enemy’s works in the world—“whose judgment is just,” as it is written. But our way of life is not like that: day and night we praise the Lord, according to the law handed down to us by the holy fathers; psalm singing follows psalm singing, reading follows reading, prayer follows prayer; then—in our thoughts, vigilance over our thoughts; in our hearts, instruction in the divine words; as well as timely silence and proper conversation; furthermore, we serve one another; everything among us is regulated by measure and weight, though on feast days some comfort is usually offered. For listen to what the Lord says to Judas: “What you are going to do, do quickly.” But none of those reclining at the table understood why He said this to him. Some were perplexed, since Judas was the treasurer, as Jesus said to him: ‘Buy what we need for the feast,’ or ‘Give something to the poor.’ Do you see that they were concerned both about the feast and about the poor? This is what we, too, as you can see, strive to fulfill in humility. But blessed be God, who has made us worthy to share in such a life; “not because of righteous deeds that we have done”—for we have done nothing good on earth—“but according to His mercy” (Titus 3:5), He has called us to it. That is why each of us, with a contrite heart, must always say: “Who am I, O Lord, O Lord, and what is my father’s house, that You should love me so much?”

2. And such is our calling; yet in the world you will rarely find anything like it. For there, night is followed by day amid the cares and affairs of this age, in self-deception through wealth and other troubles; so that a person has no time even to breathe: now they conspire with one another, now they clash in hostility; “oaths and lies, murder, theft, and adultery have spread throughout the land,” as the prophetic word says (Hosea 4:2), and many other things that are not easy to recount. Having recalled all this, the blessed Chrysostom said that scarcely even a single soul would be saved from this world. A terrible statement, yet true. And a person of good conscience cannot help but grieve and mourn over this. For are we not all brothers to one another? Are we not all of the same blood? Were we not all formed from the same dust?—If, upon seeing an animal rushing headlong into an abyss, anyone involuntarily feels pity for it, is it not all the more pitiful to witness the destruction of our brothers and fellow believers? For this reason, the blessed Apostle wept for the enemies of the cross of Christ, praying for them with unceasing anguish of heart (Rom. 9:2–3). The prophet Jeremiah wept for Israel, and his weeping is described in full detail in Scripture. The great Moses cried out to God: “And now, if You will forgive their sin—but if not, blot me out of Your book” (Ex. 32:32); and every one of the saints, being equally filled with compassion, never forgot to pray for people who were in a similar state. – So too, if we wish to follow in their footsteps, “let each of you look not only to his own interests, but also to the interests of others” (Phil. 2: 4), but also pray for the world, feeling compassion and sorrow in our hearts for those living dissolute lives, for those possessed by heresy, for those darkened by paganism, and in short: “to make supplications and prayers for all people,” as the Apostle has told us (1 Tim. 2: 1). By acting in this way, we will first and foremost benefit ourselves, repenting and purifying ourselves from passionate habits; having been freed from them, we will be deemed worthy to attain eternal life in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

271. Lent has put an end to the clamor and gossip, and has called the laity to a life of piety

271. 1) Lent has put an end to the clamor and gossip, and has called the laity to a life of piety. – 2) Fasting renews the soul and makes it a dwelling place for God; we must welcome it with joy and observe it. – 3) But while fasting physically, we must also fast spiritually, abstaining from passions and lusts, which the enemy presents as seemingly attractive, whereas in reality they are both hideous and bitter. – 4) Let us, moreover, diligently observe the rules of fasting, both within and outside the Church. [4, 54]

3. The season of Lent, compared to the rest of the year, is like a calm harbor where, gathering together, all people find spiritual peace. For this time is salvific not only for monks but also for laypeople, for the young and the old, for rulers and subjects, for kings and priests, for every kind of person and every age. Cities and villages are calmed from noise and gossip; instead, psalm-singing and hymns of praise, prayers and supplications are proclaimed everywhere, through which our good God, being appeased, pacifies our spirit, if we fall down before Him with a sincere heart, in fear and trembling, weeping and promising future correction and improvement. – But let the church leaders address the laity; as for me, having been appointed head over you, the most honorable ones, I will address you to briefly state what is fitting.

4. Fasting is the renewal of the soul; for the Apostle says: just as “our outer self is wasting away,” so “our inner self is being renewed day by day” (2 Cor. 4:16). If it is renewed, then it takes on beauty in the image of original beauty; and as it becomes beautiful, it lovingly draws to itself the One who said: “I and the Father will come and make our home with him” (John 14:23). If such is the beneficial effect of fasting—that it makes us a dwelling place of God— then we ought to embrace it with joy, without being burdened by the simplicity and frugality of the diet: for we see that the Lord, who is able to provide varied and abundant food, fed thousands of people in the desert with nothing but bread and water; moreover, the unfamiliarity with such a diet, when clothed in zeal, will cease to be unpleasant.

5. However, fasting is not limited to mere scarcity of food, but requires abstinence from all that is evil, as our holy fathers have taught. Let us therefore abstain from despondency, carelessness, laziness, envy, zealotry, ill temper, self-indulgence, and self-will; let us also abstain from carnal lust, for this multifaceted serpent attacks even those who fast. The fruit that put me to death was “beautiful to the eye and good to eat,” as we hear of it in Scripture. But note that it is called “red” in appearance, not in nature. Just as if someone, taking a pomegranate of a pleasing red color on the outside, were to find it rotten inside—so too is the sweetness of lust: it falsely promises unheard-of sweetness, but once satisfied, it turns out to be the bitterest gall—sharper than a double-edged sword, devouring the ensnared soul: just as our forefather Adam suffered, deceived by the serpent, who, having touched the forbidden fruit, found death instead of life. The same fate has befallen all who, from that time until now, have been deceived in the same way. For just as he himself, being darkness, transforms himself into an angel of light, so he knows how to transform evil into good, the bitter into the sweet, the ugly into the beautiful, the deadly into the life-giving—and in this way, ever malicious, he never ceases to deceive the world. But we will not allow ourselves to be deceived by such baits of his, nor will we suffer anything like what befalls birds, which, rushing greedily upon visible food, fall into the hunter’s net; rather, we will strip away the alluring veils from evil through reason, we will behold it naked, as it truly is, and thus easily avoid it.

6. Let us, moreover, be alert during the singing of the psalms, zealous in hymns, and attentive to the readings; let us kneel at the appointed times for each hour and work with our own hands, for it is good to work, and those who do not work are deemed unworthy to partake of food; let us bear one another’s burdens, and above all, let us strive to be “kind to one another, compassionate, humble, gentle, and full of patience and good deeds” (Eph. 4:32; James 3:17). “And the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 4:7); and here may you be deemed worthy to reach the bright day of the Lord’s resurrection blamelessly, and in the age to come, after the resurrection of the dead, to attain the kingdom of heaven.

272. The house of the soul must be built with greater care than a worldly house

272. 1) The house of the soul must be built with greater care than a worldly one. – 2) The materials for the house of the soul—virtues—are the fear of God and others, among which self-restraint is particularly significant. – 3) Daily fasting is better than fasting for two or three days, as both divine instructions and the examples of the Fathers attest. [4, 55]

7. Worldly men, when they build themselves an expensive house, give themselves no rest, day or night, working, planning, and worrying until they have completed their desired project; and their zeal for this is such that their whole mind is there (on the construction) and dwells there, devising every possible way to improve the ceiling and roof, to adorn the floor with various marbles, and to give fitting splendor to everything else, so that all may present a pleasing sight to lovers of such things; and if anyone were to try to distract them from such labors and pursuits, they would meet it with displeasure, as if it were a great insult. – But we, who are building a dwelling not of perishable but of imperishable material, not constructed of stone and wood but skillfully woven from spiritual virtues and graces—will we really grow lazy and, in our zeal for this work, lag far behind them? Would this not be the greatest of all injustices? That building, after having received so many and so many sensual people, and after having seen so many masters come and go, will eventually be abandoned, fall into disrepair, and be ruined; but it welcomes the Holy Spirit, for “we are the temple of the living God, and the Spirit of God dwells in us,” as the Divine Apostle says (1 Cor. 3: 16; 2 Cor. 6:16); and when those who possess Him depart from here, He will descend to them and abide inseparably with them for all eternity.

8. But of what material is such a building constructed?—Of virtues that are received and established in the heart. —Take, first of all, the fear of God, laying it down as a foundation, for “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Ps. 110: 10); then prudence, courage, chastity, and truth, which, holding fast to one another and being united by love, are “built up and made complete” (Eph. 4:16) and “grow into the holy Church in the Lord” (Eph. 2:21), as it is written. Let us always build such a temple within ourselves, brothers, and never cease to adorn it with every beauty of virtue, so that we may be deemed worthy to have the Holy Spirit as its inhabitant, and draw the eyes of the angels and the saints to ourselves through the attractive beauty of our lives. – But since abstinence is also one of the virtues, and we are now practicing it more than the others, let us give glory to God that we have already completed one of His trials. Let our faces have changed from what they were before; but this is a good change, glowing with the pallor of abstinence. Let our mouths be filled with bitterness from bile, due to eating late; yet our spirit is richly sweetened, being uplifted by hope. So let us rejoice, having chosen the better path and set our hearts upon it.

9. Perhaps someone will say that eating daily detracts from the perfection of fasting. – Not at all; for if that were so, the Lord would not have commanded us to ask daily for our daily bread; the prophet Elijah would not have been fed daily by ravens in the desert; St. Paul, who began living in the desert before the divine Anthony, would not have received daily bread from above; nor would St. Anthony the Great himself have preferred a daily meal to a fast lasting more than a day or a week. And it seems to me that this is the reason. – Since our body, laboring throughout the day, grows weary and exhausted, and requires rest and nourishment; so the Creator arranged it so that it might be strengthened by daily food intake and be capable once more of further labor—rather than being exhausted and enfeebled, as happens to those who go without food for two, three, or more days, —as a result of which they are unable to bow in worship alongside others, to sing loudly as they should, or to perform other acts of obedience. Thus, the daily intake of food is not permitted only to the infirm, but is also granted to the perfect, according to the rule handed down to us by our forefathers. You see now that everything among us is established according to our fathers’ tradition. And may we be granted, again and again, health of body and strength of spirit, so that we may serve the living and true God, as we await the last day, on which may you shine forth with all the saints like the sun and inherit the kingdom of heaven.

273. The week of fasting has passed. Having subdued the flesh, we have imbued the soul with virtue, that it may be pleasing to Christ the Bridegroom

273. 1) The week of fasting has passed. Having subdued the flesh, we have imbued the soul with virtue, so that it may be pleasing to Christ the Bridegroom. – 2) The soul is the bride of Christ: let us therefore keep her pure for her Bridegroom. – 3) And to this end, we must discipline the flesh. – 4) This is sorrowful, but the reward is great. [4, 57]

10. Having fasted for the first week, we now appear somewhat different to one another than we did before—we have lost weight and grown pale. But “even though our outer self is wasting away,” as the Apostle says, “our inner self is being renewed day by day” (2 Cor. 4:16). For just as the body is usually seen—when well-nourished—to be flourishing and full, so too does the soul become spiritually renewed through abstinence, so that by subduing the body, we have bestowed beauty upon the soul—that very beauty for which Saint David prayed: “O Lord, by Your will, grant strength to my goodness” (Ps. 29:8). It is with this very beauty that the blessed Paul affirms that he has betrothed us to Christ: “For I have betrothed you to one husband, to present you as a pure virgin to Christ. But I am afraid that, just as the serpent deceived Eve by his cunning, so your minds may be led astray from the simplicity and purity of devotion to Christ,” (2 Cor. 11:2–3). Do you see the greatness of the gift that we have been deemed worthy to have Christ as our bridegroom? Do you see how the one who betroths us fears for our steadfastness?

11. Thus, our soul is like a betrothed maiden. Just as such a maiden refrains from seeing men, exerting every effort to preserve her purity until the time of the wedding arrives, so too must the soul, with all diligence, keep itself pure from the corrupting passions of sin until the very end, when, having departed from the bridal chamber of its body, if it is beautiful, shining with good deeds, it will gladden the holy angels; but if it is disfigured by sins, it will delight the demons to the insult of Christ—a thought and a subject of lamentation.

12. For this reason, we mortify our bodies and treat them strictly, even to the point of harshness, thereby restraining the impulses of the flesh—as with a bridle—so that it does not cast the helmsman—the mind—overboard, not only during this present season of fasting, but throughout our entire lives. For what is the ascetic life, if not the restraint of passions, dominion over thoughts, and a ceaseless struggle against invisible enemies?

13. This is painful for the flesh; but “for our present light affliction, which is but for a moment, is working for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen” (2 Cor. 4:17–18). Therefore, for the sake of these invisible blessings, “which the angels long to look into” (1 Peter 1:12)—for the sake of Christ the Bridegroom, to whom we are betrothed—I beseech and implore you: let us keep our souls pure from evil deeds and from impure thoughts that defile us, as the Lord has said, never even entertaining any evil thoughts; for from thoughts, like fire, lust is kindled. But let us continue to keep ourselves from passions, repelling the tempter at the very first stirrings of their attraction, and let us illuminate our souls with good deeds, wholeheartedly embracing the self-restraint set before us, so that, having departed from here in purity, we may ascend to heaven in unspeakable joy and there be deemed worthy to enjoy the delights of Christ’s heavenly bridal chamber.

274. There was an onslaught from the iconoclasts. They stood firm

274. 1) There was an onslaught from the iconoclasts. We stood firm. He encourages us, assuring us that God will accept this willingness to endure everything as the deed itself. – 2) On fasting. We will continue willingly, but not of our own volition. – 3) He praises the labors of fasting, and – 4) invites us to do every work in its proper time. [4, 61]

14. Yesterday there was turmoil, today there is silence; yesterday there was agitation, today there is peace. But blessed be God, who drove away the temptation and strengthened us to remain steadfast, even while awaiting what we were threatened with. Such are true Christians! Such are genuine monks! They always keep themselves ready to face tribulations for the sake of virtue and set nothing above God’s commandments. Those (enemies and persecutors), having come, said what they had to say—and departed, not so much striking us with fear as being ashamed of their own conduct. But the Lord will fully reward you for choosing to be persecuted for His sake. For, being rich in mercy, He usually crowns those who choose what is good, even for a single resolute intention. The temptation has not yet dissipated, but still looms; for everywhere there are decrees from the authorities that no one should remain uninvolved in heretical speculation. Therefore, let us heed what the Apostle says: “Walk wisely toward those on the outside, making the most of the time. Let your speech always be gracious, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how you ought to answer each person”

(Col. 4:5–6). Here he instructs us not to throw ourselves into temptation haphazardly, nor to remain silent about the word of God; for “if anyone draws back,” says the Lord, “My soul has no pleasure in him” (Heb. 10:38). But enough of that.

15. Lent has already progressed quite a bit, and it urges us to press on with ever greater zeal, each as he chooses, “for God loves a cheerful giver” (2 Cor. 9:7). However, the law of communal life does not allow everyone to behave as they please; but here is the general limit of self-restraint for the obedient: the subjugation of one’s own will.

16. Fasting is good, for it tames the passions and subjugates the flesh to the spirit; tears are good, for they wash the heart clean of sins and present it pure before God; prayer is good, for it uplifts the mind and makes it a conversational partner with God; love is good, for it universally despises its own interests in favor of its neighbor; zeal is good, for it lightens our labors, makes the spirit youthful, and enables the elderly to act with youthful alacrity.

17. Let us, then, be cheerful and zealous: when it is time for psalm-singing, let us hasten to it with zeal; when it is time for work, let us work diligently; when it is time for silence, let us be silent wisely; when it is time for conversation, let us speak in moderation; in short, let us do everything in a proper and orderly manner, as we have been commanded, refraining from all confusion and impetuosity. Let there be as many bows as are customary, and let the usual chanting be performed, as much as our strength allows, while preserving our physical health. – And may the God of peace lead you to the Queen of Days, the Glorious Resurrection of Christ, and grant you the kingdom of heaven, where there is “neither eating nor drinking, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 14:17), with which may God enrich us through Christ Jesus, our Lord.

275. Do Not Associate with Heretics

275. 1) Do not associate with heretics. Even though we are persecuted for this, we endure it with God’s help. – 2) Blessed are those who share in Christ’s sufferings. – 3) Let us take heart. [4, 62]

18. While outside the monastery, we settled here as best we could and as circumstances permitted. Now, however, since our persecutors no longer pursue us for Christ’s sake, we must heed the prophetic words: “Go out from among them and be separate, says the Lord” (Isa. 52: 11; 2 Cor. 6:17). If others act differently in this regard, they themselves will give an account to the Lord on the Day of Judgment. It seems to me, however, that walking with them is tantamount to indifference in our relations with heretics. See how failing to follow them distances us from the world, and at the same time leads to sorrow, to hardship, to hunger, to prison, to death. “But in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us” (Rom. 8:37), Who, when He sees a soul thirsting for Him, grants it the strength to endure sufferings for His sake, as the forty martyrs, whose memory we now commemorate, bear witness along with others; for we cannot say that they were of a different nature than we are; but since they loved God with a sincere heart, they were clothed with the strength, in their frail flesh, to defeat the invisible enemy and to accomplish such a great feat, which all Christians extol.

19. And truly blessed is the one who has been deemed worthy to share, even in the slightest degree, in Christ’s sufferings: persecuted as He was persecuted; beaten as He was beaten; having endured scourging as He endured it; reviled as He was reviled; imprisoned as He was imprisoned. See now why it is written: “If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we endure, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He also will deny us; if we are unfaithful, He remains faithful—for He cannot deny Himself” (2 Tim. 2:11–13). You see what the nature and extent of the promises and warnings are.

20. Let us, then, take heart and press on—lest we bring shame upon the sufferings we have already endured through the grace of Christ: exile, imprisonment, flogging; and what more need be said? Have we not all been in prison? But such a sharing in life is also a sharing in suffering. For “if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. 12:26). Let us, then, always be “one body and one Spirit, just as we were called to the one hope to which we were called” (Eph. 4:4), with Christ as our head, so that we may please God and attain the kingdom of heaven.

276. It recounts the story of how, in Bulgaria, faithful Christians were more willing to suffer death than to eat meat during Holy

276. A legend recounts how, in Bulgaria, faithful Christians were more willing to suffer death than to eat meat during Holy Lent; and from this we draw a lesson—to stand firm against iconoclasm until death. [4, 63] In this sermon, I wish to offer you comfort through a certain legend. This legend is as follows. In Bulgaria, as those who know the matter well say, an evil decree was issued by the ruler there, ordering that Christians and our brethren held captive were to eat meat during the holy days of Lent; furthermore, those who obeyed this were to be spared, while those who disobeyed were to be put to death. The wicked ruler's decree took effect; the people gathered with their wives and children; there was much weeping and wailing—some in defense of Christian law, others out of fear of physical death; finally—alas! what pitiful news!—they were defeated and yielded to the wicked decree. But fourteen of them, separating themselves from the crowd, stood opposite them and began to urge them not to yield or submit—and, contrary to Christian law, not to agree to eat meat. At these words, cries and pleas arose from the people to yield to necessity and then atone for this sin through repentance, but not to deliver themselves to death so easily. But this did not convince or soften them in the least: they stood their ground, fixing their gaze on God and the promised bliss. The Scythian, seeing the unshakable resolve of these men, decided to use one of them to unsettle the others and win them over to his side. And after killing one of them, he sold his wife and children into slavery to the Scythians, hoping that the others, seeing this, would waver and yield... But they became even more unyielding, crying out: "We are Christians, and we stand with our departed brother." In this confession, they were all slain and died in the Lord. Do you see how the Gospel of the Kingdom of God is still powerful today?—"Whoever loves father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me," says the Lord; "and whoever does not take up his cross and follow Me is not worthy of Me..." And again: "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul; rather, fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:37, 38, 28). They obeyed the Gospel commandments, remained submissive to the Lord, and were crowned with the crown of martyrdom, following the example of the holy Maccabees—in double the number of their opponents, since there were seven of those and fourteen of these; and those suffered because they refused to eat pork, while these suffered because they refused to eat any meat whatsoever during fasting, contrary to Christian law. – O blessed men! O blessed bargain! To attain eternal rest in a single moment! What will those say to this who do not consider communion with heretics to be apostasy? If there was an apostasy of the people due to their consent to eat ordinary meat during Lent, then all the more so here, where there is communion in a sacrifice offered unlawfully. Where are those who say that suffering for the icon of Christ is not martyrdom? If there, those who suffered for refusing to violate the law of Christ's Church performed a martyr's feat; is not an even brighter act of martyrdom being performed here, when we refuse to renounce Christ Himself in His icon?—But such are the words of ignorant people, whose minds are clouded by their heretical speculations, who, through their own falls, attempt to hinder others from orthodox faith and righteous conduct. – We, however, will glorify our good God, who glorifies those who glorify Him, and who even in this generation reveals martyrs—bearing in mind that if people who are outwardly poor, uneducated, and have wives and children have left everything out of love for Christ, should we not all the more—being unmarried and having left the world behind—be prepared, when the time comes, to prove ourselves worthy of these holy defenders of the faith and piety? But this will be in due time, when Christ requires it. For now, let us stand firm in the martyrdom that constantly takes place within our consciences; let us not bow our knees to Baal; let us not yield when assailed by thoughts, but let us quench the fiery arrows of the evil one with tears, prayers, contrition, and fitting indignation against the flesh, so that we too may say with the Apostle: "I die every day; this is my boast, brothers, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord" (1 Cor. 15:31); and with Saint David: "For your sake we are being put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep for slaughter" (Ps. 43:22), with whom may we be deemed worthy to be heirs of the kingdom of heaven.

277. The Annunciation, the beginning of the Incarnate Economy, obliges us to celebrate it spiritually

277. 1) The Annunciation, the beginning of the Incarnate Economy, obliges us to celebrate it spiritually; – 2) and in doing so, to pray and mourn for those who do not accept it or benefit from it; – 3) imitating St. Paul the Apostle and the Prophet Moses. [4, 64]

21. The Annunciation has come—the beginning of the Lord's feasts; and we must celebrate it, not merely as many do, but with an understanding of the mystery for which we celebrate and revere it. What is this mystery?—That the Son of God became the Son of Man, choosing the Most Holy Virgin as the mediator for this, dwelling within her and establishing a temple for Himself through her, and becoming fully human. —For what purpose? “That He might redeem those under the law, so that we might receive adoption as sons” (Gal. 4:5), as it is written; so that we might no longer be slaves but free, no longer driven by passions but dispassionate; no longer lovers of the world but lovers of God; no longer walking according to the flesh but according to the Spirit. “For those who walk according to the flesh set their minds on the things of the flesh, but those who walk according to the Spirit set their minds on the things of the Spirit. For the mind set on the flesh is death, but the mind set on the Spirit is life and peace. For the mind set on the flesh is hostile toward God; for it does not submit to God’s law, nor indeed can it. Those who are in the flesh cannot please God” (Rom. 8: 5 – 8). Such, in short, is the power of the sacrament! And therefore we must celebrate in a spiritual manner in his honor, and conduct ourselves spiritually in accordance with him—in truth and godliness, in love, in meekness, in peace, in long-suffering, in kindness, in the Holy Spirit—so that the incarnate household of our Lord may not be shown to be fruitless and ineffective in relation to us.

22. And not only that; but we must also pray and mourn for the world. Why? Because the Son of God came to save the world, yet the world rejects Him: tribes and nations reject Him; barbarian peoples reject Him; even those who call upon His holy name reject Him—some through the unrighteousness of their faith, others through the wickedness of their lives. —What was He supposed to do that He did not do? —This God became man; He humbled Himself, being obedient even unto death, even death on a cross; He gave us to partake of His Body and drink His Blood; He has made us worthy to call Him our Father, Brother, Head, Teacher, Bridegroom, Co-heir, and has done many other things, which need not be mentioned in detail here. – And yet He is rejected; He is rejected, and yet He endures it: “I did not come,” He says, “to judge the world, but to save the world” (John 12:47).—What, then, should we say in this regard? That true disciples grieve over the denials of their fellow disciples, thereby showing their love both for the Teacher and for their fellow disciples; in the same way, true servants suffer in their hearts at the unfaithfulness of their brothers.

23. Therefore, the great Apostle commands us to “make supplications, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings for all people, for the king, and for all who are in authority” (1 Tim. 2:1–2). And here is what he says about himself in another passage: “I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying, as my conscience testifies to me through the Holy Spirit—that I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart; for I could wish that I myself were cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, my kinsmen according to the flesh” (Rom. 9:1–3). Do you see the power of love? Do you see the height of love for humanity?—Moses said the same thing to God: “If You will forgive their sin—but if not, blot me out of the book You have written” (Exodus 32:32). – So too must we, as true—and not false—disciples, not only care for ourselves but also for our brothers and for the whole world, grieving for them and praying for them. For by doing what is pleasing to the Lord in this way, we will become heirs of eternal life.

278. On the Feast of the Annunciation, he extols virginity

278. 1) On the Feast of the Annunciation, he extols virginity and—2) recalling how the enemy wages war against it—urges us to guard it diligently. [4, 65]

24. On the Feast of the Annunciation, I will try to say a few words to you about the Annunciation—namely, to show just how great is the vow of virginity that we have been deemed worthy to take upon ourselves. For to whom did the Archangel Gabriel say, “Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with you”? (Luke 1:28). “Was it not to the Most Holy Virgin Mary?” And through whom did God Himself and the Word become incarnate and take on human form? “Was it not through this blessed Virgin?” Thus, this virginity gave birth to the Life of all. This virginity is the Queen of Virtues. This virginity is the Bride and Bride-Maid of Christ. And if you wish, let us hear what Blessed Paul says: “The unmarried man is concerned about the things of the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but the married man is concerned about the things of the world, how he may please his wife. Let the married woman and the virgin be distinguished: the unmarried one cares for the things of the Lord, how to please the Lord, so that she may be holy in both body and spirit; but the married one cares for the things of the world, how to please her husband” (1 Cor. 7:32–34). Do you see the power of these words—that marriage leaves no time to concern oneself with pleasing the Lord, but only with worldly matters?—Thus, virginity, as an inheritance, is entrusted with the better part. – But even in the Kingdom of Heaven, virginity is given precedence. For in the Revelation of Saint John it is written: “These are the ones who have not defiled themselves with women, for they are virgins; these will follow the Lamb wherever He goes” (Rev. 14:4).

25. Such is the privilege granted to those who have chosen and preserved virginity! – They will follow Christ and rejoice with Him. – But let us not forget that the higher and more supernatural this matter is, the more the destroyer of our lives, the devil, strives to bring us down—more so than with other passions—through a passion opposed to his own. And who can count how many he has already brought down since the beginning of time? – And what could be more pitiful than this? – We, however, will guard our souls like the apple of our eye, keeping them pure for Christ the Bridegroom, without betraying the treasure of virginity entrusted to us, and we will not allow ourselves to suffer as fish do, who, deceived by bait, swallow the hook and meet their death. For the pleasure of the flesh is a hook that corrupts rather than nourishes, —deadly, not life-giving— from which may we be delivered by the power of God, and may we remain pure and blameless for the time to come, as long as breath remains in our nostrils, so that, departing from here in victory, we may attain the kingdom of heaven in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

279. The Passover—the feast—is longed for; but the spiritual Passover

279. 1) The Passover is a longed-for feast; but the spiritual Passover—purification from sins and passions—is even more longed for. – 2) Whoever lacks this cannot celebrate the Passover. – 3) But you are not like that; we have good practices that lead to God. – 4) Let us therefore strive earnestly for the spiritual Passover, so that we may be deemed worthy of it in the age to come. [4, 67]

26. Having passed the midpoint of Lent with God’s help, we see Passover approaching. – But why do we so earnestly long to reach this Passover, which comes and goes? Have we not been doing this for many years already? This present Passover, too, will pass. For nothing remains unchanged in this age; but our days pass like a shadow (Job 8:9), “and our life flees faster than a swift-runner” (Job 9:25), until it reaches its end. What then, you might ask, is Easter not something to be longed for? Of course it is—and greatly so; and how could it be otherwise? But the one that can be celebrated daily is even more to be longed for. What is it? The cleansing of sins, a contrite heart, tears of repentance, a clear conscience, the mortification of the earthly members of fornication, impurity, passion, evil lust, and every sin committed in deed. He who is granted such a disposition celebrates Passover, the much-desired feast, for the Lord not just once a year, but every day.

27. But who lacks these qualities and is instead possessed by passions—how can such a one celebrate Passover? How can one celebrate who has made his belly his god, or who is consumed by the lust of the flesh, or gnawed by envy, or immersed in the love of money, or enslaved by vanity, or gripped by other passions? Would anyone claim that a man consumed by fire is resting peacefully—or that a shipwrecked man is sailing safely? Such talk is unacceptable. For just as one who dwells in darkness is not in the light, so one who abides in sinful deeds does not celebrate Easter.

28. “But as for you, beloved, we hope that you are in a better state and are holding fast to salvation” (Heb. 6:9). For our life is nothing other than a preparation for the feast; for look, what is happening among us? —Psalm after psalm, reading after reading, teaching after teaching, prayer after prayer, like a circle leading us to God and uniting us with Him. How beautiful is such a way of life! How blessed and thrice-blessed is such a life!

29. Therefore, since the Passover we long for has now been set before us, let us strive toward it, and let us endeavor, to the best of our ability, to celebrate it daily—namely, the mortification of the passions and the resurrection of the virtues, in imitation of the Lord; for “He Himself suffered for us, leaving us an example, so that we might follow in His footsteps” (1 Peter 2:21). I say this, not as one who sets himself up as a judge of others: “For each one will bear his own burden” (Galatians 6:5); but, as those who are aware of the grace given to us by God, let us give thanks to the Giver and glorify the Benefactor, who not only provides all that is necessary in the present, but will also grant to those who labor diligently for Him until the end all the promised blessings, that eternal Passover in heaven, which may He grant to all of us through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

280. Blessed are those who suffer with Christ; let us therefore take heart and prepare ourselves for suffering commemoration of Christ's life-giving Passion, from which we may draw great comfort. For if our Lord and God was scourged for our sins, is it so great a thing if we, His unworthy servants, are also scourged for His sake? If He was bound, led away in chains, and imprisoned, what is so surprising if we, too, suffer for the Lord and Master? But even if we were to be flogged, we will endure the flogging; if we were to suffer ear-cutting, we will endure it; if we were to be spat upon, we will bear the spitting; finally, if we were even to die, we will surrender ourselves to such an ever-blessed death. And blessed is the one who is deemed worthy to share in any of these sufferings of Christ! This is bliss! This is immortality! Do we not hear what the Apostle says: "Let no one cause me any trouble, for I bear on my body the marks of the Lord Jesus"? (Gal. 6:17)—as if to say: let no one despise me, for I bear upon my body the adornments of Christ, the King of kings. Such was Saint Ignatius, who called himself the "God-bearer" because he bore the sufferings of Christ upon himself. Such was Saint Eustratius, who cried out during the very midst of his sufferings: "Now I know that Christ lives within me." O blessed exclamations! O thrice-blessed souls!—For whose memory do we commemorate? Whose birthdays and days of passing do we celebrate? In whose honor do we erect sacred churches? Whose relics do we venerate?—Are they not the martyrs? Are they not the confessors? Are they not the venerable ones?—And if here they have been deemed worthy of such glory from the Lord, what brilliant glorification will they receive in the age to come? This is beyond comprehension and beyond expression.—Behold, a good bargain! Behold, a blessed exchange! —To acquire eternal and endless blessings through small labors and deeds. Let us, too, imitate them; let us mix our blood with the most holy blood of the Lord. For this is possible even now, since neither nature has changed nor has He who said: "I am the Lord your God, and I do not change" (Mal. 3: 6). He loves everyone equally, died for everyone, awaits everyone as inexhaustible sweetness, desires everyone's salvation—and this is wealth for Him: for He, as the Apostle says, is "rich toward all who call upon Him" (Rom. 10: 12). Therefore, let us call upon Him in these circumstances, and He will give strength and fortitude to our souls; let us embrace Him, and He will humble our enemies, both visible and invisible; let us endure Him, and He will crown us on the day of the resurrection of the dead, on the day of His appearing in glory, on which day may we also be deemed worthy to stand before His throne without condemnation, and, having given a good answer, receive the kingdom of heaven!

281. Contemplating the sufferings of the Lord, let us be stirred to share in His sufferings

281. 1) As we contemplate the Lord's sufferings, let us be stirred to share in His sufferings. – 2) You have already shared in His sufferings, but continue to do so, and persevere in all other virtues as well. – 3) Inspired by the hope that we too will be glorified with Him: for what joy will there be then for those who have shared in His sufferings, and what sorrow for those who have turned away from this?! – 4) Reflecting on this, let us keep ourselves pure and excel in every good deed. [4, 72]

1. This day (Holy Wednesday) is holy, and we worship: for on this day the Lord begins to endure the sufferings of the Cross for us, according to the words of David, who said: "Why do the nations rage, and the peoples plot in vain? The kings of the earth have risen up, and the rulers have gathered together against the Lord and against His Christ" (Ps. 2:1–2). They gathered, plotting evil against their Lord, upon whom the treacherous Judas denied his Teacher and betrayed Him. This was followed by the traitorous kiss, the binding, and the leading of the Lord of all to His enemies for judgment; when brought before them, the Judge of all was questioned and answered, and having answered—oh, how dreadful to hear!—He was struck on the cheek by a servant and endured it with great patience, saying: "If I have spoken wrongly, bear witness to the wrong; but if I have spoken rightly, why do you strike me?" (John 18:23); then He is slandered and condemned; then He endures insults, mockery, taunts, spitting, ear-cutting, blows to the head with a reed, flogging, and nailing to the Cross, upon which, having ascended, He prays for His murderers: "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34); finally, He is given gall mixed with vinegar to drink, and the immortal One dies, commending His spirit to God the Father, and after His death, His side is pierced. Such, briefly recounted, are the sufferings of the Lord! – And whoever listens wisely to the Gospel accounts of these events will no longer be angry, grieved, or frenzied; nor will he be proud, look down on his brother, envy others, or seek glory; but will strive in every way to humble themselves, to be contrite, to consider themselves as dust and ashes, to desire communion with Christ's sufferings, to be conformed to His death, so that they may share in the glory of His resurrection.

2. Take courage, I say to you, for you too have already been made partakers of the Lord's sufferings and remain in fellowship with them. Consider where you are: Is it not for His word and His testimony that you are in exile and persecution? But even before this, did you not experience imprisonment? Did you not shed blood amid insults and abuse? Have not some of our brothers died valiantly in the midst of their sufferings?—This is our praise in the Lord! And this is our gift!—But since our steadfastness is uncertain because of our fickleness, and we cannot say with certainty what the coming day will bring; therefore I urge you to stand firm for the Lord, steadfast and unwavering, striving with one heart and one mind for the faith of the Gospel, “not wavering in the face of any opposition” (Phil. 1: 28), “and giving no offense in anything” (2 Cor. 6:3), “but in everything presenting yourselves as servants of God” (2 Cor. 6:4) in obedience, in humility, in gentleness, in generosity, “with great patience; for you need patience, so that, having done the will of God, you may receive the promise. For yet a very little while, and he who is coming will come and will not delay” (Heb. 10:36–37).

3. But if He comes and does not delay, why should we “be discouraged by our afflictions” (Eph. 3: 13), rather than be ready to die for the Lord every day? – For it is written: “If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we endure, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He also will deny us; if we are unfaithful, He remains faithful—for you cannot deny Him” (2 Tim. 2:11–13). What joy will the saints have when they behold the Lord coming from heaven with the angels of His power, calling them to unspeakable joy, crowning them, and reigning with them for all eternity? And what torment, on the other hand, will those who did not believe the Gospel and transgressed His commandments experience then—those who, as it is written, “will suffer the punishment of eternal destruction, away from His presence and from the glory of His might, when He comes to be glorified in His saints and to be marveled at among all who have believed” (2 Thess. 1:9–10).

4. Contemplating this with our minds and meditating on it, “let us purify ourselves from every defilement of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God” (2 Cor. 7:1), striving for what is best and advancing toward perfection (Heb. 11:16; 6:1), “hating what is evil and clinging to what is good; showing love to one another; giving preference to one another in honor; not being slothful in zeal, but abounding in the Spirit, serving the Lord; rejoicing in hope, patient in affliction, faithful in prayer” (Rom. 12: 9–12); so that, abiding sincerely in such purity, we may celebrate the coming Passover in a worthy manner and be deemed worthy to partake of heavenly blessings for all eternity.

282. Is it not astonishing that the Lord—such as He is—should suffer so?

282. 1) Is it not astonishing that the Lord—such as He is—should suffer so? – 2) All creation has trembled; shall we remain indifferent? – 3) For such great love toward us, let us repay Him with love and a willingness to endure all things, both in the ordinary course of our lives and in persecution. [4, 73]

5. And the remembrance of the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ always leads the soul to contrition and tenderness, especially during these days (Holy Week—Friday), when each of these events took place. What, then, are these sufferings?—The murderous plot against the Lord, His arrest by the Jews, His being led to His death, His appearance before Pilate’s court, His trial, the questioning, the striking of His ears, the spitting, the insults, the mockery, His being lifted onto the cross, the nailing of His hands and feet, the tasting of gall, the piercing of His side, and all the other things that took place in between—things that the world cannot contain, nor can they be worthily described, not only by human language but by all the languages of the angels. For let us imagine how great and inexpressible this mystery is! – The Lord, who openly sees the counsels of the heart and guides every human thought, – He Himself is led into the council where they condemn Him to death; He who “upholds all things by the word of His power” (Heb. 1:3), He Himself is delivered into the hands of sinful men; He who binds up the waters in the clouds and waters the earth in due season, He Himself is led away bound; “He who measured the heavens with a span, and the whole earth with a handful, and set the mountains in place with a measure” (Isa. 40:12)—He Himself is struck by the hand of a servant; He who adorned the earth with varied flowers—this very One is crowned with a crown of thorns as a sign of shame; He who planted the tree of life in the midst of Paradise—this very One is nailed to a tree as an object of scorn. Oh, how dreadful and supernatural are these visions.

6. The sun saw this and grew dark; the moon saw it—and was eclipsed; the earth felt it—and trembled; the stones felt it—and crumbled; all creation shuddered at the sight of the Lord’s humiliation. —So the soulless and insensate elements, as if animated and sentient, out of fear of God and at the sight of these visions, departed from their proper order and were transformed: shall we, who are endowed with reason—for whom Christ died—not be crushed and weep in these days? And will we not, after this, be more speechless than the speechless and more insensitive than stones? May it not be so with us; may it not be so; but rather, having been filled with godly wonder and transformed by a good change, let us shed tears, offer up our passions as a sacrifice, repay the Lord's insults with our own endurance of insults, and endure wounds for His wounds—some in the work of obedience, and others in the confession to come.

7. Do we not see in all this countless incentives to divine love? Who has ever been imprisoned for this? Who has ever offered himself up to be slain for the sake of his beloved? Yet our all-gracious God has endured not one or two, but countless sufferings for us who are condemned. Righteously, therefore, the blessed Apostle, reflecting on this and being filled with a deep love for God, said: "I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor principalities, neither powers nor things present nor things to come, neither height nor depth, nor any other created thing, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38–39). For God so loved us "that He gave His only Son, so that everyone who believes in Him may not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16–17). Having nothing worthy to offer in return for such love from their own deeds, the saints offered themselves, their bodies, and their blood; and in the labors of asceticism and in their sufferings, they sang with the blessed David this song: "How shall I repay the Lord for all He has given me?" (Ps. 115:12). – With such a voice, let us also cry out to the Lord always, serving Him ceaselessly with an insatiable longing for Him in our souls and striving ever more for what is best, so that, together with all the saints, we may be heirs to eternal blessings.

283. I Rejoice in Your Progress in Goodness

283. 1) I rejoice in your progress in goodness. – 2) But do not stop there; press on toward what lies ahead, imitating the saints and being inspired by the promises. [4, 81]

8. I speak to you of my own free will, not under compulsion, even though I am under obligation to speak to you. For I am jealous for you with a godly jealousy, even though I am a sinner, and I rejoice with great joy over your progress. Even if I sometimes have to rebuke you—as I did not long ago—it is so that you may recognize the love I have for you in abundance, [for a loving parent, in carefully guiding their children, does not neglect discipline. "For what son is there whom his father does not discipline?" (Heb. 12: 7)],—"that you may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing" (James 1: 4). For I confess that you are obedient and submissive and strictly fulfill your father's commandments, as perhaps no one else in this order of monastic life does. I say this without flattery, but as it truly is. And who is so united with the Father and so obedient to the abbot in everything, in accordance with the Lord's commandments, as you, who are skilled in both? Proof of this is found in the persecutions, exiles, prisons, hostilities, and "standing firm to the point of bloodshed" in the struggle "against sin" (Heb. 12:4).—And this is not of you, but a gift from God, to whom be praise. Let others have money and possessions, monasteries, and other securities; but for me, it is enough to have you alone for my good reputation and to be adorned by you: for you are my joy and crown of glory, my life, and every other good.

9. I only ask that you not stray from your good resolve, that you set no limit on goodness and on your ascent through the degrees of perfection; but just as those who pursue material possessions never find satisfaction in the increase of wealth, so too, in spiritual excellence, do not cease to press on toward the goal until your very last breath. "For the passions of this present time are unworthy of the glory that is to be revealed in us" (Rom. 8:8). Do you not see in the lives of the saints with what toil and sweat they completed their life's journey? Do you not see with what shedding of blood and amid what sufferings the holy martyrs ended their lives? Why? So that they might be united with Christ. "For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal" (2 Cor. 4:18). Is the sun not good? Yet even it will eventually fade. Is the moon not good? Yet even it will cease to give light. Are the stars not good? Yet even they will fall. Is the sky not good? Yet it, too, will wear out like clothing, and everything will change—and there will be a new heaven and a new earth, as it is written—and an indescribably blissful life in Christ and with Christ will begin. Such are the promises given to us. And with such reminders, let us help one another to overcome the sensual with the supersensual, to subdue carnal love with divine love, and, as the Apostle teaches, "to seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God, and to set our minds on things above, not on earthly things" (Col. 3:1), not wallowing in the mire of lusts, not drowning in the swamp of passions, "whose end is destruction. But our life is in heaven, from where we also await our Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ" (Phil. 3:19–20).

284. Having been wounded, I sought medical treatment, and—behold, I am speaking with you

284. 1) Having suffered a wound, I sought healing, and—here I am speaking with you. —I draw a lesson from this: as soon as anyone suffers a wound of sin, hasten to the healing of repentance. — 2) Do not delay; for death may overtake you, and it is dreadful to die without being cleansed and to appear before the judgment seat in that state. — 3) Pay attention to yourself, and do not listen to the enemy who teaches procrastination. [4, 82]

10. The wound in my leg has grieved you, and rightly so. For you sympathize with me in both joy and sorrow, as those who love their brothers and their father. I, for my part, take from this a lesson to teach you. In what way? When I received a wound because of my sins, I immediately needed medical treatment and appropriate rest; that is why, for three days, I was unable to communicate with you. But now that, by God's mercy, the illness has been healed, I am with you again—and here I am, speaking to you. — The same is true of spiritual wounds. — Has anyone been wounded in the heart by what they have seen or heard? Or has anyone been led astray by a demonic thought and consumed by evil lust, anger, rage, hatred, envy, strife, disobedience, or some other destructive passion? — He must immediately begin treatment—that is, repentance, contrition, weeping, sighing, and heartache—along with other remedies of repentance; and, having been properly healed, return to his former state of well-being. If this is not done, however, sin will follow sin and wound will follow wound; the passion will become incurable, and we will die in our sin.

11. But may it not be so with us, my brothers. First of all, we must guard ourselves against sinning; for what is sweeter and more blissful than having a pure soul and a mind unharmed by passions? And when we do happen to sin, due to the inclinations of our nature, we must correct ourselves as quickly as possible, leaving nothing within us unhealed even for a single hour: for death is a thief, and you do not know at what hour this thief will come—at midnight or at the sound of the bell; to depart from the body unprepared is a great misfortune, and to appear before the judgment seat of Christ in this state is exceedingly terrifying. For, as the Apostle says, “The word of God is living and active, sharper than any double-edged sword, piercing even to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart; and there is no creature hidden from His sight, but all things are naked and open to the eyes of Him to whom and to Him we must give an account” (Heb. 4:12–13). “And if the righteous are scarcely saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?” (1 Pet. 4:18). If the prophet Daniel, having seen God's judgment in a vision, was filled with dread and amazement, what will become of us when we actually stand before this judgment seat? “A river of fire,” it says, “was flowing out before Him; thousands upon thousands were serving Him, and myriads stood before Him; the court was seated, and the books were opened” (Dan. 7:10). When this happens, who will stand firm, and who will retain their courage? No one except those who have true faith and good deeds, and those who have acquired courage, righteousness, and chastity—the children of obedience.

12. Therefore, we must be vigilant with the utmost care and await the outcome with fear at every moment. And our murderous enemy, who steals from us, will not be concealed; he always tempts us to spend the present time in carelessness and negligence, while postponing obedience to the commandments until the future. Such is this serpent, who entices us with the alluring appearances of sin. But let us always repel him and turn him back by the power of God. For this reason, I, in humility, address you at this very moment with these words, so that, having heard even five words from my lips, you may be comforted and mutually encouraged by the reminder offered to you. For a reminder is good in that it always renews the soul. And by doing this in imitation of our fathers, I know and am confident that we will succeed in working out our salvation, appease God, and be deemed worthy to attain His kingdom.

285. He invites us to give thanks to God, who, even in a foreign land, provides for them with every kind of sustenance

285. 1) He invites us to give thanks to God that, even in a foreign land, He bestows upon them every kind of provision. — 2) And so that we may not lose such grace, he urges us not to grow lax in our zeal to please God, nor in our faith and hope. [4, 83]

13. We must thank the Lord for the blessings He bestows upon us, especially during our stay in a foreign land, that even while in exile we live as if in a monastery, and not only satisfy our own needs but also provide for those who come to us. For do you not see how many of our brothers come to us ceaselessly from here and there?—Where else can they turn but to God and to our humility? Do you not also see how many other wandering fathers and brothers come to us, suffering poverty and want in every respect? – Hardly a day goes by without us welcoming someone; yet, despite all this, we have never lacked what is necessary; on the contrary, we have had everything in abundance. What else can we say, then, except that the one who made the promise is truly not a liar: “Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you”? (Matt. 6:33). – And indeed, we have been granted “the fruit of the wheat, the wine, and the oil” (Ps. 4:8) and other necessities—all beyond our expectations; so much so that we lack the strength to raise a voice worthy of giving thanks for God’s goodness. Even if we are somewhat constrained and burdened by such practices, consider what the reward is—and what praise for this ascends to God? Even the abbots of the monasteries themselves marvel that what they lacked the strength to do, God has enabled us to accomplish. Why? So that God’s power may be made known through our faith and hope. And it seems to me that what is happening to us now is very much like what happened during Israel’s sojourn in the wilderness. It is now the fourth year since we have neither sown nor reaped, and throughout all this time God has provided us with food that has never run out. He did not rain manna down upon us from heaven, but opened the granaries of those who had more than enough to feed the hungry. He did not bring water gushing from a rock, but poured out wine from the vessels of the pious with their own hands. And He has blessed us in many other ways, which it is not appropriate to speak of now. Is this not wonderful, is it not astonishing, is it not praiseworthy?—I will say something else in the words of the Apostle: that we are “as though we were poor, yet making many rich; as though we had nothing, yet possessing everything” (2 Cor. 6:10).

14. Such are the gifts of our gracious God, and such are His blessings! And it is frightening to think that, through our failure to appreciate how He has honored us in this way, we might offend our Benefactor—but let us take heed, brothers, —all together: both those who are here and those who are absent—let us earnestly fulfill the Lord’s commandments, “and let us encourage one another in love and good deeds” (Heb. 10: 24), not allowing ourselves to live carelessly, not yielding to the desires of the flesh and our own thoughts, not giving in to grumbling like the ancient complainers, not tempting the Lord as those tempters did back then—whether He can do this or that for us in the future. “All things are possible to him who believes” (Mark 9:22), as it is written. For if we believe sincerely, the Lord will grant us, according to our petitions, all that is necessary both for our salvation and for our physical life. And we will successfully traverse the wilderness of this life, enlightened by the light of truth; we will put the invisible Amalek to flight, armed with powerful spiritual weapons; and we will enter not the Promised Land—for we do not seek what is temporary and fleeting—but the Kingdom of Heaven; for He who made the promise is faithful: “Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness’ sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:10).

286. Human temptations are external and easy

286. 1) External temptations are human in nature and are easy. – 2) Demonic temptations are more severe; but we will overcome even them with the Lord’s help, if we do not grow lax in our zeal to resist them. – 3) This is a ceaseless struggle and martyrdom. [4, 84]

15. In the face of the sorrows that have befallen us, it is fitting for us to say with the Apostle: “No temptation has overtaken us except what is common to mankind” (1 Cor. 10:13). We say this for the sake of Theoktist, the good elder, who is dear to us in every way. What, then, is this trial? It is that he is imprisoned on an island called Chalkis, while his elder, slandered by those under his authority as if he did not pray for those in authority, was subjected to the most severe beating. Temptations are flaring up; and we are mostly held responsible for such temptations: for how can we allow the one entrusted with the administration of the monastery to fail to pray for those in authority of his own accord? Or how can we allow the brothers and fathers, having escaped imprisonment, to remain in the city and not disturb the heretics? – “Come out from among them and be separate, says the Lord, and do not touch what is unclean” (2 Cor. 6:17). Those who act contrary to this experience grievous tribulations. That is why we, in humility, have withdrawn from those living within the city and dwell in its outskirts, so as “not to give occasion to those who desire occasion” (2 Cor. 11:12); and the Lord has kept us unharmed until now. But He will continue to preserve us if we watch over ourselves, do not speak indiscriminately about this and that, and do not expose our ears to vain and disapproving words. As the Apostle says: “Let your speech always be with grace, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how you ought to answer each person” (Col. 4:6). – And what does the brother of God say again: “Speak thus, and do so, as those who are free from the law, to be judged?” (James 2:12). So we can be sure that we will not fall into temptation at the wrong time, but will rid ourselves of these evils as if from a snare.

16. And this is precisely what human temptation is—that is, it is light. But demonic temptation—oh!—is very heavy and insidious. The enemy lies in wait every day, every hour, and every minute to tempt us, and in doing so makes resisting him very difficult and victory hard to attain. But since diligence and zeal can accomplish all that is necessary and desired, let us zealously resist and triumph with Christ's help: for He endures temptations alongside us; which is why He said, "Without Me you can do nothing" (John 15:5). Let us therefore strive not to fall into this temptation and not to be at the devil's mercy. This confinement here on the island—and for such a short time at that—is, in truth, no true confinement. True confinement is to be cast out from God and cast into utter darkness. Likewise, what is this flogging here—a certain number of lashes?—True flogging is where the blows are countless and the suffering from them is endless. And "those who have done good," says the Lord, "will come forth to the resurrection of life, but those who have done evil, to the resurrection of judgment" (John 5: 29). Let us therefore fear this and tremble, striving with all our strength in the power of the Spirit who dwells within us, "casting down arguments," as it is written, "and every lofty thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ; and being ready to punish every act of disobedience" (2 Cor. 10: 4–6); and this we do unceasingly.

17. Behold, an unceasing battle! Behold, a martyrdom full of suffering! For whoever, constantly assailed by thoughts, does not yield to them and does not bow the knee to Baal, but resists and overcomes the passions—lust, anger, rage, fear—that person endures torment day by day and can say with the Apostle : "I die daily; this is my boast, which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord" (1 Cor. 15:31); and at the end of his struggles, to boldly add: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that Day" (2 Tim. 4:7–8). – May we all be worthy to say this, and then, through our deeds, be adorned with the crown of righteousness and enter the kingdom of heaven.

287. Our nature is sleepy and lazy. The word about the promises stirs it up

287. 1) Our nature is sleepy and lazy. The word about the promises stirs it up. – 2) The saints and martyrs demonstrated this in practice. – 3) But why are we sleeping? Let us rise and go forth to freedom from lust and passions – 4) And let us taste the joys and delights of paradise. [4, 85]

18. The Apostle shows what kind of dedication a teacher should have toward his students when he says to Timothy: "Preach the word; be ready in season and out of season; reprove, rebuke, and exhort, with all patience and teaching. For the time will come when they will not endure sound teaching" (2 Tim. 4:2–3). For since our nature is clouded, worldly, and forgetful of the teaching, it always needs to be stirred up, as it were by a sharp prick, by the blow of the word, so that, awakening as from sleep, it may see the joy that lies before it. For what is it? Is it not the kingdom of heaven that is promised to us? Is it not immortal life? Is it not inexpressible joy? Is it not the sweetness of paradise? Is it not honor equal to that of the angels? Is it not eternal rest?

19. For what reason are there chains and dungeons? For what reason are there exiles and persecutions? For what reason are there torments and death? Is it not so that we may be deemed worthy of the promised blessings and avoid terrible torments? See with what joy the martyrs shed their blood, with what readiness they go to the sword, into the fire, to the beasts, and to all manner of other sufferings. See also with what delight the righteous mortify and subdue their flesh, esteeming nothing more desirable than virtue itself.

20. But why are we slumbering? Why are we giving ourselves over to destructive and corrupting passions, the sharp arrows that pierce the heart? "Come out from among them and be separate, says the Lord" (2 Cor. 6:17). Let us therefore depart from them, as from Sodom and Gomorrah, which were consumed by fire and brimstone; let us cast aside the reasoning of the flesh, which opposes and wars against the Spirit; let us free ourselves from laborious passions—and we shall find rest for our souls. What could be more peaceful than a soul undisturbed by passions and at peace with God?

21. Is this what joy and gladness are? Is this what blessed comfort and sweetness are? Do we wish to taste this sweetness?—Then let us flee from the pleasures of the flesh, which bring decay and death. For "he who sows," says the Apostle, "into his flesh will reap corruption from the flesh; but he who sows into the Spirit will reap eternal life from the Spirit" (Gal. 6:8). Do we wish to be glorified?—Let us despise vain human glory, clothed in humility and adorned with every good deed. In this way, we will live this life well and be made worthy of future blessings, through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

288. The present persecution is milder; yet we must endure it; and the present generation finds praise in this

288. 1) The persecution we face today is less severe; yet we must endure it, and the present generation is commended for this. – 2) Let us, however, always be ready to face attacks for the sake of Orthodoxy without fear. – 3) Let us fight unceasingly against our invisible persecutor. – 4) Let us be steadfast in our hope in God, and He will give us strength. [4, 26]

22. During these three years, we have been experiencing a new kind of life: we are not entirely persecuted, yet it cannot be said that we are not persecuted; we see one another and visit one another's homes. And this is a work of God's love for humanity. Since He saw that we were growing weary under the previous persecution, He has now closed the prisons, yet He has not ceased the persecution for Orthodoxy, according to His inscrutable ways. – And this is indeed so. – However, looking at the matter as a whole, I think there are few who are persecuted for the Lord's sake. And seeing how many of our brothers come here every day, I feel a certain relief in my heart that there are so many who have not bowed the knee to Baal, but have preserved themselves for the Lord, like bright stars, in every place of His dominion. – Thus, this generation is a source of praise for those who follow; for God is truly within us, and the Church has not lost her strength, according to the Lord's unfailing promise. All those who have attacked her from time immemorial have been scattered like the foam of the sea, while she, like an indestructible rock, remains steadfast in the same faith and the same confession.

23. We should rejoice and exult in this; but at the same time, we must remain sober and vigilant, and be ready, lest temptation should suddenly arise again: for it is not enough to preserve our confession through just one, or two, or even many trials, but throughout our entire life until its very end—without being daunted by evil rumors, nor frightened by the scourges that seem ready to tear the body apart, nor by prisons that crush the flesh, nor by any other human attacks; but truly revering the One God, by whose will all things move, and fearing only eternal torments, the experience of which is unspeakably painful; for all that is present—both joyful and sorrowful—soon passes away, like dreams; which is why it is written: "Their arrows were like sores to a child" (Ps. 63:8).

24. Nevertheless, we must still fight against them, especially against our invisible persecutor, who attacks us daily—who ceaselessly strikes us not with physical whips but with invisible thoughts, and burns us not with material fire but with evil desires, and tempts and besieges our souls with all manner of other passions. – "Therefore, take up the belt of truth, put on the breastplate of righteousness, and put on your feet the readiness to proclaim the gospel of peace. Above all, take up the shield of faith, with which you can extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one; and take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Eph. 6:14–17). Such are the Apostolic commandments! We, too, in our humility, proclaim them, and we ask that you not lose heart in tribulations or grow weary in temptations, knowing that the more temptations you endure, the greater will be your crowns.

25. May God grant us strength: for He is mighty to accomplish what He has promised; He is mighty to strengthen us, not only to endure wounds, but also fire, the sword, wild beasts, and all such things. Convinced of this, the Apostle says: "In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us. For I know that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other created thing, will be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:37–39). If we resolve to act in this way, we will be engaged in a ceaseless act of martyrdom—and we will share in the lot of the martyrs.

289. Persecution is a gift: one must live in persecution in a manner worthy of this gift; instructions are given on exactly how to do so

289. 1) Persecution is a gift: one must live in persecution in a manner worthy of this gift; it is explained exactly how. – 2) In contrast to this, living in isolation is particularly condemned, due to the harmful consequences it brings—self-indulgence, negligence, and moral lapses. – 3) Everyone is exhorted to lead a sober and prudent life. [4, 87]

26. God has given us the greatest gift in this persecution, as He Himself said in the Gospel: “Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness’ sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:10). Let us therefore be careful not to turn this persecution into a condemnation for ourselves by living in a manner unworthy of such a blessing. First of all, one who is persecuted should not live in isolation but should live together with other brothers. For the Lord says: “Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I among them” (Matt. 18:20). Furthermore, he should not go out except when absolutely necessary, but should remain where he is welcomed, as a stranger, and engage in prayer, supplication, reading, psalm-singing, handicrafts, and other good works customary among us; he should avoid seeing women, “withdraw from any brother who walks in disorder” (2 Thess. 3:11), be good-natured, grateful, hopeful, content with what he has, and ready to accept sufferings for Christ: for where there is persecution, there are usually sufferings as well.

27. Those who live in isolation have sorrow as their inheritance: for the wise man says, “Woe to the one who is alone!” because “if he falls, there is no one to help him up” (Eccl. 4:10); those among them who have servants destroy monastic freedom; those who buy fields, vineyards, oxen, and mules bring upon themselves the leprosy of Gehazi. From this spring forth the love of money, greed, fickleness, a reluctance to live with fellow brothers, the habit of behaving in a peculiar manner and according to one’s own will, “the blasphemy” through us “of God’s name among the Gentiles, as it is written” (Rom. 2:24), and spiritual downfall: for how can one who lives carelessly avoid falling? “Do you not know,” says the Apostle, “that you are God’s temple, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you? If anyone destroys God’s temple, God will destroy him” (1 Cor. 3:16–17). And again he says: “Do not deceive yourselves: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexuals, nor swindlers, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners will inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6: 9–10). Can we allow ourselves to be counted among those of whom it is said: “Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5: 24); and again: “You are not of the world” (John 15: 19); and further: “Our citizenship is in heaven”? (Phil. 3: 20).

28. Why, then, are we ruining our own bliss? Why are we so degrading the nobility of our calling? Why do we not imitate our brothers who live righteously, whose lives are glorious and praiseworthy before God and man? Is it not time for us to come to our senses at last? Is it not time to call ourselves back to our proper order? Is it not time to concern ourselves with our salvation, keeping before our eyes our final destiny and how we will appear before the judgment seat of Christ? Since we must give an account for every idle word, what answer will we give for great and grave sins? – But let us come to our senses, even if it is toward the evening of our lives; let us cast aside our passions, “put away the works of darkness and put on the armor of light” (Rom. 13:12), guarding our hearts in every way, and striving in every way to please the Lord, so that, having been saved in this way, we may become heirs of eternal blessings.

290. The one I saw has passed away, and the same will happen to us; why then do we cherish the flesh?

290. 1) The man I saw has passed away, and the same will happen to us; why then do we cherish the flesh? – 2) He was in distress on his deathbed: for at such times the thoughts one has cherished assail one—the good ones bring comfort, while the evil ones torment. – 3) Let us not, then, ensnare ourselves, neither with passions nor with passionate thoughts. [4, 88]

1. What could be more beneficial and salvific for the soul than the remembrance of death? This is what prompts me to speak to you today, on the occasion of the death of the Bishop of Eneia, whom you did not see as he was dying, but whom we did see; and we derived great benefit from that experience, and our hearts were moved, recognizing in ourselves what was also present in him. – So he departed and passed away, and will never return to this life. He no longer needs the heavens, the earth, the sea, the sun, the moon, or the stars; he no longer breathes this air, utters a sound from his throat, sees with his eyes, hears with his ears, smells with his nostrils, feels with his hands, walks with his feet, or does anything else characteristic of this life, whether great or small; its doors are closed to him forever, and he now awaits judgment and recompense. Reward is still in store, being treasured up, as it is written: “And all these, though they were commended for their faith, did not receive what was promised, since God had provided something better for us, so that they would not be made perfect apart from us” (Heb. 11:39–40). – What, then, is to become of us? – Nothing else. Will we not suffer the very same fate? Will we not return in the same way to the earth from which we were taken? Will we not die in the same way, and become dust and ashes? Let us look into the coffins and see what becomes of our living bodies now. – Why, then, do we cherish this poor body so much, which we will soon consign to the earth and the worms? Why do we burden ourselves with passions that we will encounter at the hour of our departure?

2. The dying man, still breathing, said that two figures—a woman and a man—had appeared to him and were mercilessly accusing him, causing him to groan, cry out for help, and tremble in terror at the prospect of leaving his body. Do you see what the sentence of death is?—Demons act as our accusers and judges. And it is so that whatever thoughts we willingly accept and put into practice, those we will see at the hour of death: if “I set the Lord always before me” (Ps. 15: 8), if we picture the Angel, the guardian of our life, as being near us, if we imagine such and such saints, then we will see them at our last breath; but if, on the contrary, we conjure up sinful images within ourselves and harbor demonic thoughts, then we will encounter them at that time—which is pitiful and ruinous.

3. Why, then, do we strive not to be overcome by such idols at the hour of our departure, but to find ourselves then with a pure heart, so that we too may say with boldness: “I will sleep and rest in peace” (Ps. 4: 9)? For to the virtuous, death is sleep, as the Lord said: “Our friend Lazarus has fallen asleep; but I am going to wake him up” (John 11:11). If, then, death is sleep, it is clear that it is both the cause of rest for him and the beginning of eternal life, as the Holy Apostle says: “But now Christ has been raised from the dead, the firstfruits of those who have fallen asleep”; and again, a little further on: “Death has been swallowed up in victory. ‘Where, O death, is your sting? Where, O Hades, is your victory?’—The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, who gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 15:20, 54–57).—Behold, death has been swallowed up! Behold, victory has been granted! For the Lord says: “To the one who conquers, I will grant to eat from the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God” (Rev. 2:7). Has the path to the kingdom of heaven been opened? Behold, the thrice-blessed struggle lies before us! To the victor, a crown and the taste of eternal life. Let us also strive to defeat the devil, subdue our passions, purify ourselves completely from all evil, and acquire virtues, so that we may become inhabitants of paradise and be deemed worthy to partake of the tree of life.

291. We must work toward salvation unceasingly and with willing zeal

291. 1) We must work toward salvation unceasingly and with willing zeal. – 2) Soldiers strive to serve the earthly king for earthly gain; should we then be lazy in working for the heavenly King for heavenly gain? – 3) Look at the saints: what kinds of people are not found among them, yet there is not a single lazy or negligent one. There are those among them who have fallen, but they are those who, having repented, zealously and diligently pleased God. – 4) Arise, then, you who are negligent; listen to the Apostle and be zealous. [4, 89]

4. “There is a time for everything under heaven,” says the Wise One (Eccl. 3:1). And the time for working out our salvation is always and everywhere. For the Apostle says: “Rejoice always, pray without ceasing, give thanks in all circumstances” (1 Cor. 5:16). Our salvation is defined by these three virtues: for joy is a sign of the fulfillment of all righteousness; unceasing prayer leaves no room for the devil to attack us; the gift of gratitude is a testimony to our love for God. Having thus fortified ourselves on all sides with these deeds, let us zealously please God, not losing heart under any circumstances, and not slacking off through negligence—neither in the performance of our duties, nor in psalm-singing, nor in manual labor—but doing everything with a willing spirit, “as good builders, using the various gifts of God” (1 Peter 4:1).

5. Do we not see with what zeal soldiers rush alongside their king to their task? And what task is that?! To war, to slaughter, to death. And yet, for the sake of fleeting glory and transient wealth, they readily throw themselves into everything. But we, who are called to the kingdom of heaven, to unspeakable joy, to eternal life—will we present ourselves as good soldiers of Christ with laziness and carelessness, rather than with all zeal and vigor?

6. Read the book I hold in my hands—and you will see and come to know the virtues of the holy fathers depicted in it. How great is their zeal! What a fierce burning of the spirit! What feats! And how the All-Good God glorified them, revealing them as if they were gods themselves, through the signs and wonders they performed. Here shone not only those who were good from the beginning and knew no sin—but also those who strayed from the right path and fell into grave sins, yet were set aright by the most sincere repentance, so that no one has any excuse for carelessness or neglect regarding salvation; their condition stems from nothing other than an insensitive and hardened heart, created within themselves by their unrepentant lives.

7. To such people the Apostle cries out: “Awake, O sleeper, and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light” (Eph. 5:14). “Or do you disregard His riches, His kindness, His patience, and His long-suffering, not realizing that God’s kindness leads you to repentance? But because of your hard-heartedness and unrepentant heart, you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to each one according to his deeds” (Rom. 2:4–6). Behold this, O careless one; fear the threat, and arise from the sleep of carelessness! – Thus has the venerable Brother Candid departed; before him, it happened to another, and after him, someone else will follow. And there is no one who will remain here forever. We will all pass away. But blessed is the one who has lived well, for he has successfully completed his purchase and will receive an eternal reward, having acquired the best through zeal and diligence. But since the market is still open, and the exchange for the kingdom of heaven is yet to come, I urge you, brothers and fathers: let us all stay alert, let us all be sober-minded, let us all hasten to purchase the divine and imperishable blessings, so that together with all our brothers we may become heirs to the kingdom of heaven.

292. I command everyone to strive for salvation without fail

292. 1) I command everyone to strive earnestly for salvation without fail. – 2) Moreover, one must refrain from judging others by outward appearances: for what matters most is one’s inner state. – 3) Let everyone be zealous for this inner life, rejecting evil thoughts and not indulging the movements of the passions, for this disrupts everything within. [4, 90]

8. I urge those who are zealous for salvation to be ever more zealous; and I implore the negligent to rise up from their negligence and carelessness. For “now is the time” (this life) “the favorable time; now is the day of salvation” (2 Cor. 6:2)—which, if we lose, we will never find again. Let not even a single day pass for us in negligence and carelessness, but let us take every care to continue treasuring something of the eternal treasures: prayer, supplication, entreaty, thanksgiving, tears, contrition, enlightenment of the mind, and heavenly contemplations.

9. Moreover, let us not judge what is in our brothers based on what is within us; but let us rather think that each one is working out his own salvation secretly within himself, even though outwardly he may appear different. Did it not happen in the time of our fathers that many who did not appear to be anything shone incomparably brighter than those who did? And in our brotherhood it has happened many times that those who were of humble and obscure origin shone more brightly than others, especially during times of martyrdom. – And why is that? It seems to me that this is not so much due to outward diligence and zeal as to one’s inner disposition. For where there is inner peace and purity of heart, meekness and silence, there is the kingdom of virtue; and it is there that the Lord looks, as it is written: “Whom shall I look upon, but the meek and silent, and those who tremble at My words?” (Isa. 66:2)?

10. Let everyone strive to present himself pure before the Lord in good conscience, without opening the door to the devil by entertaining sinful thoughts. For when we entertain them, you know how we suffer, how we run wild, how we change, and what bitterness we gather under the guise of pleasure; but when we come to our senses and return to what is right, what peace we taste once more, and what sweetest, honeyed stillness, as if taking refuge in a harbor after a storm. It is therefore worthy of wonder how we—when virtue is so sweet, lovely, and desirable, and sin so bitter, ruinous, and repulsive—are captivated by sin rather than clinging all the more to virtue. For the most part, this is due to the weakness of our nature, and to the fact that “the intent of man’s heart is evil from his youth” (Gen. 8:21). Nevertheless, let us not delay, and let us spare no effort to return ourselves to the right path; and the Lord, seeing our labor, will avenge us, and for our painful efforts will reward us with eternal rewards, and for our patience in these afflictions will crown us with the crown of righteousness, will number us among the saints, and will make us worthy of His kingdom.

293. Let us be vigilant and fight with zeal: for our enemies are many and ever watchful

293. 1) Let us be vigilant and fight with vigor: for our enemies are many and relentless. – But there is no need to fear them: for we have mighty helpers and weapons of victory. – 2) In visible battle, there are crowns for victory; but in our invisible battle, whoever does not yield to the enemy is already a victor and receives crowns. – 3) Let us therefore show valor in the struggle, and we shall be blessed. [4, 91]

11. Let us watch over ourselves intently and unceasingly: for day and night, those waging war against us do not retreat. Who, then, are they? The spirits of malice, the rulers of the darkness of this age, whose number is immeasurable and whose fury against us is indescribable. — Yet let us not fear them, nor be terrified by them. We, too, have a fellow warrior and intercessor, the Holy Spirit and our Lord Jesus Christ, Who “took our infirmities and bore our diseases” (Matt. 8:17), Who, “having Himself suffered when tempted, is able to help those who are being tempted” (Heb. 2:18), to whom we cry out with boldness: “Judge, O Lord, those who wrong me; defeat those who fight against me. Take up the spear and the shield, and rise up to my aid; draw the sword, and hold it against those who pursue me” (Ps. 34:1–3). — For indeed, our enemies persecute us and seek our destruction, setting snares in our paths and attempting in every way to cast us into the pit of sin. But we, too, as warriors, oppose them, “clothed in the armor of faith and love, and the helmet of the hope of salvation” (1 Thess. 5:8); for with these weapons the enemy is put to flight.

12. And here is what is marvelous: that for us, the very battle itself is the crown. In physical wrestling at the games, if the wrestler does not defeat his opponent, he is not crowned. Here, however, if the one being fought against is not defeated by his opponent, he is thereby already crowned. This is evident from what was revealed to one of our holy fathers concerning a certain disciple who was tempted seven times to retire to rest without the elder’s blessing, and seven times overcame this temptation; and for such endurance, he received seven crowns. — Therefore, if there are crowns to be won in the struggle itself, let us, I beg you, courageously resist our adversaries, without growing weary from the length of the struggle. Was not Saint Sarah severely afflicted by the demon of fornication for forty years? And yet she did not grow weary nor lose heart. Is it not also known how a certain novice, struggling in the same way, when his abbot asked him, “Do you want me to pray for an end to this struggle?” refused, realizing that victorious crowns are prepared for those who endure such struggles?

13. Nothing is as powerful as prayer, tears, and a contrite heart in overcoming this battle. Therefore, when the enemy attacks—or even strikes us, through our own inattention, by letting the arrow of lust enter our hearts—let us immediately turn to prayer against him, and he will flee without delay; let us shed tears, and the ember of seductive pleasure will be extinguished; let us humble ourselves, and the Lord will lift us up. — And blessed is the one who ceaselessly exerts himself for God’s work, enduring the hardships of obedience and keeping his purity unblemished. Having reached the end of his struggles, with complete joy and unspeakable delight, he will depart from here, and “he will not fear the report of evil,” as Saint David sings (Ps. 111:7). Do we not see how warriors, having demonstrated their valor in battle, return home with triumph and joy, displaying the marks of struggle and victory? — So we think of those who have shown their valor in the invisible battle and have labored in it with good deeds—that they will be glorified in the great city, of which God is the architect and builder, and will be praised by the angels, crowned by the Lord, and inherit eternal consolations. May we, too, be deemed worthy to attain these things through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

294. God sends sorrows and persecutions as trials; but after the trial, He puts an end to them

294. God sends sorrows and persecutions as a test; but after the test, He puts an end to them. Our persecution continues because we have not yet reached the shelter. [4, 92] The desire of our hearts and our prayer to God is for the peace of God’s Church. For what could be more beneficial than peace, that we might live a quiet and peaceful life in our monasteries?—But even the prolongation of persecution may not be without benefit in that it provides an opportunity to prove ourselves most skilled in the faith. Why does the Apostle say: “I take pleasure in weaknesses, in hardships, in distresses, in persecutions, in difficulties for Christ’s sake; for when I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor. 12:10)? So, setting aside the questions: “How long?” and “To what end?”—let us entrust all our sorrow about this to God, Who knows how to arrange the duration of these or those circumstances for the good. Listen to what Scripture says: “God tested Abraham” (Gen. 22:1). You might say: “He tested him, but only a little?” No, on the contrary: for many years, and with many trials; and when He saw that he had become perfect in faith, He said to him: “Now I know that you fear God, and that you have not withheld your beloved son from Me” (Gen. 22:12). He also tested Job with even greater trials, over many years. And when He saw that he was perfect in patience, He said to him, “Did you think I had created you for any other purpose than to prove that you are righteous?” (Job 40:3). In the same way, He tested the other prophets, the Holy Apostles, the blessed martyrs, and all the reverend and righteous ones—through many sorrows and over the course of many years—and He bore witness to them and accepted them. The same must be assumed regarding us. “We have not yet come to the blood of Christ, having striven against sin” (Heb. 12:4); we have not yet been burned enough in the fire of afflictions; we have not yet sufficiently demonstrated the sincerity of our faith through trials.—That is why the persecution still continues!

295. No matter how sinful a person may be, they can repent: examples

295. 1) No matter how sinful a person may be, they can repent: examples—David the Robber, Mary of Egypt, and others. – 2) Do not think that they have now enjoyed sin here and will taste the blessings of paradise in the future. There is no joy for sinners: only virtue brings joy. [4, 93]

14. There is no insurmountable obstacle to salvation for those who sincerely desire it; nor is it impossible to repent and turn to God, even for those who have reached the very depths of evil. And there is abundant evidence that this statement is true. One of the many such testimonies is the repentance of David, the leader of the bandits—the story of whom was recently read in the church lectionary. Here we see what this murderer, once filled with every kind of evil, was like, and how, having repented and turned to God, he attained such perfection that he even healed those possessed by demons. For the Angel said to him:

This also reveals God’s boundless love for humanity, for He not only forgave him his murders but also made him a bearer of miracles. —Do you wish to see another testimony? Look at Manasseh, who for fifty-two years led Israel astray from God and forced them to serve soulless idols; yet even he, having repented sincerely, was saved, and in spiritual joy sang a hymn to God, which the Church of God still sings to this day. – As for those who indulged in carnal love and later repented, there are so many that they cannot be counted. Among them is the divine David, who, after committing adultery and murder, once again received the gift of prophecy; then Mary of Egypt, who, after insatiably sinning in this manner, ascended to angelic likeness and was granted the gift of clairvoyance, and so on and so forth. Thus, no one has any reason to think or say that anyone who has sinned cannot, through repentance, ascend to salvation.

15. Keeping such examples in mind, let us also take on even greater zeal for salvation and greater hope in attaining it, believing that if God, through His ineffable mercy, called and saved those who had fallen into such depths of evil, all the more will He save us, who serve Him day and night. – When you hear, however, of a sinner’s conversion, let no one say:

? – One who is enslaved by sin tastes neither the delights of this world nor those of the next. What delight, tell me, is there in fornication, gluttony, greed, theft, and being enslaved by other passions? Do not such lustful people burn as if in a fire, like those afflicted with a fever? So it would be more accurate to say that such people are already suffering punishment here, and in the age to come will be subjected to eternal torments for their pernicious and corrupting pleasures here on earth. To wail and tear at one’s garments, rather than to taste sweetness—this is the lot of the sinful and the depraved. But those who love virtue and live virtuously always possess these and other blessings, tasting the ineffable sweetness of dispassion, just as all the saints, who always rejoice in the Lord and regard everything else as secondary compared to love for God. – By imitating them, we too will rejoice and share in one another’s joy, being zealous for our own salvation, and for that reason diligently practicing the virtues: patience, obedience, the subjugation of our own will, and other forms of self-discipline; and, having been perfected in them, we will become heirs of eternal life.

296. People in this world endure much for the sake of trivial benefits: should we not endure for the sake of eternal blessings?

296. 1) Many worldly people endure much for the sake of fleeting benefits: should we not endure for the sake of eternal blessings? – 2) Besides, what sorrows do we have?! And what is to be expected?! – 3) Let us therefore bear everything cheerfully, with unfailing hope. [4, 94]

16. That the monastic life is narrow and sorrowful is evident from what the Lord said: “If anyone would come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me” (Matt. 16:24). And that worldly life is also painful is clearly attested by what we see in it. But let us leave worldly people to deal with their own sorrows; let us look, as we ought, to our own. Our sorrow is accompanied by the joy of the Holy Spirit, so that even what seems sorrowful to us shares in joy, through the hope reserved for us in heaven. Is it not, then, a shame for us if, while others endure so much for the sake of some trifling glory or reward, we do not cheerfully bear the insignificant sorrows that befall us for the sake of such great heavenly blessings?

17. And what sorrows do we have?—Some task assigned against our will, some command we do not like, something unpleasant in food, drink, clothing, footwear, in the place or manner of obedience, and other such things that weigh us down. But all such things, though they may be sorrowful, are not such as to divert us from what is right: for “the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed to us” (Rom. 8:18), for which—even if we were burned at the stake every day—we ought to endure everything, and not merely such light and bearable trials. I say this not to stir up feelings of sorrow, but so that we may come to know the love with which our good God has loved us—He who has taken us out of this worldly life and raised us to this sacred and heavenly calling—and who, even in what He requires of us, does not require it for Himself; for He lacks nothing, being rich in all things, but for our own sake, so that, having been blessed by Him, we may be saved.

18. Therefore, having cast aside all double-mindedness, let us, through our endurance, win our souls, keeping ourselves above every temptation that arises and not allowing any thought to prevail over us when, for the purpose of testing and instructing us, something sorrowful is permitted to befall us and cast a shadow over our lives; so that we too may have the boldness to say with the Apostle: “We are afflicted in every way, but not crushed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed; always carrying in the body the death of the Lord Jesus” (2 Cor. 4:8–10); and that, by pleasing God with such a good disposition and such a well-ordered life, we may become heirs of the kingdom of heaven, in Christ Jesus our Lord.

297. All travelers endure hardships in the hope of rest; let us also endure all things in the hope of eternal rest, so that God may be glorified through us

297. 1) All travelers endure hardships in the hope of rest: let us all endure hardships in the hope of eternal rest, so that God may be glorified through us. – 2) But when is God glorified through us? – When our good deeds are seen. – And let us be such. – 3) And to this end, let us imitate the holy fathers, the Apostles, and the Lord Himself. – 4) The Lord endured everything for our sake: let us also endure; otherwise, there is no salvation for us. – 5) I have endured: humble yourselves, too, under the mighty hand of God. [4, 95]

19. Everyone who travels a long and arduous path labors and endures, facing various hardships of the journey, but, in the hope of a peaceful haven, bears the sorrow and overcomes the difficulties, pressing forward with all zeal and effort. – What does this parable teach us? That we, too, are on a journey in this life—a journey that is narrow and sorrowful, long and arduous. And this path cannot be any other way, since throughout our lives we must preserve virginity and chastity, and observe submission and obedience; and at the same time, “cast down every argument and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God, and take every thought captive to the obedience of Christ” (2 Cor. 10: 4–5), and do everything else that is inseparably connected with this, according to the rules of the monastic life. But here, too, there is a happy ending. What is it? Eternal life, which the faithful God has promised to those who endure His . Let us therefore, for the sake of this eternal life, bear all the sorrows of this present life with gratitude and patience, glorifying God both in our bodies and in our spirits.

20. And how we glorify God, I will explain by citing a single instance. Two days ago, some laypeople came here to see us, and upon seeing how we live in unity of mind—performing the labors of obedience with our hands and repeating the psalms of David with our lips—they glorified God and gave thanks, having been edified. – Thus has been fulfilled in us what the Lord said: “Let your light shine before men, so that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 5:16). – And so you have glorified God in body and spirit on this occasion. But strive also to glorify Him always, in all circumstances, conducting yourselves in a godly manner and shunning what is unseemly, as St. David exhorts: “Do not envy the wicked, nor be jealous of those who do iniquity; for they will wither away like grass, and fall off like the green of the field” (Ps. 36: 1–2). But be zealous for the righteous and those who do good.

21. In everyday life, those who have devoted themselves to a particular art strive to learn the principles of their chosen craft not from the worst but from the best masters: a carpenter from a skilled carpenter, a painter from the most accomplished painter; and in general, no one will imitate the unskilled or the ignorant in anything, but if they do imitate, it will be the most skilled and knowledgeable. If this is the rule and law regarding material and transitory things, how much more so in the art of arts and the science of sciences must we order our lives according to the examples of the holy men, rather than be guided by those who are their opposites. Let us, then, imitate those who, from youth to old age, remained obedient—not merely the ancient saints, but also those who have shone forth in our brotherhood; let us imitate those who, through their simplicity, thwarted all the wiles of the devil; let us imitate those who, through unquestioning obedience, guided their ascetic path well; and if you will, let us imitate the One who commanded: “Be imitators of me, just as I am of Christ" (1 Cor. 11:1); and in another place: "Be imitators of God, therefore, as beloved children, and walk in love, just as Christ also loved us and gave Himself up for us as an offering and a sacrifice to God, a fragrant aroma" (Eph. 5:1–2).

22. Thus Christ gave Himself to God as a sacrifice and offering for us; should we not, then, endure a little sorrow for His sake with thanksgiving? Christ accepted every reproach, as it is written: "The reproaches of those who reproach You have fallen upon me" (Ps. 68:10); should we not endure a few reproachful and insulting words? How then can we dwell with the saints if we do not follow in their footsteps? How can we reign with Christ if we do not conform to His death and share in His most pure sufferings?—"And if the righteous are scarcely saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Peter 4:18).—See how clearly it is stated that "the righteous are scarcely saved." And one who is impatient, intolerant, and holds onto past insults—and thereby becomes inflamed and agitated, having no peace with God—cannot even be called righteous. – Where, then, can he be saved? – Are we not, therefore, by necessity cut off from the fellowship of the Kinovites because we act this way? And, upon departing from here, will we not inevitably fall under eternal condemnation?

23. In my madness I say: Was I not also a novice? Did I not have an abbot, a treasurer, a spiritual and earthly father? Did I not have spiritual and earthly brothers? I moved among them as if in a fire, tossed back and forth and locked in battle with two opposing ways of life. But I could not be saved in any other way except through patience, proper confession, and attributing all blame to myself—for otherwise it is impossible to have a peaceful soul in times of sorrow. "Humble yourselves" and submit "under the mighty hand of God" (1 Peter 5:6); and you will find rest and peace. It is written: "Now is the acceptable time; now is the day of salvation" (2 Corinthians 6:2). Let us therefore cast away deceit from our souls, learn to do good, and present ourselves pure before Him who has blessed us, before that dreadful day comes when we must give an account for every idle word, so that, having departed from this life with a conscience as clear as possible, we may prove worthy of the inheritance of eternal life.

298. No matter how much I explain, restlessness still breaks through in some of you

298. 1) No matter how much I explain, restlessness still breaks through in some of you. – 2) This is due to a lack of love; and without it, what kind of disciples of Christ are we? – 3) Let us therefore seek peace, embracing a zealous love for what is good. [4, 96]

24. It would seem that, since I often speak to you, there is no longer any need to instruct you further, assuming that you are sufficiently inclined toward proper conduct and have no need to be reminded of that. However, I now see that this is still extremely necessary; for, despite my frequent exhortations to you, restlessness and stubbornness continue to prevail in some of you. And I am amazed that those who, given the time, ought to be teachers, are still acting like infants, speaking nonsense and behaving foolishly for no reason.

25. The reason for this is a lack of love. For if, according to the Apostle, "love is patient, love is kind; it does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud, it is not rude, it does not seek its own interests, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs, it does not rejoice in injustice but rejoices in the truth, bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things" (1 Cor. 13: 4–7): then it is clear that when love is absent, the opposite takes hold within us—unbelief, despair, impatience, discord, and insolence. – But how, while in such a state of mind, can we rightly call ourselves disciples of the Lord, when He Himself says with decisive words: "By this everyone will know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another" (John 13:35); And again in another place: "If you abide in My word, you are truly My disciples. And you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (John 8:31–32). Therefore, if we do not have true love, but instead harbor enmity, strife, and discord, then we are not Christ's disciples but Christ's enemies, though this is a harsh word. After this, why should we, poor souls, even live? Why should we breathe this air if we do not do what pleases the Lord?

26. "Whoever leads you astray will bear the penalty, whoever he may be" (Gal. 5:10). I beg you, therefore, to seek "peace with all" and "holiness," for without it no one will see the Lord. See to it that no one falls short of God's grace; see to it that no root of bitterness springs up and causes trouble, defiling many" (Heb. 12:14–15). What, then, is this?—It is a godly zeal that will prompt you to show, toward those who are deceitful, that you hate evil and turn away from it, yet regard them "not as enemies, but as brothers to be admonished" (2 Thess. 3:15), so that you may be worthy of the Apostle's approval, expressed elsewhere as follows: "in everything, show yourselves to be blameless" (2 Cor. 7:11).—I am telling you this out of love and concern for you, and also out of fear for the fate of Elijah. But if you do not reason this way, then, before long, the days will come when this tongue will be taken from you, and then you will realize that what I, the humble one, told you was true. – May the God of peace, who desires all to be saved, preserve us all in peace on the path of His commandments and lead us into His eternal kingdom.

299. St. Theodore did not accept what had been sent to the monastery by those who had repented of iconoclastic heresy but had subsequently fallen away again

299. St. Theodore refused to accept what had been sent to the monastery by those who had repented of iconoclastic heresy but had subsequently fallen away again. Some of the Orthodox reproached him, saying that by doing so he was stirring up hostility toward the Orthodox and persecution. St. Theodore justifies his conduct. [4, 97] Once again, they say, a war has broken out—an iconoclastic war, a civil war—and what could be more disastrous than when Christians exterminate one another? But we must always pray to God to bring peace to our fellow citizens, both in worldly matters and in matters of faith. For this reason, we sit here in humility. Yet we must not simply sit idly by, but with great attention and faithfulness to our purpose, lest, while preaching otherwise to others, we ourselves prove unworthy (1 Cor. 9:27). We say this with those in mind who, having undergone penance, have once again gone over to the side of the heretics. We recently refused to accept what they sent, deeming it harmful and dangerous to the soul; upon learning of this, some of the fathers among us were indignant, as if this had sparked a disturbance. We, however, deny any intention to stir up turmoil; yet we cannot, simply because some are in turmoil, diminish the truth in any way or defile the confession of Christ—fearing the sin of indifference in the faith, which one of the Prophets condemns thus: “They have not distinguished between the holy and the profane, nor have they separated the unclean from the clean” (Ezek. 22:26). In accordance with this, the Holy Apostle says: “What fellowship has righteousness with lawlessness? Or what communion has light with darkness? What accord has Christ with Belial? Or what portion does a believer share with an unbeliever? Or what agreement has the Church of God with idols?” (2 Cor. 6:14–16). And again: “We command you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to keep away from any brother who walks in disorder, and not according to the tradition that you received from us” (2 Thess. 3:6). And again: “If any brother is found to be a fornicator, or a greedy person, or an idolater, or a slanderer, or a drunkard, or a swindler—do not even eat with such a one” (1 Thess. 5:11). All this terrifies and oppresses our hearts, and for this reason we have resolved to endure every sorrow and hardship rather than betray our faithfulness and salvation. But since it is written: “If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member is honored, all the members rejoice with it” (1 Cor. 12: 26)—and you yourselves are our true members and the innermost parts of our hearts—we found it necessary to inform you of what is happening, so that you may know, and knowing, may share in our suffering as you reflect on what has taken place here. Judge for yourselves what is being said: Is it right to regard as equals those who were expelled from their own monasteries for the sake of the truth and those who took possession of the monasteries through betrayal of the truth, and to have fellowship with both groups alike?—So, have those who were expelled endured their exile in vain?! Did we, too, labor in vain for the truth in the past?! Moreover, we turn out to be deceivers, saying one thing to some and another to others. Those who faithfully hold to the confession of the faith will rightly lament against us if they see that we associate with those who have led the Church of God astray. But let us not be led astray by them and, together with them, bring ruin upon ourselves. In the past, we stood firm, as the times demanded; and now we must likewise stand firm, without wavering; for the Apostle says: “If the righteous man stumbles, my soul takes no pleasure in him. “But we have not the faith that leads to destruction, but the faith that leads to salvation” (Heb. 10: 38, 39). Do you see how he called wavering “destruction”?—Why else does he say in another place: “I am innocent of the blood of anyone; for I have not hesitated to proclaim to you the whole will of God” (Acts 20: 26–27). So too, grounded in the Apostolic teaching and the teaching of our holy fathers—which is in harmony with the Apostolic—we refrain from fellowship with heretics and those led astray by them, and we defend the true confession, “in which we stand and boast in the hope of God’s glory” (Rom. 5: 2), striving to walk uprightly and to excel in all other virtues, “so that we may be complete and whole, lacking nothing” (James 1:4), “and the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding, will guard our hearts and our minds in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 4:7).

300. Let us endure all afflictions, both external and internal, using the means customary to us for this purpose, above all prayer with unshakable faith

300. 1) Let us endure all afflictions, both external and internal, using the means customary to us for this purpose, above all prayer with unshakable faith. – 2) Our provisions had run low; but the Lord soon helped us. Let us hope that He will continue to help us, as He did James, Elijah, and others. [4, 98]

1. No one becomes a martyr without enduring suffering, and no one is crowned unless he has successfully endured the struggle in the proper manner (2 Tim. 2:5). Let us not grow weary, but bear all things with equanimity: rebukes and reproaches, like lashes from a whip; the curbing of our desires, like the shedding of blood; and the intrusions of thoughts, like fires kindled by the devil. Fire is extinguished by pouring water on it, and the flame of lust by the shedding of tears. Weariness from labor passes with peaceful rest on a bed; and the burden of the mind caused by thoughts is healed by confiding them in trust. These are the saving remedies. By using them wisely, be healed more and more in the Lord. “If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask,” as the brother of God exhorts, “from God, who gives to all generously and without reproach, and it will be given to him. But let him ask in faith, without any doubting; for the one who doubts is like a wave of the sea driven and tossed by the wind. Let not such a person think that he will receive anything from God. A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways” (James 1:5–8). Let us not, then, be double-minded, nor let our petitions be swayed by doubt. But let our requests be made to God with thanksgiving and sincere faith (Phil. 4:6), and we will certainly receive what we ask for: the foreign fire will be extinguished; frenzied thoughts will dissipate, and with God’s help we will successfully accomplish the task of obedience that lies before us.

2. I would like you to know that our treasury has very little left (John 12:6); meanwhile, expenses are mounting, but income is not increasing; now even the wine has run out, which of course causes the most vulnerable among us great sorrow. But take heart: the Lord has already provided for us from the harvest of wheat and wine, and other necessities, and He will provide again if we place our hope entirely in Him and always do what is pleasing to Him, without wavering in our confidence in Him. For He Himself said, “I will never leave you nor forsake you” (Josh. 1:5); and again: “Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you” (Matt. 6:33). And even if we sometimes fall short, it is no surprise: this is a trial and a test of virtue. Was not Patriarch Jacob righteous? And yet, pressed by hunger, he sent our forefathers to Egypt to buy wheat. Was not the prophet Elijah righteous? Yet even he, having come to Zarephath of Sidon, cried out to the widow: “Bring me now a little water, that I may drink, and a morsel of bread, that I may eat” (1 Kings 17: 10–11). He asked for nothing else but the most basic and necessary food. And who is this? Elijah, who sealed the heavens with his words to withhold rain, and who again, through prayer, ended this famine. – As for us, who are insignificant both in outward circumstances and in inner disposition, even if we suffer such things, there will be nothing improper about it; and we should not be burdened by them, but always be grateful, both in times of abundance and in times of scarcity; for this is the mark of Christ’s disciples, and by adopting this attitude, we will not only bear the sorrows of this present life with ease but also be deemed worthy of future blessings.

301. Enemies surround us and attack us unexpectedly, always and everywhere: we must protect ourselves

301. 1) Enemies surround us and attack us unexpectedly, always and everywhere: we must protect ourselves. – 2) How? Through the fear of God and trust in Him, through tears and instruction in the Word of God; by guarding the mind and refuting evil thoughts. – 3) Yesterday you sang in an unruly manner. This offends the Holy Spirit, and instead of benefit, it causes harm to the soul. From now on, sing in a proper manner. [4, 99]

3. During the recent raids by the Agarians, we were all filled with terror, fearing that we might fall into the murderous hands of these godless men. And this fear was not unfounded. But as for the raids on us by demons, we neither think about them nor fear that, through our carelessness, we might fall captive to the spirits of malice; although we know that attacks by visible enemies occur at a specific time, and word of them, coming in advance, gives those who desire freedom the chance to flee somewhere; whereas with regard to invisible enemies, nothing of the sort is possible, because day and night, and at every hour, they are occupied with nothing but attacking us, barely allowing us a moment’s respite; so there is greater fear here, and greater self-protection is therefore required, so as not to fall prey to these enemies and to avoid their soul-destroying slanders.

4. Where, then, can we flee? Certainly to God, as St. David sings: “God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in times of trouble” (Ps. 45: 2); and: “The Angel of the Lord encamps around those who fear Him, and delivers them” (Ps. 33: 8); and again: “Those who trust in the Lord are like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but abides forever in Jerusalem” (Ps. 124: 1). Therefore, if we have the fear of God and confidence in Him, we will not be afraid of our enemies. But let us bear in mind that fortresses are taken by enemies for the most part because of a shortage of bread and water. What do we have instead?—tears and the word of God, by which and in which the soul is nourished and saved, but when these are lacking, the soul decays and is taken captive. “Let the word of God dwell in us richly,” as it is written (Col. 3:16), and may our tears never run dry. There is, however, also what is called “internal betrayal.” And what is this, again?—The passions dwelling within us and the thoughts stirred up by the wiles of the flesh, which treacherously open the door to hostile demons. They must be cast out immediately, and we must guard ourselves with every care so that our city—that is, our soul—is not taken, and so that we are not carried away by sin, nor become captives of destructive passions, but remain in the virtue in which we were created, to the glory of our Creator, and to the praise of me, a sinner.

5. Yesterday you angered me with your psalm singing. I therefore ask and implore you to sing properly and in order, and not haphazardly or in a disorderly manner, so as not to offend not me, a sinner, but the Holy Spirit; for this is His commandment: “Sing with understanding” (Ps. 46:8). But one cannot sing sensibly unless the following order is observed: do not begin a new verse in unison before the singing of the previous one has ended; whether the psalm singing is loud or soft, drawn-out or quick, above all, order must be maintained; for if the observance of order is the best quality in every matter, is it not all the more so in conversation with God—since disorder gives rise to absurd fantasies and a distraction of the mind, while order preserves attention, sobriety, and the sweetness of which St. David testifies, saying: “How sweet are your words to my throat, sweeter than honey to my mouth” (Ps. 118:103). Therefore, I ask and implore that we practice this virtue with the utmost care, admonishing one another and correcting one another in our singing. By singing wisely in this way, we will find peace for our souls, set a good example for one another, and—by pleasing God in this as in all else—become worthy heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven.

302. So that the mind does not become idle or be enslaved by sinful thoughts, it must be kept in contemplation of God—contemplating the attributes and works of God, the angelic orders, the dwellings of the saints, and this visible world: in this way, the beauty of the soul is preserved

302. 1) So that the mind does not become dull or ensnared by sinful thoughts, it must be kept in contemplation of God—contemplating God’s attributes and works, the angelic orders, the dwellings of the saints, and this visible world: thus the beauty of the soul is preserved. – 2) The beauty of the soul, with which it was created, lost in the Fall, is restored through baptism, through repentance, and through the ascetic life. [4, 100]

6. This is where the mind should always be, this is where the heart should dwell!—In alert attention to God’s work, on the path of asceticism, by no means allowing oneself to be dragged hither and thither like a captive. Does the sea ever run dry of water, or the air for those who breathe?—all the more so, then, should good thoughts never run dry within us, as the eyes of our mind gaze upon the boundless sea of God’s wondrous works; for as we delve deeper into them, the mind will have no time to be distracted by worldly matters or to become entangled in evil thoughts. For the mind, being ever in motion, cannot remain at rest, but wherever we direct it, there it rushes uncontrollably—whether to the right or to the left: and if to the right, then it must cry out with David: “O Lord, by Your will, grant strength to my goodness” (Ps. 29: 8); but if to the left, then the verse that follows: “But when You turn Your face away, I am troubled” (v. 9). God’s turning away occurs when the mind is occupied with vanities, and the soul’s ruinous turmoil occurs when it engages in sinful designs. Let us therefore always strive to guide it to the right and allow it to behold good visions. What are these?—The heavenly angelic powers, the ineffable blessings there, the radiant abodes of the holy Apostles, Prophets, Martyrs, and all the righteous; as well as this heavenly vault, the shining sun, the bright moon, clusters of stars, and all other things perceptible to the senses—not so that he may dwell upon them, but so that, through them, he may be lifted up to the Creator of all things, God, and preserve his beauty unblemished.

7. For God has graced us with beauty, first by creating us in His image and likeness; and although we have defiled and disgraced ourselves through disobedience, He once again clothes us in beauty through grace, “the bath of rebirth and the renewal of the Holy Spirit, whom He has poured out abundantly upon us through Jesus Christ, our Savior” (Titus 3: 5); and when we proved unworthy even here, He provided us with a third means of regaining our beauty through repentance in the vow of virginity, “having forgiven us all our transgressions, having wiped out the handwritten code of debt against us” (Colossians 2: 13–14) through a life of the cross, just as in baptism. – May our soul abide in its beauty, so that we may be deemed worthy to hear: “You are all beautiful, my beloved, and there is no flaw in you” (Song of Songs 4: 7). But should it happen again that it becomes defiled by sin [since we are fickle and “no one is clean from defilement” (Job 14:4), “no one can boast of having a pure heart” (Prov. 20:9)], let us hasten to cleanse ourselves with tears of repentance. “Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow,” prays St. David (Ps. 50:9); “Wash yourselves; make yourselves clean; remove the wickedness from your souls,” God calls out through the Prophet Isaiah (1:16). And blessed is the soul that thus always purifies itself, having renounced every evil inclination, loving and longing for the one God, and awaiting death daily with joy. – Death will certainly come to us as well; we, too, must pay this debt common to all. – But oh, if only we, having lived a pious and righteous life, might be deemed worthy that, when the remains of each of us lie before our brothers for a final kiss at the funeral service, our soul might be taken up by the Angels of God and carried to heaven for eternal bliss.

303. Mentioning those who left the monastery, subsequently fell into heresy, and became depraved

303. 1) Recalling those who left the monastery, subsequently fell into heresy, and became corrupt. – 2) He urges caution, pointing out that the enemy seeks nothing more than to lead a monk astray and destroy him. [4, 101]

8. Few are listening now, due to the departure of several brothers; but even if there were only one listener, one should not neglect to teach; for the Lord says: “Take care not to despise even one of these little ones; for I tell you that their angels in heaven always see the face of my heavenly Father. For the Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost” (Matt. 18:10–11). Oh, how inexpressible is God’s love for mankind! The Lord came in the guise of a servant to the runaway slave, to free him from slavery to the devil. The true Light came to seek the lost drachma, to bring him out of the darkness of sin. Is it not therefore necessary for us, too, in humility, imitating the all-good Lord, to grieve for each one of you, to speak to you, and to lay down our very souls for him? Oh, if only I had wings to fly and rest in every brotherhood—to see them and speak to them as is fitting—and not only them, but also those who “have gone the way of Cain and have rushed for the wages of Balaam’s deceit” (Jude 11). Whom, then, do I call such?—Leontius, Jeremiah, and Nectarius, who have fallen away both from us and from the faith; and who, as a reward for their apostasy, have received positions of leadership—whom, if I, in my humility, were to see and speak with them, then, even if I did nothing else, I would lay down my very soul for them. I would also like to see those who, because of my sins, have cast off the holy monastic habit and clothed themselves in the garments of lawlessness and sin, so that I might weep for them once more: one of whom, that Pigasius, as they say, has sunk so low into evil that, by royal decree, he became a leader of the people, raised a rebellion, committed murders, and lost his life in battle. What a misfortune! Into what an abyss did this wretched man plunge! First he turned away from the brotherhood, then he followed his lusts, being corrupted by one thing and then another like a speechless beast; then he cast off his monastic vows, and finally met such a tragic end as we have heard.

9. Having recalled this, I ask you to pray for them, and to hold fast to your own path, without in the least diminishing your ascetic perseverance, for even small indulgences and slackness lead the soul to ruin. That is why I pity those who live in isolation and mourn for them as prey ready and waiting for the devil; for even if a wolf snatches a sheep from the sheepfold, is it not easier for him to devour one he finds outside the flock? – Do you not know what kind of frenzy the devil breathes against us? He attacks every person, not just humble monks; he rejoices in the ruin of many, but he takes no greater delight in this than when he succeeds in bringing down a single monk. Why does he tirelessly strive, lie in wait, and struggle, as if to tear the obedient away from obedience, the silent one from silence, the pillar-dweller from the pillar, the recluse from seclusion, so that, after such a disturbance, he may then lead them as he pleases: for those who remain steadfast in their disciplines and in their places, cultivating virtues, are elusive to the devil, being carried above his snares. Therefore, making use of the power given to us against the devil, let us turn him back, shielding ourselves with the fear of God and casting him down with heavenly thoughts, not allowing his own thoughts to take hold of us, so that by thus gaining victory over him, we may be deemed worthy of the crown of righteousness from our Lord Christ, the Giver of Good Deeds.

304. Let us be especially vigilant in the face of persecution: for here the enemy attacks more fiercely

304. 1) Let us be especially vigilant in the face of persecution: for here the enemy attacks more fiercely. How many has he already destroyed since the beginning of the world? And he continues to do so now. – 2) How can we avoid his snares? Through humility and submission to the commandments. Here the proper way of life is depicted—both outwardly and inwardly—with a reference to the reward, as an encouragement. [4, 102]

10. Let us lead a life worthy of persecution for Christ “in all godliness and purity” (1 Tim. 2:2), “as obedient children, not conforming to the former desires of your ignorance” (1 Pet. 1:14), and without slacking in the intensity of your ascetic efforts. For you see, “the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour” (1 Peter 5:8); and now that he sees us torn apart by persecution, he presses in much more fiercely, hoping that it is now easier to snatch our souls. But we will remain sober and vigilant at all times and in every place, protected by God’s commandments. And he, finding no foothold in us, will depart in disgrace. But if he does find a foothold, he will begin to press in more and more; and he will not retreat until he has struck and destroyed us. Or do we not know how many he has already destroyed since the creation of the world: did he not lead the first man to expulsion from Paradise by ensnaring him with the sweetness of sin? Did he not arm Cain to commit fratricide? Did he not cast Judas out of the company of the Apostles, making him a betrayer of the Life of all? Did he not condemn to death countless others as well?—Even now he beguiles, incites, and compels us to commit every kind of evil, and he devours nearly the entire universe; and avoiding him is very difficult and requires the utmost vigilance: for he attempts not only through a dissolute and base life, but also through intense asceticism, to lead us astray from what is right and draw us toward the opposite, transforming himself in various ways, devising various schemes and deceptions, spreading many nets everywhere across the earth to ensnare us, as the blessed Anthony saw in a vision and was told from above that only humility can help us avoid them.

11. Therefore, clothed in humility, let us avoid straying from the right path and stepping over it, walking the royal road and not veering to the right or to the left, but conforming precisely to the rules of the holy commandment entrusted to us and following in the footsteps of the holy fathers who went before us, whose dwelling is in heaven. May our minds refrain from evil thoughts, our hearts be instructed in the divine words, our lips open only to glorify God, our eyes see what is right, our ears not listen to vain talk, our hands reach out to our labors, our feet walk in an orderly manner, our food and drink be moderate, our sleep be regulated by a set schedule, no departures be permitted except those that are necessary, there be no room for presumption—which brings about death—and nothing else inappropriate take root within us, but everything be done in a reverent and wise manner. This path is not long, and the goal of our struggles is near. But what is the reward for our labors? – The Kingdom of Heaven; for its sake we will strive and struggle again and again; if we stumble, we will hasten to rise; if we doze off, we will awaken and be alert once more, subdue our nature, put to death the members that are on the earth, and acquire virtues. I say all this to myself as well, for I too am beset by weaknesses, being of the same nature as you. May the Lord grant all of us, having labored sincerely and lived blamelessly, to depart from here with hope and be made worthy of blessed eternal life.

305. Having pointed out the commandments of the Law and the Gospel, along with their differences, and having said that those who do not fulfill either of them cannot inherit the kingdom of God

305. 1) Having pointed out the commandments of the Law and the Gospel, along with their differences, and having stated that those who do not fulfill either cannot inherit the Kingdom of God—2) he reminds them of their dreadful fate in death, at the judgment, and after condemnation, and—3) He then invites them to turn to the Lord in repentance before the doors of His mercy are shut. [4, 103]

12. God, who created us and brought us into being from nothing, has led us into this life as if into a school, so that we might learn the Gospel commandments of His kingdom. That is why, when He sent His disciples out to preach, He commanded them, saying: “Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you” (Matt. 28:19–20). What, then, are these commandments that He has commanded us?—According to the Old Testament, it was commanded: “You shall not murder, you shall not commit adultery, you shall not steal, you shall not bear false witness” (Ex. 20; Deut. 5); but in the New Testament, He gave commandments that are higher and more perfect than these; for He says: “It was said to the ancients, ‘You shall not murder’; for whoever murders is liable to judgment. But I say to you that anyone who is angry with his brother without cause is liable to judgment; for whoever says to his brother, 'Raca,' is liable to the council." – Again: "It was said to the ancients, 'You shall not commit adultery.' But I say to you that anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart." Again: "It was said to the ancients, 'You shall not swear falsely, but you shall fulfill your oaths to the Lord.' But I say to you, do not swear at all." Again: "It has been said, 'You shall love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' But I say to you, love your enemies, bless those who curse you, do good to those who hate you" (Matt. 5:21–44). Do you see the difference between the two Covenants? One forbids actions, while the other forbids the very dispositions of the heart from which those actions arise, so that sin may not take root here. Now, if we find ourselves living neither according to the Law nor according to the Gospel, but—so to speak—in a pagan manner, what will we experience on that day? – "Do not be deceived," says the Apostle, "neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor men who practice homosexuality, nor men who engage in sexual immorality, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 6:9–10).

13. Why, as I have often told you before, do I now proclaim with determination: let no one live according to his own will; let no one be indifferent to the matter of salvation; let no one hoard gold, acquire slaves, breed horses and oxen, or burden himself with any other possessions, for from these arise the greatest and most destructive sins. And yet there are still some among you who persist in their obstinacy and resist the truth. But I, humble as I am, am innocent of your blood; for I have not ceased to proclaim God's truth to you and have ceaselessly warned of the sword that is to come upon the sons of rebellion. "Or are we provoking the Lord? Are we eating His most precious food?" (1 Cor. 10:22). "For the axe is already laid to the root of the tree: every tree, then, that does not bear good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire" (Matt. 3:10). Are you not afraid of this example? Do you not tremble at this threat? Are you not afraid even of death, which we will inevitably face in a short while? How will we meet the fearsome angels who usually come to take us from our bodies? How will we travel that long journey without having acquired the necessary provisions? How, with an unclean conscience, will we appear before the judgment seat of Christ, before whom every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess? If we are found to be such there, we will inevitably be sent to the place of unquenchable fire and undying worms, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth.

14. But so that this may not happen, let us come and worship, and fall down, and weep before our good God, presenting ourselves before Him in confession, in supplication, in contrition, in tears, in prayers, in fasting, in purity, and in righteous conduct. For He is the atonement for our sins; and He has not yet closed the door of His mercy to us; He does not turn away those who turn to Him, but graciously receives them—the harlot, the thief, and the prodigal son. Come, I beg you, let us rise, let us awaken, let us strive, so that, just as well-behaved children, having been dismissed from school, joyfully hurry to their homes, so may we, as sincere disciples of the Gospel, having renounced this life, joyfully pass into eternal life.

306. Praising obedience as the most fruitful deed and rebuking those who do not live in obedience

306. 1) Having praised obedience as the most fruitful deed and rebuked those who do not live in obedience—2) he urges his followers to excel more and more in obedience, reminding them that the One who is about to come will soon arrive and reward each person according to their deeds. [4, 104]

15. By the grace of the all-good God, you believe and submit to my humility, doing nothing except what has been commanded of you: in this lies joy and a crown not only for me, but also for you, who have set virtue as the goal of your life even before me. For what could be sweeter, more desirable, or more joyful for a disciple than to live according to the commandments and do nothing of his own will? In this lies true obedience; this is the blessed life; this is a labor both sorrowful and carefree: sorrowful as long as one is still enslaved by one's desires; carefree when one succeeds in completely cutting off one's own will, and who therefore has the boldness to say, in the words of the apostle: "It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 2:20). For, not living according to his own will, he lives according to God through the mediation of the abbot, and "beholding the glory of the Lord with unveiled face, he is being transformed into the same image from glory to glory, just as by the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor. 3:18). Such a person does not concern himself with the world, does not fear death, and leads a carefree life unburdened by anything, having surrendered himself entirely to God. But whoever relies on his own desires and pushes the laws of obedience into the background, yielding to his own will and self-indulgence, leads a tormented life, "having been taken captive by the devil to do his will" (2 Tim. 2: 26)—and even though at times such a person may appear to be fasting, or keeping vigil, or doing some other good deed, all of this is unacceptable: for “whatever is not from faith is sin” (Rom. 14: 23); and whatever is not done according to the common rule is the doer’s own affair and is foreign to godly piety pleasing to God.

16. Therefore, I rightly rebuke such people, but I praise you and urge you to persevere ever more in the best obedience, in patience, in the subjugation of your own will, in faith, hope, and love, and in all other monastic endeavors for your own salvation and as a good example to the entire brotherhood. I implore you: for “yet a little while, a little while, and He who is coming will come and will not delay” (Heb. 10:37); the last day will come, on which “the works of darkness will be revealed and the intentions of the heart will be made known” (1 Cor. 4:5). The terrible and true Judge will come, who will bring the novice before the novice, the abbot before the abbot, the bishop before the bishop, the nobleman before the nobleman, the king before the king, and through one another will condemn or justify them, and “will repay each one according to his deeds: to those who, through patience in doing what is good, seek glory, honor, and immortality, He will grant eternal life; but to those who, in their zeal, oppose the truth and obey unrighteousness, He will grant wrath and fury. Sorrow and distress for every human soul that does evil” (Rom. 2:7–9). We must fear this greatly and take every possible care to ensure that the hour of death does not find us empty of good deeds, but rich in the fruits of righteous works. Let the enemy oppose us in our good deeds [—such is his nature; “for he has been a murderer from the beginning and does not stand in the truth, because there is no truth in him,” as the Lord said (John 8:44)]; but let us wield courage and magnanimity against him, opposing him with labor, sweat, prayers, supplications, and tears—and he will succeed in nothing against us, through the assistance of our struggles and the intercession of the Lord for our weakness, who grants us eternal victory.

307. Having spoken of the fruitfulness of the teachings, he invites everyone to build up one another—in mutual cooperation—in the dwelling place of God

307. 1) Having mentioned the fruitfulness of the teachings, he invites everyone to work together in building up the house of God. – 2) He then urges us, having become the temple of God, not to allow it to be corrupted within us; the means to achieve this are also indicated. [4, 105]

17. Let no one say that our teachings are a futile labor. No, we derive great benefit from them: for just as the plow is to the earth, and water is to the thirsty, so is our instructive word to the one who listens to it with an open heart. What usually causes the soul to become corrupted? What causes strife, quarrels, and divisions in the brotherhoods? Is it not because there is a lack of teaching and exhortation? Where there is instruction and exhortation, there is peace and order; and where there is peace and order, there the Holy Spirit dwells: for this reason, I, in humility, with fear and love, strive to speak to you, to exhort, to comfort, and to remind you, so that both I and you may be helped to be saved from the devil’s many and varied temptations. – I confess that you yourselves help me greatly, especially the foremost among the brethren; you are all my collaborators for the good. “I,” says St. Paul, “planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the growth” (1 Cor. 3:6): so this good work is not mine alone, but yours as well, and even more so—God’s, from whom all that is good in people proceeds. Therefore, I ask you, in accordance with the obedience given to each of you, to direct everything toward the common good and to build one another up in God’s dwelling place through the Spirit. For the Apostle says: “No one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ. If anyone builds on this foundation using gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, or straw, each person’s work will be revealed, for the Day will bring it to light, since it will be revealed by fire; and the fire will test each person’s work to see what it is” (1 Cor. 3:11–13). Do you see how he likens virtue to gold, silver, and precious stones, and vice to wood, hay, and straw? Of these, when subjected to the trial of the fire of judgment, some—the perishable ones—will burn up, while others—the enduring ones—will remain.

18. To this, using even more solemn language, he adds: “Do you not know that you are God’s temple, and that God’s Spirit dwells in you? If anyone destroys God’s temple, God will destroy him; for God’s temple is holy, and you are that temple” (1 Cor. 3:16–17). What a gift it is that we are deemed worthy to be called and to be the temple of God! But what a threat it is that, if we destroy the temple of God, we will be destroyed by God! Let us not, then, destroy the temple of God within ourselves, and having been deemed worthy to have the Holy Spirit dwelling within us, let us not allow ourselves to become a dwelling place for passions; just as, having been set free from sin, let us not allow ourselves to be enslaved to the devil again. But “let us be pure and blameless, filled with the fruits of righteousness through Jesus Christ, to the glory and praise of God” (Phil. 1: 10–11). May our hearts, therefore, be alert, filled with the fear of God, and nourished by constant thoughts of death; for where there is such fear and such thoughts, there is no room for sin to enter. But when the heart is insensitive to this and hardened, then lust easily takes root within us, provoking and troubling us, and does not leave us until we return to our former state of peace. Let us, then, endure hardship so that, having labored to excel in goodness, we may subsequently find unceasing peace; let us endure weeping so that we may find joy in the Lord; let us endure the narrow and sorrowful path of this life so that we may find the refreshing life that springs from it. – And here is the greatest of all bargains. Here is the most sublime of all blessings—to acquire, through a few labors and efforts in the pursuit of virtue, immeasurable and eternal blessings—may we all be deemed worthy of them.

308. Our life is like a voyage across the sea

308. 1) Our life is like sailing the sea. – 2) How should the mind, as the helmsman, steer the ship of life to avoid sinking? – 3) These lessons are not only for the youngest, but also for the oldest: for danger is not far from them either. – 4) Let us therefore pay close attention, lest we lose what we have gathered through long toil. [4, 106]

19. Human life is another kind of sea, across which we—having entered this body as if into a ship—sail in our minds, and we sail not just occasionally, as those who sail the sea in ordinary ships, which sometimes sail and sometimes take shelter in harbors, but we sail ceaselessly, day and night, in bad weather and storms; and this sea is perilous, and not only perilous but also long, commensurate with the duration of our lives; and in it, so many terrible, stormy waves are stirred up by spirits of malice, so many pirates—demons—attack us, attempting to drown us, that it is impossible to describe. Why, then, does St. David, seeing this, cry out in prayer: “May I be delivered from those who hate me and from the deep waters; may the stormy waters not overwhelm me, nor the abyss devour me, nor my enemy speak against me” (Ps. 68:15–16). – If even David, such a great man, feared and prayed that he might not be drowned—though he did suffer once when he fell asleep—what then can we, the humble ones, say, and how much more should we fear and pray so as not to suffer the same fate?

20. And our mind, like a helmsman, when it is watchful and alert, wards off the storms of the passions, barely being sprinkled by the spray of assailing thoughts; but when it succumbs to laziness and negligence, it then yields to passion, which strikes with a raging torrent; and, having been overwhelmed by it, it finally suffers a great and sinful shipwreck—one that is pitiful even to hear about, and even more pitiful to experience. So terrifying and so perilous is the voyage of our life, and therefore let us hold its helm attentively and alertly, keeping passions at a distance and immediately casting out any intrusive, inappropriate thoughts, lest they, if we linger on them, sink us.

21. I say this, keeping in mind not only the very young but also the elders who have long been engaged in asceticism; for the devil does not leave even them untouched, and often brings them to a pitiful fall—as the great and godly Basil says elsewhere: “Truly, it is the most pitiful sight—after fasting, after a harsh life, after prolonged prayers, after abundant tears, after twenty or even thirty years of abstinence, to find oneself suddenly deprived of everything due to inattention and the negligence of the soul!” (Vol. 4, p. 222, – in the Russian translation). – It is I, the humble one, who have heard and seen this, and have wept and continue to weep, pondering how such a wealth of virtues, gathered over so many years, was plundered in a single moment by the cunning devil, leaving the ascetic of piety empty and worthless. – So great is the mystery of our salvation, and such is the fury of the devil against us, who cannot bear to see us ascending to heaven, from whence he fell.

22. But let him be as he is and arm himself against us with such fury; we, young and old, juniors and seniors alike, shall all unanimously and resolutely resolve, with God’s help, not to allow ourselves to be led to ruin through neglect of what we have gathered through many labors and deeds—namely, renunciation of the world, obedience, chastity, tears, and the first and last confessions; but we will also remain vigilant without ceasing, holding aloft the sail of our hope and guided by the winds of the Spirit, so that when we reach the end of our lives and enter the harbor of immortality, we may attain the kingdom of heaven through the wealth of our virtues.

309. A messenger from the king arrived yesterday; and we were all alarmed, knowing that the king is displeased with us

309. 1) Yesterday, a messenger from the king arrived; and we were all alarmed, knowing that the king is not well-disposed toward us. If we had known that he was well-disposed, you would have received the messenger differently. So the soul will meet the herald of death: joyfully, if it is confident in God's favor, and with terror, if it is not. – 2) Let us therefore be reconciled with God and make the angels our friends. To this end, let us offer tears of repentance, self-examination, mutual prayers, and above all, partaking of the Holy Mysteries. – 3) Here it is explained how one should approach the Holy Mysteries, how salvific this is, and how regrettable it is that people rarely receive Communion, with the instruction to receive Communion more frequently. [4, 107]

23. Yesterday, as soon as the tsar's envoy arrived here, we were immediately thrown into great alarm, struck by the unexpectedness of his arrival. But when we later learned that he had not come for our sake, we shook off our fear even more quickly. I now ask: why were we so frightened? Was it not because we realized that the king is not only displeased with us, but even hates and despises us? On the contrary, if we were dear to the king and numbered among those close to him, would we not have rejoiced at the arrival of a messenger from him, knowing that he has always been favorably disposed toward us?—But why am I bringing up this subject? – To this: that in the same way, a soul that has earned God's favor through a good life will, at the moment of its departure from the body—when an angel sent by the King of all comes for it—not be afraid, but will look upon him with pleasure and go joyfully to its Lord. But if it is not such a soul, it will be seized by confusion and terror, lacking inner strength and expecting no help or comfort from anywhere. For here, both a brother and a friend can comfort the soul and dispel its fear; but there, nothing of the sort is possible, and the Angel will take the poor soul mercilessly and cruelly. – Upon hearing these words, do we not feel a stir of fear in our souls? If merely hearing about this causes fear, what will we suffer when we actually find ourselves in such a situation? – And how will the soul then appear before the judgment seat of Christ? – “A river of fire,” according to the prophet Daniel, “flows out before Him; thousands upon thousands serve Him, and multitudes stand before Him” (Dan. 7: 10)—and the Judge is terrible and implacable, and every word, even a idle one, will be called to account, as it is said in the Gospel (Matt. 12: 36). How, then, will the soul endure all this?—Truly, “it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God” (Heb. 10:31). And it is even more dreadful when it hears the most righteous judgment, condemning it to endless torment.

24. For this reason, I ask and implore: let us be reconciled with God before death and earn His favor; let us make friends with the angels who are to come for us—let us keep our inner eye vigilant and our mind invincible, not yielding to the temptations of the passions; if we ever slip, let us rise again as quickly as possible; with many tears let us quench the fiery arrows of the Evil One and instead let us raise up our love for Christ.—“The prayer of a righteous person,” it says, “is powerful and effective” (James 5:16); which is why we need to pray for one another and to remember one another in prayer. Tears and contrition can also do much, and above all, partaking of the Holy Mysteries—toward which, seeing you, for some reason, treat it carelessly, I am extremely astonished. On Sundays, there are still those who approach the sacraments; but when the Liturgy is held on another day, no one comes forward. Even in the monastery, it used to be that those who wished to receive Communion did so every day; but now this happens very rarely, and you will hardly ever find it anywhere at all.

25. In saying this, I do not at all wish for you to receive the Sacraments casually, as if it were no big deal. For it is written: “Let a person examine himself, and so eat of the bread and drink from the cup. For whoever eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment upon himself, not discerning the Lord's body” (1 Cor. 11:28–29). No—that is not what I want; may it never be so! But let us, burning with the desire to partake as much as possible, purify ourselves, and in this way become worthy of this gift. For the bread set before us is the communion of life, as the Lord says: “I am the bread of life, which has come down from heaven; whoever eats of this bread will live forever. And the bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world” (John 6:51); and again: “Whoever eats My flesh and drinks My blood abides in Me, and I in him” (John 6:56). Do you see this ineffable and immeasurable gift? Not only did the Lord die for us, but He also offered Himself to us as food. What could more clearly reveal His mighty love for us? And what could be more salvific for our souls? – If no one now deprives themselves of ordinary food each day and, having not tasted it, is greatly distressed by this; then how is it consistent—when what is offered to all is not ordinary bread but the bread of life, and not an ordinary cup but the cup of immortality—to be indifferent as to whether anyone has tasted them, not regarding this matter as necessary? What folly and senselessness this testifies to! If this has happened until now, from now on, I beg you, let us resolve to prevent it any longer, knowing the power of this gift from God; but always, to the best of our ability, purifying ourselves, let us approach and partake of the holy and sanctifying mysteries. – And this, as I believe, and as is truly the case, will greatly help us to keep ourselves pure, spurred on by our preparation for Communion and our anticipation of it. When we are indifferent toward Communion, however, the passions are given greater freedom and scope to ensnare us. – May this also serve as a constant guide for us toward eternal life, which may we all be deemed worthy to receive, through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

310. Forward—forward—along the path of virtue

310. 1) Forward—forward—along the path of virtue. – 2) How? By spending every day doing what is right: for which a model program is presented. – 3) Motivations: the beauty and sweetness of virtue, and the destructiveness of sin. – 4) What prevents success? Insincere desire. [4, 108]

1. Virtue is a constantly evolving process that never ceases to move forward, but always draws its followers toward perfection. Illustrating this, the Apostle says: “Not that I have already attained this, or am already perfect; but I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me”; —and further: “Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3:12–14). Thus, there must be no pause in the pursuit of virtue; for a pause here is the beginning of a turn toward evil. Let us, then, not stand still on the path of virtue, but let us always be diligent and, ever renewed, grow from strength to strength, “until we all reach maturity, the measure of the full stature of Christ” (Eph. 4:13).

2. How, then, will this come to pass? If we spend every day zealously doing what is right. Let us take the following as an example: upon rising from sleep, let us hasten to prayer; coming from there, let us set to work diligently—singing and praising the Lord in our hearts, and working with our hands as well. Has the day passed? Let us go to sleep with thanksgiving and contrition; and through this succession of deeds, may the words of Saint David be fulfilled in us: “Day to day utters speech, and night to night reveals knowledge” (Ps. 18:3). May not a single day pass for us in indifference to our duties and in the captivity of our thoughts and hearts—nor a single night in indulging the flesh’s desires and in shameful acts—I do not speak of deeds: let it not be!—but even in thought: for the word of truth demands that not only our bodies be pure, but our souls as well.

3. If we wish to desire anything, then let it be the virtues we long for, the taste of which is sweet and insatiable. If we love to delight in beauty, then what is more lovely than the Lord, in whose beauty all things are adorned? Evil desires, however, drive the soul to madness and devour it more cruelly than any beast: so that they bring not pleasure, but a life of torment. “Flesh and blood,” says the Apostle, “cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable” (1 Cor. 15:50). And tell me, whom has sin, having captivated, not shamed, not humiliated, and not delivered to death? And whom, having revealed, has virtue not exalted and made wondrous in the world? Take two from among many—Amnon and Joseph. Did not fornication lead the one to mortal disgrace, while the other’s preservation of chastity before the Egyptian woman did not make him a king?—Thus virtue is so lovable, so desirable, so salvific! But sin is vile, repulsive, and ruinous! And yet we humans are led astray by a great delusion, choosing death instead of life, embracing darkness instead of the light, and loving corruption instead of incorruption. What could be more worthy of regret than this?

4. Why, then, do we—desiring to be lovers of the good—fail to be so?—Because we do not desire it with a true desire, but with a feigned one: since, being self-willed, we desire whatever we please and choose accordingly; therefore, if we truly desired the good, we would choose the good. – It is true that a life of vice from youth endows us with passionate habits that are impossible to shake off; but what does the Apostle say? – “I speak in human terms because of the weakness of your flesh: just as you once presented your members as slaves to impurity and lawlessness leading to more lawlessness, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness leading to holiness” (Rom. 6:19). That is, in contrast to our inclination toward sin, we must show zeal for virtue. Let us therefore continue to press on, and the all-gracious God will surely open the door for us, working in us what is pleasing to Him and granting us eternal life.

311. Someone has passed away to general acclaim: a lesson is given to emulate him

311. 1) A certain person passed away to general acclaim: a lesson is given to emulate him. – 2) We are inspired to rekindle our zeal by remembering the last moments, as all the saints did. – 3) Blessed is the one who acts in this way, and the exhortation follows: let us be like that as well. [4, 109]

5. We are now fully certain that our brother Theosost has passed away; and it is necessary to say a few words about him, for he was a man of great virtue, highly praised by many—both monks and laypeople—who both listened to others and compelled others to listen to him; and having been tested through his sufferings, he was able, to speak in apostolic terms, to be a help to those who are being tested. Through this, having gained for himself many good children in the Lord, he subsequently endured sorrows and hardships, persecutions and trials—considerable and not easy—for the sake of the truth; and having passed away in the midst of them, he departed to the Lord. – But why am I saying all this? – So that in this brother of ours we may see our own future: that is, if we live well and piously, we will be praised by others after death, just as he was, and will serve as examples of godly zeal for those who follow; but if we do not live well, then not only will we not be praised, but we will also justly be subjected to endless torment: a thought that is terrifying, not just to speak of but to even contemplate.

6. But look at this: how we pass from here one by one, and where we go, and what kind of life is prepared for us here for a few short days—to live only as long as is necessary to test and prove our virtue, and then to pass on to the place where we will dwell forever. To ponder this is the task of the prudent; and whoever ponders it is always afraid and trembling, dying daily by choice, daily awaiting release from his body, and thereby stirring up within himself zeal for the tasks ahead, in accordance with the obedience entrusted to him, and ceaselessly adding labor upon labor. For where else do the natural feats of the saints come from? Where does their obedience until death come from?—Where does the invincible patience of the martyrs come from, as their limbs are cut off and their blood is shed? —Is it not from this—is it not from the thought of the transience of life and sudden death, of standing before the dreadful judgment seat, and of the endlessness of eternal torments?—From this comes everything in them; from this comes their endurance of the most cruel sufferings, as if in a foreign body.

7. And blessed is the soul that meditates on this day and night, living out its temporary life as a stranger, sojourning here and awaiting that blessed and endless life of which the Apostle speaks: “For the creation waits in eager expectation for the revelation of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to futility, not of its own will but because of the one who subjected it, in hope that the creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay and brought into the freedom of the glory of the children of God” (Rom. 8: 19–21). Do you see what is promised? That all things will be transformed into incorruptibility, and that creation will be changed from bondage to freedom? – What, then, will that day be like, of which Saint David speaks: “Better is one day in Your courts than a thousand” (Ps. 83: 11); and Saint Peter the Apostle: “one day... is like a thousand years” (2 Peter 3: 8). There, too, shall we direct our minds and hearts—there we shall turn our longings, there we shall set our thoughts and desires, so that, by engaging in such matters, we may take refuge from the prince of this world, who has the power to tempt us but is powerless to overthrow us when we are protected by the weapons of our asceticism, —whom I, in my humility, wish for you not only to avoid but also to overcome, and to receive the crown of righteousness from Christ Jesus our Lord.

312. Only true monks can rejoice, because they are free from worldly cares, concerned solely with pleasing God, and for the preservation of their virginity

312. 1) Only true monks can rejoice, because they are free from worldly cares, concerned solely with pleasing God, and for preserving their chastity. – 2) They have nothing to grieve about: their sins are forgiven; the wounds inflicted by thoughts and passions are cut off by the struggle that prepares them for their crowns; they need only fight valiantly and defeat the enemy. – 3) Let us take heart; soon the Coming One will arrive. [4, 110]

8. The Apostle commands everyone to “rejoice in the Lord always” (Phil. 4:4). And it is usually only the true monks who rejoice, for they are not concerned with a wife, children, servants, money, property, or anything else that preoccupies the lovers of the flesh. They have but one concern: how to please the Lord; to be concerned with this is to rejoice always in the Lord. For where there is marriage, servants, and all the cares that arise from these—this is the burden of the spirit that God has given to the sons of men, so that they may be crushed by it, as Solomon said (Ecclesiastes, chs. 1–2): it is difficult to rejoice in the Lord when the things mentioned above distract the mind from the reverent remembrance of God, in which alone it is possible to rejoice. Since we belong to the number of those who rejoice in the Lord, let us rejoice and share in one another's joy always, hoping for a reward from God, the Rewarder, for our chastity and non-covetousness—He who has promised to give a reward even for a cup of cold water, and not only for such great and supernatural deeds. For truly, the work of chastity is great and supernatural: it touches upon the angelic realm and restores a person to the original state that existed in Paradise, when there was neither marriage nor slavery, but life flowed in a state of needlessness and carefree ease.

9. If anyone says that he is not rejoicing but is grieving, then I ask: What is the cause of this grief?—That he has committed many sins in the past?—But those have already been forgiven because of his confession, his renunciation of the world, and his acceptance of the yoke of obedience. — “Is it because you are daily wounded by your thoughts?” — “But if you cast them aside, this is a foretaste of your crown. For they never crown one who has not entered the battle, but the warrior; nor do they reward with gifts one who has not fought, but the one who has valiantly contended and prevailed.” Do you see that what we might point to as a cause of sorrow is, in fact, a source of joy for us? Let us therefore rejoice with spiritual joy, rising up and valiantly resisting the devil's wiles, repelling his attacks with prayers and supplications, breaking his snares with humility and obedience, drowning him with tears and contrition, just as Pharaoh was drowned; driving him far from us through self-reproach and confession; and, with God's help, overthrowing him through all other good deeds. Thus, let him be diverse in his schemes; let him be cunning in his malice; let him know the time when it is most convenient to attack us, seeking to destroy us; let him be able to feign defeat, so that, later, by unexpectedly attacking a soul unprepared for it, he may do with it as he pleases. But we, standing at our post, will remain sober and vigilant, keeping the eye of our mind ever watchful and our heart ablaze with love for God, and thereby remaining invincible and unshakable.

10. Let us, I beg you, not lose heart in battle, nor falter in the struggle against the enemy; for the end of our struggles and deeds is near; there is but a very little while left until what is to come arrives without delay—whether at the hour of each person's death or at the end of the age, when He will appear from heaven with the angels of power in blazing fire and in unspeakable glory, and “every eye will see Him,” and those “who pierced Him, and all the tribes of the earth will mourn for Him” (Rev. 1:7). How terrifying and indescribable is that sight! — Then those who have striven in good deeds, who have remained steadfast in temptations, who have loved godliness, who have been perfect in obedience, and all who have pleased the Lord in everything will rejoice. But may we also be numbered among them, and together with them enjoy the eternal blessings in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

313. Earthly life is fleeting, having become so from the very first act of disobedience

313. 1) Earthly life is fickle, having become so from the very first act of disobedience. — 2) By renouncing the world and committing ourselves to obedience, we free ourselves from such changeability; but this requires a valiant stand in our spiritual struggles. — 3) Let us therefore be sober and watchful, keeping ourselves pure; and if we sin, let us repent and make amends. [4, 111]

11. Let us listen to what the Apostle says: “I say this because the time is short; henceforth, those who have wives should be as though they had none, those who mourn as though they did not mourn, those who rejoice as though they did not rejoice, those who buy as though they did not possess, and those who seek the things of this world as though they did not seek them. For the present form of this world is passing away” (1 Cor. 7:29–31). What does it mean that “the present form of this world is passing away”? It means that it passes by, flees, and has no permanence even for a single day: yesterday it was clear, today it is cloudy; yesterday the weather was fine, today it is stormy; one rises to heights, while another falls from the heights of his dignity; one who was rich becomes poor, and another who was poor becomes rich; and our poor life is subject to countless changes and vicissitudes, never having a firm footing in anything. — Why has this come to pass? Because of our ancient recklessness: since we disregarded the Holy Commandment given to us in Paradise, having been deceived by the serpent's sweet flattery, we have been justly consigned to this long-suffering and changeable life, — which is why the incarnate work of our Lord Jesus Christ came to pass, restoring us to our original state and reestablishing that sorrowless and carefree dwelling. For it is a wise and prudent thing to be steadfast amid change and to remain unshaken amid vicissitudes. To whom, then, does this apply?—To none other than those who have crucified themselves to the world and followed the Lord.

12. But such are we, by the grace of Christ, having renounced the world through a noble renunciation and having surrendered ourselves to perfect obedience, through which our ascent to our original state is accomplished. For just as we were cast out of paradise because of disobedience and rebellion, so our all-good God has willed that we regain it through obedience and submission. Let us therefore rejoice that we abide in obedience, for it leads us into eternal life. But this requires perseverance in our efforts and patience in our trials. For if victory over the flesh is attained through much toil and sweat, how much more can the race of a life such as ours be run victoriously by anyone other than those who are courageous and valiant?

13. Let us, then, I beg you, stand firm, remaining constantly sober and vigilant, directing our longing toward God alone and constantly occupying our minds with the contemplation of Him, being washed by tears and contrition, enlightened by prayers and supplications, and thereby drawing down the grace of the Holy Spirit. For nothing delights God more than a soul purified of passions; and no multicolored meadow emits such a fragrance as a soul fragrant with virtues. If, however, we should happen to doze off, let us awaken as soon as possible; even if we sin seven times a day, let us repent seven times—and we will be accepted; even if we suffer this seventy times seven, let us repent just as many times, and we will not be deprived of the hope of mercy, according to God’s promise: only let us, I beg you, remain steadfast and not be lazy in raising ourselves up from our falls. The end of our struggles is already near; joy, gladness, and the crowns of righteousness are already near—may we all be deemed worthy of them, through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

314. A brother passed away suddenly: hence this heartfelt exhortation to be ready for our departure, and, always keeping it in mind, to remain engaged in works pleasing to God

314. A brother has passed away suddenly: hence this heartfelt exhortation to be ready for our departure, and, always keeping it in mind, to remain engaged in works pleasing to God. [4, 112] Come, let us make a saving covenant concerning the last day; come, let us be reconciled to God before the urgent hour of death arrives: for it is said, “In death there is no remembrance of You; in the grave, who will give You thanks?” (Ps. 6:6). Do we not see how our brothers are taken from us every day? Do we not see that we, like sheep destined for slaughter, are alive today but gone tomorrow? Brother Liberius has also been taken, and news of his passing has crushed my humble soul: for, as they say, he was found in his cell, having died suddenly, lying on his side as if asleep. – Such was his end! – We do not know what ours will be, nor do we know by what kind of death we will die: will it come suddenly, or with some forewarning? On land or at sea? – Will we be alone, or surrounded by our brothers? Who has fathomed the mind of the Lord, and who has been His counselor, so as to know the day and hour, the place and manner of our death? – Truly, the certainty of death is terrifying, and it is terrifying to fall into the hands of the living God. Therefore, I urge you: let us always be zealous, always vigilant, and always engaged in works pleasing to God. They say that one has attained a high rank, another has become rich, and yet another has even become a king. – And what is all this? – It all passes like a dream—“They fell asleep in their sleep, and all men found nothing of their riches in their hands” (Ps. 74: 6). “All the glory of man is like the flower of the field” (Isa. 40: 6). But God’s chosen ones have made a wonderful purchase—and have received ranks that cannot be taken away. And what are they?—Some are apostolic, others prophetic, some martyr’s, others monastic, and still others, though the lowest of these, are nonetheless salvific. Their names are written in the Book of Life; their glory is unfading, their joy inexpressible. Let us imitate them, and we will certainly receive one of these ranks: for grace is not envied, and to everyone who desires it, a good gift awaits—whether small or great, wise or unwise, old or young. But if we do not imitate them, the Lord of the House will not admit us into the heavenly bridal chamber, and He will shut its doors before us. “Woe,” says the Lord, “to that man by whom the Son of Man is betrayed! It would have been better for him if he had not been born” (Matt. 26:24). It is clear to everyone that this saying refers to the betrayer; but it can justly be applied to anyone who betrays his own salvation. Do we not think about the coming of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ? Do we not consider the terrible judgment that the incorruptible Judge will pronounce against all who stand on the left? Do we not envision the unquenchable fire and the unimaginable torments of eternity? Who can comprehend this? Who is the wise helmsman who will steer himself well and save his soul from being overwhelmed by the spirits of malice? As for us, since by the grace of Christ we have chosen a quiet and peaceful life, we will continue to navigate our course well, enduring everything that comes our way with equanimity, guarding every part of ourselves with the fear of God. Let the eye be forbidden to look with curiosity; let the ear not accept vain hearing; let the tongue not be permitted to condemn: for “whoever slanders,” says the brother of God, “a brother, or condemns his brother, slanders the law and condemns the law” (James 4:11); let the hand work, for “whoever is unwilling to work should not eat,” according to the apostle’s decree (2 Thess. 3:10); let the feet walk uprightly on the path of peace; let the heart “not turn to deceitful words, nor excuse guilt for sins” (Ps. 140:4); but “let all things be done decently and in order” (1 Cor. 14:40), so that, having lived well, we may be made worthy of eternal blessings.

315. While preserving the faith, we must also excel in a good life; especially in chastity, against which the enemy wages war most fiercely among us

315. 1) While preserving the faith, we must also excel in a virtuous life; especially in chastity, against which the enemy wages war most fiercely among us. – 2) He begins with shameful thoughts; then, having kindled lust, he leads one to act on it; and furthermore, he makes the lustful person resemble one afflicted with scabies. – 3) How can we avoid this? – Resist these thoughts by turning to prayer at the very first stirrings of them. – 4) Be inspired to resist by the thought that, having received adoption as a child of God in grace, through this sin you become a slave to the devil—and resist both this passion and all others. [4, 113]

14. There are two virtues that bring about a person’s salvation: faith and love. If I saw that you were erring in any matter of faith, I would speak to you about it, striving in every way to guide you toward orthodox thinking. – “For without faith it is impossible to please God, since whoever comes to God must believe that He exists and that He rewards those who seek Him” (Heb. 11:6). Since, by the grace of Christ, your faith is sound, I will set aside the topic of faith for now and speak to you briefly about a life of active service, which must be driven by love. – Therefore, I ask you, as I always have and continue to do, not to neglect asceticism, nor about mastery over your thoughts, nor about the priceless treasure of virginity, which we have graciously received by God’s mercy, and against which the enemy directs his schemes with the greatest zeal, seeking to steal our salvation by stealing it from us. For he knows that by this virtue we become like God, whereas, conversely, by losing it we become like senseless beasts, as it is written: “A man of high standing who lacks understanding becomes like senseless beasts and is likened to them” (Ps. 48:13).

15. Oh, how many since time immemorial has our deceiver ensnared with carnal lust! But even to this day he does not cease to deceive not only the young but also the elderly, and not only the careless but also the most diligent; and he uses this weapon against almost every soul. He begins to prepare this poison by instilling inappropriate thoughts; then, having inflamed the heart with the lusts of the flesh and blood, he prompts it to utter something forbidden, and then instills the audacity to touch the member; for this leads to death: for, as the Apostle says, “When lust has conceived, it gives birth to sin; and when sin is fully grown, it gives birth to death” (James 1:15). Let us therefore avoid this death—eternal death—and let us avoid this soul-destroying disease. It seems to me that this disease is like scabies. Just as a person with scabies, when scratching himself with his fingernails, seems to be giving himself pleasure, but in reality receives not pleasure but agonizing wounds—and the more he scratches, the worse it gets—so too, one possessed by lustful passion receives not pleasure but torment, not satisfaction but emptiness, not contentment but numbness. Such a person is worthy of pity—hopeless, fearful, afraid even of a shadow, not just of the future judgment.

16. But how, then, can one avoid this evil? The first thing is to resist these temptations with all one’s might and without fail whenever this passion arises. That it arises is no surprise; but it draws its strength either from the inattention of the mind, which is not occupied with good thoughts, or from the envy of the enemy. But however this may happen, rise up quickly from your wound, pray, sigh, shed tears, and resolutely reject the passion; and the passion will soon subside, while you will find peace in the Lord. Then you will realize that nothing is so bitter for the soul as not being besieged and enslaved by passions.

17. Have you not heard what the Lord says? “Everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin; but a slave does not remain in the house forever; a son remains forever” (John 8:34). Having been freed from sin and having received the status of sonship, shall we once again enslave ourselves to sin? Having come under the strong hand of God, shall we become subjects of the devil? Far be it from us. “For if I destroy what I have built, I prove myself to be a transgressor” (Gal. 2:18), the Apostle says elsewhere. Let us not, then, allow ourselves to be transgressors of God’s commandments and become enslaved to the devil again, after we have already received freedom from him, “thus storing up wrath for yourselves on the day of wrath and the revelation of God’s righteous judgment” (Rom. 2:5). For it is written of such people: “Their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched” (Mark 9:44). “For freedom Christ has set us free; therefore let us stand firm” (Gal. 5: 1), abhorring the vile schemes of the serpent, daily resisting and fighting not only this passion but all others as well, suppressing envy, subduing deceit, hatred of one's brother, and every other form of malice, so as to avoid eternal torment and attain the Kingdom of Heaven.

316. He extols the monks, calling them a chosen race and the army of Christ

316. 1) He extols the monks, calling them the chosen race and the army of Christ. – 2) In all heretical persecutions, both past and present, who defends the faith? – All the monks. – 3) But since we are such, let us keep ourselves pure and rise above all passions. – 4) Do not be disheartened that monasteries are being destroyed, or that we are unable to restore them as quickly as is needed. Let us take care to defend the faith, and everything else will fall into place for us. [4, 114]

18. Brethren and fathers! – I will not cease to call you by these good names of “brethren” and “fathers,” knowing that this title is truly fitting for you, and that this name is not false. For true fathers and brothers are those who, having loved God more than their parents, more than their brothers, more than their own kin, more than their own homeland, and more than all that is visible, have embraced a life of community in which there is one heart and one soul, one Father—God—and one homeland—heavenly Jerusalem. Such are you also, my beloved brothers in the Lord. I will also call you by the words of Scripture: “A chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for His own possession, that you may proclaim the excellencies of Him who called you out of darkness into His marvelous light” (1 Peter 2:9). For truly, the monastic life is a marvelous light, to which we are called and in which we proclaim the praises of Him who covers the heavens with His virtue. Here dwell wisdom, chastity, courage, and righteousness; here are the trophies of victory over the evil one in Christ Jesus. “For though we walk in the flesh, we do not wage war according to the flesh; for the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh, but are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down arguments and every lofty thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ” (2 Cor. 10: 3–5).

19. If we consider visible enemies, we will see how many and what kinds of persecutions have been waged against the Church of God! —And who has been most persecuted, beaten, and killed, if not those who have crucified themselves to the world? I will leave aside the distant past; in the present age, and in the midst of the heresy that continues to this day, who “stood firm against sin, struggling even to the point of shedding blood?” (Heb. 12: 4). Are not our fathers and brothers—both in our monastery and in others—blessed? And truly, such deeds and feats are the prerogative of monks above all; monks are the sinews and pillars of the Church. Such is the dignity bestowed upon us by God's goodness.

20. But since where there are treasures, thieves will also lurk, —and since the treasures of the soul are virtues—I remind you and urge you: let us remain sober and vigilant, so that we may not be carried away by the sweetness of sin, nor be enraged by anger, nor be darkened by unbelief, nor be hardened by unconfessed sin, nor yield to the dominion of any other passion; but, keeping ourselves above these destructive passions, let us strive earnestly toward the goal until we reach the end of our lives.

21. Perhaps some are saddened by the news that our monasteries are being destroyed by the enemies of the Lord. But why grieve over this? For we ourselves are the temple of God, to whom it is said: “If anyone destroys the temple of God, God will destroy him” (1 Cor. 3:17). The fact that these temples have often been destroyed by our persecutors is indeed a cause for regret and sorrow; yet for the most part, they have been restored again by God's providence. Perhaps it troubles some that we are unable to restore and renovate as many monasteries as are needed to compensate for those that have suffered persecution. But since the present persecution is undermining the faith, all our efforts must be directed toward defending it and restoring it to strength—and as long as this has not been done, but the name of our God is still being blasphemed and the holy fathers are being anathematized, what good is there in restoring them? – Who, in a race, has ever received the prize after running only half the course? – For it is said: “No one is crowned unless he competes according to the rules” (2 Tim. 2:5). Therefore, setting aside such thoughts, let us hold fast to the confession of our faith with both heart and word, trusting in the unfailing promise: “Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you” (Matt. 6:33). May we be made worthy of this through the grace and love of our Lord Jesus Christ.

317. One brother has died; another is on his deathbed. Are we, then, immortal?—Let us therefore remember this hour

317. One brother has died; another is on his deathbed. Are we, after all, immortal?—Let us, then, remember this hour. Where there is the memory of death, all is holy; where it is absent, there are only passions.—But we are overcome by lust. Now is the time; do not put it off until tomorrow; repent now. Stand and pray against your passions, as Moses did against Amalek. [4, 115] Behold, two of our brothers, Jacob and Vassian—one has already departed to the Lord, the other stands at the very gates of death. Are we, then, immortal? Will we not drink from the same cup that those who have gone before us drank? Blessed is the one who occupies his soul with this matter, making the remembrance of death the very soul of his life. For where there is the remembrance of death, there are feelings of repentance, contrition, tears, indifference to all earthly things, delight in heavenly things, enlightenment, and a longing for what is better and heavenly. Where all this is lacking, there arise evil thoughts, which the Lord condemned in the Gospel (Matt. 15:19), by which those who love life are ensnared and held captive. We, however, must always and in all things remember death, and take every care to ensure that we “do not live the rest of our time in the flesh according to the inappropriate desires of the flesh, but according to the will of God. It is enough for us” that “in the past we lived according to the will of the flesh and our own desires” (1 Peter 4:2–3); we are tempted by the deceptions devised by the devil, who turns us away from good intentions and endeavors and agitates us with evil thoughts, from which we have never derived any benefit, but only troubles and humiliation. “Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation” (2 Cor. 6:2). “Today, if you hear His voice, do not harden your hearts,” cries out the Holy Spirit (Heb. 3:7). Since He saw the inclination of our nature toward sin—which does not remain steadfast even for a single day—He mercifully designated “today and today” for repentance, so that no one might have an excuse to turn away from it; but so that everyone—whether they have sinned much or little, whether they have been sinning for a long time or are just beginning—upon hearing this saving call, might daily renew and purify themselves through repentance with all their heart. Behold the love of our good God, who grants us a swift and easy healing from sin. Physical wounds are also healed, but this requires a greater or lesser amount of time for treatment so that the wounded may later rejoin the ranks against their enemies. But for us, as soon as a wound is received, it can be healed immediately, if we wish to turn against our enemies again without delay. Let us not fail to repent daily and be renewed in spirit, and let us not allow any fall—whether in thought, word, or deed—to become a cause for slackness or discouragement; but no matter how many times we are struck down, we will rise up just as many times, and, fearing God’s judgment, we will arm ourselves again with all our strength against our passions. When Moses, the servant of God, was praying on the mountain with his hands outstretched toward heaven, Amalek was being defeated; but when he lowered them, Amalek gained strength. In the same way, when our mind, beset by passions, ascends the mountain of prayer and, like hands, stretches out its thoughts toward God, it strikes down the invisible Amalek; but when it fails to do so, it is itself overcome. “Do you see now what we must do? Nothing else but, in the hour of the enemies’ attack, to lift up our minds and hands to God, who has the power to save us from death. By this alone, the enemies will be put to flight, and we will win the crown of victory and inherit the kingdom of heaven.”

318. Upon hearing of impending new persecutions for the faith, he expresses an enthusiastic readiness to endure everything

318. 1) Upon hearing of impending new persecutions for the faith, he expresses an enthusiastic readiness to endure everything. – 2) He then turns to the inner struggle and calls upon us to don the armor of righteousness and fight valiantly, inspired by the help that is ready from above. [4, 116]

22. I think that trials and sorrows await us once again. But, in the words of the Apostle, which are fitting to recall here: “I do not regard my life of any account to myself, so that I may finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I received from the Lord Jesus, to testify to the Gospel of the grace of God” (Acts 20: 24). So we too, according to the measure of faith given to us, will act wisely and speak, rejoicing in our sufferings for Christ, and being willing even more to suffer for Him, rather than refusing to endure persecution again, for we have already been persecuted many times. Hearing that “we must go through many hardships to enter the kingdom of God” (Acts 14:22), let us desire more and more to suffer, to endure more and more, so that we may be more assured of receiving that blessed entrance. Perhaps, by God’s grace, nothing undesirable will happen to us; but it is good to prepare ourselves for suffering beforehand, so that when it comes, we may meet it as is fitting. For a soul that is not prepared is easily overcome if, not being properly disposed, it is suddenly thrown into struggle.

23. But why do I speak of struggles as if they were something accidental? We face a daily struggle, a daily war—not visible, but invisible; one that inflicts wounds not on the body but on the soul, seeking to destroy it. Therefore, having girded the loins of our minds and, as soldiers of Christ, having put on the armor of righteousness, let us fight earnestly and without slumber. For no one, while sleeping, deserves trophies, nor, lying on one's side, reaps a rich harvest; but both require great toil and sweat. If this is so, is it not all the more inevitable in our battle, in which arrows—like bolts of lightning—rush in: from here, evil lust besieges us; from there, the mania for glory; from another direction, envy; and from yet another, blasphemy? The devil has many other wiles, attempting in every way to shake the soul and seeking, as it were, to devour it; so that it is fitting for everyone, in amazement, to cry out: “If the Lord had not helped me, my soul would soon have gone down to hell” (Ps. 93: 17). “But in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us” (Rom. 8:37); and, in the words of David: “Through God we will gain strength, and He will bring down our enemies” (Ps. 107:14). ““For He is our peace, who has made the two one and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility” (Eph. 2: 14); that is, He who has conquered and subdued the devil, and who gives us the strength to overcome him with the promise of eternal life in return, which may all of us receive in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

319. Two leopards have appeared in Bithynia and are kidnapping people. This gives me cause to remind you of the invisible beasts prowling everywhere, seeking to devour us

319. 1) Two leopards have appeared in Bithynia and are abducting people. This gives me cause to remind you of the invisible beasts that prowl everywhere, seeking to devour us. – 2) What, then, should we do? Take refuge in the shelter of God and hide within, keeping our senses alert. – 3) Behold, Memnon has been abducted, and I mourn him as though he were dead. Why did this happen? Because he lived on his own, isolating himself from everyone—a practice against which I will never cease to cry out. – 4) He rebukes the brothers for having revealed what he had said not long before (presumably concerning heresy and persecution). [4, 117]

24. It is my earnest desire to always offer you words of comfort and edification, seizing every opportunity to do so. And now, having heard that something extraordinary has happened in Bithynia, I will take this as the subject of my message to you. What, then, has happened? They say that not one, but two or three leopards appeared suddenly there, and they are not preying on oxen, sheep, or other animals, but on people alone: so that the local inhabitants, struck with great fear, lock themselves in their homes all night long until dawn. Such a calamity is clear evidence of God's wrath. – But I will tell you why this news particularly caught my attention. Because we, too, have many beasts, fierce beasts—I mean, spirits of malice: the evil beast is anger; a wicked beast is lust; a wicked beast is envy; a wicked beast is vanity; wicked beasts are all the other passions, which not only at night but also by day boldly attack, rushing to snatch the soul as their prey. Why does the blessed Apostle Peter command: “Be sober-minded; be watchful. Your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour” (1 Peter 5:8); and why does Saint David pray: “Lest at any time the lion snatch away my soul, when there is no one to deliver or save” (Ps. 7:3).

25. What, then, are we to do in this situation?—What else but “dwell in the shelter of the God of heaven” (Ps. 90:1), and keep ourselves inwardly focused, without being distracted by the wanderings of the senses. For when the eye wanders here and there, the ear takes in corrupting rumors, the mouth utters unseemly words, and the mind indulges in inappropriate thoughts—then the soul wanders as if through desolate places and easily becomes prey to wild beasts.

26. Now poor Memnon has also suffered this fate, having been snared by the devil; I do not see his bloodstained garments, as the Patriarch Jacob once saw the garments of his son Joseph, but his very soul, slain by the sword of sin. For sin is the mother of death; the sin of our forefather Adam, who was immortal by grace, made him mortal; sin brought universal destruction upon the world through the flood; sin consumed Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities around them; and sin even now condemns everyone who commits it to eternal death. Let us therefore flee from it as from fire: for it is better to fall into fire, under the blows of the sword, or into the jaws of beasts, than into the hands of destructive passions. “Why, then, did our poor brother mentioned here fall?” “For no other reason than that he isolated himself from everyone.” “For the word of truth is not false when it declares ‘woe’ to such a one, because ‘when he falls,’ there will be ‘no one to raise him up' (Ecclesiastes 4:10); fearing this, I, in my humility, have not ceased to repeat to him, as to others, and I repeat it now: let no one remain alone with himself; let no one love to walk alone; let no one wander aimlessly here and there; let no one be alone with women, for from this, like fire, evil love is kindled. The obedient son heeds this, obeys, and is saved by the Lord; but the disobedient son is seized alive by the devil and delivered over to death. I consider myself guilty of the blood of this poor man, though I am innocent, because I did not remain silent but foretold the sword that was to come upon him; yet I weep and wail as if for a member of my own body.

27. But, beloved, I have something to reproach you for as well. What is it?—In the Acts of the Holy Apostles it is written: "It came to pass, about three hours after" Ananias had died and been buried, "that his wife," Sapphira, "not knowing what had happened" (5:7). She did not realize it—even though the event took place openly, and there were many people present—because order and the fear of God reigned there in all things, and everyone exercised prudent caution. But here among us, a few days earlier, I said something in secret; and immediately this word spread from here to Constantinople, and from there to Brussels. And I feel constrained, whether I speak or remain silent: when I speak, because things are revealed that ought not to be made public; and when I remain silent, I do not know how best to act without seeking the advice of others. And why are we so unrestrained in our speech? Why do we bring trouble upon ourselves before its time? This is not the mark of sincere disciples, but rather of hostile people. And I beg you, stop subjecting yourselves to such shame; but from now on, let us exercise self-control over our tongues, maintain propriety, fear God, and keep order in all things, so that, having lived according to God's will and pleased Him in every way, we may become heirs to eternal blessings.

320. They are occupied with their worldly affairs; but we are occupied with ours, which is above all

320. 1) They are occupied with their worldly affairs; but we are occupied with ours, which is above all else. – 2) Let us therefore remain faithful to our calling, fighting against everything opposed to it. – 3) To this end, let each one do his own work, and in his own time. [4, 118]

1. Some people take delight in and boast about various topics: soldiers speak of military affairs, sailors of maritime matters, farmers of agriculture, and those engaged in other crafts and arts speak of what pertains to them; and generally speaking, there is no one who does not take delight in the affairs of their own calling. But we find joy in stories that are not about such things: for our whole being is not carnal, but concerns the salvation of the soul, the pleasing of God, the departure from this world, and the settling there; and, as the Apostle says, "whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is commendable—if there is any excellence and if there is anything worthy of praise" (Phil. 4:8), these are the subjects of our conversations, as well as of our cares and concerns. And could there be anything more joyful or more blissful than this?—Everyone can see this from the outcome of both kinds of things; those things have both their beginning and their end within the bounds of this age; but ours have their beginning in another, higher world, and their end beyond its limits—infinite and eternal. For their very essence is virtue, which makes those who practice it gods: for true is the saying: "I said: 'You are gods, and all of you are sons of the Most High'" (Ps. 81: 6). Oh, what great mercy we have been granted! – "Let us rejoice in the Lord; let us shout for joy to God, our Savior; let us come before His presence with thanksgiving and shout to Him with psalms" (Ps. 94: 1, 2); "for He chose us from the beginning for salvation, through the sanctification of the Spirit and the faith of truth, in which He also called us," through our reception of the schema, "to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 2: 13, 14).

2. Let us therefore stand firm in the faith, embrace true obedience, and preserve our chastity unbroken. We have but one object of love—Christ the Bridegroom, "more beautiful in goodness than the sons of men"—and one inheritance—the kingdom of heaven, the blessings of the heavenly Jerusalem. May flesh and blood, wealth and glory, and all vanity be far removed from us. – However, as long as we are in the flesh, struggle is our lot: for there would be no virtue if there were no struggle. If we happen to be captivated by foreign thoughts, let us quickly call ourselves to sobriety, fearing above all sin in deed, as a deadly poison, and a step that leads us far away from God. Let us repel thoughts with thoughts, and counter desires with desires. And let us do this without laziness or complacency. The goal of the demon who fights against us is to plunge us into despondency and laxity through the relentlessness of the battle, so that we may give up resisting him. But if we remain steadfast in our struggle against the devil, resisting him so that we need not suffer because of him, we will undoubtedly triumph over him and receive the crown of victory prepared for us in heaven. For the brother of God says: “Blessed is the man who endures temptation; for when he has been tested, he will receive the crown of life, which God has promised to those who love Him” (James 1:12).

3. Therefore, rejoice in the Lord. – You who are engaged in various duties know that there is a great reward for you in them. You who are engaged in study, take care not to offend God by it. Is it time to work? Let us set to work. Is it time to study? Let us take up our lesson. But if your brother sets out to work while you take up your lesson, you are not walking in love but are alienating yourself from the brotherhood. Or do you not hear what the Apostle says: “If my brother is caused to stumble, I will never eat meat again, lest I cause my brother to stumble”? (1 Cor. 8: 13). And you not only cause your brother to stumble; but even when you are called, you do not appear, making excuses for yourself and not considering that, by acting this way, “you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of God’s righteous judgment” (Rom. 2: 5). But so that this does not happen, let us heed the Apostle, who says: “Let all things be done decently and in order” (1 Cor. 14: 40): first, deeds, and then teaching. Let us help one another, as befits the saints, and lay down our lives for one another as sincere brothers, so that God may be glorified in us, and we, acting for His glory, may become heirs of eternal life.

321. The final hour is approaching: let us not be negligent

321. 1) The final hour is drawing near: let us not be negligent. – 2) Let us seek God by keeping His commandments: for then there will be no other protection except virtue. – 3) Let us therefore remember the hour of death, and there put to death the members that are on earth: the flesh and all that is carnal are perishable; only virtue abides forever. – 4) A sign is given to distinguish true signs from apparent wonders. [4, 119]

4. When death—that penance common to all—undoubtedly lies before us, when on the one hand there is hope of attaining the Kingdom of Heaven, and on the other the fiery Gehenna looms; is it fitting for me to be idle in speaking, and for you to be idle in listening? By no means. On the contrary, this is precisely why we must always do both; and all the more so as we see that day drawing nearer. For the last day of every person draws nearer unceasingly, every hour and every minute, and “a certain dreadful expectation of judgment and the fervor of fire to consume those who wish to resist” (Heb. 10: 27), as the holy Apostle says. Let us not be lazy, then, and let us not allow a single day to pass in idleness and folly; but let us always be sober and watchful.

5. “Let us seek God,” as the Psalm says, “and our souls will live” (Ps. 68:33). How, then, do we seek God?—By keeping His commandments, as directed by the Beatitudes of the Gospel, that is, through humility, mourning, meekness, purity of heart, “peace and holiness” (Heb. 12: 14). When one who seeks God attains these, he finds Him—and having found Him, he remains fearless during the exodus, fears no demons, is not dismayed by the presence of angels, approaching them as his own, and joyfully departs to his Lord, having a good conscience as his faithful companion. But one who is not prepared in this way will fall into inescapable extremes, having no one to turn to and no one from whom to seek help. Here, for example, when someone falls into the hands of evil people, or into the waves of the sea, or into the calamity of an earthquake, or into some other extreme, they do not lose hope of being delivered from it; but there, all hope of salvation is taken away, and there is no one to deliver or help—neither an angel, nor a human, nor a father, nor a mother, nor a brother, nor a friend, absolutely no one; and the poor soul, in shattering terror and inconsolable heartbreak, departs from here, and there encounters that which no word, even figuratively, can convey the true reality of. For just as the blessings prepared by God for those who love Him are such, so too are the things contrary to that, prepared for the sons of rebellion—such that no eye has seen them, no ear has heard of them, and no heart has conceived them.

6. That is why I ask you to keep death ever in mind, and thereby “put to death the members that are on the earth” (Col. 3:5), and to root out sensuality from your soul. What do we gain from this love of the flesh, from which we derive no benefit whatsoever, but only painful torment? – Let us look, if you will, into the graves and experience the stench that is there. Such is all flesh: it begins with decay and ends with decay. And all human glory is like the flower of the field. Only virtue is indestructible and inalienable. By loving it, the saints pleased God, and for this reason their spirits are in heaven in glory, while their bodies serve as a refuge for us on earth, through signs, wonders, and miracles.

7. Since my words have touched upon signs, I will mention that signs still occur today, as we hear. And this is not surprising: for the grace of the Spirit, just as it worked then, so does it work now without ceasing. However, one should not indiscriminately believe everything spread by rumor; for it is written: “Do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are from God, for many false prophets have gone out into the world" (1 John 4:1). – And to many heretics and violators of God's commandments, both in ancient times and now, through appearances that are the work of God's providence, it has been and is permitted to perform wonders resembling signs. Therefore, one should not be carried away by such things, but must test whether they are true disciples of the Lord according to the signs that the Lord has given us. What, then, are these signs?—"By this," He says, "everyone will know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another" (John 13:35). Having been taught by these words, the Apostle later wrote: "If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am only a resounding gong or a clanging cymbal. And if I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. And if I give away all my possessions, and if I surrender my body to be burned, but have no love, I gain nothing" (1 Cor. 13:1–3). Do you see how exalted love is? How it is like a queen, standing above all the gifts of the Spirit, and can never fail; but those who perform signs sometimes fall away: for the Lord says in the Gospel, "Many will say to Me on that day, 'Lord, Lord! Did we not prophesy in Your name, and in Your name cast out demons, and in Your name perform many miracles?' And then I will declare to them, 'I never knew you; depart from Me, you who practice lawlessness'" (Matt. 7:22–23). How dreadful is such a response! And how disastrous is such a judgment! – Let us therefore strive to acquire love and its companions—faith and hope—rather than the gift of signs, so that, having lived well in their spirit, we may be recognized as true disciples of the Lord and inherit the Kingdom of Heaven.

322. Time is running out, death is approaching: why are we wasting our time in vain?

322. Time is running out, death is approaching: why are we fussing over nothing? – A rebuke of greed among monastics follows. [4, 120] Our days pass like hours, weeks like days, months like weeks, years like months. Thus time flies, driving everyone toward the last day of the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, on which "every thing is naked and laid bare before His eyes" (Heb. 4:13), as the Word of God says. Why then does a man fuss in vain? Why does a king put his trust in gold and his army? Why does a ruler boast of his possessions and pastures? Why does the rich man hope in his fleeting wealth? Why does the sensualist wallow in the mire of sin?—We must weep and mourn daily and, with all our strength, purify ourselves before the judgment of death comes, so that we may escape the wrath coming upon the sons of disobedience. "These people," to use the language of Scripture, "slander what they do not see, and what they do see—as though they were senseless animals—they are corrupted by. Woe to them, for they have gone the way of Cain, have rushed headlong into the deceit of Balaam's wages, and have perished in the rebellion of Korah" (Jude 10:1). I fear that this word, while condemning them, might also apply to you, "who think you are something" (Gal. 2:6). For while one, concerned about his father's inheritance, undertakes long journeys, another, desiring to increase his "income," worries about making a living, goes to great lengths, and exerts great effort; yet another, in order to acquire this or that, acts out of greed, not in a monastic manner—do they not deserve the same judgment as those? And those can still offer some, albeit weak, justification for their behavior, since they are responsible for their wives and children. But what excuse remains for you, who have crucified yourselves to the world and have all your treasure in the cross alone? Are you not worthy of the most severe torments for acting in this way? For it is written: "The mighty will be severely punished" (Wis. 6: 6); and: "The judgment is most severe for those in authority" (Wis. 6: 5); and again: "To whom much is given, much will be required" (Luke 12: 48). "O sons of men, how long will you be hard-hearted? Why do you love vanity and seek falsehood?" (Ps. 4: 3), inventing excuses to defend your passions? "Look upon the generations of old, and see: who ever trusted in the Lord and was put to shame? Or who ever remained in His fear and was forsaken? Or who ever called upon Him, and He despised him?" (Sirach 2:10). Was not Abraham the patriarch a stranger in a foreign land, by God's command? And yet he became the father of many nations. Did not Jacob the patriarch go down to Mesopotamia with nothing but a staff?—And yet he returned from there a wealthy man. Was not Joseph taken to Egypt to be sold? And yet he became as great as the king there. Did not the prophet Elijah, persecuted by Jezebel, flee without even a bag? Yet he was fed by ravens. Did not the blessed Apostles set out to preach with nothing and without weapons? Yet they conquered the entire world. Have we ourselves not suffered persecution and plundering in years past? Yet even in our case, you must acknowledge that God's promises are true. Where, then, does this evil come from? And what is this vanity? It seems we have forgotten God's blessings, just like ancient Israel, and are tempting God, as some of them did. But what is said about them?—"For forty years I was angry with that generation; I said, 'They are always going astray in their hearts; they have not known My ways.' So I swore in My wrath, 'They shall not enter My rest' (Ps. 94:10–11). See how the same might be said of us as well, because we prove ungrateful to our benefactor, not being content with what we have. Because of this, our feet find no rest here, and we wander to and fro; because of this, we have disputes and quarrels among ourselves, just as laypeople do; because of this, we prefer to live alone rather than with a brother, and even if we do live with a brother, it is only in pretense: for how, having the love of money as a companion, can anyone live with a brother in sincere unity? Not at all. Woe to such foolish people! I am not speaking of you, my brothers, nor of those who live godly lives here and there; but of those who live poorly and not according to the commandment given to them, whom I urge to finally begin to walk in the right way and become better, so that none of us may perish, but that we may all be saved together.

323. An elder of exemplary life has passed away. After praising him for his asceticism and endurance of the torments inflicted by the iconoclasts...—he gives the brothers a lesson—to use the remembrance of death to turn away from all worldly things and to stir up zeal for the pursuit of all virtues

323. 1) An elder of noble life has passed away. After praising him for his asceticism and endurance of the torments inflicted by the iconoclasts, – 2) he instructs the brethren—to use the remembrance of death to turn away from all worldly things and to stir up zeal for the acquisition of all virtues. – 3) He encourages them to do so by pointing out the good fruits of such conduct and the bad fruits of the opposite. – 4) He mentions that the brother who returned from Jerusalem has been sent back there to pray for us. [4, 121]

8. Although there are many edifying stories that move the soul to tenderness and contrition, none of them offers as much edification as the news of death. For death is a terrifying mystery to us, both when we hear of it and when we reflect upon it. Since a venerable elder has now passed away, it is necessary to say something—albeit briefly—for the edification of all. The very fact that he served the Lord in monastic life from his youth until his advanced old age is sufficient praise for the elder; furthermore, the fact that he was one of the courageous confessors, captured by the wicked Leo and severely tortured: his back and chest were lacerated by thirty lashes, his face was beaten with jabs and slaps, and two of his teeth were knocked out; after this, several years later, he was released from prison and set free. He then returned to his former way of life—namely, the life of a pillar hermit—and shut himself away in his cell, where he lived in great hardship and confinement until the end of his life, and peacefully gave up his spirit to the Lord. The wicked persecutor acted lawlessly in vain; but the valiant warrior ascended to heaven adorned with the crown of martyrdom.

9. And we, brothers, what shall we do, and what shall we think? How much longer will we live? —Is it much, or little?—And who knows what the coming day will bring?—But for now, let us take to heart the lesson taught by the elder's death. For what we have seen in him will soon befall us as well. For there is no one who has ever crossed the boundary of death set for him. Let us therefore never forget death, lest eternal death take us by surprise. Let us not love this present age, lest we come into enmity with God. For it is written: "Whoever wants to be a friend of the world becomes an enemy of God" (James 4:4). Or do you not know that love for this world prevents the soul from longing for the departure from the body? For just as Israel longed to be freed from Egyptian slavery and to enter the Promised Land, so too must we earnestly desire to be freed from the toil of corruption in this body, and to enter "behind the innermost curtain, where Jesus, our forerunner, has entered on our behalf" (Heb. 6: 19–20), that is, into the treasury of the blessings of the heavenly Jerusalem. – Let us therefore abhor the vanity of the world, acquire virtues in abundance, and enrich ourselves with divine treasures—prayers, tears, purification, enlightenment, and dispassion—which are the guides to eternal life. As for food and drink, clothing, and everything else necessary for the body, let us concern ourselves with them only to the extent necessary to live and work according to God's commandments.

10. If we spend our time in this way, every day will be a feast, every day a celebration. And even if countless sorrows befall us, nothing will be able to cast a shadow over our clear conscience. But if, on the contrary, we live in malice and envy, in cruelty and all manner of deceit, then, alas!—we will face death every day, and judgment and condemnation even before the final judgment. Then death will come like a roaring lion; and how will the poor soul endure its eternal misery? – For it is written: "It is time for judgment to begin at the house of God; and if it begins with us first, what will be the outcome for those who oppose the Gospel of God? And if the righteous are scarcely saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Peter 4:17–18). Let us therefore always be watchful and alert, always courageous and steadfast, "abounding in the work of the Lord at all times, knowing that our labor is not in vain before the Lord" (1 Cor. 15:58).

11. As for our brother Socrates, you know that he came from the East, having fulfilled his duty and apologizing for the delay. We wanted to keep him here as a skilled brother. But since it is written, “Blessed is the one who has offspring in Zion and relatives in Jerusalem,” we decided to send him back there, hoping to receive mercy through him. And we should rejoice that one of our brotherhood, in holy Zion, the mother of all churches, has been ordained a priest by the Most Holy Patriarch there. May the good God preserve both him and us, and “fulfill every good purpose of goodness and the work of faith with power, so that the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified” (2 Thess. 1:11–12).

324. When attacked by invisible enemies, let us take refuge in the One who is mighty to save us; and He will protect us

324. 1) When attacked by invisible enemies, let us turn to the One who is able to save us; and He will protect us. Let us only be steadfast in serving Him. – 2) Do not be surprised that evil thoughts and passions arise. This stems from Adam’s fall. Although we are renewed in Christ Jesus, if we are inattentive, the old nature rears its head again. – 3) Nevertheless, the saints of God, by God’s grace, have overcome all kinds of sinful rebellions. Let us imitate them. [4, 122]

12. “Be strong in the Lord and in the strength of His might; put on the full armor of God, so that you may be able to stand against the schemes of the devil” (Eph. 6:10–11); for he does not sleep, but always stands vigilant against us, and all the more persistently when he sees souls valiantly striving against him. So when he attacks us—and he attacks both day and night—let us stand against him with vigilance, turning to the One who is mighty to save us from the death of sin, with earnest prayer and warm tears, and the enemy will soon flee. For it is written in the Psalms: “Call upon Me in the day of your distress, and I will deliver you, and you shall glorify Me” (Ps. 49: 15). Has the enemy wounded us? But the Lord will heal us. Has he troubled us? But He who said to the sea, “Be still, be quiet... and there was a great calm” (Luke 4:39), will also calm the turbulent thoughts within us. – And how great is God’s benevolence! No sooner do we call upon Him than He—the Good One—is already near with mercy and generosity; He grants the prayer of the one who prays, dispels the cloud of sorrow, and fills the heart with light through good thoughts. – And is there anything He does not do for us?! Indeed, it could not be otherwise. For if He gave Himself up for us even unto death—a death on the cross—how could He not grant us everything thereafter? Therefore, let us remain steadfast in wholehearted service to Him; let us quickly rise from our occasional falls; and let us strive earnestly in the arena of asceticism, knowing that crowns await us at the end of our struggles. Let us make the greatest use of confession, for confession is a bridle against sin; let us preserve humility, for by it all the fiery arrows of the evil one are broken; let us guard the faith, for “without faith it is impossible to please God” (Heb. 11:6).

13. Perhaps some may wonder and be astonished: how is it that, despite our zealous efforts, we are still overcome by unwholesome thoughts?—But we suffer this because of the transgression in Adam. We fell in him, and our nature has become deeply afflicted by sensuality. But then, through the coming of Christ in the Incarnation, receiving strength in the bath of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit, it returns to its original state. Yet since, having fallen ill once, it has learned to be sick, it easily slips into sinful pleasure if we are not careful.

14. Nevertheless, the holy men strengthened themselves so much with the fear of God and love for God that they were not only content to stand firm in their own steadfastness, but also extended a helping hand to others—casting out demons and performing many other miracles. – Although we are far removed from their way of life, we will strive to imitate them to the best of our ability; and may our gracious God accept this small offering of ours, just as He accepts their great good deeds, and together with them, may He deign to grant us His kingdom.

325. Like ordinary travelers, we too—pilgrims on earth striving toward our heavenly homeland—must not become attached to anything here, must not burden ourselves with anything, and must strive directly toward our goal, inspired by the indescribable blessings that await us there and by the horrors that await us if we do not reach it.

325. Like ordinary travelers, we too—strangers on earth, striving toward our heavenly homeland—must not become attached to anything here, must not burden ourselves with anything, and must strive directly toward our goal, inspired by the indescribable blessings that await us there and by the horrors that await us if we do not reach it. [4, 123] Ordinary travelers should encourage one another and spur each other on to continue the journey, without veering to the right or to the left, but proceeding along the royal road; and not only that, but they should eat, drink, and sleep in moderation, so that by balancing their diet they may make the hardships of the journey as light as possible for themselves. – You can surely see for yourselves what this example implies—namely, that we, too, are travelers in this life, navigating its course filled with countless difficulties—and that we, too, must comfort and inspire one another in our endeavors, walk without straying, and be moderate in food, drinking, and sleep, so that, burdened by them, we do not become too lazy to continue our journey and do not return to the pleasures of this earthly life; for even ordinary travelers do not turn back or veer off to one side or the other, but keep to a single course, striving to reach the place designated for their rest. Oh, how beautiful is the place of our rest! And how blissful is our sojourn there! It is not temporary but eternal, and full not of perishable but of imperishable blessings—where there is joy, peace, and unceasing celebration. This is what the Lord says about this in the Gospel: “In My Father’s house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I am going to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and take you to Myself, so that where I am, there you may be also. And if I go, you will know, and you will know the way” (John 14:2–4). See what an ineffable and inconceivable promise this is! Who, then, will not rise up, who will not hasten, who will not long to reach those eternal dwellings? – The blessed David, longing for them, sang: “How lovely are Your dwellings, O Lord of Hosts! My soul longs and faints for the courts of the Lord” (Ps. 83: 2, 3). These are truly the longed-for abodes. Here, however, we are as if in exile; and our stay here is not long. And the whole of this present age, compared to the future, is like a single day. Why then should we be friends with the world? Why marvel at the present? Why turn our gaze—not merely to this or that thing, but to the sky, the earth, and the sea; to the sun, the moon, and the stars; and to all other visible things? For what will we leave behind in a short while—why cling in vain to such things?—“One thing I have asked,” says St. David, “of the Lord, that I will seek: ‘that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to visit His holy temple’” (Ps. 26:4), and whoever is deemed worthy to enter it is delivered from that heavy day of which one of the Prophets speaks: “Why do you call this day of the Lord? For it is darkness, not light” (Amos 5:18). But the blessed Apostle also called it a day of wrath, saying: “You are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of God’s righteous judgment, when He will render to each one according to his deeds” (Rom. 2:5–6). To give, by way of an example from our own experience, at least some semblance of the torment of that day, let us recall, if you will, a man who came here not long ago, who, having been possessed by a demon, was tormented by it in his soul and burned all over his body—how he cried out day and night, finding no comfort or relief in anything. Do you think such torment was easy for this man?—Certainly not. But it is but a dream compared to what lies ahead. How, then, shall we endure the latter—the unquenchable fire, the never-sleeping worm, and the countless other eternal torments? But by Your mercy, O Lord, through the prayers of Your Saints and of our blessed father, grant that we may be delivered from all of them and receive the blessings promised to the faithful.

326. Where is the refuge from the snares of the enemy? In turning away from all that is sinful, from wicked thoughts and desires

326. Where is refuge from the snares of the enemy? In turning away from all that is sinful, from wicked thoughts and desires. – And let us do so, inspired by the bliss of inner peace and the ruinous nature of passionate agitations. [4, 124] Fearing that we might fall into the hands of the Agarians, we fled from our former dwelling and now live here. But how much greater should our fear be of falling into the hands of invisible enemies? And how much farther, and to what safer place, must we flee from them? What, then, does this flight consist of?—In distancing ourselves from sin, with which the devil, like a sword, seeks in every way to slay the soul. —Let us therefore avoid it most diligently, even down to our thoughts; for sin begins with thoughts, then passes from thoughts to words, and from words to deeds. It is difficult not to be caught up in inappropriate thoughts: and you will not even notice when it happens. – But as soon as we notice that we are carried away by them, let us hasten to rid ourselves of them as quickly as possible, through prayers, tears, heartfelt anguish, and the fear of God; for if we allow them to linger within us, they can cause the death of the soul—and this at every moment. For a war rages within us ceaselessly—a silent one; and we cannot avoid defeat except through unrelenting and constant resistance to the sin of the mind with help from above. Do we not see how the waves raged in the sea during these three days? So too is the turmoil of the passions; only it is far more disastrous, since the shipwreck of the soul is more ruinous. But God is the cause of the turmoil of the sea, for He sends winds upon the sea for our benefit at the proper time; whereas we ourselves are the cause of the turmoil of the soul. It is better for us, as if in some harbor, to remain at peace and not open the doors to our passions; for as soon as we open them, the spirits of malice will blow in like stormy winds, and a great turmoil will arise within us; and we will not be saved unless we hasten to quell this turmoil. What need is there for us to allow ourselves to fall into such turmoil, to be subjected to such agitation, and to live in fear, as if we might suffer shipwreck? – Is it not better to enjoy peace and tranquil stillness, without wilfully bringing upon ourselves a misfortune that could easily be avoided? – Do we not reproach as foolish those who, during a storm at sea, leave the harbor and expose themselves to the danger of being drowned by the waves? But we must consider ourselves incomparably more foolish when we plunge ourselves into the turmoil of the passions. For does not evil lust, breathing into our hearts, stir up a terrible turmoil within us? Does it not toss us this way and that, as if completely drowning us and plunging us to the bottom? Does not envy, in the same way, drive us out of our right minds, wounding both heart and body? Does not unbelief also darken the soul, making it sluggish and listless? And does not every other passion drive a person out of his natural state and make him utterly foolish? Let us therefore avoid these destructive passions, lest the same be said of us that God said of those before the Flood: “My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for he is flesh” (Gen. 6:3). God called them “flesh” not because they had physical bodies—for in this sense, God Himself is “the Word became flesh” (John 1:14)—but because of their carnal reasoning, mired in unseemly lusts and lacking both the strength and the inclination to ascend to God. – But we, having consecrated ourselves to God, according to what is written: “Our citizenship is in heaven” (Phil. 3: 20), let us hear moreover: “These are not of the world, just as I am not of the world” (John 17: 14). Can there be anything more blessed—not only in regard to the age to come, but also to the present one—than to be free from unwholesome desires, not to be ruled by the flesh, but to be led by the Spirit? This is bliss, this is sweetness, this is well-being; this is an angelic way of life. Whoever is like this, outwardly lives as everyone else in the world does, but in spirit is more worthy than those who wear a diadem; he is the ruler of the world, adorned with heavenly distinctions, always ready for the journey and unafraid of death. Let us strive to become like this ourselves, to the best of our ability; for this is possible if we desire it with all our hearts. And having become such, we will enjoy a joyful state of mind throughout our lives here, no matter what external sorrows we may encounter; and in the age to come, we will inherit the kingdom of heaven with all the saints.

327. He urges unquestioning obedience: proving through examples how beneficial obedience is and how harmful disobedience is

327. He urges unquestioning obedience: 1) by demonstrating through examples how beneficial obedience is and how harmful disobedience is; – 2) by likening the brotherhood to a body in which each member attends to its own function—and the body lives because of this; and by concluding from this: “Do the same,” and all will be well. [4, 125]

15. Fearing the condemnation of the one who buried his talent in the ground—to whom the Lord said, “You wicked and lazy servant... you ought to have entrusted my silver to the moneylenders, and when I returned, I would have received my own with interest”—I am compelled to give you these brief instructions; and it is up to you, as good stewards, to put these words into practice—which you do, by the grace of God, through your good obedience. – However, there are some among you who not only fail to increase what has been entrusted to them, but are even on the verge of squandering what is their own. – Who might these be? – They are those who refuse to obey, and offer only one excuse: “Forgive me.” – What are you saying, brother? You promised obedience even unto death, and now you are refusing to do what you are capable of by God’s grace. But when you say, “I was afraid to cross the sea,” this stems from unbelief; there, “you feared where there is no fear” (Ps. 13:5). For if you had been faithful to obedience, you would not only have sailed across the sea on a ship, but, having cast off your clothes, you would have swum across the water naked, imitating that ever-memorable monk who, relying on his father’s command, was not afraid to cross a raging river, and having crossed it, emerged unscathed, to the amazement of those who witnessed it. Obedience even tames wild beasts. Proof of this is , who, at the command of his elder, bound Gehenna. Obedience works miracles even among the dead: as confirmed by Akakios, who cried out from his tomb. But why speak of either of these? The Only-Begotten Son of God Himself, “being obedient even unto death, even death on a cross,” accomplished the work of salvation for the world. Such are the wondrous deeds and fruits of obedience. Do you now wish to learn of the ruinous consequences of disobedience?—Remember Adam, who, by disobeying

God and tasting the forbidden fruit, brought death into the world; remember Saul, who, having disobeyed the holy Samuel, lost not only his kingdom but also his life in the hills of Gelboe; and remember that man of God who, having been deceived by a false prophet, fell into disobedience to the commandment and was therefore thrown to the lions. And Peter, the blessed Apostle, having out of reverence refused to allow the Lord to wash his feet—did he not hear: “If I do not wash you, you have no part with Me” (John 13:8)? Likewise, in the life of St. Euthymius, did not the herdsman who refused to obey—for reasons he deemed blessed—immediately become possessed by a demon, that “foam” of his mother-in-law? Such is the judgment upon those who refuse the obedience given to them, upon those who are rebellious: “For every rebellious disciple will stir up strife,” and “the Lord will send an unmerciful angel against him” (Prov. 17:11).

16. Generally speaking, “we are many parts of one body in Christ, and individually members of one another” (Rom. 12:5): one serves as an eye, another as an ear; one as a nose, another as a tongue; one as a hand, and yet another as a foot. If all the members do not each perform their own function, but begin to quarrel—the eye demanding to hear, the ear to smell, the nose to speak, the tongue to touch, the hand to walk—will not the whole body be thrown into disorder and fall apart? If this is so, then let each one fulfill his or her duty, and let each use the gift received from God for the common good, keeping in mind that our fate is in God’s hands. It is not because someone sails the sea that his end is there, nor because another remains on dry land that death awaits him there; but just as our good God, from the foundation of the world, has determined for each person the time, place, and manner of death, so will the end of each person come. I have set forth this not so much for those of whom I speak—for I have already accepted them for the sake of their humility—but for all who hear, that we may take it to heart carefully, and that whatever vows we have made before God and His chosen angels, we may fulfill them diligently, without wavering, even if what is commanded presents some mortal danger. This is what the Fathers teach, and above all, the Great Basil. Living in this way, we will not fall prey to sinful death, but will live in righteousness and be deemed worthy of the Kingdom of Heaven.

328. According to the economy of the Incarnation, death is a joy for Christians if they have prepared themselves to meet it

328. 1) According to the Incarnate plan of God, death is a joy for Christians if they have prepared themselves to meet it. – 2) Let us therefore prepare ourselves as we ought. [4, 126]

17. I have been a little ill of late: my heart faltered, and it seemed to me that I would depart from you. – How much longer will I, a humble man, have to live? You see that my old age has already come, and my peers have passed away; and in due course, my end awaits me. – So what? Should we grieve over this? Let it not be so. Let those who live according to the flesh grieve, if they wish, as they are separated from their wives, children, servants, possessions, and all the pleasures of this life by which they are captivated. But for us, for whom the world has been crucified and who are surrounded by the cross alone—by virtue of our renunciation of the world and our commitment to obedience—the mystery of death should be not a cause for sorrow but a source of joy. And what am I saying—“for us”? All Christians must regard their passing with joy. Before the coming in the flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, death—reigning over our race through Adam’s transgression—was dreadful and abhorrent even to the saints. But after Christ, the Life of all, “tasted death for everyone” (Heb. 2: 9), He opened and “renewed” for us “a living and new way through the curtain—that is, His flesh” (Heb. 10: 20), as it is written: “Death has been swallowed up in victory” (1 Cor. 15: 54), —when we die, we are no longer cast down into the kingdom of Hades, but are raised up into the Kingdom of Heaven, and are not “laid in darkness and the shadow of death” (Ps. 87: 7), but ascend into the inaccessible light and into the unceasing life which God has promised to those who love Him. Thus, death itself is no longer something to be feared, but rather something to be joyfully embraced—provided, of course, that we are prepared for it through the preparation of our hearts. – For without this preparation, it is still a terrifying prospect if, at the hour of our departure, we must lament the years that have passed and seek more days of life to perform good deeds. This is dreadful and disastrous, because one caught in such a state will be troubled in heart and fall into utter ruin, passing not to the rewards for good deeds but to the retribution for sins. Oh, what a dreadful sight he will encounter!

18. Lest the same fate befall us, I remind you and implore you: let us keep ourselves always ready for a blessed departure, regarding every day as the last day of our lives, as St. Anthony teaches us? For if we resolve to act in this way, we will never be dissolute, careless, lazy, idle, argumentative, rebellious, unrestrained, or ridiculous; but on the contrary, we will be submissive, self-controlled, contrite, well-disposed, meek, peaceful, sincere, blameless, and ready for every good deed, following the example of the saints, who, having lived in this way, were deemed worthy to receive the heavenly blessings promised. – I have set forth all this, seeking to strengthen not only you but also myself in what is good, so that, having lived our lives in such preparation for our departure, at the time of our departure we may not be troubled by fear and trembling, but may cry out with David in joy: ‘Return, O my soul, to your rest, for the Lord has dealt bountifully with you’; and: ‘I will be pleasing before the Lord in the land of the living’ (Ps. 114:6, 8). May this be granted to all of us.

329. The mortification of one’s own will is the greatest feat, Christ-like and apostolic, though not everyone now perceives its loftiness

329. The subjugation of one’s own will is the greatest feat, one that imitates Christ and the Apostles, although not everyone today recognizes its greatness. [4, 128] The exhortation to grieve compels those lacking in virtue and, at the same time, teaches them to heal their weaknesses. For this very sorrow over the lack of virtue imperceptibly disposes the soul to seek self-improvement. “For godly sorrow,” as the Apostle says, “produces a repentance that leads to salvation” (2 Cor. 7:10). But let us consider: what is it that causes us sorrow? Is it that unwholesome thoughts rise up within us and, like a hostile army, besiege our soul?—But it is written: “Though an army encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war rise up against me, in Him I will trust” (Ps. 26:3). Or is it that the yoke of obedience is heavy?—But again it is written: “It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth” (Lamentations 3:27); and further: “My yoke is easy, and My burden is light” (Matthew 11:30). Or is it that this life under the yoke of obedience does not allow one to have anything of one’s own? But here is the word of the Apostle: “We have left everything and followed You; what then will be ours?” (Matt. 19:27).—And they were given a promise as awesome as it is glorious. – And have we not, like them, left everything and followed in the Lord’s footsteps? Did not one leave his parents? And another, his brothers and sisters? One—his wife and children; another—his houses and fields? And all of them—that which is most precious of all—their own will and their own desires—which is the most difficult thing for people to accomplish. For name for me a strict fast or a vigil, or sleeping on the bare ground, or abstaining from a bath, or the desolation of a place, or any other of our devotions to God—all these things happen of the doer’s own free will. What happens of one’s own free will, though difficult in itself, is easily accomplished when one desires it; but what is done by setting aside one’s own will, though easy in and of itself, is accomplished with great difficulty. The holy fathers called this act “the shedding of blood”; and it is characteristic of no one else but the one who is truly a disciple and can say with the Apostle: “It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me” (Gal. 2: 20). For insofar as he does not live by his own will, in that same measure, through the abbot’s will, he lives for God, and imitates Him who said: “I have come down from heaven not to do my own will, but the will of the Father who sent me” (John 11: 38). Do you see the loftiness of our way of life? Is it not Christ-like? Is it not apostolic? Or am I speaking to you in this way merely to flatter you? No; the truth itself testifies to the sincerity of my words. If people do not heap praise upon those who live this way, their glory is in no way diminished; for God does not see as man sees. But there is God’s judgment, and there is human judgment; and how many who are considered insignificant in this world will, on the day of reckoning, prove to be the most glorious of all, as it is written: “Many who are first will be last, and the last will be first” (Matt. 19: 30).—Therefore, rejoice and tremble: the former because of God’s gift, and the latter because of the fickleness of the mind, for we do not remain the same forever. Why “let us encourage one another in love and good deeds” (Heb. 10: 24), without being burdened by the suppression of our own will—which is the whole point of the message—and without growing sluggish in the performance of our duties, but rather being inspired by zeal, supporting one another, bearing one another’s burdens, as brothers, as those of one mind, as fellow laborers. By striving in this way day after day and conducting your lives in this manner, you will, as I well know, undoubtedly receive the unfading crown of glory.

330. In the invisible spiritual battle, a fearless and spirited struggle against the enemy, waged with hope, always prevails: enemies flee from such people

330. 1) In the invisible spiritual battle, a fearless and spirited struggle against the enemy, waged with hope, always prevails: enemies flee from such people. – 2) In the battle against heresy, one should not associate with heretics or mention them by name: which is what I have forbidden. [4, 129]

1. Although I am weak in both word and deed, it is my duty to comfort you and inspire you spiritually, to the best of my ability. For if those fighting a war against visible enemies need encouragement from their comrades-in-arms, how much more do you, who are waging war against invisible enemies, need to be anointed with words of exhortation and uplifted in spirit; since your battle is not for a single day, but for your entire life; and moreover, if you are victorious, you will receive an indescribable crown of incorruption, but if you are defeated, an eternal burden of immeasurable shame?—But may we not suffer this or be put to shame in our hope! On the contrary, let us not doubt that, with God’s help, we will triumph over the devil through constant vigilance and unceasing resistance to the enemy. You know that even ordinary soldiers, when they enter battle, are in a state of extreme excitement; their countenance changes, and they seem entirely different from before; and at that moment they no longer think of their wife, children, parents, or brothers—or anyone at all—but their mind and heart, like their whole body, are wholly focused on the struggle. In the same way, we too, in our inner being, must be so disposed, not fearing our adversaries in the least, but rushing upon them with zeal and fervor of spirit, as good soldiers of Christ. When our enemies see us this way, they withdraw, not daring to attack; but when they see that our courage is waning and our strength and vigilance are weakening, then they draw their bows and wound our souls with arrows—that is, with unwholesome thoughts. – But even in such a case, we must not despair; rather, having recognized our lapse, we must repent, and, having gathered our strength once more, enter into unceasing struggle. – So it is always.

2. But now a different kind of heretical battle is raging throughout the universe. And if you wish, lift up the eyes of your mind and you will see the entire world filled with those wounded in this battle. For the serpent takes under his power not only unbelieving heretics, not only fornicators and adulterers and others who commit such debauchery; but also those who are indifferent to all such people and associate with them: for true is the saying that “he who touches pitch will be defiled, and he who associates with the proud will be crushed” (Sir. 13:1). For this reason, although I am reproached for it, I have forbidden an Orthodox Christian to commemorate in the sacred commemorations and at the Divine Liturgy a certain person who pretended to be Orthodox yet never ceased to have communion with heretics and heresy. For if he, even at the hour of death, had confessed his sin and partaken of the Holy Mysteries, then an Orthodox Christian could offer a prayer for him. But since he departed while in communion with heresy, how can such a person be admitted into Orthodox communion?—The Holy Apostle says: “The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a participation in the Body of Christ? Since there is one bread, we, though many, are one body; for we all partake of the one bread” (1 Cor. 10:16–17). Judging by this, partaking of heretical bread and the cup makes the partaker belong to a faction opposed to the Orthodox, and all such partakers together form one body, alien to Christ.—“For what fellowship has righteousness with lawlessness? Or what communion has light with darkness? Or what portion does a believer share with an unbeliever? Or what fellowship has the Church of God with idols?” (2 Cor. 6:14–16), as the same Apostle exclaims elsewhere. – But for such people we ought to weep; for those among them who are still alive, we ought to pray that they may be delivered from the devil’s snares; and for ourselves, we ought to give thanks, for “God has chosen us for salvation through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth” (2 Thess. 2: 13), so that we may serve Him in the Orthodox faith until this very confession of faith, for which— if we fulfill it blamelessly and without fault—may He deign to grant us His heavenly kingdom.

331. Other matters have their time; but the work of salvation must always be attended to

331. 1) Other matters have their time; but the work of salvation must always be attended to. – 2) Let us not delay, seeing how death reaps everyone, and reflecting in this regard on the wise and foolish virgins. – 3) Let us therefore arise and be zealous to prepare everything for the coming of the Bridegroom. [4, 130]

3. For other matters, specific times are set: a time for sowing and a time for reaping; a time for peace and a time for war; a time for trade and a time for abstaining from trade. But for the work of spiritual salvation, every time is suitable, and every day is favorable, if we so desire. – Let us therefore be ever eager to do good, of good disposition, and filled with youthful zeal to put God’s words into practice: “Not, for those who hear the law are righteous before God, but those who do the law will be justified” (Rom. 2: 13). – Therefore, whether an invisible battle lies ahead, we must fight cheerfully and, with God’s help, drive away the demonic thoughts that rise up against us, lest, by lingering within us, they cause us spiritual death; or is the spiritual harvest at hand? Then we must reap diligently, gathering sufficient provisions for eternal life into our spiritual granaries, so that we may not die there eternally from hunger. There is always a time for prayer, a time for tears, a time for purification from our failings, and a time for the rapture of the Kingdom of Heaven.

4. Why are we hesitating? Why are we delaying? Why do we put off day after day the work of our own reform? Is not "the form of this world passing away?" (1 Cor. 7:31). Are not countless people departing from us every day? Do not the coffins that are ceaselessly opened celebrate a victory over our poor nature?—Does not the earth do the same, receiving our bodies, which are of the same substance as it?—And will we remain here until the end?—Do we not see how many of our brethren have already departed? Where are our blessed fathers? Where are our brothers, both spiritual and earthly? Where are our friends and companions in labor, in manual work, and in psalm-singing? And how forgetful we are!—When the death of a brother or father occurs, we immediately come to our senses, are overcome with grief, and vow to walk righteously henceforth; but when a little time has passed since then, we forget both our grief and our good intentions. — But the saints of God did not act this way: throughout their lives they meditated on death, died daily, crucified themselves daily to the world, and turned daily by their own free will toward God; and now they live there a blessed and everlasting life. — Does the parable of the ten virgins not frighten you? — "Behold, the Bridegroom is coming; go out to meet him." The wise ones met Him, "and went in with Him to the wedding feast." But the foolish ones, for lack of good deeds, were late, and when they cried out: "Lord, Lord, open to us," they heard in reply: "Truly I tell you, I do not know you." And so they remained outside. To this the Lord added: "Watch, therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour" of His coming (Matt. 25:6, 10–13).

5. Therefore, we must watch; we must awaken our souls from sleep, be sober-minded, repent, keep ourselves blameless and pure, and walk in the light, lest death overtake us suddenly and the doors of mercy be shut before us—and there will be no one to open them or help us. Let us therefore hasten to prepare works pleasing to God for our departure: you who are lazy, arise to work; you who are disobedient, begin to obey; you who are haughty, humble yourself; you who are hard-hearted, soften your heart; you who are unrepentant, be contrite; you who do not confess, begin to confess; you who are idle, begin to work; all of you, set everything right—and strive for good deeds. I will add one more thing: you who love women, be moderate; do not associate frequently with women, and do not spend time with them for too long; for from this the fire of sin is kindled, as we hear in Scripture, which says: "If anyone binds fire in his bosom, will not his clothes be burned? Or who can walk on burning coals without burning his feet? So is the man who goes in to another man's wife" (Prov. 6:27–29). But even a virgin is a married woman if she has entered monastic life, just as one who has taken monastic vows—whose Bridegroom is the Lord of Glory. — I say this to those who have scattered here and there and live as they please, inventing excuses for their sins, and forgetting that the Lord commanded us to remove even the eye that causes temptation (Matt. 5:29), let alone anything else. — And this is what I have to say to you: "We who are strong ought to bear with the failings of the weak" (Rom. 15:1), and to set an example of virtue for those who are not yet well-ordered. You are already such by the grace of Christ; but continue to be so—and you will be saved in our Lord Jesus Christ.

332. Pointing out that the goals and pursuits of monastic life are higher than those of all other states and ranks, and—that it draws everyone to itself despite its hardships—he invites those who have been deemed worthy of it to rejoice and give thanks to the Lord, and to strive to be true monks

332. 1) Pointing out that the goals and pursuits of monastic life are superior to all other states and ranks, and—2) that it draws everyone to itself despite its hardships—3) he invites us to rejoice and give thanks to the Lord for those who have been deemed worthy of it, and to strive to be true monks. [4, 131]

6. Let us give glory to God that we have been deemed worthy to "choose the better part," and, as it were, to "sit at Jesus' feet and listen to His Word" (Luke 10:39). Others worry and talk about many things—that is, about wives and children, about possessions and money; but we have but one concern: how to please the Lord. Others wage war for the earthly Caesar and are compelled, in every way—even to the shedding of blood—to grovel before Caesar's commands; but our warfare is voluntary, in which we freely fulfill the commandments of Christ, the King of kings, in the hope of receiving the endless Kingdom of Heaven. Others undertake long and arduous journeys for the sake of trifling and fleeting gains; but our task is, whether by day or by night, to hasten only to the temple of God, so that we may offer there praise to God's majesty, and thereby acquire not perishable gold, but spiritual treasures that cannot be stolen and are eternal.

7. Although we sometimes encounter something sad and distressing—whether due to external circumstances or our inner state—when this happens for the sake of the Word of God and our hope, we bear it well, for we know how to rejoice in our sorrows and not feel constrained in our trials. Such is our life that it draws those of understanding to itself through its very sorrows. Who does not love their parents and feel affection for them? Yet, out of love for God, leaving them behind, the sons of men flock here. What bond is closer than marriage, when, according to the Lord's word, the two become one flesh? But even such people are cut through by the sword of the Gospel and sent here. Here the ruler lays aside his dominion; the wealthy man, wise in his ways, renounces his wealth; the poor man forgets his poverty; the orphan ceases to be an orphan; and I will add: the king lays aside his purple robe and is counted among the others as their equal. For our brotherhood is the body of Christ, in which all are equal; and our common dwelling is the harbor of salvation, equally salvific for all. – Everything here is different, not as in the world. Thus, when death occurs, there is no weeping or wailing here, as among those who love life, but the burial of the departed takes place in silence: for here neither the wife wails, nor the children cry out, nor do the relatives compose lamentations, recalling this or that; but the departure takes place with joy, and the burial with good hope; though there are tears, born of spiritual love for the departed: in which there is nothing inappropriate; for even the Lord wept at Lazarus's tomb, in accordance with the nature of our being (John 11:35). Has there ever been any other life more blessed than this one?—Has there ever been any other way of life that has brought people closer to God? Why, then, is it fitting for us to proclaim, in the words of David: "Here the Lord has commanded the blessing—life forevermore" (Ps. 132: 3).

8. Let us therefore rejoice and share in one another's joy; let us give thanks and give thanks unceasingly; let us love our all-good God and love Him boundlessly, for He has called us out of darkness into light, from humiliation to glory, from obscurity to distinction. Each of you knows from whom you came into the world, and from where you set out for here, with whom you subsequently entered into fellowship, whom you call brothers, and with whom you dwell together. And these blessings are but the prelude to future promises: so that, if we faithfully accomplish the task set before us, striving in every way to endure hardships and bear the fruits of obedience, according to the order and rule at work within us, then in the end we will obtain what no eye has seen, what no ear has heard, and what has not entered the human heart—what God has prepared for those who love Him (1 Cor. 2:9). May we all come to receive this.

333. Those who frequently contemplate death strengthen the remembrance of death; the remembrance of death and its implications instills the fear of God; the fear of God purifies the heart of passions

333. 1) Those who frequently contemplate death strengthen the remembrance of death; the remembrance of death and its implications instills the fear of God; the fear of God purifies the heart of passions. – 2) Let us walk this path toward blissful dispassion. [4, 132]

9. News of deaths is becoming more frequent—both from afar and nearby—and especially news of the deaths of our spiritual brothers and fathers. Among others, Brother Gregory has left us; his life was praiseworthy, and his passing was blessed, for he died in exile for Christ's sake. – So what? – Surely we too must depart from here, young and old, elders and youths alike. For death is the same penance for all, and some depart from this life before others, while others follow afterward. How, then, can we not think about death and what we are to encounter when the soul leaves the body? How will we endure the presence of the angels if we have not clothed ourselves in the armor of light? – How will we walk that path if we do not bring with us the provisions for eternal life? How shall we pass by the prince of this world, of whom the Lord said, "The prince of this world is coming, and he has nothing in Me" (John 14:30), if we are not free from the passions that enslave us? "Blessed is that servant," says the Lord, "whom his master, upon coming, finds doing so. 'Amen, I say to you, he will set him over all his possessions.'" Behold, a voice from above! "But if that wicked servant says in his heart, 'My master is delaying his coming,' and begins to beat his fellow servants, and to eat and drink with drunkards: the master of that servant will come on a day when he does not expect him, and at an hour he does not know, and will cut him in pieces and assign him a place with the unfaithful; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 24:46–51). Does this parable not terrify us? Does this threat not wear down our bodies? For this is no fable and no empty talk; on the contrary, words fall far short of accurately expressing what is to come: for that weeping is not like this weeping, and the gnashing of teeth there is not like the gnashing here; but the difference between them is as great as that between dreams and reality; furthermore, the fire there will not be quenched, whereas the fire here is quenched, and that worm does not die, whereas the worm here dies. But who thinks about this and reflects on it? Who sees this and hears it? For it is possible to see and yet not see, and to hear and yet not hear, because of the hardening of the soul and the lust of the heart. – Who has the weeping that is pleasing to the Lord, and daily purifies himself from the defilements that come from there and from here, without putting off this purification until tomorrow? “For,” it is said, “each day has enough trouble of its own” (Matt. 6:34). Who, by setting their desire upon God, rejects every earthly passion, to the point that they can cry out with David: “My soul clings to You; Your right hand upholds me” (Ps. 62:9). O blessed dispassion! This is how we must be, brothers! This is how the Word calls us to prepare ourselves! Let us be fervent in spirit, clothed in the armor of faith, winged by hope, and fully prepared for the journey.

10. Therefore, I ask and implore you: as those who die daily, let us discipline ourselves in all that is proper, to the best of our ability, knowing that discipline is by nature a virtue, yet it brings sorrow, whereas self-indulgent sin casts us down into the abyss. Let us shed the purifying tears born of a contrite heart and humble reflection. Let us make the holy angels our friends through a life of self-denial, so that they, too, may kindly lift us up to the Lord at the hour of our departure. – I say this not as one who has done good, but as one who desires to do so together with you; as one who ought to speak rather than remain silent; and as one who loves you with the love of God, so that all of us, by doing good, may become heirs of eternal life.

334. He rebukes them for ceasing to lay bare their thoughts

334. 1) He rebukes them for having ceased to lay bare their thoughts. – 2) Then he cites examples of God’s terrible punishments upon the unrepentant, as an incentive to confession. [4, 133]

11. I am grieved by you these days, with unbearable sorrow. For you have ceased your regular confession, which is the greatest and most salvific act in our lives. – And if I saw that you had become better and more perfect, I would rejoice, as if relieved of my burdens; for healing the infirmities of others requires no small amount of effort. But since I see the opposite of that in you, I can guess what the reason is. For tell me, where do your audacities come from, and the disorder they cause? Is it not because you do not confess, but hide your pernicious thoughts? For the beginning and root of our sins is an improper thought, which, when revealed, is driven away by God’s mercy, but when concealed, gradually turns into the works of darkness. From this come spiritual death, from this come divisions among one another, and from this come self-justifying words born of ignorance and delusion.

12. But, O man! Animals, which lack reason, know of their own accord, as we see, which foods are harmful to them and avoid them; should we not expect this all the more from a human being, who, from the very moment of baptism, has been enriched with all knowledge of what is good?! – Have you not heard what Scripture says, that God “did not spare the world of old, but preserved Noah, a preacher of righteousness, bringing the flood upon the world of the ungodly” (2 Peter 2:5)? Have you not read that the Lord “condemned the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah to destruction by burning them up, setting them as an example to those who would live in ungodliness?” (2 Peter 2:6). Have you not often heard the Apostle cry out: “Do not be deceived: neither the sexually immoral, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor men who practice homosexuality, nor men who engage in sexual immorality, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6:9–10). How, then, can you, having heard this, say that you do not know what is evil?—This is pretense and evasiveness.—Are you not afraid of the threat? Do you not tremble before Him before whom all creation trembles?—Let no one, then, shrink from confession!

335. Having said that he loves his brothers and is certain that they love him as well, he invites them to give thanks to God for such a bond, and to be patient when he must severely rebuke them

335. 1) Having said that he loves his brothers and is certain that they love him as well, he invites them to give thanks to God for such a union and to bear with him when he must severely rebuke them. – 2) Then he urges them to willingly endure the hardships and sorrows involved in working toward salvation: for there is no other way; Moreover, because of the great promises associated with this, it will not greatly diminish the joy proper to the saints. – 3) Let us therefore faithfully walk in God’s way; and if we happen to stumble, let us hasten to rise again. [4, 134]

13. The word of Divine Scripture is: “I love those who love Me, and those who seek Me will find favor” (Prov. 8:17). Elsewhere, it also points out the sign of love, saying: “He who loves disciplines diligently” (Prov. 13:25). Since I have been humbly appointed to preside over you, I was compelled in my previous exhortation to rebuke and chide you—not so that you might take offense—but I dare to say to you in the words of the Apostle, “so that you may know the love I have in abundance for you” (2 Cor. 2: 4), grieving with you in your sorrow and rejoicing with you in your joy. For whom else should I look to? Or for whom else should I grieve and rejoice, if not for you? You are mine—my brothers, my children, my fathers, my friends, my relatives, my beloved, my longed-for ones, my joy, my crown, and everything else that can express the sincerity of my fellowship with you. I therefore bear witness to my conviction that you feel the same way toward me, and that you are not attached to your parents, your brothers, your kin, your homeland, or anything else that is visible, but only to God, and through God to my humility. And thanks be to God in the Holy Spirit, who has thus united us, that we may love and be loved in return, and be “one body and one Spirit,” since “we have been called to the one hope of our calling” (Eph. 4:4). Let us therefore rejoice and share in one another’s joy; and even when it happens that I must sometimes speak to you in rebuke, let us not turn away from one another, but—as is fitting—out of love and for the common good, let us bear the discipline patiently. For it is written: “My son, do not despise the Lord’s discipline, nor lose heart when He rebukes you; for the Lord disciplines the one He loves, and He chastises every son whom He accepts” (Prov. 3:11–12). To this the Apostle adds: “If you endure discipline, God is treating you as sons; for what son is there whom a father does not discipline? But if you are without discipline—of which all have become partakers—then you are adulterers, and not sons” (Heb. 12:7–8).

14. Furthermore, wealth, power, and other things that people desire are not obtained for free, but require great toil and effort: can we really suppose that attaining God and divine rewards would be an easy and comfortable endeavor, rather than one filled with immeasurable toil and effort? And would not such an assumption be evidence of extreme naivety and short-sightedness?—Why do we hear that “we must enter the Kingdom of God through many tribulations” (Acts 14:22), and that “the gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to eternal life” (Matt. 7:14)? And for what reason is this?—Because we ourselves did not wish to remain in the carefree life and boundless joy given to us at the beginning in Paradise; but, through our own folly, we chose instead to fall into this present life of many passions and sorrows, and we cannot return there again except by passing through the school of afflictions, following the example of our Lord Jesus Christ. “Who, for the joy set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame” (Heb. 12: 2). However, since afflictions for God’s sake are made easier for us by the hope of eternal blessings, they are usually not too grievous; which is why the present time is called a feast for the saints. Saint David testifies to this, saying, “Rejoice in the Lord, you righteous” (Ps. 32:1), pointing to everlasting joy. Likewise, the blessed Apostle confirms: “Rejoice in the Lord always; again I will say, rejoice” (Phil. 4:4). And this was said to those who grieved and wept, who labored and remained in the struggle, and who suffered in many ways; for sorrow for God’s sake is a cause for joy for the virtuous.

15. Let us, then, as if celebrating a feast every day, bear our sorrows for God’s sake with a cheerful heart, without being weakened by the devil’s wiles and attacks. And if we should ever fall asleep or be led astray by something improper—whether in thought, word, or deed, let us hasten to rise up, return to our former good disposition, and once again begin to serve the Lord with warm zeal, knowing that even from kings, the warrior who fights and resists receives honor, not the one who flees the battlefield. In the same way, as we remain in this invisible battle until our last breath, we will be deemed worthy of eternal rewards by God’s grace, and we will receive the kingdom of heaven in Christ Jesus, our Lord.
