St. Ephrem was born in the early years of the fourth century in the vicinity of Nisibis, or in the city itself, to parents of modest means. His parents raised him in the fear of God; but the years of his youth led him into certain moral missteps; which subsequently began to cloud his faith in God’s Providence, and he began to think that everything in our lives happens by chance. God’s Providence healed him of these mental dispositions through a very poignant lesson. He was accused of stealing sheep and imprisoned. At the same time, another man was imprisoned with him—and there they found a third. All of them had been wrongfully convicted in this instance. After spending seven days in this confinement, St. Ephrem heard a voice in a dream telling him that, although he was not at fault in this case, he was suffering for his past sins; likewise, his fellow prisoners were suffering for their own past sins. Upon waking, he recounted the dream to the other two—and all of them, reflecting on the past, realized that they had indeed previously committed similar misdeeds—and were acquitted. The judge acquitted St. Ephrem, just as had been foretold to him again in a dream. This circumstance, having instilled in St. Ephrem’s heart complete faith in the Eye of Divine Providence watching over us, so deeply moved him that he immediately left the world and withdrew to the nearby mountains to join the hermits, where he became a disciple of St. James, who later became the great Saint of Nyssa. Under his guidance, St. Ephrem practiced acts of piety, studied the Word of God, and, under the influence of both, was completely transformed in character. Instead of the angry and doubt-ridden young man, St. Ephrem now appears as a humble and contrite hermit, mourning his sins day and night and completely devoted to the ways of Providence. St. James, aware of his disciple’s great virtues, made use of his abilities in the administration of the Church once he became a bishop, entrusting him with the preaching of the Word of God, the instruction of children at the school; he took him along to the First Ecumenical Council at Nicaea, and upon his return made him a partner in his decisions and prayers for the city’s deliverance from the invasion of Shapur the Persian (337). After the death of St. James (338), St. Ephrem decided to visit his mother’s homeland, the city of Amida, which was also located in Mesopotamia, and stayed with her for some time. From there, he was drawn to Edessa by a desire to venerate the local holy sites: for there was preserved the reply of Christ the Savior to Abgar; from there came the fame of the Image of Christ Not Made by Hands; there rested the relics of the Apostle Thaddeus, who had enlightened the king, the city, and the entire country with the faith; and monastic life flourished in the vicinity of the city. Upon arriving in this city, St. Ephrem remained there. Having no means of support, he took a job as a laborer for the owner of a bathhouse. This work did not suit his disposition or his goals; but he awaited guidance from above, which was not long in coming. He spent the time he had free from prayer and his assigned tasks conversing with pagans. During one such conversation, an elder from the desert happened to overhear him; judging by the high caliber of these discussions, the elder rightly concluded that St. Ephrem was in the wrong place. Therefore, after waiting until the conversation had ended, he spoke with him and, upon learning of his ascetic aspirations, suggested that he join one of the nearby monasteries, to which St. Ephrem immediately agreed. Having withdrawn to the mountains, he found there everything his soul had sought. There were many great ascetics there, whose entire lives were spent in prayer, psalm-singing, and the glorification of God; they had no other refuge but caves; they did not eat ordinary food, but subsisted solely on plants. Seeing all this, St. Ephrem wholeheartedly embraced this way of life for himself, adding to his ascetic and prayerful labors only the tireless study of the Word of God. His soul soon found kinship with these lovers of the desert; but he became especially close friends with the ascetic Julian, who shared his contrite spirit and equally loved the study of Divine Scripture. By devoting himself ceaselessly to the study of the Word of God, St. Ephrem drew from it tenderness and wisdom. But the treasures of his knowledge remained, for the most part, hidden from others, out of humility, and perhaps because they were still the fruit of his own intellectual efforts rather than a special gift of teaching—a gift that does not like to remain hidden but demands the generous sharing of instruction with all. Soon this gift was bestowed, as was revealed to the same discerning elder who had led St. Ephrem out of the city, in a vision of a radiant angel who placed a certain mysterious book into St. Ephrem’s mouth. From that time on, his soul, saturated with the living water of the knowledge of God and divine things, began to pour forth an unstoppable stream of moving exhortations. Warmed by a living spirit and flowing from the fullness of a heart sanctified by God’s grace, his words were filled with spiritual anointing. The most persuasive exhortations, touching self-reproaches and admonitions to others, wise rules and counsel miraculously sprang from his lips; and often, in a sudden, unexpected surge, his reverent thoughts soared to God to confess the glory of His boundless love or to ask Him for forgiveness of sins. Biblical examples and sayings, experiences from the life of an ascetic, parables and comparisons from the natural world—all were readily at hand and arose spontaneously in his simple, unpretentious conversations. But it was not only moral, spiritual, and ascetic lessons that constituted the subject matter of his writings. He also devoted considerable effort to interpreting Holy Scripture, and even more to expounding dogma—particularly from those perspectives that were contradicted by both contemporary and earlier heretics. His entire life was devoted to such works—and was already drawing to a close—when he felt the desire to see the Egyptian ascetics and to visit the great Archpastor of Cappadocia, Basil the Great. Taking with him a disciple who could speak Greek, he reached the Mediterranean Sea and boarded a ship. Prayer and trust in God saved him and his companions from drowning. Mount Nitria welcomed him as a cherished guest and brought him comfort in meeting the great Paisius, with whom he spent six days in conversation, as well as John Kolov and other elders. In addition to Nitria, he visited other places inhabited by ascetics, and everywhere he left a warm memory of himself as a man enlightened by God; he himself took away from there instructive lessons about the lives and practices of both the departed and still-living Egyptian ascetics. On his return journey from Egypt, St. Ephrem decided to visit Caesarea in Cappadocia to see St. Basil the Great. Their first meeting took place in the church. St. Ephrem entered the church just as St. Basil the Great was delivering a sermon to the congregation, and he was convinced of the latter’s highly grace-filled state. St. Basil the Great, too, had been informed by the Holy Spirit about St. Ephrem and invited him to join him in the sanctuary. After a brief exchange of greetings there, their conversation continued at home, covering various topics. The Holy Father of Caesarea wished to ordain St. Ephrem to the office of presbyter; but the humble monk from Edessa refused under any circumstances to accept this office, and St. Basil could only ordain him as a deacon, while ordaining his disciple as a presbyter. Later, St. Basil sent two of his disciples to Edessa with an invitation for St. Ephrem to assume the episcopal see; but St. Ephrem, feigning madness, declined this honor, humbly considering himself unworthy of it. Upon returning to his hermitage in Edessa, St. Ephrem wished to spend the rest of his life in solitude. But God’s Providence once again called him to serve his neighbors. The city’s inhabitants were suffering from famine at that time. With powerful words, St. Ephrem persuaded the wealthy to alleviate the suffering of the poor, taking upon himself the task of administering their donations. This was his final act of service to the Church. Upon returning from the city to the mountains, he soon fell ill, and, having written his will, passed away peacefully in 372 or 373. He died in the arms of his disciples and the residents of Edessa who loved him; in the presence of a large gathering of people, clergy, and hermits, his body was laid to rest; but some time later, his incorrupt remains were transferred to the church.

The Greek collection Dobrotolyubie contains nothing by St. Ephrem. We consider it an injustice to deprive our collection of treasures of his teachings. Therefore, we have decided to select the most edifying of his works under the following headings:

1. Exhortation to Repentance and the Pursuit of Salvation.
2. Lessons on Repentance.
3. A General Outline of the Life of Those Who Have Devoted Themselves to Pleasing God and Working Out Their Own Salvation.
4. On Virtues and Passions.
5. On the struggle against the eight principal passions.
6. General Lessons on the Ascetic Life.

7. Added to all this, as a summary of all the lessons, is the 50th word: advice for ascetics, supplemented by similar advice from the 55th word. (Excerpts are taken from the edition of the Writings of St. Ephrem, in the series of the Works of the Holy Fathers. Quotations from each section are listed after its table of contents.)

St. Ephrem's Instructions for Ascetics

1. An Exhortation to Repentance and the Pursuit of Salvation

1. Come, beloved, let us engage in the purchase while the day of purchase still lasts. Come, let us acquire eternal life; let us buy the salvation of our souls. Let us embrace this beautiful thought; let us desire the Kingdom and paradise.

2. Strive in this "eleventh hour"; hurry, lest you be left outside the closed doors. Evening is near, and the Reward-Giver is coming with great glory to reward each one according to his deeds. Let us repent, brothers, while there is still time.

3. Listen to what the Lord says: "There is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents" (Luke 15:10). Why do you give in to negligence, sinner? Why do you sink into despair? If there is joy in heaven when you repent, then what is there for you to fear? The angels rejoice, yet you give in to negligence? The archangel proclaims repentance—and you are afraid? The indivisible, worshiped Trinity calls you, yet you sigh!

4. Let us weep a little here, so that we may not weep there, suffering eternally. Christ's coming is sudden, like a terrifying flash of lightning. At that hour, each will receive according to his deeds; each will reap what he has sown. We will all appear before Christ's judgment seat with nothing hidden—and each will give an account to the Judge for himself. At that hour, no one will be able to help anyone else. Each will stand with fear and trembling, waiting to hear God's verdict.

5. Why do we neglect Holy Scripture and the words of Christ? Hear what the Lord says: "The word that I have spoken will judge you on the last day" (John 12:48). What is this Word? His Holy Gospel and the other Holy Scriptures of the Holy Prophets and Apostles. Let us not, then, neglect what is written. "For heaven and earth will pass away, but the words of Christ will never pass away" (Matt. 24:35).

6. Come, then, beloved, let us immerse ourselves in the sea of God's bounties before that dreadful day arrives. God Himself calls us: "Come to Me, all of you... and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). He invites everyone; for He desires everyone to be saved. Let no one hesitate; for He says, "I will never cast out anyone who comes to Me" (John 6:37). —And who is the one who comes to Him? It is the one who listens to His Word and keeps His commandments. Let us therefore listen and obey Him; for "it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:31).

7. Repent, sinner, looking with boldness upon the boundless love of Christ, who said, "I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Matthew 9:13). Repent while there is still time, lest you be put to shame at the dreadful judgment, where thousands upon thousands of angels and saints will stand in awe—the books of deeds will be opened, and what is hidden will be revealed—the Judge is mighty, the judgment is relentless—deeds will be laid bare—and the river of fire. Reflect on all this, and hurry to save yourself.

8. What are you waiting for? What is on your mind? Will anyone else answer for you? Do you not know that each person will give an account to God for himself—each will reap what he has sown—each will bear his own burden? Cast off this burden of sin while there is still time.

9. Once and for all, you renounced Satan and all his works, and in the presence of many witnesses you entered into a covenant with Christ. Remember this and do not forget it. For know that at that very moment the angels recorded your words—your vows and your renunciation—and they keep them in heaven until the dreadful Day of Judgment. On the Day of Judgment, they will bring your record and the words of your mouth before the dreadful judgment seat. And then you will hear: "By your own words I will condemn you, you wicked servant" (Luke 19:22). Be merciful to yourself, then, and spare your soul.

10. Look at others—how they strive, how they seek salvation, how much effort they put into every good deed, how they guard themselves against all that is evil, how they have come to love the narrow and constricted path—they fast, keep vigil, endure suffering, and weep, —their lips always sing and praise the Bridegroom, their eyes always behold His beauty, and their souls rejoice.

11. Think and see: behold, the Bridegroom is already drawing near. — He is coming to crown those who have striven righteously and have loved the narrow and constricted path; He is coming to show mercy to the merciful—to make the impoverished blessed and to satisfy those who have hungered and thirsted for His sake; “He is coming to bring to light the hidden things of darkness and to reveal the counsels of the heart” (1 Cor. 4:5)—and “to render to each one according to his deeds” (Rom. 2:6).

12. Finally, a cry will suddenly ring out: “Behold, the Bridegroom!” (Matt. 25:6). Behold the long-awaited joy, the praise of the righteous, the Sun of Righteousness! Behold “the Bridegroom—go out to meet Him”!

13. Then those whose lamps are burning brightly and who are clothed in white will go out to meet Him with joy and boldness, rejoicing and hoping that their lamps will not go out. But what will happen to you? Noticing that your lamp is going out, in terror and sorrow, you will turn to the first ones with a plea—to give you some oil—and you will hear: “Go to those who are selling and buy some” (Matt. 25:9).

14. You will go—and find nowhere to buy it; for the purchase of life is already over. Then, in utter confusion, weeping and lamenting, you will say to yourself: “I will go and knock on the door of Christ’s mercy. Perhaps the merciful Lord will open them for me?”—You go and knock; but the Bridegroom answers you from within: “Amen, I say to you: I do not know you” (–12). Depart from Me, you who practice lawlessness. You have not shown mercy, and you will not be shown mercy. You have indulged your flesh and defiled your garments with impurity; how then do you expect to come up here and defile My Kingdom? You have carried out the devil’s will, while rejecting Mine; you have no part with Me. “Depart from Me into the eternal fire” (Matt. 25:41).

15. Hearing this, you will stand there in shame. — At the same time, a voice of joy and gladness will reach your ears; you will recognize the voice of each of your friends, and you will then sigh bitterly, saying: “Woe is me, the wretched one! What glory have I lost, and from what fellowship have I been excluded because of my evil and wicked deeds!” — But truly, God’s judgment is just; truly, I justly endure such deprivation. They lived in self-restraint, while I pursued every kind of pleasure; — they sang psalms, while I sang shameful songs; they prayed, while I lay about idly or went out to play; they wept, but I laughed. — That is why they now rejoice, but I lament; they are merry, but I weep; they will reign with Christ for all eternity, but I will be cast into the eternal fire with the Antichrist. Woe is me, wretched man!

16. You will say these and similar things then, tormented, and you will derive no benefit from them; for there is no benefit there, not even in repentance. — Let us, then, finally take care of the salvation of the soul: for this is “the one thing needed” (Luke 10:41).

17. The body also requires care, but not much; as for the soul, however, care must be constant; for the soul is above all else. You consist of soul and body; so give the soul spiritual nourishment, and the body physical nourishment. Do not let the soul die, but nourish it with the Word of God, psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, the reading of soul-saving Scriptures, fasting, vigil, prayers, tears, hope, and thoughts of future blessings. All these things and the like are food and life for the soul.

18. Throughout the Scriptures, only those who walk the narrow path are blessed, while those who have taken the broad and spacious path are everywhere foretold to face woe. Let us therefore forsake the broad path that leads to destruction and take the narrow one, so that, having labored a little here, we may reign for all eternity. Let us labor, always keeping before our eyes the One who is to come to judge the living and the dead, and constantly keeping in mind eternal life, the endless kingdom, rejoicing with the angels, and dwelling with Christ.

19. Do not take delight in the pleasures of this life. Let a psalm always be on your lips; for the very utterance of God’s name puts demons to flight. Even as you set your hand to work, let your tongue sing a psalm, and your mind pray. The Lord Himself urges everyone here to prepare themselves for the life to come. So let us do just that; and if we sin by stumbling, let us heal that with tears while there is still time for repentance. The time for repentance is short; but the Kingdom of Heaven has no end.

20. We praise the saints and desire their crowns for ourselves, yet we do not wish to imitate their deeds. Or do you think they received their crowns as a gift, without toil or sorrow? Would you like to hear what kind of rest the saints had in this life? “They were beaten... they went about in sheepskins and goatskins... they were destitute, afflicted, and mistreated...” and so on (Heb. 11:35–38). Do you want to reign with them forever?—Then follow in their footsteps.

21. Our fathers, like luminaries, illuminated the whole earth, having lived upon it amid thorns and thistles, among heretics and the ungodly, like precious stones and costly pearls. Because of their noble and pure lives, even their very enemies became their imitators. And who has not been moved to contrition upon seeing their humility? Here they labored, and there they rejoice; for God was glorified in them, and people were edified by them.

22. The course of our own lives, however, having abandoned the straight paths, follows rapids and rough terrain. We see no one who, for God's sake, has completely forsaken his possessions and, for the sake of eternal life, has entirely renounced the world. There is no one who is meek, humble, or silent. No one refrains from insulting others; no one endures slander; but all are prone to anger, love to argue, are lazy and irritable, and care about fine clothes; all are vain and glory-seeking, and all are self-centered.

23. We hear that God Himself—the Word—was nailed to the tree and put to death for our sins—and we laugh, giving in to distraction. The sun, unable to bear the Lord's insult, turned its brightness into darkness; yet we refuse to emerge from the darkness of our sinfulness. The veil of the Temple, having committed no sin whatsoever, was torn of its own accord; yet we do not want our hearts to be torn apart by remorse for our sins. Let us therefore repent at last, brothers, so that we may appease God for our sins.

24. I fear that that day may overtake us suddenly, and that we, finding ourselves naked, poor, and unworthy, may be cast out. For this very thing happened to those who lived in the days of Noah: "They were eating, drinking, marrying, giving in marriage, buying, selling, until the flood came and destroyed them all" (Luke 17:27–28).

25. Whoever wishes to be saved must be zealous for salvation, and whoever desires to enter the Kingdom must not be negligent. Whoever wishes to escape the fire of Gehenna must strive lawfully; whoever does not wish to be cast to the never-sleeping worm must be sober. Whoever desires to enter the wedding hall and rejoice, let him prepare a brightly burning lamp and oil in a vessel. Whoever expects to be invited to that wedding, let him acquire for himself bright clothing.

26. The King's city is full of joy and gladness, full of light and delight, and to those who dwell in it, along with eternal life, it bestows every kind of comfort. Whoever wishes to live in the same city as the King, let him hasten his journey; for the day is drawing to a close, and no one knows what lies ahead on the path. Just as a traveler, though he knows the road is long, lies down to sleep until evening, and then, upon waking, sees that the day has already drawn to a close, and no sooner has he begun his journey than suddenly a cloud, hail, thunder, lightning, and calamities from all sides strike, and he is unable either to reach his lodgings for the night or to return to his former place: so too will we suffer the same if we delay our repentance. We are "sojourners and strangers" (Ps. 38: 13). Let us therefore strive to enter our city and our homeland in time.

27. We, brothers, are spiritual merchants—seeking the priceless pearl, which is Christ our Savior—the treasure that cannot be stolen. Let us not be lazy in seeking to acquire this pearl. Blessed— —three times blessed is the one who has striven to acquire it; but utterly pitiful and poor is the one who has grown weary—both of acquiring our common Creator and of being acquired by Him.

28. Do you not know that we are branches of the true Vine, which is the Lord? Take care, then, that none of us may prove barren. The Father of Truth, tending His vineyard, lovingly cares for those who bear fruit, so that they may bear even more fruit; but those who do not bear fruit, He prunes and casts out of the vineyard to be burned with fire. Be careful, then, lest, if you prove to be unfruitful, you be pruned and cast into the fire.

29. We, too, are the good seed sown by the Creator of heaven and earth, the Lord of the House—Christ. Behold, the time of harvest has already come, and the sickles are in the hands of the reapers: they await only the Lord's signal. Take care, then, lest we turn out to be weeds, bound into sheaves and cast into the fire to burn forever (Matt. 13:30).

30. Do you not know that the King of kings has invited us to a wedding feast in His palace? Why, then, do we give in to negligence and make no effort to obtain for ourselves bright garments, clearly burning lamps, and oil in our vessels? How can you fail to realize that no one enters there naked? And if anyone persists in entering without wedding garments, do you not know what will happen to him? By the King's command, his hands and feet will be bound, and he will be cast into outer darkness, where there will be "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 22:13). I fear that carnal passions might cast us—who are dressed only on the outside—out of the wedding hall.

31. What father is so compassionate? What father is so merciful? What father loves as much as our Lord, who shows love to us, His servants? He provides for all, stores up everything in abundance, heals the wounds of our souls, and is long-suffering, even when we forsake Him, desiring that all may become heirs to His Kingdom; He forgives the sinner's sins, stirring him to zeal, and quickly heeds the weak, lest he lose heart. He could compel us by force to do what is good, but He does not wish this, lest our free will be deprived of His praise. Shall we then grow weary of pleasing Him, when He loves and has mercy on us so much? He has redeemed and enlightened the eyes of our minds; He has granted us knowledge of Himself and allowed us to taste His sweetness, so that we might seek Him with all our hearts. Blessed is the one who has tasted His love; through this, he has prepared himself to taste it unceasingly.

32. Who would not love such a Lord? Who would not confess and worship His goodness? What excuse will we have on the day of judgment if we turn away? Or what will we say to Him? That we did not hear, or did not know, or were not taught? But His message has gone out to the whole earth. What was He supposed to do for us that He did not do? Did He not descend for us from immeasurable heights, from the blessed bosom of the Father? Did He not, though invisible, become visible for our sake? Did He—the immortal Fire—not become incarnate for our sake? Did He, the immortal One, not die for us, so that we might be brought to life? Was He not buried, so that we might be raised with Him? He has delivered us from the enemy, binding him and giving us the strength to attack him. When did we call upon Him, and He not hear us? When did we knock at the door, and He not open it to us? And even if He delayed at times, it was only to increase our reward. Considering all this, who will remain in negligence and carelessness, thereby offending such a Lord?

33. Consider this, brother! Those brothers who were here yesterday and spoke with us are no longer with us today; they have been called to their Lord and ours, so that each of them may present his account. Do you see the difference between “yesterday” and “today”? Just as “yesterday” has passed, like the morning's bloom, so too will “today” pass, like the evening's shadow. Examine your own purchase, then: is it pleasing to God? Our days flee like a jest. Blessed is the one who, day by day, reaps a great profit from his purchase and gathers it into eternal life. But you, beloved, why are you negligent? Why are you slothful? Why do you revel in despondency (idleness) as if it were wine?

34. Imagine two travelers, each on his way home, who met one another on the road as evening fell; they both stopped at the inn they had reached, and when morning came, they parted ways; each of them knows what awaits him at home—wealth or poverty, peace or sorrow. The same happens to us in this life; for this life is like an inn, from which, as we depart for our own place, we part ways, knowing what lies ahead. For it is no secret to anyone what he has sent ahead to heaven—for example, a tearful prayer, or frequent vigils, or contrite psalm-singing, or self-restraint with humility, or renunciation of earthly things, or sincere love and devotion to Christ. If you have offered these things, then take heart; for you are departing into rest.

35. You have been given time for repentance, yet you neglect it. Will you say to death, “Wait, let me repent”? Come to your senses, beloved, come to your senses. When the final hour closes in on you like a net, you will begin to cry out in terror: “Alas! My days have slipped away in distraction. I wasted my time on frivolous thoughts!” But what good will it do to think this way at the hour of death, when you are no longer permitted to remain in this world? Now, rather, ponder these words with your mind, and order your life according to their power.

36. Who will not weep, who will not mourn, who will not be filled with dread at the fact that the Lord of the universe—both Himself and through His servants, the Prophets and Apostles—preaches and cries out, yet no one listens? “The wedding feast is ready,” He cries out, “My bride has been slain” (Matt. 22:4). The Bridegroom sits in the wedding hall with glory and splendor, and joyfully receives those who come; the door is open, and the servants show their zeal. “While the door is still open, hurry to enter; otherwise, you will remain outside, and there will be no one to let you in.” – And there is no one who understands; no one makes an effort; laziness and the cares of this world, like chains, have bound our minds. We copy the Divine Scriptures correctly, and we read them correctly, yet we do not wish to obey them correctly; for we are unwilling to fulfill what is commanded in them.

37. Just as in the middle of the night, when the human race is deep in sleep, there is sometimes suddenly a great noise from heaven, along with terrible thunder and frightening lightning accompanied by an earthquake, and those who are sleeping are suddenly seized with terror; so at that hour, like the swiftest lightning that suddenly terrifies the whole earth, a trumpet will sound fearfully from heaven, awakening the sleepers and raising from sleep those who have been dead since the beginning of time: these heavens and “the heavenly powers will be shaken” (Matt. 24:29), and the whole earth, like water in the sea, will be shaken before the face of His glory; for a terrible fire will go before His face, purifying the earth of the iniquities that defile it; Hell will open its eternal gates, death will be abolished, and the decayed dust of human nature, hearing the sound of the trumpet, will come to life. Then the righteous will rejoice and the pious will be glad; the perfect ascetics will be comforted for the toil of their struggle; The Martyrs, Apostles, and Prophets will be crowned. Blessed is he who is deemed worthy at that hour “to be caught up in the clouds with glory” to meet the immortal Bridegroom (1 Thess. 4:17). Just as each one has spread his wings here, so there he will soar to the heights; just as each one has purified his mind here, so there he will behold His glory; and to the extent that each one has loved Him, to that extent he will be filled with His love there.

38. I recalled that hour and shuddered; I thought of that dreadful judgment and was filled with terror; I thought of the joys of paradise, and, rising, I gave myself over to weeping and wept until I no longer had the strength to weep any longer; for I had spent my days in idleness and distraction, and lived out my years in impure thoughts—and did not realize how they had flown by, nor did I feel how they had passed; my days have dwindled, yet my transgressions have multiplied. Alas! What shall I do at that hour, when my acquaintances surround me—those who, seeing me in this guise of piety, flattered me, while inwardly I was full of iniquity and impurity and had forgotten the Lord who searches hearts and minds. – There is true shame there, and woe to those who will be put to shame there. – By Your bounties I implore You, O Lover of Mankind and Good One, do not place me on the left side with the goats that grieve You so deeply; do not say to me: ‘I do not know you,’ but in Your goodness grant me unceasing tears; grant my heart contrition and humility, and purify it, that it may become a temple of Your grace.

39. I implore your unity of mind, my beloved brothers; strive to please God while there is still time; weep before Him day and night in your prayers and psalm-singing, so that He may deliver us from that endless weeping, and from the gnashing of teeth, and from the fire of Gehenna, and from the worm that never sleeps, and that He may fill us with joy in His Kingdom, in eternal life, from which sorrow, sickness, and sighing—where there is always joy, gladness, and delight, and a feast filled with spiritual delicacies, which God has prepared for those who love Him. Blessed is the one who is deemed worthy of it; and woe to the one who is deprived of it.

40. “The rich man spoke, and all fell silent, and his words rose up to the clouds” (Sir. 13:28). And God speaks to us in Holy Scripture, yet we do not wish to be silent and listen; on the contrary, while one speaks, another slumbers, and yet another’s thoughts wander elsewhere. But what does Scripture say? “He who turns his ear away from the laws of the Most High has defiled his own prayer” (Prov. 28:9).

41. Strive for eternal life, to which you are called, before many witnesses, having made your good confession: “For yet a very little while, and He who is coming will come and will not delay” (Heb. 10:37).

42. Fear the Lord with all your strength, and do not imitate the deeds of the wicked; for their fire will not be quenched, and their worm will not die (Mark 9:44).

43. Do not trust the deceiver who instills deceptive thoughts in you, saying, “You are still young; you have many years left to live; therefore, rejoice now and do not grieve your soul—in your old age you must repent.” – Are you really so foolish, brother, that you do not know the devil will deceive you in this? If you do not repent in your youth and in the prime of your strength, when you are able to endure every hardship and perform feats of courage, will you not, when you grow old, use the weakness of old age as an excuse? – And if you are taken from here while still in your youth, what will you do then? Therefore, abandon the enemy’s path and heed the voice of the true Lord, Who said: “Watch therefore and pray, for you know neither the day nor the hour” (Matt. 25:13).

44. It will come, it will come, and that dreadful hour will not be long in coming, in which, when we are tormented, we will have no excuse. For what will we be able to answer the Lord? What else was there left for Him to do for us that He did not do?—Did we not see God—the Word—humbling Himself in the form of a servant, so that we too might become humble? Did we not see His incomprehensible Face spitten upon, so that we, too, when insulted, might not become embittered? Or did we not see how His holy back was subjected to scourging, so that we, too, might meekly bear the yoke of obedience? Or did we not see how His Face was struck, so that we, when humiliated, might not fly into a rage? Or have we not heard Him say, “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart” (Matt. 11:29), so that we too might become gentle and humble, and not envy one another, nor gnaw at one another, nor devour one another? What excuse, then, will we give Him?

45. I know that God has shown mercy to many who have repented; but most of them sinned out of ignorance. I know that God has forgiven many; but they had many intercessors before Him on their behalf. – I read what is written about Korah and Dathan, and I am horrified to see how God punished them for Moses' sake. I reflect on what is written about Miriam, his sister, how she was covered with leprosy for a single word spoken to Moses—and I shudder. If such a punishment befell a holy person, what torment will there be for the eternal God? Cain, who killed his brother, is subjected to such a long-lasting punishment; what, then, will become of those who have offended God? The judgment during the Flood was severe, and I fear I might suffer the same fate as those who perished then. God was angered by the construction of the pillar, which could not be completed—what, then, will He do for my own fall? I have repented, but I do not know if I have appeased God. I implore the saints as well; but perhaps their prayers will not be accepted, for I hear Ezekiel saying that “neither Noah, nor Job, nor Daniel” will succeed in what they ask for (Ezek. 14:18).

46. He who descended from the Father's bosom and became for us the way of salvation, the Lord, with His divine voice, inspires us to repentance, saying, “I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance” (Matt. 9:13). – If I were to say this, you might not listen to me. But if the Lord Himself says this, why do you disregard it, without caring for your own life? If you recognize within yourself that there is a wound of thoughts and deeds in your inner being, why do you not care for your hidden wounds? Are you afraid of the physician?! But He is full of goodness and mercy. He came for you from the bosom of the Father. He became incarnate for you, so that you might approach Him without fear; He became man for you, to heal your grievous wounds. – And He Himself calls you to Himself with great love and all goodness.

47. The door of repentance is open; so strive, O sinner, to enter before it is shut. It will not wait for you if the time of its closing comes and finds you lingering in indifference. Why have you come to hate your own life, wretched one?—What is greater than your soul, O man? Yet you, O sinner, have neglected it. You do not know, beloved, at what hour the heavenly Physician will command the door of His healing to be shut. Come forward, I beg you; strive to be healed. He wishes to gladden the heavenly host with your repentance. The sun has already reached the evening hour, and it delays only for your sake, so that you may reach the sanctuary.

48. How long will you endure your impure enemy, shamelessly carrying out his will? He wants to cast you into the fire. That is the aim of his efforts! This is his gift to those who love him! He is always at war with all people, striking them with evil and impure desires, and he, who is impure himself, drives those who have submitted to him back into despair, hardens their hearts, and dries up their tears so that the sinner may not come to repentance. Turn away from him in every way, O man, harboring hatred and loathing for what is dear to him.

49. Let us begin; let us pray while there is still time. Here, while we are in this life, we can always appease God. It is not difficult for us to obtain forgiveness while it is still time for us to knock on the door of His mercy. Let us shed tears while there is still time for them to be accepted, so that, having passed into the age to come, we may not weep in vain; for there, tears count for nothing.

50. Why do we neglect our salvation? Why do we not desire to be healed while there is still time? For the sake of a few tears shed at this time and for the sake of repentance, God forgives all sins. Weep a little here, so that you may not weep there for all eternity in utter darkness. Be repentant here, so that you may not be cast into the unquenchable fire there.

51. Many saints and righteous people have turned away from this world and its deeds of their own free will and out of a firm hope in God's commandments, convinced that they will enjoy God's blessings in the paradise of sweetness. Having come to love Christ, they preferred Him to all that is perishable; therefore, they rejoice daily in God, are enlightened in Christ, and rejoice unceasingly in the Holy Spirit. The Holy Trinity rejoices over them, the Angels and Archangels rejoice over them, and the paradise of sweetness rejoices over them.

52. Others, however, have become mired in the transitory and have become almost like senseless beings. – What are you doing, O man, living such a sinful life? God created you with reason: yet you make yourself like a speechless creature. Come to your senses, at least a little, and pull yourself together. – The Most High God came down from heaven for your sake, to lift you up from earth to heaven. You are called to the wedding of the heavenly Bridegroom: why, then, are you so careless? Why do you delay? Tell me, how will you go to the wedding without proper wedding attire? And if you enter without it, you will immediately hear: “Friend, how did you come in here without wedding clothes?” (Matt. 22:12). Bind him and cast him into the fiery furnace. Do you not fear this, nor tremble at the fact that the time is near when the Bridegroom will appear in His glory?—Do you not know that everything is already ready, and the heavenly trumpet awaits the signal?—And what will you do at that hour if you do not prepare for it as you ought?

53. At the hour of death, a great fear awaits all sinners. The hour of parting brings joy to all the saints, all the righteous, and all the ascetics; but that same hour plunges the negligent and the weak into sorrow, reminding them of their indifference and carelessness during their past life. Then remorse torments the heart of a person who has hitherto shown no concern for his own salvation. The anguish of this remorse surpasses even the fear of death and separation. — In contrast, the righteous, the saints, and the ascetics rejoice at the hour of death and separation, seeing before their eyes the great labor of their asceticism: their vigils, prayers, fasts, tears, lying on the bare ground, and sackcloth; their souls exult, for after separation from the body they look forward to entering into rest. But the sight of death is terrifying to sinners and to weak people who do not care about living a pure life in this vain world. And the hour of separation is a source of great sorrow for the sinful person; he is not permitted to say anything in his own defense; the command regarding that hour is given with severity.

54. The hour of parting does not sadden the one who has been freed from all earthly things; but it saddens the death of the lustful; it saddens the sinner; it saddens the slothful one, who was too lazy to do what pleases God; it saddens the avaricious one, who has bound his soul with worldly cares; it grieves the rich man, because it involuntarily separates him from his wealth; it grieves the lover of the world, because it separates him from the world. All such people grieve at the hour of death, because they are bound by worldly cares. But what is there for a soul, free from the world and detached from its cares, to sigh over and grieve about? She desired freedom, sought it, and attained it—and remained so always, courageously walking in God's way, readily doing what is pleasing to God. — And you, if you cling to God with all your soul, will never fear the hour of death; rather, death and separation from the body will become a joy for you.

55. The Good God has granted us the enlightenment of knowledge; yet day by day we reject it. If we had fulfilled God's will, we would be blessed at the hour of judgment, together with all who have done His will. But since we have not fulfilled it, we will have no justification there; for we all sin while having knowledge. We all experience God's Providence and all the gifts with which the good God has graced us. His grace often visits our hearts at all times, and if it finds rest, it enters and dwells permanently in the soul; but if it does not find a pure heart, it immediately withdraws. But His generosity once again prompts it to descend and visit us sinners, for we are all changeable by choice, but not by nature. We are always distracted and weak, envious and deceitful; we often think ill of one another, indulge in deceitful thoughts, and are always, as if in a dreadful mire, immersed in our thoughts. And when grace comes to visit us, it encounters in our hearts the stench of impure thoughts, and immediately withdraws, finding no way in to dwell within us as it pleases. And yet, through its luminous sweetness, it makes an impression on the heart so that a person may sense that grace has visited him but found no way in—so that, having been delighted by the radiance of grace, he may seek it out. However, grace itself cannot completely withdraw from us; for it is moved by its own mercy to have mercy on all. Do you see God's Providence? Do you see Christ's mercy? Do you see how the Holy God always loves us and desires that we be saved? Blessed is the person who always strives to prepare a pure heart for grace, so that when it comes, it may find the fragrance of virtues and the holiness of the soul and dwell within him forever and ever.

56. Blessed are those who, having fallen into the enemy's snare, managed to break his bonds and hid themselves, fleeing from him like a fish that has escaped from a net. A fish, while still in the water, if caught but breaks through the net and hides in the depths, will be saved; but once pulled onto dry land, it can no longer help itself. So too, while we are still in this life, we have the power from God to break the bonds of the enemy's will that bind us, to cast off the burden of sin through repentance, and to be saved into the heavenly kingdom. But if that dreadful command overtakes us, and the soul departs, and the body is committed to the earth, then we are no longer able to help ourselves, just as a fish, pulled from the water and confined in a vessel, can no longer help itself.

57. Let us not wait until death comes, lest we be left in shame at the resurrection of the dead—when the saints will be clothed in the radiant robe they have prepared for themselves through good deeds. If we then find ourselves not only stripped of radiant glory but also blackened and filled with a foul stench, what shame will then overcome us?—Let us therefore strive to avoid such a danger by embarking on the path of repentance and purifying ourselves from our passions.

58. Sin is darkness, and virtue is light. Sin, when loved and committed, blackens those who commit it; but virtue, when practiced, makes those who excel in it radiant.

59. Let us bear fruit pleasing to God before the dreadful command comes to take the soul from our body. Woe then to those who have offended our Lord God and have not repented! He will seek the time he wasted in negligence—and will not find it. Let us therefore weep before the Lord our God, that we may find His mercy. While we still have time, let us be careful and seek the Lord's blessing. We need not worry about money; even if someone loses it, he can acquire more in its place. Our soul is in danger; if we destroy it, we can never bring it back (Matt. 16:26–27).

60. Our days are fleeting, and the end is drawing near. Let us weep before the Lord our God before we are shut up in utter darkness. Then, even with many tears, we will not be able to regain these days if we spend them in idleness and do not make the slightest use of them for our salvation. “Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation” (2 Cor. 6:2). Blessed are those who are sober-minded, for they will be crowned with joy. “Blessed are those who mourn now, for they will be comforted” (Matt. 5:4), together with God's elect. Blessed are those who labor for the Lord, for heavenly delight awaits them.

61. Nor will we be justified by the deeds of others, nor will others be condemned for our deeds. When we are presented naked and exposed before the Judge to give an account of what we have done, then no one will be condemned for another: “For each one will bear his own burden” (Gal. 6:5).

62. If someone who has done wrong is reported to a ruler, the accused may still escape punishment by fleeing to another place; but from the face of God, where can we flee, according to the words of Him who said: “Where can I go from Your Spirit, and where can I flee from Your presence? If I ascend to heaven, You are there; if I go down to the grave, You are there; if I take wing and dwell in the farthest seas, even there Your hand will guide me, and Your right hand will hold me fast” (Ps. 138: 7–10).

63. Let us walk the narrow and constricted path, embracing contrition, so that the remembrance of death may abide in us, and that we may be freed from condemnation. For it is said: “Woe to you who laugh now, for you will weep and mourn” (Luke 6:25). “Blessed are those who weep now, for they will be comforted” (Matt. 5:4). Let us look into the grave, and we will see the mysteries of our nature—a heap of bones lying one upon another, skulls stripped of flesh, and other bones. Looking at them, we will see ourselves in them. Where is the beauty of our former complexion, where is the rosy glow of our cheeks? Reflecting on this, let us renounce carnal desires, lest we be put to shame at the resurrection.

64. Expect your departure every day, and prepare for this journey: for at the very hour you least expect it, the dreadful command will come; and woe to the one who is unprepared! Sorrow of the heart is a wonderful thing; it heals human souls.

65. Just as it is impossible for sailors to remain on a ship forever, or for a traveler staying at an inn not to leave it, so too is it impossible for us to remain in this life forever. We are strangers and sojourners. Let us therefore, beholding this with the eye of the mind, prepare for our departure from this life.

66. If you have been a hard worker, do not grieve over the approach of a blessed passage to the next life. One who returns home with wealth is never in sorrow.

67. God created man free; that is why honors and punishments are intended for him—namely, honors and crowns for those who strive well, and punishments and torments for criminals and the negligent. There is “a sin leading to death” (1 John 5:16); and death is prepared for those who persist in sin and do not turn away from forbidden deeds to lead a better life.

68. Great is the fear at the hour of death, when the soul is separated from the body; for at this hour of separation, the soul's deeds—both good and evil, those done by her day and night—will stand before her. Trembling as she looks upon her deeds, she says to them, “Go away—let me go.” But her deeds, with one voice, reply to her, “You have brought us into being; we will go with you to God for judgment.”

69. No one knows the day or the hour of parting. While we walk carefree and rejoice on earth, a terrible command suddenly overtakes us—to take our soul from the body. And the sinner sets out on that journey on a day and at an hour he did not expect, when his soul is filled with sins and has no justification.

70. Do not think, brother, that you will live many more years on earth—and do not grow complacent, indulging in sinful thoughts and deeds. The Lord's command will come suddenly and overtake the sinner when he no longer has time for repentance and to receive forgiveness. – And what will you say, brother, to death at the hour of parting?!

71. Constantly await death, separation, and your appearance before the Lord's judgment seat. And as a wise steward of your salvation, always have your lamp prepared—and examine it hourly with tears and prayers.

72. The day is drawing to a close; our time is running out; yet we, in our unbelief, think it is still morning. The time of the harvest is already at hand; this age is coming to an end; the angels hold their sickles at the ready and await the signal. Let us be afraid, beloved! It is already the eleventh hour of the day, and the journey is still long. Let us strive to be found on the way. Let us be alert; let us wake from our slumber.

73. Say to yourself: "Look, our brothers are working, while you and I are wasting our time in idleness; they, listening to the Divine Scriptures, are nourished like parched earth by rain, while we, even though we are within the monastery walls, let our thoughts wander everywhere; they are sober-minded, while we are careless; they stay awake in prayer, while we have bound ourselves with sleep and laziness; they have received their crown, while we remain in our laziness; they are pleasing to the Lord, while we please the world. Why do we not wake up, so that we too may receive our reward?"

74. These days, years, and months pass like a dream and like the evening shadow, and soon the dreadful and great coming of Christ will arrive. — And truly, that day will be dreadful for sinners who did not wish to fulfill God's will and be saved. — Let us, then, finally cast off our concern for earthly things—and begin to prepare to meet that day.

75. Everything passes away, everything vanishes, and nothing will be of any use to us at that hour except the good deeds we have done here. Each of us will then bring our deeds and words before the throne of the righteous Judge. Our hearts will tremble, and our innermost being will be shaken when our deeds are revealed and our thoughts and words are rigorously examined. Who will not tremble, who will not weep, who will not shed tears when everything that each of us has done in secret and in darkness is revealed there?

76. To illustrate this, I present to you the example of fruitful trees, which in their season bear fruit along with their leaves. Trees do not derive their splendor from some external source, but each one bears fruit according to its own nature from within itself. So too, on that dreadful day, all human bodies will bring forth from within themselves everything they have done, whether good or evil; and each will bring before the throne of the fearsome Judge their deeds, like good and pleasant fruit, and their words, like leaves. The saints will bring the fruit of good deeds—beautiful and precious; the martyrs will bring their praiseworthy patience in torments and persecutions; the ascetics will bring the fruits of self-restraint, vigil, and prayer. But sinful, ungodly, and defiled people, with shame, weeping, and lamentation, will bring there the fruit of impurity and injustice—food for the never-sleeping worm and the unquenchable fire.

77. Why, then, are we so careless? Or do we not know what awaits us? Knowing this, why do we not weep day and night, imploring God to grant us repentance, so that we may be delivered from that shame and eternal darkness? There our sinful lips will be silenced; there all creation will tremble, and even the very ranks of the holy angels will tremble at the glory and awesomeness of the Lord's coming. What will we say to Him on that day if we spend all our time in negligence? — Here He is long-suffering, drawing all to Himself and graciously receiving them into His Kingdom. But there He will demand an account, and He will pass judgment without mercy upon those who wished to follow Him but were negligent.

78. These are the things that await us—on the one hand, the Kingdom and life, rest and joy; on the other, eternal torment in utter darkness. — Go wherever you wish; you have been given complete freedom. — Therefore, if you are negligent, do not desire to be saved, do not walk in God's straight paths, and do not wish to fulfill His commandments, then you are destroying yourself and casting yourself out of the heavenly palace. "The Holy God did not spare His Only-Begotten Son for your sake; yet you, wretched one, show no mercy even to yourself. Come to your senses at last, and awaken from your sinful slumber!"

79. Climb to a height, and you will see that everything below is insignificant; but if you descend from that height, you will marvel even at a small whitewashed house.

80. Let us concern ourselves with our salvation; let us concern ourselves with the hour of death. Alas, how dreadful is the hour of death, when the soul is separated from the body! — Then it will not be a father accompanying his son, nor a mother her daughter, nor a wife her husband, nor a brother his brother, but only each person's deeds—the good or the evil they have done. Let us, then, send our good deeds ahead of us, so that when we ourselves go there, they may welcome us into their city.

81. If you wish to inherit the Kingdom, seek the King's favor even here. To the extent that you honor Him here, to that degree will He exalt you; as much as you serve Him here, so much will He honor you there.

For it is written: “I will exalt those who exalt Me, but those who despise Me will be put to shame” (1 Sam. 2:30). Honor Him, then, with all your soul, so that He may deign to grant you the honor of the saints. — You may ask: How, then, can I win His favor? — Offer Him gold and silver by helping those in need, if you have them. But if you have none of these things, offer Him other gifts—faith, love, self-control, patience, generosity, and humility; refrain from judging others; guard your eyes so they do not look upon vanity; guard your hands so they do not commit injustice; turn your feet away from the evil path; comfort the faint-hearted, be compassionate toward the weak, offer a cup of cool water to the thirsty, give a piece of bread to the hungry—whatever you have with you, and whatever He has bestowed upon you, bring that to Him; for Christ did not reject even the widow’s two mites.

82. Let us more often remember the torments awaiting the sinner, so as to stir ourselves to repentance and to put an end to a sinful life. — What is smaller than a gnat? Yet we cannot even endure its bite. What, then, will it be like there, with the poisonous, ceaseless worm? — When evening falls, people say: “Light the lamp, for it is dark”; and darkness is driven away by the lamp. What, then, will we do there in the face of impenetrable, unceasing darkness? — Here, when someone is scorched by the sun’s rays, they flee into the shade. What, then, will we do with the unquenchable fiery Gehenna?

83. Come to your senses and do not disregard the flame that is never extinguished. And if you do disregard it, then test yourself here to see if you can endure the cruelty of the tormenting fire. Light a lamp and hold the tip of your finger to it. If you are able to endure this pain, then perhaps you will be able to help yourself there as well. But if, when your whole body is outside the fire, you cannot endure the pain of a single small limb, what will you do when your whole body, together with your soul, is cast into the fiery Gehenna?

84. We are strangers and sojourners in this life; yet we do not know when we will be taken from here. Many, having awakened in the morning, did not live to see the evening; others, having fallen asleep in the evening, did not reach the morning: “Man is like a breath; his days pass like a shadow” (Ps. 143: 4). And who knows if the time of our departure has not already come?—Let us not, then, be negligent about our salvation.

85. Blessed is the one who, at the hour of death, proves to be a holy sacrifice, pleasing to the Lord, who with great joy parts from the body and from this vain life. The angelic hosts, seeing him in heaven, will praise him as a servant like themselves, well-versed in the Lord.

86. “Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints” (Ps. 115:6); but “the death of the wicked is bitter” (Ps. 33:22)—the day will come, it will surely come, and it will not pass us by, the day when a person will leave everything and everyone behind and go alone, abandoned by all, naked and helpless, having neither intercessor nor companion, unprepared and defenseless, if that day finds him in negligence, “on a day he does not know, and at an hour he does not expect” (Matt. 24:50)—while he is reveling, amassing treasures, living in luxury, and indulging in debauchery. That hour will come suddenly—and all will come to an end. One long, agonizing night—and man will go, like a defendant, wherever those who take him lead him. Then, O man, you will need many helpers, many prayers at that hour of the soul’s separation. Great will be the fear then, great the trembling, great the upheaval, at the passage into the world beyond. This is our hour—a dreadful hour, yet inevitable. This is the end common to all—and dreadful for all; a difficult path, but one that all must travel; a narrow and constricted way, but we will all set out upon it; this is a bitter and dreadful cup, but we will all drink it to the dregs. What the soul experiences then is filled with fear and horror, but none of us knows it, except for those few who have gone before us there, except for those few who have experienced it firsthand.

87. Do you not see those who are nearing the end—how terrifying it is then? In what turmoil they are, how they sigh, how they cast their eyes here and there? How they sometimes gnash their teeth? Then they see what they have never seen, and hear what they have never heard, and endure what they have never endured; they seek a deliverer, and there is no one to save them.

88. One of those who are dying says: “Farewell, brothers, farewell. I am setting out on a long journey—a journey I have never taken before, to a land new to me, from which no one has ever returned, to a dark land where I do not know what awaits me. I am leaving now—and I will never return to you. This hour is too brief for me, for I am departing unprepared; this night is dark for me, for I am being cut down like a fruitless tree; the journey ahead is heavy for me, for I have no good guidance. “Now I see how I deceived myself, saying, ‘I am young; I will enjoy life for now, and then I will repent—God is merciful and will surely forgive me.’ Reasoning this way every day, I squandered my life.” I was taught, but I paid no attention; I was given instruction, but I laughed; I listened to the Scriptures, yet I end my life as if I had never heard them; I heard about judgment, and I mocked it; I heard about death, and I lived as if I were immortal. And now I am taken away completely unprepared—and I have no helper; caught unaware, unrepentant—and there is no one to deliver me; subjected to condemnation—and there is no one to save me. How many times did I resolve to repent, only to do worse again? How many times did I cling to God, only to turn away from Him again? How many times has He shown me mercy, only for me to grieve Him anew?—And now I depart in a hopeless state.—Sigh, brothers, and shed a tear for me!!”—Thus does the one who is nearing the end sometimes speak to us—and suddenly his tongue is tied, his eyes change, his voice breaks, and his lips fall silent.

89. When the final hour approaches, angels—the reapers of souls—are sent to take the departing soul and present it before God’s judgment seat. Upon seeing them approach, the poor man—even if he were a king, a ruler, or a world-ruler—is thrown into utter confusion, as if by an earthquake; he trembles all over, like a leaf swayed by the wind; he flutters like a bird in the hands of a hunter; he is utterly transfixed and astonished, seeing terrifying powers, seeing sights new and magnificent to him, seeing menacing and stern faces, seeing an order of things he has never seen before. — All this is seen at that moment by the one who is being taken from us, and he no longer pays any attention to us. He merely offers prayers within himself, as much as his strength allows. From his demeanor, we conclude that he sees higher powers, and, motioning to one another, we say: “Be silent and do not disturb the one who lies there any further, lest you throw him into confusion. Let us rather pray that his soul may depart in peace, and that he may find a merciful Judge.”

90. He has died; he is no more; he has lived out his life, and now lies motionless, breathless, and silent. — What, then, is a human being? — A dreamlike vision and a shadow. — The angels—the reapers—take the soul and ascend through the air, where the principalities, powers, and rulers of the opposing forces stand. These are our evil accusers—here, the tempters and recorders of our evil deeds, and there, the tormentors. They meet the ascending soul along the way, examine it, and tally its sins according to their records—sins of youth and old age, voluntary and involuntary, committed in deed, word, and thought. Oh, what fear, what dread for that poor soul! What indescribable anguish it endures then from the innumerable host of enemies surrounding it in darkness, slandering it to prevent it from ascending to heaven, entering the land of life, and dwelling among the living.

91. Thus the angels, having taken the soul, lead it along a path known only to them. As for us, having prepared the body, we carry it to the cemetery—and there we encounter a new and terrifying mystery. The small and the great, kings and commoners, masters and slaves—all have become one dust, one earth, one ash, one stench, one decay: just as the Ethiopian is, so too is the one who was once handsome; just as the youth is, so too is the old man; just as the infirm is, so too is the one strong in body; all have become, as was decreed from the beginning—dust and ashes (Gen. 3:19).—And you can distinguish nothing.—A truly great and awesome mystery lies before us! We see that every age has been erased there, every physical beauty has changed, every facial beauty has vanished, every pleasing gaze has faded, every eloquent mouth is sealed, every lock of hair has rotted away—all has come to an end. We speak—and no one listens—we weep—and no one heeds us.

92. If only we could ask those who lie there: Where have you gone, our brothers? Where do you dwell? Where is your dwelling place? Give us a sign; speak with us, as you once did.” And it would be instructive for them to answer us: “We who have departed from you, who still live on earth—that is, the soul of each of us—are in a place befitting each soul according to its merit. And this dust lying before you, these ashes you see, this stench, these decayed bones—these are the bodies of those young men and maidens whom you once coveted. These ashes are the very flesh that you held in your embrace and kissed insatiably. These bared teeth, those very lips that you covered day and night with countless kisses. This pus and this repulsive moisture—that very flesh in whose embrace you gave yourselves over to sin. Therefore, look and be certain that, when you embrace your young lovers on your beds, you are embracing dust and slime. Know that when you kiss their limbs, you are kissing stench and pus. Realize that when you burn with love for them, the object of your desire is worms, ashes, and stench. Do not give in to delusion, foolish young men and maidens! Do not be beguiled by the fleeting beauty of youth; for we, the decaying corpses lying before your eyes, were once, during our lifetimes—just as you are now—striking in appearance, majestic, anointed with perfumes, loved, enjoying life, and prosperous; and now, as you see, all of this has become a delusion, dust, ashes, and a stench. Do not deceive yourselves any longer; but learn from us, who have gone before you and now lie in the grave, and be cautious, and be certain—that there is judgment, there is endless torment, there is impenetrable darkness and a hopeless Gehenna, there is an unceasing worm, unceasing weeping, unceasing gnashing of teeth, and incurable sorrow.”.

93. This is what our brothers who have gone before us there teach us—not merely in words, but by their very deeds. Let us therefore awaken from our slumber. Let us cease to deceive ourselves with empty hopes. Let us no longer allow the cunning enemy to mock us. May we not be led astray by flattering thoughts promising a long life. Many, having made many plans, did not even live to see the morning, but were suddenly snatched away by death, like a bird by a hawk, or a lamb by a wolf. Some, having fallen asleep healthy in the evening, did not wake up; others, while sitting at the table, breathed their last; still others died suddenly while out walking or enjoying themselves; still others, dying in the bathhouse, found their funeral washing there; still others were suddenly snatched away by death during their wedding, in the very bridal chamber—and their wedding garments became their burial garments, and those who played music at the wedding were replaced by mourners, and those who danced by weepers. “We know all this,” and yet we do not cease to deceive ourselves. That is why we will find no mercy from God; for it is not out of ignorance but with full knowledge that we give ourselves over to deception. “I implore you, then,”—become at last not merely hearers, but also doers of the teaching offered to you.

94. What fear and what distress will we face at the hour of our departure from this life, when the soul is separated from the body?! A terrible and great mystery is then accomplished! Good angels and a multitude of the heavenly host approach the soul, as do all the opposing forces and the prince of darkness; both sides seek to draw the soul to their own realm. At that moment, if the soul has acquired good qualities here, led an honest life, and been virtuous, then on the day of its departure, the virtues it has acquired here are taken up by the good angels; they surround it and do not allow any opposing force to touch it; but in joy and gladness, together with the holy angels, they receive her and bring her to Christ, the Lord and King of Glory, and worship Him together with her and all the heavenly powers. And finally, the soul is led to a place of rest, to inexpressible joy, to eternal light, where there is neither sorrow nor sighing, nor tears, nor worry, but where there is immortal life and eternal joy in the heavenly kingdom with all others who have pleased God. – But if the soul lived a shameful life in this world, indulging in passions of dishonor and being carried away by carnal pleasures and the vanity of this world, then on the day of its departure from this life, those passions and pleasures which it acquired in this life are transformed into wicked demons; they surround the poor soul and do not allow God’s angels to approach it, but together with the opposing forces, the princes of darkness, they seize her—pitiful, weeping, despondent, and lamenting—and lead her away to dark, gloomy, and sorrowful places, where all sinners are kept until the Day of Judgment and eternal torment, to which the devil and his angels will be cast down.

95. Therefore, while there is still time, let us strive through repentance to purify ourselves of our passions, and through the labors of self-denial and good deeds to plant in our hearts virtues that will intercede for us at our passing, and together with the angels of God will stand before our Lord and Master, drawing His favor upon us.

2. Lessons on Repentance

1. Woe is me! What a shame I am in! My inner self is not as it appears on the outside! Truly, I have only the outward appearance of piety, but not its power. With what face will I come before the Lord God, Who knows the secrets of my heart? Being accountable for so many evil deeds, even as I stand in prayer, I fear that fire might come down from heaven and consume me. – Yet I do not despair, trusting in God’s mercy.

2. My heart has grown hard, my reason has been corrupted, and my mind has been clouded. Like a dog, I return to “my own vomit” (2 Peter 2:22). I have no sincere repentance, no tears during prayer, though I sigh and beat my breast—this dwelling place of passions.

3. There, both what was done in darkness and what was done openly will be revealed. What shame will overwhelm my soul when those who now say I am blameless see me as condemned! Having abandoned the spiritual, I have yielded to my passions. I do not want to learn, but I am glad to teach; I do not want to submit, but I love to subjugate others; I do not want to labor, but I am eager to burden others; I do not want to show honor, but I desire to be honored; I cannot tolerate reproach, but I love to reproach; I do not want to be humiliated, but I love to humiliate. – I am wise enough to give advice, but not wise enough to follow it myself; I say what ought to be done, but I do what ought not to be said.

4. Do not say, “Today I will sin, and tomorrow I will repent.” But let us repent today; for we do not know if we will live to see tomorrow.

5. Have we sinned? Let us repent, for the Lord accepts the repentance of those who truly repent.

6. If a brother sins, we gladly rebuke him; but if we ourselves sin, we do not gladly accept rebuke.

7. “Do not argue against the truth, and do not be ashamed of your punishment. Do not be ashamed to confess your sins” (Sir. 4:29–30). “Do not say, ‘I have sinned; what will become of me?’ For the Lord is long-suffering. Do not delay in turning to the Lord, and do not put off day after day” (Sir. 5:4, 8). “Remember that wrath will not be delayed” (Sir. 7:18).

8. “Who will give water to my head, and a fountain of tears to my eyes, that I may weep for my sins day and night” (Jer. 9:1)? To laughter I said (Eccl. 2:2), “Depart from me”; and to tears, “Come to me”; for my sin is very great before the Lord, and my transgressions are beyond number.

9. Do you know that there are three different kinds of tears among people? There are tears over visible things—and they are very bitter and vain. There are tears of repentance, when the soul longs for eternal blessings, and they are very sweet and beneficial. And there are tears of remorse where there is “weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 8:12)—and these tears are bitter and useless, because they are entirely fruitless when there is no longer time for repentance.

10. Outwardly we are humble, but in character we are cruel and inhuman; outwardly we are devout, but in character we are murderers; outwardly we are full of love, but in character we are enemies; outwardly we are friendly, but in character we are haters; outwardly ascetics, but in character—a plague upon ascetics; outwardly fasters, but in character—sea robbers; outwardly chaste, but in heart—adulterers; outwardly silent, but in heart—vagabonds; outwardly meek, but in character—arrogant; outwardly counselors, but in character, seducers; outwardly simple-hearted, but in character, dangerous. — Why is this so? Because we do not have the fear of God before our eyes, and either we do not know the Lord’s commandments, or, knowing them, we reinterpret them to suit ourselves.

11. And even now (after many years of self-improvement), there are still many impure thoughts within me—envy, malice, self-indulgence, gluttony, anger, vanity, and lust. I am nothing in myself, yet I consider myself to be something; I belong to the number of wicked people, yet I seek to gain for myself a reputation for holiness; I live in sin, yet I want to be regarded as righteous. I am a liar myself, yet I take offense at liars; I defile myself with my thoughts, yet I pass judgment on adulterers; I condemn thieves, yet I wrong the poor; I appear pure, though I am entirely impure; in the Church I take the first seat, though I am unworthy even of the last; I demand honor for myself when I ought to bear dishonor; before women I wish to appear charming, before the rich—pious. If I am insulted, I take revenge; when rebuked, I express my indignation; when I do not see flattery, I grow angry; I despise those in authority, yet I act hypocritically in their presence; I refuse to give honor to the worthy, yet I, being unworthy, demand honors for myself. I will not describe the thoughts that occupy me daily, my concerns with vanity, my neglect of prayer, or my passion for gossip. But I will describe my visits to church according to a set routine, along with the deliberate delays, contrived encounters, and hypocritical conversations with pious women, as well as my insatiable acceptance of gifts and flattery in order to gain more. Such is my life; such are my shortcomings!

12. Perhaps someone will say, “Are thoughts really that important?!” To this I will say: they are very important indeed, and here is proof from Scripture. Job offered sacrifices for his children, saying, “Perhaps they have thought something evil in their hearts” (1:5). If thoughts were not subject to accountability, then why would he offer even a single bull for the sins of his thoughts?—The wicked-minded were condemned in the assembly of Korah; and because they had evil thoughts, they were burned. And the Lord and Savior, in His condescension, called adultery “adultery,” lust for a wife “the very act itself,” anger “murder,” and hatred “equivalent to murder.” Blessed Paul also testifies to our responsibility for our thoughts when he says that the Lord will reveal “the counsels of the heart” at the judgment and bring to light “the hidden things of darkness” (1 Cor. 4:5).—Therefore, do not say that thoughts mean nothing, when consenting to them is recognized as the very act itself.

13. We must consider not only our thoughts, but even more so the decision of the will to accept those thoughts as pleasing and to yield to them. A farmer sows seed in the ground, but not everything is accepted by the soil; so too, the mind sows in the will, but not everything is approved and accepted by the will. From what the soil accepts, the farmer seeks a harvest; and for what the will has approved and accepted, God demands an account.

14. The Apostle called those who act naturally “spiritual,” and those who act unnaturally “carnal”; the spiritual, however, are those who transform even nature into spirit. God knows the nature, the will, and the powers of each person; He sows His Word within them and demands deeds commensurate with them; He supernaturally penetrates the soul and the spirit, nature and the will (without coercing the latter). If a person is content with what is natural, God does not hold it against him; for He has determined the measure of nature and established a law for it. But if the will is overcome by nature, He holds him accountable for insatiability and for violating God’s law.

15. I hate sin, yet I remain in passion; I renounce lawlessness, yet I reluctantly yield to pleasure. I have enslaved my nature to sin, and sin, having bought my free will, imposes necessity upon me. Passions pour down upon me like a river; for I have united my mind with the flesh, and separation is impossible. I hasten to change my will, but my previous state resists me in this. I rush to free my soul, but I am weighed down by a multitude of debts.

16. The devil, that wicked moneylender, does not remind me to repay; he lends generously but refuses to take anything back. He seeks only to enslave me and makes no argument about the debt; he lends so that we may grow rich in passions, and he does not demand repayment of what he has given. I want to pay him back, but he keeps adding to what I already owe. When I force him to take payment, he gives me something else, so that it appears I am paying him back with his own loan. He burdens me with new debts, because he eradicates my old passions with others that did not exist before. The old ones seem to have been paid off; yet he draws me into new obligations of passion and introduces me to new situations. He compels me to keep silent about my passions and not to confess them, and persuades me to pursue new passions, as if they were harmless. I grow accustomed to passions I have never known before, and, distracted by them, I forget my former passions. I make a pact with those who have come to me anew, and once again I find myself in debt. I rush toward them as if they were friends, and those who have lent me money turn out to be my masters once more. I want to free myself, and they make me a venal slave. I rush to break their bonds, and I bind myself with new ones; and in trying to rid myself of fighting under the banners of passions, because of their success and their gifts, I find myself their steward.

17. Oh, away from me this slavery to the serpent! Away with this power of the passions! Away with this deep-rooted sin. It has given pledges to buy my mind for itself; it has flattered the flesh to make my soul serve it. It preempted my youth so that my reason might not know what was happening; it bound my immature judgment to itself, and through it, like a copper chain, holds my limited mind captive; and if it tries to flee, it does not let it go, keeping it tethered. Sin surrounds the mind and locks the door of knowledge. Passion stands constantly guard over the mind, so that, even if it calls out to God, it will not prevent the flesh from being sold. It swears that indulging the flesh is not in the least wrong, and that there will be no punishment for such a trifle. It cites as examples a multitude of confused thoughts and assures me that it is impossible for them to be subjected to scrutiny; it points to their subtlety (insignificance) and assures me that all such things will be consigned to oblivion. This is how the enemy holds me back and binds me, ensnaring me with deceit and flattery.

18. Paul said of the sinner that he is “of the flesh” (Rom. 7:14). Sin is brought into play by those who willfully commit it; but habits mediate between nature and sin; and the passions are something given by sin and accepted by nature; the use of these leads to the subjugation of the soul, the confusion of the mind, and slavery. For sin, dwelling in the flesh, rules over the mind and takes possession of the soul, subjugating it through the flesh. Sin uses the flesh in place of a steward; through it, it also burdens the soul itself and becomes, as it were, its steward; for it assigns tasks and demands an account of their fulfillment. If it is necessary to inflict blows upon the soul, it burdens it with them through the flesh. For it has turned the flesh, as it were, into its own chain, and holds the soul upon it like a sheep for slaughter; and like a soaring bird, it has bound it with this chain, and with it, just as a mighty giant would with a sword, has severed its arms and legs. I can neither flee nor help myself, for I am dead while still alive; I see with my eyes, yet I am blind; I have become a dog instead of a man, and though I am rational, I behave like a creature without speech.

19. But I long to be freed from this wretched, passionate state, if the Lord will help me. If He acts toward me according to the abundance of His mercy, He will deliver me from sin; and if He pours out His goodness upon me, I will be saved. I am certain that this is possible for Him—and I do not despair of my salvation. I know that the abundance of His generosity will overcome the multitude of my sins. I know that when He came, He had mercy on all, and through baptism He granted the forgiveness of sins. I confess this because I have benefited from this grace. I am in need of healing for the sins committed after my baptism; but for Him who raised the dead, it is not impossible to heal me in this as well. I am blind, but He healed even the man born blind. I am cast out like a leper, but if He wills, He can cleanse me as well. I am overwhelmed by sins, but His goodness toward me will not be overcome by them. He had mercy on Zacchaeus as one worthy; He will have mercy on me as one unworthy.

20. Even idle words are subject to judgment. And what is an idle word? A promise of faith that is not fulfilled in deed. A person believes in and confesses Christ, yet remains idle, failing to do what Christ has commanded. In another instance, a word is empty, namely, when a person confesses but does not amend his ways, when he says he repents but sins again. And speaking ill of another is an empty word; for he recounts what was not done and what he did not see.

21. Come, sinner, to the Good Physician, and be healed without effort. Cast off the burden of your sins, offer up a prayer, and wash your festering sores with tears. For this heavenly Physician heals sores with tears and sighs. Come, then, bringing your tears—this is the best medicine. For it is pleasing to the heavenly Physician that each person heal himself with his own tears and be saved. This remedy is not prolonged, yet it is effective; it does not merely bandage the wound, but heals you instantly. The Physician awaits only to see your tears; come forward, do not be afraid. Show Him the wound, bringing with it the remedy—tears and sighs.

22. Who will not be amazed, who will not be astonished, who will not bless the great mercy of Your goodness, Savior of our souls, when You deign to accept tears as payment for Your healing! O power of tears! How far you have reached! With great boldness, you enter heaven itself unhindered. O power of tears! The angelic ranks and all the heavenly powers rejoice ceaselessly at your boldness. O power of tears! If you wish, you may joyfully stand before the Holy and exalted throne of the Most Pure Lord. O power of tears! In the blink of an eye, you soar into heaven, and you receive from God what you ask for; for He comes out to meet you, willingly granting forgiveness.

23. How can I implore You, my Savior, when my lips are full of slander? How can I sing Your praises when my conscience is defiled? How can I call upon You when I have failed to keep Your commandments?—But You Yourself, O All-Good One, do not despise me, a wretch; do not cast me away, a vile one; do not forsake me, a hopeless one. For it is a great delight to my enemy to see me despair of myself; his only joy is to see me, as a result of my despair, become his captive: but You Yourself, through Your mercy, put his hope to shame, snatch me from his teeth, deliver me from his wicked schemes, and from all the snares he has set against me!—And to all whose consciences are troubled by their wicked deeds, I implore you: do not lose hope in yourselves; do not give joy to your adversary. But approach God without shame, weep before Him, and do not lose hope in yourselves. For our Lord takes great delight in those who repent and awaits our conversion. He Himself calls out to all: “Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Matt. 11:28). Therefore, let no one lose hope in himself, even if he has sinned. The Lord is strict only toward those who reject Him and do not repent.

24. Blessed is the one who, with full awareness, has chosen to weep, and with a contrite heart sheds tears upon the earth before the Lord like precious pearls.

25. Blessed is the one whose soul has become like a newly planted tree, and who always, like water from irrigation, has tears for God.

26. Blessed is the one who plants good plants—that is, virtues—in his soul and waters what he has planted within himself, praying with tears that his plantings may be pleasing and fruitful to the Lord.

27. I wish to illustrate to you the power of tears. Through her tearful prayer, Hannah received the Prophet Samuel, as well as joy, sorrow, and praise of God in her heart. The sinful woman in Simon’s house, weeping and washing the Lord’s holy feet with her tears, received forgiveness of her sins from Him. Tenderness (heartfelt weeping before God) is the healing of the soul. It instills the Only-Begotten Son within us when we long for Him, and draws the Holy Spirit into the soul. There is no joy on earth sweeter than that which comes from contrition. Has any of you been illuminated by this joy of tears for God? If any of you, having experienced this and found sweetness in it, have soared above the earth during prayer, then at that moment you were entirely outside your body, outside this entire age—and no longer on earth.—Holy and pure tears for God always wash the soul clean of sins and purify it from iniquities. Tears for God at all times give boldness before God; impure thoughts cannot in any way approach a soul that is constantly moved by God. Tenderness is a treasure that cannot be stolen; by tenderness I mean that which continues not just for a single day, but ceaselessly, day and night, until the end of life. Tenderness is a pure spring that waters the fruitful plantings of the soul (i.e., virtues).

28. Before anyone commits an iniquity, the enemy greatly minimizes it in his eyes; in particular, he minimizes the lust for sensual pleasure, as if fulfilling it were the same as pouring a bowl of cold water onto the floor. Thus does the evil one minimize sin in a person's eyes before it is committed; but once the sin is committed, the evil one exaggerates the wickedness to the extreme in the eyes of the one who has fallen into it. At the same time, he stirs up waves of despair against him; and not infrequently he arms himself against him with parables, instilling such thoughts: "What have you done, you futile laborer? And what does your deed resemble? Here is what it resembles: someone planted grapevines, tended and cared for them—until they bore fruit—and after gathering the grapes, he filled the barrels with wine; but then he suddenly stood up, took an axe, and smashed the barrels; the wine spilled out and was lost; this is what your deed resembles." This is what the evil one suggests to a person, with the intention of plunging him into the depths of despair.

29. Therefore, knowing in advance the enemy's schemes, flee from sin. But if you do fall into sin, do not persist in it; rather, rise up and turn to the Lord your God with all your heart, so that your soul may be saved. Say to the wicked thought: "Although I have broken the barrels and ruined the wine, my vineyard is still intact, and the Lord is long-suffering, abounding in mercy, compassionate, and righteous. And I hope that, with the help of His grace, I will once again cultivate and harvest my grapes, and fill my barrels as before. For through the Prophet Isaiah He says: 'Though your sins be as scarlet, I will make them white as snow; though they be red as crimson, I will make them white as wool' (Ps. 1: 18).

30. To one person, a thought suggests and says, "You are still young; you will repent in your old age." But to one who has reached old age, a thought suggests, "You have grown old—how can you bear the labors of repentance? You need rest."

31. Do not despair of yourself, and do not say, "I can no longer be saved." On the contrary, you can still be saved. Love the fear of God with all your soul; and it will heal your wounds and keep you invulnerable from now on. As long as your soul loves the fear of the Lord, you will not fall into the devil's snares, but you will be like an eagle soaring on high. – But if, after this, the soul neglects the fear of God and becomes self-indulgent, then, having cast itself down from the heights, it becomes a plaything of the spirits of the underworld. And they, having blinded it, drag it into the passions of debauchery, like an ox yoked to a yoke.

32. If you are struck by an arrow from the crafty enemy, do not fall into despair in the least; on the contrary, no matter how many times you are overcome, do not remain defeated, but rise immediately and fight the enemy: for the Helper is always ready to extend His right hand to you and will lift you up from your fall. As soon as you first reach out your right hand to Him, He will extend His right hand to you to lift you up. The wicked enemy, however, strives only to plunge you into despair as soon as you fall. Do not believe him; but even if you fall seven times a day, strive to rise again and appease God through repentance.

33. Although we have fallen through our own weakness, let us strive to heal ourselves through repentance. Although, as human beings, we are subject to passions, let us not despair of ourselves to the very end; on the contrary, heeding God, let us listen to Him saying, "Repent, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand" (Matt. 4:17). He did not prescribe repentance for only some sins and not for others; on the contrary, the Physician of our souls has given us this remedy for every sinful affliction.

34. Repentance is a field that is cultivated at all times. It is a tree that bears abundant fruit, offering God glorious fruits in every way. It is the tree of life, raising the dead to life through sins. It is in communion with the Godhead, and God delights in it as the power of His creation; for those whom sin destroys, it recreates for God's glory. It is spiritual interest; for it reaps what it did not sow and takes what it did not give.

35. The doers of good have fertilized God's field through repentance; through it they have enriched the Church; through it they have filled God's granaries. Through it, the earth has become heaven, for it has been filled with the Saints—these earthly Angels. The good servants are praised, for through repentance they have multiplied what was sown many times over.

36. God saw that the human race would be tempted by the enemy, and He set repentance against the enemy's downfall. The enemy persuades one to sin, but repentance is ready to receive the sinner. The enemy incites one to commit lawlessness, but repentance advises one to turn back. The enemy leads one into despair, but repentance promises the hope of salvation. Sin subdues the conscience, but repentance serves as a rod to rouse it. "The Lord lifts up the fallen" (Ps. 145:7); and He accomplishes this through repentance.

37. In repentance, the law serves as a lamp; for through it, sinners encounter God once more. The lawless person is clouded and cannot see God's goodness, for the enemy has filled his soul with despair. But repentance, like a good physician, removes the darkness and all that weighs down the soul, revealing to it the light of God's goodness. The devil prevents the ungodly from coming to their senses by presenting repentance as harsh. But repentance, seeing his cunning, approaches with tenderness and says: "Just bring God to mind—and I will do the work for you. Picture His mercy in your mind—and I will intercede for you with sighs. Just sigh lightly, sinners, in contrition—and I will make you God's servants. And the Prophet Isaiah said: 'When you return and sigh, then you will be saved' (Isa. 30: 15). "Here is the testimony for you—just repent." If the sinner sighs, the burden of sin placed upon him by the serpent will fall away with that sigh. Then the mist of ignorance will clear from his mind—the eye of the soul will become clear, and repentance will begin to guide the soul toward salvation.

38. When a repentant sinner beholds God's goodness, he will not only sigh but also shed tears with great sorrow. For the soul, after a long separation from God, upon seeing Him as Father, is moved to shed tears. Because it has finally seen its Creator, it sheds tears and draws God near, for it loves the Father's favor; and in this way it is cleansed of everything to which the serpent had led it. Or have you not heard what David said: "I wash my bed every night" (Ps. 6:7)? But first he sighed, and then he began to weep. And so it is in nature: first the wind, then the rain; first the thunder roars, then raindrops form from the clouds.

39. David, sighing, drenched his bed with tears, for it had been defiled by adultery. He washed his bed with tears, which he had defiled through an unlawful union. He said, "I am weary with my sighing" (Ps. 6:7); and the toil of sighing is the fruit of a sick heart, which also brings forth many tears. Thus, tears multiply from the sighs that precede them.

40. Conscience has a natural inclination toward God (it stands for God and all that is of God) and rejects any deception that has crept in. Sin often intrudes shamelessly, but conscience, taking advantage of the circumstances of the moment, prevails. If anyone is seized by fear while in darkness, the conscience reveals that this is due to sin; for Scripture says, "The wicked flees when no one pursues him" (Prov. 28:1). Or if someone on a ship is thrown into confusion by the stormy waves of the sea, the conscience reminds him of his wickedness. Or during an earthquake, it brings to mind acts of lawlessness. Or when someone is on a journey, it brings to mind past sins. Finally, if the sinner does not repent, it convicts him when he falls into weakness and physical illness—and out of a love for life, he vows to God to crush sin within himself. Fearing death and the loss of the blessings of eternal life, he, tormented by his conscience, turns to repentance—this mediator between God and man.

41. The young man mentioned in the Gospel, having received his inheritance from his father, went off to a distant land and squandered it on prostitutes; as a result, he came to suffer agonizing poverty in every respect. When he began to languish under the burden of his hardships, repentance—by making him realize the loss of his former, carefree life with his father—revived in him the desire to return to it and the hope of appeasing his father through repentance. And he cried out: "I will arise and go to my father, and I will say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you" (Luke 15:18). When the enemy pounced on the young man who had succumbed to temptation and did with him as he pleased, repentance remained at rest, having silenced his conscience and biding its time before taking action. But when a time of hardship came upon him, repentance, like a mother, spread out her bosom, embraced him, and snatched him from the hands of his stepmother—sensuality—to return him to his mother—piety.

42. The young man cried out: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you." The sinning son recognized his father, lamenting that the one who had deceived him was a stepfather and a malefactor. He saw the treachery, he saw the deception, and he ran to repentance as to a mother. For a long time he had fed on thistles and endured hunger; but repentance, like a compassionate mother, having received this young man, nourishes him once more with milk, offering him her breasts—nourishing him with milk because sin had exhausted his strength through a life of shame. Were it not for this milk, he could not have been healed. But those who could not rise up were raised up by repentance, nourished with milk. It healed the utterly feeble and delivered them into their father's arms.

43. Do you see how repentance first appears to sinners not as harsh, but as forgiving and easy! It did not impose fasting, nor did it demand abstinence or vigil, but invited them to begin with the confession: "I have sinned." It begins with the easiest step, knowing that conscience will complete the rest. Conscience is the guardian of repentance; it takes the soul under its care and hastens to purify it. It knows the soul's docility—and it guides it like a rider. It wants repentance to be accepted; it desires for it to take root in sinners and, like the sun, penetrate the mind and illuminate it. Thus it gently leads them to God and, in a short time, makes them His own.

44. We must not, brothers, despair of salvation, having such a mother—repentance. We must not lose hope of salvation when such a mother comforts us. It led those captured by the fierce enemy into paradise to God; will it truly turn away from us? It had mercy on those who were outside the Church; will it not have mercy on us? No one will allow others to freely squander what he himself has gathered with great effort. How then could God the Father yield possession of us—whom He acquired through the blood of His Son—to the enemy? – We are His flock, and He is our Shepherd. He has given repentance as purifying water, so that if we sin in any way, we may be washed clean by it. We have a “bath” not only for “cleansing” but also for “renewal.” If we sin in any way, having washed ourselves with repentance, we become pure.

45. Repentance is God’s altar, for through it sinners appease God. Those under the Law, having sinned, were required to offer a material sacrifice and, for this purpose, to go to Jerusalem; yet some were prevented from doing so by stinginess, others by poverty, and still others by laziness. In the new grace, all this is accomplished by repentance alone, offering a sacrifice in one’s conscience. It requires no goat, but confession. Do you have no turtledove, sinner? Sigh—and God will count this more than a turtledove. Do you have no dove? Confess your sins to God—and this will be your burnt offering. Do you have no other bird at all? Weep—and it will be counted as a sacrifice for you. If you pray, God will accept your prayer in place of a calf. If you prostrate yourself with a sincere heart, your zeal will be valued higher than an ox offered as a sacrifice. Why should you prepare incense? Repentance will purify you without the burning of smoke.

46. Repentance is also God’s meal, for through it God partakes of human salvation. And the Savior says: “My food is to do the will of My Father who is in heaven” (John 4:34). Thus, repentance is God’s wondrous bread; in it, God partakes of the confession of the conscience; in repentance, He drinks the tears of contrition; in it, He delights in the fragrant aroma—the sincere sentiment of sighs—for to God they are a fragrant censer. Behold—the manifold offerings of God: abstinence, fasting, vigil, diligent prayer, and submission with humility; for these are more pleasing to God than many sacrifices.

47. Repentance is a feast for God; for the Gospel says that God rejoices more “over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine righteous people” (Luke 15:7). Repentance, by celebrating a feast for God, invites heaven itself to the banquet. The angels rejoice when repentance invites them to the supper. All the heavenly hosts feast, stirred to joy by repentance.

48. Repentance offers sinners as a sacrifice, yet it also revives them; it puts them to death, yet it also raises them from the dead. How is this so? Listen: it takes sinners and makes them righteous. Yesterday they were dead, but today they are alive to God through repentance; yesterday they were strangers, but today they belong to God; yesterday they were lawless, but today they are holy. Repentance is a great crucible that takes in copper and transforms it into gold; it takes lead and yields silver. If you have seen how glass takes on the color of a hyacinth, or an emerald, or a sapphire, then you will have no doubt about such transformations through the power of repentance. Repentance, by God’s grace, unites the repentant with the grace of the Holy Spirit and makes a person wholly a child of God.

49. The Law commanded that sacred objects be made entirely of gold. The Lawgiver did not allow any emptiness in these precious materials, so that we might know that God’s saints possess complete holiness within themselves. Listen, you who are repenting! Draw near to God with all your heart, and He will reward you by completely refining you. You have sought refinement in the fire of repentance; see to it that nothing remains unrefined. Here is what I mean. Suppose you are repenting of fornication. Be careful to cast aside all forms of fornication, for they give rise to all manner of debauchery. And not only that, but cast aside everything that leads to defilement through them: laughter, jokes, foul language, gluttony—these are paths to fornication.

50. Cast aside all that is sinful entirely. When the people sinned, the prophet Moses commanded that a serpent be set up—that is, that sins be destroyed—and he made the serpent not hollow, but cast and solid. Why? To show you that you must completely turn away from all “deceit.” He made the serpent entirely of copper, because the root of all evil is “love of money.” He cast it from the furnace so that you might quench within yourself the “flame” that spreads within you, leading to the corruption of the mind. He hung the serpent on the tree so that, through repentance, you might crucify these three vices within yourself, for they lead to spiritual death.

51. My word is for you, O penitent one; let there be no empty space within you; be firm in your resolve to resist sin and stand firm in goodness, like a rock. “Establish your heart,” as the Prophet says, “so that it may not waver” (Ps. 111:5, 8). You must offer firm repentance, like Peter, because you have sinned persistently. God does not accept repentance that lacks firm action. Many imitate the gait of kings, but for this they are not honored as kings. Likewise, those who repent, if they do not offer firm repentance, will have only the appearance of repentance, without the power that repentance imparts. Those who offer repentance merely for show commit not just one sin, but many sins, because they lead others to offer only outward repentance as well. Such people are not only not forgiven, but a sin is added to their account.

52. Therefore, you who have sinned, offer sincere repentance so that you may receive forgiveness. St. Paul said that whoever builds on a foundation of “wood, hay, and straw” will not receive a reward; he said this not only regarding teaching but also regarding repentance. If anyone does not offer sincere repentance, he is like a reed or a piece of wood floating on the water. Whoever does not approach repentance with sincerity is like a piece of wood; and such a person will not only be rejected but also burned, as it is said, by fire. For what reason? Because he thought he could mock God.

53. Let us repent, like the people of Nineveh, so that we too may obtain salvation. They truly repented, and they were truly saved; just as they had sinned, so they repented—and were accepted. They did not turn back only halfway, for both kings and commoners wept alike. It was not just a portion of them who reformed, for both rulers and slaves wept together. They did not repent for only a short time—for three whole days, men and women, infants and the elderly, did not cease to confess their sins. They accepted the judgment, and as if preparing for death, they lamented bitterly for one another. “By Nineveh I mean a person, and by its multitude of inhabitants I represent the parts of the soul and the movements of the mind. Just as they collectively undertook repentance, so too must we, with all our strength and as a whole, offer repentance.”

54. In the Law, God commanded not only to destroy idols, altars, and places of worship, but also to cast the ashes of the burned stones and trees—as unclean—outside the camp. And you who are repenting, keep in mind that it is your duty to eradicate every trace of sin within yourself. If the ashes of sin remain within you, unclean animals and reptiles will be drawn to you. But if you cast them out of yourself, not even sinful gnats and mosquitoes will trouble you. Purify your mind completely of sinful corpses—and their very stench will vanish from you. For sinful corpses are passionate memories. If they remain within you, they will cloud your thoughts, and your thoughts will be made to whirl, which, like a thick mist, will settle upon your spiritual eyes.

55. Let us purge ourselves through repentance, lest we lose the grace of forgiveness, which is our true color. Purging is the thorough removal of what is evil. For in this way, the color (of forgiveness) bestowed upon us, having been tempered in our souls, will never fade. Thoroughly wash yourselves with tears, just as dyers wash the wool; surrender yourselves to humility; humble yourselves in all things; for by purifying yourselves in this way, you will approach God already prepared to receive grace.

56. Some of those who repent return to sin because they did not know the serpent hidden within them; and even if they did know it, they did not cast it out of themselves completely, but allowed traces of its image to remain within; and it soon, as if conceived in the womb, restores the full image of its malice. When you see a repentant person who sins again, understand that he has not changed in his mind; for he has left all sinful inclinations within himself. The sign of one who offers true repentance, however, is a disciplined and austere way of life, the casting aside of pride and conceit, as well as eyes and a mind always fixed on the beloved Jesus Christ with the desire, by the grace of Christ, to become a new person.

57. Guard yourself against whatever is contrary to virtue. If you fast yet laugh foolishly, you will easily be tripped up. If you weep in prayer yet behave worldly in society, you will soon be caught in a snare. If, while living a chaste life, you are careless, you will not delay in falling. Repentance must come from the whole heart. The repentant person must remain consistently the same—that is, always be what he began to be. If anyone falls short in any way, this is already a sign of imperfect repentance. If he changes, this reveals that a firm foundation for a life according to God has not been laid in his heart. Such a person repents like a child being taught, and weeps out of necessity—as one who has been beaten—rather than of his own free will. Worldly laws correct behavior through fear, but they do not change the disposition of the heart. Likewise, some people repent with an ulterior motive—perhaps one they are barely aware of—to occasionally indulge in sin.

58. One of the Prophets said: “In the assembly of the Lord, do not slander with ‘tears’” (Micah 2:5–6). By this, the prophet does not reject repentance, nor does he call the confession of a humble heart before the Lord slander; rather, he says that if tears are shed hypocritically with evil intent, such repentance is unstable. And he also says: “Rend your hearts, not your garments” (Joel 2:13). For he wants us not to boast of our repentance, but to truly repent. And David says: “With my tears I will water my bed” (Ps. 6:7). I will not shed tears in church, putting on a mere show before people and seeking glory so that they may regard me as righteous, but on my bed I will wash my bed with tears every night, so that I may be in harmony with Christ, who says: “When you pray, go into your inner room, close the door, and pray to your Father, who is in secret; and your Father, who sees what is done in secret, will reward you openly” (Matt. 6:6).

59. Many trade in confession, often presenting themselves as better than they really are, and thereby concealing their true selves. Others make a business of repentance, using it to buy themselves glory. Still others turn repentance into a pretext for pride, and instead of receiving forgiveness, they take on a new debt. You have not yet been freed from your previous debt—and you are taking on a new one? You came to pay your debt—and you are binding yourself with a new obligation? Are you trying to free yourself from debt, only to prepare a new form of slavery for yourself?—This is what is meant by the words: “Let his prayer be counted as sin” (Ps. 108:7). And how can such a person not return to sin? How can he not give in to his passions again? Will the serpent leave him in peace? Will the creeping things cease to trouble him?—Alas! What Christ said will come true for such a person: “seven other, more wicked spirits” will take up residence in him (Luke 11:26).

3. A General Outline of the Life of Those Who Have Devoted Themselves to Pleasing the Lord

Excerpted in abridged form from Chapter 110. Although the text is addressed to monastics, it is generally applicable to everyone.

1. All who have dedicated themselves to God and always strive to “present their bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God” (Rom. 12: 1), it is incumbent upon them, in accordance with the sacred promises of the Gospel and the rest of Holy Scripture, to believe that by devoting themselves to every good work and every exercise in virtue, they may, through the grace of Christ and the power of God, obtain complete deliverance and purification from the passions of wickedness that arise in the soul and body. What is impossible for us is possible for God, who has made the promise. Moreover, sinful passions subsequently entered the soul and body as a result of the sin of the first man.

2. We, as believers, have received through Holy Baptism the pledge of grace, like a talent, to be multiplied many times over and thereby increase the promised inheritance. The divine and comforting Spirit, given to the Apostles and transmitted through them to the one true Church of God, dwells from the moment of baptism in everyone who approaches baptism with pure faith—and each person receives this “talent” for multiplication, cultivation, and growth, as stated in the Gospel.

3. Just as a child born into this world does not remain forever in infancy but grows daily, according to the law of nature, until he reaches full maturity, so too one who is born from above by water and the Spirit must not remain in spiritual infancy but, by constantly engaging in spiritual struggle, labor, and much patience, is obligated, through the fight against the spiritual adversary, to prosper and grow to the fullness of spiritual maturity—or “to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ,” as the Apostle teaches (Eph. 4:13).

4. But in physical birth, the newborn infant, by the necessary law of nature, reaches manhood: for God’s Providence has ordained that physical maturity should come to perfection not by one’s own will, but according to the order of nature; but in spiritual birth from above, God has established a different order—namely, in the matter of spiritual growth, He has entrusted to man’s free will the labor, the struggle, and the arduous journey (toward this goal) undertaken with steadfast patience. Strive, says the Lord, “to enter through the narrow gate” (Luke 13: 24); and again: exert yourselves, for “those who seek the Kingdom of Heaven with all their might will seize it” (Matt. 11: 12); and again: “by your endurance you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19). Thus has the grace of God arranged things so that each person, according to his own disposition and will, may attain spiritual growth through labor and effort.

5. To the extent that a person devotes himself to physical and spiritual discipline, taking delight in good deeds, to that same extent does he receive the participation of the Holy Spirit in spiritual growth through the renewal of the mind, —receiving (the strength for) salvation by grace alone, yet advancing in progress and maturity through faith, love, and the efforts of free will, so that, both by grace and by righteousness, he may become an heir to eternal life. It is not entirely by God's power and grace, without one's own human cooperation and effort, that one grows in progress; nor is it entirely by one's own strength and power, without the cooperation and help of the Spirit, that we are able to attain the perfect will of God and the measure of purity. For "unless the Lord builds the house and guards the city, the builder watches in vain and the laborer toils in vain" (Ps. 126: 1).

6. What is the perfect will of God, which the Apostle exhorts and urges everyone to pursue (Rom. 12:2)?—The purification and sanctification of the heart through the indwelling of the Spirit of God, which undoubtedly takes place in the soul that, with faith and love, surrenders itself entirely to God. The Lord said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. 5:7); of those who desire to attain such blessedness, He requires perfect purification from sin—that is, a decisive deliverance from the passions of wickedness and the complete establishment within oneself of the highest virtue. The Prophet also points to this when, in prayer, he said: "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me" (Ps. 50:12); and again, when he asked, "Who shall ascend the mountain of the Lord, or who shall stand in His holy place?"—he answered: "He who has no iniquity in his hands and is pure in heart" (Ps. 23:3–4). By this, the Spirit showed that we must, through our own efforts, completely cut off from ourselves sin committed in deed, word, and thought, striving for perfect purity of spirit and hoping to attain it through the grace of the Holy Spirit. Thus, the Apostle, describing what the souls of those who withdraw from carnal marriage and worldly bonds and desire to remain in virginity should be like, says: "She who is unmarried cares for the things of the Lord, how she may please the Lord, that she may be holy"—not only "in body" but also "in spirit" (1 Cor. 7:34). He thereby teaches that the soul, the bride of Christ, desiring to be united with the pure heavenly King, must be free from active and mental sinfulness—that is, from both overt sins and secret passions—as St. John the Theologian says: "Everyone who has this hope in Him purifies himself, just as He is pure" (1 John 3:3).

7. The soul that has withdrawn from worldly fellowship and desires to abide in union and communion with the imperishable Bridegroom must be pure not only from overt sins—such as fornication, theft, gluttony, slander, idle talk, loud laughter, and greed—but even more so, it must keep itself pure from the strongest passions of the soul and hidden sins—that is, from lust, vanity, the desire to please others, hypocrisy, a love of authority, flattery, malice, hatred, unbelief, envy, arrogance, jealousy, self-indulgence, self-love, boasting, and similar invisible "passions of unrighteousness" (Rom. 1:26). Scripture regards the hidden sins of the soul as similar to sins revealed in action; for they are offshoots of the same root. Thus, the Prophet rebukes certain people: "You commit iniquity in your hearts" (Ps. 57: 3). And he prays for himself: "Cleanse me from my hidden faults" (Ps. 18: 13). Therefore, just as we strive to protect the outer person—that is, the body—from obvious sins, treating it as the temple of God, so too must we apply the same diligence and effort to protecting the inner person—that is, the soul—from every evil thought, as it is said: "Guard your heart with all diligence, for from it flow the springs of life" (Prov. 4:23).

8. We will succeed in this purification of the heart if we always resist and oppose wicked thoughts—such as pride, hatred, boasting, flattery, lust, rivalry, self-will, and so on—examining ourselves with the utmost rigor, guarding our minds against any alliance or harmony with secret passions of the soul, and instead devoting ourselves with all our strength to every good endeavor, labor, and feat, so as to place obstacles in the way of our enemy. For if we act in this way, the Lord, seeing our spiritual struggle, out of His love for mankind and by the power of His own Spirit, will surely bring about in us a great healing from secret passions, avenging our mental enemies.

9. We shall learn from St. Paul to what spiritual height we ought to strive to ascend. He says: all our concern is directed toward "presenting every person perfect in Christ" (Col. 1:28). And what this perfection consists of, he indicated in his prayerful blessing to the Ephesians, saying: "May God grant you—to be strengthened with power through His Spirit in the inner man; to have Christ dwell in your hearts through faith; to be rooted and grounded in love, so that you may..." etc. (Eph. 3: 16–18). The crown of it all is love; he presented this even more strikingly in another epistle, where, listing God's various gifts and human self-sacrifice, he adds to each that all these and similar things are nothing without love. He then describes love as the devourer and destroyer of all passions (1 Cor. 13:1–8). This is the pinnacle of perfection. It follows from this that those who have been granted the gifts enumerated by St. Paul but have not yet been delivered (from passions) by the power of the most perfect and effective spiritual love are still in danger, struggle, and fear, even though they already possess spiritual gifts.

10. The Apostle pointed this out for those who desire to advance faithfully toward Christian perfection, so that no one who has been granted any gifts might think of himself as having already attained perfection even with the grace acting only partially, and so that, having deluded himself into thinking he no longer needs anything, and, content with mere inferior gifts, might fail to reach the proper limit of perfection. In pointing to this goal of perfection, the Apostle teaches that everyone, recognizing their own poverty in the face of such a wealth of love, should strive ceaselessly and unflaggingly in good works and run the spiritual race until they reach the goal, as it is said: “Run in such a way that you may win” (1 Cor. 9:24).

11. I have expounded at such length on the goal of asceticism for the purpose of establishing in those who wish to embrace it a firm understanding of what our hope is and what path lies before us, and so that each and every one of those who have consecrated themselves to God, guided by this understanding and constantly keeping in mind where we are called and what standard we are bound to attain, in every way, with all their strength, and with the utmost care, may they always zealously dedicate themselves and all that they possess in this world to what is good—without, however, falling into the presumption that we are something, but rather recognizing that we are truly always nothing in comparison with the excellence of the perfect measure of our calling and the unfathomable riches of Christ’s love. “Let us, then, with patience, run the race set before us, looking to Jesus, the Author and Perfector of our faith” (Heb. 12:1)—“forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead” (Phil. 3:14).

12. How, then, brothers, should we live and conduct ourselves toward one another? Through what labors, sweat, and discipline can lovers of the truth attain the goal mentioned above? Let the one who strives for this goal, having withdrawn from the world and its pleasures, devote his soul to the brotherhood. This is what the Savior commanded when, after listing what one must leave behind to follow in His footsteps, He added: “even his own soul” (Luke 14:26). For what does it mean to give up one’s soul, or to renounce it?—To devote oneself unconditionally and entirely to the brotherhood, by no means to follow one’s own will, and resolutely to possess nothing under one’s control except the clothes one wears, so that, having no cares, one may always joyfully carry out only what is commanded. He who has renounced his own soul should honor all the brothers, and especially the superiors, as lords and masters; and with all “prudence” he should serve them, “not working merely to please men, but as servants of Christ” (Eph. 6:6). Having surrendered himself to the Lord, let him walk this narrow and difficult path (of obedience), and let him willingly submit to this good yoke of Christ, believing without a doubt that it prepares for him great salvation.

13. The brethren are to live among themselves in simplicity, purity, unanimity, peace, and sincerity of heart. Let no one exalt himself above another, nor consider himself better or superior to anyone; on the contrary, let each one, as a disciple of Christ, acknowledge himself to be the least of all people; so that through love, simplicity, the absence of rivalry and pride, and mutual submission to one another in the fear of God, the bond of peace in the brotherhood may be preserved, as if it were one body and one Spirit in Christ Jesus.

14. In resolving to follow these rules, let each person first and foremost strive with all his might to have in his heart a sacred love for and fear of God; let him ceaselessly ask God for these, and through frequent—or rather, ceaseless—remembrance of the Lord and of heavenly love, let him zealously strive in every way to renew them within himself daily, with the help of grace.

15. As for love of neighbor (after this), we can easily succeed. Put the first in first place, and then the second, following the first, will fall into place. But if anyone neglects the first great commandment—love for God, which, with God’s help, is formed within us from an inner disposition, a good conscience, and sound thoughts about God— —and if he then resolves to care for the second commandment, which is like it, then only an outward service to one’s brothers will result from this, and he will never be able to fulfill this service purely and soundly; for the wiles of malice, finding his mind far from the remembrance of God, from love for Him, and from striving toward Him, will either stir up murmuring and complaints in his soul about serving his brothers, presenting it as difficult and burdensome, or will inflate his pride and compel him to dream of himself as honorable and great, deluding him with the thought of his many deeds for the benefit of all. When a person is far from the remembrance of God and from the fear of God, then he inevitably seeks glory and craves praise from those whom he serves. But when the very mind and disposition of the soul are always occupied with thoughts of God and a longing for Him, then, in accordance with God’s love, a person—doing everything for the glory of God and enriching himself with pure and God-pleasing acts of love toward the brethren—achieves complete success in his labor, which is to be crowned with eternal reward from God.

16. Every exercise in virtue that we undertake should be performed for the glory of God, and should not be done for our own glory. Our observance of the commandments is holy and pure only when it is done with remembrance of the Lord, with the fear of God, and out of love for God. With such a disposition, the enemy—who is always attempting to defile the fulfillment of the commandments—is driven far from us, and everything commanded in the commandments becomes easy and manageable for us; for the love of God within us makes the commandments effortless and removes every difficulty in fulfilling them. The enemy strives in every way to distract our minds from remembering God, from the fear and love of the Lord, with various earthly temptations, so that later, through some plausible deceptions, he may turn our hearts away from the true good—that is, from the love of God—toward imaginary goods. And whatever good a person does, the evil one strives to tarnish and defile it by mingling into the fulfillment of the commandment his seeds of vanity, or doubt, or grumbling, or anything similar, so that the good deed may not be true good—which occurs only when it is performed humbly and earnestly for God. That is why everyone needs knowledge and discernment, so that the mind may recognize the enemy’s schemes and wiles and remove all that is sinful from one’s deeds. For even a good deed can be done carelessly or negligently, or with an impure intention, in which case it will not be pleasing to God; or it can be done according to God’s will, carefully, soberly, and for God’s sake—so that it will be pleasing to God.

17. Those who have wholly devoted themselves to God must fulfill all the commandments to the best of their ability, since it is evident to all that there is but one goal of piety, namely, that through faith and zeal for all virtues we may be deemed worthy of fulfillment by the Holy Spirit, and attain perfect liberation from the passions—that is, the purification of the heart wrought in the souls of the faithful and pious by the sanctifying Spirit. Therefore, let each one devote himself to goodness to the extent that his love for God extends. – And finally, if anyone desires to pray unceasingly, let him remain constantly in prayer. (This refers, of course, to the hermits.)

18. Therefore, if any member of the brotherhood desires to undertake the ascetic practice of prayer out of love for heavenly blessings, he should be permitted to do so—and he is most worthy of praise before men and before God. Let the brothers, with one accord and joy, permit such a one to remain in prayer, so that they themselves may receive a reward from God for granting this permission to their brother and for their kind assistance to him; provided that the one who undertakes this does so out of an irrepressible longing to abide with the one Lord—and in practice remains steadfast in this endeavor of ceaseless striving toward the Lord, resisting all superfluous thoughts, so that in this way the fruits of his labor may become evident daily for the edification of all. Whoever has love for the Lord—even if he does not yet feel the piercing and burning of divine love during prayer—but if he exerts himself, strives, and compels his will to this labor, unconditionally surrendering himself to heavenly love and seeking to attain true spiritual prayer; let the other brothers gladly allow him to remain in prayer, or rather, let them assist him as helpers, recognizing their brother’s progress toward perfection as their own achievement; let them not distract him from this through rivalry and jealousy, let them not hinder the beginning of this beautiful, zealous endeavor, and let them not interrupt his good striving toward God. And God, seeing the fervor of their mutual love, will grant the petitions of all, rewarding each one for their righteous and good will toward one another.

19. One who has entered the order of those who pray, having taken upon himself the greatest of tasks, must also undertake the most extensive of struggles; for there are many obstacles to abiding ceaselessly in prayer: sleep, despondency, the heaviness of the body, the whirl of thoughts, impatience, and slackness; and, in addition to all this, the rebellion of evil spirits, who wage war against the soul—which by its very nature ceaselessly seeks God—opposing it and hindering it in every way from drawing near to God. Therefore, one must constantly remain soberly attentive to everything taking place within—in struggle, patience, and weeping—striving with all one’s might to prevent anything that is detrimental to prayer.

20. If our prayer is not adorned with humility, love, simplicity, and kindness, then such a prayer will be of no benefit to us whatsoever; or rather, it will be a mere pretense of prayer. This, however, applies not only to prayer but to every spiritual endeavor in general—whether it be chastity, fasting, vigil, psalm-singing, ministry, or any other work performed for the sake of virtue. If, in performing them, we do not find within ourselves the fruits of love, peace, joy, meekness, humility, simplicity, sincerity, patience, lack of envy, and the like, then all such labors and deeds are in vain. For it is for such fruits that they are undertaken; therefore, when these fruits are not found in us, all our deeds and all our feats are in vain. Those who lack these fruits will find themselves on the same level as the foolish virgins on the Day of Judgment.

21. Those who are not yet able to devote themselves fully to the work of prayer should, with faith and the fear of God, prepare themselves for the service of the brethren or for the performance of spiritual duties; and having undertaken this work, carry it out as those who are fulfilling the Lord's commandment and doing spiritual work; be attentive to it as to the work of God, and serve with joy as servants of the Lord, by no means allowing the enemy's malice to defile your good work through seeking human approval, or grumbling, or arrogance, or laziness, or carelessness; but rather, striving in every way to sanctify your excellent obedience with reverence and love for God, so that it may be pleasing to Him.

22. Therefore, since all the brothers who lead the same way of life have the one goal mentioned above, let each one strive according to his strength and trust in God that, through diligent care and the practice of virtue, he will attain the full measure of Christian sonship. Simplicity, sincerity, mutual love, joy, and humility in all things may always be unshakable in the brotherhood, as a foundation, lest, by becoming haughty, or looking down on one another, or giving in to grumbling, we render our labor in vain. And let the one who abides constantly in prayer not exalt himself above those not yet capable of such constant prayer, so that his work may prosper before God and men. And let the one who has dedicated himself to ministry, or to some other form of service, not grumble out of malice, nor slander the one who persists in prayer and fasting, so that he too may obtain God's grace, and so that his work may be pleasing to God. – As members of one another, we are obligated to comfort one another. Just as the members of the body, governed by a single soul, serve one another without envy, so too we, being members of one another, governed by the one Spirit and nourished by the one living Word of truth, must, for our mutual comfort, conduct ourselves in general harmony through love and simplicity, kindness, and joy. – When such a spirit of mutual simplicity is maintained, then the abundance of those who devote themselves to prayer will make up for the shortcomings of those who bear the burden of obedience in this matter, and conversely, the abundance of those who carry out their duties will make up for the shortcomings of those who remain in prayer, “so that there may be,” as the Apostle says, “equality” (2 Cor. 8:14). If only simplicity, love, humility, and the absence of envy were established among the brethren. Then, to the extent that each one believes, loves, and labors—progressing daily in this way—he will be deemed worthy of the kingdom. This is truly the angelic life! This is precisely what it means to say, “Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven,” when we unite with one another in a spirit free from envy—with simplicity, love, peace, and joy—regarding our neighbor's success as our own gain, and likewise acknowledging his weaknesses, shortcomings, and sorrows as our own loss, as it is said: “Do not look out only for your own interests, but also for the interests of others” (Phil. 2:4). In this way, by showing compassion for one another—especially the strong for the weak and the robust for the frail—we will be able to fulfill the law of Christ, as St. Paul instructed (Gal. 6:2).

4. On Virtues and Passions

1. It is necessary to know that since man is dual in nature—that is, consisting of body and soul—he also possesses two kinds of senses. There are five mental senses and five bodily senses. The mental senses are called by the sages the “ ” or powers of the soul, and they are as follows: intellect, reason, understanding, imagination, and sensation; while the bodily senses are: sight, smell, hearing, taste, and touch. From these arise two kinds of virtues and two kinds of vices. And it is absolutely essential for every person to know clearly what the virtues of the soul are, and what the virtues of the body are, as well as what the passions of the soul are and what the passions of the body are.

Virtues of the Mind

2. Regarding the virtues of the soul, we affirm that there are primarily four cardinal virtues, namely: courage, prudence, temperance, and justice. From these arise the following virtues of the soul: faith, hope, love, prayer, humility, meekness, generosity, patience, kindness, forbearance, knowledge of God, equanimity, simplicity, composure, sincerity, truthfulness, freedom, aversion to judgment, to vanity, to boasting, to pride, to envy, to deceit, and to the love of money; compassion, mercy, generosity, respectfulness, reverence, a longing for future immortal blessings, a desire for the Kingdom of God, and a yearning for adoption as children of God.

Physical Virtues

3. As for the bodily virtues—which, more accurately, can be said to be transformed into instruments of virtue through God-conscious living—and which, when free from all hypocrisy and the desire to please men, lead a person to excel in humility and dispassion, they are as follows: abstinence, fasting, hunger, thirst, vigil, standing all night, kneeling, consistently refraining from going to the bathhouse, contentment with a single tunic, eating only dry food, eating late and in small quantities, drinking only water, lying on the bare ground, poverty, non-acquisitiveness, emaciation, disregard for clothing, selflessness, solitude, silence, confinement to the cell, frugality, contentment with little, reticence, manual labor, every kind of suffering, and every physical feat. All of this, when the body is healthy and troubled by carnal passions, is very necessary and beneficial; but when it is weak and, with God's help, has overcome its passions, it is not so necessary; for everything is fulfilled by holy humility and gratitude.

Passions of the Mind

4. The passions of the soul are: forgetfulness, sloth, and ignorance. The eye of the soul—that is, the mind—when clouded by these three passions, falls under the dominion of other passions, which are: ungodliness, unbelief—that is, every kind of heresy—blasphemy, irritability, anger, resentment, quick temper, misanthropy, vindictiveness, slander, condemnation, unreasonable sorrow, fear, timidity, discord, jealousy, envy, vanity, pride, hypocrisy, lies, unbelief, imprudence, indiscriminateness, short-sightedness, insatiability, greed, laziness, exactingness, partiality, attachment to earthly things, despondency, faintheartedness, ingratitude, grumbling, boasting, conceit, quick temper, arrogance, love of authority, people-pleasing, cunning, shamelessness, insensitivity, flattery, secretiveness, mockery, duplicity, yielding to sin out of passion, ceaseless thoughts of sin, wandering thoughts, self-love—the mother of all evil, love of money—the root of all vices and passions, wickedness, and deceit.

Carnal Passions

5. The carnal passions are: gluttony, overindulgence, luxury, drunkenness, eating in secret, various forms of sensuality, fornication, adultery, debauchery, impurity, incest, child molestation, bestiality, evil desires, and all manner of unnatural and shameful passions; theft, sacrilege, robbery, murder out of envy or in a fit of irrational rage; all forms of carnal indulgence and the gratification of the flesh's desires—especially when the body is healthy; sorcery, divination, fortune-telling, soothsaying, dandyism, frivolity, idleness, a passion for finery, facial rubbing, scandalous debauchery, gambling, an excessive devotion to worldly pleasures, a life devoted to the flesh that dulls the mind, making it earthbound and beast-like, and in no way allowing one to lift one's gaze toward God and the works of virtue. The root of all evils—and, as some would say, the primary cause—is the love of pleasure, the love of glory, and the love of money, from which all that is evil is born.

6. But a person does not commit any sin unless, as the wise ascetic Mark says, these mighty giants—namely, forgetfulness, sloth, and ignorance—first overcome him and gain the upper hand. These are born of a life of sensual pleasure and ease, and of attachment to human glory and entertainment. And the root cause—and the most unfit mother—of all this is self-love, that is, an irrational attachment and passionate devotion to the body, a scattered and distracted mind, along with sharp-tongued profanity, all manner of licentiousness in speech and laughter, which lead to much evil and many downfalls.

7. Furthermore, one must know that the love of glory, when it has turned into a passion, is very diverse and takes many forms, and that there are many pleasures that beguile the soul when it is not sober before God, nor embraced by the fear of God and the love of Christ, nor occupied with the practice of virtues. For from every direction there appear thousands of pleasures that draw the eyes of the soul to themselves: physical beauty, money, luxury, fame, idleness, anger, possession, a love of authority, and greed, to our deception, these pleasures are presented to us with a bright and alluring appearance, sufficient to draw to themselves those who are captivated by such things and who lack a strong love for virtue, but who find it difficult to practice it. Every earthly attachment, every inclination toward anything material—no matter how insignificant it may be—produces pleasure and a pleasant sensation in the one who is drawn to it, though this is unreasonable and ultimately harmful; and it enslaves the soul's desiring power so strongly that the one who has succumbed to passion, upon being deprived of what is beloved, is plunged into irritability, sorrow, anger, and resentment. And if, in addition to this attachment, even a slight habit takes hold of a person, then, alas! it causes the one captivated by an irrational attachment to surrender to it completely, because of the pleasure hidden within it.

8. The pleasure of lust, as stated above, is manifold, and finds satisfaction not only in fornication and other carnal pleasures, but also in other passions. And chastity consists not only in abstaining from fornication and carnal pleasures, but in being free from other passions as well. Therefore, the greedy, the avaricious, and the covetous are not chaste. Just as one is captivated by physical beauty, so the other is captivated by money. And the latter is even less chaste; for he lacks the same impulse as the former, which would compel him by the very demands of nature. For, in all fairness, the rider who is most rightly called unskilled is not the one who cannot control a stubborn and spirited horse, but the one who cannot manage a gentle and obedient horse. And from all this it is clear that the passion for money is greater than the others and is not natural; and the impulses toward it do not lie in our nature, but in a perverse will; which is why whoever is overcome by it commits an unforgivable sin. Therefore, we must clearly understand that sensuality is not limited to sexual immorality and physical pleasures alone, but is present in everything we love according to the whims and passions of our soul.

9. To understand the passions even more clearly, we have deemed it necessary to add the following. The soul is divided into three parts: the rational, the irascible, and the appetitive. And the sins of the rational faculty are as follows: unbelief, heresy, imprudence, blasphemy, indiscriminateness, ingratitude, and consent to sins arising from the appetitive faculty of the soul. The remedies for these sins are: unshakable faith in God, true and infallible dogmas, constant study of the words of the Spirit, pure prayer, and unceasing thanksgiving to God. The sins of the irritable force are as follows: cruelty, hatred, lack of compassion, vindictiveness, envy, murder, and constant thoughts of the like. The remedies for these sins are philanthropy, love, meekness, brotherly love, compassion, patience, and kindness. The sins of the lustful power are as follows: gluttony, overindulgence in food, drunkenness, fornication, adultery, impurity, debauchery, greed, and the craving for empty glory, gold, wealth, and carnal pleasures. Fasting, abstinence, self-denial, non-covetousness, giving money to the poor, striving for future blessings, desiring the Kingdom of God, and longing for adoption as God's children serve to cure and heal these sins.

10. I will now speak of the passionate thoughts that lead to the commission of every sin. There are eight vices: gluttony, fornication, greed, anger, sorrow, despondency, vanity, and pride. Whether or not all these thoughts trouble us is not within our power; but whether they remain or do not remain within us, and whether they stir up passions or do not, is within our power. But one thing is temptation, another is association, another is passion, another is struggle, another is consent—which draws one toward the act and resembles it—another is self-will, and another is captivity. Temptation is a simple suggestion made by the enemy, for example: “Do this or that,” just as the enemy said to Christ our God: “If you are the Son of God, command that these stones become bread” (Matt. 4:3). And this, as has been said, is not within our power. Association, on the other hand, is the acceptance of a thought suggested by the enemy, and, as it were, engaging with it and conversing with it with pleasure, occurring of our own free will. Passion is the habit formed as a result of association with a thought suggested by the enemy, and, as it were, constant reflection and daydreaming about it. Struggle is the mutual opposition between thought and mind, tending either toward the eradication of passion in thought or toward yielding to a passionate thought, as the Apostle says: “The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are opposed to one another” (Gal. 5:17). Captivity is the forced, involuntary enticement of the heart, dominated by prejudice and long-standing habit. Consent is the expression in thought of agreement with a passion; and “self-will” is the very act of yielding to a passionate thought.

11. Whoever, through his own resistance and steadfastness from the very beginning, repels the first—that is, the initial attraction—cuts off all the rest at once. Gluttony is eradicated by abstinence; fornication, by divine love and a longing for the future; avarice, by compassion for the poor; anger, by kindness and love for all; worldly sorrow, by spiritual joy; despondency, by patience, steadfastness, and gratitude before God; vanity—by secretly practicing virtues and constant prayer with a contrite heart; pride—by not condemning or belittling anyone, like the boastful Pharisee, but by considering oneself the least of all. In this way, the mind, having been freed from all the aforementioned passions and having ascended to God, begins even here to live a blessed life, having received the pledge of the Holy Spirit; and upon departing from this world, with dispassion and true knowledge, is placed in the light of the Holy and Divine Trinity, together with the Divine Angels, shining for all eternity.

12. The soul, as was stated above, consists of three parts; for there are three powers within it: thought, the irascible, and the appetitive. If there is love and benevolence in the irascible, and purity and chastity in the appetitive, then thought is pure. But if there is misanthropy in the affections and licentiousness in the desires, then the intellect is dark. When the passions are subject to it, the intellect is sound, chaste, and luminous; it spiritually contemplates the relationships among God's creatures and is elevated to the Holy and Blessed Trinity. Likewise, irritability is in harmony with nature when one loves all people, complains about none of them, and bears no grudge. And desire is true to nature when, through self-restraint, humility, and non-covetousness, it puts the passions to death—that is, carnal pleasure, the craving for gain, and the pursuit of fleeting glory; for desire has a threefold inclination: either toward carnal pleasures, or toward empty glory, or toward the allure of wealth—and because of this inclination, which is contrary to reason, one neglects God and God's commandments, forgets one's own nobility, becomes embittered toward one's neighbor, clouds one's thoughts, and prevents one from lifting one's gaze toward the truth. But whoever has attained the highest mode of thought, even here, as stated above, gets a foretaste of the Kingdom of Heaven, begins to live a blessed life, awaiting the bliss prepared for those who love God—a bliss to which may we, though unworthy, also be made worthy through the grace of Christ.

13. It is necessary to know that the full perfection of any virtue whatsoever cannot be attained by one who, throughout his entire life, does not strive with tireless diligence to acquire it through active and conscientious effort. This applies to almsgiving, prayer, love, or any of the cardinal virtues—courage, prudence, chastity, and justice. – While persisting in the practice of virtues, one must be careful not to diminish or completely destroy their value and significance by allowing improper motives to accompany them—such as seeking the approval of others, empty glory, and the like. And above all else, one must always practice the virtues with prudence—which is superior to all virtues, as it were a queen, and the virtue of virtues.

14. It is also essential for all who wish to excel in virtue and strive to avoid sin to know that, just as the soul is incomparably superior to the body, so too are the virtues of the soul—especially those that bear God's name and imitate Him—superior to the virtues of the body; just as the vices of the soul are graver and more destructive than those of the body, both in their effects and in the punishments they entail, though I do not know why this escapes the understanding of many. They guard against, fear, and avoid drunkenness, fornication, theft, and vices similar to these—since these are things that many apparently abhor; yet they view with indifference vices that are far more serious—those of the soul—such as envy, rancor, arrogance, deceit, and the root of all evils—the love of money—and vices similar to these.

5. On the Struggle Against the Eight Principal Passions, in General

1. Know that there are eight thoughts from which all evil springs: gluttony, fornication, love of money, anger, untimely sorrow, despondency, vanity, and pride. It is these that wage war against every person.

2. But if you wish to overcome "gluttony," love self-restraint, have the fear of God—and you will prevail.

3. If you want to overcome "sexual immorality," love vigilance and self-denial, always think of death, and never converse with a woman—and you will overcome.

4. If you want to overcome "greed," love simplicity and frugality.

5. If you wish to overcome "anger," cultivate meekness and magnanimity, and keep in mind how much evil the Jews did to our Lord Jesus Christ; yet He, as a God who loves mankind, did not become angry with them, but rather prayed for them, saying: "Father, forgive them," for this sin: "for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34).

6. If you wish to overcome untimely "sorrow," never grieve over anything temporary; but if you are wounded by a word, or troubled, or dishonored, do not grieve, but rather rejoice. Grieve only when you sin; but even then, exercise moderation so as not to fall into despair and perish.

7. If you want to overcome "despondency," take up some kind of craft—even if only for a short while—or read, or pray often.

8. If you want to overcome "vanity," do not love praise, honors, fine clothes, the place of honor, or preferential treatment; on the contrary, love being criticized and dishonored, with lies being spread about you—and reproach yourself, saying that you are more sinful than any sinner.

9. If you want to overcome "pride," whatever you do, do not say that it is accomplished by your own efforts or your own strength; but whether you fast, spend time in vigil, sleep on the bare ground, sing psalms, or make many prostrations, say that this is done with God's help and under God's protection, and not by my own strength or my own efforts.

1. On the Struggle Against Gluttony

1. A monk must not crave meat, nor drink wine to the point of intoxication; otherwise, your mind will become coarse, and you will have no end to your worldly cares.

2. The signs of a good life in a young monk are humble and wise abstinence from wine and from excessive talk. Whoever loves these things will not persevere to the end in a good life.

3. Do not force your brother to drink wine to the point of intoxication, even if he has been drinking it for a long time; for a ship takes a long time to build, but is shattered in an instant by a single blow.

4. Whoever desires carnal comfort brings many misfortunes upon himself; but the long-suffering is saved.

5. It is better to eat in the Lord and give thanks to the Lord than to abstain from eating and condemn those who eat and give thanks to the Lord.

6. Have you sat down to a meal? Eat your bread, but do not condemn your neighbor, lest by your condemnation you become one who devours your brother.

7. Be firm in the faith, and eat whatever is set before you in the Lord. If something unwholesome is set before you that you do not wish to eat, do not send it away from the table when others wish to eat and give thanks to the Lord.

8. Have you sat down to eat? Eat like a human being, and do not look around like an ignorant person.

9. One brother said: "I do not refuse to eat meat out of any kind of disgust; for 'every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be rejected' (1 Tim. 4:4); but since it is written, 'Sweetness is of no use to a fool' (Prov. 19:10), it is unwise for a monk to eat the meat of animals."

10. When pieces (leftovers) are offered, do not turn them down; for the Lord commanded His disciples to gather up the leftover pieces, "so that nothing would be lost" (John 6:12).

11. It is a reproach to a man to be drunk with wine; having seen many, I have found no one like one who is drunk.

12. Abstinence exhausts the flesh, but overeating dulls the mind.

13. Oppress yourself, O monk, and subdue your flesh, lest you be cast aside.

14. Work upon your flesh, and you will bear fruit for God.

15. Do you wish, monk, to find peace in the community of the brethren? Be content with the communal meal of the brethren; "and there will be healing" for your body, and "restoration to your bones" (Prov. 3:8), and your soul will suffer no harm. "But if you set your eyes on cups and glasses, afterward you will suffer pain, as if bitten by a serpent" (Prov. 23:31).

16. A lion, chasing prey for its belly, becomes a captive; and a glutton humbles himself for the pleasure of his belly.

17. An abundance of food dulls the mind, but proper self-restraint purifies it.

18. A drunkard and a hot-tempered man stirs up the souls of his brothers, and shame is ever with him.

19. A man who drinks in the evening does and says what he ought not to, and in the morning he repents; but if he finds wine again, he acts the same way.

20. Do not drink wine to the point of intoxication, even if your friends who are with you urge you to do so; for if wine overpowers you, those who urged you on will be the first to be led astray by you.

21. A glutton toils and agonizes over how to fill his belly with food, and when he has eaten, he suffers during digestion; but self-restraint brings health and sobriety.

22. A gluttonous monk worries about many things, but the self-restrained monk is like a gazelle in the field.

23. Do not worry about your stomach, monk, and you will have peace.

24. All the firewood in the forest is not enough to satisfy a fire; so the flesh is insatiable, no matter how much you satisfy it.

25. A drunken shepherd will not tend the sheep entrusted to him, and a sleepy one will himself become prey to wild beasts. For "thorns grow in the hands of a drunkard" (Prov. 26:9), but the soul of the self-controlled clings to God.

26. Temperance is the virtue of patience.

27. Do not drink wine to the point of intoxication to please others; for then you will suffer great shame when they find you drunk.

28. You have tasted bread and are satisfied! Give glory to God, who has nourished you. And if you wish to content your body with little, give glory to God, who has strengthened you, and do not say before everyone, “I have not even eaten such-and-such a portion of bread.” – What do you gain by this? – Are you not merely condemning those who eat and give thanks?

29. A gluttonous monk calls fasting a time of sorrow, but the temperate one does not look gloomy even during fasting.

30. I believe that excessive abstinence is not praiseworthy, nor is neglecting proper abstinence beneficial. Just as a prolonged deviation from established meals leads to lethargy and a lack of strength for service, so too does overindulgence in food invite condemnation. It is said: “Woe to you who are full now, for you will go hungry” (Luke 6:25). Moreover, the intemperate person, through excess, falls into carnal passions. Therefore, one must govern the body in a godly and proper manner.

31. After receiving refreshment (at the meal), do not wander through the cells, but remain in silence in your own cell; for the devil has led many astray with wine. Therefore, being in another’s cell after receiving refreshment gives the appearance of recklessness and debauchery. In such gatherings, souls fall into sin, especially when the abbot’s authority is neglected. For whoever does not wish to restrain his mind with the fear of God needs human fear to keep him from useless things, just as a slave remains chaste under his master’s strictness.

32. Eat simple and necessary foods, so that your mind may not become dulled by “feasting, drunkenness, and the cares of this life” (Luke 21:34). For those possessed by such passions do not regard fornication as fornication, nor adultery as adultery, and they do not abstain from anything that the pagans, who do not know God, do; but they commit all these things without fear, differing in no way from pigs wallowing in the mud; they remember neither the Law, nor the Prophets, nor the Lord Himself, who became incarnate to destroy the lawlessness of sin. Do not, therefore, be addicted to meat and wine, lest your mind become incapable of receiving spiritual gifts.

33. Do not indulge in baths, drinking, and an abundance of meat, lest you fall into insurmountable dangers by sinning in any important matter.

34. Do not listen to the advice of self-indulgent people—those who have made themselves slaves to their appetites and carnal passions.

35. Overeating and overdrinking are pleasant only in the moment, but the next day they leave one with a sense of unease and lethargy.

36. A monk will not remain long in one place, nor will he find peace, unless he first loves silence and self-restraint. For silence teaches stillness and constant prayer, while self-restraint keeps the mind undistracted. Finally, those who have attained this will find peace in their hearts.

37. Do not be seduced by the satisfaction of the belly, “and do not get drunk with wine, in which there is debauchery” (Eph. 5:18). Nothing is of any benefit to you except one thing: to fulfill the will of God.

38. Know that to the extent that anyone indulges his flesh—to his own detriment—he multiplies passions within himself, and ultimately the soul, burdened by the body’s bad habits, becomes barren. Therefore, the Savior says: “Take heed to yourselves, lest your hearts be weighed down with gluttony, drunkenness, and the cares of this life” (Luke 21:34). That is why the Apostle says: “I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9:27).—But if anyone compels himself to the Lord’s work, then to the same extent his body becomes strong, and his soul is enlightened. Just as a wrestler constantly devotes time to physical exercises to train his body for the art of wrestling, so too must the ascetic of piety practice every good deed, as the Apostle says: “Train yourself in godliness” (1 Tim. 4:7–8).

2. On the Struggle Against Lust

1. The sensual man, upon encountering women, becomes cheerful and is drawn to their beauty; their physical attractiveness drives him mad, the beauty of their faces delights him, the gracefulness of their figures enchants him, and in conversation with women he melts with pleasure; when recalling what he has seen, he dreams lustfully, vividly picturing in his mind women’s faces, their passionate expressions, their enchanting smiles, the flutter of their eyes, the elegance of their attire, their flattering words, and the press of their lips.

He finds men boring; but when he sees women, his face lights up, and he rushes back and forth to offer his services; then, out of nowhere, he finds the voice to sing, the ability to make a witty remark, to laugh, and to present himself as entertaining and pleasant.

2. Do not let your eyes wander here and there, and do not gaze intently at another's beauty, lest your enemy bring you down through your eyes.

3. A wandering eye is a reproach to a monk. A wandering eye causes much sorrow to the one who follows it. If you do not refrain from letting your eyes wander, you will not tread the straight paths of chastity.

4. If you love self-restraint, you will subdue the demon of lust.

5. Whoever nourishes the flesh of his body nourishes evil lusts, and shameful thoughts will not cease within him.

6. Whoever restrains his eyes will find lightness; but whoever lets his gaze wander will take on a burden. For it is said: "The flight of lust corrupts a mind that is not evil" (Wisdom 4:12).

7. If, carried away by passion, you allow your eyes to gaze upon vanity, stop them quickly, lest you fall into the shame of sensual indulgence.

8. When the flesh is aroused, do not touch your body, lest you provoke an even stronger arousal.

9. Be mindful of yourself, monk; be mindful when you meet women.

10. Flee from the serpent that gnaws at the body; flee even more from the woman who gnaws at the soul.

11. Whoever admires a woman's beauty plants the desire for her beauty in his soul, and whoever lingers at the door of her house is like one walking on ice; for temptation is not far from him.

12. Two wrestlers are like a monk in the company of a woman. But the sober man will gather gain, and he himself will not be robbed.

13. Do not incline your ear to shameful words, lest your mind be defiled. "For just as smoke is to the eyes" (Prov. 25:20), so too is a shameful word harmful to the soul.

14. If the spirit of fornication troubles you, rebuke it, saying, "May the Lord destroy you, you stinking spirit of impurity." For we know the one who said, "The mind set on the flesh is hostile to God" (Rom. 8:7).

15. Everyone who loves purity and chastity becomes a temple of God.

16. "If anyone destroys God's temple, God will destroy him" (1 Cor. 3:17), says the Holy Scripture. Resist the demon of fornication as you would a dog; do not consent in any way to be carried away by such thoughts; for from a single spark many embers arise, and from an evil thought evil desires multiply. Strive to eradicate the memory of them more than you would the stench of mud.

17. Just as a fragrant aroma delights the sense of smell, so too does the Holy Spirit rejoice in purity and dwell within a person.

18. Just as a pig takes pleasure in wallowing in the mud, so too do demons find pleasure in fornication and impurity.

19. In purity dwell great light, joy, peace, and patience; but in fornication dwell sorrow, despondency, insatiable sleep, and thick darkness.

20. Love purity, monk, in the love of Christ; it is as fitting for your life as a carpenter's plane is for a carpenter.

21. A certain monk, suffering from lust, rebuked the demon, saying, "Go into the darkness, Satan! Do you not know that, though I am unworthy, I nevertheless bear the members of Christ?" And immediately the passion ceased (as if someone had blown out a lamp); he marveled at this within himself and glorified the Lord.

22. Why do you love to dress up with such recklessness? Listen to what the Apostle says: "Flee the passions of youth" (2 Tim. 2:22). Do you not know what kind of enemy you are fighting? Do you not know how painful it is to be a snare to another soul? How can you fail to consider what rot and decay await those who do such things? I wish to make it clear to you that even if the outer person is well-dressed, but the dwelling place of the soul is defiled, his beauty will not be long in being corrupted. But if you acquire inner beauty, then from this beauty and from this light something will radiate onto the outer person as well, and such beauty is enduring!

23. Whoever adorns his clothes and fills his belly will suffer much reproach; but the sober-minded are a terror to their enemies.

24. If, while you are working, the spirit of lust disturbs you, do not be too lazy to raise your hands in prayer, and the prayer of faith will stand up for you.
25. Suppress lust within yourself before it suppresses you, for it leads those who yield to it into the depths of hell.
26. Love peace and holiness (purity), so that you may be deemed worthy to behold the face of the Lord God.
27. Refrain, brother, from jokes, lest they make you shameless; for shamelessness is the mother of debauchery.
28. Do not go to the cell of those who are intoxicated, lest you suddenly lose the riches of chastity.
29. When lust flares up in your body, bring to mind the unquenchable fire and the endless worm, and the burning of your members will immediately be extinguished; otherwise, having grown lax, you will be overcome and will come to repent, and the fire of the sorrow of repentance will consume you, and you will grow accustomed to sinning, even though you repent. At the beginning, strive to be strict with every stirrings of this desire, so that you are not overcome by it—and you will not grow accustomed to yielding victory to it in battle. For habit is a second nature. A habit of indulgence will never allow you to acquire self-discipline. It always builds up and tears down, sins and repents. If you get used to letting your guard down when you are attacked, then the inscription in your manuscript will be, for all eternity: “repentance.” Whoever is accustomed to yielding victory to desire is always condemned by his conscience; he is sorrowful at all times, and though he puts on a cheerful face before others, inwardly he is despondent because of his conscience’s condemnation. For the common lot of lust is to bring agonizing sorrow to those who indulge in it. Therefore, pay attention with all your soul, always keeping God within you.
30. Be mindful of yourself, and strive until death to keep yourself pure, so that you may meet your immortal Bridegroom with boldness and joy. Honor virginity; and it will lead you into the heavenly palace. That is why the Apostle said: “I have betrothed you to one husband, a pure virgin, to present you to Christ” (2 Cor. 11:2).
31. Guard your body from sin, lest you lie before the Creator; for we have offered ourselves as a gift to the Lord, and we no longer have authority over our own bodies, nor can we take back the gift of our own free will. If anyone, having made a vow to God, offers a gift to the Lord, and the priest, having received the gift, places it in the temple, then even if the one who offered the gift later repents, he no longer has the authority to take the gift back after it has been offered to the Lord; but if he attempts to steal it secretly, he will not be free from accusation as one who has taken his own property, but will suffer punishment as a sacrilegious person. Likewise, those who have consecrated their souls to God no longer have authority over their own bodies.
32. Beware of bad counsel. For it often happens that those who have fallen away from virtue strive to lead others astray as well, so that they are not the only ones wallowing in a dissolute life. They speak with flattery, seeking to distract those who obey them from chastity and plunge them into sin. Having fallen themselves, not only do they refuse to rise again, but they also deliberately lead others into temptation—toward downfall and corruption. And the devil uses them as bait on a hook. “Their throats are open graves,” devoted to “passions of impurity” (Rom. 3:13; Rom. 1:26). Beware of them, lest they burn you with their smooth words.
33. Blessed are those who preserve holiness (purity) in humility!—But let no one hope to attain peace (in this matter) by yielding to the enemy’s promptings; for then this tormentor will hold them captive through lustful thoughts and pleasures, even if they commit no shameful acts. In such a state, since they have not known a wife, the enemy instills in them the thought of claiming virginity for themselves, whereas their entire body is filled with the defilement of lust. Thus the enemy causes them to boast that they are free from sin, while he fills them with “a cluster of bitterness and a cluster of sorrow” (Deut. 32:32),
34. It goes without saying that one should not indulge in wine or spend time with women, for everyone clearly sees for themselves how foreign this is to virtue. And it is not only this one thing from which one must guard against the temptations of demons; one must also avoid effeminate conversations with men, which can arouse lustful pleasure and lead the soul to ruin. – We refrain from meeting with women not because we regard women as deceitful, but because through meeting and conversing with women, the enemy can easily bring us down and lead us to transgress God’s commandments. We must guard ourselves from all sides against the attacks of deceitful spirits, placing our hope in the full armor and power of the Holy Spirit. Whoever closes one door to the enemy but opens two for him, and thinks himself safe, is deceiving himself. No; one must protect oneself from all sides and give no pretext to those who seek pretexts.

35. Do not be negligent regarding the virtue of chastity, but strive with all your might to preserve holiness (purity) within yourself, for this is why you have left the world behind. Preserve your virginity so that the Holy Spirit may dwell within you. Pay no heed to shameful desires and vain caresses; keep yourself pure, and if a sinful flame begins to burn within you, extinguish it with tears and prayer to the Lord, who loves those who seek holiness and serve Him in it. – A precious treasure is virginity with a righteous mind. If you love it, you will be glorified by the Lord, and you will prosper in all things.

36. If carnal strife arises within you, do not be afraid or lose heart. By doing so, you will embolden the enemy against yourself, and he will begin to sow seductive thoughts within you, suggesting: “It is impossible to quench the fire within you unless you satisfy your lust.” But “endure patiently for the Lord”; pour out your prayer with weeping before His goodness, and He will “hear” you and “lift you up” from the “pit of passions,” that is, from impure thoughts, and from the “muddiness of the mire,” that is, shameful fantasies, and He will “set your feet” upon the “rock” of holiness (purity) (Ps. 39:1–3), and you will see the help that has come to you from Him. Just persevere; do not let your thoughts slacken, do not grow weary as you bail water from the boat: for the harbor of life is near. “While you are still speaking, He will say, ‘Here I am’” (Isa. 58: 9). But He waits to see your struggle, to see if you are truly ready to fight against sin even unto death. So do not lose heart; God will not forsake you. He is watching your struggle; the faces of the Holy Angels and the host of demons are watching it as well. The angels are ready to present a crown to the victor; the demons—to cover the vanquished with shame. So be vigilant. Do not grieve your own (the angels), and do not bring joy to strangers (the demons).

37. There is no place hidden from God’s eyes. Do not let the enemy deceive you by suggesting, “He will not see.” You stand at God’s feet. Do not disregard this. For it is written: “Heaven is My throne, and the earth is My footstool” (Acts 7:49).

38. It is not a tragedy that passions assail us and we must fight against them; but it is a tragedy if, by indulging ourselves, we fall before our adversaries. Resist, then, the lust that burns within you, so that you may avoid the never-extinguishing flame. If a passion defeats you once, it will not retreat, but will attack you even more fiercely. Be vigilant, then, lest you lose the glory of God’s presence.

39. Let us flee from drunkenness; let us flee, as much as possible, from encounters with women: for a woman’s word is like “a snare” in the heart (Prov. 7:21), and he who heeds it is drawn into an unholy union.

40. Be careful not to be ensnared by fleeting pleasures, lest you lose eternal life. You are called to be a merchant; remain fully sober, lest you lose your pearls, lest the enemy steal your treasure and sink your ship with its cargo, and lest you return home empty-handed. The enemy, knowing the glory that comes to one who keeps himself pure from the defilements of the flesh, wages a fierce battle against him with thoughts, seeking to ensnare him with them so that, carried away by them, he may miss out on future glory. And if he finds a soul that rejects impure thoughts, he does not attack it often, but neither does he withdraw from it entirely. Rather, he goes where, as soon as he pushes, the door is immediately opened to him; and he defiles the body and soul with the most impure desires in one who does not resist him; finally, as if he were a good counselor, he instills this thought in him: “It is better for you to go out into the world and take a wife than to crush your flesh in this way.” But nothing of the sort comes near the sober-minded. Therefore, be mindful of yourself, lest anything like this befall you.

41. Remember what you promised God and preserve your holiness (purity), so that you may find favor before the Lord. Listen to the one who said, “Flee from sexual immorality” (1 Cor. 6:18).—Do you want to know what a grave sin sexual immorality is? Behold: those whom the serpents could not kill in the wilderness were brought down by fornication in the land of Midian. If you have fallen into sin, do not remain in your fall, and do not disregard God’s long-suffering and His mercy. “Remember that death will not be long in coming” (Sir. 14:12). Remember that you cannot escape God’s hands. Therefore, do not be negligent, but repent, weep, and lament that you have been led astray; for even if we forget our fall, God, who created us, knows the deeds of each one.

42. Do not be careless, but courageously resist the enemy, and block the opening through which the enemy usually enters to destroy you, so that, finding no convenient entrance, he may depart empty-handed. And to block the breach means to safeguard the senses through which both good and evil enter the soul—that is, sight, hearing, smell, touch, and taste—and not to allow your thoughts to wander where they ought not to go. Keep in mind the giants who ravaged the earth with their dominion, and how the Lord wiped them from the face of the earth in an instant with the flood; and their strength was of no avail to them. Consider the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, how it was destroyed because of the sins of its inhabitants; and neither their luxury nor their pride availed them. Let us, then, take care of our own salvation, lest sudden death overtake us as well, and lest we depart from here under great condemnation.

43. Say to the one who instills wicked and impure desires in you: “O enemy of the truth! Must I shame myself so that you may fulfill your desire? Go to those like you who are depraved. You have asked for a herd of pigs! Drown with them. But I will no longer be a slave to my own desires. I have had enough of the past; from now on I will care for the truth and implore my God to deliver me completely from your deeds. He gave me the Holy Spirit, and I provoked Him to anger; He gave me a pure soul and body, and I defiled them.” Speak thus, beloved, to the one who instills such passions in you.

44. One of the Saints said: “Fornication is like a dog; if you pet it, it will not leave you, but if you chase it away, it will flee.” Be mindful of yourself, and do not neglect your life. Take care that a small pleasure does not cause you to lose the fruit of your labors—that you do not, for the sake of impurity, forfeit the reward of your deeds—that you do not, for the sake of impurity, lose the reward for silence, for vigil, for self-restraint, and for other virtues; do not be like a man who puts the wages he has earned into a leaky purse. — Protect yourself with the fear of the Lord.

45. If you are speaking with a woman of radiant beauty, guard your eyes lest lust disturb your mind; for then you will begin to speak at length, filled with passionate emotion; and it will turn out that while you speak of chastity with the tips of your lips, your soul is given over to lust and wholly absorbed by it. Therefore, when you happen to have such an encounter, it is better to cut short the conversation and resort to silence. For Scripture says, “She entices him with her many words” (Prov. 7:21). Frequent conversations of this kind cause no small harm to the soul.

46. A fornicator cannot love one who abhors his passion, but “a man clings to his own kind.”

47. Seek out ways to overcome your lust; for this is up to you.

48. A refuge from sensuality is, first of all, to pray often and with a sober mind, and then to give dominion to the mind and pure thought, to refrain from uttering licentious words inconsistent with a reverent disposition of the spirit, in the certainty that the Lord is the infallible Judge. Mindfulness and the expectation of judgment will destroy inner stirrings and dry up the growing lust; and in such a soul, stillness will come (lustful impulses will subside).

49. If you are chaste, do not boast of your self-restraint, but in humility pray to the Lord that He may be your Guardian to the end. For it is not uncommon for a sudden invasion of four-legged beasts into a vineyard to suddenly destroy the fruit due to the guard’s negligence.

50. When you go to bed, do not spread out more bedding than is necessary; for luxury can naturally inflame your body and strongly fan the embers of sensual desire.

51. Blessed is the one who guards his body as a sanctuary for the Savior, and has not shamed his soul with foreign deeds, but has remained pleasing to the Lord. Blessed is the one who has hated vile and shameful deeds, and has offered himself as a living sacrifice pleasing to the Lord.

52. Blessed is the one who, through his deeds, has rebuked the tormentor (the devil—the tyrant of souls) and has not been overcome by fear of the flames of lust; for his soul will be watered by the dew of the Holy Spirit.

53. If you valiantly struggle against those who seek to steal the fruits of your labor (vain thoughts), then be careful that no one, by some trick, creeps up from below and causes you to fall (a lustful thought). But put your thoughts in order (be vigilant), so that you do not miss the favorable wind and keep your sails ready, and save the ship by guiding it into the harbor of life.

54. Whoever plants a fig tree and leaves its fruit unattended? All the more so must one watch over purity and chastity. — Or who, having been bitten by an asp, does not take care to stay away from its lair? If, after being bitten, he puts his hand into its lair, he will be bitten again; who then is to blame for his death? Is it the venomous animal, or the man who did not protect himself? — Understand well what has been said.

55. It is harmful for a monk to associate with a woman. And do not go near a virgin at all, if you still harbor any carnal thoughts. A monk who spends time drinking wine with women is no different from one who throws himself into the fire. Flee from encounters with them, just as a chamois flees from a snare.

56. Guard the purity of your body. If you preserve it out of love for Christ, you will easily be able to excel in every virtue. The Holy Spirit dwelling within you will rejoice over you, for you fill your temple of God with the fragrance of purity and righteous will—and He will strengthen you for every good deed. And to excel in virtues and in divine purity, you have the following three aids: abstinence of the belly and the tongue, and restraint of the gaze. All three must be observed. If you preserve, say, the first two, but do not keep your eyes from wandering, you will not attain lasting purity. Just as a broken water pipe cannot hold water, so a wandering eye cannot hold a chaste mind. “Do not gaze upon the beauty of strangers” (Sir. 9:8)—and may your mind be fixed on the fear of God (Isa. 118:120).

57. A monk should not wash his body or feet with excessive care. Just as those who indulge in sensual pleasures seek satisfaction in the elegance of their bodies and clothing, so the ascetic of piety takes a stand against his adversaries by doing the opposite.

58. The struggle between holiness (purity) and defilement is no small matter. Those who encourage us in defilement suggest this thought: “No one sees you; what are you afraid of?” But those who encourage us in holiness object to them: “God sees—and His angels are with you; how can you say, ‘Who sees you?’” The tempter continues: “Where are they? So far, no one is visible here.” At this, the helpers of holiness interrupt him: “You don’t see?!—You spoke the truth: for it is written, ‘Their malice has blinded them’ (Wis. 2:21). ‘Does not the Creator of the eye see?’ (Ps. 93:9)? Where can you hide from God (Ps. 138: 1–12)?”—This is what you must keep in mind—and sin will no longer rule over you, and the sorrow of sin will not overtake you, but joy and peace in the Holy Spirit will come to you.

59. Guard the purity of your body in the Lord as a precious pearl; do not flaunt your clothing; keep your gaze downcast and your soul lifted up; do not engage in casual conversation with a young man, and even speaking with a woman is superfluous; do not prolong conversation with a young man, and do not associate with drunkards and jesters, but remain entirely in the fear of God, remembering the Apostle’s command: “Do not get drunk with wine, for in it there is debauchery” (Eph. 5: 18).

60. It happens that the evil one instills such a tempting thought: “A lustful thought troubles you constantly; how long must you bear this distress and endure it? Satisfy the flesh so as not to be in conflict; you will repent later—it is no great matter.” Answer him with sobriety: “But who can tell me that, if I indulge my flesh, I will find time for repentance and will not be swept away along with those who commit lawlessness? For ‘our life on earth is but a tent’” (Job 8:9). If that were to happen, would it not be the same for me to sin as to take a sword and kill myself?—And how can you say that this is a trivial matter? For I see how highly those who have not yielded to this temptation are honored, and how dishonorable those are who have indulged in it. Joseph is praised from generation to generation, in heaven and on earth, while the Egyptian woman is mocked; the chaste Susanna is glorified, while the lustful elders have left behind a bad name for all generations. – How can you still say: “Satisfy it just once, and you’ll be at peace”? “Do you not know, O devil, that a beast, once accustomed to carnivorous habits, more often indulges this passion? And yet you wish to assure me that if I satisfy my lust, it will no longer trouble me. May the Lord forbid it, you cunning deceiver, who, like a lion, seeks to devour my soul. Your sweetness is bitter; your suggestion is the depths of evil; your promises are full of death and ruin. You are tempting me to sin, which will strip me of the Lord’s grace and offend the Holy Spirit. “With whom,” I was marked “on the day of redemption” (Eph. 4:30); yet you say this is no great matter. You tempt me to “make the members of Christ members of a harlot” (1 Cor. 6:15), so that in a single moment I may lose my immortal treasure and forfeit the sanctification without which no one will see the Lord. And this, in your view, means nothing? You are tempting me to provoke the Lord to anger, so that on that dreadful day, before the dreadful judgment seat, I may hear from Him, the righteous Judge: “You wicked servant, more fond of pleasure than of God, you have defiled the earth with your impurities and your sins.” And is this not important? – Have you not yourself experienced the severity and immutability of the dreadful judgment of the righteous God, Who “will not spare even the angels who sinned with you, but having bound them as prisoners of darkness, will deliver them to the judgment of the great day to be guarded by those who are tormented”? And yet you say: “It is of no consequence”? – You are a lie, flattery, and ruin. With lies and flattery you blind the eyes of the mind and manage to entice others to prefer this fleeting pleasure to eternal life. But we, having committed ourselves to the Lord, do not fear you. The Lord is our strength; the Lord is our refuge; the Lord is our helper and defender.”

61. The demon of fornication is rendered powerless not only by abstinence from food, but also by abstinence of the eyes, “that I may not see vanity” (Ps. 118:37). In a gaze that wanders aimlessly, there is already fornication, as the Lord testified: “Anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Matt. 5:28). Whoever turns his eyes downward and his soul toward the Lord uproots such adultery within himself; and whoever has conquered his belly has also conquered his gaze. The wandering eye is a terrible traitor to us.

62. The battle stirred up by the wandering eye inflames the soul with lust, whether the object is present or absent. It even presents the object to the heart in sleep; for the demons paint a tempting image in the mind and occupy the mind by renewing the image of the tempting object previously seen by a person’s eyes. For this very reason, the Prophet prays: “Turn my eyes away, that I may not see vanity.”

63. When a demon begins to sketch a tempting object within you, and paints in your mind the beauty of a woman you once saw; bring the fear of God into your heart, and remember those who sleep in their sins—think of the day of your departure, when your soul will be separated from your body—imagine that dreadful and terrifying voice that will be heard by those who have neglected the truth and failed to keep Christ’s commandments: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41)—imagine also the worm that never dies and the unending torment. Meditate on this and keep it in mind—and the desire for pleasure will vanish from your thoughts, just as wax melts before the face of fire; for demons and fleeting moments cannot stand against the fear of God.

64. Whoever does not resist lust but allows his eyes to wander freely has certainly already yielded his mind to passions, and were it not for human shame, he would have defiled his body more than once. Therefore, unless he remains sober and constantly keeps the fear of God before his eyes, he will not delay in defiling his body as well. For this demon, who teaches the eyes to be distracted, is followed by another demon who actually commits sin in the flesh. If the second one sees that the first has succeeded in distracting the soul and making it unfocused, he immediately begins to urge that a carnal sin be committed as well. To the one overcome by his own eyes, he begins to suggest something like this: “You have already sinned in your intention and committed adultery in your heart; you have already broken the commandment, and the sin of transgressing the commandment has already been imputed to you. Therefore, satisfy your lust now. For to do and to desire are one and the same. At least enjoy your lust.”—But do not believe his thoughts, according to the words of the Apostle: “We do not understand his thoughts” (2 Cor. 2:11). For by this he wants to ensnare your soul. —To this demon, who advises you to commit an unlawful sin, you must say: “Although I have fallen with my eyes and committed adultery in my heart, I nevertheless break my adulterous heart with sighs of repentance, and I wash my fallen eyes with tears. For ‘God will not despise a broken and contrite heart’ (Ps. 50: 19).

65. If you find yourself needing to go to a village, do not amuse yourself with conversation with women, lest your soul be carried away like a bird that has swallowed a snake. Be all the more vigilant then, for your fall is not far off. If you keep watch over yourself, you will be as safe as in a harbor. Fight temptation with reverence and fear of God. Shamefulness is the mother of fornication. If women see that you treat them freely and speak of trivial matters, they will incite you to even worse things and lead you to a fall. — But also be on guard against others who, under the guise of contrition and reverence, might weaken your resolve with their words. One of the Saints said: they speak these words in an attempt to lead you into passion.

66. If you notice that a certain thought is drawing you toward a rendezvous with a young man or a beautiful woman, know that you are approaching the enemy’s snares. If, even after being warned (not to do this), you do not abandon your intention, know that you are already entangled in the snares, and it will not be easy for you to overcome sensual desire. You may say, “I do not suffer harm from this.” But is it possible to walk on hot coals without burning your feet?

67. If you wish to be chaste, practice self-restraint and put an end to harmful encounters. To the extent that a person draws near to that which causes temptation, to that extent it is impossible for his heart to remain free from troubled thoughts and the kindling of wicked desires; for the sight of a face and the sound of words stir him to passion. Just as a sponge, when brought near something wet, swells and absorbs moisture, so too does a person whose thoughts are not steadfast—if he draws near to or converses at length with those who speak carnally—absorb harm; therefore, intoxicated by this, he becomes drunk through no fault of his own, and because he is already filled with what is harmful, he does not receive the spiritual word.

68. One who desires to reform and establish himself in purity must firmly hold fast to chaste thoughts, wear down the flesh with good works, and, through constant remembrance of God, purify his mind of all that is evil and shameful. Through this, our mind is filled with grace; and the grace of God, dwelling in the mind and ruling over it, bars the access of the crafty enemies when they attempt to enter.

69. When you see a sensible woman who shines with beauty, has a bright gaze, radiant cheeks, and a certain artificial expressiveness in her face—and she stirs up your thoughts and intensifies your desires—consider that what amazes you is earth, and what inflames you is ashes; —and your soul will cease to rage. Fix your thoughts on the skin of her face, and then you will see the utter worthlessness of her beauty; for you will find nothing but bones, sinews, and a foul odor. Imagine also that she grows old, changes, dies, and all that color fades away. Consider what it is that amazes you, and be ashamed—and, having been ashamed, repent.

70. Blessed is the person who strives to please God and keeps his body pure, so that it may become a holy temple of Christ the King. Have you already become a temple of God of your own free will? Be mindful of yourself day and night, lest your temple be defiled. If you keep it pure and fit for service to your Lord, then the Spirit of God will dwell within you and sanctify you more and more.

71. Gird yourself with faith, hope, and love, and stand strong on guard, protecting the temple of God from all impure thoughts. Become all eyes, constantly watching and on the lookout for the devil's robbers; and these robbers, as soon as they find someone who is lax and distracted, always pounce on him to defile his wretched bodily temple, so that it may no longer be acceptable to the Lord. Be vigilant, then, so that it does not turn out that you yourself are welcoming these robbers of the evil one—that is, impure thoughts and wicked desires.

72. The root of lust is shameless. If you cut it down every day, it withers away every hour. Uproot the root of lust completely from your heart, so that it does not wither and grow back hour by hour. If you cut it down a thousand times, it will spring up twice as many times—until you completely uproot it.

73. Be mindful of yourself, lest you allow the vile enemy to enter your temple in place of the Holy and Most Pure Lord, and lest your temple be defiled by the shamelessness of this enemy, the hater of goodness. He is shameless and stubborn in his intent; you drive him out time and again with rebuke, but he shamelessly strives to enter. If you let him into your temple, God will forsake you. And your temple will be filled with every kind of impurity, stench, and darkness.

3. On the Struggle Against the Love of Money

1. Do not seek profit that is harmful to the soul; for what is more precious than the soul?

2. A poor monk who remains silent in humility is better than a rich monk who is filled with pride and arrogance.

3. Whoever loves gold will not be justified; but whoever loves the Lord will be blessed. Whoever places his hope in gold will fall; but whoever places his hope in the Lord will be saved.

4. If you love the love of money, you will leave this world with nothing; but if you love simplicity, you will not be deprived of heavenly riches.

5. If you love poverty, you will put the demon of fornication to flight.

6. Whoever hides gold in his cell accumulates within himself the passions of pride and disobedience. But whoever gathers prayers and alms into his treasury grows rich in God. Others hoard money for themselves, but you, monk, hoard prayers and alms for yourself.

7. Let us seek only what satisfies our needs; for what is excessive merely distracts and brings no benefit.

8. A monk who seeks an inheritance from his earthly parents falls into temptation, but he who seeks the Lord will be saved.

9. Do not say, "What will I eat when I grow old?" For we are not even allowed to worry about tomorrow, yet you are already worrying about old age. Let us "seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to us" (Matt. 6:33). If, however, we do not seek this above all else, it will be clear that we do not care about it at all. Therefore, "Cast your burden upon the Lord, and He will sustain you" (Ps. 54:23).

10. A monk who is greedy is like a barren palm tree, while one who is not greedy is like a pruned palm tree growing tall.

11. A monk attached to material things is like a hawk flying with straps on its legs; wherever it lands, it immediately becomes entangled. But one who is not attached to material things is like a traveler, always ready to set out.

12. Gold does not bring patience, but faith sets upon a firm foundation the one who has acquired it.

13. Why do we not cast off every useless worry and free ourselves from the burden of earthly things? Do you not know that the gate is narrow and the way is hard, and that the greedy cannot enter through it? God loves those who are not greedy, who willingly subject themselves to deprivation and sorrow for Christ's sake—in their struggles, in their vigils, and in their many sufferings.

14. Let not your hand be outstretched to take, but rather let it be outstretched to give (Sir. 4:35).

15. The passion of greed is the most grievous, for it is "the root of all evil" (1 Tim. 6:10). Would you like to know how this passion is eradicated?—By placing one's hope in God with all one's heart and all one's soul.

16. To another brother, the evil one instills an excessive zeal for manual labor. From this arises the passion of the love of money. Then the soul, having been wounded by the love of money—that root of all evil—prompts the monk to sit down to his work earlier than usual in the morning and to stop it later than necessary in the evening; so that, if possible, he neglects prayer and the divine service, and, driven by the love of money, is occupied solely with his work. When the bell rings for the service, this brother arrives after everyone else and looks for excuses to leave the service before anyone else. — Knowing this, guard yourself, lest you, having been led to stray into what is entirely forbidden, lose your rank. — For the enemy does not stop there. But, having found an opening, he manages to lead others astray, suggesting: "You labor and labor, yet you have almost nothing; go and learn a more profitable trade."—Without understanding the matter, some brother follows this advice into the world; and remains there entirely. Beware, therefore.

17. Chastity consists not only in abstaining from fornication and carnal pleasures, but also in being free from other passions. The avaricious, the money-lover, and the greedy are not chaste. Just as one is captivated by physical beauty, so the other is captivated by money; and the latter is even less chaste; for he lacks the same impulse as the former, which would compel him by the very demands of nature. The passion for money is not natural, and the impulses toward it do not lie in our nature but in a perverse will; therefore, whoever voluntarily yields to it commits an unforgivable sin.

4. On the Struggle Against Anger

1. He who drives away the spirit of anger and irritation is far from strife and rebellion; he is always calm in spirit, cheerful in countenance, and sound in mind—and is the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit.

2. The meek person, even when wronged, rejoices; even when insulted, gives thanks; tames the angry with love; when struck, does not lose his composure; when quarreled with, remains calm; — when subjected to authority, he rejoices; he is not stung by (another's) pride; he rejoices in humiliation; he does not boast of his merits; he is at peace with all; he is submissive to his superiors; he is ready for any task; he is free from deceit; he knows no envy.

3. The one who is free from envy does not seek honor; he rejoices with those who rejoice, helps those who are successful, looks with pleasure upon those who walk the path of goodness, praises those who live as they ought, and, in general, being free from envy and free from rivalry, rejoices in every success and every noble deed of others.

4. Whoever is afflicted by envy and rivalry is pitiful; for he is an accomplice of the devil, through whose "envy" "death entered the world" (Wisdom 2:24). His heart is always worn out by sorrow, his body is consumed by pallor, and his strength is drained. Envy and rivalry are a terrible poison: from them spring slander, hatred, and murder.

5. Whoever has not wounded his tongue with slander has kept his heart and conscience unstained. Whoever has not been seized by the spirit of slander has truly come to know that he himself is a man of the flesh, and has kept himself from being vindictive. Whoever does not associate with slanderers will dwell with the angels. Whoever has not poisoned his ears and tongue with slander is filled with the healing power of love. Whoever does not defile his lips with slander—his lips will exude the fruits of the Holy Spirit.

6. Whoever slanders another condemns himself. In slander there is calumny, hatred, and backbiting; and he is rightly recognized as a fratricide.

7. Hatred or envy cloaked in piety is like bitter water in golden vessels. Plant the tree of life within it, and it will become sweet. By the cross of our Savior, all the slanders of the cunning enemy are abolished.

8. Love enlightens the eyes of the mind; but whoever loves strife and quarrels is like a man who often puts his hand into a den of vipers.

9. If you harbor the passion of resentment in your heart, you will become a dwelling place of wrath and ignorance, as well as sorrow—and the expression on your face will change. For it is said: “The way of the resentful leads to death” (Prov. 12:28).

10. Whoever harbors resentment in his heart is like one who nurtures a serpent in his bosom.

11. A hot-tempered person will stir up the souls of his brothers, but the long-suffering in love will fear God.

12. The north wind stirs up the sea, and a hot temper stirs up a person’s thoughts; but generosity drives away irritability, and without irritability, anger ceases.

13. An unbridled horse delivers its rider into the hands of evildoers, and a hot-tempered man falls into trouble.

14. Do not listen, monk, to envy; do not plot against your brother, and do not give him a reproachful name. As you seek to drive him from his place in disgrace, take care that you yourself do not suffer the very thing you are plotting against another. “Whoever digs a pit for his neighbor will fall into it” (Eccl. 10:8). Hear what is written: “The wicked will fall into their own snare” (Ps. 140:10).

15. Do not make the excuse: “This brother is harming the community.” But do not do evil to another, and do not associate with those who do evil; for God “tests the hearts and minds” (Ps. 7:10).

16. Whoever has found the way of patience and kindness has found the way of life.

17. He who envies his brother’s success cuts himself off from eternal life, but he who helps his brother will be his partner in eternal life. For if, at the judgment, both those who do evil and those who are complicit with them are punished, will not the Lord all the more reward the one who contributes to the fulfillment of His will?

18. It is better to quell anger with a smile than to rage uncontrollably.

19. Smoke drives away bees, but holding a grudge drives knowledge from the heart.

20. Pray to the Lord, and shed tears before His goodness; then resentment will not take root in your soul, and your prayer will be “like incense” before Him (Ps. 140:2).

21. Whoever wishes to live peacefully in every place should seek not his own peace, but the peace of others in the Lord, and he will find peace for himself. But the quarrelsome and ill-tempered will never find peace.

22. If a quarrel arises between brothers, the one who repents first will receive the crown of victory, but the other will also be crowned if he does not reject repentance but willingly does what is necessary for peace.

23. Irritability in a person is a pitfall for him; but whoever has overcome irritability within himself has avoided this pitfall.

24. The Lord dwells in the unity of the brethren, but their enmity delights the evil one.

25. Whoever remains silent when accused of wrongdoing harbors resentment in his heart, but whoever defends himself (or confesses) with meekness and peace does not harbor resentment.

26. An irritable and boisterous person is quick to swear, but the silent one is wise.

27. What is irritability? It is a brazen and shameless passion, followed by repentance; but sorrow consumes the heart of the one who has fallen into it.

28. Whoever loves rebellion will suddenly be overtaken by destruction, division, and irreparable devastation; for he rejoices in everything that is hateful to the Lord; but whoever loves peace will inherit peace; and meekness in a person prevents irritability.

29. Irritability and resentment are like the venom of vipers; for they distort the face, disturb the mind, weaken the sinews, and rob a person of the strength to accomplish anything; but meekness and love ward off all these things.

30. How is resentment eradicated? By keeping the fear of God and the remembrance of the day of death in one’s heart. “Remember the end, and cease from strife” (Sir. 28:6). Remember death, and do not become arrogant; for in a little while you will be laid in the grave; and what good will your evil deeds do you?

31. Be a peacemaker, so that you may be worthy of the title “son of God.”

32. Fuel for fire is wood; fuel for anger is pride.

33. Do you want to tame your anger? Embrace humility, and walk in the way of the meek and humble.

34. If brothers are deeply distressed with one another, blessed is the peacemaker; but whoever stirs them up to quarrel will not go unpunished.

35. The spirit of wisdom rests in a gentle and humble person; but the Lord loves those who walk in wisdom.
36. A meek and silent monk will inherit eternal life.
37. A meek monk is a guardian who watches over the passions.
38. Forgive your brother if he has sinned against you—and the Lord will forgive your transgressions.
39. Hurry to your brother who has offended you, and repent before him with a pure heart, according to the word of Him who commanded us to forgive our brother's sins not only "up to seven times, but up to seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:22).
40. Accept, brother, repentance from your brother as from one sent by God, so as not to dishonor the One who sent him and not to provoke His wrath against yourself.
41. Do not attack your brother on the day of his sorrow, and do not add to his grief.
42. Do not hold a grudge against your brother; for it is written: "The way of those who hold a grudge leads to death" (Prov. 12:28).
43. Can you not bear insults? Be silent, and you will find peace.
44. Be mindful of yourself, lest hot-temperedness, irritability, and a vindictive spirit get the better of you—for these will lead you to a life of anxiety and disorder. But cultivate magnanimity, meekness, and a lack of malice, and all that is fitting for Christians, so that you may lead a peaceful and serene life.
45. Harbor no hatred in your heart toward anyone, and do not repay evil with evil; but cultivate love, which Divine Scripture has placed above every virtue; for it likened love to the Creator Himself, saying, "God is love" (1 John 4:8).
46. The Lord will not leave one who has fallen but harbors no hatred or envy in his heart to remain in that fall; but He will extend a helping hand to lift him up—because he has not rejected love. On the other hand, one who appears to stand firm but is puffed up with pride and harbors hatred within is not safe; for the darkness of hatred has blinded his eyes, and he does not see where he is going.
47. Strive not to be quick-tempered, lest you become intoxicated without cause, burdening yourself with the passion of anger.
48. To rejoice and be glad at a neighbor's success is a mark of perfection; but to grieve and be dissatisfied when another is praised is a sign of a wicked disposition and a malicious heart.
49. It is an impossible task to bring virtue to perfection without dissolving it in love (1 Cor. 13:2). Without love, we will stray far from the straight path leading to the gates of heaven. Let us therefore shed tears so that we may be freed from the bonds of hatred, envy, pride, and every devilish defilement. It is a demonic act to take offense at the virtues of those who prosper. Hatred has taken root in the demons; their greatest desire is for everyone to perish completely. The saints, however, imitating the Lord, "desire all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:4); for, being filled with love, they have loved their neighbor as themselves.
50. Be patient, so that you may grow strong in wisdom. Patience is a wonderful gift; it drives out irritability, anger, and contempt, and brings the soul to a state of peace.
51. When someone slanders you, do not flare up in anger; but immediately, with humility and a smile on your face, turn irritation into peace. Remember, however, that a smile when you are irritated stirs up even greater anger in the other person. Therefore, first calm your heart, then speak with a smile. Fire is not extinguished by fire. And you, with love and kindness, should quell the anger of the irritated person. If a brother does not come to his senses through this, we will strive to use other measures—of every kind—to heal him, so that in the end his irritation does not prevail and render all our sacrifices to God unacceptable (Matt. 5, 23–24). Let us imitate the Lord and Savior, "who, when he was reviled, did not revile in return" (1 Peter 2:23), and David, who, in response to Shimei's slander, said: "Let him curse, for the Lord has told him to curse David... may the Lord not despise my humility" (2 Sam. 16: 10, 12).
52. Let not the sun go down on our anger, but let us forgive all our debtors and strengthen love, for it covers a multitude of sins. Whoever harbors enmity toward a brother and thinks to offer anything to God will be regarded as one who offers a dog as a sacrifice or the price of a prostitute. Whoever harbors enmity toward a brother—and thinks he loves Christ—is a liar and deceives himself.
53. If you have a grievance against your brother, or your brother against you, be reconciled. If you do not do this, whatever you offer to God will not be accepted (Mark 11: 25; Matt. 5:23–24). But if you fulfill this commandment of the Lord, then pray to Him with boldness, saying, "Forgive me my debts, Lord, just as I forgive my brother, having fulfilled Your commandment!” And the Lover of Mankind will reply: “If you have forgiven, I also forgive; if you have pardoned, I also pardon your debts.”

5. On the Struggle Against Sorrow

1. Whoever patiently endures being slandered or wronged is like one who has confined a lion in a menagerie; but whoever retaliates against slander and wrongdoing is like a man who strikes himself (with a weapon).

2. Let us not lose heart; for we will not live forever in this life.

3. Do not let sorrow enter your heart; “for the sorrow of this world produces death, but the sorrow that is according to God” brings you eternal life (2 Cor. 7:10).

4. A monk who is ready to courageously endure whatever may happen will have only a little sorrow.

5. Do not let sorrow enter your heart, but take comfort in the Lord.

6. If you are subjected to slander, and afterward the purity of your conscience is revealed, do not become arrogant, but serve the Lord who has delivered you from human slander with humility, lest you fall into a terrible downfall.

7. A deceitful soul, when flattered, becomes arrogant, and when insulted, flies into a rage; but a good soul neither rejoices in flattery nor resents insults.

8. There is no limit to patience, provided it is infused with love.

9. Endure the Lord in the day of sorrow, so that He may shelter you in the day of wrath.

10. Do not mock the afflicted, nor rejoice at the sight of one who is going astray, lest the Lord be angry with you, and you be left without protection on the day of sorrow.

11. Do not think that you alone suffer more than anyone else. Just as it is impossible for one living on earth to avoid the air, so it is impossible for a person living in this world not to be tempted by sorrows and illnesses. Those preoccupied with earthly things experience earthly sorrows; and those who strive for spiritual things suffer for spiritual reasons. But the latter will be blessed, for their fruit is abundant in the Lord.

12. If we are prisoners of God the Savior, we will not be ashamed to bear the bonds of sorrow, but we will endure them with joy, awaiting His coming from heaven, when He will number us among the ranks of the saints; for those who share in His suffering will also share in His comfort (2 Cor. 1:7).

13. There are now two kinds of sorrow that surround every person under the sun: sorrow for God and worldly sorrow; and it is impossible to go through this life without one or the other—either without sorrow for God or without worldly sorrow. — Worldly sorrow is heavy and offers no reward; but sorrow for God brings comfort and, even more, gladdens the heart with the promise of eternal life. When you are subjected to the former, hasten to transform it into the latter—and you will drive the agonizing sorrow from your heart.

14. If, while doing God’s work with humility and reverence, the enemy—intending to hinder you from living a righteous life—stirs up careless people against you, do not be afraid, do not lose heart, and do not stray from the straight path. “Wait for the Lord” (Ps. 26:14), O chosen one of God, so that those who now insult you may be amazed at your glorious salvation, as it is written: “The righteous, even if he meets his end, will rest in peace” (Wisdom of Solomon 4:7).

15. Just as fire in a smelter tests gold and silver, so the souls of mortals are tested in tribulations, having the Lord as their helper.

16. Let us not fear trials, but let us boldly strive for the honor of the higher calling in Christ. For the Lord crowns all who love Him.

17. Whoever wishes to become a monk but cannot endure insults, humiliation, and loss will never become a monk.

18. Bear insults and slander magnanimously—taking a bad name as a good one, and the most unworthy name as a name that pleases God. —And one must always remember that “a servant of the Lord must not quarrel but be gentle toward all” (2 Tim. 2:24).

19. If you happen to fall ill, do not resort to useless remedies or human protection; but rather, let us be patient, awaiting God’s mercy, that He may guide us in all things; for there are times when even the flesh needs correction. In everything, let us please the Lord, “for He cares for us” (1 Peter 5:7). When a person is sick, his soul begins to seek the Lord even more than usual. Why is correction good, provided that the one being corrected gives thanks? Certainly, such a person will say: “If we accept the good things from the Lord, shall we not also endure the bad? May the name of the Lord be blessed forever” (Job 2:10; 1:21).

20. We must not lose heart during times of temptation, but remain vigilant in prayer and good deeds—imitating those who sail the sea, who, when a storm arises, keep a watchful eye on everything, stay alert, and call upon God for help. The Lord does not despise those who call upon Him in truth. Therefore, when sorrow befalls us, let us also take refuge in the Lord, as it is said: “O Lord, in our distress we remember You” (Isa. 26: 16). The sea is not always calm; and it is impossible to sail through this life without temptation. But if we hold fast to our faith in the Lord as if it were a rudder, it will lead us into the harbor of life—and then, having laid aside our labors, we will be clothed with life and incorruption.

21. If sorrow comes upon us, let us look forward to the coming of joy. Let us take as an example those sailing the sea. When the wind rises and a fierce storm strikes, they battle the waves, awaiting calm weather; and when calm sets in, they await the storm; and so they are always vigilant, lest a sudden gust of wind catch them unprepared and capsize them in the sea. So too must we act. When sorrow and hardship befall us, let us expect relief and help from God, so that, should the sorrow continue, the thought that we no longer have hope of salvation will not bring about our death. And in the same way, when we are joyful, let us expect sorrow, so that in the midst of our joy we do not forget our tears.

22. Be steadfast in temptations and sorrows, and resist the lust that inflames you, so that you, like an unfired brick, will not be washed away by raindrops, and so that you will not be found lacking the steadfastness you think you possess.

23. Having resolved to please God, be patient. Look at the generations of old, and you will see that all the saints attained the promises through constant and long-suffering patience. Therefore, let us urge ourselves every day so that we, too, may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven with them. – Because of our unbelief, patience departs from us. Be zealous for the Lord, and take courage as a faithful one, so that you may not lose your spiritual strength because of great sorrow. Imagine those who were subjected to torture in exile, in the mines, and in bitter slavery—and submit to the afflictions that befall you for the Lord’s sake.

24. If you happen to experience grief, enduring it is not yet the greatest evil; but it is both difficult and dangerous to remain in that state of grief. If someone has spoken ill of you in your absence, and another comes and tells you that a certain brother has spoken ill of you, then, as a wise person, discern whose temptation this is, and do not be upset with your brother. And say this to the one who told you: “Although he has insulted me, he is my brother, and I myself deserved the insult; moreover, he did not act of his own accord, but the enemy arranged this to sow enmity between us. May the Lord thwart the schemes of the evil one, have mercy on my brother, and not forsake us.” – If you are insulted to your face again, do not be upset by this, and do not let your mind be stirred up. – When it happens that we suffer an insult because of a wrongdoing, let us not be hard-hearted, but rather correct our own mistake.

25. If the one who comforts the sorrowful is a spiritual person, he comes to him not to cause harm, but for great benefit. But whoever has a carnal mindset will bring no benefit at all; rather, coming to comfort the sorrowful, he will upset him even more.

26. You hear an unpleasant word—and you grieve. But if you are rightly rebuked by a word, rejoice that you have been rebuked for your own good, and strive to correct your failings. Have you been rebuked unjustly? All the greater will be your reward if you bear it with good grace. And the Apostles, like criminals, were beaten in the midst of the city; yet they did not grow angry or become indignant, but rejoiced, “because they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for His name’s sake” (Acts 5:41). Rejoice, too, that you have been counted worthy to suffer dishonor for His name’s sake.

27. Perhaps some negligent person might say, “It grieves me that this has happened to me after so much toil.”—Does this grieve you, servant of the Lord? Would it not be better for you to realize from this that, after so many years of effort, your passions still remain unconquered, and, having realized this, to begin conquering them starting with this very incident? “For if anyone thinks he is something when he is nothing, he deceives himself” (Gal. 6:3). The skill of a helmsman is revealed during a storm. Whoever boasts, “I have been living the monastic life for so many years,” yet does not demonstrate the deeds of that life, carries with him the tools of a craft he has not yet mastered. “A small trial befell you, and you immediately stepped out of the monastic way of life, as if you had renounced the monastic life. In a single moment, you ruined the labor of so many years.” “No, brother, do not turn your back on your enemies; but stand firm, fight, and your enemies will flee from you.” Put on the armor of faith, take up the “helmet of salvation,” take the “sword” of the Holy Spirit, “which is the word of God” (Eph. 6:17)—and fight, so that the Holy Spirit dwelling within you may rejoice in your valor.

28. If you cannot endure a small temptation, how will you endure a great one? If you cannot overcome a youth, how will you overcome a mature man? If you cannot endure a word, how will you endure a blow? If you cannot endure a slap or a blow, how will you bear the cross? If you do not bear the cross, how will you inherit glory in heaven along with those who say, “For your sake we are put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep for slaughter” (Ps. 43:23)? Have we, brother, forgotten what our common Lord endured for us? He was reviled, humiliated; they said to Him, “You have a demon”—and He was not angry; they called Him a deceiver, slapped Him, beat Him, and nailed Him to the cross; He tasted vinegar mixed with gall, and was pierced in the side with a spear. He endured all this for our salvation. But we—woe to us, poor wretches!—are unwilling to endure even a single insult, not even a word, for His sake, He who suffered so much for us.

29. Whoever desires to please God and become an heir of God through faith, so that he may be called a son of God born of the Holy Spirit, must first of all, clothed in good cheer and patience, courageously endure the sorrows, misfortunes, and hardships that come his way, —whether these be physical illnesses and sufferings, or insults and offenses from people, or various invisible sorrows that wicked spirits bring upon the soul with the intent of leading it into laxity, indolence, and impatience, and thereby preventing it from entering into life. All this happens according to God’s providence, who allows every soul to be tested by various sorrows, so that those who love God with all their hearts may be made manifest through their courageous endurance of all things without losing hope in God, but with constant, grace-filled, faithful, and patient expectation of deliverance, —and so that, having endured every trial in this way, they may become worthy of the Kingdom of Heaven.

30. A soul that does not take courage and endure every temptation and every sorrow with steadfastness, but instead becomes distressed, despondent, indignant, anxious, and neglects the struggle—or even falls into despair— as one who no longer has hope of deliverance—having failed to preserve within herself the hope that, with unshakable faith, awaits God’s mercy—certainly does not become worthy of life; for she has not followed all the Saints, nor has she walked in the footsteps of the Lord. Look and observe how, from ancient times, the Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, and Martyrs, having walked this path of temptation and sorrow, were able to please God thereby and were deemed worthy of great rewards.

31. God does not allow a soul that trusts in Him and is patient to be tempted to such an extent that it reaches despair—that is, to fall into such temptations and sorrows that it cannot bear them (1 Cor. 10:13). Nor does the evil one tempt the soul or burden it with sorrow to the extent he wishes, but only to the extent permitted by God. Let the soul endure everything courageously, holding fast to hope through faith and expecting help and deliverance from God; and it is impossible for it to be forsaken. On the contrary, the more the soul strives, turning to God with faith and hope and unquestionably expecting help and deliverance from Him, the sooner the Lord delivers it from every sorrow that holds it back. For He knows how much the soul must be subjected to trial and temptation—and He permits only that much. If a potter, having made vessels, does not place them in the kiln to be fired and hardened, they will not be fit for human use. But even when he places them in the kiln, he knows how long they must remain in the fire until they are ready, and he does not leave them in the kiln longer than necessary, lest they crack from being overfired; nor does he take them out prematurely, lest they remain unfinished and unfit for use. Therefore, if people have such discernment and knowledge when it comes to mortal matters, how much more does God know the needs of the soul in trials and temptations—those who desire to please Him and long to attain eternal life.

32. Just as flax is not suitable for spinning into fine threads unless it is beaten many times—yet the more it is beaten, the purer and more suitable it becomes for spinning— so too does a God-loving soul, when subjected to many temptations and trials and courageously enduring sorrows, become purer and more fit for spiritual work, and is ultimately deemed worthy to inherit the Kingdom of Heaven. – Sorrows and temptations make the soul virtuous and steadfast, if it endures all that befalls it courageously, willingly, and with hope in God, awaiting deliverance from the Lord and His mercy with unshakable faith.

33. Souls subjected to afflictions as a test, and tormented in various ways by evil spirits—whether secretly, through the inner burden of sorrow or wicked thoughts, or openly, through bodily sufferings—if they endure courageously, maintain their hope, and await their reward from the Lord; they will be deemed worthy of the crowns of righteousness, and on the Day of Judgment will attain the same boldness before God as the martyrs. For the suffering in tribulations is the same—endured by some on the cross, by others through the evil spirits acting upon them.

34. If the enemy is unable to lead someone astray or bring them down through their thoughts, he then inflicts sorrows upon that person to cloud their mind, and only then sows whatever he pleases within them. And if even this fails to lead him into evil, the enemy grants him all the comforts of life; he exalts him and leads him into a great delusion, which is more dangerous and worse than all passions, for it makes a person proud, draws him into the abyss of sensuality, and drives out the remembrance of God, of his own weakness, and of the hour of death. He discerns a person's inclinations and then turns against them, opposing them with every kind of injustice.

35. Everything comes from God—both good and sorrowful; but one comes by His good pleasure, another by His discipline, and a third by His permission. By His good pleasure, when we live virtuously; for it pleases God that those who live virtuously be crowned with the wreaths of patience; for the sake of discipline, when, having fallen into sin, we are corrected; and by God's permission, when, even after being corrected, we do not repent. — Again, for the sake of discipline, God punishes us sinners so that we may not be condemned along with the world, as the Apostle says: "We are disciplined by the Lord so that we may not be condemned with the world" (1 Cor. 11:32). — In this sense—"There is no evil in the city that the Lord has not brought about" (Amos 3:6)—such as famine, plagues, diseases, defeats, and wars; for all these serve to purify us from sin. — God, however, permits—and completely abandons—those who either do not wish to live without sin or, despite being admonished, do not repent but remain in sin. "Then God gives them over to a depraved mind," that is, He permits them the freedom to "commit all kinds of immorality" (Rom. 1: 28).

6. On the Struggle Against Despondency

1. A grumbling person is unfit for any task and lacks enthusiasm. He is lazy and always has an excuse ready to shirk his duties. And he corrupts others, saying, "What's the point of this? What's the point of that? There's no use in any of this."

2. When called to sing psalms, the lazy person gets annoyed; when awakened for a vigil, he makes excuses about stomachaches and headaches. If someone admonishes him, he says, "Teach yourself"; if taught something, he shouts, "I know that myself."

3. It is not right for a man who is able to work to eat another's bread in idleness, when the Apostle says, "I have kept myself from need, and will keep myself" (2 Cor. 11:9).

4. A grumbling monk suffers great harm; but whoever endures everything courageously will inherit joy.

5. If a spirit of despondency comes upon you, do not leave your home, but resist this spirit with patience. Do not let the thought that urges you to move from place to place persuade you. For if you give in to this thought, you will never have patience.

6. But the monk says, "Here there is strife and hardship, but there (in such-and-such a place) is a peaceful and carefree life" (thinking of moving there). For do you know who wages war against us? Is it not our enemy, the devil? And he "roams the whole earth" (Job 2:2). Since, wherever you go, you will be under heaven; thus, you will be vulnerable to the devil everywhere. Why is it better, then, to remain where you are, "to resist the devil, and he will flee from you"; and conversely, "draw near to God, and He will draw near to you" (James 4:7–8)?

7. The lazy monk makes excuses and says, "Today I live here, and tomorrow I'll go somewhere else; why should I work?"

8. A lazy monk gathers many excuses for himself—and the slumbering one will fall into trouble.

9. Whoever constantly moves from one cell to another acquires vain thoughts; but whoever remains in one place is more at peace.

10. A wandering monk is not immune to trouble unless he remains sober; but the one who stays where he is called will more quickly find peace.

11. Idleness is pleasant to you, but its end is bitter; you grow weary from work, but you will rejoice afterward.

12. A lazy and self-centered (self-pitying) monk, as soon as he sees work, hides, yet at supper he places himself among the first.

13. Remembrance of death and punishment is a sword against the demon of despondency.

14. Of all heavy burdens, despondency is the heaviest—especially when accompanied by unbelief; for its fruits are filled with deadly poison.

15. You, monk, have left your cell and wander through the world. Do you not fear “lawlessness and strife in the city” (Ps. 54:10)?

16. Who is more lazy than the thirsty man who sits near a spring yet does not reach out his hands to draw water and quench his thirst?—And who is more negligent than the man who owns a book yet neglects to read it?

17. Take the trouble to teach literacy to those who wish to learn it, so that, as they read about God’s wondrous deeds, they may bless His wondrous Name; and God will be your rewarder.

18. A monk in despondency is overcome by sloth; and when he has patience, he is overcome by pride; but whoever truly loves the Lord rejects both.

19. A lazy monk will suffer many losses, but a sober one will not neglect a single hour.

20. Do not love to move from place to place; but rather, with patience, derive benefit from the hardships encountered in your place of residence. Tell me, after you and I have traveled the whole world, will not a cell await us if we wish to be saved? And if we lack the patience to remain in a communal dwelling, and find no peace even in solitude, where, then, will we finally find refuge? This is like saying, “I cannot bear the sun’s heat, nor can I endure the shade.” I fear that, in the end, that very cave will shelter us.

21. Let us be steadfast in heart; for weakness of heart is contrary to virtue. Let us not lose heart if a little despondency befalls us, but let us compel ourselves, like a good traveler. When a traveler grows weak along the way, he does not give up on his goal of continuing the journey, but comforts himself with the words: “It’s not much further, and you’ll reach your lodging and rest.”—And the Lord, seeing how we compel ourselves, will give us strength and ease our difficulties.

22. To provide for ourselves, let us work, trusting in God. Do not grieve over labor; many, doing nothing, were weighed down by their very idleness. Learn to work so that you will not have to learn to beg for alms. Do not be negligent in your work. “The Lord is near” (Phil. 4:6).

23. Let us not lose heart while sitting in our cells, remembering that the holy martyrs, after much torture, were bound in iron chains. Therefore, let us not flee from the hardships of the cell, nor long for work, remembering that many of the saints were sent to the mines for the Lord’s sake. If we had lived in those times, would we have changed our way of life because of the torments? Would we have renounced our faith because of extremely difficult circumstances?

24. Hold fast to the place where you live, resisting sloth. For it is not by change of place or distance, but only by attentiveness of mind that you can subdue the passions. We need “patience” so that, “having done the will of God, we may receive the promises” (Heb. 10:36). He who gives in to despondency is as far from patience as a sick person is from health. Virtue is not recognized in despondency, but in patience. And patience is renewed and strengthened when the mind is occupied with contemplation and divine instruction. Nourished in this way, the mind gains strength, just as the body does from healthy food. But if the mind turns away from this grace and from this dignity, it will truly become poor and weak. Therefore, having cast off your attachment to material things, exercise your mind in this divine activity. And you will have no need to move your body from place to place or to wear it out with travels without a blessed purpose. For “the Kingdom of God is within us” (Luke 17:21).

25. When you notice within yourself that reading the Holy Scriptures has become tedious to you, and you are reluctant to listen to spiritual instruction, then know that your soul has fallen into a grave illness. For this is the beginning of wickedness, through which those afflicted have reaped the fruit of death.

26. Blessed is the one who cultivates beautiful and good thoughts within himself at every moment—and through hope has conquered the wicked passion of despondency, against which the Lord’s ascetics struggle.

27. Blessed is the one who, in the Lord’s work, has become like a valiant warrior, rousing the slothful and encouraging the faint-hearted on the Lord’s path.

28. Blessed is the one whom the passion of despondency has not cast down as one lacking courage; but he has attained perfect patience, for which all the saints have received their crowns.

29. When the spirit of despondency troubles you, do not be carried away by its thoughts; but remain in the very place where God has set you, reflecting within yourself on the love you had for God when you first came to the monastery gates. Let us have that same love until the end, enduring the Lord like a wrestler who, through endurance, overcomes the one striking him. For “whoever endures to the end will be saved” (Matt. 10:22).

30. Before the all-night vigil, a thought came to one brother: “Give yourself a rest today, and do not get up for the vigil.” But he replied to the thought: “Who knows? Perhaps you won’t get up tomorrow; that is why you must get up today.” And while he was working, a thought was also suggested to him: “Give yourself a rest today, and work tomorrow.” But he replied again: “No, I will work today, and the Lord will take care of tomorrow.”

31. If despondency troubles you, do not lose heart, but pray to the Lord that He may grant you patience. After praying, sit down, gather your thoughts, and comfort your soul with a psalm: “Why are you downcast, O my soul? Why do you trouble me? Trust in God, for I will yet confess to Him that He is the salvation of my face and my God” (Ps. 41:6). Say also: “Why are you so downcast, my soul? After all, we will not always live in this world. Listen to what the Psalmist says: ‘I am a sojourner on earth, and a stranger, just as all my fathers were’ (Ps. 38:13). We too will pass away with you, when it pleases God. The life of the righteous begins at their death. That is why the Prophet, longing for the life to come, says: “As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for You, O God; when shall I come and appear before Your face?” (Ps. 41:2–3). The saints regarded this present life as a prison. That is why one of them joyfully cried out, “Now You are letting Your servant depart in peace, O Lord” (Luke 2:29); and another declared that he desired “to be released and to be with Christ” (Phil. 1:23).

32. When morning comes, the brother rises, offers a prayer, and sets to work on his craft. Then the enemy of good, the demon, instills in him a thought of despondency.

33. If, when despondency comes upon him, the brother continues to work and labor, then, with the help of grace, he drives the despondency away from himself. But if, when despondency comes upon him, the brother does not ward it off with patience, he is overcome by it and becomes its captive. Giving free rein to his thoughts, he begins to say to himself: “Today I feel somewhat downcast and unwell. I will rest today, and in the morning I will make up for two days’ work.” Thus, on this first day, the brother does nothing, hoping to make up for this neglect in the morning. But in the morning, the demon who hates goodness brings upon him an even deeper despondency than the day before. Then, already overcome by his thoughts, the brother gets up and sets aside his work—and either does not do it at all, or does it halfheartedly, not as a serious task. — Or the enemy lures him out of his cell and makes him loiter about.

34. Whatever you are doing, if the enemy brings despondency upon you while you are at work, to counter this adversary, point to some similar craft (adding: “Do you see how they labor for the sake of the temporary? Why, then, are you unwilling to labor for the sake of the eternal?”). And whatever work you undertake, let your conscience be your witness that what you are doing is done according to God—and you will be saved (from despondency).

7. On the Struggle Against Vanity

1. Understand, monk, what I am saying: let there not be in us—outwardly—piety, but within the cell—carefree licentiousness; lest we be like “whitewashed tombs” (Matt. 23:27). For in every place there is one and the same God, to whom be glory forever! Amen.

2. A monk who boasts of his own strength is the first fool; it is a source of shame and reproach for a monk to boast of his own power: “Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord” (1 Cor. 1:31).

3. Do you wish to earn a good reputation? “Conduct your affairs with meekness” (Sir. 3:17).

4. It is not yet a virtue to be dishonored and not feel it; but it is a virtue to feel it and endure it for the sake of piety. For it is said: “The sluggard is not put to shame” (Prov. 20:4).

5. The love of glory is a disease of the soul, a wicked passion.

6. It is written: “Let the sincere praise you, not your own mouth—a stranger, not your own lips” (Prov. 27:2). And again: “Silver and gold are tested by fire,” and a person “is tested by the lips of those who praise him” (v. 21).

7. Give honor to all for the Lord’s sake, without seeking honor for yourself, and you will find favor with the Lord.

8. Never be taken aback by a people-pleaser who seeks to please many, but not the Lord.

9. In secret, beloved, keep the Lord’s commandments, and the Lord will reward you openly.

10. If you see that a person on earth has attained great dignity, do not be amazed by this; but be amazed by the one who has come to hate earthly glory.

11. Be careful that, in desiring excessive honor for yourself, you do not bring dishonor upon yourself; for true honor for a person is to do everything according to God, while great dishonor is to transgress the commandments.

12. Do not strive to appear skilled in every task, lest you fall into vanity, which leads to a love of glory, anger, and sorrow. Above all, strive to be simple and even-tempered in all things.

13. Do not boast by flaunting your eloquence, but rather proclaim the teaching derived from the experience of simple, uneducated people, so that you may become a disciple of Christ's Apostles; for boasting in outward wisdom is forbidden, especially for Christians. "Let him who boasts, boast in the Lord" (2 Cor. 10:17).

14. Those who practice virtue to please others have laid the foundation of their salvation not on rock but on sand; therefore, as soon as the rain falls, the rivers rise, and the winds (temptations) blow, they fall away from their resolve. If they do not fall but live as they ought, they become puffed up with great pride; and when they do fall, they give themselves over to useless despair.

15. "Let no one boast of himself" (2 Cor. 10:18). But first examine your own deeds: have you truly lived a life worthy of the praise you give yourself—have you conquered lust, embraced poverty, hated slander, set aside the love of vanity, hated sexual desire, have you abhorred sensuality, have you truly done no harm to anyone, have you overcome your passions, have you truly not become angry when insulted, and when hearing praise of yourself, have you not become arrogant, have you loved the Lord with all your strength and your neighbor as yourself?—If we have not kept these things, then why should we boast about ourselves? — We must weep over this before the Lord's mercy, that He may heal us from the hardening of our hearts and strengthen us to lead a life worthy of Him.

16. We must do nothing to show off to people, but in everything we must act from a pure heart; for God knows what is hidden and secret, and from Him alone do we hope to receive our reward.

17. A vain man, though poor in possessions, even if he takes upon himself the title of King, is not yet a King; so a monk who eats in secret, yet hypocritically pretends to be a faster and a chaste man at the communal meal, is not yet an ascetic. He weaves a web of deceit—and walks not in the righteous path of the saints, but in the path of those who seek to please men.

8. On the Struggle Against Pride

1. The proud person cannot tolerate anyone being superior to him—and when he encounters such a person, he either envies him or competes with him. Rivalry and envy go hand in hand, and whoever harbors one of these passions harbors both.

2. Those who possess these passions are tormented by the success of others; those who do not are not grieved by it. The latter, when honor is bestowed upon another, is not embarrassed; when another is exalted, is not troubled, because he gives everyone the advantage and prefers everyone to himself.

3. Without humility, every feat, every act of self-restraint, every act of obedience, every act of non-covetousness, and every act of learning is in vain.

4. The impure spirit of pride is cunning and multifaceted, and it uses every effort to prevail over everyone: it ensnares the wise with wisdom, the strong with strength, the rich with wealth, the beautiful with beauty, and the artist with art.

5. Nor does it fail to tempt those who lead a spiritual life in the same way, setting its snares—for the one who has renounced the world, in his renunciation; for the chaste, in their chastity; for the silent one, in their silence; for the non-covetous, in their non-covetousness; for the prayerful, in their prayer. In all of them, it strives to sow its tares.

6. As a remedy against pride, read more often the following and other similar passages from Scripture directed against it: "When you have done all that is commanded you, say, 'We are unworthy servants'" (Luke 17:10). "If anyone thinks he is something when he is nothing, he deceives himself" (Gal. 6:3). "Whatever is exalted among men is an abomination before the Lord" (Luke 16:15). "Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls, says the Lord" (Matt. 11:29). "In our humility the Lord has remembered us; He has delivered us from our enemies" (Ps. 135: 23). "I humbled myself, and He saved me" (Ps. 114: 5). "Everyone who is haughty is an abomination to the Lord" (Prov. 16: 5).

7. If you are healthy in body, do not be proud, but be cautious.

8. Whoever exalts himself brings disgrace upon himself; but whoever serves his neighbor in humility will be glorified.
9. Humble the thought of pride before pride humbles you. Cast down the thought of arrogance before it casts you down. Crush lust before lust crushes you.
10. Do not condemn your brother for his inconsistency, lest you yourself fall into the same weakness.
11. A novice who lacks humility has no weapon with which to resist; and such a one will suffer a great defeat.
12. Let the monk consider himself the least of all—and he will gain hope. For “the one who humbles himself will be exalted, and the one who exalts himself will be humbled” (Luke 18:14).
13. The evil reproaches against a monk are pride, insolence, callousness, shamelessness, recklessness, quick temper, and madness.
14. If you love pride, you will belong to the demons; if you love humility, you will belong to the Lord Christ.
15. A haughty person will endure much sorrow, but the humble will always rejoice in the Lord.
16. Pride always seeks honor; but humility is not exalted in glory, nor is it troubled in disgrace; for it awaits its reward from the Lord.
17. Pride blinds the eyes of the wise, but humility enlightens them with love; for the Lord “teaches the meek His way” (Ps. 24:9).
18. It is dangerous for a person to trust in himself, but whoever trusts in the Lord will be saved.
19. He who adorns his garments will become proud; and a proud monk is like an eagle that has not yet grown its feathers.
20. A humble and wise monk is a light and swift walker and (as it were) a sharp-shooting archer.
21. Just as iron refines and subdues all things, so too does godly humility destroy the enemy’s schemes.
22. Just as a spear is to a hunter and a weapon is to a warrior, so is humility to a monk.
23. Pride is dangerous to a person, in whatever form it may take. Do not love pride, for there is no benefit in it. Every infirmity is healed through care, but the disease of pride is an evil that is difficult to cure; for it rejects healing medicine and concocts for itself a deadly poison. May it not be found among Christ’s servants.
24. Do you want to be great?—Be the least of all (Mark 9:35).
25. If a brother leaves the monastery, do not look down on him in your thoughts, and let him not be dishonorable in your eyes: “Do not despise the day of your youth” (Prov. 3:28).
26. Listen to the one who says, “Take heed that you stand firm, so that you may not fall” (1 Cor. 10:12), and also, “Do not boast of yourself, but let God be the one who commends you” (2 Cor. 10:18). For many thought of themselves that they had triumphed and were in charge; but they became the lowest of the low, while the desperate received grace; for God “opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble” (James 4:6).
27. If you see a person who is disobedient, proud, and “wise in his own eyes,” then his root is already half-dead; for he does not accept the nourishment imparted by the fear of God. But if you see a person who is silent and humble, know that his root is strong; for he is nourished by the fear of God.
28. Great is the success and great is the glory of humility, and there is no downfall in it. The sign of humility is to meet your brother’s needs with both hands, just as if you yourself were receiving assistance.
29. A proud and rebellious person will see bitter days; but the humble and patient will always rejoice in the Lord.
30. It is a great thing to find a humble and patient person; his goodness knows no bounds.
31. Whoever exalts himself above his brother is mocked by demons.
32. Rain causes weeds to multiply, and associating with worldly people breeds pride. But those who fear the Lord do not exalt themselves.
33. If you have been granted a gift, do not be presumptuous; for you possess not a single perfection of your own, “which you did not receive from God” (1 Cor. 4:7); and if you do not walk according to His commandments and will, He will take His gift from you and give it to someone better: and then you will be like a man from whom a pen, just dipped in ink, is taken away.
34. No matter how much a person exalts himself in the pride of his heart, he still tramples upon the earth from which he was taken and to which he will return; but the Lord exalts the humble.

35. Arrogance brings down, but humility receives the prize of victory.

36. Even if you prove to be as pure as gold before your brothers, still consider yourself a vessel unfit for use, and you will avoid pride, which is hateful to God and to people.

37. If you see that a brother is sinning, and you meet him the next morning, do not despise him, regarding him as a sinner in your thoughts; for you do not know that, perhaps, after you left him, he did something good in the wake of his fall and appeased the Lord with sighs and bitter tears.

38. We must refrain from condemning others; but each of us must humble ourselves, speaking of ourselves with the words of the Psalm: “My iniquities have overwhelmed my head; they have become a heavy burden upon me” (Ps. 37:5).

39. Do not give me, O Lord, the Lord of all, a heart that hates submission and fatherly instruction; remove from me proud thoughts; for You, O Lord, have forbidden the proud (Ps. 118:21).

40. Not only should my gaze be cast down, but my heart, too, must not exalt itself above others.

41. If two novices live with an elder, which of them is greater before the Lord? The one who humbles himself before his brother in the fear of God. For He who said, “He who humbles himself will be exalted,” did not lie (Luke 18:14).

42. Whoever wants to move a stone does not place the lever from above, but from below—and then he will easily turn the stone. This is a model of humility!

43. Pride is abhorrent to both God and people, but the Lord exalts those who love humility.

44. It is not dignity, honor, or greatness that leads to the Kingdom of Heaven, but humility, obedience, love, patience, and good will—these are what save a person. Have you not heard that the devil was cast down from heaven because of his pride? Have you not heard what great glory he lost by rebelling against God?

45. The humble person does not boast or take pride, but serves the Lord out of reverence for Him. The humble person does not impose his own will, contradicting the truth, but obeys the truth. The humble person does not envy the success of a neighbor, nor does he rejoice in his downfall; on the contrary, he rejoices with those who rejoice and weeps with those who weep. The humble person is not dejected by deprivation and poverty, nor does he become arrogant in prosperity and glory, but he remains steadfast in the same virtue. The humble person honors not only those above them but also those below them. The humble person does not become irritable, does not insult anyone, and does not quarrel with anyone. The humble person is neither stubborn nor lazy, even if called to work at midnight; for he has committed himself to obedience to the Lord’s commandments. The humble person knows neither resentment nor deceit, but serves the Lord in simplicity, living peacefully with all. The humble person, if rebuked, does not grumble, and if scolded, does not lose patience; for he is a disciple of the One who endured the cross for us. The humble person hates self-love, which is why he does not seek primacy, but regards himself in this world as a temporary passenger on a ship.

46. Even if you study the entire Divine Scripture, take care that, contrary to Scripture, such a thought does not make you proud; for all Scripture, inspired by God, teaches us humility. And whoever thinks or acts contrary to what he has been taught thereby shows that he is a transgressor.

47. If the spirit of pride, or self-will, or wealth troubles you, do not be carried away by it, but rather stand courageously against the armies of the wicked and deceitful spirit. Picture in your mind ancient buildings, weathered statues, and pillars corroded by rust—and reflect within yourself, and consider where the owners and builders of all this are; and strive to please the Lord, that you may be deemed worthy of the Kingdom of Heaven: “for all flesh is like grass, and all the glory of man like the flower of grass” (1 Peter 1:24). What is higher and more glorious than royal dignity and glory? But even kings pass away, and so does their glory. Those who are deemed worthy of the Kingdom of Heaven, however, will experience nothing of the sort; they will dwell in peace and joy in heaven with the angels, free from sickness, sorrow, and sighing, in joy and gladness, praising, glorifying, and extolling the King of Heaven and the Lord of all the earth.

48. If you are the first to arrive at the divine service and remain there until the end, let not this thought make you proud; for pride is like a den in which a serpent nestles and kills whoever approaches.

49. Let us not exalt ourselves, but rather humble ourselves. And what strength do we have to exalt ourselves, when even a small difficulty brings us down to the ground? Therefore, let us love humility, so that the Lord may not turn away from us.

50. In every place and in every deed, let humility be with you. For just as the body needs clothing, whether it is warm or cold outside, so too does the soul have a constant need to clothe itself in humility. It is better to walk naked and barefoot than to be stripped of humility; for the Lord covers those who love it.

51. Maintain a humble mindset, lest, having risen to great heights, you crash in a terrible fall.

52. The beginning of humility is submission. Let humility be both the foundation and the garment of your response; let your speech be simple and gracious in the love of God. Pride is unyielding, disobedient, and rebellious; it is led by its own thoughts. But humility is obedient, meek, and modest; it honors both the lowly and the mighty.

53. Having chosen a life of piety for yourself, be on guard lest the evil one, under the guise of piety, instill in you a foreign thought—namely, vanity and pride—which will make you unwilling to labor alongside your brothers. Work as the other brothers do, and guard your piety.

54. If a thought of conceit troubles you, say to the one wrestling against you: “Depart from me, wicked thought. What have I done, and in what virtue have I excelled, that you inspire such thoughts in me? The saints ‘were stoned, were sawn in two, were put to the test, were put to death by the sword’ (Heb. 11:37). The Lord Himself, the Ruler of all, “endured” the cross for us, disregarding the shame (– 12:2). But I, having spent my entire life in sin, what answer will I give on the Day of Judgment?”—And by this you will drive away pride from yourself.

55. One brother said: “I asked the Lord for a spirit of humility, so that when my brother commands me to do something, I might say to myself, ‘This is your master; obey him’; and if another brother commands me, I would again say, ‘This is your master’s brother.’ And if a child were to command me, I would say, ‘Obey the son of your master.’—And in this way, resisting foreign thoughts and with the help of grace, he went about his work with a peaceful mind.

56. Fearlessness gives rise to pride; and pride is the mother of disobedience. Humility and meekness bind those who possess them to the fear of God, like a pillar firmly established in the temple of God.

57. Guard yourself against the demon of conceit, lest you fall into a spirit of pride and disobedience and bring harm upon yourself. There is no shame in remaining in submission to the Lord and doing good with your own hands. This small furnace—and the suffering you endure for the Lord’s sake—will bring you eternal life. Imagine that someone exchanges a drachma for many thousands of talents of gold; this is what every sorrow of the monastic life signifies in comparison with the future suffering that will befall those who do evil. You give up a little, and you are given much. — Therefore, renounce pride, and the Lord will be your portion.

58. The distinguishing features and characteristics of a person who possesses true humility are as follows: to consider oneself a sinner more than all other sinners, having done nothing good before God; to reproach oneself at all times, in every place and for every deed; to slander no one and to find no one on earth who is more sinful or more negligent than oneself, but always to praise and glorify everyone; never to condemn, belittle, or slander anyone; to remain silent at all times, and to say nothing without being commanded or out of extreme necessity; but when asked, and there is a purpose, or extreme necessity compels one to speak and answer, then speak softly, calmly, sparingly, as if under compulsion and with shame; never put oneself forward unduly in anything, and never argue with anyone—neither about faith nor about anything else; but if someone speaks well, say to him, “Yes,” and if badly, reply, “As you see fit”; be submissive and despise one’s own will as something pernicious; keep one’s gaze cast down toward the ground at all times; keep one’s own death before one’s eyes; never engage in idle talk, never speak frivolously, never lie, and never contradict one’s superiors; to bear insults, humiliations, and losses with joy; to hate idleness and love labor; to grieve no one, nor wound anyone’s conscience. These are the marks of true humility; and blessed is the one who possesses them; for here one begins to become the dwelling place and temple of God, and God dwells within him—and he becomes an heir to the Kingdom.

59. There is no humility in a sinner regarding himself as a sinner; but humility consists in this: while recognizing much and great things within oneself, not imagining anything great about oneself. He is humble who is like Paul; yet he says of himself: “I consider myself to be nothing” (1 Cor. 4:4)—or: “Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the foremost” (1 Tim. 1:15). Thus, to be exalted by merit and to humble oneself in mind—this is humility!

6. General Lessons on the Ascetic Life

1. There is restraint of the tongue—not speaking much or idly, not slandering; not hurting others with words, not swearing, not engaging in idle talk, not backbiting, not gossiping, not revealing secrets, and not meddling in matters that do not concern us.

2. There is restraint of the ear—to control one’s hearing and not be swayed by idle gossip.

3. There is restraint of the eyes—to control one’s gaze and not fix one’s eyes on what is sinfully pleasing or inappropriate.
4. There is self-restraint in anger—to control one’s anger and not flare up suddenly.
5. There is self-restraint in glory—not to desire or seek praise and honor, not to boast, not to be haughty, and not to have high hopes for oneself.
6. There is self-restraint in thoughts—to subdue thoughts with the fear of God, not to yield to seductive and inflaming thoughts, and not to take pleasure in them.
7. There is moderation in food—do not desire or seek out many, sweet, or expensive dishes; do not eat at irregular hours; do not give in to gluttony; do not let the quality of the food stir up greed; and do not crave one dish one moment and another the next.
8. There is moderation in drinking: do not consume not only wine but also water without measure; do not seek the pleasure of drinking artfully prepared concoctions; do not seek out various beverages; do not drink wine unnecessarily; and do not attend feasts.
9. There is abstinence from sinful sensuality—not giving in to accidental stirrings of lust, not yielding to shameful thoughts, not fulfilling the desires of the flesh, but restraining one’s passions through the fear of God.
10. The holy Fathers have left us a wonderful rule for acts of repentance and ascetic labor, saying: “Do not abstain only today, but prepare a feast for tomorrow; do not drink only water today, but obtain wine for tomorrow; do not wear only a hair shirt today, but fine cloth tomorrow; do not be meek and humble only today, but arrogant and proud tomorrow; do not be quiet and obedient only today, but unruly and unyielding tomorrow; do not give yourself over to weeping and wailing only today, but to laughter and indifference tomorrow; do not sleep on the bare ground only today, but rest on a soft bed tomorrow. But keep to one rule, my beloved, by which you may please God and be of benefit to yourself and your neighbor.
11. For forty or fifty years, the Holy Fathers did not change their rule—that is, their beautiful and blameless self-restraint, observed in regard to food, speech, sleeping on the bare ground, humility, meekness, faith, and love, non-covetousness, and unceasing prayer with weeping and contrition—and in this way they purified themselves. That is why God dwelt within them and was glorified in them.
12. If anyone does not purify himself from every wicked deed, from impure thoughts, from evil desires, from anger, irritability, envy, pride, vanity, hatred, slander, condemnation, and idle talk—in a word, —from everything that is hateful to God—and if, having turned away from these things, they do not keep themselves at a distance from them, then God will not dwell within them. Therefore, let us purify ourselves, beloved, so that God may dwell within us—and we may be made worthy of His promises.
13. Do you want to know what is in your heart? Listen! A love of praise is a sign that we are vain; a delight in food shows that we are gluttons; neglect reveals that we are lazy; greed—that we do not love Christ; envy proclaims that there is no love in us; the pleasure with which we condemn others means that we are full of hatred. Thus, the invisible soul is made visible through bodily actions, revealing whether it is good or evil.
14. But the tongue serves as the most uncontrollable preacher of what the heart loves and to what it clings; the secrets of our heart are exposed through our lips. When our lips are open and unguarded, our words flow indiscriminately, bringing to light everything that is in the heart. Therefore, if you wish to know the thoughts of the heart, pay attention to the mouth; from it you will learn what the heart cares about and strives for—whether earthly or heavenly, spiritual or carnal, pleasure or self-control, greed or contentment, humility or pride, love or hatred. From the treasures of the heart, the mouth offers food to those who come, and what the tongue is occupied with reveals what the heart loves—Christ, or something of this world.
15. Our soul is good by nature, but it becomes evil by its own free will. Passions are unnatural; they are instilled and developed by evil will—and habit makes them as strong as nature itself. Nature is bondage; habit is the will. The will, being free, is like a farmer who instills in our nature both bad and good habits, as he pleases. Nature is the soil we cultivate; the will is the farmer; and the Divine Scriptures are the advisors and teachers who instruct our farmer as to which bad habits he should uproot and which good virtues he should plant.
16. No matter how sober and zealous our farmer may be, without the teaching of the Divine Scriptures he is neither strong nor knowledgeable. The precepts of the Divine Scriptures give him understanding and strength, as well as—from their own branches—the good virtues to graft onto the tree of nature: namely, faith, hope, love, knowledge, diligence, and the like. But if our farmer, in his pride, should ever decide to abandon his teacher and counselor—that is, the Divine Scriptures—then he begins to act errantly and grafts onto nature what is foreign to it, namely: unbelief, ignorance, hatred, envy, pride, vanity, love of glory, gluttony, strife, rebellion, and many other such things; because, having forsaken the Lawgiver, he himself is forsaken by Him. But if, having repented, he condemns himself and, falling at the feet of the Lawgiver, says, “I have sinned by forsaking You”; then the Lawgiver, in His characteristic love for mankind, immediately accepts him, grants him understanding and the strength to once again cultivate the field of his nature, to uproot the bad habits within it, and to plant good virtues in their place. Moreover, He grants him crowns for this and showers him with praise.

17. Why, then, have you renounced the world, if you still seek worldly pleasures, desiring clothing instead of nakedness, and wine instead of thirst? – You have been called to battle, yet you wish to go into battle against the enemy unarmed; instead of keeping vigil, you sink into sleep; instead of weeping and lamenting, you give yourself over to laughter; instead of love, you harbor hatred toward your brother. You have been called to obedience, yet you rebel. You are called to the inheritance of the Kingdom of God, yet you think of earthly things, displaying arrogance and pride instead of humility and meekness.

18. We are spiritual merchants, brothers, and we are like worldly merchants. A merchant calculates his profits and losses every day; and if he has suffered a loss, he strives to make up for it. So you too, beloved, every day—in the evening and in the morning—carefully reflect on how your business is faring. – And “in the evening,” entering the sanctuary of your heart, take stock and ask yourself: “Have I angered God in any way? Have I spoken idle words? Have I been careless? Have I grieved my brother? Have I condemned anyone? When I sang the psalms with my lips, was my mind not wandering toward worldly things? Did a carnal desire arise within me, and did I indulge in it with pleasure? Did I allow earthly cares to gain the upper hand over me?” If you have fallen short in any of these things, strive to make up for what you have lost; then sigh and weep, so that you may not fall into the same trap again. And “in the morning,” take stock of yourself once more and ask: “How did this night go? Did I gain anything from my efforts? Was my mind awake along with my body? Did tears flow from my eyes? Was I not weighed down by sleep while kneeling in prayer? Did wicked thoughts come to my mind, and did I dwell on them with pleasure?” If you were overcome by any of these things, then strive to heal yourself; set a guard over your heart so that you do not suffer the same thing again. – If you are so careful, you will preserve your treasure intact; and in this way you will please your Lord and benefit yourself.

19. Be mindful of yourself, lest you ever fall into laziness; for the prevalence of laziness is the beginning of ruin. Imitate the bee, and observe its wondrous mystery: how it gathers its harvest from the flowers scattered across the earth. Let your mind contemplate this insignificant creature. If all the sages of the earth and all the philosophers in the universe were gathered together, they would still be unable to make its wisdom comprehensible. And every sensible person, seeing its labors, glorifies God the Creator, marveling that so much wisdom comes from such a small creature. Likewise, my beloved, be like the bee, and gather for yourself a rich and imperishable treasure from the Divine Scriptures, and send it on to heaven.

20. A monk is like a warrior going into battle, who shields his body from all sides with full armor, remains vigilant until victory is won, and is on guard lest the enemy suddenly attack him, and lest he be taken captive if he fails to take precautions. Likewise, if a monk, allowing himself to become lax, grows slothful, he is easily captured by the enemy; for the enemy instills in him impure thoughts, which he accepts with joy—namely, thoughts of pride and vanity, as well as envy and condemnation, gluttony and insatiable sleep—and, moreover, drives him to despair. But if a monk remains ever vigilant, he draws God’s grace to his aid, learns from God how to please Him, and becomes both pleasing to God and a praiser of God. Just as one who looks at himself in a mirror is both the beholder and the beheld, so too, when grace finds rest in a person and dwells within him, it both glorifies him and is glorified by him.

21. Without the help of grace, the heart cannot muster sufficient strength or be filled with contrition to confess properly before the Lord; on the contrary, a person is poor and lacking in virtue, and vile and impure thoughts take root within him, “like a night raven on a ruin” (Ps. 101: 7). Therefore, it is man’s duty to call upon grace, so that when it comes, it may enlighten him—it is man’s duty, having purified himself, to seek that grace may dwell within him and help him; and with grace, he will succeed in every virtue, and, enlightened by it, will be able to comprehend the diversity and splendor of the blessings of the age to come. Grace becomes for him a wall and a stronghold, and protects him from this age for the life of the age to come.

22. Strive to acquire perfect virtue, adorned with all that God loves (which is love). It is called the single virtue and encompasses all the beauty and diversity of the virtues. Just as a royal diadem cannot be woven without precious stones and select pearls, so too is this single virtue impossible without the beauty of the various virtues. It is entirely like a royal diadem. Just as the latter, if it lacks even one gem or a single pearl, cannot shine upon the royal head, so too this singular virtue, if it lacks even one aspect of the beauty found in the other virtues, cannot be called a perfect virtue.

23. It is also like fine delicacies, which are prepared with all manner of exquisite seasonings, but not without salt. Just as these delicacies, if they lack salt, are unfit for consumption and unpalatable, so too is this virtue, adorned with all the beauty of various virtues, utterly unattractive if it is devoid of love for Christ and one's neighbor.

24. It is also like a perfect and beautiful alphabet, in which the letters are polished and adorned, but which becomes completely useless if even a single letter is removed. Likewise, this virtue, if deprived of even one of the other virtues, proves to be entirely useless.

25. And it is also like a large, soaring eagle which, upon spotting food caught in a net, swoops down on it with all its might; but as it seeks to snatch its prey, the tips of its talons become entangled, and because of this small detail, its entire strength is bound: and although, outwardly, its whole body appears free and outside the net, yet all its strength is bound by the nets. In the same way, this virtue, if bound by anything earthly, is stifled, grows weak, and perishes, and is no longer able to soar to great heights; for it is pinned down to the earth.

26. Just as someone dives into the depths to find a precious and exquisite pearl, and having found it, surfaces and rushes ashore with great wealth. So too, strip yourself of all the impurities of this life, clothe yourself in this virtue, and, adorned with it, remain vigilant day and night, lest it be stripped from you. No calamity—neither hunger, nor nakedness, nor despondency, nor sickness, nor poverty, nor persecution, nor any other diabolical temptation—can shake the soul that possesses it. If it remains vigilant, it grows even stronger and is crowned through this, continually prospering in God and becoming enlightened. Even death itself is powerless to harm it; on the contrary, upon departing from the body, the angels receive it, rejoicing, into heaven and bring it to the Father of lights.

27. The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit rejoice over her. The Father rejoices over her because she loved Him and loved no one but Him. His only-begotten Son rejoices over her because she desired Him and sought no one but Him. The Holy Spirit rejoices over her because she has become a Holy Temple for Him, and He has taken up residence within her. Heaven and the heavenly powers rejoice over her, and with one voice they prostrate themselves and glorify the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, seeing that she is adorned with angelic virtue in all the beauty of righteousness. Paradise rejoices over her, for she has received it as her inheritance. Glory and majesty to the one good and philanthropic God, Who, in His goodness, grants us His Kingdom.

28. Let us be sober and work hard during this brief time. The evening is near. The Rewarder is coming in glory to give to each according to his deeds. Be careful that none of you, after success, becomes complacent and forfeits the Savior's immeasurable reward. A monk is like a sown field which, having grown from fruitful rains and dew, bears the fruit of joy; and when the time of harvest arrives, it causes the farmer great concern that hail and wild beasts might not devastate the field. When the farmer receives his reward in the harvest, having gathered the reaped fruits into the granary, he then rejoices and is glad, giving thanks to God. Likewise, while in this body, the monk must care for eternal life, laboring in asceticism until the very last day, so that through negligence he does not render his entire course of life useless. And when, having completed his journey, like the farmer, he carries the fruits of his labor to heaven, he brings joy and gladness to the angels.

29. Imagine that someone, standing before the King and conversing with Him, upon hearing the call of a fellow servant, leaves behind the wondrous and glorious conversation with the King and begins to speak with the servant; so too is the one who talks during the singing of the psalms. Let us realize, beloved, before Whom we stand. Just as the angels, standing in His presence with great awe, sing praises to the Creator, so too must we stand in reverence during the singing of the psalms. Let it not be that only our bodies are present, while our minds wander.

30. Three kinds of conduct multiply evil, and a fourth does not count among the good: when the young disobey; when the elders envy the successes of their juniors; when the devout are drawn to unseemly deeds; and when the abbot, out of his own ignorance, oppresses and burdens the brothers.

31. Three kinds of deeds multiply good, and a fourth kind is pleasing to the Lord and to people: when the brothers are of one mind in meekness and truth; when a brother instructs another in the fear of the Lord; when the younger ones are subject to the elders as to their rulers; and when the abbot loves his brothers as himself and truly cares for the salvation of their souls.

32. If you see someone trading in something, say to yourself: “This person, desiring the temporary, endures so much in order to gather fleeting goods. Will you, my soul, lose heart regarding what is eternal?”—If you see people quarreling with one another, say to yourself: “These people exert so much effort and argue among themselves over something that is of no benefit whatsoever. Will you, my soul, though endowed with many talents, fail to turn to God as you ought, so that your debt may be forgiven?”—If you see people building a house of clay, say to yourself: “These people, building a house of clay, are exerting their efforts to complete the work. Will you, my soul, neglect the eternal dwellings?” But so as not to prolong my words by speaking of one thing and then another separately, I will say this: whatever we see in life, let us replace worldly thoughts and mundane reasoning with spiritual ones, and with the grace that assists us, we will certainly benefit.

33. What is a monk? A monk is like a man who, while falling from a great height, came upon a rope hanging high above the ground, seized hold of it, and now hangs from it, ceaselessly crying out to the Lord for help, knowing that if he grows weak and lets go of the rope with both hands, he will fall and die.

34. Because we are unwilling to endure a little sorrow for the Lord’s sake, we unwittingly fall into many and grievous sorrows. Because we are unwilling to relinquish our own will for the Lord’s sake, we bring spiritual harm upon ourselves. Because we refuse to submit to subordination and humiliation for the Lord’s sake, we deprive ourselves of the comfort of the righteous. Because we do not heed the admonitions given to us for the Lord’s sake, we make ourselves a plaything of demons. Because we do not accept discipline with the rod, a dungeon awaits us, in which there will be no comforter.

35. The Deceiver—the enemy—has poured his poisons into each of us in various ways, and through his schemes he causes each of us to stumble. One has observed a fast, yet surrenders himself to rivalry and envy. Another has refrained from shameful desires, yet is bound by vanity. Yet another has excelled in vigil, yet is entangled in the snares of judgment. One shuns judgment, yet is filled with disobedience and rebellion. Another abstains from food, yet drowns in pride and arrogance. Another is tireless in prayer, yet allows irritability and anger to get the better of him. Another has succeeded in some small matter and already exalts himself above those who are more negligent than he is. Each one, in one way or another, is bound by sin—and none understands.

36. Our struggle is not against visible people, from whom, by keeping our guard up, we can protect ourselves. Those who wage war against us are invisible. Therefore, the danger is great for the careless, but the reward is great for the victors. — We will engage them in battle with skill and defeat them. — If the enemy—to give an example—incites us to gluttony, let us attack him with fasting; if he stirs up lust for a woman within us, by exercising patience we will overcome that desire, and the enemy will immediately flee from us; if he provokes us to anger, let us arm ourselves with peace; if he drives us to irritation, let us embrace meekness; if he stirs up hatred within us, let us cling to love; if he incites us to seek honor, let us show humility; if he incites us to seek glory, let us embrace our insignificance; if he dreamily leads us to heights, let us set before ourselves the Lord’s humility. — If we resist the enemy in this way, he will not stand against us and will flee, and grace will return to us.

37. Be mindful of yourself, O lover of asceticism, lest your days slip away in distraction. Do not allow deceitful thoughts to enter your heart, lest your strength fail in the struggle against your enemy. Always keep the sweetest Lord in your mind, so that the course of your struggle may be crowned with success. Hasten the struggles of your asceticism; for suddenly the day will come when the diligent will be crowned, and the slothful will repent. Acquire virtue while there is still time; acquire reverence for your eyes, truth for your ears, words of life for your tongue, visits to the infirm for your feet, the image of your Lord for your heart, and success in chastity for your members, so that you may be deemed worthy of greater honor before angels and men. A lifeless tree is honored if it bears the image of a mortal king; how much more, then, in this present age and the age to come, will a soul that has God within it be preferred.

38. Come, my friends, let us bow down before the Lord, that He may grant us the enlightenment of the soul to understand the wiles of the enemy—our adversary, who hates all that is beautiful. For he places in our path stumbling blocks, temptations, harm, the distractions of this age, carnal pleasure, hope for the permanence of this life, fear during our struggles, sloth in prayer, sleep, and carnal complacency during psalm-singing. But as diligent as he is, so careless are we; and the more he devises evil schemes, the more we neglect our duty, even though we know that our days are numbered—and the Lord of glory is coming.

39. We have made a vow to bear the fruit of life. But for our fruit there are no tears to bring it to maturity; no contrition to make it flourish from the breath of tears; no humility to shade it from the great heat; no detachment from worldly goods so that nothing contrary might weigh it down; there is no love of God—that strong root that sustains the fruit; there is no carefree attitude toward earthly things; there is no vigilance, no alert mind sobered by prayer. Instead of these beautiful and good virtues, we have their opposites: there is fierce anger and irritability, which beat the fruit into a state of uselessness; there is greed, which weighs it down; there is great despondency. Will all these adversities allow it to ripen as it should, so that it may be fit for its Lord?

40. In order to imitate their way of life by observing each person's example—namely, how each, armed with zeal, strives toward "the honor of the higher calling" (Phil. 3:14)—one must carefully observe in one person a perfect and precise faith, in another, hope in God; in yet another, a twofold love for the Lord and neighbor; and in yet another, how he stands guard in the fear of God, protecting himself from every wicked deed, leading a life that is not reprehensible or open to criticism, but rather one praised by all for the purity and blamelessness of his conduct.

41. Behold how another, assailed by the enemy through various passions, turns to God in prayer and, clinging to Him with love and contrition, receives the help of grace and is delivered from unseemly and impure thoughts, —with great weeping, tears, and sighs, repenting of what he has done, mourning his sins with sorrow, confessing to God in prayers and vigils, enduring hardship through fasting, abstinence, and sorrow, and striving to save himself with these weapons. So strive to fight to the death, like a true warrior—keeping in mind that asceticism is no trivial matter, and that salvation is attained only through great diligence.

42. Follow the example of those who demonstrate complete renunciation of the world—and you will easily ascend to the heights of virtue. When you see in someone perfect detachment—how, having left everything behind, he strives to free his mind from all cares so that he may devote himself to prayer without distraction, and so that no thought or worry may interrupt his prayer—strive with all your might to emulate him. Whoever prays to God with a pure heart, with love and tears, reflects God Himself in his mind as in a mirror. And this priceless blessing is attained through poverty, destitution, and a life of every kind of hardship. "The gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to life" (Matt. 7:14).

43. Imitate the saints in your way of life—some in reverence and fear of God, some in humility, some in self-abasement and self-reproach, some in silence, some in meekness, some in good-natured patience, some in yielding and peacefulness, some in friendliness and unity of mind, some in sobriety and prudence, some in pleasant manners, friendliness, and forbearance, some in forgiving offenses, courage and magnanimity, some in feats of valor and obedience, some in manual labor and service to their brothers, some in zeal and fervor of spirit, some in complete detachment from the world and in daily dying like the Crucified One, some in steadfastness of spirit and love of truth, some in chastity and virginity. Look also—in some for kindness and a willingness to help, in others for gentleness of character and goodness, in others for compassion and mercy, in others for impartiality and justice, in others for unpretentiousness and modesty, in others for contentment with little and moderation, who is characterized by simplicity and straightforwardness, who is characterized by unceasing prayer, psalm-singing, and streams of tears—in short, look for the traits of a God-pleasing life in everyone—and imitate them.

44. Let us strive to gaze upon things above, to think of things above, to always remember things above, to be wholly attached to things above, to be in constant communion with things above—and in no way turn our gaze toward things below, where there are pleasures, where there are the lusts of this deceitful and life-destroying age. It is always good to gaze upon the things above with the eye of the heart, taking every care that nothing should enter the pupil of this eye—whether a wicked thought or anything else displeasing to God—and cloud the mind.

45. We must pray unceasingly that the Lord may deliver us from the devil's wiles. For these thoughts do not only overwhelm us when we sit alone in our cell, but they also rise up strongly when we gather in the house of the Lord; causing us to look even at men's bodies with impure eyes; and the serpent leads us to the most shameful acts through fanciful thoughts. He sows a mixture of thoughts so that the brother may become distracted and be unable to listen with a pure mind to the most holy mysteries of our Savior—God. – However, by guarding his eyes and keeping his mind alert, the chaste person overcomes this, with the help of God's grace. Therefore, we must guard our hearts and our senses with all vigilance; for in this life we are engaged in a great struggle, and our enemy is fierce.

46. One must not give up the struggle. Whoever is at peace with his passions—how can he wage war against them when he has already sold himself into slavery to sinful pleasures and willingly pays tribute to the tormentor? For wherever there is enmity, there is war; where there is war, there is struggle; where there is struggle, there are crowns. If anyone wishes to be freed from bitter slavery, let him engage in battle with the devil. By emerging victorious in this battle, the saints have been granted heavenly blessings.

47. Whoever wishes to be freed from the enemy's mockery and to rid himself of his bitter slavery must oppose the will of this tyrant of ours and wage war against him out of love for the Creator. For then they will demonstrate the valor of their struggle, when—not only with their lips but also with the disposition of their hearts—they say to him: "We will not heed your voice, devil, and we will no longer serve your lusts." But during the struggle, one must lift up a prayerful voice to God; that He may put to shame those of His servants who seek evil. Then, let this raging tormentor kindle the furnace of lust sevenfold; those who hope in the Lord will soon see this furnace transformed into dew—and the tormentor, who once inspired fear, will himself tremble before them.

48. One of the Saints said: "Think of what is good, so as not to think of what is evil; for the mind cannot bear to be idle." – Therefore, let us devote our minds to the teaching of God's Word, to prayer, and to good deeds. For preoccupation with vain thoughts gives rise to vain deeds; whereas preoccupation with good thoughts yields good fruit.

49. Even if you have no visible tears, let there be contrition of heart; for there is a difference even among tears. – But blessed is the one who, in his soul as in a mirror, contemplates the Lord, and together with his tears pours out praise to Him in the presence of His goodness; for his prayer will be heard.

50. If you wish to become a chosen vessel, then excel in submission to your spiritual guide in the Lord and in humility. The lives of the saints became radiant, having been exalted through obedience. Joshua, for his perfect submission to Moses, was granted the gift of becoming his successor. Samuel, while serving under the priest Elijah, was deemed worthy to hear the voice of God. Elisha, through his submission, received the special grace of his teacher. God Himself—the Word—having become incarnate, lived a life of humility and obedience, as the Evangelist says: "and He was subject to them" (Luke 2:51). The Apostle also said: "He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even to death—even death on a cross" (Phil. 2:8). You have begun with a good resolve; stand firm, so that the Lord may exalt you with the meek and humble in the Kingdom of Heaven.

51. One brother, while remaining in obedience to his spiritual fathers, went to another brother and said, "I want to leave my spiritual fathers and live in silence on my own." The other replied: "A certain man had a son whom he entrusted to a master so that he might teach him his craft." The boy paid no attention to his work. And after a few days, this child came to his father and said, 'Father, take me away from my teacher; I can learn this craft better on my own.' But his father said to him, 'If, while learning from others, you have learned nothing under their guidance, how can you succeed at anything on your own?' I can see that you have not learned your craft well, and I fear that my efforts on your behalf have been in vain. Therefore, set to work properly and master it under the master's guidance, so that, having become skilled in this craft, you may later make a living from it." – So let us, brother, not strive to cast off the yoke of submission—to the Lord—lest we remain unskilled in the work of pleasing God, and be helpless when we fall into temptation.

52. When, having conquered our passions, we root out every worldly attachment within ourselves, then the grace of the Holy Spirit, having found rest in us, will enlighten our hearts like a prepared lamp, abundant in oil and equipped with a wick. But if we are still enslaved by our passions and mired in them, we are like a lamp deprived of oil and a wick—and we sit in darkness. Let us therefore take care to prepare ourselves to receive the light of the mind; let us seek the spiritual life, so that both our mind, coming under the rule of the Holy Spirit, and our body, becoming a partaker of the Spirit, may be sanctified within us.

53. A Parable. Two men set out for a city thirty stadia away. When they had traveled two or three stadia, they came upon a shady grove along the road, through which streams of water flowed, and there were many pleasant spots. When the travelers entered this place, one of them, eager to see the city as soon as possible, hurried through it, while the other stopped to look around and fell behind. After looking around, he, too, wanted to go to the city, but he feared the heat and remained in the shade of the trees. But while he lingered, enjoying the pleasantness of the place, a beast came out of the forest, seized him, and dragged him off to its lair. Meanwhile, the other man, who was not enticed by this spot, safely reached the city. — This parable means the following: the two men are those who have set out on the path of piety and have begun to strive along it. The attractive spot along the way is the world with its allurements. The one who passed by represents those who, paying no attention to anything, hasten to “attain the honor of the higher calling in Christ” (Phil. 3:14). And the one who was captivated by the attractive landscape represents those who, having forgotten their goal, turned their minds away from the invisible to the visible. The heat is the toil of virtue. The fact that a man, having lingered in one place, fell prey to a beast means that when someone fixes his thoughts on earthly desires, sin arises from that desire and, taking hold of the man, devours him like a ferocious beast—as it is written: “When desire conceives, it gives birth to sin; and when sin is fully grown, it gives birth to death” (James 1:15). Let us therefore flee from worldly desires, lest we once again become slaves to sin.

54. Avoid useless talk, lest you fall into shameful thoughts. Just as good words are beneficial to the soul, so bad words corrupt it, as the Apostle says: “Bad company corrupts good habits” (1 Cor. 15:33).

55. When you see negligent people who have grown old in monastic life, you must exercise great caution so that, out of envy for them, you do not follow the same path, and so that, having become self-controlled, you do not become haughty toward them—which means allowing pride to gain the upper hand over you. Listen to the one who says, “Take heed to yourself,” and guard your soul carefully.

56. Do not reveal your thoughts to just anyone, but only to those whom you know to be spiritual. For the devil has many snares. Hide nothing from spiritual people, lest the enemy, finding a foothold, take up residence within you. But do not enter into counsel with carnal people.

57. You must avoid useless conversations and have no dealings with those who are careless about the fear of God; for they say nothing useful, do nothing for the Lord, and speak neither of virtue, nor of piety, nor of purity. Their words are a deadly snare; their counsel is the abyss of hell; their company is the ruin of the soul.

58. Be careful not to lose your boldness before God for the sake of human honor or glory, or for the sake of food, drink, or clothing; for all these things are subject to decay, and everyone’s deeds—both good and evil—are recorded. “Set your minds on things above, not on earthly things” (Col. 3:2), so that you may receive the promise of the heavenly Father.

59. The soldiers of the earthly king shed blood to please their king; but you have no need to shed blood—only do not be overcome by sin, lest it bear the fruit of death (Rom. 7:5). Be sober, brother, be sober, and persevere in your labors. God is not unjust and will not forget your labor. But even for the hardship you endure while sitting in your cell, the light of truth will shine upon you. “Fight the good fight of faith” (1 Tim. 6:12), so that, having triumphed over the enemy, you may worship the King of Glory without shame. For the Lord crowns not only those who have died by the sword and those who have suffered at the hands of tormentors, but also those who have proven themselves skilled in asceticism and love. Just as the former endured reproach for the Lord’s sake, so too have the latter endured a life of sorrow and asceticism for the Lord’s sake.

60. Be mindful of yourself, and let there be “no wicked thought in your heart.” Do not yield to wicked thoughts. Thus did a certain man of old suffer, having hidden something from his oath in his thicket (Josh. 7:1–26); and similarly did Gehazi, the servant of the prophet Elisha, suffer. They did not hide themselves only from God, but also from people. They committed their crime in secret; but they received their retribution openly. One was stoned to death in public, and the other was stricken with leprosy (2 Kings 5:27). For it is true what was said: “God is not mocked; for whatever a man sows, that he will also reap” (Galatians 6:7).

61. By what means does the enemy overcome us? By what means do our passions multiply within us?—Is it not because of our disobedience?—When we are taught, we do not pay attention; when we are rebuked to correct our errors, we resist. We hide from people and neglect God. The dreadful serpent instills in us the “wisdom” to defeat with words those who wish to correct us; and because of this, sin multiplies within us, having no one to oppose it.

62. The beginning of spiritual corruption in a monk is laughter and licentiousness. When you see this in yourself, monk, know that you have fallen into the depths of evil. Do not cease to pray to God that He may deliver you from this death. Laughter and licentiousness plunge not only young monks but also the elders into shameful passions. One of the Saints said of licentiousness: “Licentiousness is like a scorching wind; it destroys the fruits of the monk.” Now listen about laughter: laughter deprives a person of the blessedness promised to those who weep (Matt. 5:4), destroys the good inner order, offends the Holy Spirit, harms the soul, and corrupts the body. Laughter drives out virtues; it has no remembrance of death, nor any thought of torments.

63. The beginning of weeping is self-knowledge. Let our weeping, then, be not for man, but for God, Who knows the secrets of the heart, so that we may receive blessing from Him. Therefore, let us be cheerful in appearance, rejoicing in the Lord's gifts and in the Holy Spirit; but let us weep and lament in our hearts, imploring God to forgive us all our sins and to preserve us from them forever until our death. Weeping builds up and protects; weeping washes the soul with tears and makes it pure. Weeping gives birth to chastity, cuts off lusts, and strengthens virtues. Weeping pleases God and receives comfort from the angels.

64. Engage in spiritual matters so that the remembrance of God may be preserved within you; but abhor idle talk; for it is impossible for stench and fragrance to coexist.

65. The hermit is freed from three battles—those of sight, hearing, and speech. And the attentive communal monk is also freed from three battles—those of buying, selling, and attacks by robbers. But everywhere one must be mindful of oneself and keep one's conscience pure.

66. Do not say, "I have entered the monastery, and I bear the image of an angel." It is not merely outward appearance that pleases people, but God Himself; what is required above all are the fruits of good deeds. – So stand firm, like a fruit-bearing tree, guarding the fruits of your virtues, lest the worm of "pride" creep in and undermine the fruit of humility within you, lest "vanity" cloud your reverence, lest "anger" rob you of your meekness, irritation does not deplete your good-naturedness, strife does not disturb your peace, enmity does not stand in the way of friendship, holding a grudge does not cut off mutual love, resentment does not break harmony, "gluttony" does not hinder fasting, greed does not destroy self-control, "carelessness" has not hindered your diligence, sleep has not lulled your vigilance, "despondency" has not weighed down your zeal, laziness has not hindered your service, grumbling has not diminished your submission, "disobedience" has not barred the way to obedience, idle talk has not prevailed over psalm-singing, playfulness did not prevail over praise, laughter did not overcome weeping, "fornication" did not corrupt chastity, and the love of money was not preferred to non-covetousness. Take care not to love your parents more than Christ, nor to find greater delight in the world than in the Kingdom; that a passion for gossip may not incite your tongue; that envy of anyone may not torment you; that deceit may not defile the purity of your heart, that hypocrisy may not deprive you of the enjoyment of true blessings, that theft may not exclude you from the Kingdom, that falsehood may not bar you from paradise, that the desire to please men may not destroy your boldness, that the love of pleasures may not rob you of the love of God, that lust may not extinguish the contrition of your heart.

67. To the extent that one curbs and subdues one's will, to that same extent one progresses toward success. And the more stubbornly one clings to one's will, the more harm one inflicts upon oneself. Therefore, do not desire to be a slave to your will, but rather be obedient to God's will.

68. When you leave your cell to perform a service or to speak with someone, guard your eyes, and stir your heart with godly thoughts, saying to yourself: "You are not a painter, nor have you gone out to learn how to copy images of people." Be mindful of yourself. If your attention is occupied by the senses, how will you be able, with a clear mind—as in a mirror—to contemplate the heavenly, to find delight, and to rejoice in the remembrance of God?

69. Stop prying into the sins of others, lest your pious thoughts be naturally corrupted by this.

70. Practice silence; it will deliver you from many evils. Remember constantly the plight of sinners, fearing that you too may soon be counted among them.

71. Let us not be self-centered; for from self-centeredness, like branches, all passions spring forth. Self-centeredness, however, is eradicated by love, which draws all toward unity of mind and binds them together as one. Love is a great and precious treasure. Therefore, strive not to fall away from love.

72. As we care for our own salvation, let us present to our neighbor an example of virtue in faith, in love, in patience, in purity, in obedience, in humility, and in the fear of God, without being carried away by evil desires, but striving in spiritual labors.

73. To accept God's commandments, have the simplicity of a dove; to repel the enemy's wiles, have the cunning of a serpent.

74. Wisely avoid harmful company, so that your inner self may rest in peace.

75. Do not spend time with actors, lest your thoughts be corrupted; for their words are very harmful. They compel the elderly to act like youths, and they draw the young into lawless deeds.

76. When one weeps, it is impossible to sin; and no one in heartfelt contrition plots evil. Heartfelt contrition brings tears, and tears lead to the reduction of evil by refraining from wicked deeds.

77. If you are young, accustom yourself to silence and work. Work will make you unburdensome, and silence will keep the light of your soul unquenchable, not allowing it to be dimmed by any passion.

78. It is not hair or clothing that makes a person worldly, but a bad character and a tendency toward worldly and impure desires, which make the soul vile.

79. It is not the tonsure or the habit that makes one a monk, but heavenly desire and a divine way of life, in which the perfection of life is revealed.

80. Do not exalt yourself before temptation; for temptation, once it strikes, often puts to shame even those who appear to be steadfast. That is why one must remain vigilant and thus keep the mind safe from falling.

81. Do everything and think about everything in such a way as to please God; for if you lack this intention, all your deeds lose their value.

82. Whether you live in a community or in silence, secluded from everyone, do not neglect what you seek—that is, a pure heart and a contrite spirit. Whoever has attained these will not be humiliated by God; but to neglect them is a great danger.

83. Water your soul with divine waters (the Word of God and the sacraments), so that it may flourish and bear fruit in truth. We must strive for what is beneficial to the soul just as animals run to green pastures.

84. When the soul is healthy, then the body also has the strength for good works; but if the soul is lost in evil thoughts, then the body will inevitably be corrupted by sin.

85. The Evil One sets hidden snares for our soul every day, so that, by seducing it, he may subject it to eternal torment. These snares are filled with sweetness, to deceive and lure souls that are inattentive to themselves. Do not delight, brother, in this mortal sweetness, carried away by deceptive thoughts. A thought is a seducer; if it finds its way into the soul, it delights it with sinful thoughts, so that it may later kill it with sin. And it becomes a snare for the soul. But come to your senses and hasten to break this snare, driving the thought from your soul through prayer, tears, abstinence, and vigilance. – In all other matters, be vigilant, and do not dwell on a seductive thought even for a single moment. Always turn to God with prayer, fasting, and tears, so that you may be freed from all snares, temptations, and passions.

86. Let us be vigilant warriors; let us overcome the evil one daily in battle. Let us study the rules of this battle: it is invisible, and its rule is to strip ourselves of all earthly things. If we await death, keeping it before our eyes daily, then we will not sin. If you strip yourself of all earthly things, you will not be defeated in battle. Since earthly things draw us down, and passions cloud the eyes of the heart, the evil one overcomes us in battle against him.

87. Do not reason, monk, by saying: “The labors of asceticism are great, but I am weak and feeble, unable to strive.” —If you set out to go to some distant country or land, it will be impossible for you to cover the entire distance in a single moment; but by traveling each day from one resting place to the next, over time, you will reach the country you have in mind. The same must be said of the Kingdom of Heaven and the paradise of bliss. Everyone reaches it through the labors of a lifetime—through fasting, abstinence, and vigil. Abstinence, tears, prayer, vigil, and love—these are the resting places that lead to heaven. Endure them patiently—and with joy. After each stopover, the steps of your soul will be strengthened—and you will find no difficulty on your path leading to heaven.

88. The enemy manages to instill a spirit of recklessness in a person who has entered the monastic life without careful consideration. And to the one who became a monk out of reverence, he inspires feats beyond his strength. But the one who truly fears God is not led astray by either of these thoughts. The fear of God enlightens his heart to walk the straight path.

89. A brother, after taking the monastic vows, struggled with the thought of leaving the community. And his thoughts presented him with this example: “Look at this greenery in the garden; if the one tending these beds does not pull up the plants and transplant them to another place, they will not grow.” But Brother replied to these thoughts as follows: “Will the gardener really uproot everything that has been sown in these beds? Will he not leave in the bed what it can nourish?—Moreover, what has been pulled up is not as secure as what remains in place. Therefore, you too should be among those who are not uprooted.” – And thus, with the help of grace, he overcame that thought.

90. A monk must be prudent, so as to discern what the adversary plots against him—and to let some things pass with a laugh, others with humility, and still others to refute with a well-chosen word.

91. As long as the soul yearns for earthly things, the various desires of this world and the vain pleasures that appear to the soul in its thoughts weaken its strength; and because of this, the one dwelling in the cell falls into sloth. But when someone completely renounces the world, hates it and its allurements, and with all his heart and all his soul surrenders himself as a servant to the Lord, then sloth will not gain power over him, and as a result, he will be free to do his work. He will face only the struggle against the thought of vanity; but even this thought the servant of the Lord will drive away, taking into account both his own weakness and the fact that whatever gift he has is a gift from the Lord, in accordance with the saying: “What you have, you have received” (1 Cor. 4:7)? He also faces a struggle with the weakness of the flesh; but the servant of the Lord will not be overcome by fear because of this, nor will he separate himself from the love of God, according to the words of the one who said, “Who shall separate us from the love of God?” (Rom. 8:35–39). For behind all passions lies the spirit of fornication—but flee from shameful words, and you will avoid impure thoughts.

92. Wise elders are balm for the brethren, anointing and strengthening the soul.

93. If you have renounced the world, then attend to your task, so that you may obtain the pearl you seek. For some, having renounced the world, withdrew from worldly life—some left military service, others squandered their wealth—but in the end, led by their own will, they fell; for there is nothing more disastrous than being ruled by one’s own will rather than living according to God’s will. They pretended to be leaving all worldly things through the main gate, but returned to the world through a hidden door.

94. This is the fragrance of wisdom in a person: that in every circumstance he blames himself, and, in blaming himself, does not condemn another who has fallen into the same error.

95. Whoever has a heart clouded by a storm of thoughts and is overcome by passions neither feels shame before people nor fears God. If he is a ruler, he commits evil without fear. If, however, he is weak and poor, he also acts wickedly without shame, yielding to the coarseness of his nature.

96. For warriors, battle is brief, but for those who strive for salvation, it continues until their departure to the Lord. Therefore, one must set about this task with all diligence, sobriety, and patience. If you resolve to kill a lion, tackle it with determination, lest it crush your bones like a potter’s vessel. If you are cast into the sea, do not lose heart until you reach dry land, lest you sink into the depths like a stone. If you enter into a struggle, be sober-minded, so that your opponent does not rejoice in defeating you, and so that you do not receive the opposite of a crown.

97. Whoever wishes to become a monk must be prepared for courageous endurance, so that, upon entering monastic life, he will not say, “I did not know that this would happen to me.” This is made known to you. Set your thoughts in order, then, and arm yourself with patience—so that, when you say at your tonsure, ‘I will endure everything,’ you do not find yourself the very next morning breaking this vow, both in word and deed. The angels of God stand by and hear everything that comes from your lips. Take care not to lie; for the Lord ‘will destroy all who speak falsehood’ (Ps. 5:7).

98. Many temptations surround those who set out to serve the Lord. But the one who surrenders himself wholeheartedly to God’s guidance and abides in God’s will overcomes them all. God requires only our resolve, and He Himself gives us strength and grants us victory: “He is a shield to those who take refuge in Him” (Ps. 17:31).

99. Do not look upon the careless; but pay attention to yourself, keeping God before your eyes, following the example of the one who wrote: “I have set the Lord always before me; because He is at my right hand, I shall not be shaken” (Ps. 15: 8).

100. Let us not judge anyone; for we do not know how he conducts himself in his cell, or how he labors before God; let us not judge if we see him laughing or talking; for we do not know what his state of mind is in his cell. Each of us must be mindful of ourselves; for each of us will give an account to God for ourselves.

101. Do you want to avoid being overcome by temptation? Cut off every trace of your own will. If a matter seems good to you, but the abbot, in the Lord, does not consider it good, then submit to him in the Lord. Engaging in arguments or following your own intentions is already a sign of falling away. Let everyone hear what is said in the Psalm: “Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice before Him with trembling. Receive discipline before the Lord becomes angry, lest you perish from the way of the righteous” (Ps. 2:11–12).

102. Let us not behave in such a way that today we practice self-restraint and meekness, but tomorrow we give in to intemperance and pride; today—silence, vigil, and humility—but tomorrow—entertainment, insatiable sleep, disobedience, and the like; today we renounce the world, renounce all earthly things, renounce our homeland, friends, and parents, trusting in the Lord, but tomorrow we long to see our homeland, our relatives, and our inheritance—which plunges us into many evils. Let us remember that Lot's wife, having looked back, was turned into a pillar of salt. And the Lord teaches: "No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:62).

103. Always keep in mind that day when, having cast off everything, you left the world for the Lord, when you were inflamed with the fear of God and burned with zeal for the Lord. And hold fast to this disposition until the end; for "whoever endures to the end will be saved" (Matthew 10:22).

104. Do not let your guard down against the thoughts that come to you; for this is the beginning of the struggle. Take a lesson from a rain-filled pond. Shortly after the rain, when the blessing of the rain has just gathered in the pond, the water is murky, but then, the more time passes, the clearer it becomes. – Be patient; your thoughts will settle as well—and they will give you peace.

105. Listen to this parable about evil thoughts. When grapes are harvested from the vines, placed in a wine press, squeezed to yield wine, and poured into vessels, the wine at first boils as if heated by the fiercest fire, so that even the finest vessels, unable to withstand its force, sometimes burst from the pressure. So it is with human thoughts when they turn from this vain age and its cares toward the heavenly realm. Demons, unable to tolerate zeal in a person, confuse his mind in various ways, intending to mix into it "the murk of corruption" (Abba 2:15); and if they find a vessel that is not without flaw—that is, a faithless and doubting soul—they shatter it. Demons, like ravenous wolves, roam the monks' cells, seeking a door left open for them, so that, having burst inside, they may corrupt the soul that is submissive to them. But if they find the door locked—a soul firmly established in the faith—they depart with downcast faces.

106. In all your deeds, maintain humility, which is the mother of obedience. – Cast off double-mindedness, and clothe yourself in faith in all things, so that the Lord, seeing the zeal of your soul, may strengthen you in your work. – Nurture within yourself a strong hatred for sloth, rivalry, every kind of wickedness, and envy, since you have forsaken everything for the Lord. Know that if such thoughts cause you to slacken at the beginning, you will later suffer much toil and harm.

107. Just as you do not allow filth to accumulate in your yard, so do not allow carnal desires to gain strength within yourself.

108. On the broad path, the following occur: malice, entertainment, gluttony, drunkenness, extravagance, debauchery, discord, irritability, arrogance, fickleness, and the like; and following these are: unbelief, disobedience, rebellion, and the worst of all evils—despair. – And on the narrow path, the following are found: silence, self-restraint, chastity, love, patience, joy, peace, humility, and the like. And following these is immortal life.

109. Guard yourself especially against licentiousness, lest you become enslaved by loquacity and shamelessness, lest you become a source of joy for demons, and ultimately lose fellowship with your brothers. It is not so much wild donkeys that devour the grain as licentiousness that ruins the monks' labors.

110. Let us imagine those who stand before the earthly King and serve the mortal throne; with what attention and fear do they stand before their King? Should we not, all the more so as believers, stand before the Heavenly King with fear and trembling and with all reverence? Therefore, I do not consider it proper to gaze with a shameless eye upon the mysteries of the Body and Blood of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ that lie before us. And let the Divine Scripture convince us of this, saying: "Moses trembled and did not dare to look" (at the burning bush) (Acts 7:32).

111. As I see it, there are three kinds of drowsiness that trouble a person at night. The "first" kind befalls a brother through the work of the evil one when the brother begins to sing psalms. But if there is no laziness in the brother, it has no power whatsoever; it troubles him more severely, however, if the brother's stomach is burdened with food and drink. "The second" befalls a brother during divine worship, due to his own negligence, when he does not make the effort to remain until the end of the service, and in the middle of the service wishes to leave those singing the psalms and go to sleep. "The third" occurs due to the demands of nature after the end of the regular service. – Do not be negligent, then. Have you not heard how the Prophet Samuel, though called repeatedly, never once failed to rise, even though he was still a youth? When you stand at the divine service, whether among the brethren or alone, to glorify our Savior Jesus Christ—and the first stirrings of drowsiness trouble you: upon noticing them, resist them, lest your laziness deprive you of the fruits of serving God; but endure with steadfastness, even if drowsiness closes your eyes once or twice; do not leave your place—and you will gain great benefit. An addiction to insatiable sleep is like the passion for gluttony. If someone is accustomed to eating a lot, then nature demands a lot; but if someone is accustomed to moderation, then nature does not demand overeating. Consider the fishermen: they spend the whole night awake, not neglecting their work. But if any of them, weighed down by sleep and giving in to negligence, falls asleep, then when he awakens, he will see that they have caught nothing. And he will begin to reproach himself for his negligence. The same will happen to you if you give in to drowsiness and sleep, just as the Prophet says: “They fell asleep in their slumber and found nothing” (Ps. 75:6).

112. Just as a ship at sea, if a small hole appears in it and no effort is made quickly to repair it, will be swamped by the waves despite its great size because of such a small defect—so too it is with the soul that has allowed the enemy’s attacks to enter it, unless it turns to its Creator. That is why we need, my brother, sobriety and great humility. All that is wicked is rendered powerless by turning our hearts to God.

113. It happens that someone takes a vessel to draw water, but without filling it with water, overturns it and breaks it. Similar to this is the one who, having entered a monastery to attain Christian perfection, rejects God’s grace and returns once more to worldly life.

114. Faith is the mother of all that is good, and through it a person attains the fulfillment of the promises of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, as it is written: “Without faith it is impossible to please God” (Heb. 11:6). – But the devil’s most fruitful gain is unbelief, which is the mother of every wicked deed. From it springs double-mindedness, which is disorder. “A double-minded man,” it is said, “is unstable in all his ways” (James 1:8).

115. Do you want to avoid temptations and slander? Set a gate at your lips concerning the Lord, “and turn away your eyes from looking at vanity” (Ps. 118:37)—and you will avoid both: slander through silence, and temptations by guarding your eyes. If we do not overcome this within ourselves, wherever we go, we will carry our enemies within ourselves. Overcome them, and you will have peace wherever you live.

116. Prayer and fasting are excellent, but almsgiving strengthens them; for it is said, “I desire mercy, not sacrifice” (Hosea 6:6). And the Savior blesses the merciful: “Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.” And what does the angel say to Cornelius: “Your prayers and your alms have ascended as a memorial before God” (Acts 10:4)—not just your prayers, but also your alms.

117. Do not neglect the Church service under the pretext of any worldly business. Just as rain nourishes the seed, so the Church service strengthens souls in virtue.

118. Do not act in such a way that today you remain in silence and devotion to God’s work, only to go from cell to cell the next morning—or, even worse, from village to village. But remain in silence at all times, remembering that to the extent that one remains silent, to that extent one’s thoughts become pure—and to the extent that one strays from silence, to that extent one’s mind becomes coarse.

119. The fear of God is a strong pillar against the enemy. Do not tear down this pillar, and you will not be taken captive. Cling to the Lover of Mankind, crying out with the Prophet to His goodness: “In You, O Lord, I have trusted; let me never be put to shame. Deliver me and save me by Your righteousness” (Ps. 30:1–6). Then the Lord will say to you: “I will be with you; I will not forsake you or despise you. Be strong and courageous” (Joshua 1:5–6).

120. Let us be magnanimous and bear one another’s burdens, striving to raise up those who have fallen and those who have been taken captive by the enemy. What warrior, seeing that his comrade has been taken captive by enemies, does not enter the fray and fight against them to rescue his comrade from the hands of his captors? And when he is unable to rescue him, he weeps and grieves, remembering his friend. Should we not, then, lay down our lives for one another all the more? For our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ said: “There is no greater love than this, that someone lay down his life for his friends” (John 15: 13).

121. A person who spends his days in idleness deceives himself, giving no thought at all to the blessings the Lord has prepared for the righteous or to the punishment reserved for sinners, and indulging in pleasures without any fear. In such a person, the evil one stirs up all manner of carnal lusts; yet he is unable to perceive this, just as gates do not notice those who enter and exit through them; for lust, having taken root in his mind, has darkened his eyes.

122. Flee from licentiousness and laughter; curb gluttony through self-restraint, greed through non-covetousness, loquacity through silence, restlessness through remaining in your cell, sloth through remembrance of future blessings, and disobedience through humility; above all, flee from licentiousness, which, in my understanding, is the root of all evils. If you do not restrain it, it will make you shameless. But if you restrain it, you will be blessed; for it is said: “Blessed is the man who fears all things out of reverence” (Prov. 28:14).

123. Be mindful of yourself, lest you waste your time in idleness and distraction. You have planted a vineyard for yourself; surround it with a fence. You have acquired a garden for yourself; guard its fruit, so that you may rejoice in it in the end; and do not let your pigs into the field you have cultivated with your own labor, lest they lay it waste. What good is it if we build for one day and destroy for two? With such a way of acting, how will the work ever come to an end?

124. All manner of sinful temptations are scattered throughout all humanity, so that a person may constantly struggle with his mind. But one struggles, while another yields to temptation and falls; and they fall—one into one thing, another into another, according to each person’s disposition. This does not happen without the enemy’s involvement, but even he takes our predispositions into account. And when he wishes to bind a person with sinful desires, he binds him with those that give him pleasure, so that, taking delight in the bonds, he will never wish to free himself. The one who binds us is cunning and knows well with what and how to bind each person; he knows that if he binds someone with involuntary bonds, the mind will immediately break the bonds and soon run away. Therefore, he binds each person with what brings them pleasure and comfort. That is why, even while we are bound, we do not grieve but rejoice in it—and even while we are ensnared, we boast of it; we take pride in it because one who is bound, for example, by envy—as long as he is not bound by adultery—considers himself unbound by anything, and one who is bound by vanity—as long as he is not bound by obvious injustices—thinks of himself as free from base bonds. None of those who are bound are aware of their bonds, nor do they perceive the snares laid out for them. They all suffer from the ignorance of those who are intoxicated. One who is bound, like one in a state of intoxication, does not know that he is bound. Under the influence of wine, they forget their bonds, and in their intoxication, they do not see the snares around them.

125. Bear in mind that the admixture of sinful passion corrupts and destroys every good: truth is destroyed when base deceit is mixed with it; purity is corrupted if lust touches it; faith is destroyed if it heeds prophecies; charity is tarnished if it becomes prideful; fasting is disgraced if it gives way to condemnation. Therefore, watch over yourself and do not allow such good-destroying admixtures.

126. You are obligated to protect each member of your body from harm in a proper manner. If your body is free from sexual immorality, guard your mouth from condemning others. The mouth cannot commit fornication, but it can lie and slander. If one of your members is blameless, but another is guilty, then by condemning that one member, you yourself are subject to condemnation. Do not disregard condemnation as something trivial. From the example of those who fall prey to hunters, learn not to disregard even the smallest thing. It happens that a bird becomes caught in a net by a tiny claw, and the power of its wings is subdued and overcome by the tip of that insignificant claw; and although the bird is completely outside the net, it is nevertheless captured by it.

127. Let us flee from evil thoughts; for thoughts are judged on a par with deeds. Let us turn to good thoughts, which receive a reward from the Tester of hearts equal to that of deeds. An intention is already a deed; for in it, as in the source of all creation, lies the foundation of our freedom.

128. The merciful Lord has provided us with weapons against all enemy attacks. Just do not be lazy in using them, and you will suffer no harm. If the enemy fires his fiery arrows at us, we have an invincible shield—prayer; if he intends to ensnare us with falsehood, let us resort to the truth, and we will be saved; if he intends to wound you with misanthropy, meet him with the power of philanthropy; if he attacks you with pride, fight him with humility; if he stirs up carnal lust, quickly clothe yourself in the armor of chastity; if he attacks us with insatiability, let us make ourselves wings—fasting. —Thus, just as our enemies have arrows, so too does our weakness have arrows. Defeat in battle comes not from a lack of weapons, but from inattention and a reluctance to use them.

129. What good is it if someone has everything but lacks saving love? If someone prepares a great feast to invite the King and the princes, and arranges everything lavishly so that nothing is lacking, but has no salt: will it be possible to taste such a feast? Undoubtedly not. The same applies here. Whether someone has preserved their virginity, fasted, kept vigils, prayed, given shelter to the poor, intended to offer gifts, firstfruits, or fruits, built churches, or done anything else—without love, all this counts for nothing before God (1 Cor. 13:1–4).

130. Let us concern ourselves with acquiring the eternal blessings promised to us; let us strive for this while it is still light, while the market has not yet closed; let us make friends for the life to come from among the poor and the needy. Let us buy oil from them and send it ahead of us; for here, the oil for the lamps of the hereafter is sold by widows, orphans, the infirm, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and all the poor who sit at the church doors.

131. When you stand before God in prayer, take care that your beautiful instruments—on which you sing to God, that is, your thoughts—are not plundered by your enemies. How or with what will you serve God when your instrument is taken from you, that is, when your thoughts are captive? Serving God requires that your thoughts, the entire strength and power of your soul, and your whole mind be undistracted and focused on God. Do not mix copper or lead with your gold—that is, do not mix many impure thoughts with your soul. Just as a virgin betrothed to a husband, if she is seduced by others, becomes abominable in his eyes: so too is the soul, carried away by impure thoughts and consenting to them, an abomination to her heavenly Bridegroom, Christ. – She must avoid all connection with these thoughts in every possible way and not take pleasure in consenting to them, so that the Lord, seeing her love for Him, may be pleased with her, and, coming, may destroy her enemies who seek to turn her thoughts away from Him. For as soon as the Lord sees that the soul is striving earnestly to be collected within itself, ceaselessly seeking the Lord, awaiting Him at night, and crying out to Him by day, He will not delay in avenging her, and He will purify her from whatever vice still remains in her, presenting her to Himself as a bride without blemish.

132. Open your heart; resolve to long for God all the days of your life. To long for God is everlasting delight and enlightenment, and everlasting joy. If you always long for Him, He will always dwell within you—He dwells in the souls of those who fear Him—and fulfills the will of those who love Him.

133. Do you wish to be a holy and spotless temple of God? Always keep the Image of God in your heart. By the Image of God, I do not mean a painted likeness, but that Image which is painted in the soul through good deeds, fasting, vigils, progress in goodness, self-restraint, and prayers; and the colors for this heavenly, sovereign Image are pure thoughts, the casting off of all earthly things, and a life that is always pure.

134. Neither in the world nor in the ascetic life does anyone receive a crown without a struggle; therefore, without a struggle, no one can obtain the unfading crown and eternal life. For this present life is always like a battlefield. Do you wish to prove yourself perfect in the struggle? Always clothe yourself in virtues, as in the weapons of the struggle. Have you clothed yourself in virtue? Strive ceaselessly not to cast it aside.

135. Strive to imitate the life and virtue of the holy fathers. Follow the path of their lives and strive as they did, —strive with your mind, strive with your spirit, strive with your body; be ascetic in your clothing, be ascetic in your food, be ascetic in your speech, be ascetic in your gaze, be ascetic in your thoughts—so that you may be perfect in all things.

136. Be mindful of yourself, so that you are not distracted during prayer. When you stand before God in prayer, stand before Him with fear and trembling. Cut off from your heart all thoughts and concerns about earthly matters. During the hour of prayer, be wholly a heavenly angel, and strive to ensure that your prayer is holy, pure, and unblemished, so that, upon seeing it ascend on high, the gates of heaven may immediately open before it; so that, upon seeing it (having ascended there), the Angels and Archangels may all greet it with joy and bring it before the holy and exalted throne of the Most Pure Lord. Thus, at the hour of prayer, always prostrate yourself before God, like the Cherubim and Seraphim.

137. Your battle is no ordinary one; on the contrary, all the angels and their Lord are watching the battle you wage against the enemy. – Thus, when you emerge victorious over the enemy, God and the angels will applaud you; and the angels, rejoicing, will glorify God, who has granted you the strength to defeat the evil one. That is why the battle intensifies more and more—so that you may become skilled in the faith, God may be glorified, and people may follow your example.

138. Do not fall into apathy because of weariness, but keep your hope in mind. For where there are feats, there are rewards; where there is battle, there is honor; where there is struggle, there is a crown. Keeping this in mind, anoint yourself with the oil of patience. Call out to yourself unceasingly, crying out with the Saints: “Be strong, and let your heart take courage; wait for the Lord” (Ps. 26:14).

139. Prepare your affairs for your departure; put everything in order in your field; and this field is this life: take a good shield—the New Testament; surround your possessions with thorns (make a hedge of prickly plants)—through fasting, prayer, and teaching. If you have such a fence, the beast—that is, the devil—will not enter. Cultivate your soul like a beautiful vineyard—and just as those who guard vineyards clap their hands and shout loudly, using that noise to stop intruders: so do you as well—raise your voice, exclaim in psalmody, and you will drive away the cunning beast—the fox, that is, the devil. Keep a constant watch over the enemy, should your desire incline you toward unseemly deeds. And if he begins to hurl wicked thoughts into your soul, as if from a sling, hold up the shield of faith and put on the helmet of hope. Take up “the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God” (Eph. 6:17). And having armed yourself thus against the enemy, persevere, and do not be negligent in battle; on the contrary, be sober-minded in all things, saying: “We know his schemes!”

140. When a wicked thought arises within you, draw your sword—that is, arouse the fear of God in your heart—and you will cut down all the enemy’s power. And instead of a military trumpet, use the Scriptures. Just as a trumpet gathers warriors with its sound, so too the Scriptures, calling out to us, gather good thoughts; and, bringing them into order through the fear of God, form them into a regiment to oppose the enemy: for our thoughts, like warriors, fight against the King’s enemies. Furthermore, just as a trumpet, with its sound during battle, stirs up young warriors to charge against their opponents, so the Scriptures stir up your zeal for what is good and strengthen you for the struggle against your passions.

141. To the best of your ability, compel yourself to read Scripture as often as possible, so that it may gather your thoughts, which the enemy scatters through his wicked schemes, planting deceitful thoughts within you, whether he inflicts frequent sorrows upon you or grants you many successes and worldly comforts. He does this out of his own malice, with the intention of turning a person away from God.

142. Be sober, and strive always to devote yourself diligently to reading, so that it may teach you how to avoid the enemy’s snares and attain eternal life.

143. Reading the Divine Scriptures brings a wandering mind to composure and grants knowledge of God. For it is written: “Be still and know that I am God” (Ps. 45:11). You hear that the knowledge of God is acquired by those who, with a pure heart, practice reading the Divine Scriptures. Therefore, do not be negligent, but practice this reading—and prayer—so that your mind may be enlightened, and that you may become “perfect and complete, lacking nothing” (James 1:4).

144. Some boast of conversing with nobles, princes, and kings; but you should boast that in the Holy Scriptures you converse with the Holy Spirit; for through them the Holy Spirit speaks.

145. Strive to read the Divine Scriptures and to remain constantly in prayer. For every time you converse with God through them, your body and soul are sanctified. Knowing this, strive to practice them more often.

146. If you cannot read, do not turn away from places where you can listen and benefit; for it is written: “If you see a wise man, seek him out, and let your foot knock at his door” (Sir. 6:36). This is beneficial not only for those who cannot read, but also for those who can; for many read without knowing what they are reading.

147. See to it that, when you wish to read, the enemy does not interrupt you by instilling despondency or distraction, or by saying, “Do such-and-such a task first, since it is not a big deal; and then you will read with a calm spirit.” By suggesting this, he also stirs up a special zeal for manual labor, so as to distract you from reading as quickly as possible. He does this when he sees that a brother is reading diligently and benefiting from it, trying to distract him from this activity and hinder him with these and other excuses. Do not believe him; but be like a thirsty deer longing to come to the springs of water—that is, to the Divine Scriptures—to drink from them and quench your thirst, which is scorching you with passions.

148. When the Lord grants you to read and understand a word from the Scriptures, take care that it does not pass you by (in vain); but meditate on it with your mind, engrave it on your heart, and preserve it indelibly in your memory. For it is written: “I will meditate on Your precepts” (Ps. 118: 16); and again: “I have hidden Your words in my heart” (– 11).

149. When you read, read with zeal and diligence; dwell on every word with great attention, and do not merely turn the pages, but if necessary, do not be too lazy to read a verse twice, three times, or several times, so that you may grasp its meaning.

150. When you sit down to read or to listen to someone reading, pray first to God, saying: Lord Jesus Christ! Open the ears and eyes of my heart, that I may hear Your Words and fulfill Your will. ‘Open my eyes, and I will understand the wonders of Your law’ (Ps. 118:18). I trust, O my God, that You will enlighten my heart.” – Always pray to God in this way, that He may enlighten your mind and reveal to you the power of His Words. Many, relying on their own understanding, have fallen into error, and “claiming to be wise, they have become fools” (Rom. 1:22).

151. Acquire silence as a strong wall; for silence will raise you above the passions. You will wage battle from above, while they fight from below. Acquire silence, then, in the fear of God, and none of the enemy’s arrows will harm you. Silence, combined with the fear of God, is a fiery chariot that lifts those who have attained it up to heaven.

152. Silence is the mother of contrition, the mirror of sins, the wellspring of uncontrollable tears, the school of observing one’s thoughts and their reasoning, the foundation of fasting, the barrier against gluttony, the arena for practice in prayer and reading, the pacification of thoughts, an unshakeable haven from cares, a good and light yoke that comforts and sustains those who bear it, the mother of reverence, a prison for the passions, a bridle for the eyes, tongue, and ears, the wine of non-covetousness, the fruitful field of Christ that yields good fruit.

153. Acquire for yourself this good portion, chosen by Mary, who, sitting at the Lord’s feet and clinging to Him alone, became a model of silence. For this, the Lord praised her, saying, “Mary has chosen the good portion, which will not be taken away from her” (Luke 10:42). See what silence is like! The Lord Himself praises those who have attained it. Attain silence, then, and you will delight in “the Lord” (Ps. 36: 4), sitting at His feet and clinging to Him alone, so that you may say with boldness: “My soul clings to You; Your right hand upholds me” (Ps. 62: 9).

154. Illnesses do not suddenly become incurable, but having taken an evil start from neglect, they develop into immeasurable damage. And passions in the soul arise from a small cause, but if they are not eradicated, they produce immeasurable disorder in the soul. Do you see how a green stain on copper grows deeper and deeper?—Understand, then, what a passion does to the soul when neglected. If you do not remove the rust, you will not get rid of the stain; if you do not subdue the nature of the flesh, you will not succeed in driving the passion from yourself. Rust binds tightly to copper; so too does passion take root in one’s nature. Whoever cleans the copper before it rusts will have no further worries about it; whoever clothes the soul in virtue will be out of danger and will not suffer even the hidden corruption of evil. When polished, copper takes on a luster, just like clothing; and if the copper is polished while still unblemished by rust, it will serve well for a long time, but otherwise the luster is deceptive; such a vessel is fragile and quickly deteriorates, just as if it were made of damaged copper. Likewise, if a soul that has already been corrupted attempts to embrace virtue, it falls into wavering, and from wavering into corruption.

155. Just as the soul becomes carnal through its union with the moist body, so too does the body become spiritual when the soul, undecayed, is united with the seed of God. And St. Paul distinguishes between spiritual and carnal people. He knew that even the carnal have a soul, and the spiritual have a body; but because of the predominance of whatever is greater in a person, the name of the predominant aspect is applied to the whole person. If the flesh predominates over the soul in a person, then he is carnal; but if the soul predominates, then he is spiritual. And elsewhere, conveying the same meaning, he says: “The flesh desires what is contrary to the Spirit, and the Spirit what is contrary to the flesh; for these are opposed to one another, so that you may not do what you want” (Gal. 5:17). The Gospel says that the Kingdom of Heaven belongs to those who seek it earnestly (Matt. 11:12). The spirit strives to elevate nature to the Divine; for nature, through the flesh, is drawn toward the earthly. This struggle of the spirit against nature is a battle, and it takes place in two ways: in beginners, so that they may not fall into union with the flesh; and in the perfected, so that even the body itself may be made spiritual.

156. If the essence of a human being is the immortal soul, then there is no injustice on God’s part in turning humanity toward incorruptibility; He does not compel the complex human nature, but only urges it, through the power of the Spirit, to willingly draw the flesh—corrupted by sin—toward incorruptibility, as a slave. Just as copper takes on the appearance of fire in a fiery crucible, so too is the body spiritualized when it is fused with incorruptibility. The same copper, buried in the ground, is consumed by rust and turns to dust; so it is with the flesh immersed in passions.

157. How do the Saints relate to the flesh?—The nature of the flesh demands rest, yet they strive all the more to crush it and make it bitter. Our nature (corrupted, carnal) delights in glory, but they, though reviled, find comfort and keep their deeds hidden. The nature of the flesh demands the enjoyment of food; but they exhaust it with fasting and wear it down with ascetic feats. Nature has a tendency toward married life; but they rein it in with abstinence and cut off all causes of lustful arousal. Nature pursues the comforts of life; but the Saints, when wronged, endure it; when robbed, they bear it magnanimously. In general, they completely renounce the life of the flesh, according to the Word of the Lord: “Take up your cross and follow Me” (Matt. 16:24). The Apostle teaches the same thing, saying: “Put to death your members which are on the earth” (Col. 3:5). He does not condemn God’s creation to destruction; rather, He desires to enliven the flesh by putting to death what is unnatural in it through the effort of the spirit. He did not say, “Put to death the bodily members,” but “the members that are on the earth.” What are these?—Fornication, impurity, evil desire, greed, and all such things. The carnal man, humiliated and corrupted by sin, delights in all such things. Sin violates nature. And then nature, instead of contentment, gives itself over to insatiability; instead of quenching thirst with drink—to drunkenness; instead of marriage—to fornication; instead of truth—to falsehood; instead of love—to enmity. All these things are foreign to nature, and the Apostle teaches us to put them to death by restraining our corrupted nature so that, being under the control of the Spirit, it does not overstep its bounds. And when the Savior said that it is better for an ascetic to enter the Kingdom “lame” or “poor” (Matt. 18:8), He did not command us to cut off the members He created, but rather not to make them instruments of sin.

158. Anyone who wishes to strive for Christ’s sake must acquire such armor that he may be able to resist the devil and please our Savior, namely:

159. Instead of strife, embrace, like a mustard seed, faith in the consubstantial and indivisible Trinity. Just as a mustard seed is perfectly round and, as it were, self-propelled, so let your faith be self-propelled. The movement of faith is virtue. Some have faith but no deeds; this is not faith, for it is dead—as it is said: “Faith without works is dead” (James 2:20). Whoever has faith and performs the works of faith possesses faith like a self-propelled mustard seed. Acquire it, and be healthy and unharmed in faith, burning with zeal for the commandments of our Savior, so that you too may hear from Him: “Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of your Lord” (Matt. 25:23). The Lord called him “good” because of his deeds, and “faithful” because of his faith.

160. Instead of a helmet, take up the hope of future blessings, “which no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and which have not entered the human heart—things that the angels long to look into” (1 Peter 1:12; 1 Cor. 2:9). This hope gives you strong comfort in afflictions and sorrows, and the remembrance of it will gladden you. Christ’s blessed martyrs heeded this; amid the sharp torments, amid the terrible and varied tortures, amid the blazing fire, they kept this longed-for hope before their eyes, and therefore willingly and gratefully endured everything, so that they might obtain what they hoped for. Keep this hope constantly before your eyes, so that the desire for what you hope for may not allow you to think of anything fleeting, and moreover may stir within you a readiness for every good deed.

161. Instead of a belt, gird yourself with perfect love for God and your neighbor: love will ensure that you move forward without encountering obstacles. One who is girded passes through everything comfortably and unhindered; all the more so, one who is girded with love passes comfortably everywhere. For “love,” as it is said, “bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things” (1 Cor. 13: 7); filled with it, St. Paul said: “Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is led astray, and I am not outraged?” (2 Cor. 11:29). See the compassion and power of love!

162. Instead of shoes, put on humility: just as shoes are trampled underfoot, so too does the one who has acquired humility conduct himself in such a way that when everyone tramples on him, he regards this as in keeping with the natural order of things. And you, brother, acquire humility. These are not physical shoes, but spiritual ones: they will protect you, “lest your foot stumble upon a stone” (Ps. 90: 12). Blessed David, having acquired humility, said, “I am a worm, and not a man” (Ps. 21: 7). See how God loves humility, how closely He draws near to those who have acquired it, and how He always looks upon them with favor. For it is written: “He dwells on high and looks with favor upon the humble” (Ps. 112:5–6), and again: “His eyes are on the needy” (Ps. 9:29). When you hear of the poor, do not think of those who are destitute of possessions; for many kings have pleased God, and many poor people have perished. But “the poor” refers to those who are poor in spirit, as it is said: “Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5: 3).

163. Instead of a shield, protect yourself with the holy cross, marking your limbs and your heart with it. And do not merely make the sign of the cross with your hand, but also imprint it in your thoughts upon every activity: your coming and going, your sitting and rising, and your bed—and whatever service you perform, first of all, for a blessing, mark yourself with the cross in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. This is a most powerful weapon—and no one can ever harm you if you are protected by this weapon. If even the one who bears the seal of the earthly King cannot be harmed, how much more is no one able to contend with us when we bear upon ourselves such a seal of the great heavenly King. Use this weapon as often as possible, brother; for it strongly resists the arrows of the enemy. Never forget to protect yourself with the sign of the cross; and you will break the snares that the devil has hidden for you; for it is written: “On this path, as I walked along it, they hid a snare for me” (Ps. 141:4). Always mark yourself with the sign of the cross; and evil will not touch your spirit.

164. Instead of a bow, stretch out your hands in prayer, as it is written: “You have made my right hand like a bow of bronze” (Ps. 17:35). For indeed, the bow of bronze against the enemies is the hands stretched out in prayer offered in full awareness; this is the arrow, skillfully shot by the one who draws the bow. If you allow your thoughts to wander, you will be like a man who holds a bow in his hands but does not know how to aim the arrow at the enemy, and instead shoots it at the sky. Will this shot frighten your enemy if you hold the bow in your hands but shoot the arrow not at him but at random?—Not at all. Only when someone prays with discernment, does not allow his thoughts to wander, and understands who he is, to Whom he is addressing himself, and with Whom he is conversing—only then does the prayer draw near to God, and the enemy suffers greatly, as if struck by an arrow in the heart. Then, by God’s grace, the soul prospers more and more, while the enemy flees like dust before the wind, driven by the Angel of God. This is why those who pray with discernment and strive courageously to subdue their thoughts cause the enemy to suffer.

165. Pray with awareness (knowing to whom and for what you are praying). And if, during prayer, something—whether through your eyes or for some other reason, distracts your mind, know that this is the work of the enemy, and do not rush to end your prayer; rather, rebuke yourself, gather your mind again, and then pray with full awareness, so that you may know what you are asking of God and for what purpose you are asking Him, and so that you do not speak needlessly or ramble. — And it is the work of Satan to send thoughts flying like an arrow shot at random, preventing a person from remaining focused on what concerns him. For he knows that if a person continues his prayer, the One who created him will hear him, even if he is a sinner beyond count. That is why the enemy leads him into rambling thoughts, so that his thoughts fly like an arrow shot at the sky. And it happens that his hands are outstretched in prayer, but his tongue speaks one thing, while his mind thinks and imagines another—to the enemy’s mockery. Therefore, my brother, always ask God for what is especially needed and for what you have a particular need, and do so in accordance with the sense of that need. Consider the two blind men of Jericho. They cried out to the Lord: “Have mercy on us, Son of David.” And when the Lord asked them, “What do you want Me to do for you?”—they pleaded, with the pain and anguish of their hearts, “that their eyes might be opened” (Matt. 20:30). They did not say, “Give us this or that,” for did they not have many needs? But they asked for the one thing in which their need was most urgent. — Look at the Canaanite woman—what does she cry out after the Lord? — “Have mercy on me, O Lord! My daughter is severely tormented by a demon” (Matt. 15:22). She said nothing else but the sickness of her heart. Likewise, did not all who came to Him express before Him the sickness of their own hearts? If a sick person comes to a doctor, does he not show what ails him? And you, my brother, present to God the sickness of your soul. — Look upon Him, then, through the eyes of faith, so that, as it is written, you may see “the One seated on the high and exalted throne” (Isa. 6: 1), and the hosts of angels and archangels standing before Him; and, bowing down before His goodness, pour out your supplication before Him. First confess your sins, and only then present your words or your sorrow before Him, so that He may have mercy on you through His goodness and pour out His bounties upon you: O soul! “Because of your great faith, let it be done for you as you wish” (Matt. 15:28).

166. Those whose spiritual eyes are enlightened and ever open know with certainty that it is not by their own strength, but by the invincible power of God, that they are delivered from the temptations of the evil one. The freedom available to a person consists only in the resolve—or lack thereof—to resist the devil; yet even when such resistance is possible, man does not possess complete mastery over his passions. If human nature could resist the devil’s wiles even without the full armor of the Holy Spirit, then the Lord would not have commanded us to say in prayer: “Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one.” Therefore, whoever wishes to be delivered from the fiery arrows of the evil one, to attain dispassion, and to become a partaker of divine glory, let him, with an insatiable desire, with all his heart and all his strength, always seek help from above, so that with its aid he may overcome the passions, and through such a triumph—which is not in vain—attain the realm of purity, “where no one but He will behold the Lord.”

167. Strive to be a blameless child of God, and to enter that rest “into which Christ has gone before us” (Heb. 6:20); strive to be inscribed in the heavenly Church along with the firstborn; strive to ascend to the heavenly Jerusalem, where the paradise of sweetness is found. – But know that you will not be deemed worthy of these wondrous blessings unless you shed tears day and night like streams, just as the Saint says: “I wash my bed every night; with my tears I drench my couch” (Ps. 67:7). Do you not know that “those who sow in tears will reap with joy” (Ps. 125:5)? Therefore, the Prophet says: “Do not hide my tears” (Ps. 38:13); and again: “You have set my tears before You, as in Your promise” (Ps. 55: 9); and again: “My tears have been my bread day and night” (Ps. 41: 4); “And I have mixed my drink with weeping” (Ps. 101: 10). Tears shed in awareness, with great sorrow, amid the pure fervor of the heart’s innermost being, are the food of the soul, the heavenly bread that nourishes souls for eternal life.

168. Just as there is this visible heaven, called the firmament, so above it there is another heaven, radiant with light and invisible to the physical eye, where the ranks of angels dwell. There is a tabernacle not made with hands, in which the holy angels perform their service. All this is divine, ineffable, radiant, and belongs not to this age but to another world, where there is neither night nor evil spirits nor strife. But since not everyone, whoever they may be, is permitted to see the heavenly with the inner eye; therefore, as a kind of veil, the firmament has been set up so that even from there they may not simply behold everyone, but only those who are pure in heart and sanctified in mind—their fellow citizens and fellow soldiers. And when the veil is removed, then it will be revealed to the righteous what awaits the righteous.

169. Prayer offered at length, with a sorrowful soul and a focused mind, ascends to heaven. Just as water, while flowing over level ground and enjoying wide open space, does not rise to a height, but when the pipes of a water system block its flow below and constrict it, then, constrained, it rushes upward faster than any arrow: so too does the human mind wander and scatter as long as it enjoys great freedom; but when the heart’s contrition and anguish constrain it, then, in this beautiful affliction, it soars upward and sends up pure and fervent prayers to God. That prayers offered with sorrow are especially heard is attested to by the Prophet, who says: “When I was in distress, I cried out, and He heard me” (Ps. 119:1). Let us, then, stir our conscience and arouse sorrow in our souls through the remembrance of our sins, so that our prayers may be worthy of being heard—sober, vigilant, and capable of reaching the heavens with their cries. Nothing drives away sloth and indifference from us as effectively as a painful sense of sorrow, which gathers the mind into unity and brings it back to itself. Whoever grieves and prays in this way will, after prayer, be able to instill great comfort in his soul. Just as a gathering of clouds first darkens the air, but when rain falls from them and the clouds lose, one by one, the moisture they have accumulated, the air once again becomes clear and bright: so too does the sorrow of the soul, while it remains confined within, darken our thoughts; but when it exhausts itself in tears through words of prayer and flows outward, it then produces great clarity in the soul, bringing down into the mind of the one praying—like a ray of light—the thought of God’s help.

170. Do you wish to pray without distraction?—Let your prayer spring from the depths of your soul. Just as trees that have sent their roots deep into the earth, even when buffeted a thousand times by the winds, do not break and cannot be uprooted—because their roots are firmly anchored in the depths of the earth—so too do prayers sent up from the very depths of the soul, being securely rooted, reach upward, and no storm of thought can lead them astray. The Prophet gives us an example of this, speaking of himself: “From the depths I cry out to You, O Lord” (Ps. 129: 1).

171. I examined the armory of the victorious, seeking to understand which weapon brings decisive victory to the one who wields it. “Many weapons presented themselves to my gaze there,” and with each of them one can achieve a brilliant victory. First, I saw pure fasting—this sword that never loses its edge. Then I saw chastity, purity, and holiness—this bow from which sharp arrows pierce the heart of the wicked. I also saw poverty, which scornfully rejects silver and all possessions—this armor that prevents the devil’s cunning arrows from reaching the heart. I noticed there love—this shield; and peace—this sturdy spear, before which Satan trembles and flees. I saw vigil—this armor; prayer—these plates; and righteousness—this light war chariot. – But as I examined all these weapons and pondered which of them was the strongest, I saw the stronghold of humility and found that nothing is stronger than it; for no enemy weapon can pierce it, and the evil one is powerless to storm it. Therefore, if you wish to be victorious in the battle you are waging, seek refuge behind the stronghold of humility; take shelter there and do not leave this enclosure—and the predator will not take you captive; do not rely entirely on your other weapons, lest the evil one strike you down.

7. Advice to Ascetics

1. The beginning of monastic renunciation is the fear of God; a monk who does not fear God will be cast out beyond the gates of the Kingdom of God. The beginning of a good life for a monk is the knowledge of God; ignorance of God, however, darkens the monk's soul.

2. A monk's good inheritance is chastity and holiness; but a monk who lacks these is deprived of the inheritance of the fathers.

3. The spiritual struggle for a monk consists in studying the Scriptures and keeping God's commandments; a monk who does not engage in this is not a spiritual warrior.

4. A monk's nourishment is to do God's will; sensual food, however, will not bring a monk before Christ, but "enters the stomach and passes out into the latrine" (Matt. 15:17).

5. Let the monk's foot, moving with dignity, tread the steps of the Church; but let it not wander from house to house, acting disorderly.

6. Let a monk seek counsel from the wise; let not the counsel of the unwise take root in his heart.

7. A monk who stays awake with psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs drives away nighttime reveries; but a monk who, puffed up by his good deeds, falls asleep, weaves a web of delusion.

8. A courageous monk avoids the devil's snares through the cross of Christ.

9. A monk who is grounded and bowed down to the earth acts in a satanic manner in everything (by opposing the commandments, through deceit, and by self-indulgence).

10. May a monk's mind always be occupied with good deeds. A monk's discipline consists of virtuous thoughts. A monk's vigilance subdues impure thoughts.

11. A monk's cultivation is a good soul that bears fruit according to the Gospel. The monk who cultivates it is the first to taste its fruit.

12. The immortal power within a monk is non-covetousness, which bears the cross; but the love of money is destructive to them, for it bars them from the Kingdom of Heaven.

13. A good gift to a monk is chastity, which, like Elijah in his chariot, lifts him up to heaven. The power of chastity lies in abstinence from food; but a monk who indulges in gluttony defiles his own flesh.

14. Tears shed from the eyes are the tree of life, growing to the heights of humility. The monk who acquires this will reap good fruit.

15. A monk who proclaims his gift to everyone arouses disgust—and will hear from the Lord: "You have already received your reward" (Matt. 6:2). But whoever is ashamed to speak of it will receive his reward from the Lord, who knows what is hidden.

16. When you give "to God what is God's," do not boast, monk; but, praying to the Lord, say: "I bring to You what is Yours, O Lord, and from You alone do I seek the salvation of my soul."

17. The Lord hears the monk who performs his nightly prayers with a pure heart; during the day He makes him as bright as the day itself, and day by day He reveals him to be ever brighter.

18. The Lord does not rest in a monk's pride, but the Holy Spirit rests in his humility.

19. Let the monk's tunic (not the woven one, but the spiritual one) remain unstained at all times. Such a monk will enter the palace with the Bridegroom at midnight.

20. Monk, prepare oil to meet the Bridegroom; for if you have nothing to pour into the lamp so that it may burn brightly, you will remain outside the palace with the foolish virgins.

21. Let the monk's life, in imitation of the angels, be a burning away of sins; it must be the ceaseless fruitfulness of one who repents.

22. Let the monk's life bear the seal of the mortification of lust upon all his members: the life of John the Forerunner is a model for him.

23. May the storm of demons flee from the monks; may the peace of the angels rejoice among them. When the storm of demons comes, monk, restrain your irritability; for the monk's life must always be clothed in meekness and patience.

24. A monk burning with the spirit (of zeal for God) drives out demons; but a monk driven by (proud) rivalry, who competes with his brother, draws the devil to himself.

25. Let not the sun go down on your anger, and let not the disorderly shouting that comes from your irritated throat disturb your brothers.

26. Do not refuse to listen to hymns, for they are the singing of the angels; but flee from the clamor of demonic spectacles, for they are a demonic delusion.

27. May the cross of Christ always be upon your forehead, and the fear of God in your heart.
28. Silence, coupled with a pure heart, anoints the monk with the oil of the Holy Spirit.
29. A good disposition gives rise to brotherly love and drives away strife.
30. He who is united with the Lord will not surrender himself to the devil, lest he be put to shame in the bridal chamber.
31. An unbreakable shield for the monk is the singing of the angels on his lips; death, however, is a sleep more delightful than their song.
32. A monk's treasure is voluntary poverty; a monk clothed in it is divine. Store up treasure for yourself in heaven, for the ages of delight are endless.
33. Let your mind always be occupied with the Divine Scriptures. Let your door be locked not with iron bolts, but barred by the cornerstone (the name of the Lord Jesus, proclaimed in sobriety).
34. The monk's face becomes radiant in prayer, and the traces of the spiritual joy he experiences bring joy to the entire community of monks.
35. A monk who does not indulge his appetite and does not love wine becomes like an angel.
36. Indescribable beauty is the virginity shining in a monk's soul; yet his face becomes most hideous when that virginity is defiled.
37. The worst thing for a monk is to fall into sin; it devours all that is good in him, just as fire devours straw.
38. A monk who has renounced the world becomes a companion of Christ; but one entangled in worldly affairs is not pleasing to the Commander—Christ.
39. A monk who is not greedy for money is the most faithful preacher of the Kingdom of Heaven, but one afflicted with greed is a man who has perished miserably.
40. Chastity, accompanied by unblemished virginity, is the adornment of a young monk.
41. Obedience is a treasure for a monk: whoever acquires it will be heard by the Lord.
42. Let the monk speak words of goodness, and let him proclaim the Word of the Most High with his lips.
43. Let the monk willingly endure hunger to humble the earthly body and exalt the heavenly soul.
44. Let a monk speak words of truth, and let falsehood be banished from his lips.
45. When you hear harsh words, do not become angry, but be humble; for by becoming a peacemaker, you will receive a sure reward for peace, and you will be called a son of the Most High.
46. A lion is feared by wild donkeys; so too should a monk be to lustful thoughts.
47. A monk who permits fasting at the wrong time is like one who undermines the foundation of the pillar (in which he lives).
48. Just as a whirlwind stirs up dust on the plain, so is a proud monk who stirs up passionate desires in the monastery.
49. A good monk, unharmed by the arrows of sensuality, is an angel on earth.
50. Do not give in to pride, lest you fall a terrible fall. Imitate Paul's humility, so that you may become his co-heir.
51. Choose Moses' meekness as your model, so that God may transform your heart of stone into a lake of water, and you, having experienced the benefits of this, may proclaim with praise: "The Lord has led me in the waters of rest" (Ps. 22:2).
52. Recognize how wonderful humility is, and choose it for yourself; for it lifts one up to heaven. A good reward is offered to you for humility—the Kingdom of Heaven: do not lose heart over it.
53. A young monk, despising vanity, should be steadfast in chastity. A monk nourished by chastity is a new plant sanctified by God.
54. Fasting is a bridle for the monk; whoever casts off this bridle becomes a "wild horse" (Jer. 5:8). A young monk who does not bridle his stomach will not be able to refrain from carnal sin.
55. Day and night, the vigilant monk remains diligent in prayer; striking his own heart, he sheds tears and draws down the anointing oil from heaven upon himself.
56. The tree of life on earth is a monk who is not enslaved by passions and who has embraced the angelic life.
57. The sharpest sword against the devil is a psalm on the monk's lips.

58. The dry tree of Elisha drew iron from the depths; likewise, the monk's body, having become dry, draws the soul from the depths (of the passions). The monk's fast dries up the streams of sensuality. For the monk, the limit of fasting is death; and may it not leave him before his passing.

59. The sword against passions is the monk's vigilance in prayer. There is no limit set for the monk's prayer; therefore, let him bless the Lord at all times.

60. It is not easy for a monk who does not restrain his tongue on a day of anger to master his passions as well. A monk who becomes angry kills his own soul and wounds his neighbor with sharp arrows.

61. Arm yourself before temptation comes; this will help you prove yourself skillful in the face of temptation.

62. Do not accumulate wealth, nor indulge the flesh: the narrow and constricted path requires setting aside everything that is of no use on it. Imitate Paul, "counting all things as loss so that I may gain Christ" (Phil. 3:8). Wealth and indulgence of the flesh will not be admitted through the gates of heaven. Love, then, non-covetousness and self-restraint—and you will not be left outside those gates.

63. The burning fire within a monk is sensuality, kindled by drunkenness. Christ is an ever-flowing spring; by drawing from Him, quench that foul-smelling fire.

64. Do not utter an evil word; otherwise, you will become a vineyard that produces thorns. Use the most pleasant words when speaking with your neighbor, imitating the bee, which always brings honey that has no bitterness.

65. A frivolous monk is tossed about by a storm of thoughts; but the one who masters himself is strengthened by the words of the Gospel. A negligent monk, however, is choked by his thoughts, just as wheat is choked by thorns.

66. Do not harbor evil words against your brother in your heart, so that you may be able to proclaim in prayer: "Forgive us... as we forgive" (Matt. 6:12).

67. The crown of praise for a monk is peace and holiness; whoever attains them will "see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14).

68. A monk's wisdom lies not in knowing what labors to undertake, but in undertaking them wisely. Such a one teaches not by words, but instructs by deeds.

69. A wise monk, battling the hordes of demons, is never wounded by their arrows; strengthened by the cross of Christ, he crushes the head of the serpent.

70. A monk's most precious treasure is chastity, illuminated by the light of charity. He who has attained and preserved it will undoubtedly enter the bridal chamber.

71. Observe the commandments of the Most High, and keep the rules of the Fathers; and you will be an heir to the Kingdom of Heaven.

72. A monk who is reckless and presumptuous will fall into temptation and the devil's snare; but the meek will find peace and the crown of holiness.

73. A monk who eats to excess will fall into delusions and nighttime fantasies; but for the one who fasts, his bed is not defiled, and his sleep is undisturbed.

74. A monk who fears God will not tolerate anything harmful, for the Lord protects such a one, and on the day of his death he will have a sacrifice of atonement.

75. A monk's humility is not recognized by great deeds, but is tested in temptations. A monk's patience in afflictions, faithfully maintained, earns him an unshamed hope. And may he hold fast to it until his last breath, for "whoever endures to the end will be saved" (Matt. 10:22). Endure, monk; for the time of suffering is short, but the ages of joy are endless.

76. Let the monk's singing be unceasing; for the seraphim praise Him without ceasing. Let there be a spiritual song on your lips, monk, one that lightens the burden of the temptations that assail you.

77. An obedient monk will stand before the cross with holy boldness; for on the cross is the Lord, who was obedient even unto death—a death on the cross.

78. May the monk's voice, in prayerful meekness, rise sincerely to God from lips that do not waver.

79. A true light on earth is a monk who has not slandered with his tongue. Whoever is such, and has not defiled his body with sins, is a friend of Christ.

80. If the fear of God fills a monk, he is like an unshakable pillar. A monk who has not acquired the fear of God will easily be captured by his enemies.

81. A monk who possesses nothing is a pure light on earth; for “the love of money, being the root of all evil” (1 Tim. 6:10), bears no good fruit.
82. It is better for a monk to eat meat and drink wine than to devour the flesh of his brothers through slander.
83. Gold is tested in a fiery furnace, and a monk is known among the multitude of monastics.
84. Let a monk’s hands be reverently raised to God to defeat the enemy, imitating Moses, who, by raising his hands in the shape of a cross, defeated Amalek.
85. Abundant grace rests upon the monk who is crucified and dies daily; the angels rejoice over him, welcoming him into the Kingdom of Heaven.
86. Fasting is the bridle for the passions, and the mortification of the passions is prayer accompanied by almsgiving.
87. A monk who is above carnal passions is whiter than snow; desiring Christ alone, he will see how Christ crowns him on the day of grace.
88. A monk who whispers will drive away many monks and scatter his friends. The serpent drove Eve out of Paradise through whispering; and a monk who whispers is like him, for he destroys his neighbor’s soul and does not save his own.
89. Whoever sings wisely in his heart will be heard by God. Let the monk’s soul gaze upon God with an undistracted eye; for it is proper for her, having renounced the world and united herself with Christ, to disregard all earthly things.
90. The monk’s soul, fragrant with the Spirit, holy, shields its sense of smell from the serpent, so as not to smell the filth of lust in it. — Likewise, whoever has the fear of God in his heart will not be touched by the filth of sensuality.
91. Strive always to be simple-hearted and sincere, and do not keep one thing in your heart and another on your lips; for this is deceit.
92. Be truthful and do not lie, for lies come from the devil.
93. Do not repay evil with evil; but if anyone does you wrong, forgive him, so that God may forgive you as well.
94. If you are plagued by resentment, pray wholeheartedly for that brother, and the resentment will depart from you.
95. Be careful not to allow the passion of envy to take root in you, lest the devil devour you alive; rather, go to confession and pray to God to deliver you from such danger.
96. If you see someone sinning, do not reveal his sin, do not condemn him, and do not harbor hatred toward him, lest you too fall into the same sin; rather, say, “I am worse than he; and today he has sinned, but tomorrow I will sin.”
97. Know also that demons fear silence, fasting, vigil, abstinence, humility, prayer, tears, and other ascetic virtues.
98. If you want God to grant you tears, contrition, and dispassion, constantly remind yourself of death and your own grave.
99. If you are deceived by the devil and fall into a sin, whether small or great, do not despair or condemn yourself to ruin, but resort to confession and repentance, and God will not turn away from you.
100. Do not love to go into cities; for if you do not see what is sinful, you will remain pure.
101. Do not drink wine to the point of intoxication; otherwise, your heart will rush headlong toward pleasures.
102. Do not eat twice a day, lest your body become coarse, and with it your passions grow strong.
103. Do not sleep too much, but constantly ask for God’s help, “so that you may escape like a bird from a snare” (Prov. 6:5).
104. Do not speak much, lest you fall into falsehood.
105. Acquire nothing beyond your needs, and live with moderate means.
106. Be silent, and do your work.
107. Control your tongue and your stomach with all your strength.
108. Be humble; act as if you were ignorant and uneducated.
109. Be gentle with all people.
110. There is much harm in talkativeness and laughter; a prudent man observes silence.

111. Always keep death before your eyes, and temptation will never lead you to fall.
112. In the evening and in the morning, examine yourself to see how you have spent your time; but this cannot be done without effort (constant self-attention and observation of the heart).
113. Fear God, as one who must give Him an account of all your deeds.
114. Ask yourself every day: Which passion have you overcome?
115. Whoever believes there will be a judgment does not judge anyone, but rather guards and protects himself even from the smallest and most insignificant evil.
116. Whoever believes that his body will be resurrected takes care to purify it from defilement.
117. Having established yourself in the fear of God, keep and fulfill all that you ought to do—and do not disregard the promptings of your conscience; but be attentive to it, so that it may be your guardian and immediately show you into what you are falling, never leaving you, and not allowing you to fall into the hands of your enemies.
118. Know that when a monk's mind begins to turn away from its own will and turn to God, despondency first assails him. Prayer and unceasing meditation on God serve to eradicate such despondency; this meditation is sustained by self-restraint, and self-restraint is preserved by physical labor. Such is the narrow gate that "leads to life" (Matt. 7:14).
119. If you have truly loved the Lord and are striving to attain the coming Kingdom, and have vowed to labor because of your sins, then remember the judgment and eternal torment, awaiting with fear your departure from this world.
120. Have no attachment to money, possessions, parents, worldly glory, friends, relatives, or brothers—or to anything earthly at all. Have no concern or care for these things; but having severed every bond, set aside all worry, and come to hate these things—even stripping your own flesh bare of all this—follow Christ without anxiety or laziness, always looking toward heaven and expecting help from there. For death is sudden, and judgment is near. And woe to the unprepared!

Saint John of the Ladder

A Brief Account of Him

The parents of St. John, his place of birth, and the circumstances leading up to his entry into the Sinai monastery are unknown. His writings indicate that he received a good education; however, his desire to dwell with God compelled him to leave the world and its glory and to withdraw to the Monastery of Sinai, which was renowned at that time for its wise Fathers. He entered the monastery at the age of 16 and placed himself under the instruction and guidance of the elder Martirius, who, four years later—when St. John was 20—tonsured him as a monk. His obedience to his elder was so great that it seemed he had no will of his own; yet toward his brothers he conducted himself simply and humbly, showing no superiority toward anyone. After living with his elder for 19 years, St. John was bereaved of him, and following his death, he began to live alone, choosing for this purpose a secluded place, called Fola, five stadia away from the monastery. He lived there for 40 years. His life in seclusion flowed peacefully, marked by strict asceticism, which he nevertheless knew how to conceal, without appearing to be anything out of the ordinary. Every Saturday and Sunday he would come to the monastery to attend the Divine Liturgy in the church, to partake of the Holy Mysteries of Christ, and then to converse with the Holy Fathers and examine his spiritual state in light of their guidance. During such conversations, in the assembly, St. John would often speak as well, and naturally, his words could not help but stand out among those of others. This pleased the humble; but some of the less discerning began to suspect the wise speaker of vanity and were unable to conceal such suspicion. Then St. John, so as not to lead the weak astray, imposed upon himself complete silence, which he strictly observed for an entire year; and he lifted it only after the earnest entreaties of those very same people who had compelled him to impose such a feat upon himself. After forty years of living in silence, St. John was elected abbot of the Sinai Monastery by the unanimous will of all the brothers. But after guiding this spiritual flock for four years, he returned once more to his solitude, not long before his death, which occurred in the 80th year of his life, in the year 563. At the request of the abbot of Raif, who shared his name, St. John wrote The Ladder of Divine Ascent, in which he describes, in 30 steps, the stages of spiritual ascent toward perfection. He also appended to The Ladder a Letter to the Shepherd, in which he sets forth the duties of a spiritual shepherd. From the 30 words of The Ladder, we present a selection under the following headings:

1. General Principles of Asceticism
2. On Repentance
3. On Virtues and Passions, and on the Struggle Against the Latter in General
4. On the Struggle Against the Eight Principal Passions: b) lust; c) anger; e) despondency; z) pride
5. On Impassivity

Ascetic Lessons of St. John Climacus

1. General Principles of Asceticism

1. God is life and salvation for all who are endowed with free will.

2. One who has dedicated himself to God, though clothed in a material and mortal body, imitates the life and state of the incorporeal—he adheres solely to God’s words and commandments at all times, in every place, and in every deed, — always keeps their senses in check and exercises self-discipline against their natural inclinations, — always meditates on death, grieving and suffering in their soul, — turns away from material goods praised by the world in order to obtain heavenly blessings.

3. All who have earnestly renounced worldly life have undoubtedly done so either for the sake of the Kingdom to come, or because of the multitude of their sins, or out of love for God. If, however, they had none of these intentions, then their withdrawal from the world was unwise. Nevertheless, our good Guide awaits to see what the outcome of their journey will be.

4. When we wish to leave Egypt and flee from Pharaoh, we too need a certain Moses—that is, an intercessor before God and through God—who, standing in the midst of our actions and conduct, would lift up his hands to God on our behalf, so that, guided by him, we might cross the sea of sins and defeat Amalek, the enemy of the passions.

5. For all who have attempted to ascend to heaven in the flesh, self-discipline (restraining oneself) and constant self-denial (voluntary privations) are truly necessary—especially at the very beginning of renunciation, until our pleasure-seeking nature is purified and our insensitive heart is warmed by love for God. For toil—truly, toil—and great, hidden suffering are inevitable in this endeavor, until our mind, this fierce and pleasure-seeking dog, becomes chaste and loving. – However, you who are passionate and weak! – let us be of good cheer. Let us confess our weakness to Christ the Lord, presenting it to Him with unshakable faith, as with a right hand—and we will certainly receive His help—even beyond our worth, if only we always humble ourselves into the depths of humility.

6. Those who undertake this endeavor must renounce everything, despise everything, laugh at everything, and shake off everything in order to lay a firm foundation. The following three-pillar foundation is good: non-malice, fasting, and chastity.

7. A firm beginning (resolve) will undoubtedly be of benefit to us, even if we later grow weak; for a soul that was once courageous, if it grows weak, is wounded by the memory of its former zeal, which acts as a sharp weapon. Some have lifted themselves up in this way many times, after having grown lax.

8. When the soul, treacherously betraying itself, destroys its blissful and longed-for fervor, let it then diligently examine the reason why it lost it; and let it direct all its effort and all its zeal toward that reason; for the former fervor cannot be restored except through the very same door through which it departed.

9. At the very beginning of renunciation, we undoubtedly practice virtue with difficulty, self-compulsion, and sorrow; but as we make progress, we cease to feel sorrow in them, or we feel it, but only slightly; and when our carnal reasoning is overcome and captivated by the fire of zeal, then we perform them with all joy, desire, and divine fervor.

10. Laypeople asked me, “How can we, living with our wives and entangled in worldly cares, attain the most perfect Christian life?” I replied to them, “Do whatever good you can; do not judge anyone, do not steal, do not lie to anyone, do not boast before anyone, do not harbor hatred toward anyone, do not neglect church gatherings, be merciful to those in need, do not lead anyone astray, do not violate another’s honor, and remain faithful to your wives. – If you do these things, you will not be far from the Kingdom of Heaven.

11. Let us set out on this noble endeavor with joy and courage. Let us not fear our enemies; for they gaze upon the face of our soul, though they themselves are invisible—and when they notice that it has changed out of fear, they arm themselves more fiercely against us, seeing that we have been frightened. So let us boldly arm ourselves against them; for no one can contend with a courageous warrior.

12. Those who truly wish to serve Christ must first of all take care—with the help of spiritual fathers and their own discernment—to choose for themselves suitable places and ways of life, paths, and forms of instruction; for communal living is not beneficial for everyone, and not everyone is suited to silence. Each person must consider which path corresponds to his or her own qualities.

13. The entire monastic life consists of three main forms of ascetic practice: either in ascetic solitude and hermitage; or in silence with one, or at most, two others; or, finally, in patient dwelling in a communal life.

14. Whoever has truly loved the Lord, whoever truly desires and seeks the coming Kingdom, whoever has true sorrow for his sins, whoever has truly fixed within himself the memory of judgment and eternal torment, whoever truly fears the end of this life, will no longer love anything temporal; will no longer be preoccupied with or concerned about possessions and acquisitions, nor about the glory and honor of this world, nor about anything earthly; but, having set aside all such cares, and having even come to hate his own body, he will follow Christ, naked and free from cares and sloth, constantly gazing toward heaven and awaiting help from there, according to the words of the Holy One who said, “My soul clings to You” (Ps. 62:9), and according to the words of another ever-memorable one: “I have not grown weary of following You, nor have I desired a day of human rest, O Lord” (Jer. 17:16).

15. It is a shame for us, having left everything behind, to once again be preoccupied with the same things. This is what it means to turn back and not be led into the Kingdom of God.

16. Listen to what the Lord said to that young man who had nearly fulfilled all the commandments: “One thing you lack: sell your possessions and give to the poor, and make yourself poor so that you may receive alms from others” (Luke 18:22, Matthew 19:21).

17. Let us be mindful that, while thinking we are walking the narrow path, we do not in fact wander along the broad and spacious one. Here is the true description of the narrow path: mortifying the flesh, standing in prayer all night, drinking water in moderation, eating little bread, enduring the humiliation of slander, reproaches, mockery, and insults, cutting off one’s own will, enduring attacks, not grumbling in the face of contempt, bearing heavy afflictions—so as to endure courageously when wronged, not to be indignant when slandered, not to be angry when condemned, and to be humble when humiliated. Blessed are those who walk the paths of the way shown here, for “theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven” (Matt. 5:3–12).

18. Whoever thinks he has no attachment to any thing, yet grieves in his heart when deprived of it, deceives himself.

19. This refuge (renunciation of the world) is the cause of both salvation and misfortune; those who sail this sea of the mind know this. But it is a pitiful sight when those who were saved from the abyss suffer drowning in the very refuge itself.

20. Having withdrawn from the world, do not touch it; for passions easily return.

21. Flee from those places that present you with an opportunity to fall as you would flee a scourge, for when we do not see the forbidden fruit, we do not desire it so strongly.

22. Let us strive to imitate Lot, not his wife; for the soul that turns back to where it came from will become like salt that has lost its strength and will grow stiff. Flee from Egypt never to return; for hearts that turn back to it have not seen Jerusalem—that is, the land of dispassion.

23. Let him who is able and willing to help you cast off the burden of your sins be your father; let contrition—which can wash you clean of defilement—be your mother; let your brother be a fellow worker and rival in the pursuit of the heavenly; take the remembrance of death as your inseparable companion; let the sighs of your heart be your beloved children; let your body be your servant, and make the heavenly powers your friends, for at the hour of your soul’s departure they may be of benefit to you if they are your friends. “These” are “the generation that seeks the Lord” (Ps. 23: 6).

24. As we withdraw from the world, we must choose places to dwell that are devoid of opportunities for comfort and vanity—and that are humble; otherwise, we are acting out of passion.

25. Just as it is impossible to look at the sky with one eye and at the earth with the other, so it is impossible for one who has not, in thought and deed, severed all ties with the world to avoid spiritual calamities.

26. A good and well-ordered character is acquired through much labor and effort; but what has been acquired through long effort can be lost in an instant: “For bad company corrupts good habits” (1 Cor. 15:33).

2. On Repentance

1. Repentance is a renewal of baptism. Repentance is the purification of the conscience. Repentance is a covenant with God to reform one’s life. Repentance is reconciliation with the Lord through the performance of good deeds that are the opposite of one’s former sins. Repentance is a spirit of self-condemnation and self-care, free from external concerns. Repentance is the daughter of hope and the rejection of despair.

2. For us, who have fallen into the pit of lawlessness, it is impossible to be drawn out of it unless we plunge into the abyss of humility.

3. There is the broken humility of those who repent; there is the pangs of conscience of those still falling into their sin; and there is the blissful wealth of humility that visits the perfected through God’s influence. The sign of the second (kind of humility) is perfect endurance of dishonor. — Old habits often torment even those who weep over them. And do not be surprised by this. The causes and nature of our falls—which ones occur due to negligence, which due to neglect of spiritual discipline, and which due to God’s withdrawal—are obscure and utterly incomprehensible to the soul. Someone, however, told me that in the falls that befall us due to neglect of our spiritual life, we are granted a swift return from them; for He who delivers us to them does not allow the demon of sorrow to hold us for long.

4. When a wound is still fresh and raw, it heals easily; but chronic wounds, those left neglected and allowed to fester, do not heal easily, and require much effort—cutting, applying poultices, and cauterization—to be healed. Many wounds become incurable over time, but “with God all things are possible” (Matt. 19:26).

5. Before the fall into sin, the demons present God to us as loving toward humanity, but after the fall, as unapproachably strict.

6. Do not listen to the enemy who, after your fall, whispers to you about the insignificance of your transgression, saying, “As long as you do not do this or that, this is nothing.” Often even small offerings have appeased the great wrath of the Judge (and vice versa).

7. Whoever truly seeks assurance of the forgiveness of his sins considers every day on which he does not weep to be lost, even if he has done some good on that day.

8. Let no one who ought to weep over their sins slacken their zeal in this matter, deluding themselves with such a hope: “At the end of my life (at the hour of death), I will receive assurance of forgiveness.” What is unknown is not certainly true. “Relieve me” with this assurance, “that I may rest; I will not depart from here even before I receive it” (Ps. 38: 14). “Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there the bonds are loosed” (2 Cor. 3:17); where there is priceless humility, there the bonds are loosed. But those who lack these two things should not delude themselves: they are bound.

9. Those who live in the world are the only ones alien to these revelations. But some of them, walking the path of charity, will come to realize at the hour of their departure how fruitful this is for them.

10. Whoever weeps for himself will not come to recognize the weeping, the fall, or the reproach of another. — A dog wounded by a beast becomes even more enraged against it, raging uncontrollably against it because of the pain from the wound.

11. Let us consider whether our conscience has ceased to convict us because it has been, as it were, suppressed by evil, rather than because it has become pure. The sign of forgiveness for a fall is the constant acknowledgment that we are debtors.

12. Let us all pay attention—especially those of us who have fallen—so that the pernicious teaching of the godless Origen does not enter our hearts. That vile teaching emphasized above all God’s love for humanity, which is very much to the liking of those who seek pleasure.

13. At the very beginning of our spiritual struggle, let us confess our sins to our good judge (spiritual father), in private; but if he commands it, then in the presence of all. For when sores are revealed, they are not aggravated by this, but healed.

14. During confession, be—both in outward appearance and in inner feeling and thought—like a condemned criminal, with your face bowed to the ground; and if possible, wet the feet of your spiritual father with your tears, as if they were the feet of Christ Himself.

15. Demons usually tempt us either not to confess our sins to our spiritual father at all, or to confess them while shifting the blame for our sins onto others.

16. Do not be deceived by a spirit of pride; confess your sins to your spiritual father without hiding anything, for without self-reproach it is impossible to be freed from eternal shame. Expose your sore to the doctor and do not be ashamed to say to him, “Father, this is my ulcer, my wound; it did not come from anyone else, but from my own laziness: no one is to blame for it—neither man, nor spirit, nor body, nor anything else—but only my own negligence.”

17. John the Baptist required confession from those who came to him before baptism, not because he himself needed it, but seeking the salvation of those who came.

18. Nothing is more repulsive to those who are repenting than the confusion caused by irritability, for repentance requires great humility, while irritability is a sign of great pride.

19. A ray of sunlight that penetrates a house through a crack illuminates everything within it, so that even the finest dust floating in the air becomes visible; in the same way, when the fear of the Lord enters the heart, it reveals all its sins.

20. Just as water washes away letters, so too can a tear cleanse sins.

21. Just as, for lack of water, letters are erased by other means, so too do souls deprived of tears purify and erase their sins through sorrow, sighs, and much lamentation.

22. Just as a fresh wound heals quickly, so, on the contrary, long-standing spiritual wounds are difficult to heal, though they can be healed.

23. Just as it is shameful for one who has buried his father to attend a wedding immediately upon returning from the funeral, so too is it unseemly for those who weep over their sins to seek peace, honor, or glory from people in this present age.

24. Just as the dwellings of citizens differ from those of convicted criminals, so too must the way of life of those who mourn their sins be entirely different from that of the innocent.

25. The feeling of the soul is its natural property; but sin dulls this feeling. Conscience brings about either the cessation of evil or its reduction. Conscience, in turn, is the product of the inner voice, and the inner voice is the word and rebuke of the Guardian Angel given to us at baptism. This is why we observe that those who have not been enlightened by baptism are not tormented in their souls for their evil deeds to the same extent as the faithful, though the reason is not entirely clear.

26. Let anyone who wishes to be freed from the burden of his sins imitate those who sit by the graves outside the city, and let him not cease to shed warm and fervent tears, and let him not cease from the silent sobs of the heart, until he, too, sees Jesus coming and rolling away the stone of hardness from his heart, and freeing our mind, like Lazarus, from the bonds of sin, and commanding His servants—the angels: “Loose him” from his passions “and let him go” (John 11: 44), toward the bliss of dispassion.

3. On virtues and passions—and on the struggle against the latter—in general

1. Discernment is the true understanding of God’s will at all times, in every place, and in every matter; it is found only in those who are pure in heart.

2. Whoever has overcome the first three of the principal passions (vanity, love of money, gluttony) has thereby overcome the last five as well (fornication, anger, sorrow, despondency, pride); but whoever is negligent in overcoming the first will not conquer even one.

3. All demonic attacks stem from three main causes: either from our own negligence, or from pride, or from the devil’s envy.

4. As a rule in all cases, let us align our conscience with God (enlightened by faith and the Lord’s commandments), and having discerned from which direction the winds blow, let us set our sails according to its guidance.

5. In all the deeds by which we strive to please God, the demons dig three pits for us: first, they strive to hinder our good work; second, when they are defeated in this first attempt, they strive to ensure that what is done is not according to God; and when they fail in this scheme as well, then, having quietly crept up on our soul, they flatter us as though we were living in a manner pleasing to God. – The first temptation is resisted by zeal (for salvation) and concern for death; the second—by obedience and humility; and the third—by constant self-reproach. “This is the task before us, until the fire of God enters our sanctuary” (Ps. 78: 16). – Then there will no longer be in us the violence of evil habits; “for our God is a consuming fire” (Heb. 12:29) that devours every arousal and stirrings of lust, every evil habit, every hardening and darkening, whether internal or external, visible or mental.

6. When demons overcome the soul and darken the light of the mind, then there will no longer be in us, the wretched, either sober attention, or reason, or knowledge, or shame; but in their place will come: hard-heartedness, insensitivity, lack of judgment, and blindness.

7. The theft of the soul occurs when we regard as good that which is not good—it is an imperceptible deprivation of wealth, an unknown captivity of the soul. The “murder” of the soul is the killing of the rational mind through indulgence in wicked deeds (the suppression of the fear of God, conscience, and spiritual sensibility by mortal sins). The “destruction” of the soul is falling into despair after committing iniquity.

8. Let those who have been enslaved by their passions and have repented take heart! For even if they have fallen into every pit, become entangled in every snare, and suffered from every ailment, once healed, they will be lights and physicians, beacons and guides to all, revealing the nature and forms of every ailment and, through their own experience, saving those on the brink of falling.

9. The most excellent “alphabet” for everyone (beginners) is as follows: obedience, fasting, sackcloth, ashes, tears, confession, silence, humility, vigilance, courage, cold, labor, suffering for the sake of God, humiliation, contrition, forgiveness, brotherly love, meekness, simple and unquestioning faith, indifference to the world, pure hatred of parents, impartiality, simplicity without malice, voluntary self-denial.

10. The state and characteristics of the “prosperous” are: lack of vanity, lack of anger, good hope, silence, discernment, a firm remembrance of judgment, mercy, hospitality, moderate instruction, unceasing prayer, and lack of love of money.

11. The limit, state, and law of souls “perfect in piety” are as follows: an unconquerable heart, perfect love, a fountain of humility, the outpouring of the mind, Christ’s passion, the unceasing radiance of light and prayer, an abundance of God’s illumination, a longing for death, a hatred of life, an aversion to the body, a prayerful intercessor for peace, as if forcibly compelling God to show mercy, a co-worker with the angels, an abyss of reason, a dwelling place of the mysteries, a repository of ineffable revelations, a savior of mankind, a god over demons, a master of the passions, a ruler of the body, a lord of nature, one who is alien to sin, a dwelling place of dispassion, an imitator of the Lord through the Lord’s help.

12. We must constantly care for and seek the spiritual sense; for when it appears, then the external senses will cease to exert a deceptive influence on the soul; and knowing this, one of the wise men said: “And you will find the sense of God” (Prov. 2:5, 3).

13. The monastic life—in terms of deeds, words, thoughts, and actions—must be lived in accordance with the promptings of the heart. If this is not the case, then it will not be monastic, let alone angelic.

14. Some are, so to speak, naturally inclined toward self-restraint, or silence, or purity, or modesty, or meekness, or tenderness; but others have a nature almost entirely opposed to the aforementioned virtues, yet they force themselves to practice them; and although they are sometimes overcome, I nevertheless praise them more than the former, as those who overcome their nature.

15. Monks are the light of the angels, and monks are the light for all people; therefore, let them strive to be a good example in everything, “giving no offense to anyone in anything” (2 Cor. 6:3), neither in deed nor in word.

16. With the help of the Holy Trinity, let us arm ourselves against the three principal passions with the three virtues. If we do not, we will bring many hardships upon ourselves.

17. If God is raised up in us through our actions, His enemies will be scattered; and if we draw near to Him through vision, then “those who hate Him” and us “will flee from His presence” and ours.

18. Then, above all, through hard work—and not mere words—let us strive to learn the divine truths; for it is not words but deeds that we must show at the time of the exodus.

19. Those who have heard that a treasure is hidden in a known place seek it out, and having found it with difficulty, carefully preserve what they have found; but those who have become rich without effort tend to be wasteful.

20. What sins arise from the eight principal passionate thoughts, and which of the three principal passions is the parent of each of the other five?—The mother of fornication is gluttony; the mother of despondency is vanity; sorrow and anger are born of all three principal passions; and the mother of pride is vanity. — As for which sins arise from the eight principal passions, I will say this: in unbridled passions there is no sense or order, but only chaos and disorder.

21. Untimely laughter, for example, sometimes arises from the demon of lust; sometimes from vanity, when a person shamelessly praises himself inwardly; and sometimes laughter arises from satiety.

22. Excessive sleep sometimes stems from satiety; sometimes from fasting, when those who are fasting become elated; sometimes from despondency; and sometimes simply from one's nature.

23. Loquacity sometimes stems from satiety, and sometimes from vanity.

24. Blasphemy is, in essence, a product of pride; but it often arises from condemning one's neighbor for the very same thing, or from the hostile envy of demons.

25. Hardness of heart sometimes stems from satiety, sometimes from insensitivity; and sometimes from attachment to something. And attachment, in turn, sometimes stems from sexual immorality, sometimes from greed, sometimes from gluttony, sometimes from vanity—and from many other causes.

26. Deceit arises both from pride and from anger.

27. Hypocrisy stems from self-satisfaction and self-will.

28. The virtues that are the opposites of these, however, are born of opposite parents. But since I would not have enough time to discuss each of them separately, I will say briefly in general that the mortification of all the passions mentioned is humility—and whoever has acquired this virtue has conquered all passions.

29. Let the fear we feel toward our superiors serve as an example of the fear of God; and let love for physical beauty serve as a model for love of God: for nothing prevents us from taking examples for virtue even from actions that are contrary to it.

30. God is not revealed in labor alone, but in labor accompanied by simplicity and humility. Although "God's power is made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor. 12:9), the Lord will reject the worker who lacks humility.

31. Illness is sometimes sent to purify us from sin; and sometimes to humble our pride.

32. Our good and all-good Master and Lord, seeing that someone is very lazy in his spiritual struggles, humbles his flesh with sickness as a less difficult struggle; and sometimes by this He purifies the soul from wicked thoughts and passions.

33. Everything that happens to us, whether visible or invisible, is received in one of three ways: either with a good disposition, or with a passionate one, or with a disposition somewhere in between. I saw three brothers who suffered a loss: one of them was indignant, another remained without sorrow, and the third accepted it with great joy.

34. I have seen farmers who sowed the same seeds into the ground; yet each of them had his own particular intention: one to pay off debts, another to become wealthy, and a third to honor his Lord with gifts; while others had in mind to earn praise for their good deeds from those passing along this path of life, or to annoy their envious enemy, or to avoid reproach from people for idleness. — These are the names of the seeds sown by these farmers: fasting, vigil, almsgiving, various acts of service, and the like. Let the brethren themselves carefully examine their intentions in the light of the Lord.

35. Just as when drawing water from springs, we sometimes unknowingly scoop up a toad along with the water; so too, in practicing virtues, we often fulfill passions secretly intertwined with them. Thus—gluttony is intertwined with hospitality; with love—fornication; with prudence—excessive strictness (rigorism); with wisdom—cunning; with meekness—suspicion, slowness, laziness, backbiting, self-will, and disobedience; with silence—the oppression of teaching; with joy—conceit; with hope—sloth; with love again—condemnation; with silence—despondency and sloth; with purity—bitterness; with humility—presumption (without measure); and following all of these, as a common remedy—or rather, a poison—comes vanity.

36. Let us not grieve when, after asking something of the Lord, we are not heard for a long time. The Lord Himself would wish that all people become dispassionate in an instant (but He encounters great obstacles from our own will).

37. All who ask God for something and do not receive it undoubtedly fail to receive it for one of the following reasons: either because they ask before the time is right; or because they ask beyond their measure and out of vanity; or because, had they received what they asked for, they would have become proud or fallen into indolence.

38. It happens that in some people—not only the faithful but also the unfaithful—all passions depart, leaving only that one which, as the primary evil, alone replaces all the others, and which is so harmful that it can cast one down from heaven itself (this is pride).

39. The substance of the passions is consumed as it is devoured and rooted out of the soul by the divine fire.⁷⁷

40. Sometimes the demons withdraw of their own accord to lull us into complacency. But then they suddenly attack the poor soul, plunder it, and accustom it to vice to such an extent that afterward it slanders itself and wages war against itself.

41. I am also aware of another kind of retreat by these beasts—one that occurs when the soul is thoroughly entrenched in sinful habits. We see an example of this in infants who, out of long-standing habit, suck their thumbs when their mothers no longer allow them to suckle at the breast.

42. I also know of a fifth form of dispassion, which arises in the soul from great simplicity and praiseworthy gentleness. To such people, help is sent from God, “who saves the upright in heart” (Ps. 7:11), and they themselves do not even notice that He is delivering them from their passions. Just as infants, when their clothes are removed, do not at all notice their own nakedness.

43. Sin and passion, of course, are not part of human nature. God is not the creator of passions. He, however, has bestowed many virtues upon our nature, among which are the following: charity—for even pagans are compassionate; love—for even speechless animals often shed tears when they lose one another; faith—for we all generate it within ourselves; hope—for whether we give or receive, sow, or sail, we do so in the hope of gaining wealth. Therefore, if—as has been proven—love and virtue are naturally inherent in our nature, and love is the fulfillment of the law, then it is clear that virtues are not foreign to our nature. And let those who excuse their failure to practice virtue by claiming their own weakness be put to shame.

44. But as for purity, lack of anger, humility, prayer, vigil, fasting, and constant contrition, these virtues are above nature. Some of them were taught to us by people through their example; the angels served as models for others; and for still others, the Teacher and Giver is God the Word Himself.

45. It sometimes happens that while we are in prayer, an act of charity arises that admits of no delay. In such a case, we must give preference to the work of love. For love is greater than prayer, since prayer is a particular virtue, while love encompasses all virtues.

46. Not infrequently, God, by the decree of His Providence, leaves certain very slight passions in spiritual people so that, by looking upon these slight, almost sinless weaknesses, they may reproach themselves greatly and thereby acquire the imperishable wealth of humility.

47. Whoever did not live in obedience from the beginning cannot acquire humility, for anyone who has taught himself a craft tends to think highly of himself.

48. The fathers limit the active life to two principal virtues: fasting and obedience. And rightly so; for the first is the destroyer of sensuality, and the second safeguards this destruction with humility. And weeping has a twofold effect, since on the one hand it destroys sin, and on the other it gives birth to humility.

49. It is characteristic of the pious to give to everyone who asks; to give even to those who do not ask is the work of the most pious; and to refrain from demanding back what was taken from the one who took it—especially when he is able to return it—belongs only to the dispassionate.

50. With regard to all passions and virtues, let us constantly examine where we stand—at the beginning, in the middle, or at the end.

51. All the demons’ attacks against us stem from the following three causes: self-indulgence, pride, and the demons’ envy.

52. It is one thing to pray against thoughts; another to resist them; and yet another to pay them no mind and rise above them (or to rule over them). The middle one (i.e., the one capable of contradicting them) often resorts to the first method, due to his unpreparedness; but the first is not yet able to repel his enemies in the second way; and the third ultimately mocks his enemies.

53. Just as those with a keen sense of smell can detect fragrances, even when someone carries them secretly upon their person, so too does a pure soul perceive in others both the fragrance it has itself received from God—and the stench from which it is completely free—even though others do not notice it.

54. Although not everyone can be dispassionate, everyone can be saved.

⁷⁷ In the Optina translation, the following addition appears: “And as the material is eradicated and the soul is purified, the passions also recede—unless a person himself draws them back through a materialistic lifestyle and laziness.”

55. Do not let those foreigners prevail over you—those who urge you to question the ineffable ways of Providence and God’s providence toward people—and who secretly suggest that the Lord shows partiality. These are the offspring of conceit—and they reveal themselves as such.

56. Some have said that certain demons oppose others; but I have ascertained that they all seek our destruction.

57. Every spiritual endeavor, whether visible or mental, is preceded by one’s own free will and most sincere desire, which, with God’s assistance, are brought to fruition. For if the former (free will and desire) do not precede, then the latter (God’s assistance) will not follow.

58. “There is a time for everything under heaven,” says Ecclesiastes. Therefore, let us not be deceived by prideful zeal, which urges us to seek before its time what will come in due season. Let us not seek, at the time of sowing, that which belongs to the harvest; for there is a time to sow our labors, and there is a time to reap the ineffable gifts of grace. Otherwise, even in due time, we will not receive what is fitting and proper for that time.

59. Some, by the inscrutable dispensations of God’s Providence, have received the gifts of grace before their labors; others, in the very midst of their labors; still others, after their labors; and some, even at the hour of death. It is a test to see which of them is more humble than the rest.

60. There is despair arising from the multitude of sins and the burden of conscience; and there is despair arising from pride and arrogance, when those who have fallen into sin think that they were not worthy (of being spared) the fall. The former is healed by abstinence from sin and good hope; the latter, by humility and not judging anyone.

61. In all your undertakings and deeds, both external and internal, examine whether they are truly undertaken and carried out to please God. The sign that our deeds are pleasing to God is, for beginners, progress in humility; for those of intermediate stage, the cessation of inner strife; and for the perfected, the multiplication and abundance of divine light.

62. When the air is cleared of clouds, the sun appears in all its splendor; so too does the soul that has been granted forgiveness of sins and freed from passionate habits (and thoughts) undoubtedly see the Divine light.

63. Some find the greatest delight in miracles and other visible spiritual gifts, not realizing that there are many superior gifts which are hidden and therefore safe from falling away.

64. One who is completely purified of passions sees the soul of one’s neighbor—not its very essence, but its constitution, feelings, and dispositions; whereas one who is still progressing judges the soul by its bodily actions.

65. Those who are weak in spirit must recognize the Lord’s visitation and His mercy toward them through bodily illnesses, misfortunes, and external temptations; but the perfected recognize God’s visitation through the presence of the Holy Spirit within them and through the multiplication of gifts.

66. Among the evil spirits there is a demon—a forerunner—who appears immediately upon our awakening to tempt us and defile our very first thoughts. Dedicate the beginning of your day to the Lord; for to whom you give them first, to that one they will belong. A most skilled craftsman once told me the following words, worthy of attention: “From the beginning of the morning, I know the entire course of my day.”

67. In the temptations that befall us, the demons strive to make us say or do something unwise; and when they cannot overcome us, they approach quietly and secretly instill a proud sense of gratitude toward God.

68. Those who have sought wisdom in heavenly things ascend to heaven after death, while those who cling to earthly things descend into the underworld; for there is no third, intermediate place for souls separated from their bodies.

69. Just as a deer parched with thirst longs for water, so let monks long to comprehend God’s good will; and not only this will, but also when our own will is mingled with it, and when an opposing force is at work. They must also consider which deeds should be performed immediately and without any delay, and which—without haste and with prudence.

70. All who wish to know the will of the Lord must first put to death their own will within themselves; and after praying to God with faith and sincere simplicity, they must consult their fathers and brothers with a humble heart and without any doubt in their minds; and they must accept their counsel as if it came from the mouth of God, even if it contradicts their own reason. – Those who follow this rule without doubt are filled with great humility. – And God does not allow them to be led astray.

71. Some discerned God's will in this way: they detached their thoughts from any inclination toward one desire or another of the soul—that is, both toward that which impels them to action and toward that which opposes it; and, having stripped their mind of its own will, they presented it to the Lord with fervent prayer for a set number of days; and in this way attained knowledge of His will—either because the Mind within their minds mentally revealed it to them, or because one of those thoughts completely vanished from their soul.

72. Others, based on the sorrows and difficulties their undertaking encountered, concluded that it was in accordance with the divine will. Still others, on the contrary, based on the unexpected help they received in their endeavor, sensed that it was pleasing to God, saying to themselves: “God assists only those who choose what is good.”

73. Whoever has acquired God within himself through divine enlightenment is soon made aware of God's holy will, both in matters requiring prompt action and in matters that allow for delay, in the latter case (i.e., through divine providence).

74. God is righteous, and He will not shut the doors of His mercy to those who knock upon them with humility.

75. In all circumstances, we must examine our intentions, for the Lord looks upon them in all our deeds. Anything that is free from partiality and all impurity, and is done solely for God's sake and not for any other reason, will be counted as good for us, even if it is not entirely good in itself.

76. There are courageous souls who, out of a strong love for God and humility of heart, attempt deeds beyond their capacity; but there are also proud hearts who venture into the same undertakings (at the instigation of our enemies). For our enemies often deliberately incite us to undertake deeds beyond our capacity, so that, having failed in them, we may fall into despondency and abandon even those deeds that are commensurate with our strength—and thus become a laughingstock to our enemies.

77. I have seen those who are weak in soul and body who, because of their many sins, attempted feats beyond their capacity but could not bear them. I told them that God judges repentance not by the measure of one's labors, but by the measure of one's humility (accompanied by weeping, contrition, and aversion to sin).

78. Sometimes one's upbringing is the cause of extreme evils, and sometimes bad company; but often the corruption of one's own soul is enough to lead to ruin. Whoever has rid himself of the first two evils may perhaps rid himself of the third as well; but whoever is dominated by the third is unfit for any place. There is no place safer than heaven; yet even there, some have perished because of their corrupt will.

79. Among the unclean spirits, there are some who are more cunning than others. They are not content merely to lead us into sin, but they also urge us to make others our accomplices in evil, so as to bring the most terrible torments upon us. – I saw a man who passed on his sinful habit to another; then, coming to his senses, he began to repent and turned away from sin; but since the one he had taught did not cease to sin, his repentance was not genuine.

80. Listening to accounts of the feats and virtues of the spiritual fathers stirs the mind and soul to zeal; and listening to their teachings is a lamp in the darkness, a return of the strayed to the right path, and enlightenment for the blind.

81. Whoever desires to present to the Lord a chaste body and a pure heart must maintain a temper-controlled and self-restrained life, for without these two virtues all our labor will be in vain.

82. Among the virtues, there are daughters, and there are mothers of virtues. The wise person strives above all to acquire the mothers. God Himself, through His own action, instructs the mothers, while there are many teachers to instruct the daughters.

83. Let us be careful not to compensate for the scarcity of enjoyment (in food) with an excess of sleep, and vice versa; for to act in this way is unwise.

84. Among the unclean spirits are some who, at the beginning of our spiritual life, interpret the Divine Scriptures for us. They usually do this in the hearts of the vain, and even more so in those trained in secular sciences, so that by gradually deceiving them, they may finally plunge them into heresy and blasphemy. We can recognize this demonic theology—or rather, this war against God—by the confusion and the disorderly, unrestrained joy that arises in the soul during these interpretations.

85. We will never cease to grow in virtue and love, neither in this age nor in the age to come, always receiving new light of understanding through the light (enlightenment from above). And the angels, these intelligent beings, do not remain static, but always receive glory upon glory, and understanding upon understanding.

86. Do not be a harsh judge of those who teach about great virtues with their words, while being lazy in doing good; for the lack of action is often compensated for by the benefit of that teaching. We have not all attained everything in equal measure: some excel more in word than in deed, while in others, on the contrary, deed is stronger than word.

87. God is not the creator of evil; therefore, those who say that certain passions are natural to the soul are mistaken, failing to understand that we ourselves have transformed our natural dispositions into passions for evil. By nature, for example, we possess the seed for procreation, yet we use it for lawless sensuality; by nature there is also anger within us—intended against that ancient serpent—yet we direct it against our neighbor; we have been given zeal so that we may be zealous for virtues, yet we are zealous for vices... and so on.

88. A soul that is not slothful provokes the demons to battle against itself; and as the battles multiply, so do the crowns. One who is invulnerable to adversaries will receive no crown; but whoever does not lose heart in the face of attacks will be praised by the angels as a brave warrior.

89. Constantly examine the manifestations of passionate impulses within you; and you will see that there are many passions within you which, being afflicted by spiritual ailments, we cannot even recognize—either because of our weakness or because of a deeply rooted sinful habit.

90. Demons often distract us from what is easiest and most beneficial, and urge us to undertake what is most difficult.

91. A community organized according to God's will is a spiritual laundry that washes away every stain, every coarseness, and every ugliness of the soul. Hermitage, on the other hand, can be called a dyehouse for those who have first cleansed themselves of lust, resentment, and irritability, and only then have withdrawn into silence.

92. The demons of fornication, anger, gluttony, despondency, and drowsiness do not have the power to inflate our minds (but rather humble them); whereas the demons of avarice, pride, loquacity, and many others usually add the evil of arrogance to the sin itself; and the demon of judgment is like them in this regard.

93. If a monk, after visiting worldly people or receiving them at his dwelling, is pierced by the arrow of sorrow an hour or a day after parting from them—instead of rejoicing in his deliverance from the snare that hindered his progress—then he becomes a plaything of the passions of vanity or lust.

94. We must consider with great care when and in what circumstances we should stand against the objects of our passions and fight against them, and when we should retreat; for sometimes, due to weakness, it is better to choose flight so as not to die spiritually.

95. Just as winds, in calm weather, disturb only the surface of the sea, but at other times set the very depths in motion, so too must we conclude regarding the winds of darkness; for in those consumed by passion they agitate the very feelings of the heart, while in those who have triumphed over them, they agitate only the surface of the mind; therefore, the latter are quicker to restore within themselves their usual tranquility, which has remained untouched.

96. Abstinence is the mother of health; and the mother of abstinence is the thought of death and the firm remembrance of the gall mixed with vinegar that our Lord, Master, and God tasted.

97. Silence is the cause and helper of chastity; fasting extinguishes the passions of the flesh; and contrition of heart is the enemy of wicked and impure thoughts.

98. Just as a serpent cannot shed its old skin unless it crawls through a narrow opening, so too we cannot cast off our former evil habits, the corruption of the soul, and the garment of the old man unless we walk the narrow and constricted path of fasting and self-denial.

99. Just as eggs warmed under wings come to life, so too do thoughts hidden from the spiritual father turn into deeds.

100. Just as good horses, when running together, spur one another on, so too in the communal life of good brothers, one spurs the other on to holy zeal.

101. Just as clouds obscure the sun, so too do wicked thoughts darken and destroy the mind.

102. Just as the poor, upon seeing the king's treasures, become even more aware of their own poverty, so too does the soul, upon reading accounts of the great virtues of the Holy Fathers, involuntarily become even more humble in its way of thinking.

103. Just as one who carries perfumes gives off a fragrant scent even against his will, so too is one who has the Spirit of the Lord within him recognized by his words and by his humility.

104. Just as thieves will not rashly enter a place where they see the king's weapons lying about, so too do the thieves of the mind hesitate to steal from one who has united prayer with his heart and established it there.

105. Just as a ship with a good helmsman, with God's help, enters the harbor safely, so too does the soul, having a good shepherd, ascend comfortably to heaven, even though it once committed many sins.

106. Just as one without a guide easily goes astray on his path, even if he is very intelligent, so too does one who walks the path of monasticism on his own authority easily perish, even if he knew all the wisdom of this world.

107. Whoever is weak in body and has committed many grave sins should walk the path of humility and the virtues related to it; for he will find no other salvation.

108. Recognizing one's wrongdoing leads to turning away from it; and turning away from it is the beginning of repentance. The beginning of repentance is the beginning of salvation, and the beginning of working toward salvation is a good resolve (to please God). This good resolve gives rise to good works, and the beginning of good works is virtue. The beginning of virtues is their essence, and the essence of virtue is action. The generation of virtue is constancy (in thought and zeal for it), and the fruit and result of constant thought (and zeal) is habit. The source of habit is the purification of the soul by goodness, and the purification of the soul is the mother of fear. Fear gives rise to the observance of the commandments, both heavenly and earthly, and the observance of the commandments is a sign of love. The beginning of love is the wealth of humility; the wealth of humility is the fullness of love—and then the perfect indwelling of God in those who have become pure in heart through dispassion; "for such will see God" (Matt. 5:8).

4. On the Struggle Against the Eight Principal Passions

1. The Struggle Against Gluttony

1. It would be remarkable if anyone, before entering the grave, were to be freed from the assaults of the stomach.

2. In the passion of gluttony, the stomach, even when sated, cries out, "I am hungry!" and when filled and swelling from excess, it cries out, "I am starving." This passion, with food before one's eyes, incites one to devour everything at once.

3. Whoever caresses a lion often tames it; but whoever indulges the body strengthens its ferocity.

4. A slave to his belly seeks out what delicacies to honor the feast with; but a servant of God considers what gifts might enrich him.

5. When a guest arrives, the glutton makes an effort to be hospitable, driven by gluttony; and he thinks that the opportunity to comfort the visitor is also a license for him to do as he pleases. He takes the visit as a pretext to drink wine; and under the guise of concealing virtue, he becomes a slave to passion.

6. Often, vanity is at odds with gluttony: and these two passions wage war against one another over the poor monk, as if he were a purchased slave. Gluttony compels one to indulge, while vanity urges one to display one's virtue; but a wise person avoids both of these abysses and knows how to use the right moment to counter one passion with another.

7. If the flesh still rages, it must be tamed by abstinence, at all times and in all places. But when it has subsided (which, incidentally, I do not expect to see before my death), then we may conceal our abstinence from others.

8. If your spiritual father permits you—as a young person—to drink wine at feasts, then observe what kind of man he is himself: if he is God-fearing, you may allow yourself a little; but if he is not entirely prudent, it is better for you, disregarding his blessing, to maintain abstinence, especially while you are still struggling with the fire of carnal lust.

9. In taming the stomach, let us proceed with prudent gradualness: first, let us cut out food that causes weight gain; then, food that stirs up the appetite; and finally, food that is overly sweet. Give your stomach food that is moderate and easily digestible, so that through moderate satiety you may rid yourself of its greed, and through the rapid digestion of food, rid yourself of arousal as if it were a scourge.

10. For those who have not fallen, special abstinence is required only when lust arises; but for those who have fallen, it is necessary even unto death; until their very end, let them give no comfort to their bodies and fight against them without compromise. The former need only maintain the proper order of the mind at all times; the latter must also appease God through the soul's lamentation and wasting away (from hunger and thirst).

11. Let us subdue the belly by meditating on the future fire. Obeying the belly, some (because of the arousal caused by lust) eventually cut off their own members—and died a double death. Look closely and you will see that overeating is the sole cause of the drownings (in the sea of lust) that befall us.

12. The mind of one who fasts prays with sobriety, while the mind of the intemperate is filled with impure fantasies. The satiation of the stomach dries up the springs of tears, but a stomach dried up by abstinence gives birth to tears.

13. Whoever serves his belly while seeking to conquer the spirit of fornication is like one who extinguishes a fire with oil.

14. When the stomach is restrained, the heart is humbled; but if it is sated with food, the heart is lifted up in its thoughts.

15. Restrain your stomach through self-control, and you will thereby silence your mouth; for the tongue draws its strength from an abundance of food.

16. He who fills his stomach expands his internal organs; but in the one who starves it through self-restraint, they gradually shrink; and once shrunk, they no longer demand or accept much food.

17. Know that often a demon sits upon the stomach and does not allow a person to be satisfied, even if he were to devour all the food of Egypt and drink all the water of the Nile.

18. If you have promised Christ to walk the narrow and difficult path, then restrain your stomach. The "broad path" of gluttony is vast, "leading to destruction" through debauchery, "and many walk along it," but "the gate is narrow and the path is hard" of self-restraint, "leading to life" through purity, "and few enter through it" (Matt. 7:14).

19. As you sit at a table laden with food, picture death and judgment before your mind's eye; for even in this way you may barely manage to curb your passion for gluttony, if only a little. When you drink, always remember the vinegar and gall of your Lord; and in this way, you will either remain within the bounds of self-restraint, or at the very least, upon sobering up, you will humble your thoughts.

20. Gluttony is the cause of all falls and breaches of vows in monastic communities. If you conquer this mistress, every place will help you attain dispassion; but if she rules over you, you will suffer everywhere until your very death.

21. A living remembrance of death curbs intemperance in eating; and when intemperance in eating is curbed with humility, other passions are also cut off at the same time.

22. Once, when I was still young, I came to a certain town or village—and there, during lunch, thoughts of gluttony and vanity suddenly assailed me; but, fearing the consequences of gluttony, I decided it was better to be overcome by vanity. Among laypeople, the root of all evil is the love of money, and among monks, it is gluttony.

23. I have seen courageous men who, out of some necessity, having granted their stomachs a little leeway in food, subsequently exhausted this wretched body by standing all night long; and in this way taught it to joyfully turn away from satiety.

24. It is an impossible task to be completely free from gluttony and vanity at the beginning of monastic life. But we must not fight against vanity by indulging the stomach.

25. Just as a criminal who has been sentenced and is on his way to execution does not speak of public spectacles, so too, one who truly mourns his sins will not indulge his stomach.

26. Just as a great deal of manure breeds many worms, so too does an abundance of food lead to many stumbles, wicked thoughts, and (shameful) dreams.

27. If the extreme limit of gluttony is to force oneself to eat when one does not want to, then the extreme limit of self-restraint is to restrain one's nature when it craves, even though it has done nothing wrong at that moment.

28. Just as fat birds cannot fly high, so too is it impossible for one who indulges his flesh to ascend to heaven.

29. Just as dried-up mud is no longer pleasing to pigs, so too does the flesh, withered by ascetic struggles, no longer satisfy the demons.

30. (Confession of Gluttony). How do you intend to rid yourselves of me, when I am bound to your very nature?—My gateway is the need for food, and habit makes me insatiable—which, together with the soul's insensitivity and forgetfulness of death, serves as the foundation of your passion for me. — My firstborn son is fornication; the second offspring after him is hardness of heart; and the third is drowsiness. A sea of evil thoughts, waves of filth, and the depths of unspeakable impurity—these, too, spring from me. My daughters are: sloth, loquacity, insolence, mockery, blasphemy, backbiting, cruelty, disobedience, insensitivity, captivity of the mind, boastfulness, arrogant and foolish self-confidence, love of the world—which is followed by defiled prayer, flying thoughts, and often unexpected misfortunes; and following all this comes despair—the fiercest of all passions. —The memory of my sins rises up against me, but does not prevail. The thought of death is a fierce enemy to me, but there is nothing in human beings that can completely destroy me. Whoever has received the Comforter prays to Him against me, and when He is implored, He does not allow me to act passionately within him. But those who have not tasted Him seek in every way to delight in my sweetness.

2. The Struggle Against Fornication

1. The satisfaction of the belly is the mother of fornication, and the mortification of the belly is the cause of purity.

2. When we are sated, the spirit of gluttony departs and sends the spirit of fornication to us, informing it of our condition and saying, "Go and seduce so-and-so; his belly is full, and therefore you will have little trouble." This spirit, upon arriving, smiles and, binding our hands and feet with sleep, does whatever it pleases with us, defiling the soul with fantasies and the body with lustful outbursts.

3. Let no one who has been trained in the preservation of purity attribute its attainment to himself, for it is impossible for anyone to overcome his own nature; and where nature is overcome, there is recognized the coming of the One who is above nature; for, without any contradiction, the lesser is abolished by the greater.

4. The beginning of purity occurs when thoughts are not mingled with lustful desires, and emissions occur from time to time in sleep without fantasies; the middle stage of purity is when natural movements arise only from satisfaction with food and are free from fantasies and emissions; and the end of purity is the mortification of the body, preceded by the mortification of impure thoughts.

5. He who drives away the lustful dog through prayer is like one fighting a lion; whoever subdues it through resistance is like one who has put his enemy to flight and is pursuing him; but whoever has become completely free from the very attachment, having once and for all made it impossible for it to gain any access to him, though he remains in the flesh, has already risen from the grave.

6. If the mark of purity is to feel no lustful impulse even in one's dreams, then surely the extreme degree of lustfulness would be to suffer emissions in waking life from mere thoughts and memories alone.

7. Whoever wages war against this adversary through physical labor and sweat is like one who has bound his enemy with a rope; whoever wages war against his enemy with abstinence and vigilance is like one who has bound his enemy with iron shackles; and whoever arms himself against him with humility, patience, and self-denial is like one who has slain his adversary and hidden him in the sand.

8. There are those who bind this tormentor through heroic deeds, those through humility, and those through God's inner inspiration. The first is like the dawn, the second like the full moon, and the third like the radiant sun; but all of them dwell in heaven.

9. The fox pretends to be asleep, and the demon pretends to be chaste; the former to deceive a bird, and the latter to destroy a soul. Do not trust this mortal body throughout your life; and do not rely on it until we stand before Christ.

10. For beginners, falls into carnal sins usually occur because of an abundance of food; for those of intermediate standing, they arise from pride, and for the same reason as with beginners; but for those approaching perfection, they occur only because of judgmental attitudes toward others.

11. Some praise those who are eunuchs by nature (from birth) as having been delivered from the torments of the flesh; but I praise those who daily make themselves eunuchs and, with their thoughts—like a knife—have grown accustomed to circumcising themselves.

12. Do not think to overthrow the demon of lust with arguments and proofs; he has favorable grounds on his side, since he wages war against us by means of our very nature.

13. Whoever hopes to struggle against his own flesh, or to conquer it by his own strength, labors in vain. For if the Lord does not destroy the house of carnal lust and build the house of the soul, then he who attempts to succeed in this by his own efforts watches and fasts in vain.

14. Cast down before the Lord the weakness of your nature, acknowledging your utter powerlessness in all things, and you will imperceptibly receive the gift of chastity.

15. Those who have slipped and fallen into the pit of lust fall far behind those ascending and descending the ladder (seen by Jacob); and in order for them to resume such an ascent, they require much toil and extreme penance.

16. There is fornication even without knowing a wife—which, being unnatural, subjects one to greater torment. It is a kind of death and destruction that we always carry within ourselves, and most of all in our youth. But I do not dare to declare this destruction in writing, for my hand is restrained by the one who said, “It is shameful even to mention or speak of the things that are done in secret” (Eph. 5:12).

17. The inhuman enemy, the instigator of fornication, portrays God as merciful, suggesting that He shows great leniency toward this passion as if it were natural. But observe this schemer closely, and you will find that, once this sin has been committed, he already portrays God differently—as merely just and unforgiving. He makes the first suggestion to draw us into sin, and the second to plunge us into despair.

18. When, after committing a sin, we are tormented by anguish and despair, it is not our nature to give in to further falls; but when these feelings subside, the malicious enemy once again begins to speak to us of God’s love for humanity.

19. The Lord, being incorruptible and incorporeal, rejoices in the purity and incorruptibility of our body; the demons, however, rejoice in nothing more than foul fornication, and love no passion as much as this one, which defiles the body.

20. The mother of sweetness (of fruits that bring comfort) is the earth and the dew; and the mother of purity is silence combined with obedience. Purity of the body, attained through silence alone, while bringing one closer to the world, often did not remain unshakable; but that which is attained through obedience is universally virtuous and unshakable.

21. Whoever attempts to quell this struggle through abstinence alone is like a man striving to swim out of the depths of the sea using only one hand. Combine abstinence with humility; for the former, without the latter, proves useless.

22. Whatever passion you see reigning within yourself, arm yourself most of all against that one, especially against your natural inner enemy. For if you and I do not conquer this passion, victory over others will be of no benefit to us; but having struck down this Egyptian, we too will surely behold God in the bush of humility.

23. When I was tempted, I felt joy, tears, and comfort, and in my naivety I thought this was a spiritual fruit, but it was the enemy’s deception.

24. Do not be deceived, young man! I have seen some who prayed for those they loved, who, though driven by lustful passion, nevertheless thought they were fulfilling the duty of holy love.

25. When we lie down on our beds, that is when we must be most vigilant; for then the mind, separated from the body, wrestles with the demons; and if it has not yet cut off all sympathy for the sweetness of lust, it readily becomes a traitor.

26. May the remembrance of death fall asleep and rise with you, along with the prayer of Jesus; for nothing can provide you with such powerful intercession during sleep as these practices.

27. Emissions during sleep sometimes occur from an abundance of food, and generally from excessive indulgence of the flesh; sometimes from pride, when we, having long remained free from emissions, become puffed up by this; sometimes from the fact that we condemn our neighbor; and sometimes simply from demonic envy. God allows this to happen to some so that, through this misfortune, He may teach the sinless person humility.

28. Do not allow yourself to dwell during the day on the dreams you had while sleeping; for it is the demons' intention to defile us while we are awake through these dreams.

29. During the storm of temptation by lust, the following are a great help to us: a hair shirt, ashes, standing all night, hunger, scorching thirst—quenched only by a few drops—staying in cemeteries, and above all, humility of heart; and if possible, a spiritual father or a zealous brother, quick to help and wise in experience; for I consider it a miracle that anyone could, on their own, save their ship from this abyss.

30. A certain man, upon seeing an extraordinarily beautiful woman, glorified the Creator through her. From gazing upon her, love for God was kindled within him, and a fountain of tears burst forth from his eyes. And it was wondrous to see how that which would have led another to ruin became, for him, a crown of victory beyond the natural order. If such a person always has the same feelings and actions in similar situations, then he has attained incorruptibility even before the general resurrection.

31. We must be guided by the same rule with regard to hymns and songs. Those who love God are usually stirred by both secular and spiritual songs to holy joy, God's love, and tears, while those who love sensual pleasures are stirred to the opposite.

32. Some say that after tasting carnal sin, it is impossible to be called pure; but I, refuting their opinion, say that it is possible and easy for one who desires to transform a wild olive tree into a good one through grafting. If the keys of the Kingdom were entrusted to one who is chaste in the flesh, then the opinion of those people might be justified. But let them be put to shame by the one who, having a mother-in-law, became pure and bears the keys of the Kingdom.

33. The serpent of carnal lust takes many forms: to those who have not tasted its sweetness, it suggests tasting it just once and then stopping; but to those who have tasted it, this cunning serpent urges them to taste it again. Many of the former, being unaware of this evil, remain free from temptation; but the latter, having experienced this abomination, suffer temptations and incitements. However, the opposite often happens as well.

34. When we rise from sleep in a good and peaceful frame of mind, this happens to us through the hidden influence of the Holy Angels, especially if we fell asleep in prayer and sobriety. But it happens that we rise in a gloomy and vexed state of mind, suffering this because of evil dreams.

35. It is no wonder that the immaterial should struggle against the immaterial; but it is a miracle—and truly a wondrous miracle—that one clothed in matter should put immaterial enemies to flight, in the struggle against this very matter of his own, which is hostile and treacherous.

36. The wise Fathers hold that one thing is an apposition, another is a conjunction, another is a coordination, another is a subjugation, another is a struggle, and yet another is the so-called passion of the soul. They define an apposition as a simple word (thought) or an image of some object that reappears to the mind and is brought into the heart; a conjunction is a dialogue with the image that has appeared, whether with passion or dispassionately; an assimilation is the soul's inclination toward what is seen, accompanied by delight; captivation is the violent and involuntary enticement of the heart by what is seen, or its complete fusion with it, which disrupts our sound disposition; "struggle" refers to strenuous resistance against the adversary, ending either in victory or defeat—at will; and "passion" refers to such a lustful disposition which, having taken root in the soul, is then, through long habit, transformed into what seems to be a natural property of the soul, so that the soul already strives of its own accord and of its own volition toward its satisfaction. Of all these, the first is sinless; the second is not entirely so; the third may be either sinful or sinless, depending on the disposition of the one who strives. This struggle is either a source of reward or of torment. Captivity is subject to judgment in some cases when it occurs during prayer, and in others when it occurs at other times—in some cases when one thinks of indifferent things, and in others when one thinks of evil things. As for the passion, it is undoubtedly condemned in every case, and if it is not purified by equivalent repentance, it is subject to eternal torment. But whoever treats the first—that is, the initial impulse—with detachment (rejecting it without dwelling on it with their attention) cuts off everything that follows in one fell swoop.

37. The most enlightened and discerning of the Fathers have also noted another thought, one that is more subtle than all those mentioned above. It is called a "flash of thought"—which, without a specific time, without a word or image, and with the speed of an arrow, instills passion in the one being tempted. There is nothing more fleeting in the body, nothing faster or more instantaneous in the spirit, than the way this thought—with a single subtle reminder—timeless, unspoken, and for some even unknown—suddenly makes its presence felt in the soul, without prior consultation or agreement with it. – Whoever has been able to grasp through tears (to understand, to grasp) such subtlety of this thought? That person can also explain to us how it happens that the soul, from a single glance, or the touch of a hand, or the sound of singing, passionately strays (is defiled and corrupted by lust) without having thought about it or intended it.

38. Sometimes lust, having arisen within the soul, passes into the body, and sometimes it passes from the body into the soul. The latter usually happens to those living in the world, and the former to those leading a monastic life, due to the scarcity of the substance (or material) of lust within them.

39. When, after a long struggle with the demon—the ally of our mortal flesh—we finally drive him out of our hearts with the stones of fasting and the swords of humility, then this accursed one, like a worm crawling within our body, strives to defile us with a certain tickling sensation, arousing untimely and inarticulate movements.

40. This demon watches more closely than any other for the moment when we are physically unable to pray against him. And then this vile one makes a special effort to attack us.

41. For those who have not yet attained true prayer from the heart, exerting oneself in bodily prayer helps (in the struggle against lust)—that is, the raising of the hands, the beating of the chest, the tender lifting of the eyes to heaven, sighs mixed with groans, and frequent kneeling; —which, however, they are often unable to do because of the presence of others. —It is precisely then that the demons try especially hard to attack them; and since they do not yet have the strength to resist them with steadfastness of mind and the invisible power of prayer, they may, out of necessity, sometimes yield to those who are fighting against them. In such a case, however, withdraw from people as quickly as possible, if you can; hide somewhere out of sight for a short time—and there, raising your eyes in sorrow—spiritual, if you can, and if not, at least physical—and spreading your arms in the shape of a cross, to thus put to shame and defeat the mental Amalek, —cry out to the Almighty to save you, not with cunning words, but with humble utterances, first and foremost imploring: “Have mercy on me, for I am weak” (Ps. 6:3). Then, through experience, you will come to know the power of the Most High, and with invisible aid, you will put the invisible ones to flight. Having become skilled in this manner of warfare, you will soon drive away your enemies with your soul alone; for this second gift is given by God to those who do the first as a reward.

42. Drink eagerly, as the water of life, the reproach from every person who wishes to give you this medicine that cleanses you from lustful desires; for then profound purity will shine forth in your soul, and the light of God will not be lacking in your heart.

43. Do not cease to imagine and recall the abyss of dark fire, the merciless servants, the unmerciful and implacable Judge, the endless depth of the flames of hell, the narrow passages leading to the underworld, the dreadful chasms, and other things of this kind; so that through the fear born of these recollections, you may cast away from yourself the sensation of lust, unite yourself with incorruptible purity, and receive into your soul the radiance of the incorporeal light, which is more brilliant than all other lights.

44. There is a demon who, as soon as we lie down on our bed, comes to us and bombards us with cunning and impure thoughts: so that, being too lazy to arm ourselves against them with prayer, and falling asleep with impure thoughts, we may then be overwhelmed by impure dreams.

45. What the eyes have not seen, the throat does not strongly desire to taste merely from hearing about it; so too, those who are pure in body derive great relief in the battle against fornication from their ignorance of its (fornicatory) delights.

46. Just as one who fights a lion and takes his eyes off it perishes immediately, so too does one who struggles against his own flesh—if he gives it rest.

47. For those who struggle against bodily lust, silence is appropriate at times—but only with the permission of a mentor who knows them well.

48. I have learned that the demon of despondency precedes the demon of fornication and prepares the way for him; by thoroughly relaxing the body and plunging it into sleep, it enables the demon of fornication to commit defilements in the sleeper just as in waking life.

49. Just as an earthly king finds it abhorrent when someone stands before him, turns his face away from him, and converses with his enemies, so too is it abhorrent to the Lord when someone stands before Him in prayer while harboring impure thoughts.

50. When this dog (the demon of lust) comes to you, drive him away with the spiritual weapon of prayer; and no matter how shamelessly he persists, do not yield to him.

51. (Confession of Lustful Passion). The soul asks: “Tell me, my spouse—my very nature (for I wish to ask no one but you about what concerns you)—tell me, how can I remain unscathed by you? How can I overcome your torment?” She, answering her soul, says: “I will not tell you what you yourself do not know; but I will tell you what we both understand. I have within me my father—self-love (self-indulgence and self-pity). From afar, every form of self-indulgence and comfort prepares my arousal; from this comfort and the deeds that accompany it, a lustful burning then ignites within me. And then, having conceived, I give birth to sins; and they, once born, in turn give birth to the death of the soul through despair. – If you recognize my weakness and your own—both obvious and profound—you will bind my hands. If you starve my throat, you will bind my feet so that I may not go any further. If you unite yourself with obedience, you will sever your bond with me. And if you acquire humility, you will cut off my head.

3. The Struggle Against Greed

1. The love of money is the daughter of unbelief. It uses possible weaknesses, the approach of old age, and the sudden onset of famine due to drought as excuses for itself.

2. The lover of money is a scoffer and a willful violator of the Gospel. (The spirit of the Gospel is love.) But whoever has love will not hoard money. Anyone who tries to get along with both (love and money) is deceiving himself.

3. Whoever mourns for himself renounces (not only his possessions but) his own body as well; and if the time demands it, he will not spare even that.

4. Do not say that you need to collect for the poor (in order to gain the Kingdom by helping them), for the Kingdom can be bought even for two lepta.

5. A lover of travel and a lover of money met; and the latter called the former imprudent.

6. Whoever has conquered this passion (for money) has cut off all worries; but whoever is bound by it (is always tormented by worries) and can never pray with a pure heart.

7. The love of money begins with the intention of giving alms, but ends in hatred of the poor. And he (the money-lover), while he is gathering, is merciful, but as soon as he has gathered enough, he clenches his fists.

8. I have seen beggars who, though living the life of the spiritually poor, have become spiritually rich and have forgotten their former poverty.

9. The non-acquisitive person has set aside all earthly cares, does not worry about life and worldly matters, and walks his path unhindered. He is the master of the world, having cast all his sorrow upon God. He will not tell anyone of his need, but accepts whatever comes as coming from the hand of the Lord.

10. The non-acquisitive person is attached to nothing and does not think about what he has, as if it did not exist; for he had already renounced everything when he decided to become a hermit. Whoever grieves over anything is not yet non-acquisitive.

11. The non-covetous person prays with a pure heart, but the covetous person, during prayer, is filled with material images, as if praying to them.

12. Those who live in obedience are free from the love of money; for when they have even surrendered their own bodies, what else can they possibly possess as their own?

13. One who has tasted the heavenly regards earthly things as nothing; but one who has not tasted the former delights in the acquisition of the latter.

14. O monks! Let us not be less faithful than the birds—which neither sow nor gather.

15. Great is the one who has piously renounced all possessions; but the one who renounces them of his own free will is holy. The former will receive a hundredfold, whether in possessions or in gifts, while the latter will inherit eternal life.

16. Waves will not leave the sea, nor will anger and sorrow leave the lover of silver.

17. Unshakable faith dispels all anxiety, and the remembrance of death teaches one to renounce even the body.

18. There was not a trace of greed in Job; that is why, even after losing everything, he remained unperturbed.

19. “The root of all evil” is called “the love of money” (1 Tim. 6:10); for it gives rise to hatred, theft, envy, divisions, strife, discord, malice, cruelty, and murder.

20. Faith and a life of pilgrimage are the death of the love of money; but mercy and love spare not even the body itself.

21. Just as those with shackles on their feet cannot walk comfortably, so too those who hoard money cannot ascend to heaven.

22. If the extreme degree of greed is when a person cannot stop accumulating wealth or is never satisfied with it, then the height of non-greed consists in not sparing even one's own body.

23. Let us cast aside our cares; for we have enrolled ourselves among those who are free from cares. We have no excuse if we do not fulfill this. Let us remember one thing: that to those who have received the Lord through the renewal of Holy Baptism, He has given "the right to become children of God" (John 1:12); which is why it is said to them: "Be still and know that I am God" (Ps. 45:11).

24. It is a great shame for us who have left everything behind, after the calling by which the Lord—and not man—called us, to concern ourselves with anything that cannot benefit us during our great need, that is, at the hour of the soul's departure. This is what it means, as the Lord said, to turn back and not be admitted into the Kingdom of Heaven.

25. The demon of avarice battles against those who are not covetous; and when he cannot overcome them, he presents beggars to them and, under the guise of mercy, persuades them to turn from the immaterial back to the material.

26. Just as those who exchange gold for clay suffer a great loss, so too do those who, for the sake of material gain, proclaim and publicize their spiritual achievements—they suffer nothing but loss.

4. The Struggle Against Anger

1. Anger is the recollection of hidden hatred, that is, resentment. "Anger" is the desire to harm the one who has caused distress. "Irritability" (quick temper) is a momentary flare-up of the heart. "Grief" is an unpleasant (annoying) feeling lodged in the soul. "Fury" is the corruption of a good disposition and the defilement of the soul.

2. Some, being prone to irritability and anger, pay no attention to it and do not care to heal this passion, not considering what the Wise One said: "The impulse of fury is his downfall" (Sir. 1:22).

3. Anger, like the rapid movement of a millstone, can in a single moment grind away and destroy the wheat and fruit of the soul—more than anything else can in an entire day. Therefore, one must watch oneself carefully. Like a flame fanned by a strong wind, it scorches and destroys the field of the soul more quickly than a slow fire.

4. Impartiality is an insatiable desire for dishonor, just as the vain have an excessive desire for praise. Impartiality is a victory over one's nature, attained through toil and sweat, accompanied by indifference to insults.

5. Meekness is an unshakable disposition of the soul, remaining the same in the face of both dishonor and praise.

6. The beginning of non-anger is silence of the lips when the heart is troubled; the middle is silence of the thoughts when the soul is slightly disturbed; and the end is unshakable stillness in the face of the winds of impurity.

7. Just as water, poured continuously onto a fire, extinguishes it completely, so too do the tears of true weeping usually extinguish every flame of anger and wrath.

8. Just as darkness is dispelled by the appearance of light, so every sorrow and anger vanishes from the fragrance of humility.

9. Nothing is more out of place for those who repent than irritable anger; for turning to God requires great humility, while irritability is a sign of a high opinion of oneself.

10. If the height of meekness is to remain peaceful and loving in one's heart toward an irritable person even in their presence, then without a doubt the height of anger is when someone, being alone with themselves, wages a fierce battle and struggle against the one who has offended them, expressing this through words and gestures.

11. If the Holy Spirit is the peace of the soul, and anger is the turmoil of the heart, then nothing poses such an obstacle to His dwelling within us as irritable anger.

12. Silence of the lips is the first weapon against anger; but it is possible, under the guise of silence, to hide a grudge. And this is worse; it is better to speak one's mind, even in anger. Some, when angry, refuse to eat—and thereby only deepen this passion; while others eat a great deal—and this drives them into a rage—whereas moderate consolation has often helped to quell fury. Therefore, the struggle against this passion requires great prudence. And nature itself aids it, just as it does the serpent of carnal lust.

13. Sometimes moderate singing successfully dispels irritation; but sometimes, when it is excessive and untimely, it contributes to sensuality. Therefore, one must make use of this remedy, wisely establishing both its measure and its time.

14. It is more beneficial for the angry to live in community, while the lustful would do better to lead a life of silence, as a remedy against fornication and foul impurity. Those suffering from either of these ailments must entrust themselves to the care of a spiritual father, so that he may at times keep them in silence and at other times engage them in the practices of communal obedience.

15. It is very harmful to disturb the eye of the heart with irritation, as the one who said, “My eye is troubled by anger” (Ps. 6:8), put it; but it is even more harmful to express the inner turmoil of anger in words; and to let one’s hands act upon it as well—this is entirely contrary to and alien from the monastic life—the angelic and divine life.

16. Let us look closely—and we will see that many of the wrathful diligently observe vigil, fasting, and silence—and the enemy does not hinder them in this; for he knows how, even amid acts of repentance and weeping, to prepare the fuel for the nourishment and rekindling of this passion.

17. The beginning of blessed meekness is to patiently endure insults, despite the bitterness and pain of the soul; the middle stage is to keep one’s heart free from sorrow and care during such times; and perfection, if it occurs, is to regard them as a source of praise for oneself.

18. It is one thing for beginners to be free from anger, arising from penitential weeping, and another for the perfected to be unmoved by anger. In the former, anger is restrained by tears, as by a kind of bridle, while in the latter, this serpent is slain by the sword of dispassion.

19. I saw three monks who had all suffered dishonor together. One of them felt insulted but remained silent; another rejoiced for himself but grieved for the one who had reviled him; the third, however, having imprinted the harm done by his neighbor upon his mind, shed fervent tears for him. Here we see the practitioners of fear, reward, and love.

20. Holding a grudge is the ultimate expression of anger—keeping the sins (committed by our neighbor against us) in memory, rejecting the path to forgiveness (as ordained by God: “Forgive, and you will be forgiven”), —the ruin of all former virtues, a poison that kills the soul, a worm gnawing at the heart, a shame to pray (how can one say, “Forgive us, as we forgive?”), a nail driven into the soul, unceasing sin, relentless lawlessness, and hourly evil.

21. He who has subdued his anger has nipped in the bud the seeds of resentment; for children are begotten only by a living father.

22. He who has acquired love has become a stranger to enmity; but he who harbors enmity multiplies within himself labors that know no rest.

23. If you are to hold a grudge, hold it against the demons; and if you are to be hostile, be hostile toward your own body at all times. The flesh is an ungrateful and treacherous friend; when you indulge it, it harms you even more.

24. A vindictive heart is a twisted interpreter of Scripture, allegorically twisting the words of the Spirit to suit itself. But may the prayer given to us by the Lord Jesus put it to shame—a prayer we cannot utter while harboring a vindictive heart.

25. If, after much effort to improve yourself, you are unable to tear this thorn from your heart, then go and humbly repent before the one against whom you harbor enmity, even if only in words; and, ashamed of your long-standing hypocrisy toward him, you will embrace him in your love, your conscience pricking you like fire.

26. Do not consider yourself free from this affliction merely because you have prayed for the one who offended you, or given him gifts, or invited him to a meal; but only when, upon hearing that he has suffered some misfortune—whether spiritual or physical—you are deeply moved and weep for him as you would for yourself.

27. The memory of the sufferings of the Lord Jesus heals a vindictive heart—a heart that is deeply humbled by His lack of malice.

28. Some subject themselves to toil and sweat in order to obtain forgiveness, but the one who does not hold a grudge is ahead of them. For the saying is true: “If you forgive others quickly, you too will be forgiven generously” (Luke 6:37).

29. Not holding onto evil is a sign of true repentance; but whoever, while remembering evil, thinks that repentance is taking place is like a person who, in a dream, imagines himself running.

30. I have seen resentful people who, while advising other resentful people not to be resentful, were ashamed of their own words and turned away from this passion.

31. Slander is born of hatred and a grudge—a subtle ailment, a hidden leech that sucks the blood of love.

32. Some people mask slander with love, with a desire to correct. But if you love your neighbor, do not speak ill of him; instead, pray for him. Only such conduct is pleasing to the Lord.

33. Whoever wishes to rid themselves of the spirit of condemnation should direct their rebuke not at the one who falls, but at the tempting devil. For no one desires to sin against God, though everyone is free to sin of their own accord (i.e., sins of their own volition).

34. One of the shortest paths to receiving forgiveness of sins is to judge no one; for it is said, “Do not judge, and you will not be judged” (Luke 6:37).

35. Just as fire is opposed to water, so it is unbecoming for a repentant person to judge others. Even if you were to see someone sinning at the very moment their soul leaves their body—even then, do not condemn them, for God’s judgment is hidden from people. Some have clearly fallen into great sin, yet in secret have performed even greater good deeds; and those who love to gossip have been led astray, seeing only the smoke and failing to perceive the sun behind it.

36. Experience has shown that whatever sins—whether of the body or of the soul—we use to condemn our neighbor, we ourselves will fall into.

37. Those who are quick and harsh in condemning their neighbor’s transgressions are indignant because of this passion, for they lack a perfect and constant remembrance of and sorrow for their own sins. For if anyone, unclouded by the veil of self-love, looks truthfully upon his own evil deeds, he will no longer concern himself with anything else but them, rightly reasoning that even his entire life would not be enough to mourn for himself—even if he lived a hundred years, and even if he saw the entire Jordan River flowing from his own eyes.

38. Demons, the murderers of souls, incite us either to sin or, if we do not sin, to condemn those who do, so that through this they may defile us—and those who do not sin as well.

39. Know that, in a spirit of hostility, taking pleasure in criticizing a neighbor’s teachings, deeds, and virtues is a sign of vindictive and envious people.

40. I have seen people who secretly commit grave sins—sins that simply remain undisclosed—who, convinced of their own purity, mercilessly attack those who have fallen into sins, even if minor, that have become public knowledge.

41. To judge is a shameless usurpation of God’s authority; and to condemn is the ruin of one’s own soul.

42. Just as pride, even without any other passion, can destroy a person, so condemnation alone can completely destroy us. Thus, that Pharisee was condemned for this.

43. The angry man and the hypocrite met; and in their conversation, not a single word of truth could be found. If you look into the heart of the former, you will find fury; and if you examine the soul of the latter, you will see deceit.

44. Just as winds stir up the abyss, so anger, more than any other passion, agitates the mind.

45. (Confession of This Passion). Tell us, O mad and shameful passion, what is the name of the father who begot you, and what is the name of the mother who bore you wickedly; also, what are the names of your wicked sons and daughters; and not only that, but who are those who struggle against you, and who are those who slay you? – “I have many mothers, and more than one father. My mothers are: vanity, greed, gluttony, and sometimes fornication; but my chief father is pride. My daughters are: rancor, hatred, enmity, and self-justification. My rivals are the virtues opposite to my daughters—forbearance and meekness; my slanderer, however, is humility.”

5. The Struggle Against Sorrow

1. Whoever has come to hate the world has escaped sorrow. But whoever is attached to anything visible has not yet been freed from it; for how can one not be saddened by the loss of a beloved thing? Although we must maintain self-control in all things, we must be especially prudent and attentive in this regard.

2. When the abbot tests us with beneficial humiliation through rebukes and reprimands, let us recall the terrible words of the Universal Judge; and we will undoubtedly cut through the reckless sorrow and grief instilled in us with meekness and patience, as with a double-edged sword.

3. If we have fallen, let us first and foremost take up arms against the spirit of sorrow; for it, appearing during our prayer and reminding us of our former boldness before God, seeks to turn us away from prayer.

4. Love for the lowly is the cure for irritability; while psalm-singing, mercy, and non-covetousness are the slayers of sorrow.

5. Just as too much wood smothers and extinguishes the flame and produces a great deal of smoke, so too does excessive sorrow make the soul, as it were, smoky and dark, and dries up the stream of tears.

6. The narrow path is marked by disgrace, reproach, ridicule, insults, and the burden of afflictions. And it leads to salvation if you—when wronged—endure with courage; when slandered—do not resent; when humiliated—do not become angry; and when condemned—submit with humility. Blessed are those who walk in the ways of this path, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven (Matt. 5:3–12).

7. Willingly enduring all sorrow is the true, saving path of repentance.

8. To consider oneself worthy not only of the visible and invisible sorrows already endured, but also of greater ones, is a sign of active repentance.

9. Just as water, when confined, rises upward, so too does the soul, oppressed by misfortunes, flow upward in repentance toward God and be saved.

10. A certain Abba Kir was mistreated every day at the monastery; and the servants would drive him away from the meal almost every day, so that he was often left without food. I (St. John Climacus) asked him how he viewed this. He replied: “Believe me, Father, these fathers of mine are testing me to see if I am truly a monk. And since they do not do this in earnest, I, knowing their intention, bear it cheerfully and do not grieve.” – At the time of his death, two years later, he said: “I thank you, brothers; for because you tempted me for my own salvation, I was free from demonic temptations for seventeen years.”

11. Another man, a certain Macedon, an elder, had been justly sentenced—as a punishment—to remain always among the novices; but when his term ended, he himself begged to be allowed to remain under this humiliating penance, as if he had sinned gravely. – Later, he confessed to St. John Climacus: “I have never experienced such relief in any inner struggle, and never before have I felt within myself the sweetness of the Divine light as I do now.”

12. As we are pierced by reproaches, let us remember our sins until the Lord, seeing our need and the harm we inflict upon ourselves, deigns to blot out our sins—and transforms the sorrows that gnaw at our hearts into joy, as the Psalmist says: “Though I have many sorrows in my heart, Your comfort has gladdened my soul” (Ps. 93:19).

13. Blessed is the one who, being rebuked and humiliated daily for God’s sake, compels himself to endure; he will rejoice with the martyrs and speak boldly with the angels. – Whoever rejects righteous or unrighteous rebuke rejects his own salvation, but whoever accepts it—whether with sorrow or without—will soon receive forgiveness of sins.

14. My son! If you first submit yourself to the endurance of dishonor, you will labor only a little to attain blessed peace of mind.

15. Just as a small fire softens a great deal of wax, so too does a small humiliation often suddenly soften the heart, soothe it, and eradicate all its ferocity, all its insensitivity and bitterness.

16. Annoyances, humiliations, and all such occurrences in the soul of a novice are likened to the bitterness of wormwood—while praise, honor, and approval are likened to honey. But wormwood purifies all inner impurity, whereas honey usually increases bitterness.

6. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Despondency

1. Despondency is a slackening of the soul, neglect of spiritual struggles, and aversion to one’s vow; it is the delight of the laity, a slanderer of God, as if He were unmerciful and inhuman; in psalm-singing it is discordant, in prayer it is feeble, yet in physical service it is strong as iron, in manual labor it is diligent, and in obedience it is swift and willing.

2. A man who lives in obedient submission knows no despondency; and through the sensual, he prospers in the spiritual.

3. Community life is the enemy of despondency, but for the silent monk, it is a constant companion; it will not depart from him before death, nor will it cease to struggle against him until his passing. Upon seeing the hermit's cell, it smiles, and drawing near, it settles close to him.

4. A doctor visits the sick in the morning, but despondency visits the ascetics around noon.

5. Despondency incites hospitality and pesters with suggestions to give alms from one's earnings; it eagerly urges visits to the sick, recalling the words: "I was sick, and you came to Me" (Matt. 25:36); it persistently urges: "Go to those who are grieving and the faint-hearted"—and, being faint-hearted itself, advises us to comfort the faint-hearted.

6. To those who have set out to pray, it reminds them of necessary tasks and devises every possible means to distract us from prayer with some blessing, like a silent bridle.

7. Each of the other passions is overcome by a single virtue; but despondency, for the monk, is all-encompassing death. Of all the eight leaders of evil, the spirit of despondency is the most grievous.

8. When there is no psalm singing, despondency does not arise; and at the end of the rule (during which drowsiness sets in), the eyes open cheerfully.

9. During attacks of despondency, the temptations of the flesh are revealed; and nothing brings as many crowns to the attentive monk as despondency.

10. He who weeps over himself knows no despondency.

11. A monk who loves money does not know despondency: he constantly recalls the words of the Apostle: "Let the idle not eat" (2 Thess. 3:10), and another: "These hands have ministered to me and to those with me" (Acts 20:34).

12. Despondency sometimes arises from indulging in sensual pleasures, and sometimes from a lack of reverence before God.

13. Diligent prayer is the antidote to despondency; the remembrance of the Last Judgment, however, gives rise to zeal (to act according to God's will).

14. Good hope is the sword with which the monk conquers and slays despondency.

15. (Confession of Despondency). Tell us, you negligent and lax passion: who is the one who gave birth to you in evil? What are your offspring? Who are those who wage war against you? And who is your murderer? – (Answer). – I have many mothers: sometimes the insensitivity of the soul, sometimes forgetfulness of heavenly blessings, and sometimes excessive labor. My offspring, who dwell with me, are changes of residence, disregard for the commandments of the spiritual father, forgetfulness of the Last Judgment, and sometimes the abandonment of the monastic vow. My adversaries, who bind me, are psalm-singing and needlework. My enemy is the thought of death; yet prayer, with firm hope of attaining eternal blessings, puts me to death.

7. The Struggle Against Vanity

1. Vanity is the squandering of labor, the loss of sweat, the thief of the soul's treasure, an ant on the threshing floor of life, which, though small, is always ready to steal the fruits of our labor and the rewards of our deeds.

2. Vanity clings to everything: I boast when I fast, but when I break my fast to hide my self-denial from others, I boast again, considering myself wise; I am overcome by vanity when I dress in fine clothes; but even when I dress in shabby clothes, I still boast; if I speak, I am overcome by vanity; if I remain silent, I am again overcome by it. No matter how you throw this trident, its tip will always point upward.

3. A vain person is an idolater. He thinks he is honoring God, but in reality he is pleasing people, not God.

4. Anyone who loves to show off is vain. The fasting of the vain goes unrewarded, and their prayer is fruitless; for they do both to seek human praise.

5. A vain ascetic does himself a double wrong, for he exhausts his body but receives no reward.

6. The Lord often hides from our eyes the virtues we have acquired; but a person who praises us—or rather, flatters us—opens our eyes with praise, and as soon as they are opened, the wealth of virtue vanishes (it is, as it were, devoured from our sight).

7. The flatterer is a servant of demons, the leader of pride, the destroyer of compassion, the ruiner of virtues, and the one who leads one astray from the true path. “Those who bless you flatter you, and they make your feet stumble,” says the Prophet (Isaiah 3:12).

8. I have seen weeping people who, upon being praised, flared up in anger at the praise and, as often happens in business, exchanged one passion for another.

9. When a neighbor—or even a friend—reproaches you, whether in your absence or in your presence, show love by praising him.

10. It is a great thing to reject human praise from the heart, but it is greater still to turn away demonic praise.

11. It is not the one who disparages himself who shows humility (for who can endure insults from himself?), but the one who, when rebuked by another person, does not diminish his love for that person.

12. When the demon of vanity sees that an ascetic has attained, even if only a little, peace of heart, he immediately urges him to go out into the world, saying, “Go and save the perishing souls.”

13. Vanity prompts the frivolous, in the presence of others, to put on a mask of humility and to display piety in their actions, facial expressions, and tone of voice; at the table, it compels them to abstain conspicuously; during psalm singing, it makes the lazy zealous and the tone-deaf melodious.

14. Vanity makes the favored proud and sows resentment in the despised.

15. Vanity clings very easily to natural gifts, and through them often brings ruin upon its unfortunate slaves.

16. Once I saw how the demon of vanity drove out his brother, the demon of wrath. One brother became angry with another; but when laypeople arrived, he suddenly calmed down, having sold himself to vanity; for he could not serve both of these masters at once.

17. Whoever has become a slave to vanity leads a double life: one outwardly, and another in his thoughts and feelings; one in private, and another in public.

18. One who has tasted heavenly glory naturally despises all earthly glory; and I would be surprised if anyone, having not tasted the former, were to completely despise the latter.

19. I have seen some who began their spiritual pursuits out of vanity; but later, having changed their intention in their endeavors, they crowned a reprehensible beginning with a praiseworthy end.

20. Whoever boasts of natural gifts—such as wit, quick understanding, skill in reading and speaking, a sharp mind, and other similar abilities that come to us without effort—will never attain anything higher than natural blessings; for “whoever is unfaithful in a little will also be unfaithful in much” because of his pride (Luke 16:10).

21. Whoever asks God for gifts in return for his labors stands on a precarious foundation; but whoever, on the contrary, regards himself as a perpetual debtor before God will suddenly find himself enriched with heavenly riches beyond his expectations.

22. Do not listen to this instigator when he teaches you to proclaim your virtues for the benefit of those who hear you; “for what does it profit a man if he gains the whole world but forfeits his soul?” (Matthew 16:26). Nothing benefits one’s neighbors as much as a humble and sincere disposition, and words that reflect it. In this way, we will also encourage others not to become arrogant; and what could be more beneficial than this?

23. Praise exalts and inflates the soul; but when the soul is exalted, pride takes hold of it, lifting it up to the heavens and casting it down into the abyss.

24. Wicked vanity teaches us to assume the appearance of a virtue we do not possess, leading us to be deceived by the Savior’s words: “Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good deeds” (Matt. 5:16).

25. Do not hide your shame with the thought of not giving your neighbor cause for stumbling; though it may not always be useful to apply this remedy, but rather depends on the specific nature of the sins.

26. When our admirers—or, rather, flatterers—begin to praise us, let us hasten to recall our many sins (and God’s judgment, which is not like that of man)—and we will see that we are unworthy of what they say or do in our honor.

27. Those who are simple at heart are not very susceptible to being poisoned by this venom; for vanity is the ruin of simplicity and a life of pretense.

28. It often happens that a worm, having reached maturity, grows wings and soars to great heights; so too does vanity, having grown stronger, give birth to pride, the ruler and consummator of all evils.

29. The beginning of the eradication of vanity lies in guarding one's lips and embracing dishonor; the middle lies in cutting off all mental attachments to vanity; and the end (if there is an end to the abyss) lies in doing, without embarrassment in the presence of others, that which serves to bring dishonor.

30. Conceal your nobility, and do not boast of your high birth, lest you be one way in word and another in deed.

31. I saw an inexperienced disciple who, in the presence of certain people, boasted of his teacher's virtues; and, thinking to claim glory for himself from another's harvest, he instead earned disgrace when everyone said to him, "How is it that a good tree has produced a barren branch?"

32. Vanity loves to make a grand appearance on the throne of loquacity; but silence of the lips puts an end to vanity.

33. Those who succumb to the demon of vanity are subject to sudden surges of lust when, having temporarily freed themselves from lewd thoughts, they begin to think highly of themselves. The lustful impulses that arise as a result lead them to recognize the vanity lurking in the depths of their hearts, and teach them not to attribute the purity of heart that sometimes occurs to their own diligence and effort, following the Apostle's instruction: "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7)—whether directly from God or through the help of others and their prayers.

34. Silence and stillness are the enemies of vanity; but if you live in a community, endure the insults.

35. If extreme vanity is when a person, seeing no one around to praise him, acts vainly in private, then the sign of perfect humility is not to be overcome by vain thoughts even in the presence of others.

8. The Struggle Against Pride

1. Pride is the rejection of God, contempt for people, the mother of condemnation, the spawn of praise, the repelling of God's help, the cause of downfall, the source of anger, the bitter tormentor of others' deeds, the inhuman judge, the adversary of God, and the root of blasphemy.

2. The beginning of pride is the taking root of vanity; its "middle" is the belittling of one's neighbor, the shameless boasting about one's own deeds, self-praise in the heart, and hatred of rebuke; and its "end" is the rejection of God's help, arrogant reliance on one's own efforts, and a demonic disposition.

3. I have seen people who thanked God with their lips while boasting in their thoughts. A clear example of this is the Pharisee, when he said, "God, I thank You" (Luke 18:11).

4. Where the Fall occurred, pride had already taken root, for pride is the harbinger of the Fall.

5. A self-righteous monk will strongly contradict; but a humble monk will not only refrain from contradicting, but will not even dare to raise his eyes.

6. A cypress tree does not bow down or lie prostrate on the ground; likewise, a haughty monk cannot possess humble obedience.

7. If "God opposes the proud" (James 4:6), then who can have mercy on them?—And if "everyone who is haughty is an abomination to the Lord" (Proverbs 16:5), then who can purify him?

8. He who rejects rebuke reveals the passion of pride; but he who accepts it has freed himself from the bonds of pride.

9. A wise elder once admonished a proud brother; but the latter, blinded in spirit, said, "Forgive me, Father, I am not proud at all." Then the wise elder replied, "How, my son, can you more clearly prove that you are proud than by asserting that there is no pride in you?"

10. For people of a proud disposition, it is most beneficial to be obedient, to lead the most humble and despised life, and to read accounts of the ruinous consequences of pride and the supernatural cures for it.

11. It is shameful to boast of others' adornments, and it is the height of folly to take pride in God's gifts. Boast only of those virtues you possessed before your birth; as for those you have acquired since your birth, God has granted them to you, just as He granted you life itself. — If you have cultivated any virtues without the aid of your mind, then let them alone be yours, for even the mind itself was given to you by God. — And if you have performed any feats without your body, then they alone were the result of your own effort; for even the body is not yours—it is God's creation.

12. Do not rely on your virtues until you hear the Judge's final verdict concerning you; for in the Gospel we see that even one who was already reclining at the wedding feast was bound hand and foot and cast into outer darkness (Matt. 22:13).

13. Let us not cease to examine ourselves and compare our lives with those of the Holy Fathers and luminaries who came before us; and we will find that we have not yet taken a single step to follow in the footsteps of these great men—we have not even fulfilled our vow as we ought, but still remain in the worldly order.

14. A monk is an abyss of humility into which he has cast himself and in which he has drowned every evil spirit.

15. From pride comes the forgetting of sins; but the remembrance of them is the intercessor of humility.

16. Pride is the poverty of the soul, which imagines itself to be rich and, while in darkness, thinks it possesses light.

17. The proud are like an apple, rotten on the inside but shining with beauty on the outside.

18. The proud have no need of the devil, the tempter; they have made themselves their own devil and adversary.

19. Blasphemous words are born in proud hearts, while heavenly visions are born in humble souls.

20. I do not know how it happens that so many of the proud, unaware of themselves, think they have attained dispassion, and only upon leaving this world do they perceive their wretchedness.

21. Whoever is captive to pride desperately needs God's extraordinary help for deliverance; for human means of salvation are futile.

22. Blasphemous thoughts arise from pride, and pride prevents one from confiding them to a spiritual father. That is why it often happens that this affliction plunges some into despair, destroying all their hope, like a worm gnawing away at a tree.

23. There are no thoughts that are (because of pride) as difficult to confess as blasphemous thoughts; therefore, they often remain in many people until old age. But in the meantime, nothing strengthens the demons and evil thoughts against us as much as the fact that we do not confess them but hide them in our hearts—which nourishes them.

24. No one should think that he is guilty of blasphemous thoughts; for the Lord is the knower of hearts and knows that such words and thoughts are not ours, but those of our enemies.

25. Let us learn to despise the spirit of blasphemy, and, paying no attention whatsoever to the thoughts it instills, say to it: "Get behind me, Satan; I worship the Lord my God, and I will serve Him alone; but may your 'sickness' and your words 'return upon your own head,' and may your blasphemy fall upon your 'head,' in this age and in the age to come (Ps. 7:17).

26. Whoever despises this enemy is freed from his torment; but whoever intends to fight him in any other way will be overcome by him. He who seeks to conquer spirits with words is like one who tries to shut out the winds.

27. When holy humility begins to flourish within us, then we will begin to despise all human praise and glory. And when it matures, we will not only regard our good deeds as nothing, but we will even count them as an abomination, thinking that we daily add to the burden of our sins by squandering our virtues in ways unknown to us.

28. Diligent repentance and tears, purified of all defilement, build a temple of humility in the heart and tear down the shack of pride built on sand.

29. The signs of the disappearance of pride and the establishment of humility are: joyfully bearing insults and humiliations, the quenching of anger, and disbelief in one's own virtues.

30. The end of all passions is vanity and pride for anyone who does not pay attention to himself. But their destroyer—humility—keeps its possessor unharmed from every deadly poison (of the passions).

31. A humble monk does not pry into things beyond comprehension; but the proud one seeks to probe even the depths of the Lord's decrees.

32. Demons approached one of the most discerning brothers and flattered him. But this humble and wise man said to them: "If you were to cease praising me in my heart, I would conclude from your departure that I am great; but if you do not cease to praise me, I see my impurity in your praise; for 'every proud heart is an abomination to the Lord' (Prov. 16:5). "Therefore, either depart, so that I may consider myself a great man; or praise me—and I will gain great humility through you.” They were so struck by this double-edged sword of reasoning that they vanished at once.

33. It is one thing to be arrogant, another not to be arrogant, and yet another to be humble. One person judges all day long; another judges nothing, yet does not condemn himself either; and a third, though blameless, always condemns himself.

34. When a horse runs alone, it seems to itself that it is running fast; but when it runs with others, it realizes how slow it is. (Compare yourself to the best, and you will avoid conceit.)

35. Impure demons secretly planted praise in the heart of a certain attentive ascetic. But he, guided by divine inspiration, was able to overcome the spirits’ cunning with such a pious stratagem: he wrote on the wall of his cell the names of the highest virtues—that is, perfect love, angelic humility, pure prayer, incorruptible purity, and others like them. When his thoughts then began to praise him, he would say to them, “Let us go to the judgment”—and, approaching the wall, he would read the written names—and add: “Even if you acquire all these virtues, know that you are still far from God.”

36. If you wish to acquire an unwavering love for prayer, first train your heart not to look for the sins of others; but the precursor to this must be a hatred of vanity.

37. If we wish to understand ourselves, let us not cease to examine and discipline ourselves; and if, with a sincere heart, we hold that every neighbor of ours is superior to us, then God’s mercy is not far from us.

38. Many call themselves sinners, and perhaps they truly think of themselves that way; but the heart is tempted by humiliation (at the hands of others).

39. Whoever says that he feels the fragrance of humility—even when receiving praise, though his heart is scarcely moved—let him not be deceived, for he is deluded.

40. “Not to us, O Lord, not to us, but to Your name give glory,” said someone in the depths of his soul (Ps. 113: 9); for he knew that human nature, being so weak, cannot accept praise without harm. “My praise is from You in the great church” (Ps. 21:26)—in the age to come; but before that, I cannot accept it safely.

41. It is the natural property of the lemon tree that, when barren, it stretches its branches upward; but when they are bent downward, they are more likely to bear fruit. —He who has acquired knowledge understands this.

42. If the pride of some of the angels turned them into demons, then without a doubt humility can turn demons into angels. Therefore, let the fallen take courage, trusting in God.

43. Nothing humbles the soul as much as living in poverty and subsisting on alms.

44. Whoever stubbornly insists on defending his own opinion in conversation, even if it is just, let him know that he is possessed by a devilish affliction (pride); and if he acts this way in conversation with his equals, perhaps the rebuke of his elders will heal him; but if he behaves this way toward those greater and wiser than himself, then people cannot cure this illness.

45. Once I asked one of the most accomplished elders how obedience is connected to humility. He replied: A prudent novice, even if he were to raise the dead and receive the gift of tears, and attain deliverance from strife, always believes that this is accomplished through the prayer of his spiritual father—and remains alien and distant from vain boasting; and indeed, how could he boast of something that, as he himself acknowledges, he accomplished through the help of another and not by his own efforts?

46. While living in the community, be mindful of yourself, and by no means strive to appear more righteous than the other brothers in any way; otherwise, you will commit two evils: you will wound the brothers with your false and feigned zeal, and you will give yourself cause for pride.

47. Be zealous, but in your heart, without expressing it in any way outwardly—neither by your appearance, nor by any word, nor by any subtle sign; in everything, be like your brothers, so that you may avoid pride.

48. False compassion gives rise to pride, while true compassion brings comfort.

49. Whoever takes pride in his own tears and condemns in his mind those who do not weep is like one who has asked the king for weapons against his enemy and then uses them to kill himself.

50. If anyone notices that he is easily overcome by pride and irascibility, cunning and hypocrisy—and wishes to wield against these enemies the double-edged sword of meekness and goodwill—let him hasten to enter, as it were, the launderette of salvation, the assembly of the brethren, —and, moreover, the most severe ones, when he wishes to rid himself completely of his vicious habits; so that there, shaken by the rebukes, humiliations, and disturbances of the brothers, and struck by them mentally, and sometimes even physically oppressed, trampled upon, and kicked, he may cleanse the robe of his soul—from the filth that dwells within it.

51. I have seen that pride can be the cause of humility. For the fruit of arrogance is a fall into sin; and this fall into sin is often, for those who desire salvation, a cause for humility.

52. A proud soul is a slave to fear; trusting in itself, it fears the faintest sound of creatures and even shadows.

53. The immoral can be corrected by people, the deceitful by angels, but the proud are healed by God Himself.

54. Visible pride is healed by sorrowful circumstances; invisible pride—by the Invisible One before all ages.

55. Watch over pride unceasingly with the eye of the soul; for among all deceptions, there is nothing more destructive than this passion.

56. If the sign of ruin—that is, pride—is when one exalts oneself even over small and insignificant matters, then the saving sign of humility is to maintain a humble mindset even in great undertakings and reforms.

57. Once I caught this mad seductress in my heart, carried there on the shoulders of her mother—vanity. Binding them both with the bonds of obedience and striking them with the whip of humility, I compelled them to tell me how they had entered my soul. Finally, under the blows, they said: “We have neither beginning nor birth, for we ourselves are the rulers and mothers of all passions. One of our enemies—the contrition of the heart born of obedience—harbors no small enmity toward us. But to be subject to anyone—this we cannot endure; that is why, even though we were rulers in heaven, we withdrew from there. In short: we are the mothers of everything opposed to humility; and whatever aids humility opposes us. However, if we appeared in such power even in heaven, where will you flee from our presence? We very often follow those who endure insults, who practice obedience and patience, who do not hold grudges, and who serve their neighbors. Our offspring are the downfall of spiritual men: anger, slander, resentment, irritability, shouting, blasphemy, hypocrisy, hatred, envy, backbiting, self-will, and disobedience. There is one thing we have no strength to resist—being severely beaten by you, we will say this to you as well: “If you sincerely reproach yourself before the Lord, you will despise us as a spider’s web.” “You see,” said pride, “that the horse I ride is vanity; but holy humility and self-reproach will laugh at the horse and its rider, and will sweetly sing that song of victory: ‘Let us sing to the Lord, for He is gloriously exalted; He has cast the horse and its rider into the sea’ (Ex. 15: 1), that is, into the abyss of humility.”

5. On Detachment

1. The stars are the splendor of the firmament, and the adornment of dispassion is virtue.

2. One is called and is impassive who has made his flesh impervious to passions, has elevated his mind above every creature, has subjugated all his senses to his mind, and has presented his soul to the face of the Lord, always reaching out to Him, even beyond his own strength.

3. Some also say that dispassion is the resurrection of the soul before the resurrection of the body, while others say that it is the perfect knowledge of God (union with God)—second only to the angels.

4. This perfect and never-ending perfection of those who are perfect in the Lord—as someone who has tasted it told me—finally sanctifies the mind and detaches it from all material things, so that, upon reaching this heavenly refuge, it spends most of its life in the flesh in an ecstatic vision of heaven.

5. There is the dispassionate, and there is the most dispassionate of the dispassionate. For one hates evil intensely, while the other insatiably enriches himself with virtues.

6. Purity (chastity) is also called dispassion. And rightly so; for it is a foretaste of the general resurrection and the incorruptibility of the perishable.

7. If the sign of complete enslavement to the passions is that a person quickly obeys almost all the thoughts secretly instilled by demons, then I consider it a sign of holy dispassion when someone can truthfully say with David: “I have not known the wicked who turns away from Me” (Ps. 100: 4), and do not know how he came, why he came, or how he departed; I have become insensitive to all that, being wholly united with God, and hoping always to remain in such a state.

8. Whoever has been deemed worthy to be in this state, even while still here, clothed in mortal flesh, becomes a temple of the living God, Who guides him and instructs him in all his words, deeds, and thoughts; and he, by virtue of inner enlightenment, discerns the will of the Lord as if hearing a certain voice, and, being above all human teaching, says: “When shall I come and appear before the face of God?” (Ps. 41:3)? For I can no longer endure the pangs of heavenly longing, but I seek that immortal beauty which You bestowed upon me before I fell into corruption.

9. The dispassionate one—what more is there to say?—“no longer lives for himself, but Christ lives in him” (Gal. 2:20), as he who “fought the good fight, finished the race, and kept the faith” (2 Tim. 4:7) said.

10. Just as a royal crown is not made from a single stone, so too dispassion cannot be achieved if we neglect even a single virtue.

11. Humility is born of obedience, and from humility comes dispassion, which is the culmination of humility. The beginning of humility is obedience; and dispassion, which is the daughter of humility, perfects her mother.

12. Some exhaust their bodies in pursuit of dispassion and the abundance of gifts, miracles, and the power of discernment; but these poor souls do not know that it is not toil, but above all humility, that is the mother of these blessings.

13. Whoever has united himself in marriage with the virtue of humility is meek, gentle, easily persuaded, merciful, and above all, peaceful, joyful, submissive, carefree, alert, diligent—and, need I say more? — dispassionate, for “in our humility the Lord has remembered us, and has delivered us from our enemies” (Ps. 135: 23–24)—from our passions and defilements.

14. Many have quickly received forgiveness of sins—but no one has quickly attained dispassion; for to attain it requires a long time, much labor of love, and God’s help.

The Holy Venerable Fathers Barsanuphius and John

A Brief Account of Them

Excerpted from The Lives of the Saints compiled by Nicodemus the Hagiorite: St. Barsanuphius was originally from Egypt. From a young age, he was filled with a burning desire to lead a life of asceticism. Once, passing by a horse racing track, he entered it and, seeing how everyone there was trying to outrun one another, said to himself: “Do you see how earnestly those seeking perishable crowns strive? ‘Shouldn’t we—the heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven—strive all the more?’” And he left that spectacle, even more fervent in spirit for asceticism than before. Whether he was in any monastery in Egypt is unknown. Tradition indicates that he was a monk directly in Palestine. Having come to Jerusalem to venerate the holy sites, he remained there and at first lived under the guidance of the elder Marcellus, and later moved to the monastery of Abba Serid near Gaza. There, striving for the highest asceticism, he set up a small cell for himself outside the monastery and, shutting himself away in it, enjoyed the sweetest silence. At the beginning of this period of silence, they brought him only three loaves of bread a week from the monastery. But as he gave himself over to weeping and drew great sweetness from his tears, he was often content with just one loaf because of the sensation of this ineffable sweetness, and on many occasions he even forgot to eat it. Thus, he ate sometimes twice a week, sometimes once; for he was frequently drawn to spiritual food, the sweetness of which made him forget about physical food. Over time, washing himself with constant tears, the blessed one so purified his heart of spiritual and bodily passions that he rose above the enemy’s arrows, attained peace of mind—which is the receptacle of the gifts of the Holy Spirit— —and he also attained that in him every passionate impulse and speculation had fallen asleep, or, rather, died, which is why he called his cell a tomb. From the very moment he purified his heart of passions and was deemed worthy to be a temple and dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, as a result of such purity, he was enriched with exalted, true, and perfect humility, by which he considered himself to be dust and ashes—in deed, not merely in word—and always said to himself: “Who am I? And who considers me to be anything at all?” Through such humility, he was deemed worthy of the greatest of all virtues—discernment, which is given by God to the monk as a steward. Through discernment, the great Barsanuphius was granted the gift of insight, by which, according to the explanation of St. Peter of Damascus, the mental and hidden essences of sensible and intelligible beings are comprehended. Through this insight, he was deemed worthy to receive the gift of clairvoyance and prophecy—to see what is happening far away as if it were close at hand, and the future as if it were the present (Resp. 31. 812). By God’s grace, he also discerned the inner dispositions of people and answered those who questioned him, not according to their words, but in accordance with the direction of their minds and thoughts. And by constantly, in accordance with the words of the divine David, aspiring in his heart toward God, and adding humility to humility, silence to silence, and love to love, he was finally deemed worthy to attain the highest gift—ecstasy in God, in which he was lifted up to the seventh heaven, not on the dreamy wings of thought, but in the ineffable power of the Spirit; and there he received a blessing and beheld the ineffable blessings and mysteries of the kingdom of God, not knowing whether he was in the body or out of the body, just as the great Paul did (2 Cor. 12:3). And he was then granted the abundant gift of miracle-working, so that he could raise the dead in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, cast out demons, heal incurable diseases, perform other mighty deeds and miracles, and, like Elijah, close and open the heavens. Barsanuphius, great among the Fathers, was deemed worthy to receive such great gifts and to attain such great perfection in virtue. However, he acquired these great gifts amid such trials that many not only cannot endure them in reality but cannot even conceive of them by hearsay. Likewise, this most blessed one was subjected to severe illnesses, but he endured them with such fortitude that, even when ill, he not only never reclined on a bed for his own comfort but did not even cease his manual labor. This saint lived in the 6th century, during the reign of Emperor Justinian, and for a full fifty years or more, no one ever saw him. Only once did he appear to several brothers and wash their feet, to dispel doubts about his existence. And toward the end of his life, he parted with the silence so dear to him for the good of the Church, when Justinian began to persecute the Affortodocets—whom he had previously protected—who did not accept his teachings. The Patriarch of Jerusalem, in this time of need, persuaded this great Abba to go to the Emperor with a plea to turn his wrath into mercy. The mission was successful. Convinced by the power of Abba’s words, the Emperor halted the planned persecution of those who, as he saw it, were disobedient to him personally, and restored his favor to the Church of Jerusalem, sending her gifts through Barsanuphius. The great Abba passed away in 563. Others, without specifying the year, generally say: before the year 600. Another elder, the Venerable John, led a life of silence just like Barsanuphius and was granted the same gifts of the Spirit as he, especially and above all the gifts of clairvoyance and prophecy, which is why he was called a prophet. It is unknown where St. John was from or how he came to this monastery. He lived in the first cell of the great Barsanuphius, after the latter had arranged another cell for himself near the same monastery—and he lived in silence there for 18 years until his very death. No one ever saw him smile, or be embarrassed, or receive the Divine Mysteries without tears, as the abbot of that monastery testified about him. By the grace of Providence, the Venerable John, having foretold many other things that came to pass exactly as he had predicted, also foretold his own death, saying this: “I will die in the cells of Abba Serid. If Abba Serid had lived longer, and I had lived another five years, but since God hid this from me and took him away, then I, too, will not live any longer.” But since Abba Elia, who was still young at the time, having been tonsured and appointed abbot of the monastery, did not know the monastic rules or how to govern the brethren, he implored the blessed John: “Grant me just two weeks so that I may ask you about the monastery and its administration,” the elder, taking pity on him and moved by the Holy Spirit dwelling within him, said: “Very well, I will stay with you for two more weeks.” And Abba Elia asked him about everything concerning the administration of the monastic community. At the end of the two weeks, the venerable one summoned the entire monastic community and, greeting each one individually, sent them back to their cells; and then, in peace, he gave up his spirit into the hands of God. After the death of the Venerable John, St. Barsanuphius fell completely silent and no longer gave answers to anyone, as Abba Dorotheus states in the title of his second discourse; after Barsanuphius fell silent, Abba Dorotheus left that monastery and established his own separate community.

These blessed fathers, who loved their neighbors with all their hearts, not only bestowed spiritual blessings upon them during their lifetimes, but continue to do so even after their deaths, leaving us this soul-saving book of their godly answers as a paternal legacy to their children, so that, by diligently reading it, we may derive great spiritual benefit from it. This book contains 850 answers to various questions posed by different people: bishops, priests, monks, laypeople, elders, the young, the infirm, and the healthy. Some of these answers were written by the so-called “other Elder John,” while others—and indeed the majority of them—were given by the great Elder Barsanuphius himself, who did not write them himself but dictated them through Abba Serid. The following circumstance is particularly noteworthy. When the great Barsanuphius began to give his answers, he summoned Abba Serid, recounted his answer to him, and instructed him to write it down (the answer was addressed to John, a monk of the Mirosav Monastery). Abba Serid, not expecting to be able to retain in his mind all the words the Saint had spoken to him, wondered how he would write down such a multitude of words, and assumed that the Elder would instruct him to bring ink and paper so that, as he listened, he could write everything down, word for word. St. Barsanuphius, by the grace of discernment granted to him, perceived Serid's secret thought; his face shone like fire, and he said to Serid: "Go, write, and do not be afraid; even if I were to tell you to write countless words, know that the Holy Spirit will not allow you to write a single word more or less than what is said, even if you yourself were to wish it, but will guide your hand to write everything faithfully, in the proper order." Such is this book! Abounding in wondrous reasoning, it resolves the most intractable questions—it is a teacher of patience, an eradicator of grumbling, a sword that cuts off one's own will, an axe that strikes down the desire to please others, a guide to true and perfect humility, teaching us to consider ourselves as nothing, a herald of repentance, a mother of tears, and an intercessor for the salvation of souls and perfection in Christ the Lord.

Instructions for Ascetics

(Select consecutively all passages relating to spiritual struggles and the battle against the passions)

1. Set your mind to give thanks to God for everything, heeding the words of the Apostle: "Give thanks in all circumstances" (1 Thess. 5:18). Whether you are in sorrow, in need, in affliction, or in sickness and bodily toil—give thanks to God for everything that befalls you, for "we must through many tribulations enter the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22). Therefore, do not waver in your soul, and do not grow lax in your heart in any way; but remember the words of the Apostle: "Though our outer self is wasting away, our inner self is being renewed day by day" (2 Cor. 4:16). Unless you endure suffering, you cannot ascend the cross and partake of its saving fruits.

2. As long as a ship is at sea, it is subject to dangers and the buffeting of the winds. But when it reaches a calm and peaceful harbor, it no longer fears dangers, disasters, or the buffeting of the winds, but remains safe. So too, as long as you remain among people, expect sorrows, dangers, and the buffeting of the winds of the mind. But when you reach the haven of stillness prepared for you, then you will have no fear.

3. Do not lose heart in the sorrows and physical labors you endure while working for the common good; for this, too, means "to lay down one's life for the brethren" (1 John 3:16)—and I hope that the reward for this labor will be great. Just as the Lord appointed Joseph to provide for his brothers during the famine (Ps. 32: 19) in Egypt, so He has appointed you to serve the community. I, for my part, repeat to you the words of the Apostle: "You, therefore, my child, be strengthened by the grace of the Holy Spirit" (2 Tim. 2: 1).

4. One attains God's peace through works pleasing to God, while another attains it through humility. You, however, maintain a disposition that will enable you to attain it through both, when anger dies within you as a result of the taming of irritability in your heart; and then the word of Scripture will be fulfilled in you: "Behold my humility and my toil, and forgive all my sins" (Ps. 24: 18). May the Lord preserve your soul, your body, and your spirit from all evil, from every opposition wrought by the devil, and from every fantasy that stirs up rebellion in your thoughts.

5. Above all, guard yourself against the spirit of despondency, which gives rise to all evil and various temptations. Why does your heart grow weak and weary because of the sorrow inflicted upon you by Christ's sheep? Listen carefully to what I am about to tell you: long-suffering is the mother of all good things. Look at Moses, who chose "to suffer with the people of God rather than to enjoy the fleeting pleasures of sin" (Heb. 11:25).

6. Be careful lest the cunning serpents rob you and poison you with their venom (anger). It is deadly. No one will ever do good through evil, because one is overcome by evil oneself. On the contrary, "evil" is overcome by "good" (Rom. 12:21). You stand "in the arena"; that is why you must fight against wild beasts, just as the Apostle did in Ephesus (1 Cor. 15:32), who boasted of having defeated the beasts. You have been cast into a storm at sea; therefore, you must endure many dangers and struggle against the raging waves. Having overcome them with God's help, you will enter the peaceful harbor of Christ Jesus, our Lord.

7. You are troubled by thoughts that compel you to upset others and to be upset by others yourself. But know, my brother, that if anyone offends another—whether by deed or by word—he himself will later be offended a hundredfold more. Be patient in all things, then, and be careful not to mix your own will into anything. Examine your thoughts carefully, lest they infect your heart with deadly poison (anger) and deceive you into mistaking a gnat for a camel and a pebble for a cliff, so that you become like a man who, having a log in his own eye, looks at the speck in another's eye.

8. You call yourself a sinner, yet in reality you show that you do not feel that way. One who acknowledges himself as a sinner and the cause of many evils does not contradict anyone, does not quarrel with anyone, and does not get angry at anyone, but regards everyone as better and wiser than himself. If you are sinful, why do you reproach your neighbor and accuse him, as if sorrow comes to you through him?—It turns out that you and I have not yet reached the point of considering ourselves sinners. — Look, brother, how we have disgraced ourselves: we speak with our lips, but our deeds show otherwise. — Why, when we struggle with our thoughts, do we not receive the strength to reject them? Because we first rush to judge our neighbor, and through that our spiritual strength weakens, and we accuse our brother while we ourselves are at fault. — Cast every thought upon the Lord, saying, “God knows what is best,” and you will find peace—and little by little you will gain the strength to endure.

9. If anyone cannot endure reproach, he will not see glory; and if he does not purify himself of bitterness, he will not taste sweetness. You have entered among the brethren and various trials in order to be refined and tested: and gold is tested by nothing other than fire. By no means set any rules for yourself, for by doing so you will expose yourself to strife and worry; but with the fear of God, discern what is fitting for the time, and do nothing out of zeal; as much as possible, turn away from anger, condemn no one, and love especially those who tempt you. If you look closely, you will find that it is they who lead us to success.

10. Be patient in afflictions, as one who has attained the Lord's promise, which says: “In the world you will have tribulation, but take heart; I have overcome the world” (John 16: 33); so that you may attain invincible love, which brings those who have acquired it into the royal courts and makes them brothers of Christ.

11. Churn the milk, and you will get butter; but if you squeeze the teat with your hand, blood will come out (Prov. 30:33). If anyone wishes to bend a tree or a vine like a hoop, he bends it gradually, and they do not snap; but if he bends it suddenly and forcefully, the tree breaks at once. (This refers to the strict measures of abbots—and to the excessive ascetic practices of monks.)

12. Are you weary from afflictions, like a person of the flesh? Or have you not heard that afflictions await you? And do you not know that “many are the afflictions of the righteous” (Ps. 33: 20)—and they are tested by them, as gold is in the crucible? Therefore, if we are righteous, let us submit ourselves willingly to the trial of sorrows; but if we are sinful, let us endure them as we deserve. — Let us recall all the saints, from the beginning of the world, — and remember how much they endured while doing good, speaking good, and remaining unshakable in the truth. They were hated and reviled by people until the very end of their lives—and, according to the Savior's words, “prayed for their enemies and those who persecuted them” (Matt. 5:44). Have you, too, been sold into slavery, like the chaste Joseph? Have you, like Moses, endured hostility from childhood to old age? Have you been persecuted, like David, who suffered persecution at the hands of Saul? Or, like Jonah, were you cast into the sea? Why, then, does your mind grow weak? Do not be afraid or tremble, as one lacking courage, lest you lose God's promises. Do not be terrified, as an unbeliever, but encourage your faint-hearted thoughts. Love afflictions in all things, so that you may be a skilled son of the saints.

13. No one who wishes to reach the city lies idle; no one who wishes to work and sees the rising sun gives in to laziness; no one who wishes to fertilize his field neglects it. But the one who wishes to reach the city hurries to get there before dusk falls—(the one who wishes to finish his work), seeing the rising sun, hurries cheerfully to his labor, fearing to be delayed by anything—and the one who wishes to fertilize his field strives to do so before it becomes completely unproductive. — “He who has ears to hear, let him hear!”

14. Do you wish to be free from sorrows and not be weighed down by them?—Look forward to greater ones, and you will find peace. Remember Job and the other saints, and the sorrows they endured; acquire their patience, and your spirit will be comforted. Be courageous, take heart, and pray.

15. Weep, sob; do not seek to be regarded as anything special, and do not compare yourself to others in anything. Leave the world behind, take up your cross, cast off earthly things, shake the dust from your feet, “do not be concerned about disgrace” (Heb. 12:2), do not stoke the furnace with the Chaldeans, lest you be burned along with them by God's wrath. Consider every person superior to yourself—weep for your dead—cut down your own log—restore your fallen house—cry out: “Have mercy on me, Son of David... that I may see” (Luke 18:38, 41).

16. While we still have time, let us pay attention to ourselves and learn silence. And if you wish to be at peace with everything, be dead to every person, and you will find peace. I say this concerning thoughts, concerning all deeds, dealings with people, and cares.

17. You wrote: “Pray for my sins.” And I will say the same to you: “Pray for my sins.” For it is written: “Do to others as you would have them do to you” (Luke 6:31). Although I am wretched and the least of all people, I still do this to the best of my ability, in accordance with the commandment: “Pray for one another, that you may be healed” (James 5:16).

18. If you cannot reason about the faith, then do not reason. One who is firm in the faith, if he speaks and debates with heretics or unbelievers, will never be confounded; for he has Jesus within himself, the Prince of peace and tranquility. And such a one, after a peaceful debate, can lovingly lead many heretics and unbelievers to the knowledge of our Savior Jesus Christ. As for you, since discussing other subjects is beyond your capacity, hold fast to the royal path—that is, the faith of the Holy Fathers (and for us today, the faith confirmed by the seven Ecumenical Councils)—into which you were baptized: it contains everything with precision for those who fully understand. Take special care of yourself, reflecting on your sins and on how God will meet you.

19. When you hear praise directed at yourself, recall the words of Scripture: “My people, those who call you blessed are flattering you and are leading you astray” (Isa. 3:12). Such flattery prevents us from seeing the vileness of our deeds: it seems to harm even those who have attained a measure of spiritual progress and leads away from faith in God, Who says: “How can you believe, when you receive glory from one another?” (John 5:44). Whoever embraces the humility of the Apostle will rather choose “to be foolish, that he may become wise” in the end (1 Cor. 3:18). But whoever presents himself as wise, rather than spiritual, I wonder if he will escape the condemnation reserved for pride.

20. (On the question of fear at night). Citizens fear an enemy invasion as long as they have no help from the king. But when they receive word that a military commander has entered their city, they are no longer anxious, knowing that their leaders are looking out for them. Even if they hear of the enemy’s approach, having a defender, they no longer fear. So too, if we believe in God, we do not fear demons; for God sends us His help.

21. The hours and hymns are part of church tradition and have been well established to bring all people into harmony (in prayer), as well as to foster harmony among many in communal living. The sketes, however, recite neither the hours nor the hymns, but instead spend time alone engaged in manual labor, reading, and meditation, and after a while they rise to pray. When you stand in prayer, you should pray for deliverance from the old self— —or recite the “Our Father,” or both together, and then sit down to your handiwork. As for how long to continue praying while standing, I will say this: if you “pray without ceasing” according to the words of the Apostle (1 Thess. 5:17), then duration is not necessary.

22. As for nighttime sleep, pray for two hours in the evening, counting from sunset; and after finishing the Doxology, sleep for six hours, then rise for vigil and stay awake for the remaining four hours. Do the same in the summer—but shorten the Doxology and read fewer psalms, in keeping with the shorter nights.

23. The Lord taught us how to attain humility, saying, “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matt. 11:29). If you, too, wish to attain perfect peace, recognize what the Lord endured, and endure it yourself, and set aside your own will in all things. The Savior Himself said: “I have come down from heaven, not to do My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me” (John 6:38). Perfect humility consists in enduring reproaches, insults, and all else that our Teacher, Christ Jesus, suffered. This also serves as a sign that a person has attained perfect prayer—namely, that he is no longer troubled, even if the whole world were to insult him.

24. The gateway to perfect prayer is when one is freed from the distraction of thoughts and sees that his mind, enlightened by the Lord, is filled with joy. The one who prays perfectly is the one who mortifies himself to the world and its comforts; and when someone diligently performs his work for God’s sake, this is not distraction, but diligence pleasing to God.

25. Regarding moderation in food and drink, the Fathers say that one should consume both somewhat less than is customary, that is, not to fill the stomach completely. And each person must determine for himself the proper measure, both in cooked food and in wine. However, moderation is not limited to food and drink alone, but extends to conversation, sleep, clothing, and all the senses; in all these things there must be a proper measure of moderation.

26. How should one determine the measure of food and drink so that it is slightly less than the proper amount?—From the total amount of food—that is, bread and other meals—set aside just under one ounce; and as for wine and water, set aside less than half a cup of each. If you are mindful of yourself and find it easy to drink only once, that would be good; but if you cannot, then drink twice, though each time less than the proper amount. And during times of confusion and inner turmoil, you should also slightly reduce your usual amount of food and drink—that is, reduce food by one more ounce and all drink by one more cup—so that, in total, you reduce the amount of food by two ounces and the amount of drink by one cup.

27. How, then, does one determine the proper measure, or how does one know how much one needs to eat and drink?—By observing oneself over the course of several days with regard to all food—that is, bread, other meals, and vegetables—a person can learn from experience how much food and drink his body needs (to be satisfied without feeling burdened). From this measure, let them set aside one ounce of food and half a cup of drink. And during times of war, let them set aside one ounce and half a cup each.

28. What is abstinence “according to one’s strength”? To abstain “according to one’s strength” means to consume food and drink, as stated—namely, to consume them slightly less than is proper—and the same applies to sleep. But if someone, due to labor and fatigue, consumes slightly more than this, it will not be a violation of the rule “according to one’s strength.” — You might ask: What should be the proper measure of sleep? — The Fathers prescribe half the night for this. As for food, stop eating when you still feel like having a little more—and in this way, always consume it in moderation.

29. What does it mean to eat on a whim, and what does it mean to eat out of natural need? — To eat on a whim means to want to eat not out of the body’s need, but to please the stomach (and the throat). If, however, you see that your body prefers a certain food—not because of its sweetness, but because it is light—then eating it is not a whim. Some, by their very nature, crave sweet food, others salty, and still others sour—and this is not a whim. But to love a particular food especially and to desire it lustfully—that is a whim, the handmaiden of gluttony. — If you wish to know whether you are possessed by the passion of gluttony, here is how you will find out: if food controls your thoughts (so that you cannot resist it), then you are a glutton. But if there is no such control, and you freely accept any food in accordance with the body’s needs, then you are not a glutton. There is another sign of gluttony—wanting to eat before mealtime; this should never be done, unless there is a valid reason.

30. If the desire (for gluttony) does not overcome me beforehand but arises just as I am about to eat, what should I do then—should I refuse the food, or not? —When you are eating with others, do not refuse to eat; but, invoking the name of God, drive away the craving and eat sparingly, reminding yourself that this food will soon turn to a foul odor. But when you are alone and hungry, eat bread or some other food that does not cause you distress.

31. Should one consult the elders about every thought that arises in the heart? — One should not consult them about every thought that arises in the heart, but only about those that linger within a person and torment him. This is similar to when a person, even though many people annoy him, ignores the annoyances and pays them no mind. But if someone rises up and attacks him, then he reports that person to the ruler.

32. Should we resist the thought that struggles against us? — Do not resist it; for the enemies of this desire it, and (seeing your resistance) will not cease to attack; but pray to the Lord against them, laying your weakness before Him, and He can not only drive them away but also completely destroy them.

33. Nighttime visions and defilements occur—sometimes from pride, sometimes from gluttony, and sometimes from the devil’s envy. Regarding the latter, it should be noted that when pride and overindulgence on our part do not aid the enemy, he cannot repeat this often. Just as a builder who cannot find the necessary materials labors in vain, so too does the devil.

34. I want to control my appetite and reduce the amount of food I eat, but I cannot. Even if I do reduce it for a time, after a short while I return to my former habits, and the same is true with drinking. Why is this?—No one is free from this except those who have attained moderation, as the one who said: “I have forgotten to eat my bread; because of the sound of my groaning, my bones cling to my flesh” (Ps. 101:5–6). Such a person soon achieves moderation in food and drink; for tears serve as his bread—and eventually he reaches the point where he is nourished by the Holy Spirit. Believe me, brother, I know a man of this caliber; once or twice a week—and often more—he is drawn to spiritual food, and because of its sweetness he forgets physical food; but when the time comes to eat bread, he is as if sated and does not want to eat it, and as he eats, he reproaches himself, saying, “Why am I not always in this state?” And he desires to progress even further.

35. How does one attain such a state?—When all a person’s thoughts form a single whole in God; then this flesh will follow the thoughts directed toward God—and the joy of the Spirit appears in the heart, nourishing the soul and fattening the body, and strengthening both of them. Such a person no longer grows weak or despondent; for from that moment on, Jesus acts as his Advocate and places him near the threshold where “every sickness, sorrow, and sigh shall flee away” (Isa. 51: 11)—and the word of Scripture is fulfilled in him: “For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also” (Matt. 6: 21). It is humility that brings a person to this state.

36. How can one distinguish between natural physical weakness (due to abstinence) and that caused by a demon, and how much food should one eat? – Regarding weakness: if the body, while consuming its daily food (with the usual degree of self-restraint), becomes weak, this is due to demons; otherwise (when the degree of self-restraint is excessive), it is natural weakness. The usual measure of self-restraint is to rise from the table feeling slightly hungry, as the elders have prescribed for beginners. – When a person has become established in this, and in a greater measure of self-restraint, then, having already been trained by habit, he cannot fail to know how much he ought to eat.

37. “Pray for me; I am in great sorrow.”—Those who are completely dying to the world through patience and sorrows reach the measure of maturity. O beloved brother!—The Lord endured the cross—should you not also rejoice in your sorrows, the endurance of which leads into the Kingdom of Heaven? That you are sorrowful is a good sign. Do you not know that sorrows and temptations multiply when the Lord is preparing His grace for someone? And in general, do not seek bodily rest unless the Lord sends it to you, for bodily rest is abhorrent to the Lord. And the Lord said, “In the world you will have tribulation” (John 16:33).

38. What daily food should you set aside for yourself?—If you set aside daily food for yourself in your cell, it will lead you into worry and strife. Be content with whatever God sends. “He who walks uprightly walks in hope” (Proverbs 10:9).

39. When reading the Psalms, should one recite the “Our Father” after each psalm? – It is enough to recite the “Our Father” once.

40. Follow the path that we have walked, following in the footsteps of our Fathers. I do not recall that, having found perfect peace, we ever took advantage of it; but we tried in every way to mix in a little distress and sorrow from all sides, fearing Him who said, “You have gathered your good things in your bosom” (Luke 16:25), and remembering that “we must through many tribulations enter the kingdom of God” (Acts 14:22). This is how we acted even when many possessions came into our hands, and God knows in what poverty we lived, for the sake of Him who became poor for our sake. – It is not good to seek peace of mind in everything. Whoever seeks this lives for himself and not for God; for such a person cannot subdue his own will.

41. The Lord wants you to regard every person as superior to yourself. Obey your spiritual father in everything, and do whatever he tells you, whether it concerns food, drink, or any other matter. If you are slandered, rejoice; this is very beneficial for you. If you are insulted, endure it; “for whoever endures to the end will be saved” (Matt. 10:22). Give thanks to God for everything; for thanksgiving intercedes before God on behalf of our weaknesses. In everything and always, judge yourself as one who sins and is led astray—and God will not judge you; be humble in everything, and you will receive grace.

42. In all circumstances, let us resort to humility; for the humble lie on the ground, and one who lies on the ground—where can he fall? But for one who is on high, it is easy to fall. If we have repented and been set right, it is not of ourselves—it is a gift from God; for “the Lord lifts up the fallen and gives sight to the blind” (Ps. 145:8).

43. Illness is God’s instruction to us, and it serves for our good if we give thanks to God. Was not Job a faithful friend of God? But what did he not endure, while giving thanks and blessing God?—And his endurance finally led him to unparalleled glory. Be patient a little while (in your illness), “and you will see the glory of God” (John 11:40).—And if you cannot fast (while ill), do not grieve; God does not require anyone to labor beyond their strength. Moreover, what is fasting if not a discipline of the body, intended to subdue the healthy body and render it powerless against passions, as the Apostle says: “When I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor. 12:10). Illness is a greater punishment than this, and it counts in place of fasting—and is even valued more highly than fasting. Whoever endures it with patience, giving thanks to God, receives through that patience the fruit of his salvation. Instead of weakening the body's strength through fasting, it is already weakened by illness. Give thanks to God, then, that you have been freed from the labor of fasting. Even if you eat ten times a day, do not be sad; you will not be condemned for it, since you are not doing so to indulge yourself.

44. Out of envy (for the fruits of faith), demons instill unbelief in us; and if we accept it, we become their servants and accomplices.

45. (Daily Practices). You should practice singing psalms a little and pray aloud (praying from memory) a little; you also need time to examine and guard your thoughts. As for psalm singing and reciting prayers by heart, do not bind yourself to a strict schedule, but do as much as the Lord strengthens you; do not neglect reading and silent prayer either. A little of one, a little of the other, and thus you will spend your day pleasing God. Our perfect fathers did not have a set rule, but throughout the entire day they fulfilled their rule: they practiced psalmody for a while, recited prayers by heart for a while, examined their thoughts for a while, and, though only a little, they also took care of their food—and they did all this with the fear of God. For it is said: “Whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God” (1 Cor. 10:31).

46. Let not the enemy disturb you in your sorrow. Does temptation or sorrow ever befall anyone without God's permission? No. God permits these things for the benefit of our souls, but the devil presents things to us differently than he did long ago when he cast our first parents out of Paradise. – But we do not understand this, and, forgetting that God sends us sorrow to purify us from all impurity, we become troubled and despondent. – If you want to be saved, do not trust your own thoughts; for the demons sow evil seeds within you and present one thing in place of another. By no means accuse anyone of anything, but strive in everything to please your neighbor. And do not think evil of anyone; for by doing so you yourself become evil, since the wicked think evil, and the good think good. When the thought comes to you, “They are talking about me,” know that it is the enemy whispering to you. Never harbor such suspicions. Endure everything, rejoicing and being glad; for the reward for patience is great. And do not believe the demons; for what they show you is not real: they only seek to confuse you in some way.

47. (“Another Insult”). I am amazed at your naivety, brother. Do you really think the devil ever stops tempting anyone?—Moreover, can one blame the possessed who fall to the ground and foam at the mouth?—In the same way, one cannot blame those whom the devil drives to oppose and insult us. It is not them who are to blame, but the passion and the one who stirs it up. The enemy confuses you—and you do not look at your own sins, but keenly see the sins of your neighbor; you harp on your brother's transgressions, yet have forgotten your own. —And who are you to look at the sins of others? —Remember Lazarus—how long did he endure, thanks be to God?

48. “I have fallen into lustful dreams (shameful ones).” —God allows us to fall into lustful dreams and other passions so that we may recognize our own weakness and place our trust and hope not in ourselves, but in Him alone. – However, do not think that we fall into fantasies and other passions by God's will; rather, God allows this to happen to us because of our negligence, and out of His love for humanity, He uses the evil (manifested in us) to lead us to humility for our salvation. Know, then, who you are, and humble yourself not only before God but also before people, entrusting all your cares to the One who can do far more than we ask or even imagine.

49. “I am weary from temptations.” – Do not lose heart, brother; God has not forsaken you and will not forsake you. Know that the sentence pronounced by the Lord upon our common father Adam—“by the sweat of your face you shall eat your bread” (Gen. 3:19)—is unalterable. Just as gold, refined in the crucible, becomes pure and fit for a royal crown, so too does a person, refined by sorrows—if he endures them with gratitude—become a son of the kingdom. Believe, then, that everything that happens to you serves your good, so that you too may gain boldness before God.

50. (To the sick person who is despondent.) Meditate on the sufferings of our Savior—as if you, too, were suffering with Him the insults, the wounds, the humiliations, the abuse of being spat upon, the reproach of the scarlet robe, the shame of the crown of thorns, the vinegar mixed with gall, the pain of the nails driven into His hands, the piercing of the spear, the outpouring of water and blood—and draw comfort from this for your own sufferings. The Lord will not let your labor be in vain. He has allowed you to endure a little sickness so that you may not be a stranger to the Saints when you see them at that hour bearing the fruits of their patient suffering and glorified, but may be a partner with them and with Jesus, having boldness before Him together with the Saints. Do not be sad, then; God has not forgotten you, but cares for you as for His sincere son, and not as for an “adulterer.”

51. May that great Brother of ours grant help to us all; I mean our Lord Jesus Christ, who was pleased to make us His brothers (Heb. 2:11). And we have already become such, and the angels bless us. – O, whom do we have as our brother! The Mighty One, to strengthen us;—the Strong One, to share His bounty with us;—the Commander, to strike down our enemies who attack us in battle;—the Healer, to heal our inner self along with our outer self, subjecting the latter to the former; – A Nourisher, to nourish us with spiritual food, – The Living One, to sustain us, – The Merciful One, to have mercy on us, – The Generous One, to show us kindness, – The King, to make us kings as well, – God, to make us gods as well. – Therefore, knowing that everything is found in Him, pray to Him—and He will grant the petition of your heart, provided you do not hinder Him yourself.

52. May the Lord Jesus, who said, “Ask, and you will receive” (John 16:24), fulfill all your petitions. Just prepare your house, cleansing it thoroughly, to receive God’s gifts. They remain preserved only in a cleansed house—and they give off their fragrance only where there is no impurity. Whoever partakes of them becomes alien to the old man, crucified to the world, just as the world is to him, and lives always in the Lord. No matter how fiercely the enemy’s waves crash, they cannot shatter his ship; and from that moment on, he becomes a terror to his enemies—for they see the holy seal upon him—and to the extent that he becomes their enemy, to that extent he becomes a sincere and beloved friend of the Great King.

53. Do not let the anxieties caused by demonic passions and fantasies overwhelm you. Believe that, although demons disturb and tempt us, they will not succeed in doing anything, but will even increase our virtue—if only we diligently watch over ourselves to maintain a little patience. Let us not slacken in our efforts, lest we lose the promises given to us by our loving and merciful God. It is up to Him to grant, and our task is to preserve. And do not be surprised that, after God’s holy promises and unrepentant gifts, the demons once again raise their shameful passions against you, hoping to steal immeasurable riches, but remember how shameless they were when, after God Himself had testified on behalf of the holy Job, they raised such temptations and torments against him in order to topple this pillar of patience; yet they did not overcome him and could not plunder the treasures of his radiant faith and gratitude. Gold is purified by passing through fire—that is, the righteous man through many trials. God permitted and allowed His servant to be tempted even after His special testimony concerning the righteous man, for the greater honor and glory of the Lord and the utter defeat of His enemies. Do not lose heart, then. The seals of the promises remain intact; “Wait for the Lord” (Ps. 26:14); “But he who endures to the end will be saved” (Matt. 24:13), concerning Christ Jesus our Lord.

54. (Answers). – The turmoil in your thoughts arises because you have an unstable heart. – You need not abstain from (grape) wine entirely, but consume it in moderation. – Sleeping while sitting eventually leads to humility. – In general, surrender yourself entirely to God, in reverence for Him.

55. Be mindful of yourself; the demons want to entice you toward things that are of little benefit, such as sleeping while sitting or not using a pillow—which is the same as “mint, cumin, and fennel”—and they suggest “neglecting the greater matters of the law” (Matt. 23:23), that is, to quell anger, dry up irritability, and attain obedience in all things. They sow these things in you in order to wear out your body, causing you to fall ill, so that you will inevitably require a soft bed and various foods; but rather, be content with a single headboard and rest upon it with the fear of God. Put into your pot a mixture of spiritual remedies, such as humility, obedience, faith, hope, and love; for whoever possesses them prepares a feast for Christ, the Heavenly King.

56. “I was carried away by a blasphemous thought.”—It has been quite some time since the blasphemous demon, who destroys the souls that accept him, set out against you. He has seized you by the yoke (the chain around your neck—your passions) to put you to death. Oh, may God not allow him to carry out his will upon you (2 Tim. 2:26).—But do not despair. God, who accepts your repentance, stands before you. Awaken from the delusion of captivity—and above all, quell your anger and irritability, knowing that they lead a person to pernicious blasphemy against God; but acquire humility, which scorches demons; obedience, which opens the way for the Son of God to enter a person; faith, which saves a person; hope that does not put one to shame; and love, which prevents a person from falling away from God. You have not cultivated these virtues; on the contrary, you have chosen their opposites—anger, irritability, and utter ruin—the aforementioned blasphemy. But make an effort to amend your ways, contemplating God’s goodness and reflecting on how many blessings the Lord has bestowed. – The past is forgiven, but amend your ways from now on. – For 40 days, offer repentance to God, making three prostrations daily and saying, “Forgive me, my God, for blaspheming You!” and confess Him with your blasphemous lips three times a day, saying, “Glory to You, my God, and blessed are You forever—Amen!” – And do not fall into the same sin again, lest something worse befall you. From insensitivity of heart you came to anger, and from anger you went on to the point of falling away from Holy Communion: being completely ensnared, you also fell into the pit of blasphemy. – And if the hand of the merciful God and the prayers of the Saints had not intervened, your soul would have fallen into the ruin of despair. Behold, through me, the least of all, God speaks to you: you have sinned—sin no more. Pray also for your past sins. God is merciful and, if we desire to amend our ways, forgives our sins.

57. (I grieve over Abba because he shows preference to others.) Brother! You are tempting yourself. Do you not know that “each person is tempted when they are lured and enticed by their own desire” (James 1:14)?—Pay no attention to anyone but yourself, and do not be curious about others, for this is of no benefit to you in any way. – And see how Satan has troubled your heart through such a trivial matter. – Rise up, then, supported by the hand of God, – and do not trust your own thoughts, through which the demons show you things as they please.

58. (When offered the chance to do something that signifies respect). Guard yourself against taking pleasure when you are honored for something, and show obedience that drives out rebellion, which is hated by God and by those who love Him. Cling to obedience, which lifts one up to heaven and makes those who attain it like the Son of God.

59. (How to begin repentance?) If you wish to begin repentance, look at what the woman who had sinned did: “With her tears she washed the Lord’s feet” (Luke 7:38). Weeping washes away everyone’s sins. But a person attains weeping through hard work, by means of much study of Scripture, patience, reflection on the dreadful judgment and eternal shame, and through self-denial, as the Lord said: “If anyone would come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me” (Matthew 16:24). To deny oneself and take up one’s cross means to set aside one’s own will in all things and to consider oneself as nothing.

60. (Because of my physical weakness, I cannot strive as the Fathers did.) If you are weak and cannot endure much, then do what you can, consuming a little less food and drink than you need; for God accepted the widow’s two mites and rejoiced in them more than in all else. – Train yourself not to treat others lightly—and you will be saved.

61. Thoughts arise within me, saying: “Go to a foreign land, and there you will be saved.”—This comes from the enemy, who offers this to you under the guise of truth, so that, having mocked you, he may make you an object of temptation for many, so that you may bear condemnation on their behalf as well. – However, you are subjected to this because of your sloth and vanity. The demons add their own schemes to your sloth and vanity in order to destroy your soul. So watch yourself carefully and strive against these thoughts, driving away negligence and vanity; do nothing of your own will, and do not accept the thoughts and self-justifications that arise within you—otherwise, you will suffer a severe fall. Acquire steadfastness, and it will remove from you the freedom to act as you please toward your neighbors—the cause of all evil in man; let go of all cares, and you will be free to serve God; become dead to every person, and you will be a stranger; consider yourself as nothing, and your mind will not be troubled; do not think that you have done anything good—and your reward will be preserved for you in its entirety. Furthermore, remember that you will not remain in this body for long, and strive to do what will enable you to say with boldness on that day: “I have prepared myself and have not been troubled” (Ps. 118:60). Brother! One cannot live without toil, and no one is crowned without struggle. Compel yourself to strive for your salvation—and God will help you, “who desires all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4).

62. Not everyone living in a monastery is a monk, but a monk is one who performs monastic work. The Lord said: “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter the kingdom of heaven, but the one who does the will of My Father in heaven” (Matt. 7:21). Brother! Why do you allow the enemy to mock you and expose you to the danger of falling?—“You ask,”—yet you make no effort to carry out what has been told to you. You ask again and vainly pass it on to others to curry favor—and thereby prevent yourself from succeeding soon. Time is given to us so that, having recognized our passions, we may labor to heal them, weeping and wailing. If, while in your cell, your thoughts wander, reproach yourself for it, confessing your weakness before God.

63. Whoever wishes to be a monk must by no means have a will of his own in anything. Christ the Lord, teaching us this, said: “I have come into the world, not to do My own will” (John 6:38). But if you obey one command and refuse another, you will thereby show that you are wiser than the one who commands you, and this is the same as being mocked by demons. Therefore, you must obey in everything, even if it seems to you that the task commanded is not sinless. The Abba who assigns it to you will bear your sin, and he will be held accountable for you. If the task is extremely inconvenient or dangerous for you, or beyond your strength, explain this to the Abba, and do as he judges.

64. (When I engage in conversation, I get carried away and lose myself; afterward, I feel ashamed and grieve.) To prevent the weak from falling into this, and into a love of glory, they must avoid talkativeness at all costs and end the conversation by making some excuse and withdrawing from those who are speaking. – When a conversation is beneficial and does not hinder a more important task, stay as long as they are talking; but if the conversation is not helpful, say, “Forgive me, I am weak,” and take your leave.

65. How should one behave when meeting others? When meeting someone, limit yourself to a greeting; then say, “Pray for me; I am on my way to attend to some business,” and leave. And when you are asked about something and you know the answer, say it and move on; but if you do not know, say, “I do not know,” and move on.

66. I want to stop seeing people: should I stop immediately, or gradually?—If you stop seeing people all at once, you will have peace; otherwise, you will be the cause of much confusion both for yourself and for others.

67. (A patient asks whether he should read medical books.) Read them, but as you read them—or when you ask anyone about medical treatments—do not forget that without God, no one receives healing. Whoever devotes himself to the art of medicine must dedicate himself to the name of God, and God will grant him help. The art of medicine does not prevent a person from being pious; but practice it as a craft, for the sake of the brethren. Whatever you do, do it with the fear of God, and you will be preserved by the prayers of the Saints.

68. “I am busy all day long—and it prevents me from remembering God.”—It happens that a person hears a great deal about a certain city, but when he happens to enter it, he does not realize that this is the very city he had heard about. So it is with you, brother: you spend the whole day in remembrance of God and do not realize it. To keep the commandment and strive to observe it as God’s—in this lies both obedience and remembrance of God.

69. We need food every day, but we must not eat it with relish. When we receive it, giving thanks to God who has given it and condemning ourselves as unworthy, then God causes it to serve us for sanctification and blessing. Likewise, if you need something and succeed in obtaining it, thank God for helping you and condemn yourself as unworthy; and God will turn away your attachment to it.

70. Everyone loves his neighbor to the extent of his ability; but the measure of perfect love consists in loving one’s neighbor as oneself, for the sake of the love one has for God. – Young people are prone to fall because of their foolish love for one another and because they gather together for private conversations. – The measure of their love for one another should be this: not to slander one another, not to hate one another, not to belittle one another, not to seek only one’s own interests, not to love one another for the sake of physical beauty or for the sake of any physical activity, and not to sit together without extreme necessity, lest they fall into audacity, which destroys all the fruits of a monk’s life and makes him like a dry tree.

71. “I want to be saved, but I do not know the way to salvation.”—Brother! God, through Holy Scripture and through the Fathers, has shown us the way to salvation, saying: “Ask your father, and he will tell you; your elders, and they will tell you” (Deut. 32:7). – Therefore, if you do not wish to go astray in the matter of salvation, do not do anything without consulting your spiritual fathers, and you will not go astray by the grace of God, “who desires all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4).

72. “A thought tells me that if I go somewhere and live alone, I will attain perfect silence.” – Our Lord Jesus Christ, before the cross, endured many afflictions and insults, and after that He ascended the cross. Likewise, no one can attain perfect and fruitful stillness and the rest of the holy and perfect life unless he first suffers with Christ (while living among his brothers) and endures all His sufferings, recalling the words of the Apostle: “If we suffer with Him, we will also be glorified with Him” (Rom. 8:17). Do not be deceived; there is no other path to salvation except this one.

73. (To the Sick). This illness has befallen you so that you may not depart to God without having borne fruit. If you endure it and give thanks to God, it will be counted to your credit in place of ascetic deeds, since you have not long remained in the monastic life.

74. One must not go anywhere without a command; for what we do of our own accord is not pleasing to God. But when you go by command, then in fulfilling the command of the one who sent you lies both prayer and pleasing God, Who said: "I have come down from heaven, not to do My own will, but the will of the Father who sent Me" (John 6:38).

75. (I am struggling with obedience. Should I ask for help?) Brother! Whoever desires to come to Jesus and walk the path of salvation must expect trials and sorrows at every moment. Scripture says: "My son, if you set out to serve the Lord, prepare your soul for trial" (Sirach 2:1). And the Lord said: "Whoever comes after Me must deny himself, take up his cross" every day, "and follow Me" (Matthew 16:24). Therefore, whoever wishes to be His disciple must remain obedient until death. It is more beneficial for you to be alone and to labor a little on your own than to invite another. Freedom in your spiritual life is not so much strengthened when a brother merely helps you, but rather when he is constantly with you.

76. (Whom should one ask about one's thoughts, and is it proper, after asking one person, to ask another about the same thing?)—You should ask the one in whom you have faith, whom you know is capable of bearing your thoughts, and whom you trust as you would God; but to ask another about the same thought is an act of unbelief and doubt. If you believe that God speaks through His Saint, then what is the point of testing here, or what need is there to tempt God by asking another about the very same thing?

77. "How many times must one pray so that a thought may receive guidance regarding a matter?"—When you cannot ask your spiritual father, you must pray three times about every matter; and after that, observe where your heart inclines—even if only by a hair's breadth—and act accordingly; for guidance becomes evident and is understood by the heart in every way.

78. "How should one pray three times—at different times, or all at once? Sometimes it is impossible to delay."—If you have free time, pray three times over the course of three days; but if there is an urgent need, as during the Savior's Passion, take as your example that He withdrew three times to pray, and while praying three times, He spoke the same words (Matt. 26:44).

79. (On Guidance). When a ship is tossed by the waves, if it has a helmsman, he, by the wisdom given to him by God, saves the ship, and those on board rejoice at seeing its safety. Above all, a sick person is greatly comforted by the memory of a doctor, and even more so by the doctor's skill; and a traveler in danger from robbers is encouraged by the voice of the guards, and even more so by their presence. If this is indeed the case, then should not the father's response, " , " bring much greater joy to everyone who hears it, especially when it is accompanied by earnest prayer to God, who said, "Pray for one another, that you may be healed" (James 5:16)?

80. He who confesses his sins is justified in them, according to the words of Scripture: "Declare your iniquities first, that you may be justified" (Isa. 43:26), and again: "I said, 'I will confess my transgressions to the Lord,' and You forgave the iniquity of my heart" (Ps. 31: 5). Let us guard ourselves from now on, for God has forgiven us our past sins.

81. If anyone, while observing a fast, adds anything to it of his own will, or fasts seeking human glory and gain from it, then his fast is abhorrent to God. So it is in everything. Any good deed that is performed not solely out of love for God, but to which one's own will is mingled, is impure and displeasing to God. This can also be understood from the Divine Law, which says: "You shall not sow mixed seed in your field, nor make for yourself garments of wool and linen" (Deut. 22:9–11; Lev. 19:19).

82. When memorizing the Psalms, do not be presumptuous, lest you end up filling the air with useless words, and this serve as a condemnation against you. The Word of God is the seed of goodness; if it remains unfruitful within you, you will be condemned along with the one who buried the silver given to him for multiplication in the ground.

83. With what words can we give thanks to Him who first created us, then granted us help against the enemy—and, most importantly, provided a place for our repentance, and gave us His Body and Blood for the forgiveness of sins and the strengthening of our hearts?—We will never be able to thank Him as He deserves; nevertheless, let us offer Him the thanksgiving we can with our lips and hearts—especially by enduring everything for His sake even unto death—and He, in His love for mankind, will count all this as the two mites of the widow in the Gospel.

84. When a matter that is of God presents itself to you, and a contrary thought resists it, then from this very fact it is evident that the matter is truly of God. – But offer up a prayer—and see: if, while you are praying, your heart is strengthened in what is good and that good increases rather than diminishes, then whether or not the opposing thought that troubles you persists, know that the matter is from God; for what is good inevitably faces sorrowful opposition due to the devil’s envy, but it (the good) prevails over this through prayer. If, however, the apparent good is inspired by the devil, and there is also opposition arising from him, then through prayer even the apparent good diminishes, and with it the apparent opposition. In such a case, it is evident that the enemy resists the thought he has planted solely to deceive us into accepting that thought as good.

85. When a thought praises you, and you cannot avoid the harm it causes, try to call upon the name of God, and say to your thought: Scripture says, “My people, those who praise you are deceiving you and causing you to stumble” (Isa. 3:12). Do the same when others praise you—remembering, moreover, that those who accept human praise gain no benefit, as the Lord Himself says: “How can you believe in Me, when you receive glory from men?” (John 5:44). – In general, we must keep in mind and heart that one should “boast in the Lord” (2 Cor. 10:17); for even if we have anything from God, it is all by God’s help. Why, then, did the Apostle, having attained such greatness, not boast in himself, but cry out, saying, “By the grace of God I am what I am” (1 Cor. 15:10)?

86. When, during psalm singing, prayer, or reading, an evil thought arises, disregard it, and focus more intently on the psalm singing, prayer, or reading, so that you may draw strength from the words you are uttering; if it persists, try to call upon the name of God, and God will help you and thwart the wiles of the enemies.

87. “How can one attain contrition in prayer, reading, and psalm-singing?”—Contrition in prayer comes from remembering one’s sins. The one who prays must recall his own deeds, and how those who do such things are judged, and that dreadful voice: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire” (Matt. 25:41). – As for reading and psalm-singing, devotion arises when one focuses one’s mind on the words being spoken and receives into one’s soul the power contained within them. If, despite this, indifference still remains within you, do not lose heart, but continue to labor patiently; for God is merciful, generous, and long-suffering, and He accepts our efforts. Always remember the words of the Psalmist: “I waited patiently for the Lord, and He heard me” (Ps. 39: 1). Learning from this, trust that God’s mercy will soon come upon you.

88. If, while singing psalms or when you are with others, you happen to call upon God, do not think that you are not calling upon Him unless you speak aloud, but remember that He is the Knower of hearts and looks upon the heart—and call upon Him in your heart. This is what is said in Scripture: “Shut your door and pray to your Father in secret” (Matt. 6:6).—Even if you do not utter the name of God in your heart, but merely remember God, this is even more like a call—and it is sufficient to help you.

89. True weeping, combined with contrition, atones for past sins and washes away defilements; it constantly protects the person who has attained it through the name of God, drives out laughter and distraction, and sustains unceasing lamentation; it is a shield that deflects all the fiery darts of the devil (Eph. 6:16); whoever possesses it is not wounded by the battle at all, whether he is among people or even with harlots.

90. Imperfect weeping comes and goes, in accordance with how the thought (zeal) for salvation alternately flares up and subsides. But when that fervor becomes constant, then there is great and constant contrition, and this is followed by true weeping, which one must strive to attain by compelling oneself.

91. Humility consists in cutting off one’s own will in all things and having no concern for anything. To cut off the root of the passions (lust, gluttony, greed) means to cut off one’s own will, to afflict oneself as much as possible, and to compel the senses to remain within their proper bounds rather than to abuse them; through this, the root of not only these but also other passions is cut off.

92. Surrendering everything to God’s will protects a person from confusion, no matter what happens. Yet confusion may still arise and prevent one from accepting what has happened with gratitude and joy. In such a case, one must wage a battle against this confusion by renewing one’s devotion to God’s will and reaffirming the conviction that everything comes from God, and that everything that comes from God is good for us. – Nothing good is accomplished by our own efforts alone, but by the power and will of God. Nevertheless, God also requires of us an effort in accordance with His will, and not one based on any cunning or deceit, which comes from the evil one.

93. Silence is better and more wondrous than any edifying discourse. Our fathers honored and cherished it, and through it they were glorified. But since we, because of our weakness, have not yet attained the point of walking in the way of the perfect, let us speak of what serves for edification—and speak by referring to the words of the Fathers, rather than delving into the interpretation of Scripture; for this task presents no small danger to the uninitiated. Scripture is spoken spiritually, and a person of the flesh cannot understand spiritual things. It is better for us to rely on the words of the Fathers in our discourse and find the benefit contained therein. But let us use them in moderation, remembering the one who said, “In the multitude of words sin is not avoided” (Prov. 10:19). And so that we do not thereby fall into pride and self-glorification in our thoughts, let us keep in mind that, if we do not put into practice what we say, we speak to our own condemnation.

94. If silence is recognized as more beneficial than good conversation, then all the more so is it beneficial in conversations about mundane matters (such as cities, villages, trade, peace, war, and the like). But when we cannot remain silent and are drawn into conversation about such subjects, let us at least not prolong the conversation, lest we fall into some enemy’s trap through verbosity.

95. If you find yourself in the company of people discussing worldly or spiritual matters, allow yourself to say something that contains no harm, but speak judiciously, merely to avoid having your companions praise you for being silent. But even when you act this way—that is, speak little—be careful not to condemn them for speaking too much.

96. When you intend to do something and sense a disturbance in your thoughts, and this disturbance remains even after invoking the name of God—even if only by a hair’s breadth—then recognize from this that the deed you wish to do has been suggested to you by the evil one, and do not do it; for nothing done with a disturbed mind is pleasing to God. – But when someone resists that hesitation (when a thought arises that resists it), then one should not immediately consider the matter harmful, but examine it to see if it is good or not—and if it is not good, abandon it; but if it is good, carry it out, disregarding the hesitation.

97. If, having begun a conversation, you realize that it is sinful, cut it off by saying, “No, let’s not talk about that,” or, after pausing briefly, say, “I forgot what I was talking about”—and steer the conversation toward something else—something sinless.

98. What is self-justification?—It is when someone denies sin, as we see in Adam, Eve, Cain, and others like them, who sinned but, wishing to justify themselves, denied their sin.

99. Every thought and every deed, as has been said, must be examined to see whether it is good or not, and one must do what is good and reject what is not. However, so that what is good is not accompanied by confusion, one must examine the prevailing thought behind it—the purpose for which one undertakes anything—and when you question it out of the fear of God, God will not allow you to fall into error. – But in any case, do not forget to call upon the name of God.

100. (To one who has been struck by a brother and wishes to separate from him). Do not be upset, lest you act rashly, especially toward a person whose thoughts are clouded by the envious devil. Some sick people, their minds clouded by a high fever, torment those who are healthy and serve them, without even realizing it, because the illness has completely taken hold of them. So too, the one who is tempted, though he is destroying his own soul, is unaware of it; for he is intoxicated by the passion of his affliction, under the influence of the adversary, who always distorts everything before him in order to cast him into the pit of destruction. He is not worthy of anger or vengeance, but of pity and forbearance. Through these, God allows us to be tempted—and He allows it with care, so that we may appear before Him as those who have been tested. Let us, then, be lenient toward our neighbor during his sensual and mental struggles, for it is said: “Bear one another’s burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ” (Gal. 6:2). – Do not be tempted to leave your place and separate yourself from your brother; for this would not be according to God, but the fulfillment of the devil’s will, and if you resolve to do this, the enemy will not rest, but will incite you to even worse things. It is better to pray for your brother with all your heart, and to love him in Christ Jesus our Lord.

101. (To a brother troubled by fear). Brother! You must glorify God for the fact that He is fulfilling in you the word of Scripture that says: “God is faithful; He will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear” (1 Cor. 10:13). According to your strength, He allows you to be trained in spiritual warfare; but He tests great men with great temptations according to their strength, and they rejoice in this; for temptation leads a person to success. Where there is good to be had, there is also a struggle. Do not fear temptations, but rejoice in them, for they lead to success. Despise this temptation. God helps you and protects you.

102. Strive to cultivate humility and submission; under no circumstances insist on having your own way, for this gives rise to anger; do not judge or belittle anyone, because this weakens the heart and blinds the mind, and from this comes indifference and a hardening of the heart. Be constantly vigilant, studying the law of God, for through this the heart is warmed by heavenly fire, as it is said: “And in my teaching a fire will blaze up” (Ps. 38:4). Guard your lips from idle talk and empty chatter, and do not let your heart grow accustomed to evil words. Humble yourself before God, saying, “God, be merciful to me, a sinner” (Luke 18:13); and He will have mercy on you, preserve you, and shield you from all evil, so that you may pass from darkness to the true light, from deception to the truth, from death to life in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

103. Give your body as much (food) as it needs; and you will suffer no harm, even if you eat three times a day. If a person eats only once a day but recklessly, what good does that do him?—Gluttony is followed by the temptation to fornication—and the enemy then burdens the body with sleep to defile it.

104. Do not be surprised if you sometimes feel great weakness while serving (at the rule) and while doing manual work. Such is the nature of this path: sometimes a person feels one way, and sometimes another, just as a traveler sometimes walks on smooth paths, sometimes encounters rapids and mountains, and then returns to level ground. Do not focus on your weakness; just keep doing your work.

105. (To a sick person forced to eat contrary to the rule.) God does not condemn those who eat not for their own pleasure but because of bodily weakness. Foods are forbidden to us to protect us from gluttony and bodily desires, but where there is weakness, those prohibitions are set aside; for where there is weakness, there is a call to God.

106. (To a sick person who asked for prayers in his exhaustion.) My despondent and complaining brother! Why are you grieving? Why are you crying out? Why do you send for help from afar, when you have Jesus standing close to you and desiring that you call upon Him for help! – Call out to Him: “Teacher!” and He will answer you. Touch the hem of His garment, and He will heal you not only of this one affliction, but of all your passions. If your mind were where it ought to be, then even the bites of venomous snakes and scorpions could not bring you down from there to the sensation of bodily illness: “ ” “I have forgotten,” he says, “to take my bread because of the sound of my sighing” (Ps. 101: 5). Do not grieve; God’s mercy is near to you.

107. Despise the body, which will be eaten by worms; it will not help you in the least when it is given over to decay. The Apostle says: “Do not gratify the desires of the flesh” (Rom. 13:14).

108. (The sick person: Should I indulge the body in its weakness?) God has given us reason so that we may be guided along the right path through the Divine Scriptures. The Apostle says: “Test everything; hold fast to what is good” (1 Thess. 5:20). One must only be careful not to consume or do anything out of passion; but what one does out of weakness or necessity is not counted as either sin or indulgence. When we are healthy, desire prompts us to seek rest for the body; but when we sustain the body out of necessity, it will help us in the performance of our duties. If we care for animals that serve our needs, we should all the more care for the body as the instrument of the soul. When an instrument becomes dull, this hinders the artist, even if he is quick-witted and knowledgeable. The Apostle, noting St. Timothy’s illness and weak stomach, commanded him to drink wine (1 Tim. 5:23), though he also commanded him to “endure hardship” (to endure privations) while carrying out “the work of an evangelist” (2 Tim. 4:5). And in all things, a person must be guided by reason—and he will not easily stray.

109. “The battles against me are growing ever more intense.”—Brother! The time of battle is the time for action; do not slacken, but act. Fight the battle; and when it intensifies, strengthen yourself as well, crying out: “Lord Jesus Christ!” You see my weakness and my sorrow; help me, “and deliver me from those who persecute me, for I have taken refuge in You” (Ps. 141:7; 142:9); and pray that you may receive the strength to serve God with a pure heart.

110. God has given people two gifts through which they may be saved and delivered from all the passions of the old man: humility and obedience; yet we do not strive for them, nor do we desire to abide in them or be guided by them. – Cast aside all deviations, bow your neck to humility and obedience, and you will receive grace. If you carry out with humility and obedience what you hear from the Fathers, the Lord will grant you His gracious help not only in the task in which you are engaged, but will also ensure that all your endeavors are successful, for He preserves the path of those who fear Him and shields their journey. Why are you indignant? Why do you argue? God’s mercy will help you if you remain constantly in God’s patience. Stop being angry, irritable, and envious. Die to every person. Ask yourself: Who am I?—“Dust and ashes” (Gen. 18: 27) “and a dog” (Matt. 15: 27). Do not judge others by belittling or mocking them. Force yourself not to say: “What is this? Why is that?” (Sirach 39:22). “Why am I not equal to this or that person?” But work diligently at your small craft, with the fear of God, and you will receive no small reward for it.

111. When drowsiness sets in due to despondency and hinders the task at hand, then one must rise to pray and not cease praying—and the Lord will dispel the drowsiness through prayer.

112. (To one who wished to be last—just so he might be accepted into the monastery.)—To be in the last place is not your concern to seek. It depends on your Abba; your task is to prepare yourself for obedience.

113. If a person does not make an effort himself, to the best of his ability, and does not combine his own efforts with the prayers of the Saints, he will derive no benefit from the Saints praying for him. When they fast and pray for him, but he indulges in sensual pleasures and behaves recklessly, what good will their prayers for him do? For here is fulfilled what is said in Scripture: “One builds up, and another tears down; the only thing that remains is labor” (Sir. 34: 23)? And the Apostle says: “The prayer of a righteous person is powerful and effective” (James 5:16), that is, when a holy and righteous person prays for a sinner, the sinner, to the best of his ability, must cooperate with the saints’ intercession through repentance.

114. When someone asks another to give him something, and the other does not have it, he will not be condemned for not giving him what was asked. And the Apostle Peter, when a lame man asked him for alms, said: “I have neither silver nor gold” (Acts 3:6)—and did not borrow money to give to him. Likewise, if someone has only what is strictly necessary for himself, he should not spend even that on alms, lest he later, when he himself is in need, come to grieve, being unable to endure poverty. And when a beggar pesters him, and he says, “Forgive me, I have nothing to give you,” this is not a lie; for one who has only what is necessary for himself has nothing to give to another. Let him say to the beggar, “Forgive me, I have only what is necessary for myself.” Recall the five virgins who, when others asked them for oil for their lamps, replied, “There will not be enough for us and for you” (Matt. 25: 9). And the Apostle Paul, writing to the Corinthians, says: “Let your abundance be their lack” (2 Cor. 8:14), and: “For why should others have joy while you have sorrow?” (2 Cor. 8:13).

115. When you want to give alms, but a thought causes you to doubt whether you should give, then examine your thought; and if you find that it is motivated by stinginess, then give, and even a little more than what you originally intended to give.

116. “How can someone who has nothing to give share in bliss?”—Bliss is not promised only to those who give alms.—“Blessed are the poor in spirit,” “Blessed are those who mourn,” and so on (Matt. 5:3 ff.). So, if you cannot give alms, be poor in spirit, so that you may inherit the Kingdom of Heaven with the saints. Weep over your sins in this world, so that you may find comfort with those who mourn. Acquire meekness, so that you may inherit the earth. Be pure in heart, so that you may behold God in His glory. Endure reproach, persecution, and false slander for the Lord’s sake, so that you may rejoice in the joy of receiving a great reward in heaven.

117. If the law of the Lord commands one thing, but the law of this world prescribes the opposite: what should one do?—The law of God is more important; for it speaks of the salvation of the soul, while the law of this world, being carnal, speaks to the carnal.

118. Your love asks me about the fact that you sometimes find yourself gazing passionately at the one before you—and becoming captivated in your soul. This clearly refers to the temptations of the devil. In this regard, you must remember the decay and stench of our nature, and how we will change when we are in our graves. Also, picture before your eyes the coming dreadful judgment of God, and what the fate of those who act this way will be, and how you will be able to bear that great shame when our deeds are revealed before the angels and archangels, before all people, and before the righteous Judge—and how the mouths of those who commit these deeds will then be silenced. Let us fear Him who said: “Do not deceive yourselves: neither fornicators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexuals will inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6:9–10)—and: “Anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent” and so on. (Matt. 5:28). You must remember this and not frequent the company of those toward whom you feel this conflict; but do not reveal to them why you are withdrawing from them, so as not to give them cause for various suspicions. — And as soon as you need to speak with them, call upon the holy name of God for help, saying: Lord Jesus! Cover me and help me in my weakness.” And do not be afraid; He will break the bow of your enemies, for evil is rendered powerless by His name. Speak little rather than much, and do not give free rein to your ears or your thoughts; but conduct yourself with dignity and without confusion, so that no one may notice what is happening. If, through this, you gain strength, do not be bold toward your enemies, for they are shameless, and even if they are defeated a thousand times, they will take up the fight again. But God the Victor helps the humility of man, for whose sake He, of His own will, chose to become incarnate.

119. “How does the mind become entangled in lustful thoughts?”—The entanglement or distraction (and captivity) of the mind occurs not only in relation to lustful passion but also in other cases. The mind is subjected to this because of distraction—and when this happens, a person must call out to himself, saying: “Lord, forgive me, for the sake of Your Holy Name; because of my negligence, I have been subjected to this. Deliver me from distraction and from every snare of the enemy.” – And let this be the sign by which you may recognize such distraction: if someone is conversing with another, and his mind wanders here and there, it happens that while he is speaking about one thing, his thoughts turn to another. This is distraction. – In the same way, lustful thoughts also lead us astray. It happens that someone is conversing with another, and if the enemy manages to distract the mind from godly sobriety, then, as a result of distraction, lustful desire arises in the mind. – And this, too, is a form of distraction, because it did not arise from reflection or recollection, but the person was carried away by it through forgetfulness. – Having come to his senses, such a person must call himself to order, as mentioned above, and take refuge in God’s mercy; the Lord is gracious and will accept him as the prodigal son. But when such a battle arises in the mind even without distraction, one must remain sober, not take pleasure in such thoughts, not linger in them, but rather turn to the Lord God.

120. It is best to avoid all conversation with women. If necessity compels one to interact with them, let us seek to do so through others. If even this is impossible, then, when interacting with them, let us conduct ourselves as one who approaches a fire. Just as one takes every precaution not to be burned by fire, so too shall we treat women as if approaching a fire—and we shall firmly establish ourselves in the fear of God. Let us not look at women under any circumstances. Let us not give free rein to our eyes, nor linger in conversation with them; for from this arises the fire of lust; but let us strive to withdraw from them quickly, praying to God that He may save us in this difficult hour from the snare of the devil set before us, and let us constantly remember God—and His great power will cover our weakness in Christ Jesus our Lord.

121. “Is it good for me to leave my wife with the intention of entering a monastery?”—You must not leave her of your own accord, for you will violate the commandment of the Apostle, who says: “If you are bound to a wife, do not seek a dispensation” (1 Cor. 7:27). If she (after you leave) sins and begins to live a wicked life, then this sin will be upon you—unless you leave her by mutual agreement, after consulting with her, and for the sake of her good. – But leave this matter to God; and as His love for mankind sees fit, so will He act.

122. One should by no means grieve over the things of this world, but only over sin itself. Likewise, “rejoice with those who rejoice” means to share in the joy of those who excel in virtue according to God and rejoice in the hope of future blessings; and “weep with those who weep” means to sympathize with sinners as they repent of their sins.

123. (On “Blessed are the peacemakers.”) It is better to bring peace to one’s own heart: this is fitting for everyone—and blessed is the one who does so. But it is not fitting for everyone to reconcile those who are quarreling, but only for those who can undertake this without any harm to themselves. The weak, however, should rejoice in the peace of all, but not make themselves mediators for the reconciliation of every person, except perhaps those whom they love in God; and even then, only when no harm to their own soul is involved.

124. “I am being insulted by someone: what should I do?”—Do him a kindness.

125. “When one of the fathers comes to me, I don’t have the necessary things to offer him—and I grieve.” – Such a thought comes from the devil. It is enough to offer them what you have, as it is written: “Be content with what you have” (Heb. 13:5)—and God will make them aware of your zeal. When you happen to go somewhere, do not expect to find peace there—and you will not be dismayed; but if, having hoped to find it, you do not, you will speak ill of the one who welcomed you: yet slander is the death of the soul. – Give thanks for everything: for in this lies spiritual and soul-nourishing food and peace.

126. He who seeks counsel from the fathers imitates Christ, Who “humbled Himself, taking the form of a servant” (Phil. 2:7–8). A man who lives without counsel is an enemy to himself, for Scripture says, “Do everything with counsel” (Sir. 32:21). It is more beneficial to ask with humility than to follow one’s own will; for the Lord Himself puts into the mouth of the one being asked what to say, for the sake of the humility and righteousness of the asker’s heart.

127. Never argue about the faith: God does not require this of you, but only that you believe rightly, as you received from the Holy Church at baptism, and that you keep His commandments. Keep this—and you will be saved. But if you are asked, say: “Forgive me, holy fathers, this is beyond me.”

128. Do not inquire into anything that God does not require of you, but be content, as I said above, with the profession of the true faith, and do not be curious about anything beyond that.

129. When you happen to be with laypeople and they begin to engage in idle talk, if you have no particular need, leave; but when there is a need, turn your mind to your prayer, not condemning them, but acknowledging your own weakness. – However, if they are well-disposed toward you and you know that they are eager to hear the Word of God, try to turn this idle conversation into something useful—by telling them something from the lives of the saints.

130. When someone you know holds to heretical speculations, exhort him to come to know the true faith, but do not argue with him, and do not wish to hear his speculations, lest you be infected by his poison. If he wishes to hear the truth of the faith, direct him to the Holy Fathers, who can benefit him in Christ. In this way, you will help him according to God’s will without harming yourself. But if he does not repent after the first and second admonitions, then, according to the Apostle’s word, “reject him” (Titus 3:10).

131. “My conscience tells me not to leave my home often, but it so happens that there are several church services throughout the week: should I attend them, or is it better to stay home and devote myself to prayer?” – If you know that leaving the house and the encounters you have there cause you harm, then it is beneficial for you not to go out often—even for church services—but only from time to time; for silence delivers one from many evils.

132. “If I find it necessary to leave the house—whether for my own needs or for the sake of my fathers—would it not weigh on my conscience if I did not go to church in such a case?” – If you need to leave the house out of necessity or at the command of the fathers, strive to do your duty with the fear of God, and do not worry about missing the church service; but return to your home, and there reflect on your sins. But if you leave the house out of laziness or distraction, then it is better to go to the church service and not let your mind wander, but to pay attention to yourself.

133. “Is it good to go to church at night (for a vigil), or to keep vigil at home to the best of one’s ability?”—It is good to keep vigil at home, for there are conversations in church.

134. “A thought presents to me the lack of the means I need, suggesting that I cannot provide for my family—and from this, sorrow assails me.”—This is sorrow of every kind. If we had hope in God, He Himself would guide us according to His will. Therefore, “Cast your sorrow upon the Lord” (Ps. 54:23), and He is powerful enough to provide you and your household with everything you need without sorrow or grief. Say to Him, “Let Your will be done,” and He will not leave you in sorrow or grief.

135. “When I do something unjust and then make amends for it, my mind becomes conceited, suggesting that I have done something good; what should I say to it in this case?” – Tell him: Without God, we cannot do anything good, as He Himself said: “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15:5). And the Apostle says: “What do you have that you did not receive? But if you have received it, why do you boast as if you had not received it?” (1 Cor. 4:7). Therefore, if we cannot take pride even in doing good, how much less should we do so in abstaining from evil. It is great folly to take pride in the fact that we do not sin.

136. “Every food has a natural sweetness: does it not harm the one who eats it?”—God the Lord has granted sweetness to every kind of food, and there is no harm in this for the one who receives it with thanksgiving. But one must always guard against addiction, for it is harmful to the soul.

137. “Is it improper to do something in such a way that the work turns out clean, when, for example, I happen to be constructing a building or doing something else?” – It is not inappropriate to make something so that it turns out clean and beautiful, for the sake of the purpose for which it is intended, but without attachment, for the Lord rejoices in all purity. But if you notice a fondness for a thing within yourself, then remember its end—how it is subject to decay—and you will be calmed; for there is not a single thing that remains constantly in the same form, but everything is transitory and changeable.

The Venerable Abba Dorotheus

A Brief Account of Him

Abba Dorotheus flourished at the end of the sixth and the beginning of the seventh century. He spent his early youth studying secular sciences—with great diligence. After completing his education, he lived for some time in his homeland, not far from the monastery of Abba Serid, perhaps in Ashkelon or Gaza. He was of sufficient means. He soon came into contact with the great elders Barsanuphius and John, whose teachings inspired him to leave everything behind and take monastic vows at the monastery of Abba Serid, where they resided. Under their guidance, he received his monastic training—primarily, however, under the guidance of the elder John—while at the same time fulfilling the duties assigned to him by the abbot of the monastery, who first entrusted him with the supervision of the guesthouse and then the infirmary. During this latter period of service, he served as the mentor of St. Dositheus. After the deaths of Abba Serida and the elder St. John, when their common mentor, the great Barsanuphius, withdrew completely into his cell, the Reverend Dorotheus left Abba Serida's community and became the abbot of another monastery. His teachings, delivered to his disciples, likely date from this time. These teachings, numbering twenty-one, along with several epistles, constitute all that remains to us as a legacy from the writings of this Father, whose light of teaching spread not only in monastic communities but also everywhere among Christians. The year of his death is estimated to be around 620. His feast day is June 5.

Instructions for Ascetics

(Excerpted in sequence)

1. In His goodness, God has given us commandments that purify us, so that, if we so desire, we may, by keeping these commandments, be cleansed not only of sins but also of the passions themselves. For the passions are one thing, and sins are another. Passions are: anger, pride, sensuality, hatred, evil lust, and the like. Sins, however, are the very acts of the passions, when one carries them out in practice—that is, performs with the body those deeds to which his passions impel him; for one may have passions but not act upon them.

2. The (old) Law was intended to teach us not to do what we ourselves would not want to suffer; that is why it restrained us only from doing evil. Now, however (in the New Testament), we are required to cast out the very passion that drives us to do evil—hatred itself, sensuality itself, vainglory itself, and other passions.

3. Listen to what the Lord says: “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matt. 11:29). Here He revealed the root and cause of all evil and the remedy for it—the cause of all that is good; He showed precisely that exaltation has brought us low, and that mercy cannot be obtained except through its opposite, humility. — Why have we been subjected to all these sorrows? Is it not because of pride? Man was created in every kind of delight and was in paradise. But he was commanded not to do one thing, and yet he did it. Do you see pride? Do you see disobedience (the daughter of pride)?—Then God said: Man cannot enjoy a single joy; if he does not experience misfortune, he will go even further and perish completely; if he does not know what sorrow and toil are, he will not know what joy and peace are either;—and He cast him out of Paradise. — There he was left to his own pride and his own will, so that they might crush his bones, and through this he might learn to follow not himself but God's commandments, and so that the very suffering of disobedience might teach him the bliss of obedience, as the Prophet says: “Your apostasy will discipline you” (Jer. 2:19). — Now the goodness of God calls out: “Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy-laden, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matt. 11:28). It is as if to say: You have toiled and suffered, and experienced the evil consequences of disobedience; so come now and turn back; revive yourselves with humility, instead of the pride with which you have killed yourselves. “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matthew 11:29).

4. Abba Mark said: Without contrition of heart, it is impossible to be freed from evil and to acquire virtue. Through contrition of heart, a person becomes obedient to the commandments, is freed from evil, acquires virtues—and then ascends to his rest.

5. Some God-loving people, having curbed the workings of the passions through holy baptism, desired to conquer the passions themselves and become dispassionate—such as St. Anthony, St. Pachomius, and other God-bearing Fathers. They embraced the noble intention “to purify themselves from every defilement of flesh and spirit” (2 Cor. 7:1). But knowing that, while living in the world, it is not easy to achieve this, they devised their own special way of life, a special way of acting—that is, a life of seclusion detached from the world—and began to flee from the world and live in the deserts, striving in fasting and vigils, sleeping on the bare ground, and endured all manner of other hardships, having completely renounced their homeland and kinship, their estates and possessions.

6. Not only did they keep the commandments, but they also brought gifts to God. The commandments are given to all Christians, and every Christian is obligated to keep them. This is the same as the tribute owed to a king in the world. But just as there are great and noble people in the world who not only pay tribute to the king but also bring him gifts—for which they are granted special honors, rewards, and distinctions—so too the Fathers not only paid tribute to God by keeping the commandments, but also brought Him gifts—chastity and non-possessiveness, which are not commandments but acts of free will: for concerning the first it is said, “Let the one who is able to accept this accept it” (Matt. 19: 12), and concerning the second: “If you wish to be perfect... sell what you have and give to the poor” (Matt. 19:21).

7. They crucified the world for themselves, and then set about crucifying themselves to the world, imitating the Apostle, who says: “The world has been crucified to me, and I to the world” (Gal. 6:15). For when a person renounces the world and becomes a monk—leaving behind parents, possessions, and all worldly affairs and cares—then he crucifies the world for himself. And when, having freed himself from external things, he strives against the very pleasures themselves, or against the very desire for things, and against his own wishes, and puts to death the very passions, then he crucifies himself to the world—and can boldly say with the Apostle: “The world has been crucified to me, and I to the world.”

8. Our Fathers, having crucified the world to themselves, also crucified themselves to the world by devoting themselves to ascetic struggles. But we, although we seem to have crucified the world to ourselves by leaving the world and entering the monastery, we do not wish to crucify ourselves to the world, for we still love its pleasures, still have an attachment to it, sympathize with its glory, and harbor within ourselves a fondness for food, clothing, and other vanities. However, we must not act this way; just as we have renounced the world and its possessions, so must we renounce our very attachment to those things.

9. We have left the world; let us also leave behind our attachment to it. For attachments once again bind us to the world and unite us with it, even if they concern trivial, ordinary, and worthless things. But if we wish to be completely transformed and freed from attachments, let us learn to cut off our desires—no matter how trivial the things to which they pertain. For nothing benefits people as much as the curbing of one’s own will; and truly, a person prospers more from this than from any other virtue. Meanwhile, such suppression of one’s will and desires can happen moment by moment. Suppose someone is walking; a thought tells him, “Look this way and that,” but he suppresses his desire and does not look. He encounters people talking; a thought tells him, “Say a word or two to them,” but he suppresses that desire—and does not speak. He approaches the kitchen; a thought tells him, “Go in and ask what the cook is preparing,” but he suppresses that desire, and does not go in, and so on and so forth. —By suppressing his desires in this way, he becomes accustomed to suppressing them and, starting with small things, reaches the point where he suppresses them effortlessly and calmly even in great matters; and so he finally comes to have no will of his own at all, and whatever happens, he remains calm. Thus, by cutting off one’s will, one attains impartiality, and from impartiality, with God’s help, one ascends to perfect dispassion.

10. One of the elders said, “Above all, we need humility.” Why did he say that?—Why did he not say that, above all, we need self-control? For the Apostle says, “Everyone who competes in the games exercises self-control in all things” (1 Cor. 9:25). Or why did he not say that, above all, we need the fear of God? For it is written in Scripture: “The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Prov. 1:7). Why did he also not say that, above all, we need almsgiving or faith? For it is said: “Sins are cleansed by almsgiving and faith” (Prov. 15:27), and also: “Without faith it is impossible to please God” (Heb. 11:6). Why, then, having set aside all these things that are so necessary, does he emphasize only humility? The Elder shows us by this that neither the fear of God, nor almsgiving, nor faith, nor self-control, nor any other virtue can be perfect without humility. For it is through humility that all the arrows of the enemy and the adversary are broken. All the saints walked in its path and through its labor. “Behold my humility and my labor, and forgive all my sins,” cries the Psalmist; and again: “I humbled myself, and the Lord saved me” (Ps. 24:18; 114:6).

11. The same elder said: Humility is not angry with anyone, nor does it provoke anyone to anger. Humility draws God’s grace upon the soul; and when God’s grace comes, it delivers the soul from these two grave passions. For what could be more grievous than being angry with one’s neighbor and provoking him to anger? – But am I saying that humility delivers us from only these two passions? It delivers the soul from every passion and every temptation.

12. When St. Anthony saw all the devil's snares spread out before him and, sighing, asked God, "Who, then, will escape them?" God answered him, "Humility escapes them," and—what is even more astonishing—added, "They do not even touch him." Do you see the power of this virtue? Truly, there is nothing stronger than humility; nothing can overcome it. If something sorrowful befalls a humble person, he immediately condemns himself, acknowledging that he deserves it—and will not reproach anyone, nor will he lay the blame on another. In this way, he endures what has happened without confusion, without sorrow, with perfect calm; and therefore he is not angry with anyone, nor does he provoke anyone's anger.

13. There are two kinds of humility, just as there are two kinds of pride. "The first kind of pride" is when someone reproaches a brother, condemns him, and dishonors him as if he were insignificant, while considering himself superior to him. If such a person does not come to his senses soon and strive to correct himself, he gradually falls into "the second kind of pride," which is pride against God Himself and attributes one's own deeds and virtues to oneself rather than to God, as if one had accomplished them by one's own efforts, through one's own knowledge and intellect, and not by God's help. From this, one can see what the two kinds of humility consist of. "The first" humility consists in regarding one's brother as wiser and in every way superior to oneself—or in regarding oneself as lower than everyone else. "The second" humility, however, consists in attributing one's deeds to God. And this is the perfect humility of the saints.

14. Perfect humility is born of keeping the commandments. When there is much fruit on the trees, the fruit itself bends the branches downward and causes them to droop; but a branch that bears no fruit reaches upward and grows straight. There are also certain trees (lemon trees) that bear no fruit as long as their branches grow upward; but if someone takes a stone, ties it to a branch, and bends it downward, then it bears fruit. So too, when the soul humbles itself, it bears fruit, and the more fruit it bears, the more it humbles itself. That is why the saints, the closer they draw to God, the more they see themselves as sinners. Thus, when Abraham saw the Lord, he called himself "dust and ashes" (Gen. 18:27); and Isaiah, upon seeing God exalted, cried out: "Woe is me! I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips" (Isa. 6:5).

15. No one can express in words what humility is and how it is born in the soul unless they learn it from experience. No one can come to know this from words alone. Once, Abba Zosima was speaking about humility (that the holier a person is, the more humble they are), and a certain sophist who was present asked him: "Do you not know that you possess virtues? After all, you see that you are keeping the commandments: how is it, then, that while doing so, you consider yourself a sinner?" The elder could not find an answer to give him, but only said, "I do not know what to say to you, but I consider myself a sinner." And when the sophist continued to pester him with the question, "How?"—the elder replied only this: "I do not know how; but I truly consider myself to be so. Do not trouble me." Likewise, when Abba Agathon was nearing the end of his life, and the brethren said to him, "Are you afraid too, Father?" he replied, "As much as I could, I compelled myself to keep the commandments, but I am a man, and how can I know whether my deeds are pleasing to God? For God's judgment is one thing, and human judgment is another."

16. Regarding what leads to humility, one of the elders said this: "The path to humility consists of physical labors performed wisely—and of considering oneself lower than everyone else—and of praying to God unceasingly." – Physical labor leads the soul to humility, because the soul sympathizes with the body and shares in everything that happens in the body. Just as physical labor humbles the body, so too is the soul humbled along with it. To consider oneself lower than everyone else is a distinctive feature of humility, and practice and training in this naturally root humility and uproot the pride we mentioned first. For how can anyone take pride before another, or rebuke and humiliate anyone, if they consider themselves lower than everyone else? – Likewise, praying unceasingly clearly opposes pride—the second kind. For it is evident that one inclines toward humility who, knowing that he cannot perform any virtue without God's help, never ceases to pray to God that He may bestow His grace upon him. Why? Because one who prays unceasingly, even if he is deemed worthy to accomplish something, cannot become proud, knowing why he accomplished it; for he cannot attribute this to his own strength, but attributes all his successes to God, always giving Him thanks and always calling upon Him, trembling lest he be deprived of such help. Thus, he prays with humility and is humbled by prayer; and the more he always progresses in virtue, the more he is always humbled; and as he is humbled, he receives help and progresses in humility.

17. When God created man, He instilled within him something divine—a thought akin to a spark, possessing both light and warmth—a thought that enlightens the mind and shows it what is good and what is evil. This is called conscience—and it is the natural law. By following this law—the conscience—the Patriarchs and all the Saints, even before the written law, pleased God. But when people, through the Fall, suppressed and trampled upon their conscience, then the written law became necessary, the holy Prophets became necessary, and the very coming of our Lord Jesus Christ became necessary—to reveal and restore it—so that the spark, which had been buried, might be rekindled through the observance of His holy commandments.

18. Now it is up to us either to smother it again or to let it shine within us and enlighten us, if we obey. When our conscience tells us to do something, and we disregard it—and when it speaks again, and we do not act but continue to trample on it—then we smother it, and it can no longer speak clearly to us because of the burden weighing upon it; but like a lamp shining from behind the conscience, it begins to show us things that grow darker and darker. Just as in water clouded by much silt, no one can recognize their own face, so too, through sin, we fail to understand what our conscience is telling us—so that it seems to us as if we have no conscience at all.

19. Conscience is called an adversary because it always resists our evil will and reminds us of what we ought to do but do not do; and if we do what we ought not to do, it condemns us. That is why the Lord called it an adversary and commands us: “Be reconciled to your adversary while you are still on the way with him” (Matt. 5:25)—that is, in this world, as St. Basil the Great says.

20. Let us, then, guard our conscience while we are in this world; let us not allow it to convict us of any wrongdoing, and let us not trample upon it in anything, even if it be the smallest thing. Know that from neglecting this small and, in essence, insignificant thing, we move on to neglecting even the great. If anyone begins to say, “What’s the big deal if I eat this trifle? What’s the big deal if I look at this or that thing?” then from this: “What does it matter in this, what does it matter in that”—he falls into a wicked habit and begins to disregard what is great and important and to trample on his conscience; and thus, becoming hardened in evil, he will be in danger of falling into complete insensitivity.

21. One must keep one’s conscience both in relation to God, in relation to one’s neighbor, and in relation to things. — In relation to God, one keeps one’s conscience by not neglecting His commandments; and even in those things that people do not see, and in which no one demands anything of us, one keeps one’s conscience toward God in secret. — Keeping one’s conscience clear toward one’s neighbor requires that one never do anything that, as we know, offends or tempts one’s neighbor—whether by deed, word, appearance, or gaze. — Keeping one’s conscience clear in regard to material things consists in not mistreating any object, not allowing it to be damaged, and not discarding it unnecessarily. — In all these matters, one must keep one’s conscience pure and unblemished, so as not to fall into the trouble against which the Lord Himself warns us (Matt. 5:26).

22. St. John says, “Perfect love casts out fear” (1 John 4:18). But how then does the holy Prophet David say, “Fear the Lord, all you His saints” (Ps. 33: 10)? This shows that there are two kinds of fear: one is initial, and the other is perfect—one is characteristic of beginners, and the other is characteristic of perfect saints who have attained the measure of perfect love. Whoever does God’s will out of fear of punishment is still a beginner; but whoever does God’s will out of love for God—in order to please God—is led by this love into perfect fear, by which, having tasted the sweetness of abiding with God, he fears falling away and fears losing it. And it is this perfect fear, born of love, that drives out the initial fear.

23. It is impossible to attain perfect fear unless one first acquires the original fear. The Wise Sirach says: “The fear of God is the beginning and the end” (Sirach 1:15, 18). The “beginning” refers to the initial fear, followed by the perfect fear of the saints. The initial fear is characteristic of a spiritual state. It protects the soul from every fall; for it is said: “Through the fear of the Lord, everyone turns away from evil” (Prov. 15:27). But whoever turns away from evil out of fear of punishment, like a slave who fears his master, gradually comes to do good of his own free will—at first, like a hired hand, hoping for some reward for his good deeds. If, however, he continues in this way—avoiding evil out of fear, like a slave, and doing good in the hope of a reward, like a hired hand—then, abiding in goodness by God’s grace and uniting with God in proportion to this, he finally acquires a taste for goodness, comes to a certain sense of what is truly good—and no longer wishes to be separated from it. Then he attains the dignity of a son and loves the good for the sake of the good itself—and although he fears, it is because he loves. This is the great and perfect fear.

24. St. David the Prophet also describes this gradual process in the following words: “Turn away from evil and do good; seek peace and pursue it” (Ps. 33: 15). “Turn away,” he says, from “evil”—that is, avoid all evil in general; turn away from every deed that leads to sin. But having said this, he did not stop there; rather, he added: “and do good.” For it happens that some do no evil, yet they do no good either; for example, they do not wrong others, yet they do not show mercy, or they do not hate, yet they do not love. Having said this, he continues logically: “Seek peace and pursue it.” He did not merely say, “Seek,” but “strive earnestly for it, so that you may attain it.”—Pay close attention with your mind to these words, and note the subtlety observed by the Saint. — When someone is granted the grace to turn away from evil and then, with God’s help, diligently does good, the enemy’s attacks will immediately arise against him—and he strives, labors, and is distressed, at times fearing to return to evil like a slave, and at other times hoping for a reward for his good deeds like a hired hand. But while enduring attacks from the enemy, fighting against him, and resisting him—driven by these impulses—he does good, yet with great sorrow and great effort. But when he receives help from God and gains some skill in doing good, then he sees peace, then he feels peace, then he understands what the sorrowful struggle means, and what the joy and gladness of peace are. — And only then does he begin to seek peace, striving earnestly for it, so that he may attain it, possess it fully, and establish it within himself. But whoever has attained this measure finally tastes the blessedness of the peacemakers (Matt. 5:9).—And from this point on, who can move this soul to do good for any reason other than the enjoyment of that very good? It is then that such a person comes to know perfect fear.

25. The Fathers have said that a person acquires the fear of God if he keeps death and the torments of the afterlife in mind—if every evening he examines himself to see how he spent the day, and every morning, how the night passed—if he is not presumptuous, and finally, if he maintains close fellowship with a person who fears God. For they say that a certain brother asked an elder: “What must I do, Father, to fear God?” The elder replied to him: “Go and live with a person who fears God—and by the very fact that he fears God, he will teach you to fear God as well.” — We drive the fear of God away from ourselves by doing the exact opposite of what has been said: we have neither a remembrance of death nor a remembrance of torment—we do not pay attention to ourselves or examine how we spend our time—but we live carelessly and associate with people who do not fear God—and we become presumptuous. And this last point is the worst of all: it is utter ruin; for nothing so drives the fear of God from the soul as insolence. Abba Agathon was once asked about it, and he said: “Insolence is like a strong, scorching wind from which, when it blows, everyone flees, and which spoils every fruit on the trees.”—May God deliver us from this all-destructive passion—insolence.

26. Presumption takes many forms: one can be presumptuous in word, gesture, and gaze. Because of presumption, some fall into idle talk, speak worldly things, act in a ridiculous manner, and provoke others to indecent laughter. Insolence is also when someone touches another without need, reaches out to someone who is laughing, pushes someone, snatches something from their hands, or stares shamelessly at someone: all this is caused by insolence, and all this stems from the absence of the fear of God in the soul—and from this, a person gradually descends into complete carelessness. — That is why God, when He gave the commandments of the Law, said: “The children of Israel shall be reverent” (Lev. 15: 31); for without reverence and modest modesty (shyness), a person neither honors God Himself nor keeps any of the commandments. That is why there is nothing more harmful than audacity—and that is why it is the mother of all passions, for it drives out reverence, banishes the fear of God from the soul, and gives birth to carelessness.

27. Abba John, a disciple of Abba Barsanuphius, was in the habit of repeating the following four sayings—sometimes one, sometimes another—when dismissing the brothers who came to see him: “By keeping a clear conscience toward one’s neighbor, humility is born; — one must never prefer one’s own will to that of one’s brother; — flee from all that is human, and you will be saved; — ‘Bear one another’s burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ’ (Gal. 6:2).” — Each time he prefaced these sayings with words such as: “I once said, brother—may God preserve love—the fathers said,” and after that he would add one of his own sayings.

28. In any task that comes your way—even if it is extremely necessary and requires careful attention—I do not want you to carry it out with hesitation or confusion. But be assured that every task you undertake—whether great or small—is one-eighth of the goal; and maintaining your composure, even if this means failing to complete the task, is seven-eighths. Therefore, if you undertake a task and wish to fulfill it completely and entirely, strive not only to carry out the task itself—which, as I said, is one-eighth of the goal—but also to preserve your composure intact—which constitutes seven-eighths. But if, in order to carry out the work of your service, it becomes necessary to get carried away and harm yourself or another by arguing with them, then you should not lose seven-eighths just to preserve one-eighth.

29. The wise Solomon says in Proverbs: “Those who lack guidance fall like leaves; but salvation lies in the multitude of counsel” (Prov. 11:14). Do you see what Holy Scripture teaches us? It exhorts us not to rely on ourselves, not to consider ourselves all-knowing, not to believe that we can govern ourselves, for we need help; we need those who instruct us according to God. There are none more wretched or closer to ruin than those who have no guide on the path of God. For what does this mean: “Those who have no guidance fall like leaves”? A leaf is always green, blooming, and beautiful at first, but then it gradually withers, falls, and is finally trampled underfoot. So too, a person who is guided by no one is at first always zealous for fasting, vigil, silence, obedience, and other virtues; but then this zeal gradually cools, and since he has no one to instruct him, support him, or rekindle this zeal within him, it imperceptibly withers, falls, and finally becomes a slave to his enemies, who then do with him as they please.

30. Concerning those who lay bare their thoughts and actions and do everything after consultation, the Wise One says: “Salvation lies in the counsel of many.” He does not say, “In the counsel of many”—meaning that we should consult with everyone—but that we should consult on everything—of course, with those we trust—and not in such a way that we say one thing while concealing another, but by revealing everything and seeking counsel on all matters; for such a person, true salvation lies “in the counsel of many.”

31. When we do not reveal our thoughts and intentions and do not seek the counsel of the experienced, then we cling to our own will and follow our own justifications (that is, what we ourselves consider righteous). And then, while seemingly doing a good deed, we set traps for ourselves and perish without even realizing it. For how can we comprehend God’s will, or surrender ourselves fully to it, if we trust in ourselves and cling to our own will?—That is why Abba Pimen said that “our will is a wall of bronze between man and God.”

32. For the one who trusts his own mind and surrenders to his own will, the enemy sets a trap as he pleases. But for the one who does everything by counsel, the enemy has no access. That is why he hates both questioning and instruction regarding himself; he hates the very voice, the very sound of such words. And shall I say why?—Because he knows that his malice will be immediately exposed as soon as people begin to ask questions and speak of what is beneficial. And he fears nothing more than being recognized, because then he can no longer scheme as he pleases. When someone asks for and hears advice from someone experienced: “Do this, but don’t do that,” or “Now is not the time for this,” and sometimes, “Now is the time”; then the devil cannot find a way to harm him or bring him down, because he always seeks counsel and protects himself from all sides—and thus the saying is fulfilled in him: “Salvation lies in the multitude of counsel.”

33. The enemy loves those who rely on their own reason; for they help him and weave their own snares. I know of no other cause of a monk’s downfall except when he trusts his own heart. Some say that a person falls because of this or that; but I know of no other fall except when a person follows his own will. If you see someone who has fallen, know that he followed his own will. There is nothing more dangerous, nothing more ruinous than this.

34. I always tell you that it is through small indulgences that we come to commit grave sins. What is worse than sin—condemning one’s neighbor? What does God hate so much, and from what does He turn away so strongly? And yet a person falls into such a great evil from something seemingly trivial—from allowing oneself to take even a slight offense at one’s neighbor. For when this is permitted, the mind begins to ignore its own sins and to notice the sins of others. And from this (from the habit of doing so) arise gossip, reproaches, slander—and finally—destructive condemnation. But nothing angers God so much, nothing so strips a person of grace and leads to ruin as reproaching, slandering, and condemning one’s neighbor.

35. It is one thing to slander, and another to condemn or belittle. To slander means to say about someone: “So-and-so lied,” or “committed adultery,” or “became angry,” or “did something else that was not good.” This is someone who slandered his brother—that is, spoke passionately about his sin. But to condemn means to say: “So-and-so is a liar, a fornicator, or quick-tempered.” This is someone who condemned the very disposition of his soul, passed judgment on his entire life by saying that he is such-and-such, and condemned him as such—and this is a grave transgression.

36. The Pharisee, praying and giving thanks to God for his virtues, did not lie but spoke the truth, and he was not condemned for that: for we ought to thank God when we are enabled to do something good, because He helped and assisted us in it. He was not condemned for this; nor was he condemned for saying, “I am not like other men.” But when, turning to the tax collector, he said, “or like this tax collector,” then he was condemned (himself for condemning another). For he condemned the very person, the very disposition of his soul, his entire life. That is why the tax collector went out justified more than he did (Luke 18:11).

37. It belongs to God alone to justify or condemn, since He knows the disposition of each person’s soul, as well as their strength, aspirations, and gifts, their physical constitution, and their abilities—and in accordance with this, He justly condemns or justifies each one. For who can truly know all these things except the One who created all and is all-knowing?

38. Sometimes we not only condemn but also humiliate our neighbor; for there is a difference between condemning and humiliating. Humiliation occurs when a person not only condemns but also despises another—loathing them and turning away from them as from some abomination: this is worse than condemnation and far more destructive.

39. Those who wish to be saved do not pay attention to the faults of others, but always look at their own and prosper. Such was the man who, seeing that his brother had sinned, sighed and said, “Woe is me! Just as he has sinned today, so will I sin tomorrow.” Do you see the wise disposition of the soul? How did he immediately find a way to avoid condemning his brother? For by saying, “So will I tomorrow,” he instilled in himself fear and concern that he, too, might sin before long—and thus avoided condemning his neighbor. Moreover, he was not satisfied with this, but also cast himself at his feet, saying, “And this one will repent of his sin, but I will not repent as I ought; I will not attain repentance; I will be powerless to repent.” Do you see the enlightenment of the divine soul?

40. It happens that the poison of condemnation, having overflowed our soul, seeks to pour out onto others as well. And so, when we meet another brother, who is peaceful toward all, we rush to tell him: “This and that happened”—and we cause him harm by planting the sin of condemnation in his heart. We do not fear the words: “Woe to him who leads his friend astray with murky corruption” (Habakkuk 2:15); yet we commit a demonic deed and are heedless of it. For whose work is it to confuse and harm, if not that of demons? And so we find ourselves acting as the demons’ accomplices, leading both ourselves and our neighbor to ruin. Why is this so? Because there is no love within us. For “love covers a multitude of sins” (1 Peter 4:8).

41. The saints do not condemn the sinner nor turn away from him, but have compassion on him, grieve for him, admonish him, comfort him, heal him as a sick member, and do everything to save him. – What did St. Ammon do when the brothers came and said to him in confusion, “Go and see, Father, is there a woman in such-and-such a brother’s cell?” What mercy did he show? Realizing that the brother had hidden a woman under a barrel, he went and sat on it, and ordered them to search the entire cell. When they found nothing, he said to them, “May God forgive you.” Thus he put them to shame and did them a great service, teaching them not to believe accusations against their neighbor too readily; and he corrected that brother, not only by covering for him in a godly manner but also by instructing him when the time was right. For, having sent everyone out, he took him by the hand and said to him, “Think of your soul, brother!”—This brother was immediately ashamed, was moved to repentance, and put an end to his sin. Thus, the elder’s love for humanity and compassion had a beneficial effect on his soul.

42. Imagine a circle, with its center at the middle, and radii—beams—extending from the center. The farther these radii extend from the center, the more they diverge and move away from one another; conversely, the closer they approach the center, the closer they come to one another. Now suppose that this circle is the world, the very center of the circle is God, and the straight lines (radii) extending from the center to the circumference, or from the circumference to the center, are the paths of human life. And here, too, the same applies. To the extent that the saints enter the circle toward its center, desiring to draw near to God, to that extent, as they enter, they draw nearer both to God and to one another; and moreover, in such a way that to the extent they draw near to God, they also draw near to one another, and to the extent they draw near to one another, they also draw near to God. – Understand the same principle regarding separation. When they turn away from God and turn toward the external, it is evident that to the extent that they depart from the center and move away from God, to that same extent they also move away from one another—and to the extent that they move away from one another, to that extent they also move away from God. Such is the nature of love: but to the extent that we remain outside and do not love God, to that extent each of us is also distant from our neighbor. If, however, we love God, then to the extent that we draw near to God through our love for Him, to that extent we are united in love with our neighbors; and to the extent that we are united with our neighbors, to that extent we are also united with God.

43. Why is it that sometimes, when someone hears an insulting remark, they pay no attention to it and take it in stride, as if they hadn’t heard it at all, while at other times, as soon as they hear it, they are immediately embarrassed? Why does this happen? Here is why they are not embarrassed: first, it happens that after prayer or a good spiritual exercise, a person is in a good frame of mind, and therefore is forgiving toward his brother and is not embarrassed by his words; it also happens that some have a great fondness for someone, and therefore bear everything that person inflicts upon them without distress; it also happens that some despise the one who wishes to insult them and do not take offense at his insults. – But people are troubled by the opposite of this—either because they are not in a good frame of mind, or because they harbor animosity toward the one who has insulted them—and for other reasons as well. – Yet the main cause of all such distress is that we do not reproach ourselves.

44. Abba Pimen said: “Wherever one who reproaches himself may go, whatever harm, dishonor, or other sorrow may befall him, he already considers himself worthy of every unpleasant thing and is never troubled. Is there anything more carefree than such a state?”...

45. Someone might say: If a brother insults me, and I, upon examining myself, find that I gave him no cause for it, how can I reproach myself? – In truth, if anyone examines himself with the fear of God, he will find that he has given cause in every way—whether by deed, word, or appearance; and if it does not turn out that he has given any cause at the present time, then he has certainly offended him at some other time, either in this matter or in another, or perhaps he has offended another brother and should have suffered for it—or often for some other sin. That is why I say that if anyone examines himself with the fear of God and rigorously examines his conscience, he will certainly find himself guilty and reproach himself.

46. It happens that someone, sitting in silent seclusion, remains at peace. But then a brother comes, and in the course of conversation says something unpleasant, and he is immediately thrown into confusion—and later says, “If he had not come to me and disturbed me, I would not have sinned.” – What a ridiculous line of reasoning! Did the one who spoke those words to him instill that passion within him? He merely brought to the surface what was already within him;—and now he must not grieve over his brother, but repent of his passion, reproaching himself. Such a person is like rotten bread, which looks good on the outside but is moldy on the inside, and when someone breaks it open, its rottenness is revealed—or like a clean vessel that is full of stench and foul odor inside, and when someone opens it, its stench is immediately noticeable. So this man remained, as it seemed to him, at peace, unaware that the passion was within him; the brother spoke a single word to him and revealed the rot hidden within him. Therefore, if he wishes to be forgiven, let him repent, reproaching himself. Only by this path will he attain purity and prosper. He must also thank that brother for having brought him such benefit.

47. As the soul commits sin, it grows weary from it; for sin weakens and wears down the one who gives himself over to it; and therefore everything that befalls him weighs him down. But if a person prospers in goodness, then as he prospers, what was once heavy becomes lighter for him.

48. In any case, we must look upon suffering. Whether someone does us good or we suffer evil at the hands of another, we must view it as suffering and thank God for everything that happens to us, always reproaching ourselves and saying that if something good happens to us, it is the work of God’s merciful providence toward us, and if something evil happens, it is because of our sins.

49. Wretched are we, who sin daily and indulge our passions! We have abandoned the righteous path shown to us by the fathers—the path of self-reproach—and are walking the crooked path of reproaching our neighbor. And each of us strives in every matter to shift the blame onto our brother and lay the entire burden upon him; each is lazy and does not keep a single commandment, yet demands that our neighbor fulfill all the commandments.

50. Where is that elder who, when asked, “What is the most important thing you have found on this path, Father?” replied, “To reproach oneself in everything?” Likewise, Abba Pimen said with a sigh, “All virtues have entered this house, but without one virtue it is difficult for a person to stand firm.” “What virtue is that?” they asked him. He replied, “That a person should reproach himself.” And St. Anthony said, “It is a great deed to take upon oneself one’s sins before the face of God—and to expect temptation until one’s last breath.” And everywhere we find that our fathers found peace because, having entrusted everything—even the smallest thing—to God, they always observed this rule: to reproach themselves in all things.

51. The Fathers said that it is not proper for monks to become angry or to insult anyone, and furthermore: “Whoever has overcome irritability has overcome the demons, but whoever is overcome by this passion is entirely alien to the monastic life,” and so on. “What, then, are we to say about ourselves, when we not only give in to irritability and anger but also harbor grudges? What are we to do but lament such a pitiful and inhuman state (of our souls)? Let us, however, take heed of ourselves, brothers, and strive, with God’s help, to rid ourselves of the bitterness of this destructive passion.”

52. Disagreements and grievances often arise among brothers, but they usually hasten to settle these quarrels and make peace. It happens, however, that some, even after bowing in reconciliation, continue to grieve over their brother and harbor ill will toward him. This is resentment—and it requires great care lest one become entrenched in it and perish. Whoever has reconciled immediately after becoming angry has healed his anger, but has not yet struggled against resentment—and therefore continues to harbor resentment toward his brother. For resentment is one thing, anger another, irritability yet another, and confusion yet another. To help you understand this better, I will give an example. Whoever kindles a fire first takes a small ember: this is the word of the brother who inflicted the insult. If you endure that word, you have extinguished the ember. But if you think, “Why did he say that? Since that’s the case, I’ll say such-and-such to him; if he hadn’t wanted to insult me, he wouldn’t have said that—so I’ll insult him too—without fail”—then you have added kindling, or something similar, just as one who stokes a fire does, and produced smoke, which is agitation. Confusion is that very movement and agitation of thoughts that stirs up and irritates the heart. And irritation is a vengeful rebellion against the one who has grieved you, which turns into insolence, as Blessed Abba Mark said: “Malice, nourished by thoughts, irritates the heart; but prayer kills it.” If you had taken a brother’s slight remark to heart, you would have extinguished that small ember before confusion arose. – However, even that, if you wish, you can easily extinguish while it is still fresh—through silence, prayer, or a single bow from the heart. – But if you continue to smolder—that is, to irritate and agitate your heart with thoughts like, “Why does he... so should I...”—then your heart will flare up, and a fever of irritability will arise. – If you wish, you can extinguish this as well before anger takes hold. But if you continue to agitate and irritate yourself, you will be like a person adding wood to a fire, which produces a fiery flame—and this is anger. And anger, if it becomes entrenched, turns into resentment, from which a person cannot free themselves unless they shed their own blood (through sweat and self-discipline).

53. You have heard what initial confusion is, what irritability is, what anger is, and what rancor is. Do you see how a single word can lead to such evil? For if you had first rebuked yourself, patiently endured your brother’s words, and refused to take revenge on him—or to respond to one word with two or five words, or to repay evil with evil—you would have been freed from all these evils. That is why I say to you: always cut off your passions while they are still young, before they take root, become entrenched within you, and begin to weigh you down; for then you will have to suffer greatly from them. It is one thing to pull up a small blade of grass, and quite another to uproot a large tree.

54. One can repay evil with evil not only by deed, but also by word and gesture. Some think that they do not actually repay evil with evil, but it turns out that they do so by word, or gesture, or movement, or glance; for by all these things one can offend one’s brother—and this, too, is repaying evil with evil. Another, however, makes no effort to take revenge for the wrong done to him—neither by deed, nor by word, nor by appearance, nor by gesture—but harbors resentment toward his brother in his heart and grieves over him. Still another, though he does not grieve over his brother, if he hears that someone has insulted that brother in any way, or that he has been scolded or humiliated—and rejoices at it—then he, too, is found to be repaying evil with evil in his heart. Another harbors no malice in his heart and does not rejoice upon hearing of the humiliation of the one who insulted him; indeed, he even grieves if that person is insulted. Yet he does not rejoice in the other’s prosperity either—for example, when he sees that person being praised and flattered, he grieves; and this, too, is a form of resentment, albeit the mildest.

55. Another person, if someone happens to insult him, and they bow to one another and reconcile, lives in peace with that person and harbors no ill will toward him in his heart; but when, after some time, that person happens to say something distressing to him again, he begins to recall the past and is troubled not only by the second incident but also by the first. – This is like a man who has a wound and has applied a bandage to it; although the wound has now healed and closed over, the spot is still tender; and if someone throws a stone at him, that spot is injured more than any other part of the body and immediately begins to bleed. The same thing happens to that person: he had a wound, and he applied a bandage—that is, he bowed his head and healed the wound, that is, his anger, through reconciliation; he also began to strengthen himself against resentment, striving not to harbor a single evil thought in his heart. This means that the wound is healing; but it has not yet completely healed—there is still a remnant of resentment, from which the wound can easily reopen if the person suffers even a slight injury.

56. One must strive—to completely purge the inner pus as well, so that the sore spot may heal completely, and so that no disfigurement remains and it is impossible to tell that there was ever a wound in that place. How, then, can this be achieved?—By praying with all one’s heart for the one who has offended and saying: “God, help my brother and me for the sake of his prayers!” – By praying in this way for his brother, he shows compassion and love; and by asking for help for himself through his brother’s prayers, he humbles himself. And where there is compassion, love, and humility, what room is there for irritability, resentment, or any other passion? – And Abba Zosima said: “Even if the devil were to employ all the wiles of his malice along with all his demons, all his schemes would be nullified and crushed by humility according to Christ’s commandment.” And another elder said: “He who prays for his enemy will not be vindictive.”

57. Put the elders’ advice into practice, and then you will truly understand what they are saying; if you do not put it into practice, you can never learn the way of asceticism from words alone. What person, desiring to learn a craft, masters it from words alone? No; first he works and makes mistakes, works and destroys his creation; and so, little by little, through toil and patience, he learns the craft, with the help of God, who watches over his labor and his will. Yet we want to learn the art of arts through words alone, without getting down to work. Is that even possible?!—Let us, then, be mindful of ourselves and labor diligently while we still have time.

58. We must be vigilant in every way so as not to be robbed by lies, for the liar is not united with God. Lies are foreign to God. Scripture says that “lies are from the devil,” that he “is a liar and the father of lies” (John 8:44). Behold, the devil is called the father of lies, while God is the Truth; for He Himself says, “I am the way, the truth, and the life” (John 14:6). See from Whom we separate ourselves and with whom we unite ourselves through falsehood!—Therefore, if we truly wish to be saved, we must love the truth with all our strength and all our zeal and guard ourselves against every falsehood, lest it separate us from the truth and from life.

59. There are three different kinds of lies: one lies in thought, another lies in word, and yet another lies through his very way of life. – One lies in thought who accepts his own assumptions as truth—that is, empty suspicions about his neighbor; for example, when he sees someone talking with his brother, he makes his own conjectures: “He’s saying something about me”—and the like. – Such a person lies in thought; for he speaks nothing true, but only according to his own opinion, and from this arise slander, gossip, enmity, and condemnation. – In short, one lies who, for example, being too lazy to get up for prayer, does not say, “Forgive me, I was too lazy to get up,” but says, “I had a fever, I was unwell,” and invents dozens of lies—so as not to make a single bow or humble himself. Likewise, if he desires something, he will not say directly, “I desire this,” but twists his words, citing now an illness, now a need—and lies until his desire is satisfied. Eventually, people stop believing him, even when he speaks the truth. —He who lies with his very life is the one who, being a fornicator, pretends to be chaste; or, being greedy, presents himself as merciful; or, being arrogant, puts on the appearance of humility.

60. Let us take care of ourselves. Who will give us this time if we waste it in vain? Truly, there will come a time when we will long for these days and not find them. Abba Arsenius always said to himself, “Arsenius, why did you leave the world?”

61. If we were willing to make even a little effort, we would not grieve so much nor experience such difficulties. For if anyone compels himself to make efforts, by continuing to strive, he progresses little by little and then practices virtue with ease; for God, seeing that he compels himself, grants him help. Let us, then, compel ourselves; for although we have not yet attained perfection, if we strive, we will receive help through our striving, and with this help we will acquire every kind of virtue. That is why one of the Fathers said, “Give your blood and receive the Spirit,” that is, strive, and you will gain proficiency in virtue.

62. Just as one who wishes to learn carpentry does not engage in any other craft, so too those who wish to learn the spiritual way should concern themselves with nothing else but to study day and night how to acquire it. However, there must be a measure to everything. One of the elders said: “Walk the royal path and count the stages (versts).” For virtues are the middle ground between excess and deficiency. That is why it is said in Scripture: “Do not turn to the right or to the left, but walk the royal path” (Deut. 5:32; 17:11).

63. Evil in and of itself is nothing, for it is not a being of any kind and has no composition. But the soul, having strayed from virtue, becomes passionate and gives birth to sin, and then suffers, finding no natural rest in it. Does a tree, by its very nature, have worms inside it? But a little rot sets in; from this rot a worm is born—and this very worm devours the tree. So too does the soul itself produce evil—and again suffers from evil itself, as Gregory the Theologian said: “Fire is the product of matter; and it devours matter, just as evil devours the wicked.”

64. We see the same thing in physical illness: when someone lives disorderly and does not take care of their health, an excess or deficiency of something occurs in the body, and from this the person subsequently becomes ill; but before this, there was no illness at all, and it never was anything; and again, once the body is healed, the illness no longer exists at all. In exactly the same way, evil is an ailment of the soul that has been deprived of the health proper to it and inherent in its nature, which is virtue.

65. There are three states in a person: he either acts on his passion, resists it, or eradicates it. The one who acts on passion is the one who carries it out and indulges it. The one who resists it is the one who does not act on it and does not cut it off, but prudently avoids the passion, as it were, yet still harbors it within. And the one who eradicates passion is the one who strives and acts against it.

66. One who acts on passion is like a man who, struck by his enemy's arrows, takes them and thrusts them into his own heart with his own hands. One who resists passion is like a man showered with his enemy's arrows but clad in armor, and therefore unharmed. And the one who uproots passion is like one who, while being showered with arrows by his enemy, shatters them or returns them to the enemy's heart, as it is said in the Psalm: "Let their weapons pierce their own hearts, and let their bows be shattered."

67. One brother lay feverish for seven days, and now another forty days have passed, yet he still finds no strength within himself. "This humble one was ill for seven days"—but how many days have passed since then, and he still has not recovered? So it is with the soul: sometimes one sins only a little, but how long does one then spend shedding one's own blood before being set right?

68. We see our brothers being taken from our midst, yet we do not pay attention to ourselves, even though we know that we, too, are gradually drawing near to death. Let us, then, pay attention to ourselves, and while there is still time, let us not waste it in vain. How can we forget the words of that elder who said that if anyone loses gold or silver, he may find another in its place; but if we lose time by living in idleness and laziness, we will not be able to find another to replace what we have lost. Truly, we will seek even a single hour of this time and will not find it.

69. A great elder was walking with his disciples in a certain place where there were various cypress trees, both large and small. The elder said to one of his disciples, "Pull up this cypress." The cypress was small, and the brother immediately pulled it up with one hand. The elder pointed to another one, larger than the first, and said, "Pull this one up as well." The brother shook it with both hands and pulled it out. The elder pointed to another one, even larger. He pulled that one out as well, but with great difficulty. Then the elder pointed to yet another, even larger one. With the greatest effort—first shaking it vigorously, laboring and sweating—the brother finally pulled this one out as well. Finally, the elder showed him an even larger cypress tree. But the brother, though he labored hard and sweated over it, could not pull it out. The elder, seeing that he could not do it alone, told another brother to help him. And the two of them barely managed to pull it out. "Then the elder said to his disciples: 'So it is with passions; while they are small, we can easily uproot them if we wish; but if we treat them as if they were small, they grow stronger, and the stronger they become, the more effort they demand of us; and when they become deeply rooted within us, then even with great effort we cannot uproot them from ourselves on our own, unless we receive help from certain saints who assist us through God.'"

70. The prophet says to the daughter of Babylon: "Blessed is he who seizes and dashes your infants against the rock" (Ps. 136:9).—The daughter of Babylon is a symbol of all that is sinful and opposed to God. Her offspring are passionate thoughts and deeds. Blessed is the one who does not accept the wicked thoughts that arise within him, and does not allow them room to grow within himself and bring evil to fruition; but while they are still small, and before they take root and rise up against him, he strives in every way to crush them against the rock of unshakable resolve, and to destroy them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

71. The Fathers have shown us how a person should gradually purify himself: every evening he should examine himself to see how he spent the day, and again in the morning, to see how he spent the night, and repent before God for whatever sins he may have committed. As for us, since we sin so much, it is truly necessary—because of our forgetfulness—to examine ourselves even after six hours have passed, to see how we spent our time and in what ways we have sinned.

72. Whoever examines himself in this way will find that evil begins to diminish little by little—and if he committed nine transgressions, he will commit eight;—and thus, progressing gradually with God's help, he will not allow passions to take root within him. It is a great misfortune to fall into the habit of any passion.

73. It is not the one who has become angry once who is already called angry—nor is the one who has committed fornication once called a fornicator—nor is the one who has shown mercy once called merciful; but in both virtue and vice, through frequent practice in them, the soul acquires a habit, and then this habit either torments or soothes it. Virtue brings peace: for the more good we do, the greater our habit of virtue becomes, and through this we regain our natural disposition and return to our original well-being. But vice torments us: because through it we acquire a habit that is foreign and hostile to our nature, and which destroys it.

74. If an eagle is entirely outside the net but becomes entangled in it with just one talon, this small detail is enough to render it powerless—and the hunter can seize it whenever he wishes. So it is with the soul: if it allows even a single passion to become a habit, the enemy can bring it down whenever he pleases, since, because of that passion, it is in his hands. Do not, then, allow any passion to become a habit for you, but strive and pray to God day and night so that you may not fall into temptation. But if, as human beings, we are overcome and fall into sin, let us strive to rise up immediately, repent of it, weep before God's goodness, and remain vigilant and diligent. And God, seeing our good will, our humility, and our contrition, will extend a helping hand to us and show us mercy.

75. We must bring everything that happens before God and say: nothing happens without God's will; God knows that this or that is good and beneficial, and that is why it happens this way. Of all that God creates, there is nothing that is not good, but "everything was very good" (Gen. 1:31). Therefore, no one should grieve over what happens, but should lift it up to God and find peace. There are some people who are so overwhelmed by the sorrows that befall them that they renounce life itself and consider death sweet, just to be rid of their sorrows; but this stems from cowardice and great foolishness. They do not know the terrible need that awaits us when the soul departs from the body.

76. A very zealous brother asked a certain elder, "Why does my soul long for death?" The elder replied, "Because you do not want to endure the sorrows you are facing, not knowing that the sorrows to come are far heavier than those here."—And another brother also asked the elder, "Why do I fall into carelessness while in my cell?" And he said to him, "Because you have not yet come to know either the rest that awaits you or the future torment. For if you truly knew this, even if your cell were full of worms, so that you stood in them up to your neck, you would endure this without slacking off". But we, while asleep, wish to be saved, and therefore we languish in sorrows; whereas we ought to thank God and consider ourselves blessed that we are deemed worthy to suffer a little here, so that we may find no small peace there.

77. Evagrius said: "Whoever gives in to passions and prays to God to die quickly is like a sick person who begs a carpenter to quickly chop up his bed (on which he nevertheless found some comfort in his suffering). For while in this body, the soul finds relief from its passions and a certain comfort: here a person eats, drinks, sleeps, converses, and socializes with his friends. But when the soul leaves the body, it is left alone with its passions, and therefore is always tormented by them; consumed by them, it is scorched by their fire—and is so tormented by them that it cannot even remember God. This remembrance of God could comfort the soul, as it is said in the Psalm: "I remembered God and was glad" (Ps. 76:4); but its passions do not allow it to do so.

78. From the sufferings here on earth, you can gain some understanding of what the torment there is like. When, for example, someone has a fever, what is it that burns him? What kind of fire causes this burning? So too, the passionate soul is always tormented there by its evil habits, bearing bitter memories and agonizing impressions of the passions that ceaselessly burn and inflame it.

79. Who, moreover, can recall without horror the dreadful places of torment—the fire, the darkness, the merciless servants of the tormentors, and other torments mentioned in Scripture: living alongside demons, for whom alone the fire of that place is prepared (Matt. 25:41)? – And how crushing and deadly is the very shame of condemnation alone? St. Chrysostom says: "Even if there were no river of fire flowing and no terrifying angels standing by, but only all people were summoned to judgment—and some, receiving praise, were glorified, while others were sent away in disgrace, so that they might not see the glory of God— would not the punishment of that shame and disgrace, and the sorrow of being deprived of such blessings, be more terrible than any Gehenna?"—

80. Let us therefore strive to purify ourselves, so that we may be spared such a calamity. Effort is certainly required: let us labor, that we may find mercy. If someone who owns a field leaves it neglected, will it not become overgrown?—And will it not be filled with thorns and thistles all the more the longer he neglects it? And when he later wants to clear his field of all the weeds he allowed to grow during his neglect, will his hands not be all the more bloodied the more he has let it go to ruin?—For he must not merely cut the weeds but pull them out by the roots; otherwise, they will all grow back, no matter how much he cuts them. So it is with our soul. When we are negligent toward it, it becomes overgrown with all manner of evil weeds of the passions; but when, having come to our senses, we set about cleansing it, painful labor is inevitable: for we must not only abstain from passionate deeds, but also uproot the very habits of passion. Yet there is nothing worse than a passionate habit. “It is no small feat,” says St. Basil the Great, “to overcome a bad habit, for a habit, having taken root over a long period of time, often acquires the strength of nature.”

81. We must not only cut off the passions but also their causes; then we must thoroughly fertilize the soil of our character with repentance and tears—and only then begin to sow the good seed, that is, good deeds. For just as it is with a field—if, after it has been cleared and fertilized, good seed is not sown in it, then weeds sprout and, finding the soil loose and soft from the clearing, take deeper root in it: so it is with a person: if, having repented of his past deeds and corrected his character, he does not strive to acquire virtues, then what is said in the Gospel about the return of an unclean spirit to its former dwelling—now cleansed and swept, along with seven other spirits—as a result of which that person ends up worse off than before (Matt. 12:44).

82. Everyone who desires to be saved must not only refrain from doing evil but is also obligated to do good, as it is said in the Psalm: “Turn away from evil and do good” (Ps. 33). For example, if someone was quick to anger, they must not only refrain from getting angry but also acquire meekness; if someone was proud, they must not only refrain from pride but also become humble. For every passion has a virtue that is its opposite: pride—humility, stinginess—charity, fornication—chastity, cowardice—patience, anger—meekness, hatred—love.

83. Just as we once cast out the virtues and accepted passions in their place, so now we must strive not only to cast out the passions but also to establish the virtues within ourselves in their stead. We naturally possess within ourselves the virtues given to us by God. For God, in the very act of creating man, instilled in him all the virtues, as He said: “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness” (Gen. 1: 26). It is said, “in our image”—because God created the soul to be immortal and free—and “after our likeness” refers to virtue—as if to say, “Be holy, for I am holy” (1 Peter 1:16). Consequently, virtues are natural to us; but passions do not belong to our nature, but are introduced into it—namely, when the soul gives itself over to self-indulgence, it then strays from virtue and harbors passions within itself.

84. Abba Pimen spoke well when he said that a monk’s progress is revealed in temptations: for a monk who truly “sets out to serve the Lord” must “prepare his soul for temptation” (Sir. 2:1)—so that he may never be astonished or confused by anything that happens to him, believing that nothing happens without God’s Providence. And whatever is part of God’s Providence is entirely good and serves the benefit of the soul; for everything God does, He does for our benefit, loving and having mercy on us. And we must, as the Apostle said, “give thanks for everything” (Eph. 5: 20; 1 Thess. 5:18) for His goodness, and never grieve or lose heart over what has happened to us, but accept everything that befalls us without confusion, with humility and hope in God, believing that whatever God does to us, He does out of His goodness, loving us and for our own good.

85. If anyone has a friend and is certain that the friend loves him, then even when he suffers something at the friend’s hands—even something severe—he thinks that the friend did it out of love, and will never believe that his friend intended to harm him: all the more should we think of God, Who created us, brought us from non-existence into being, became incarnate for our sake, and died for us—that He does everything to us out of His goodness and out of love for us. One might think of a friend: “He does everything out of love and compassion for me (and is always ready to act this way); but he lacks the wisdom to always arrange everything concerning me for the best; hence it happens that he harms me unintentionally. But we cannot say this of God; for He is the source of wisdom, knows everything that is beneficial to us, and accordingly arranges everything concerning us, even the most trivial matters. Again, regarding a friend, we can say that although he loves and cares for us and is wise enough to manage matters concerning us, he is powerless to help us in the very things he intends to benefit us with. But we cannot say even this about God; for all things are possible for Him, and nothing is impossible for Him. In light of all this, we must accept everything that happens to us with gratitude, as coming from God, our Benefactor and gracious Lord, even if it is distressing.

86. If anyone endures a temptation with patience and humility, it will pass without harming him; but if he loses heart, becomes troubled, and blames everyone else, he only burdens himself and gains no benefit, but only harms himself; whereas temptations bring great benefit to the one who endures them without being troubled.

87. We must not be embarrassed even when passion embarrasses us. Why should you, a man of passion, be surprised—and why should you be embarrassed—when passion troubles you? “You yourself have fostered it within yourself; you willingly harbor it within yourself—and yet you are troubled? You have accepted its pledges, and yet you ask, ‘Why does it trouble me?’ Better to endure, to strive, and to pray to God to help you; for it is impossible for one who has indulged in passions to be free from their painful assaults.” Their vessels, as Abba Sisoës said, are within you; give them their pledge, and they will depart from you. Since we have loved them and set them in motion, it is impossible for us not to be captivated by passionate thoughts that compel us, even against our will, to act on our passions; for we have voluntarily surrendered ourselves into their hands.

88. Whoever is assailed by passionate thoughts before acting on them is still in his own city; he is free and has God as his helper. For as soon as he humbles himself before God in this matter and struggles a little, God’s help will appear to free him from the assault of passion. But if anyone refuses to struggle and, indulging himself, gives in to carnal pleasure, then God’s help withdraws from him, and the passion draws him into passionate deeds; and this will result in his unwittingly serving that very passion.

89. It is told that when a certain disciple of a great elder was afflicted by a battle against the flesh, and the elder, seeing his struggles, said to him, “If you wish, I will pray to God that He may ease this battle for you,” the disciple replied: “Although it is hard and difficult for me, Father, I see within myself the fruit of my labor; therefore, pray to God that He may grant me patience.” The elder said to him in response, “Now I know that you are prospering and surpassing me.” Such are those who truly desire salvation! And this is what it means to bear the yoke of temptation with humility!

90. When God sent Moses to deliver the Israelites from Egypt and from Pharaoh’s bondage, Pharaoh then burdened them even more with labor. So too, when the devil sees that God has taken pity on a soul and is ready to have mercy on it and relieve it of the burden of passions, he burdens it even more with passions and fights against it more fiercely. But the fathers, knowing this, strengthen a person with their teaching and do not allow him to give in to fear. “Be strong, and let your heart take courage, all you who hope in the Lord” (Ps. 30:25).

91. The fear of God prompts the soul to keep the commandments, and through the commandments the house of the soul is built. Let us therefore fear God and build houses for ourselves, so that we may find shelter during winter, rain, lightning, and thunder, for those without a house suffer great hardship in winter.

92. We can learn how to build a house of the soul by observing the construction of a physical house. One who builds a house erects walls on all four sides, rather than focusing on just one wall; otherwise, he will waste his expenses and labor in vain. Likewise, a person who wishes to build a spiritual house must not neglect any aspect of his edifice, but must erect it evenly and in harmony. This is what Abba John meant when he said, “I want a person to acquire a little of every virtue every day”—and not as some do, who, clinging to a single virtue and abiding in it, practice only that one and pay no attention to the others.

93. The house of the soul is thus built evenly and harmoniously on all sides in the following manner: First, one must lay the foundation, which is faith; for “without faith it is impossible to please God” (Heb. 11:6). And then, upon this foundation, one must build the structure evenly—namely: if an opportunity for obedience arises, one must lay the stone of obedience; if one encounters grief from a brother, one must lay the stone of long-suffering; if an opportunity for self-control presents itself, one must lay the stone of self-control. Thus, for every virtue for which an opportunity arises, one must lay a stone in the edifice, and in this way build it up from all sides, laying in the edifice now a stone of compassion, now a stone of self-denial, now a stone of meekness, and so on. But in all this, one must take care to cultivate patience and courage: for they are the cornerstones; through them the building is held together and wall is joined to wall, preventing them from leaning or separating from one another. Without patience and courage, no one can practice any virtue. That is why it is said: “By your patience you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19).

94. One who builds a house applies lime to each stone; for if he places one stone upon another without lime, the stones will fall out and the house will collapse. Lime (in the building of the soul) is humility, because it is taken from the earth and lies beneath everyone’s feet. And any virtue practiced without humility is not a virtue. This is also stated in the Father’s Sayings: “Just as a ship cannot be built without nails, so one cannot be saved without humility.” – An ordinary house has a roof. The roof of the spiritual house is love, which constitutes the perfection of virtues, just as the roof of a house is the crowning element of the house. – A railing runs around the roof so that, as the law says (Deut. 22:8), children do not fall from the roof. The railing in the house of the soul consists of sobriety, attentiveness, and prayer; and the children are the thoughts that arise in the soul, which are guarded by sobriety and prayer.

95. But in this work of construction, one more thing is necessary, namely, that the builder be skilled. For if he is not skilled, he may build a crooked wall, and the house will eventually collapse. Skilled is the one who practices virtues wisely; for it happens that some undertake the labor of virtue, but because they perform this labor unwisely, they ruin it themselves or constantly spoil the work; and in this way, they do not complete the building, but only build and destroy.

96. Here is one example among many. If someone fasts either out of vanity or thinking to himself that he is performing some special virtue, then such a person fasts unwisely, and therefore begins afterward to rebuke his brother, considering himself to be something great; and it turns out that not only has he, having laid one stone, removed two, but he is in danger of destroying the entire wall through his condemnation of his neighbor. But whoever fasts wisely does not think he is performing some special virtue, nor does he want to be praised as a faster; but believes that through self-restraint he will attain chastity, and through this he will attain humility, as the Fathers say: “The path to humility consists in bodily labors performed wisely,”—and so on. Such a person proves to be a skilled builder, able to construct his house firmly.

97. Do not be led astray by thoughts that virtue is beyond your strength and unattainable for you; but, inspired by faith, boldly take the first step, show before God your good will and diligence—and you will see the help He will give you to accomplish virtue. – Imagine two staircases—one leading up to heaven, the other down to hell—and you are standing on the ground between them. Do not think or say: “How can I soar from the ground and suddenly find myself at the height of heaven, that is, at the top of the staircase?” Just be careful not to slip down by doing evil; instead, strive to climb upward little by little by doing the good that comes your way. Every good deed will be a step upward. Thus, ascending with God’s help from one step to the next, you will finally reach the top of the ladder.

98. If we seek, we will find, and if we ask, we will receive; for the Gospel says: “Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you” (Matt. 7:7). It is said, “Ask,” so that we may call upon God for help in prayer; and “Seek” means that, having seen how virtue comes and what brings it about, we should accordingly apply our own efforts to acquire it. “Knock” means to fulfill the commandments; for whoever knocks does so with their hands, and the hands signify action. Thus, we must not only ask, but also seek and act, striving, according to the Apostle, “to be ready for every good work” (2 Cor. 9:8; 2 Tim. 3:17)—that is, being fully prepared to wisely fulfill God’s will, as He desires and as is pleasing to Him.

99. The Apostle commanded us to “test what is the will of God—what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom. 12:2)—so that we may then act in accordance with it. —What, then, is God’s good will? —It is to love one another, to be compassionate, to give alms, and the like; this is “God’s good will.” And what is “God’s pleasing will”? Not everyone who does something good does so in a way that is pleasing to God. It happens, for example, that someone finds a poor, beautiful orphan; he is drawn to her because of her beauty—and he takes her in and raises her, both as a poor orphan and as a beautiful girl. This is God’s will and it is “good,” but “not pleasing.” What is “pleasing,” however, is when someone performs an act of mercy not out of any human motive, but for the sake of God, who commanded it, for the sake of goodness itself, and out of pure compassion: this is pleasing to God. – Finally, God’s “perfect” will is when someone performs an act of mercy—not with stinginess, not with laziness, not with contempt—but with all their strength and with all their will, showing mercy as if they themselves were receiving it, and doing good as if they themselves were receiving the benefit: then God’s perfect will is fulfilled. – This is how a person fulfills God’s will—which is good, pleasing, and perfect.

100. There are two kinds of gluttony: the first is when a person seeks pleasant food and does not always want to eat a lot, but desires something tasty; the second is when a person is overcome by gluttony—and does not desire fine food, nor care about its taste, but wants only to eat and eat, without distinguishing what the food is, and concerned only with filling the stomach. The first is called “gluttony of the throat,” and the second, “gluttony of the stomach.” – Whoever wishes to observe a fast for the purification of their sins must avoid both of these forms of gluttony; for they satisfy not the body’s need but its passion, and if anyone indulges in them, it is counted as a sin against them.

101. However, while fasting, we must not only observe the rule regarding food mentioned above, but we must also abstain from every other sin, so that just as we fast with our stomachs, we may also fast with our tongues, refraining from slander, lies, idle talk, belittling our brothers, anger, and every other sin committed with the tongue. We must also fast with our eyes, that is, not look at vain things, not give our eyes free rein, and not look at anyone shamelessly or without fear. Likewise, we must keep our hands and feet from every evil deed.

102. What purpose should we have when we visit one another?—First, we should visit one another out of love; second, in order to hear the Word of God, because the Word of God is better understood among many brothers: what one does not know, another does, and the first, by asking the other, also learns it; finally, to understand the state and condition of our own souls—and to draw examples of conduct from others, as St. Anthony did, learning meekness from one, humility from another, silence from yet another, and in this way gathering within ourselves the virtues of each person we visit.

103. When observing others, one must above all avoid suspicion, from which harmful judgment arises. I have had many experiences confirming the truth that everyone judges others according to their own disposition. Let me give an example. Suppose someone happens to be standing in a certain place at night, and three people walk past him. Upon seeing him, one of them thinks: he is waiting for someone to go and commit fornication; another: he must be a thief; the third: he has arranged with someone from the nearest house to go somewhere together to pray—and is waiting for that person. So three people saw the same man in the same place, yet they did not form the same opinion of him; one thought one thing, another thought another, and the third thought yet another—and evidently each according to his own state of mind. Just as bodies that are melancholic and emaciated transform every food they consume into poor-quality fluids, even if the food is wholesome, so too does a soul of a bad disposition derive harm from every thing, even if the things it encounters are good. But one with a good disposition is like someone with a robust constitution, in whom, even if he eats something harmful, it is transformed into wholesome juices. Likewise, if we have a good disposition and are in a good state of mind, we can derive benefit from every thing, even if that thing is not in itself beneficial.

104. I heard of a certain brother who, when he came to visit a fellow brother and saw that his cell was not swept or tidied, would say to himself: “Blessed is this brother, who has set aside all concern for earthly matters and has directed his entire mind so fully toward heaven that he finds no time even to put his cell in order.” Likewise, if he visited another and saw his cell tidy, swept, and clean, he would again say to himself: “Just as this brother’s soul is pure, so too is his cell pure, and the condition of his cell corresponds to the condition of his soul.” And he never spoke of anyone as careless or proud, but, through his good disposition, he saw everyone as good and benefited from everyone. May the Good God grant us the same good disposition, so that we too may benefit from everyone and never notice the faults of our neighbor.

105. “Instructions for Those Being Trained in the Monastic Life.” If you live in obedience, never trust your own heart, for it is blinded by old passions. Do not follow your own judgment in anything, and do not decide anything for yourself without asking for guidance and counsel. Do not think or assume that you are better or more righteous than your mentor, and do not scrutinize his actions. By doing so, you will obey and walk calmly and safely in the path of our Fathers. Compel yourself in all things and subdue your will; and by the grace of Christ, through instruction, you will become accustomed to subduing your will, and then you will do so without compulsion or sorrow, so that everything will happen for you as you wish. Do not wish for everything to happen as you want it to; but wish for it to be as it will be, and in this way you will be at peace with everyone. And believe that everything that happens to us, down to the very smallest detail, occurs according to God’s Providence, and then you will bear everything that comes upon you without distress. Believe that insults and reproaches are medicines that heal the pride of your soul, and pray for those who reproach you as if they were true physicians of your soul, being certain that whoever hates insults hates humility, and whoever avoids those who grieve him flees from meekness. Do not seek to know your neighbor’s faults, and do not entertain suspicions about him that are instilled in you by the enemy; but if such thoughts do arise in you, due to our own sinfulness, strive to turn them into good thoughts. Give thanks for everything, and acquire goodness and holy love. Above all, let us all guard our conscience in everything—in our relationship with God, with our neighbor, and with material things; and before we say or do anything, let us examine whether it is in accordance with God’s will; and then, having prayed, let us say or do it, humbling ourselves before God and asking for His help.

106. If you want holy thoughts of faith to exert their soothing effect at the right time to quell unrighteous impulses, thoughts, and feelings, then train yourself in them always, frequently reviewing them in your mind—and I believe in God that you will find peace. Also, blend prayer with instruction. Strive to excel in this, so that when bodily or spiritual sorrow befalls you, you may endure it without grief, without heaviness, and with patience.

107. When you hear that you have done something you did not do, do not be surprised or upset, but immediately bow humbly to the one who told you this, saying, “Forgive me, and pray for me”—and then remain silent, as the Fathers have said. And when he asks you, “Is this true or not?” then, after bowing in humility, tell the truth about what happened; and after speaking, bow again in humility and say, “Forgive me and pray for me.”

108. If, when meeting or interacting with the brethren, you cannot maintain a steady state of mind, then at least try not to be tempted by anything, not to condemn anyone, not to slander, and not to nitpick at a brother’s words, deeds, or gestures—for this will not benefit you; rather, try to draw edification for yourself from everything.

109. Know that whoever is troubled by any thought, or grieves over it, and does not confess it, thereby strengthens it against himself—that is, gives that thought greater power to struggle against and torment him. But if he confesses it and begins to struggle against and resist his thought, and to do the opposite of it, then the passion will weaken and will not have the strength to fight him or cause him sorrow. And then, little by little, through spiritual struggle and with God’s help, he will overcome the passion itself.

110. Abba Pimen said that fearing God, praying to God, and doing good to one’s neighbor are the three principal virtues. – He placed the fear of God first because the fear of God precedes every virtue, for “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Ps. 110:10), and “the fear of God turns a person away from evil” (Prov. 15:27). He then said to pray to God because a person, by himself, can neither do anything good nor acquire virtues, but in everything he needs God’s help alongside his own efforts, which are inspired by the fear of God. And he mentioned doing good deeds for one’s neighbor at the end because this is an act of love, which is the pinnacle of Christian perfection (Rom. 13: 10).

111. When the soul is numb, it is helpful to read the Holy Scriptures and the edifying words of the God-bearing Fathers frequently, to remember God’s terrible judgment, the departure of the soul from the body, and the dreadful dark forces that await it—with whom it has done evil in this fleeting and calamitous life.

Saint Isaac the Syrian

A Brief Account of Him

St. Isaac was a native of Nineveh. Nothing is known about his parents. In the prime of his youth, having withdrawn from the world and all worldly things, he entered the Monastery of St. Matthias together with his brother, and there he embraced the monastic way of life. Having perfected himself in asceticism at this monastery and having sufficiently excelled in virtue, he was seized by a desire for silence. Therefore, having withdrawn a great distance from the monastery, he settled in a hermit’s cell and began to lead a life of complete solitude, having no communion with anyone and attending only to himself and to God. His own brother, having taken over the administration of the aforementioned monastery, strongly urged and implored him to leave the desert and return to his former abode; but he was so attached to the desert that he would not agree to leave it even for a short time. Yet what his brother’s plea could not achieve, divine revelation accomplished. St. Isaac, having disobeyed his own brother, submitted to the Father, who had called him from on high to govern the Church of Nineveh. Therefore, he left the desert—and was ordained bishop of the great city of Nineveh. For it was fitting that the lamp should not remain hidden in the seclusion of the desert, but be placed on the candlestick of the Pastorate, and cast the bright rays of radiant virtue far and wide. But this did not last very long: no sooner had this light shone than it was soon hidden again. The Saint left the episcopal see due to the following circumstance. Two men came to him at the bishop’s residence—a creditor and a debtor—the former demanding immediate repayment of the debt from the latter, while the latter, acknowledging his debt, asked the former to grant him a short extension. But the creditor replied: “If he does not pay me the debt right now, I will take him to court immediately.” St. Isaac remarked to him: “If, according to the Gospel commandment, you should not even demand repayment from one who has taken what is yours, how much more should you show generosity to one who promises to pay you the debt soon.” But this cruel man replied, “Leave the Gospel commandment aside for now.”—And he would listen no more. Then the Holy One of God said to himself, “If they do not obey the Lord’s Gospel commandments, what is left for me to do here?”—Seeing, moreover, how much the silence and serenity to which he had grown accustomed in the desert were being disrupted by the inevitable demands of governing, he resolved to leave the throne and return to his beloved desert hermitage. Remaining there until his death, St. Isaac performed great feats in his struggle against demons and the flesh; he excelled in the virtues required by both the active and contemplative life; he attained spiritual perfection; and— even in this life, was deemed worthy of grace—it would be superfluous to speak of this: one can easily learn of it from his writings. St. Isaac wrote extensively, and everything he wrote was based on personal experience. He first actively lived through everything that he later committed to writing, and through his own actions he instructed those under his guidance. Thus, even from the desert, he continued to pour forth an inexhaustible stream of pure and life-giving water, with which he abundantly quenched the souls of his brothers. The writings of St. Isaac have come down to us in Syriac and Arabic; of these, nearly half have been translated into Greek—and from Greek into Russian, among the works of the Holy Fathers, numbering 91 in total. St. Isaac departed for his heavenly abode at the end of the 6th century. His feast day, according to the calendar of Archbishop Sergius, is January 28.

Ascetic Instructions

(Excerpted in short articles)

1. The fear of God is the beginning of virtue; it is the fruit of faith and is sown in the heart when the mind is freed from worldly distraction, so that one may gather one’s wandering thoughts into contemplation of future restoration.

2. In order to lay the foundation of virtue, it is best for a person to keep himself removed from worldly affairs and to abide by the law that illuminates the righteous and holy paths, as the Holy Spirit indicated through the Psalmist (Ps. 22:3; 118:35).

3. The beginning of the path of life is to constantly study the Word of God with one’s mind and to live a life of poverty. Nourishing oneself with one helps to perfect the other. If you nourish yourself by studying the Word of God, this helps you to succeed in poverty; and success in non-covetousness gives you the leisure to succeed in studying the Word of God. The support of both contributes to the swift erection of the entire edifice of virtues.

4. Without withdrawing from the world, no one can draw near to God. By “withdrawal,” I do not mean a physical relocation, but a detachment from worldly affairs. The virtue of withdrawing from the world consists in not allowing one’s mind to be occupied by the world.

5. When grace abounds in a person, the fear of death becomes insignificant to him on the path to the righteousness he desires (or in the face of obstacles on that path)—and he finds many reasons in his soul why, for the sake of the fear of God, he is ready to endure sorrows as something that is to be expected; then everything that is unpleasant to the body and capable of causing it suffering counts for nothing in his eyes compared to what he hopes for in the future. But when a person’s lack of grace increases, then what happens within him and to him is the opposite of what has been said: then knowledge, based on inquiry (which can rely only on the tangible), becomes greater than his faith; he does not place his hope in God in every matter; and God’s providence regarding man is understood differently. Such a person is constantly subjected to fears, due to the schemes of those who lie in wait “in the darkness to shoot him down” with their arrows (Ps. 10:2).

6. Doubt in the heart brings fear into the soul; but faith can make the will steadfast even when limbs are cut off. To the extent that love for the flesh prevails within you, to that extent you cannot be bold and fearless in the face of the many adversities surrounding the one you love.

7. The chaste person is not one in whom, during struggle, toil, and feats of valor, shameful thoughts cease, but one who, through the sincerity of his heart, keeps the vision of his mind chaste, not allowing it to stray toward impure thoughts. — And just as the integrity of his conscience is evident in the gaze of his eyes, testifying to his fidelity (to the law of purity), so shame hangs like a veil over the innermost chamber of his thoughts, and his purity, like a chaste virgin, is preserved through faith in Christ.

8. To ward off the soul’s preconceived inclinations toward impurity, nothing is as helpful as immersing oneself in the love of studying the Divine Scriptures and comprehending the depth of their meaning. When thoughts are immersed in the delight of comprehending the wisdom hidden in the words; then, to the extent that a person derives enlightenment from them, to that same extent he leaves the world behind and forgets all that is in the world. — But even when the mind floats only on the surface of the sea of the Divine Scriptures and cannot penetrate to the very depths of Scripture’s meaning; even this very fact—that he is occupied with a zeal to understand Scripture—is sufficient for him to firmly bind his thoughts with a single thought of what is praiseworthy, and to prevent them from straying toward the material and the carnal.

9. In everything you encounter in Scripture, seek out the purpose of the word, so that you may penetrate to the depth of the Saints’ thought and understand it with greater precision. Those who are guided by divine grace toward enlightenment in their lives always sense, as it were, an intelligent ray passing through the verses of Scripture, distinguishing for the mind mere words from that which is spoken to the soul with profound meaning.

10. If a person reads verses rich in meaning without delving deeply into them, then his heart remains impoverished (tasting nothing), and the holy power within him fades away—that power which, through the soul’s wondrous understanding, bestows upon the heart the sweetest delight.

11. Every thing naturally tends toward that which is akin to it. And the soul, possessing within itself a share of the spirit, when it hears a statement containing a hidden spiritual power, is ardently drawn to the content of that statement. Not every person is moved to wonder by what is spoken spiritually and contains within itself a great, hidden spiritual power. A word about virtue requires a heart not preoccupied with earthly things; but in a person whose mind is burdened by concern for the transitory, virtue does not stir thoughts of loving it or seeking to possess it.

12. Detachment from the material world through one’s very being precedes union with God, although not infrequently, according to the economy of grace, in some the latter precedes the former. The order of the monastic life differs from the order common to all people. — You, however, should follow the common order. If grace precedes you, that is its business; and if it does not, then follow the path of all people and ascend you too to the height of the spiritual pillar.

13. The soul’s insatiability in the pursuit of virtue turns to its advantage a portion of the visible (sensual) desires of the body associated with it. Moderation adorns every thing. Without moderation, even what is esteemed beautiful becomes harmful.

14. Do you wish to commune with God through your mind? — Practice charity. There is no other path to spiritual love—which imprints the invisible image (of God) within oneself—unless one first begins to be generous to the same degree that our heavenly Father is perfect, as the Lord said (Luke 6:36).

15. Just as an artist who paints water on walls cannot quench his thirst with that water, so too is a word not backed by action. Whoever speaks of a virtue that he himself has put into practice conveys it to his listener just as one gives another money earned by his own labor. And whoever sows the teaching from his own earnings into the ears of those who listen to him speaks boldly, saying to his spiritual children, just as the aged Jacob said to the chaste Joseph: “I give you” a special portion “above your brothers, which I took” from the Amorites “with my sword and my bow” (Gen. 48:22).

16. Someone has said beautifully that the fear of death grieves a man who is condemned by his own conscience; but whoever has a good conscience within himself desires death just as much as he desires life.

17. If something has become deeply intertwined with your soul, consider it your treasure not only for this life, but believe that it will go with you into the life to come. And if it is something good, rejoice and give thanks to God in your heart; but if it is something evil, then grieve and sigh, and strive to free yourself from it while you are still in the body.

18. Always keep in mind the deepest sorrows of those who are grieving and embittered, so that you yourself may give due thanks for the small and insignificant sorrows that befall you, and be able to bear them with joy.

19. In times of apathy and sloth, recall in your heart the days of your former diligence—how you were attentive to everything, even the smallest details; what feats you accomplished, and with what zeal you resisted those who sought to hinder your progress. Through such remembrance, your soul will be reawakened, as if from a deep sleep; it will be clothed once more in the flame of zeal, as if rising from the dead, and through fervent struggle against the devil and sin, it will return to its former state.

20. The work of the cross is twofold: one consists in enduring the sorrows of the flesh (physical privations, inevitable in the struggle against the passions), and is called “active work” proper; the other consists in the subtle work of the mind, in divine contemplation, and in abiding in prayer, etc., and is called “contemplation.” The first purifies the passionate part of the soul, while the second enlightens the rational part of the soul. Any person who, before being fully trained in the first part, moves on to this second part—drawn by its sweetness, not to mention by his own laziness—will incur wrath for failing first to “put to death the parts of the body that are on the earth” (Col. 3: 5)—that is, without first healing the infirmity of his thoughts through patient practice in bearing the cross—dared to dream in his mind of the glory of the cross. This is precisely what the ancient Saints meant when they said that if the mind sets out to ascend the cross before its senses, having been healed of their weakness, have attained serenity, then God’s wrath befalls it. For whoever has a mind defiled by shameful passions, and who is quick to fulfill his mind with fanciful thoughts, his mouth is silenced by a prohibition—because, without first purifying his mind through suffering and subduing his carnal desires, but, relying on what the ear has heard and what is written in ink, he has rushed straight ahead to walk a path filled with darkness, though blind in body.

21. Imagine that virtue is the body, contemplation is the soul, and both together form a single perfect human being, united by the spirit from two parts: the sensory and the rational. And just as it is impossible for the soul to come into a state of manifesting its being without the formation of the body with its members, so it is impossible for the soul to attain contemplation without the practice of virtue.

22. Having heard that one must withdraw from the world, leave the world behind, and purify oneself of everything in the world, you must first understand and discern—not through common notions but through purely rational ones—what the very term “world” means, and from what distinctions this name is composed, and you will be able to discern how far your soul is from the world, and what elements of the world are mingled within it. — “World” is a collective term encompassing what are called the passions. When we wish to refer to the passions as a whole, we call them the “world”; but when we wish to distinguish them according to their individual names, we call them “passions.”

23. When you come to understand what the world is, then, by distinguishing all that is meant by it, you will also come to understand how you are bound to the world and how you have detached yourself from it. To put it more briefly: the world is a carnal life and the scheming of the flesh. It is precisely by the fact that a person has withdrawn from this that it is known that he has departed from the world.

24. Fear for the body is so strong in people that, as a result, they are often left unable to accomplish anything praiseworthy or honorable. But when fear for the soul overcomes fear for the body, then bodily fear melts away before the fear of the soul, like wax before the power of a burning fire.

25. The soul is by nature dispassionate. Passions are something superimposed—and the soul itself is to blame for them. —If the nature of the soul was once bright and pure because it had received the Divine light within itself, and if it returns to this same state when it regains its original order, then it is undoubtedly true that the soul is outside its own nature as soon as it enters into a passionate state, as the disciples of the Church assert.

26. The natural state of the soul is the knowledge of God’s creatures—both sensible and intelligible. Its supernatural state is the movement (or action and state) of contemplating the pre-existent Divinity. Its unnatural state, however, is the movement of the soul, or its disposition and way of life, such as is found in passionate people who are enslaved by their passions. Thus it is evident that the passions of the soul are not, by their very nature, of the soul.

27. If you wish to know human mysteries and have not yet reached the point of discerning them by the spirit, you will discern them through each person’s words, way of life, and dispositions. Whoever is pure in soul and blameless in conduct always speaks the words of the Spirit with chastity, and, in accordance with the measure of his understanding, reasons both about the Divine and about what is within himself. But for those whose hearts are filled with passions, their tongues are moved by those very passions. If they speak of spiritual matters, they will reason under the influence of passion. The wise recognize such a person at first meeting, and the pure can smell the stench of their wickedness.

28. The tasks of a monk are as follows: freedom from the flesh, physical labor in prayer, and unceasing remembrance of God in the heart.

29. Prayer is one thing, and contemplation in prayer is another, although prayer and contemplation derive their origin from one another. Prayer is sowing; contemplation is the reaping of the harvest, during which the reaper is filled with wonder at the inexpressible vision of how, from the small and bare seeds he sowed, such beautiful ears of grain have suddenly sprung up before him.

30. The Savior began the work of our salvation through fasting. Likewise, all who follow in the Savior's footsteps on this foundation establish the beginning of their endeavor, for fasting is a weapon prepared by God. – And who, if he reflects on this, will not be convinced of its truth? – If the Lawgiver Himself fasts, how can anyone bound by the law fail to fast? That is why, before fasting, the human race knew no victory, and the devil never experienced defeat at the hands of our nature; but by this weapon he was truly vanquished. And our Lord was the leader and first-born of this victory, so that He might place the first victorious crown upon the head of our nature. And as soon as the devil sees this weapon in any person, this adversary and tormentor is immediately seized with fear, reflecting and recalling his defeat in the wilderness by the Savior—and his power is instantly crushed, and the very sight of the weapon given to us by our Chief Commander burns him. – Clothed in the armor of fasting, one is always inflamed with zeal. – Whoever abides in it has an unshakable mind, ready to confront and repel all fierce passions.

31. Deeds and labors then bring dispassion to the soul, put to death the "members that are on the earth," and grant rest to the thoughts, when we partake of silence, when the turmoil in the soul—caused by impressions from the external senses—ceases. Otherwise, success in this is impossible. For if a tree is watered daily, will its root ever wither? Does the water ever run out in a vessel to which it is added daily?—When a person attains stillness, then the soul easily discerns the passions, and the inner person, stirred to spiritual work, overcomes them, and day by day lifts the soul toward purity.

32. When can one say that someone has attained purity?—When one sees all people as good and no one appears to him as impure or defiled, then he is truly pure in heart.

33. What is proper for an ascetic living in silence in his cell to do?—Does a prudent and sober-minded person really need to ask how he should conduct himself when he is alone with himself? – What other occupation does a monk have in his cell besides weeping? And what other occupation is better than this? The very existence of a monk and his solitude, resembling a stay in a tomb, far from human joy, teach him that his activity is weeping. And all the Saints departed from this life in weeping. – Let us therefore pray to the Lord to grant us weeping. For if we receive this grace—the best and most excellent of all gifts—then, with its help, we will attain purity; and as soon as we attain it, it will never be taken from us until the very end of our life in this world.

34. Blessed are the pure in heart, for there is no moment when they do not delight in the sweetness of tears—in which they always behold the Lord. As long as tears remain in their eyes, they are granted a vision of His revelations in the heights of their prayer, and they have no prayer without tears. This is precisely what the Lord meant when He said, "Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted" (Matt. 5:4). For when a monk, with the help of tears, has been granted the grace to cross the realm of the passions and enter the plain of spiritual purity, then he encounters the comfort that God gives to those who mourn because of their purity. Shedding tears and weeping is a gift of the dispassionate. And if the tears of one who weeps and laments can temporarily not only guide him toward dispassion but also completely purify and free his mind from the memory of passions, what can be said of those who, with full awareness, practice this work day and night?

35. One of the Saints said that the body becomes a friend of sin when it fears temptations, lest it go to extremes and lose its life. Therefore, the Holy Spirit compels it to die (inspiring the ascetic to condemn himself to death). For He knows that unless he dies, he will not overcome sin. If anyone desires that the Lord may dwell within him, he compels his body to serve the Lord, to labor in the commandments of the Spirit as written by the Apostle, and to guard his soul from the works of the flesh described by the Apostle (Gal. 5:19). But the body, having become accustomed to sin, finds rest in the works of the flesh, and the Spirit of God finds no rest in its fruits. For when the body is exhausted by fasting and humility, then the soul is strengthened by prayer.

36. When the body is greatly oppressed by the sorrows of silence, endures privations and hardships, and is on the verge of losing its life, it usually implores you, saying, "Grant me a little freedom to live decently; I am now walking in the right path, for I have been tested by all manner of afflictions." And as soon as, out of compassion, you soothe it from its sorrows and grant it some respite, it will gradually begin to whisper to you with flattery (and its flattery is very powerful): "We can live well even in the world, following the same rules by which we now live; for we have been tested in many ways. Just tempt me, and if I'm not as you wish, we can return. The desert will not flee from us."—Do not believe it, even though it will plead earnestly and make many promises. It will not fulfill what it says. When you yield to its request, it will plunge you into great falls from which you will be unable to rise and escape.

37. When you fall into despondency from temptations and grow weary of them, say to yourself: “Once again you are craving an impure and shameful life.” – And if your body says to you, “It is a great sin to take one’s own life,” then answer it: “I am taking my own life because I cannot live impurely. I will die here so as not to witness the true death of my soul—death to God. It is better for me to die here for the sake of purity than to live a wretched life in the world. I have freely chosen this death for my sins. I am putting myself to death because I have sinned against the Lord; I will no longer provoke His wrath. What good is a life far from God to me? I will endure these hardships so as not to be cut off from the hope of heaven. What does God care for my life in this world if I live poorly in it and provoke God’s wrath?”

38. It is harmful for a monk to see the world and worldly things. And what a change takes place in the mind of one who, having remained silent with himself for a long time, suddenly falls back into the whirlpool of the world, seeing and hearing things that are unfamiliar to him! – Let us not be deceived by those who claim that there is no harm to us in hearing and seeing certain things, that our thoughts remain the same whether in solitude or in the world, that our modesty is not disturbed—whether in the cell or outside it—and that no adverse change befalls it, and that when we encounter people and things, we do not feel the turmoil of the passions. Only those of such strong spirit can assert this—those who, even if they sustain wounds, do not feel them. But we have not yet attained such health; we still bear festering wounds that will swarm with maggots if they are neglected for even a single day, and they will remain unbandaged, unplastered, and unsecured with bandages.

39. The soul, having once entrusted itself to God in faith and having experienced His assistance time and again, no longer concerns itself with itself, but is bound by wonder and silence, and is unable to return to its former ways of conduct and put them into practice, lest it otherwise be deprived of God’s Providence, which in secret watches over the soul unceasingly, cares for it, and constantly watches over it—and it will not be deprived of it because, in such a case, the soul would be presumptuously deluding itself into thinking that it can sufficiently provide for itself by the power of its own understanding.

40. Those in whom the light of faith shines no longer stoop to such shamelessness as to ask God again in prayer, “Give us this,” or “Take that from us”—nor do they care in the least for themselves; because with the spiritual eyes of faith they see at every moment the Father’s Providence, by which that true Father shelters them—He who, with His immeasurably great love, surpasses all earthly fatherly love, and who, above all others, is able and has the power to provide for us in abundance, far more than we ask, think, or imagine.

41. Whoever has been deemed worthy to taste the sweetness of faith and has turned back to worldly knowledge is like one who has found a precious pearl and exchanged it for a copper coin; and furthermore, like one who has forsaken complete freedom and returned to a state of poverty, filled with fear and slavery.

42. There are three mental modes through which knowledge ascends and descends. These modes are: the body, the soul, and the spirit. Knowledge is a gift from God to rational beings, bestowed upon them at the beginning of their creation—and by its very nature it is simple and indivisible, like sunlight, but in accordance with its functioning, it undergoes changes and divisions. —Listen to the order of this functioning.

43. “The First Degree of Knowledge.” When knowledge follows carnal desire, it unites the following modes into one: wealth, vanity, adornment, bodily comfort, the pursuit of verbal wisdom suitable for governing this world and giving rise to innovation in inventions, arts, and sciences, and everything else with which the body is crowned in this visible world. – And by these distinguishing features, this way of thinking becomes opposed to faith. – And it is called mere knowledge; for it excludes all divine providence, and because of the body’s predominance, it instills in the mind an irrational powerlessness and directs all its concern entirely toward this world alone. Here is how this philosophy conceives of itself: as if it were a mental power secretly governing man, a divine providence watching over him and caring entirely for him. Therefore, it does not attribute the governance of the world to God’s Providence, but rather regards all that is good in man, his deliverance from what is harmful to him, and his natural guard against difficulties and the many adversities that secretly and openly accompany our nature as the result of his own prudence and his own methods. Such is the conception of self-deceiving knowledge. It imagines that everything happens according to its own design; and in this it agrees with those who assert that there is no governance of this world. However, it cannot exist without constant concern and without fear for the body; and therefore it is overcome by cowardice, sorrow, despair, fear of demons, fear of people, rumors of robbers, reports of deaths, anxiety in sickness, worry in poverty and lack of necessities, fear of death, fear of suffering and wild beasts, and everything else of a similar nature—all of which make the mind resemble a sea in which, hour after hour, day and night, waves toss about and crash down upon swimmers. Since this way of life is unable to entrust its care to God in the hope of faith in Him, it is constantly occupied with stratagems and devising means concerning everything that pertains to itself. But when the methods it devises prove ineffective in any given situation— —and it fails to discern the mysterious providence in this, it then quarrels with those who hinder and oppose it. In this regard, the tree of the knowledge of good and evil has been planted within this mindset, uprooting love. — Arrogance and pride prevail within it. — It boasts, yet walks in darkness—and values its possessions in comparison to what is on earth, unaware that there is something better than itself.

44. “The Second Degree of Knowledge.” When a person, having left the first degree, is occupied with spiritual thoughts and desires, then, in the light of the soul’s nature, he performs the following excellent deeds: fasting, prayer, almsgiving, reading the Divine Scriptures, a virtuous life, the struggle against passions, and so on. For all good deeds, all the beautiful qualities discerned in the soul, and the wondrous ways employed in service in Christ’s court—at this second stage of guidance, in the working of His power—are accomplished by the Holy Spirit. And it is the Holy Spirit who shows the heart the paths leading us to faith and gathers within it the provisions for the true life. After repentance come the labors of good deeds and asceticism, aimed at purifying the heart, with the help of the grace of the Holy Spirit. But even here, the path is still carnal and difficult. In it lies only the path that leads and guides us to faith. There is yet a higher degree of guidance. And if anyone succeeds, he will find the opportunity, with Christ’s help, to be raised to that level as well, when he lays the foundation of his conduct in silent seclusion from people, in the reading of Scripture, in prayer, and in other good deeds through which everything pertaining to the second degree of guidance is accomplished. And it is through these that all that is beautiful is accomplished; this is what is called the conduct of affairs; for through sensory acts, mediated by the bodily senses, one carries out one’s work at the external level.

45. The third degree of conduct is the degree of perfection. Listen now to how a person becomes refined, acquires the spiritual, and, in his way of life, becomes like the invisible powers, which carry out their service not through deeds produced by the senses, but through the care of the mind. When knowledge rises above the earthly and above concerns for earthly affairs, and begins to explore its thoughts regarding what is hidden from the eyes within, and its gaze extends upward and is guided by faith in concern for the age to come, in the longing for what has been promised to us, and in the search for hidden mysteries; then faith itself absorbs this knowledge, transforms it, and gives birth to it anew, so that it becomes entirely spirit. Then it can soar on wings into the realm of the incorporeal, touch the depths of the intangible sea, representing in the mind the divine and wondrous acts of governance in the natures of mental and sensory beings, and seek out spiritual mysteries comprehended by a simple and subtle mind. Then the inner senses are awakened to spiritual activity in the manner that will prevail in that life of immortality and incorruptibility; for even in this life, as it were in secret, the soul experiences a spiritual resurrection, a true testimony to the universal resurrection.

46. Here are the three stages of knowledge. — From the time a person begins to distinguish evil from good, and until he departs from this world, the knowledge of his soul remains within these three stages. And the fullness of all falsehood and wickedness, the fullness of truth, and the ability to touch the depths of all the mysteries of the spirit are brought about by a single form of knowledge within these three states; and within it is contained every movement of the mind, whether it ascends or descends, in good, in evil, or in the middle between good and evil. These same degrees are called by the Fathers: the natural, the unnatural, and the supernatural. And these are the three directions along which the remembrance of the rational soul is elevated and lowered, when, as has been said, one either acts righteously according to nature, or, transcending nature, is enraptured by the remembrance of it in the contemplation of God beyond nature, or goes out to feed pigs, having squandered the wealth of his reason while laboring with a multitude of demons.

47. The first degree of knowledge cools the soul for the work of walking with God. The second warms the soul for a swift progression toward that which is at the level of faith. The third, however, is rest from action, in which the mind, in a single exercise, delights in the mysteries of the future. But since our nature cannot yet completely rise above the state of spiritual death and the burden of the flesh, as long as a person lives in the flesh, he remains in a transitional state between the two. Like a poor beggar, his soul begins to perform service at the second, middle degree of virtue; at other times, like those who have received the spirit of sonship, in the mystery of freedom, it delights in spiritual grace, according to the worthiness of the One who bestows it; and again it returns to the humility of its deeds, performed with the aid of the body. For in an imperfect age there is no perfect freedom.

48. The work of the second degree consists in action and continuous practice; the work of the third degree, however, is the work of faith, which is not produced by deeds but is accomplished through spiritual mental images, in a purely spiritual act; and it transcends the senses. – By faith, however, we do not mean the kind that a person has in discerning the distinction between the Divine Hypostases worthy of worship and the wondrous economy of the Incarnation through the perception of our nature—although this faith is exceedingly lofty; – but the faith that shines in the soul from the light of grace, strengthening the heart with intelligent testimony so that it may not waver in the certainty of hope, far from all doubt. And this faith is revealed not through the sharpening of the ears’ hearing, but through the spiritual eyes that see the mysteries hidden in the soul, the invisible divine riches, concealed from the eyes of the children of the flesh, and revealed by the Spirit to those who partake of Christ’s table, in instruction by Christ’s law, as the Lord said: “If you keep My commandments, I will send you the Comforter, the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, and He will teach you all truth” (John 14:17, 26).

49. There is yet another distinction among forms of knowledge. The kind of knowledge that deals with the visible, or receives through the senses what is conveyed from the visible, is called natural. The kind of knowledge, however, that deals with the power of the mind and, within itself, with the natures of incorporeal beings, is called spiritual; for perception is received by the spirit, not by the senses. And because of these two sources (the perception of visible and spiritual things), both kinds of knowledge come to the soul from outside. But the knowledge imparted by divine power is called supernatural; and it is even more incomprehensible and higher than knowledge. And the soul receives the contemplation of this knowledge not from a substance outside itself, as in the first two kinds of knowledge; but within itself, immaterially, suddenly, swiftly, and beyond expectation, it is revealed and made known from the very depths of the soul; for, according to the words of Christ, “The Kingdom of Heaven is within you” (Luke 17:21)—it does not nourish hope through a foreshadowing, nor does it come “through observance,” but within the image imprinted in the innermost mind, it reveals itself of its own accord, without any thought of it. The first kind of knowledge comes from constant study and diligent learning; the second—from a good life and sound faith; and the third is granted as a gift to faith alone, through which knowledge is set aside and deeds come to an end.

50. Do not doubt the power of the prayers in our liturgical texts, even if, during prayers or hourly readings, they are not followed by intense emotion and unceasing contrition.

51. Accept as necessary a word spoken from experience, even if the one who uttered it is not a learned man; for even though the king’s treasures are greater than all others on earth, they do not neglect to accept as a supplement a morsel taken from a beggar; and from small streams, rivers are flooded and become great in their course.

52. The recollection of good and the recollection of evil, as if with a finger, point out to us either the shame of our thoughts or the nobility of our life, and each, according to its nature, strengthens within us thoughts and impulses that are either righteous or wicked. We are occupied with them in the secret recesses of our minds; but in this mental occupation, the course of our lives is depicted, and in it we can see ourselves.

53. There is a love like a small lamp fueled by oil, which goes out as the oil runs out—or like a rain-fed stream whose flow ceases as the rainwater that feeds it runs dry. But there is a love like a spring gushing from the earth, which never runs dry. The first is human love; the second is divine, having God as its source.

54. Do you wish to delight in poetry during your service and to grasp the meaning of the words of the Spirit that you utter? – Set aside completely the number of verses, do not take into account the meter of the verses, and abandon the usual bombast; but immerse your mind in the study of the words of the Spirit until your soul is stirred to lofty understandings, and through this is moved to praise or to wholesome sorrow. – In a slavish approach (in reading only what is prescribed), there is no peace for the mind; and confusion usually robs the mind of its taste for meaning and understanding and scatters one’s thoughts. It is fitting to call confusion the devil’s chariot, for Satan has the habit, like a charioteer, of sitting upon the mind, taking with him a host of passions, entering with them into the unfortunate soul, and plunging it into confusion.

55. Do not argue with the thoughts instilled in you by the enemy, but rather interrupt your conversation with them through prayer to God. We do not always have the strength to resist such opposing thoughts in order to stop them; on the contrary, in such cases, we often receive a wound from them that takes a long time to heal. Despite all your wisdom and all your prudence, the enemies will succeed in striking you. But even if you do defeat them, the impurity of those thoughts will defile your mind, and the stench of their filth will linger in your nostrils for a long time. By employing the first method, however, you will be free from all this and from fear; for there is no other help except God.

56. When, during your time of seclusion in silence, you turn to handicrafts, do not use your father's commandment as a cover for your love of money. To avoid despondency, let your work be modest and not disturb your mind; but do not forget that prayer, in its proper order, is above all else.

57. Be assured that your Guardian is always with you—and that, together with all other creatures, you stand under the one Lord, Who, with a single gesture, sets everything in motion and arranges all things. So stand firm and be of good cheer. Neither demons, nor deadly beasts, nor wicked people can carry out their will to harm or destroy you, unless the Ruler permits it and allows it to happen to a certain extent. Therefore, say to your soul: "I have a Guardian who protects me; and no creature can appear before me unless there is a command from above. But if it is the will of my Lord that the wicked should prevail over creation, then I accept this without sorrow, not wishing that the will of my Lord should remain unfulfilled." In this way, in your trials, you will be filled with joy, having come to know and fully realize that the Lord's sovereign guidance governs and directs you. Thus, strengthen your heart with hope in the Lord.

58. Guardianship of the tongue not only causes the mind to soar toward God, but also secretly imparts great strength to the visible deeds performed through the body, and likewise enlightens one in secret deeds, as the Fathers used to say, because guarding one's lips causes the conscience to soar toward God, provided one observes silence with full awareness.

59. Every thought of good will is followed by "zeal," whose fervor is like burning coals; and it usually protects this thought, preventing any resistance, obstacle, or barrier from approaching it. This is a virtue without which no good can be produced. Someone clothed in Christ called this zeal a dog and a guardian of God's law. This power of zeal is awakened, strengthened, and kindled in two ways to guard the house (the soul)—and it is also brought to exhaustion, slumber, and laziness in two ways. It is aroused and kindled (firstly) when a certain "fear" comes to a person's mind, causing him to fear for the good he has acquired or intends to acquire, lest it be stolen or destroyed. When this fear is aroused, zeal blazes day and night like a burning furnace—and, like a cherub, it constantly watches over its surroundings and zealously guards its good against all enemy temptations, both from without and within. There is another way in which this zeal is kindled—when the desire for virtue grows most strongly in the soul. And to the extent that this desire grows in the soul, to that same extent is the zeal for virtue kindled. The first cause for its cooling is when the very desire for good diminishes or ceases in the soul; and the second cause is when some thought of confidence and boldness enters the soul and takes root there—and a person begins to hope, to think, and to cling to the idea that he has no reason to fear harm from any power; therefore, he lays aside the weapon of vigilance, and the house is left unguarded; the dog falls asleep and abandons his watch for a long time. Both of these things happen because some very subtle thought of pride has entered the soul and taken root there; or because a person has begun to devote himself more to concerns about the transitory, or to frequent, alluring contact with the world. Or this happens because of the womb, that mother of all evil. Whenever an ascetic enters into fellowship with the world, his soul immediately grows weary. The same happens when he associates with many who, out of vanity, inevitably crush his soul. The mind of an ascetic who enters into communion with the world is like a helmsman who sails calmly across the sea and suddenly finds himself in the midst of underwater rocks and is shipwrecked.

60. To choose the good is the task of the one who desires it; but to bring that choice to fulfillment is God's work. For this, a person needs God's help. Let us therefore ensure that whenever a good desire arises within us, it is followed by frequent prayers, asking not only for His help but also for guidance as to whether this desire is pleasing to God's will or not. For not every good desire enters the heart from God, but only that which is beneficial.

61. Sometimes a person desires what is good, but God does not help him; for sometimes such a desire comes from the devil, not for our benefit but to our harm—either because the desired endeavor is beyond our capacity, since we have not yet attained the way of life appropriate to it, —or because it is foreign to the way of life we have chosen for ourselves—or because the time has not yet come when it can be accomplished or when we can begin to carry it out—or because we lack both the knowledge and the physical strength sufficient for it—or because the circumstances of the time do not favor us in this matter. The devil, meanwhile, uses every trick to make such a matter seem plausible, so that by enticing us toward it, he may disturb our peace of mind or cause harm to our body. Therefore, even good desires must be carefully considered. It is better to do everything with counsel.

62. Virtue is the mother of sorrow; from sorrow comes humility; and grace is bestowed upon humility. And the reward that follows is no longer for virtue itself, nor for the labor done for its sake, but for the humility that springs from them. If, however, humility is lost, then the former will have been in vain.

63. The Lord demands not merely the observance of the commandments, but rather the reformation of the soul, for which He established the commandments. The body acts the same way in both good and evil deeds; the mind, however, is either righteous or sins, depending on its disposition.

64. A gift without trials is ruin for those who receive it. If you do what is good before God, and He gives you a gift, implore Him to grant you the ability to be humble to the extent that is fitting for you, or to place a guardian over the gift, or to take it away from you, so that it may not be a cause of your ruin. For it is not beneficial for everyone to possess wealth.

65. Virtues are accompanied by sorrows. Whoever flees from sorrows undoubtedly parts ways with virtue as well. If you desire virtue, then submit yourself to every kind of suffering. For suffering gives birth to humility. Until we attain true knowledge, we draw near to humility through trials. For whoever remains in virtue without suffering has the door to pride wide open.

66. When a person dwells in pride, the Guardian Angel, who is close to him and stirs within him a concern for righteousness, departs from him. But when a person offends this Angel, and he departs from him, then a stranger (the spirit of darkness) draws near to him—and from that time on, he no longer has a concern for righteousness.

67. God often permits the virtuous to be tempted by something—He allows temptations to arise against them from all sides, afflicts them in their bodies, as He did with Job, plunges them into poverty, causes people to turn away from them, and strikes them in the things they have acquired; yet no harm comes near their souls. — And it is impossible that, when we walk the path of righteousness, we should not encounter sorrow, or that the body should not grow weary from illness and toil—and yet remain unchanged, provided we love to live in virtue. — When a person walks in God's way—and encounters something of this kind; then it is not fitting for him to stray from his path, but he must accept this with joy, without complaint, and give thanks to God for sending him this grace, and that he has been deemed worthy, for God's sake, to fall into temptation and to become a partner in the sufferings of the Prophets, the Apostles, and the other Saints, who endured sorrows for the sake of this path. Whether temptations come to him from people, from demons, or from the flesh, let this be a cause for him to give thanks. For it is impossible for God to bestow a blessing upon one who desires to abide with Him in any other way than by sending him trials for the sake of the truth; just as it is impossible for a person to become worthy of this greatness—that is, to enter into trials and rejoice—without the grace of Christ. This matter is so great that St. Paul clearly calls it a gift when a person is deemed worthy to suffer for the sake of hope in God, saying to the Philippians: "For it has been granted to you by God not only to believe in Him, but also to suffer for His sake" (Phil. 1: 29). Likewise, St. Peter wrote in his epistle: "If you suffer for righteousness' sake, you are blessed" (1 Peter 3:14)—because you have become partakers of Christ's sufferings. You should not rejoice when you live in comfort, yet frown in times of sorrow, regarding them as foreign to God's way. For His path has been laid out from of old and from generation to generation through the cross and death. And where does such a thought come from (to walk God's path half-heartedly)?—Realize from this that you are outside God's path and are straying from it, unwilling to follow in the footsteps of the saints, or intending to devise for yourself another, special path, and to walk along it without suffering. God's path is the daily cross. No one has ascended to heaven by living a life of indifference. — As for the path of indifference, we know where it ends.

68. True righteous people always reflect within themselves that they are unworthy of God—and the very fact that they are truly righteous is evident from the fact that they acknowledge themselves to be wretched and unworthy of God's care, and confess this both secretly and openly, and are enabled by the Holy Spirit to do so, so that they may remain in toil and hardship as long as they are in this life. But God has reserved a time of rest for them in the age to come. And those who have the living Lord within them do not, for this very reason, desire to be at rest or to be freed from sorrow, even though at times they are mysteriously given spiritual comfort.

69. Such is the will of the Spirit, that His beloved should abide in toil. The Spirit of God does not dwell in those who abide in rest. This is how the sons of God are distinguished from others: they live in afflictions, while the world takes pride in luxury and rest. God did not will that His beloved should rest while they are in the body, but rather desired that, while in the world, they should abide in sorrow, in hardship, in toil, in poverty, in nakedness, in need, in humiliation, in insults, in a weary body, and in sorrowful thoughts, so that what was said might be fulfilled in them: “In the world you will have tribulation” (John 16:33). The Lord knows that those who live in peace cannot abide in His love, and therefore He denies them peace and the delight that comes with it.

70. Because of the love the saints have shown toward God by suffering for His Name, their hearts gain the “boldness” to look upon God with unveiled faces and to ask Him with confidence. — Great is the power of bold prayer. Therefore, God allows His saints to be tempted by every kind of sorrow, so that they may experience His help firsthand and come to know how much God cares for them. Through these trials, they gain wisdom and, from experience, acquire knowledge of all things, so as not to be mocked by demons. If God were to train them in one good thing alone, they would lack instruction in other areas, and they would be blind in the midst of trials.

71. If a person is not first tested by evil, he has no taste for the good, so that when he encounters the good within the evil, he may make use of it with understanding, as if it were his own. How pleasant is knowledge gained directly from experience and practice, and what strength it imparts to the one who has acquired it within himself through long-term experience—this is known to those who have experienced the assistance of this knowledge, as well as the weakness of nature and the help of divine power, and have become convinced of it. For they come to know this only when God, having at first withheld His power from assisting them, brings them to the realization of the weakness of human nature, the difficulty of temptations, the cunning of the enemy, and the nature of the struggle they face—how they are endowed by nature, and how they were protected by divine power, how far they have come on their journey, how much God’s power has exalted them, and how powerless they are in the struggle against every passion when this divine power is withdrawn from them—so that from all this they acquire humility, draw near to God, begin to await His help, and abide in prayer. And where would they have gained all this if they had not experienced much evil, having fallen into this evil by God’s permission, as the Apostle says: “Lest I be exalted because of the surpassing revelations, a thorn in the flesh was given to me, a messenger of Satan” (2 Cor. 12:7)? But in temptations, having repeatedly experienced God’s help, a person also acquires firm faith; from this, he becomes fearless and gains equanimity in temptations.

72. Temptation is beneficial to every person. Ascetics are tempted so that they may add something to their spiritual wealth; the complacent, so that they may guard themselves against harm; those immersed in slumber, so that they may prepare themselves for awakening; those who stand far off, so that they may draw near to God; those who belong to God, so that they may rejoice in Him with boldness. — Every untrained son receives wealth from his Father’s house not for his own benefit. That is why God first tempts and afflicts, and then reveals His gift.

73. While a person is in a state of indifference, he fears the hour of death; but when he draws near to God, he fears the judgment to come; and when he enters fully into the presence of God, then both fears are consumed by love. — Why is this so? — Because as long as a person remains in the realm of the flesh and lives a carnal life, he is terrified of death. But when he is in spiritual understanding and leads a good life, his mind is occupied at every moment with the remembrance of the future judgment; for, as is right by his very nature, he moves in the spiritual order, is engaged in his understanding and way of life, and is prepared to draw near to God. But when he attains that knowledge of the truth, through the awakening within him of the knowledge of God’s mysteries and the strengthening of his hope for the future, then that carnal man—who, like an animal, fears slaughter—and the rational man, who fears God’s judgment, are both consumed by love; and having become a son, he is adorned with love, rather than being disciplined by a terrifying rod, saying, “I and my father’s house will serve the Lord” (Josh. 24:15).

74. Blessed is the one whose thoughts are always on God, and who abides with Him alone in the conversation of his understanding. Joy in God is stronger than this earthly life; and whoever has found it will not only pay no heed to suffering, but will not even turn his gaze toward his own life. Love is sweeter than life, and the understanding of God, from which love is born, is even sweeter than honey and honeycomb. For love, it is no sorrow to accept a painful death for the sake of those who love. Love is the fruit of knowledge; and knowledge is the fruit of spiritual health, and spiritual health is the strength that comes from prolonged endurance.

75. Eternal life is consolation in God; and whoever has found consolation in God regards worldly consolation as superfluous. If anyone has received wisdom from the Spirit, he recognizes it from the wisdom itself, which, in the depths of his being and in his feelings, teaches him humble conduct. If anyone has attained humility, he knows it by this: if he finds it abhorrent to please the world through his association with it or through his words; and if the glory of this world is hateful in his eyes.

76. Passions (in action) are desires which, being produced by the things of this world, entice one under the pretext of necessity to satisfy the needs of life; and these desires do not cease as long as this world endures. But a person who has been graced with divine grace, having tasted and experienced something higher than this, does not allow these passions to enter his heart; because in their place another, better desire has prevailed within him—and neither these passions themselves nor what they engender come near his heart, but remain outside, inactive—not because there are no longer any passionate desires, but because the heart that would receive them is dead to them and lives by something else; not because the person has found peace through the exercise of reason and action, but because there is nothing in his mind to disturb him, and his consciousness is sated, having found delight in something else.

77. If we keep the law of sobriety and the practice of prudence under control, the struggle against passionate desires will not even come close to the mind. They are prevented from entering the heart not through struggle, but through the saturation of consciousness and understanding—with which the soul is filled—and through the desire for the wondrous contemplations found within the soul. As long as a person lives, he needs sobriety, vigilance, and alertness to guard his treasure. But if he abandons the limit (fast) assigned to him, he will become weak and be robbed. One must not labor only until one sees the fruit; rather, one must strive until the very end. For it is not uncommon for even ripe fruit to be suddenly struck by hail.

78. If we train ourselves in righteous reflection (meditation in the heart), we will be ashamed of our passions as soon as we encounter them. But we will also be ashamed of even approaching our passions because of their sinfulness.

79. When, out of love for God, you desire to perform some deed, set death as the limit of this desire; and in this way you will truly be deemed worthy to ascend to the rank of martyrdom in the struggle against every passion, and you will suffer no harm from whatever you encounter within that limit, provided you persevere to the end and do not slacken. The thoughts of a feeble mind render the power of endurance feeble as well; but a steadfast mind imparts to those who follow its thoughts a strength that nature does not possess.

80. Life in this world is like letters inscribed on tablets; and whoever wishes may add to them, subtract from them, or alter the letters. But the life to come is like manuscripts inscribed on blank scrolls, sealed with the royal seal, in which neither additions nor subtractions are permitted. Therefore, while we are still in the midst of change, let us be mindful of ourselves; and while we still have control over the manuscript of our lives—which we write with our own hands—let us strive to enrich it with a good life and to erase the shortcomings of our past life. For as long as we are in this world, God does not affix His seal to either the good or the bad, until the very hour of our departure from this life.

81. Prayer requires practice so that the mind may become skilled through prolonged engagement in it. Prayer is preceded by seclusion (solitude, the withdrawal of thoughts from all that is extraneous). Solitude is necessary for the sake of prayer, and prayer is necessary so that we may acquire God's love; for through prayer we find reasons to love God.

82. We must know that every secret conversation with God, every concern of a good mind for God, every reflection on spiritual matters is established by prayer, is called prayer, and is united under this name,—whether you understand various readings, or the voice of the lips in praise of God, or thoughtful sorrow for the Lord, or physical bows, or the singing of psalms, or everything else that makes up the entire order of true prayer, from which God's love is born; for love comes from prayer, and prayer comes from dwelling in solitude; we need solitude so that we may converse more freely with God.

83. Guard yourself against conceit during times of positive change within you. Carefully reveal to the Lord in prayer your weakness and your ignorance regarding the subtleties of this conceit, so that you may not be forsaken or tempted into anything shameful; for pride is followed by fornication, and conceit by delusion.

84. When you place all other ascetic practices on one side of the scale and silence on the other, you will find that silence outweighs them. People have much advice; but when someone draws near to silence, it will be superfluous for him to follow that advice, and his former deeds will prove superfluous, and he himself will be found to have surpassed those deeds; for he has drawn near to perfection.

85. Let almsgiving always have the upper hand in you. Let our mercy be a mirror, so that we may see within ourselves that likeness and that true image which exists in God's nature and in God's essence. A cruel and unmerciful heart will never be purified. A merciful person is the healer of his own soul; for, as it were, with a strong wind from within, he dispels the darkness of the passions. This, according to the Gospel's word of life, is a good debt that we lend to God.

86. When you approach your bed, say to it: "Tonight, perhaps you will be my coffin, O bed; and I do not know whether, instead of temporary sleep, the eternal sleep to come will overtake me this very night." Therefore, while you still have legs, pursue the work of salvation before you are bound by chains that cannot be broken. While you still have fingers, crucify yourself in prayer before death comes. While you still have eyes, fill them with tears before they are covered with dust. Just as a rose withers as soon as the wind blows upon it, so if one of the elements that make up your being were to cease within you, you would die. Take to heart, O man, that your departure is imminent, and say to yourself unceasingly: "Behold, the messenger who has come for me is already at the door. Why then do I sit here? My departure is eternal; there will be no return."

87. Whoever loves conversing with Christ loves solitude. But whoever loves to remain among many is a friend of this world. If you love repentance, love silence as well. For without silence, repentance does not attain perfection. If you love silence—the mother of repentance—then gladly embrace the slight physical discomfort, the reproaches, and the insults that will be heaped upon you because of your silence. Devotion to silence is a constant anticipation of death. Whoever enters into silence without this mindset cannot bear what is inevitably associated with this way of life.

88. Let us love silence until the world is put to death in our hearts. Let us always remember death, and with this thought draw near to God with our hearts—and worldly pleasures will become contemptible to us.

89. One of the silent ones said: "I strive in silence so that the verses may be a delight to me as I read and pray. And when my tongue falls silent from the pleasure of comprehending them, then, as if in some kind of dream, I enter a state in which my senses and thoughts are stilled. And then, when, as this silence continues, my heart is stilled from the turmoil of memories, waves of joy are sent to me unceasingly through inner thoughts, coming suddenly, beyond all expectation, to delight my heart."

90. Another said: "Silence cuts off pretexts and causes for new thoughts, and within its own walls causes the memory of what we have previously occupied ourselves with to decay and wither away. And when old thoughts decay, then the mind, correcting them, returns to its proper order."

91. Yet another says: "Choose for yourself a delightful practice—unceasing vigil at night, during which all the fathers cast off the old man and were granted the renewal of the mind. In these hours, the soul experiences that immortal life, and through this experience, it casts off the garments of darkness and receives the Holy Spirit into itself."

92. And further: "It is impossible to subject these (external) senses to the authority of the soul without silence and withdrawal from people; for the rational soul, being essentially united and intertwined with these senses—which are its own—is involuntarily carried away by their impressions and thoughts unless a person remains vigilant in secret prayer."

93. Just as the seed of the sweat of fasting brings forth the ear of chastity, so does satiety bring forth lustful burning, and overindulgence brings forth impurity. When the belly is hungry and humble, shameful thoughts cannot penetrate the soul.

94. How your beauty, chastity, is illuminated by lying on the bare earth, by the toil of hunger that robs one of sleep, by the suffering of the flesh, which, when abstaining from food, becomes like a deep chasm between the ribs and the belly! Every morsel of food we take into our bodies and every repose of the flesh give rise within us to shameful imaginings and hideous fantasies; and as they arise, they incite us to a secret inclination toward shameful deeds. But the emptiness of the belly and of our thoughts makes our mind a desert, undisturbed by thoughts, and silent from all rebellious thoughts.

95. Some necessary instructions for the one who observes silence: If, during various services, you remain—as far as possible—free from the wandering of the mind, and suddenly the verse on your tongue is cut off, and the chains of silence are laid upon your soul without your free will, and this follows a long period of silence; then know that in your silence you are moving forward, and that meekness has begun to take root within you. For mere silence is truly worthy of condemnation. If you notice in your soul that with every thought that arises within it, with every recollection, and during the moments of contemplation that occur in your silence, your eyes fill with tears, and tears flow unbidden down your cheeks; then know that a breach is beginning to open before you, to the ruin of the adversaries. If you find within yourself that at times your mind, without any prior intention to do so and outside the usual order of things, sinks deep within you and remains in this state for about an hour or for some time, and then you notice that peace reigns in your thoughts—and the same thing happens to you repeatedly; then know that the cloud has begun to overshadow your dwelling. But if, when you undertake this task, you do not find peace from the passions that trouble you, do not be surprised. Just as the depths of the world, when deprived of the sun's rays, remain dark for a long time, so too do the scent of medicines and the fragrance of incense, spreading through the air, linger for quite some time before they dissipate and vanish; all the more so do passions, like dogs accustomed to licking blood in a butcher's shop, stand and bark when they are not given their usual food, until the power of their former habit is broken. But when you press forward, you will find the following clear signs close at hand in your soul: you will be strengthened in all things by hope and enriched by prayer—your mind will never lack what is useful whenever you encounter people and feel the frailty of human nature (each such occasion will protect you from pride)—the faults of your neighbor will become unworthy of attention in your eyes, – you will long to depart from this body with the same desire with which you would dwell in the age to come; – regarding every sorrowful trial that befalls you, whether openly or in secret, you will find that all this has come upon you justly and according to judgment, and you will give thanks to God for it.

96. Passions are set in motion either by certain images or by a feeling without images, and by memory—at first without passionate movements or thoughts—which then gives rise to irritation.

97. Constant vigil accompanied by reading, followed by frequent prostrations, will not fail to bring about, through diligent effort, a peaceful disposition of the heart. And whoever has attained it has done so through these very means. Those who wish to attain it again must remain in silence and, at the same time, practice what has been said; but first and foremost, they must not let their thoughts become attached to anything other than their own soul; they must practice inner work, and in reflecting on their actions themselves—practicing precisely those in which we find a certain feeling particularly close to us, one that affirms us in a good state of mind.

98. In every rational nature, there are countless changes, and changes occur in every person hour by hour. A discerning person can come to understand this by testing himself; if he remains sober-minded and observes himself in his own mind, he will easily discover what changes his thoughts undergo at any given time, how suddenly they shift from a peaceful state to confusion, and for what reasons. St. Macarius wrote about this in his instructions to the brethren, urging them not to fall into despair when changes for the worse occur; for even those who stand on the ladder of purity, just as the air cools, always experience falls from a better to a worse state, even though there is no negligence or self-indulgence on their part; on the contrary, even when they observe their discipline, such downfalls occur to them, contrary to the intention of their own will. The Blessed Mark affirms the same, saying: “Changes occur in everyone, just as in the air.” “In everyone,” that is, not only in the lowest and worst, but also in the perfect. Just as in nature there is cold and soon after heat—and likewise hail and, not long afterward, clear weather—so it is in our spiritual practice: sometimes struggle, sometimes help from grace; sometimes the soul is in turmoil and cruel waves rise up against it—and then a change occurs again, because grace visits and fills the human heart with joy and peace from God, with chaste and peaceful thoughts.

99. Therefore, when you are in turmoil, do not despair—and when you are filled with peace, do not become arrogant. On the contrary, examine more closely within yourself the impure thoughts and those unseemly images that took root in your mind during the turmoil, in the hour of confusion and disorder of thoughts; —and reflect on how quickly you were led astray by your passions and conversed with them in a clouded state of mind; and know that all this was brought upon us by God's Providence for our humility, for He provides for each of us and arranges what is beneficial for each person.

100. Humility, even without heroic deeds, makes many sins forgivable; but without humility, even heroic deeds are useless and even bring us much harm. Just as salt is to all food, so is humility to every virtue. To acquire it, we must constantly grieve in our thoughts with self-abasement and judicious sorrow. And if we acquire it, it will make us children of God.

101. Our Lord has shown us the support for our weakness in prayer, saying: “Awake, ‘watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation’” (Matt. 26:41). Pray and do not be slothful, but at all times “be watchful and pray” (Col. 4:2–3). “Ask, and you will receive; seek, and you will find”; “knock, and it will be opened to you.” For everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks, it will be opened” (Matt. 7:7–8). He especially confirmed this word of His and urged us to greater diligence with the parable of a friend who came to his friend at midnight and asked him for bread. The Lord says: “Amen, I say to you, even if he does not give it to him because he is his friend, yet because of his persistence he will rise and give him whatever he needs” (Luke 11:8). And you, pray, and do not be negligent. What an unspeakable encouragement to boldness!

102. The Lord knows that before death He will not take away from us the possibility of straying, that this change is very close to us—namely, the transition from virtue to vice—and that man and his nature are capable of embracing the opposite; which is why He has commanded us to be vigilant and to strive in constant prayer. And He commanded us to pray not only to protect ourselves from obvious change, but also because of the subtlety and incomprehensibility of what we constantly encounter—things that cannot be grasped by our minds in those states in which we often find ourselves involuntarily. For although our thoughts are very firm and attached to what is good, His Providence nevertheless repeatedly leaves us on the brink of temptations and casts us into them, as the blessed Paul said: “A thorn in the flesh was given to me” (2 Cor. 12:7–9).

103. This world is a contest and an arena for competition. This is a time of struggle. And during a struggle, and during a contest, there is no law; that is, the King sets no limits for His warriors until the contest is over, and every person is brought to the gates of the King of Kings and tested there to see whether he has won the contest or has broken his back. Here there is but one law—to remain vigilant and to resist. —Let us not neglect prayer, nor be too lazy to ask for help from the Lord, without Whom we can do nothing that is pleasing to Him. — Let us firmly keep in mind that as long as we are in this world and remain in the flesh—even if we were to ascend to the heavenly vault—we cannot remain idle and without labor, nor can we be without care.

104. Perfection in this path consists in the following: repentance, purity, and self-improvement. (The repentant person enters into a struggle against the passions—and struggles until the heart is purified of them; the purification of the heart is the end of the struggle and the gateway to the realm of perfection.)

105. Someone was asked, “What is repentance?” And he replied, “Abandoning one’s former ways and grieving over them”; and also, “a contrite and humble heart.”

106. He was also asked, “How can a person acquire humility?” And he said, “By constantly remembering one’s sins and the nearness of death, by wearing simple clothing—by always choosing the last place, and in every situation willingly taking on the most menial and humbling tasks—by not being disobedient, – to remain silent, – not to enjoy attending gatherings, to desire to remain unknown and unelected to any office, – not to keep any possession entirely at one’s own disposal, – to detest conversation with many people, – to have no love of gain, and, moreover, to rise above the inclination to criticize and accuse anyone, and above envy, – not to be the kind of person whose hands are on everyone and upon whom everyone’s hands are laid, but to go about one’s business alone in solitude, and not to take upon oneself the care of anything in the world except oneself. In short: a life of wandering, poverty, and solitude—these are the things from which humility is born and the heart is purified.”

107. The sign of those who have attained perfection is this: even if they were to be delivered ten times a day to be burned for the sake of love for their neighbors, they would not be satisfied with this, as demonstrated by Moses (Ex. 32:32), Blessed Paul (Rom. 9:3), and the other Apostles. – God delivered His Son to death on the cross out of love for His creatures. And if He had had anything more precious, He would have given it to us as well, in order thereby to win our race for Himself. – Imitating this, all the saints, striving for perfection, seek to become like God in the perfection of love for their neighbor.

108. No one can attain the level of this love unless they feel it in the secret of their hope. Those who love this world cannot acquire love for others. When someone acquires love, they are clothed in God Himself along with that love. And whoever has acquired God must not only refuse to accept anything else alongside Him, but must also put off his own body. But if anyone, through love for the world, clothes himself in this world and this life, he will not be clothed in God until he leaves this behind. For God Himself has testified to this, saying: “If anyone” does not forsake this, and “does not hate his own soul, he cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:26). One must not only forsake it, but also hate it.

109. Why is hope so sweet, and why do all deeds become easy in its presence?—Because at that moment a natural desire (for well-being) is awakened in the souls of the saints, and hope allows them to drink of this in the monastery from its own cup, and it delights them. Therefore, they no longer feel the toil, but become insensitive to toil and sorrow, and throughout their entire journey they think that their journey is taking place as if on air, and that they are not walking on human feet; for the difficulty of the path is invisible to them; there are no hills or streams before them, and what are rough places on the path become smooth for them (Isa. 40:4). Their attention is turned toward the bosom of their Father—and hope itself, as if with a finger, points them at every moment toward what is distant and invisible, yet visible to the secret eye of faith; and the desire for this distant goal, as if by fire, kindles every part of their soul. All the striving of their thoughts extends toward that end, and they always hasten to reach it. Thus hope kindles them as with fire, and they cannot grant themselves rest in this swift and unceasing flow, which they carry out with joy.

110. Detachment does not consist solely in not feeling passions, but also in not allowing them to take root within oneself. As a result of the many and varied virtues, both manifest and hidden, acquired by the Saints, the passions have been exhausted within them, and they cannot easily rise up against their soul; nor does their mind need to be constantly attentive in its reasoning; for it is at all times filled with thoughts that are consciously stirred in the mind by reflection and conversation about the most excellent virtues. And as soon as the passions begin to stir, the mind is suddenly captivated by a certain insight that has penetrated it, keeping the passions at bay; and the passions, as Blessed Mark said, remain within them as if idle.

111. The mind, by the grace of God, as it performs virtuous deeds and draws near to knowledge, scarcely perceives that which constitutes the evil and unwise part of the soul. For knowledge lifts it up to the heights and separates it from all that is in the world. And because of the purity of the saints, and the subtlety, flexibility, and sharpness of their minds, as well as because of their ascetic efforts, their minds are purified and find themselves enlightened, due to the dryness of their flesh. And, as a result of their training in silence and their prolonged abiding in it, every inner contemplation comes easily and quickly, and what they contemplate fills them with wonder. At the same time, they are usually abounding in contemplations, and their mind never lacks objects of understanding, nor are they ever without that which produces the fruit of the Spirit within them. Through long-standing practice, the memories that stir up passions in their hearts are erased, and the power of the devil's dominion is weakened. For when the soul does not associate with the passions by dwelling on them—since it is constantly occupied with other concerns—the power of the passions cannot hold its spiritual sensibilities in its clutches.

112. Just as pride carries the soul aloft and gives it freedom to soar in the clouds of its own thoughts and to whirl about throughout all creation, so humility gathers the soul into a single point through silence—and it becomes centered within itself. Just as the soul within the body is hidden from sight and from communion with all people, so too does a truly humble person not only desire not to be seen or known by others, but even will to plunge from himself into himself, to become nothing, as if nonexistent, as if not yet brought into being. – And as long as such a person remains hidden, withdrawn into himself, and separated from the world, he abides entirely with his Lord.

113. The humble never stops to look at gatherings, crowds, commotion, noise, or revelry—nor does he pay attention to words, conversations, shouts, or the distraction of the senses—for his desire is not to possess many things or to be constantly occupied, but to be free at all times, free from cares, so that his thoughts do not stray beyond himself. For he is certain that if he becomes involved in many things, he will not be able to remain free from confusion of thought; because with many tasks come many worries and a multitude of complex thoughts; and through this, the door to passions is opened, the stillness of reason is driven away, and the door to peace is shut. Therefore, the humble-minded person guards himself against all that is excessive; and through this, he remains at all times in stillness, in peace, in tranquility, in modesty, and in reverence.

114. The humble and wise person is never hasty, hurried, or confused, nor does he have impetuous or frivolous thoughts, but he remains at peace at all times. There is nothing that could astonish, confuse, or terrify him; for neither in sorrow does he become terrified or change, nor in joy does he become astonished or elated. But all his joy and gladness are in whatever pleases his Lord.

115. The humble-minded dare not even pray to God or ask for anything, nor do they know what to pray for; but they simply remain silent with all their senses, awaiting only the mercy and the will that shall come upon them from the face of the Most Worshiped Majesty, —when he bows his face to the ground, and the inner vision of his heart is lifted up to the gates of the Holy of Holies, where He dwells in darkness, before Whom the eyes of the Seraphim are closed—and dares only to speak and pray thus: “According to Your will, O Lord, let it be with me.”

116. Walk before God in simplicity, not in the cleverness of the mind. Simplicity is followed by faith; but the subtlety and cunning of cleverness are followed by self-conceit; and self-conceit, in turn, leads to separation from God.

117. When you stand before God in prayer, make yourself in your thoughts like a speechless infant. Do not speak before God from any knowledge, but draw near to Him with childlike thoughts, and walk before Him, so that you may be deemed worthy of that fatherly care which fathers have for their infant children. It is said: “The Lord preserves the little ones” (Ps. 114:5)—not only those who are small in body, but also those who are wise in the world, who, having set aside their own knowledge, have, of their own free will, made themselves like little children, and have begun to learn of that all-pervading Wisdom which cannot be attained through the labors of (of the books). Ask God that He may grant you to attain the measure of this faith. Pray for this without laziness, seek it with fervor, and implore it with great earnestness until you receive it. You will be granted this if you first, with faith, compel yourself to cast your cares upon God and replace your own concern with His providence. And when God sees in you this resolve—that with a pure heart you have entrusted yourself to God Himself more than to yourself, and have compelled yourself to trust in God more than in your own soul—then that inexpressible power will take up residence within you, and you will tangibly feel that there is undoubtedly a power with you—that power which, when felt within themselves, causes many to walk through fire without fear and to walk on water without wavering in their minds from the fear of drowning.

118. Does it not seem to you that this spiritual knowledge might in some way be mistaken for knowledge of the soul?—Not only is it impossible to mistake this spiritual knowledge for that of the soul, but there is not even any possibility of perceiving it through the senses by anyone who zealously practices the knowledge of the soul. And if any of them wish to draw near to this other spiritual knowledge, they will not be able to do so—even slightly—until they renounce this mental knowledge, along with all its subtle twists and complex methods, and adopt a childlike way of thinking. On the contrary, the habits and concepts of mental guidance become a great obstacle to them until they gradually erase them. This spiritual guidance is simple and does not shine through in mental thoughts. Until the mind is freed from many thoughts and attains a single simplicity of purity, it will not be able to perceive spiritual guidance.

119. If you have once entrusted yourself to the Lord, who is all-sufficient to protect you and watch over you, then do not worry about such things again, but say to your soul: “In every matter, He to whom I once entrusted my soul is sufficient for me. I am not here; He knows this.” – Then you will truly see the wonders of God—you will see how God is always near to deliver those who fear Him, and how His Providence surrounds you, even though it is invisible. But just because the Guardian who dwells with you is invisible to the physical eye, you must not doubt Him as if He did not exist; for He often reveals Himself even to the physical eye, so that you may be comforted.

120. As soon as a person rejects all visible help and human hope, and follows God with faith and a pure heart, grace immediately follows him and reveals its power to him through various forms of assistance. First, God reveals Himself in the visible, bodily realm and provides help through His providence, so that in this way, above all else, he may come to feel the power of God’s Providence. By comprehending this visible help, he is assured of help in the hidden as well—in the course of which grace reveals to him the intricate web of difficult thoughts and intentions, as a result of which a person can easily discern their meaning, their mutual connection, and their allure, and how they arise from one another—and destroy the soul. At the same time, grace exposes before his eyes all the wickedness of the demons, and, as it were, points out to him what he would have suffered had he not come to know this. Then the thought arises in him that he must ask his Creator for every thing, small and great, in prayer.

121. When God’s grace strengthens his resolve to trust in God in all these matters, he gradually begins to face temptations. And grace allows temptations to be sent upon him, commensurate with his capacity, so that he may bear their weight. And in these temptations, help draws near to him tangibly, so that he may remain steadfast until he is gradually trained and acquires wisdom, and, trusting in God, comes to despise his enemies. For it is impossible for a person to become wise in spiritual battles, to know his Provider, to sense his God, and to be firmly established in faith in Him, except through the strength gained by enduring trials.

122. As soon as Grace perceives that a hint of doubt is beginning to arise in a person’s thoughts, and that he has begun to think highly of himself, it immediately allows temptations to intensify and grow stronger against him, until he recognizes his own weakness and once again, in humility, clings to God.

123. Do not be surprised that when you set out to practice virtue, severe and intense sorrows pour down upon you from every side; for virtue is not considered such if its practice is not accompanied by difficulty. That is why St. John (Colov or the Prophet) said: “Virtues usually encounter difficulties; it is worthy of reproach when it is attached to ease.” And Blessed Mark says: “Every perfect virtue is called a cross when it fulfills the commandment of the Spirit.” This is the Apostolic teaching that “all who desire to live” in the fear of the Lord and “in Christ Jesus will be persecuted” (2 Tim. 3:12). The Lord, however, says: “Whoever loses his life for My sake will find it” (Matt. 16:25). For this reason, He offers you the cross at the very beginning, so that you may first commit yourself to the cross, and only then send your soul to follow Him.

124. Nothing is as powerful as despair. It knows no defeat, whether by the right hand or the left. When a person, in his thoughts, robs his life of hope, then there is nothing more daring than he. None of his enemies can stand against him, and there is no sorrow whose very mention would exhaust his wisdom; for every sorrow that befalls him is lighter than death, and he has bowed his head to accept death upon himself.

125. The hope of peace has at all times caused people to forget what is great, good, and virtuous. Both before our time and to this day, not because of anything else but precisely because of this, people grow weary; and not only do they fail to achieve victory, but they even lose what is best. Therefore, to put it briefly, if a person neglects the Kingdom of Heaven, it is surely because of the hope for a little earthly comfort. Who does not know that birds approach the net, seeking rest?

126. When the mind is zealous for virtue, then the external senses do not yield to any difficulties. When the heart is zealous in spirit, then the body does not grieve over sorrows, does not fall into fear, and does not shrink back in terror; for then the mind, like a diamond, resists all temptations within it with its firmness. Let us, then, be zealous—and indifference, which breeds laziness, will flee from us. Zeal breeds courage and gives the soul victorious strength. What power of the demons can withstand it when the soul mobilizes its natural zeal against them?

127. Our ancient fathers, knowing that our mind is not always able to remain focused on one thing and keep watch, and at other times cannot even discern what harms it, clad themselves in detachment from worldly possessions as if it were a weapon and withdrew to the desert, where there are no worldly pursuits that give rise to passions, so as to have no cause for irritation, desire, or resentment. Against all this and the like, they fortified and shielded themselves as with an impregnable pillar.

128. When a person lives in detachment, the thought of departing from this life constantly comes to mind—and he devotes constant care to preparing for it, — he shuns all rest; the thought of renouncing the world stirs vividly in his mind; he fortifies his heart to face dangers without fear; he does not fear death, for he fixes his gaze upon it at every moment; he accepts sorrows, if they come, with joy and gladness, knowing that they bring crowns. But if it happens that he acquires anything transitory, then at that very moment a love for the body begins to awaken in his soul; thoughts of carnal comfort arise, along with ways to obtain everything that serves that purpose; from this point on, the steadfastness of heart he possessed—when, in his detachment from worldly goods, he was above the world—begins to slip away from him, and his soul becomes overwhelmed by thoughts that instill fear for his life; thus, his firm hope in God departs from him.

129. Various Sayings. — Just as it is impossible for one whose head is submerged in water to breathe in the thin air, so too is it impossible for one who immerses his thoughts in earthly cares to breathe in the sensations of that new world. Just as a deadly stench disrupts the body’s constitution, so does an indecent sight disrupt the peace of the mind. Just as glass cannot remain intact when it collides with a nearby stone, so too a saint, when he remains with and converses with a woman for a long time, cannot preserve his purity and avoid being defiled. Just as trees are uprooted by a strong and constant flow of water, so too is love for the world uprooted from the heart by the flow of temptations directed at the body. Just as bitter medicines purge the impurity of unhealthy fluids from the body, so the severity of sorrows purifies the heart of wicked passions. Just as it is impossible for one who spares his enemy on the battlefield to remain unharmed, so it is impossible for the ascetic to save his soul from destruction if he spares his body. Just as a young maiden, struck by the sight of something terrifying, runs to her parents, clings to their clothes, and cries out for help, so too does the soul—to the extent that it is distressed and crushed by the fear of temptations—hurry to cling to God, calling upon Him in unceasing prayer. And as long as temptations continue to assail her one after another, she redoubles her supplication; but as soon as she is set free, she gives herself over to idle thoughts. Just as one who brings a great gift to the King is rewarded by him with a gracious glance, so too does the great King of the ages, God, forgive every measure of sin to the one who has tears in his prayer, and reward him with a gracious glance. Just as a man carrying a precious pearl, walking along a path frequented by robbers, is in constant fear of being attacked and robbed; so too, the one who bears the pearl of chastity and walks in the world—this path full of enemies—cannot be free from the fear of these robbers until he reaches the abode of the tomb, that is, the land of rest. Just as a person who drinks wine on a day of mourning, once intoxicated, forgets all sorrow about his difficult situation, so too does one who is intoxicated with the love of God in this world—that is, in the house of weeping—forget all his labors and sorrows, and because of his intoxication becomes insensitive to all sinful passions, his heart is strengthened by hope in God, his soul is light as a feathered bird, his mind is lifted from the earth at every moment, his thoughts soar above all that is human, and he enjoys immortality with the Most High.

130. Humility is the garment of the Godhead. The incarnate Word clothed Himself in it, and through it spoke to us in our flesh, veiling the majesty of His greatness and His glory with this humility, so that creation might not be consumed by gazing upon Him. Creation could not have looked upon Him had He not taken on a part of it, and thus come to speak with it. Therefore, whoever puts on this garment of humility puts on Christ Himself; for in the likeness in which Christ was visible to His creation and lived among it, he too desires to clothe his inner man.

131. Humility is a certain mysterious power which, upon the completion of their entire life, the perfect saints receive. This power is given by the power of grace only to those who are perfect in virtue, for this virtue encompasses everything.

132. Not everyone who is modest, silent, and gentle has already attained the degree of humility. Nor will we call one who acts with humility when recalling his sins, grieving over them, truly humble, even though this is praiseworthy; for he does not yet possess humility, but is skillfully drawing it near to himself—he desires only humility, but does not yet have it. The truly humble person has no need to use his own reasoning to invent reasons for humility, but manifests humility in everything without effort or self-compulsion.

133. If anyone asks how to acquire humility, we will answer him: “It is enough for a disciple” to become like his teacher—a servant like his master (Matt. 10:25). See how He who commanded humility and grants this gift manifested humility—imitate Him, and you will acquire it.

134. We must avoid in every way anything that stirs up evil passions within us; above all, we must cut off within ourselves the causes of these passions and whatever sets them in motion, even the smallest ones; and when, despite this, passions do arise, we must resist them and fight against them. For both of these purposes, the very best thing is to immerse oneself in one’s inner self and remain there in solitude, ceaselessly cultivating the vineyard of one’s heart. When our mind dwells there in solitude and seclusion, it is no longer the mind that wages war against the passions, but grace.

135. The purpose of the Savior’s coming, when He gave us His life-giving commandments as purifying remedies for our passionate state, was to cleanse the soul from the damage caused by the first transgression and to restore it to its original state. Just as remedies are for a sick body, so are the commandments for a passionate soul. And it is clear that the commandments are established in opposition to the passions, for the healing of the sinful soul.

136. The corruption came upon us through the transgression of the commandments. From this it is already evident that health is restored by keeping them. And without keeping the commandments—unless we first set out on the path leading to purity of soul—we must not even desire or hope for the purification of the soul. And do not say that God, even without our keeping the commandments, can grant us the purification of the soul by His grace. These are the Lord’s judgments, and the Church does not command us to ask for anything of the sort. The Jews, during their return from Babylon to Jerusalem, traveled by natural means; but Ezekiel arrived in Jerusalem supernaturally and, through divine revelation, became a witness to the future renewal. Something similar occurs in the matter of purity of soul. Some, by following a well-trodden path—through keeping the commandments in a life of great toil, even at the cost of their own blood—attain purity of soul; while others are granted it as a gift of grace. And it is remarkable that we are not permitted to ask in prayer for the purity granted to us by grace, nor to renounce a life spent in keeping the commandments. For to the rich man who asked the Lord, “What must I do to inherit eternal life?” the Lord clearly said, “Keep the commandments” (Luke 10:25). But when the rich man pressed for further instruction, He said: “If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and take up your cross and follow Me” (Matthew 19:21). And this means: die to everything you possess, and then live in Me; depart from the old world of passions, and then enter the new world of the Spirit. For the Lord, having said, “Take up your cross” (Matt.

16:24), thereby taught man to die to everything in the world. And when he had put to death the old man within himself—that is, his passions—then He said to him, “Follow Me.” It is impossible for the old man to walk in the way of Christ.

137. Blessed Basil the Great and the blessed Gregorys, who loved the desert and extolled silence, did not come to silence because they had failed to practice the commandments, but lived first in the world, keeping the commandments that those living in society were required to keep, and then attained purity of soul and were deemed worthy of spiritual contemplation. And after this, they hastened to go out into the silence of the desert; and from that time on, they dwelt with their inner man; therefore, they became contemplatives and remained in spiritual contemplation until they were called by grace to become shepherds of the Church of Christ.

138. The desert lulls the passions to sleep. But one thing is required of a person for this—to lull one’s passions to sleep, and even to root them out, that is, to overcome them when they persist in opposing us. For passions that have been lulled to sleep are reawakened as soon as a cause arises for them to come into action. Let us therefore desire the desert not merely because it lulls the passions to sleep, but let us wish that, amid the lack of sensory pleasures and in isolation from all others, we may find wisdom there, and that the inner, spiritual man in Christ may be renewed within us; so that at every moment we may be watchful over ourselves, and so that our mind may become vigilant, guarding itself at all times, and may not lose sight of the hope within it.

139. Our Lord, in order to make us like the greatness of our Heavenly Father, has ordained mercy for us, yet monks prefer silence to mercy. How can this be reconciled? The Lord has ordained mercy so that we may become like our Heavenly Father, because it draws the merciful closer to God. And we, as monks, honor silence without excluding mercy, but striving as much as possible to distance ourselves from vain cares and turmoil; —we do not intend to neglect our duty (toward our neighbors), but we cherish silence so that (more accurately, to fulfill another higher duty) we may abide in the contemplation of God, through which we can best restore our purity and draw near to God. If, however, at some point our brothers should have a genuine need for us, we must not neglect it. Therefore, let us constantly urge ourselves to be inwardly merciful toward every rational being at all times. For this is what the Lord’s teaching inspires in us, and it is in this—and not in anything vain—that the distinction of our silence lies. And we must not only preserve this inner compassion of ours, but, when circumstances call for it, we must not neglect to demonstrate our love openly.

140. The Giver of Life has summed up the fullness of the commandments in two commandments that encompass all the others—love for God and a similar love for the image of God. The first fulfills the purpose of spiritual contemplation, while the second fulfills both contemplation and action. For the nature of God is simple, invisible, and naturally lacks nothing; and consciousness, in its self-contemplation, naturally lacks nothing with regard to God; in bodily activity, its activity is simple and manifests itself in a single part of the mind, in accordance with the simplicity of the venerable Giver, which is above carnal sensation. And the second commandment—that is, love of one’s neighbor—due to the duality of nature, requires that we desire to fulfill in the body, in the same way, what we fulfill invisibly in consciousness. Since action always precedes contemplation, it is impossible for anyone to rise to the realm of the higher unless they first fulfill the lower through actual deeds. And no one may claim, with regard to love for one’s neighbor, that they excel in it with their soul if they neglect that part which, to the best of their ability and in accordance with time and place, is carried out in the flesh. For it is only through this fulfillment that it becomes certain that perfect love exists within a person. And when we are, as far as possible, faithful and true in this, then the soul is given the strength, in simple and incomparable concepts, to extend itself to the great realm of lofty and divine contemplation. But where it is not possible to fulfill love for one’s neighbor through deeds visible in the body, there our love for our neighbors, fulfilled only by the soul, is sufficient before God.

141. Whoever desires to love God above all else must take care to preserve the purity of his soul; and the purity of the soul is attained by overcoming and eradicating the passions. Passions are a door shut before the face of purity. Unless one opens this shut door, he will not enter the spotless and pure realm of the heart. And without this, the soul cannot have boldness in the hour of prayer; for this boldness is the fruit of purity and of the efforts made to attain it. Here is the order in which all this takes place: patience, with self-discipline, struggles against the passions for the sake of purity; if the soul overcomes the passions, it attains purity; and true purity causes the mind to gain boldness in the hour of prayer.

142. Let us refrain from asking God for anything lofty; but above all, let us acquire patience for whatever befalls us—and with great humility and contrition regarding what is within us and our thoughts, let us ask for the forgiveness of our sins and for the peace of our souls. One of the Fathers wrote: “Whoever does not consider himself a sinner, his prayer is not accepted by the Lord.” It is written that “the Kingdom of God does not come with observance” (i.e., in a noticeable way)—(Luke 17:20). For our part, we will strive in every way to put our hearts in order through acts of repentance and a life pleasing to God; the Lord’s Kingdom will come of its own accord if the place in our hearts is pure and undefiled. As for what we seek “with observance”—that is, God’s exalted gifts—this is not approved by the Church of God; and those who have received such things have brought upon themselves pride and downfall. And this is not a sign that a person loves God, but a sickness of the soul. And how can we seek God’s exalted gifts when Paul boasts of his sufferings and considers participation in Christ’s sufferings to be a great gift from God?

143. As long as the soul is afflicted by passions, it does not perceive the spiritual with its senses, nor does it know how to desire it; rather, it desires only what it hears with its ears and reads in the Scriptures. The inner power of the soul is healed from these illnesses by the secret fulfillment of the commandments, through participation in Christ’s sufferings. Initially, our nature, through Christ’s incarnation, received renewal and was united with Christ’s suffering and death; and then, through this renewal by the shedding of blood, it was sanctified and became capable of receiving the new and perfect commandments. And if these commandments had been given to people before the shedding of blood, before the renewal and sanctification of our nature, then perhaps even the newest commandments, like the ancient ones, would have merely cut off vice in the soul, but would not have been able to eradicate the very root of vice from the soul. Now, however, it is not so: the inner workings and the new and spiritual commandments, which the soul keeps out of the fear of God, renew and sanctify the soul, and secretly heal all its members. For it is clear to all what passion each commandment silently heals within the soul, and their effectiveness is palpable to both the healer and the one being healed, just as it was with the woman suffering from a hemorrhage.

144. The healing of the passionate part of the soul can also be accomplished by grace, as was the case with the blessed Apostles. But this is a matter of God’s special election; ordinarily, however, the soul attains health through the lawful path. Namely: whoever has overcome the passions through the observance of the commandments and the arduous labors of a true life has attained spiritual health by the lawful—common—path, has been nourished with milk beyond the materiality of this world, has cut off his former nature within himself, and has been reborn, as in the beginning, in the spiritual realm, and by grace, having acquired the understanding of the inner man, has become visible in the realm of the spirit, and has received into himself the new, uncomplicated world.

145. When the mind is renewed and the heart is sanctified, then all the concepts arising within it are stirred in accordance with the nature of the world into which it enters. First, a love for the Divine is stirred within it, and it longs for communion with the Angels and the revelation of the mysteries of spiritual knowledge; his mind is purified by the spiritual knowledge of creatures, and the contemplation of the mysteries of the Holy Trinity shines within him, as well as the mysteries of the divine economy established for our sake; and then he enters fully into union with the knowledge of hope for the future.

146. If the soul, while confined to the realm of the passions, could truly comprehend the spiritual, it would have no need to ask about or inquire into the mysteries of the spiritual world. But it is clear that instruction and knowledge, when accompanied by passions, are of no benefit and are insufficient to open the door that is closed to the face of purity. When, however, the passions are removed from the soul, then the mind is enlightened and placed in the pure realm of nature, and has no need for questions; for it clearly sees the blessings found in their proper place. For just as the external senses do not perceive the natures and things that come into contact with them as a result of instruction, but each sense naturally perceives the thing that meets it: so, in a similar way, imagine spiritual contemplation. For the mind, which penetrates the hidden mysteries of the spirit, if it is in its natural health, fully contemplates the glory of Christ, and neither asks questions nor learns, but delights in the mysteries of the new world, beyond the freedom of the will, in proportion to the fervor of faith and hope in Christ.

147. If you desire your heart to become a dwelling place for the mysteries of the new world, then first enrich yourself through bodily works: fasting, vigil, worship, asceticism, patience, the subduing of thoughts, and the like. Engage your mind in reading the Scriptures and delving deeply into them; write the commandments before your eyes; and through ceaseless prayerful conversation and deep immersion in prayer, uproot from your heart every image and every likeness that you have previously conceived. Train your mind to delve constantly into the mysteries of the Savior's household; cease to seek for yourself knowledge and contemplation, which, in their proper place and time, transcend verbal description, and continue to fulfill the commandments and labor to attain purity, and ask the Lord to grant you a life of wisdom. The beginning, middle, and end of this life consist of the following: the severing of all things through union with Christ. If, however, you long for the contemplation of the mysteries, cultivate the commandments within yourself through action, and not merely through a desire to know them. Spiritual contemplation operates within us in the realm of purity.

148. Contemplation among the children of the mystery of faith is united with faith and feeds on the pastures of Scripture. Words that are incomprehensible to the intellect become understandable to us through faith, and we gain knowledge of them through contemplation, which comes after purification. For the spiritual mysteries, which are beyond understanding and which neither the bodily senses nor the rational power of the mind can perceive, God has given us faith, through which we know only that these mysteries exist. And from this faith, hope in them is born within us (that is, the hope of comprehending them). By faith we confess that God is the Lord, the Ruler, the Creator, and the Organizer of all things. Consequently, moved by our conscience, we resolve that we must keep His commandments, and understand that the old commandments are kept out of fear, while Christ's life-giving commandments are kept out of love, as the Lord says: "If you love Me, keep My commandments. 'And I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Advocate'" (John 14:15–16). By the coming of the Advocate, He means the gift of the revelation of spiritual mysteries; therefore, in receiving the Spirit, whom the Apostles received, lies the fullness of spiritual knowledge. And the Lord promised, after interceding with His Father, to give them the Comforter, so that as they keep His commandments and purify themselves, He might abide with them forever. Do you see that by keeping the commandments, the mind is made worthy of the grace of mystical contemplation and the revelations of spiritual knowledge?

149. Keeping the commandments reveals such power when it is done out of love for the One who gave them, and not out of fear. Therefore, the lawful door leading to contemplation is love. On all the ascents of revelations of knowledge and mystical contemplations, Divine love leads those who have attained it both upward and downward. Therefore, one must first acquire love; and after that, spiritual contemplation will come to us naturally. And understand the wisdom of the blessed Paul, how he set aside all the gifts bestowed by grace and asked for the most essential one—that by which the gifts are received and preserved, namely, love (1 Cor. 13). It is the place of revelations; and in this place, contemplation reveals itself to us of its own accord. Just as, as the soul matures naturally, it takes in more and more knowledge about what exists in the world, and learns this more and more day by day, so too in the spiritual realm does a person take in spiritual contemplation and a sense of the Divine, and learns this to the extent that the mind matures in a life of reason. But when he enters the realm of love, then he contemplates the spiritual in its proper place.

150. As long as a person exerts effort to make the spiritual descend to him, it does not yield. And if he dares to dream, and lifts his gaze toward the spiritual, and attempts to reach it with his understanding before the time is right, his vision soon becomes dulled, and instead of reality, he perceives phantoms and images. As soon as you grasp this with your discerning mind, you will not seek contemplation out of turn. But if it seems to you that even now (before entering the realm of purity and love) you are experiencing contemplation, then this contemplation is the shadow of a phantom, not true contemplation; for everything conceived in the mind has a semblance and a dreamlike image, but there is also true contemplation. And in the natural order, sometimes what is real is seen, and sometimes the opposite of that; the eye sees a shadow instead of reality, sees water where there is no water, sees buildings suspended in the air, even though they stand on the ground. Imagine the same phenomenon with regard to the mental as you do with the physical.

151. If the mind's vision is not purified by the fulfillment of the commandments and by the deeds of a silent life, if it does not attain the perfection of the light of love, and if it does not progress with age in the renewal of Christ, then it cannot become a true beholder of divine contemplation. Nevertheless, those spiritual likenesses that the mind attempts to construct for itself are called illusions, not reality. And the fact that the mind sees one thing instead of another stems from the fact that it has not been purified. This was also the case with the external philosophers, who regarded as spiritual that about which they had not received true teaching from God—and boasted about it in undue conceit, divided the one God into polytheism, spoke and agreed among themselves in the mockery of their thoughts, and called this delusion of their foolish thoughts “speculation on the nature of things.”

152. True contemplation of the sensible and supersensible realms and of the Holy Trinity itself is revealed in Christ’s Revelation. Christ taught this to people and showed it to them when, through His Hypostasis, He first renewed human nature, restored and granted it its original freedom, and Himself paved the way for us to ascend to the Truth through His life-giving commandments. And our nature is capable of becoming a spectator of true—rather than imaginary—contemplation only when a person, through the endurance of suffering, labor, and sorrow, casts off the old, passion-ridden man, just as a newborn infant casts off the garments worn while in the womb. Then the mind, having been spiritually reborn, becomes capable of receiving the contemplation of its true homeland.

153. And this contemplation serves as nourishment for the mind until it reaches a state where it can receive a higher contemplation than the first; for one contemplation leads a person to another, until the mind is introduced into the realm of perfect love. Love is the abode of the spiritual, and it dwells in the purity of the soul. When the mind enters the realm of love, then grace is at work; the mind receives spiritual contemplation and becomes a beholder of the hidden.

154. As I have already said, the gift of revelations of intellectual contemplation is granted in two ways. Sometimes it is granted by grace for fervent faith; and sometimes for keeping the commandments and for purity. By grace, as was the case with the blessed Apostles, who purified their minds not by keeping the commandments but by fervent faith; for they believed in Christ with simplicity and, without a doubt, with a heart ablaze, followed Him. And when Christ had accomplished His most venerable work of building up the Church, He sent them the Spirit of the Comforter, Who purified and perfected their minds, and effectively put to death within them the old, passion-driven man, and effectively brought to life within them the new, spiritual man. – Thus, the blessed Paul was mysteriously renewed, and thereafter received the contemplation of the mysteries of revelation. It is not written what Jesus spoke to him openly, but it is written that Ananias said to him: “Saul, brother, our Lord Jesus Christ, who appeared to you on the road, has sent me to you so that your eyes may be opened and you may be filled with the Holy Spirit” (Acts 9:17). – And when he baptized him, he was filled with the Holy Spirit; and he perceived the hidden mysteries of the revelations, just as this had happened to the holy Apostles, to whom the Lord Jesus had said: “I have much more to say to you, but you cannot bear it now; yet when the Holy Spirit comes, He will guide you into all the truth and will tell you what is to come” (John 16:12–13).

155. And it was precisely then, when Blessed Paul received the Holy Spirit and was renewed by Him, that he was deemed worthy of the mysteries of revelation; he began to contemplate through the spirit of revelation, took delight in this contemplation, heard ineffable words, beheld the highest nature, marveled at the visions of the heavenly powers, and took delight in the spiritual. And let it not be as the heretics (Euktitai) claim in their madness, that he attained this ascent of his own volition! The mind cannot ascend there at all. On the contrary, Paul was caught up in the spirit of revelation, as he himself wrote in his epistle to the Corinthians (2 Cor. 12:2, 4), contrary to these vain people, who likened themselves to the holy Apostles and called the fantasies of their thoughts “spiritual contemplations.”

156. Regarding people who are filled with passions and engage in the study of the laws of the corporeal and incorporeal—and who, therefore, are no different from the sick who teach rules for maintaining health—one of the Saints wrote: “Blessed is Paul, when he learned of disciples who neglected the commandments and had not overcome their passions, yet longed for the bliss of contemplating the mysteries—a bliss possible only after purification from those passions—said to them: ‘First put off the old man of passions, and then desire to put on the new man, renewed by the knowledge of the mysteries in the likeness of the Creator; and do not desire my bliss or that of the other Apostles, which is actively perfected by grace; for “God has mercy on whom He wills, and He hardens whom He wills” (Rom. 9:18). For who can stand against Him, or resist His will?—God sometimes grants freely; at other times He requires deeds and purification, and only then sends the gift; and sometimes, even after deeds and purification, He does not grant it here, but reserves it to bestow the vision in its proper place.”

157. We find that He acts in this way even with regard to a gift lesser than this—that is, the forgiveness of sins. For He grants baptism freely and requires absolutely nothing except faith; but when it comes to repentance for sins after baptism, He does not forgive immediately, but requires labor, sorrow, grief, contrition, tears, and prolonged weeping—and only then does He forgive. He forgave the thief immediately for a single confession spoken on the cross, and promised him the kingdom; but from the sinful woman, He also required faith and tears.

158. The soul that loves God finds rest in God and in Him alone. First, sever every external bond within yourself, and then you will be able to be united with God in your heart; for union with God is preceded by detachment from material things. Bread is given to an infant as food only after it has been nourished with milk: and a person who intends to prosper in the Divine must first detach himself from the world, just as an infant detaches itself from its mother's embrace and breasts. Physical labor precedes spiritual labor, just as the dust preceded the soul breathed into Adam. Whoever has not attained physical labor cannot possess spiritual labor either; for the latter is born of the former, just as an ear of grain springs from a bare wheat kernel. And whoever lacks spiritual labor is also deprived of spiritual gifts.

159. Just as sowing in tears is followed by harvests of joy, so too will suffering for God's sake be followed by joy. Bread earned by sweat tastes sweet to the farmer; so too are the deeds of righteousness sweet to the heart that has received Christ's knowledge. Endure humiliation and humility willingly, so that you may have boldness before God. A person of wisdom who endures every harsh word—even when he himself has done no wrong to the one who spoke it—is blessed, even though he thereby places a crown of thorns upon his own head, for he is crowned with an imperishable crown, though he himself does not know it.

160. Whoever, with discernment, flees from vain glory has sensed the age to come in his soul. Whoever seeks peace in this present life has already had his mind set on the age to come. But whoever is bound by greed is a slave to his passions. Do not think that the acquisition of gold and silver alone constitutes greed; it is the acquisition of anything at all—that to which your will is attached. Do not praise one who suffers physically yet gives free rein to the senses—by which I mean the ears, the gaping and unrestrained mouth, and the wandering eyes.

161. Know that forgiving the sins of debtors is an act of righteousness. Then you will see peace and clarity everywhere in your mind. If a merciful person does not rise above his own righteousness, then he is not merciful—that is, a truly merciful person not only gives alms to others from his own possessions but also joyfully endures injustice from others and shows them mercy. Whoever lays down his soul for his brother is merciful, not the one who shows mercy to his brother only through almsgiving. And the one who, if rebuked by his brother, does not have the audacity to respond and sadden his heart is also merciful.

162. Love the practice of vigil, so that you may find comfort in those close to your soul. Engage in reading in silence, so that your mind may always be lifted up to the wonders of God. Love poverty with patience, so that your mind may be gathered into one, free from distraction. Detest a life of luxury, so that your thoughts may remain serene. Refrain from many things, and care for your soul alone, so that you may save it from the dissipation of inner peace.

163. Love chastity, so that you may not be put to shame before God during your prayer. Acquire purity in your deeds, so that your soul may be illuminated in prayer, and the remembrance of death may kindle joy in your mind. Do not be lazy in your work, lest you be put to shame when you stand among your friends. Do not bind your freedom with what serves as pleasure, lest you become a slave to slaves. In your attire, love simple clothing, so that you may humble the thoughts arising within you—that is, the pride of the heart. Whoever loves splendor cannot attain freedom of thought; for the heart is inwardly shaped in the likeness of external images.

164. Humility is followed by self-restraint and moderation in all things. Humility, through constant self-restraint, attains contemplation and adorns the soul with chastity; but vanity, through the ceaseless turmoil and confusion of its own thoughts, gathers impure treasures from everything it encounters and defiles the heart. It gazes upon the nature of things with an unchaste gaze and occupies the mind with shameful images, while humility spiritually enriches itself through contemplation and inspires those who have attained it to give praise.

165. It is better for you to free yourself from the bonds of sin than to free slaves from bondage. It is better for you to be at peace with your own soul in the unity of the threefold nature within you—that is, body, soul, and spirit—than to pacify those of differing minds through your teaching. Gregory says: "It is good to engage in theology for God's sake, but it is better for a person to make himself pure for God." It is more beneficial for you to see to it that what has fallen in your soul due to passions is restored by directing your thoughts toward the Divine, rather than to raise the dead.

166. Throughout your life, wherever you may go, consider yourself a stranger, so that you may be able to rid yourself of the harm caused by carelessness in your conduct. Always bless with your lips, and no one will speak ill of you, for slander begets slander, and a blessing begets a blessing. In every matter, consider yourself lacking, so that you may learn—and throughout your life you will prove yourself wise. Do not tell another what you yourself have not experienced, lest you be ashamed of yourself, and lest your lies be exposed when your life is examined.

167. Be careful not to read heretical teachings, for this is most likely to stir up a spirit of blasphemy within you. Read frequently and insatiably the works of teachers on God's Providence, for they guide the mind to discern the order in God's creatures and works, strengthen it through their own wisdom, prepare it through their subtlety to acquire luminous thoughts, and ensure that it proceeds in purity toward an understanding of God's creatures. Read the Gospel, bequeathed by God for the knowledge of the entire universe, so that your mind may be immersed in God's wonders. Let your reading take place in a silence undisturbed by anything, and be free from excessive concern for the body and from the turmoil of daily life, so that you may experience in your soul, through sweet comprehension, the sweetest taste that surpasses every sensation, and so that your soul may experience this through its abiding in it.

168. Purify your soul; cast off concern for what lies outside your nature; drape a veil of chastity and humility over your thoughts and movements; and through this you will discover what lies within your nature, for to the humble the mysteries are revealed.

169. If you intend to devote your soul to the work of prayer, which purifies the mind, and to staying awake at night in order to attain a clear mind, then withdraw from the sight of the world, cease meeting with people, and do not receive in your cell, as is customary, friends—even under the pretense of benefit—except for those of like mind and spirit with you and your fellow ascetics; fear the disturbance of inner conversation, and after cutting off external conversation, combine your prayer with almsgiving, and your soul will behold the light of truth. For to the extent that the heart ceases to be troubled by external matters, to that same extent the mind can, through the comprehension of divine thoughts and deeds, attain to understanding and wonder. For the soul is quick to replace one conversation with another, if we take care to exercise a little diligence.

170. To replace one conversation with another (the vain one with the soul-saving one), devote yourself to reading Scripture and the lives of the saints. And when you set out to pray and follow your rule, instead of reflecting on what you have seen and heard in the world, you will find yourself reflecting on the divine Scriptures you have read; and through this reflection, your thoughts of worldly matters will fade away; and in this way, the mind is purified. And this is what is written—that reading helps the soul when it turns to prayer; and likewise: the soul is enlightened in reading through prayer. And reading, in turn, instead of external distractions, provides nourishment for various forms of prayer; therefore, through reading, the soul is enlightened so that it may always pray without laziness or distraction.

171. It is just as unseemly for those who are lustful and gluttonous to delve into spiritual matters as it is for a harlot to pontificate on chastity. A body that is extremely sickly cannot tolerate rich food; and a mind preoccupied with worldly things cannot approach the study of the Divine. Fire does not ignite in damp wood; nor is divine fervor kindled in a heart that loves tranquility. Just as one who has not seen the sun with his own eyes cannot describe its light to anyone based solely on hearsay—nor even perceive that light—so too is one who has not tasted the sweetness of spiritual matters with his soul.

172. If you have anything beyond your daily needs, give it to the poor, and go boldly to offer your prayers—that is, converse with God as a son with his Father. Nothing can draw the heart closer to God than almsgiving; and nothing produces such stillness in the soul as voluntary poverty. When you give, give generously, with a gentle expression on your face, and provide more than what is asked for. Do not try to distinguish the worthy from the unworthy; let all people be equal to you in doing good. For in this way you can draw even the unworthy to goodness, because the soul is quickly drawn to the fear of God through bodily means.

173. Cleanse your cell of excesses, for this will lead you to self-restraint, even if you do not wish it. Frugality in all things teaches a person self-restraint. Those who have triumphed in the external battle—that is, the battle waged against the soul by the senses—hearing, sight, and so on—need not fear the internal battle either. When a person closes the city gates—that is, the senses—he fights within and fears not those who plot evil outside the city. Blessed is the one who, knowing this, does not trouble himself with a multitude of tasks, but has turned all his bodily activity toward the labor of prayer.

174. While God is inwardly moving your heart to contrition, keep bowing and kneeling without ceasing. Do not allow your heart to be preoccupied with anything else if, at that moment, the demons begin to persuade you to attend to other matters; and then watch and marvel at what will come of it for you. Nothing else in the struggles of asceticism is as important or as difficult, nor arouses such envy in the demons, as when someone prostrates himself before the cross of Christ, praying day and night, as if with his hands bound behind his back. If you wish to keep your zeal from cooling and your tears from drying up, devote yourself to this, and blessed are you if you attend to what has been said to you day and night and seek nothing else. If you do not strive, you will not attain it; and if you do not knock fervently at the door and remain in vigil before it unceasingly, you will not be heard.

175. Until the outer man dies to all worldly things—not only to sin but also to every deed—and likewise the inner man dies to wicked thoughts, and until the natural movements of the body are subdued to the point that no sinful sweetness is stirred up in the heart, until then the sweetness of the Spirit of God will not be stirred up in man; his members will not attain purity in this life, divine thoughts will not enter his soul, and they will remain imperceptible and invisible. – And until a person, in his heart, sets aside concern for worldly matters—except for the necessary needs of the flesh—and leaves the care of these things to God, spiritual rapture will not be aroused within him.

176. Whoever keeps in mind, with conviction and feeling, the equality to which the common end of all leads, needs no other Teacher to renounce worldly life. Whoever does not voluntarily distance himself from the causes of passion is unwittingly drawn into sin. The causes of sin are as follows: wine, women, wealth, and physical health; not, however, because these are sins by their very nature, but because human nature is easily led by them into sinful passions, and therefore a person must be carefully on guard against this. People abhor poverty, but to God, a haughty soul and a lofty mind are far more abhorrent. People hold wealth in high esteem; but to God, a humble soul is honorable.

177. If you wish to begin doing good, prepare yourself first for the temptations that will assail you. For it is the enemy's custom—when he sees that someone has begun a virtuous life with fervent faith—to confront that person with various terrible temptations, so that, overcome by fear, he may grow cold in his good resolve and no longer have the zeal to pursue deeds pleasing to God. Therefore, prepare yourself courageously to face the temptations that assail virtue, and only then begin to practice them.

178. God's commandments are greater than all the treasures of the world. Whoever has acquired them finds God within himself. Whoever always rests in God's care has found God as his guardian. Whoever desires to fulfill God's will will have the heavenly angels as his guides. Whoever fears sin will complete the dreadful journey without stumbling, and in the midst of darkness will find light both before him and within himself. The Lord guards the footsteps of those who fear sin, and when temptation arises, God's mercy precedes them. Whoever considers his transgressions to be minor falls into a state worse than before and suffers sevenfold punishment.

179. Sow alms in humility, and you will reap mercy at the judgment. Whatever good you have destroyed, acquire it anew. If you have destroyed chastity, God will not accept alms from you if you remain in fornication; for He desires the holiness of your body. And every ailment is healed by its proper remedy. You have been overcome by envy; why then do you strive to fight against sleep (rather than against envy)?

180. While a transgression is still small and has not yet matured, root it out before it spreads its branches far and wide and begins to bear fruit. Do not give in to negligence while the fault still seems small to you; for later you will find in it a ruthless master and flee from it like a slave or a prisoner. But whoever resists a passion from the beginning will soon gain mastery over it.

181. Whoever can joyfully endure an insult, even while having the means to repel it, has received comfort from God through faith in Him. And whoever humbly endures the accusations leveled against him has attained perfection, and the Holy Angels marvel at him. For no other virtue is so lofty and so difficult to practice.

182. Do not trust yourself to be strong until you are tempted—and find yourself unchanged. Do not rely on your own strength, lest you be allowed to fall through weakness; and then, through your own fall, you will come to know your weakness. Do not trust your knowledge, lest the enemy, stepping in, catch you with his cunning. Never boast in your speech of your deeds, lest you be put to shame. In whatever a person boasts, God allows him to be changed so that he may be humbled and learn humility.

183. Lift your eyes ceaselessly to God; for God's Protection and Providence encompass all people, but He is invisible and reveals Himself only to those who have purified themselves of sins and who always think of God—and of Him alone. God's Providence is revealed to them especially when, for God's sake, they enter into temptation. For then they perceive God's Providence as if beholding Him with their physical eyes, in accordance with the measure and cause of the temptation that befalls each of them, so as to inspire these ascetics to courage, as was the case with Jacob, Joshua, the three youths, Peter, and the other saints, to whom Providence appeared in some human form, encouraging and strengthening them in piety.

184. Need we even speak of the ascetics, strangers to the world, and of the hermits? They turned the desert into a city, transforming it into a settlement and dwelling place of the angels. Angels always came to them because of the righteousness of their lives, and as warriors of the one Lord, they sometimes fought alongside one another. They loved the desert all the days of their lives, and out of love for God, they made their homes in the mountains, caves, and chasms of the earth. Since they had forsaken the earthly to love the heavenly and had become imitators of the angels, the holy angels themselves, in justice, did not hide their presence from them, but fulfilled their every desire and provided them with every kind of help in all things.

185. Whoever has dedicated himself to God once and for all spends his life in peace of mind. Without detachment, the soul cannot free itself from the turmoil of thoughts—and without bringing the senses to stillness, it will not experience peace in thought. Without facing temptations, no one will acquire spiritual wisdom. Without diligent reading, one cannot discern the subtleties of thought. Without stillness of thought, the mind will not penetrate the innermost mysteries. Without hope in faith, the soul cannot boldly face temptations. Without experiencing God's manifest protection, the heart is unable to hope in God. If the soul does not consciously partake of Christ's sufferings, it will have no communion with Christ.

186. Whoever shows mercy to a beggar has God as his guardian, and whoever becomes poor for God's sake will find treasures that never run dry. God lacks nothing, but He rejoices when He sees that a person honors His image and reveres it for His sake. When someone asks you for what you have, do not say in your heart, "I will keep this for myself so that I may find rest in it, and God will provide what this person needs from somewhere else." Such thoughts are fitting for the unrighteous and those who do not know God. A righteous and good person will not give his honor to another, nor will he allow the time of grace to pass in idleness. A poor and needy person is provided for by God, for the Lord forsakes no one; but you, by sending the poor person away, have turned away from the honor given to you by God and have removed His grace from yourself. Therefore, when you give, rejoice and say, "Glory to You, O God, for making me worthy to find someone to comfort." But if you have nothing to give, rejoice all the more and, giving thanks to God, say: "I thank You, my God, that You have given me this grace and honor—to become destitute for Your name's sake—and have deemed me worthy to taste the afflictions laid upon the path of Your commandments, in sickness and poverty, just as Your saints who walked this path have tasted them."

187. Our nature has become prone to passions; there are many temptations in this world; evil is not far from you—it springs up within you and lies at your feet. Just as the ages are close to one another before our eyes, so are temptations close to people; and God has wisely arranged this for your benefit, so that you may constantly knock at His door, so that the fear of affliction may instill remembrance of Him in your mind, so that you may draw near to Him in prayer, and your heart may be sanctified by unceasing remembrance of Him. God did not create you immune to sorrow, lest you, desiring to be a god, should inherit the same fate as the one who was originally a cherub but later, through pride, became Satan; nor did He create you unchanging and immovable, lest you become like the nature of inanimate creatures.

188. Constantly purify yourself before God, keeping Him in remembrance in your heart, so that, having remained long without remembering Him, you may not find yourself lacking boldness when you come to Him. For boldness before God comes from frequent communion with Him and much prayer. Communion with people takes place through the body, but communion with God takes place through the soul's remembrance of Him, attention to Him in prayer, and complete surrender to Him. By maintaining remembrance of God over the long term, the soul is at times filled with wonder and amazement. "Let the hearts of those who seek the Lord rejoice. Seek the Lord," you who are condemned, "and be established" in hope; "seek His face" through repentance (Ps. 104:3, 4)—and be sanctified by the holiness of His face and cleansed of your sins.

189. When temptation befalls the unrighteous, he has no hope to call upon God and expect salvation from Him; for in the days of his rest he strayed from God's will. Before sorrow befalls you, pray to God; and in the time of distress you will find Him—and He will hear you. Noah's ark was prepared in times of peace; its timbers were hewn over the course of a hundred years, and in the time of wrath the unrighteous perished, while it became a refuge for the righteous.

190. In those in whom peace is dead, insults are borne with joy; but in those in whom peace is alive, insults cannot be borne; rather, driven by vanity, they become angry, and through unwise actions fall into confusion or are overcome by sorrow. Whoever wishes to excel in the virtues of patience in the face of insults and magnanimity must withdraw from his kin and become a wanderer; for it is impossible to excel in this virtue in one's homeland. Only the great and the strong are capable of enduring such sufferings among their own kin—and this is possible only for those in whom this world has died; for they no longer expect any consolation in this present age.

191. Just as grace is close to humility, so are painful trials close to pride. The eyes of the Lord are upon the humble, to gladden them; but the face of the Lord is against the proud, to humble them. Be one who is easily overlooked in your greatness, rather than one who boasts in your smallness. Whoever pursues honor, it flees from him; but whoever flees from honor, it pursues him from behind. Whoever hungers and thirsts for God's sake, God will satisfy him with His blessings. Whoever endures nakedness for God's sake, He will clothe him in a garment of incorruption and glory. Whoever becomes impoverished for God's sake is comforted by His true riches. Acknowledge yourself a sinner throughout your life, so that you may be justified throughout your life. Associate with the humble, and you will learn their ways. Let it always be your habit to be gracious and respectful toward everyone.

192. For the soul's benefit, God has permitted it to be subject to the passions; yet He did not deem it beneficial to place it above the passions before the second life. — And for the soul to be subject to the passions is beneficial for the pricking of the conscience; but to remain in the passions is brazen and shameless. Just as gluttony gives rise to turmoil of thought, so too do verbosity and disorderly conversations lead to senselessness and the mind straying from its proper order. Concern for worldly matters throws the soul into confusion, and being troubled by them disturbs the mind and robs it of peace. A monk who has devoted himself to heavenly pursuits ought always to be free from all worldly cares, so that, having withdrawn into himself, he may find nothing at all that belongs to this present age. Having been freed from all such things, he may then, without distraction, study the law of the Lord day and night.

193. Physical labor without purity of mind is like a barren womb and withered breasts; for it cannot draw near to the knowledge of God. They weary the body but do not bother to root out the passions of the mind; and therefore they reap nothing. Just as one who sows among thorns can reap nothing, so one who destroys himself with resentment and greed can succeed in nothing, but groans on his bed from insomnia due to the worries about his affairs that oppress him.

194. If the soul is illuminated by the remembrance of God and by unceasing vigilance day and night, then the Lord establishes there (within) a cloud to protect it, sheltering it by day and illuminating its night with a fiery light; in its darkness, light shines forth.

195. Just as a cloud obscures the light of the moon, so the vapors of a full belly drive God's Wisdom from the soul. Just as a fiery flame burns in dry wood, so does the body when the belly is full. Just as one combustible substance, when applied to another, increases the fiery flame, so the variety of bodily desires increases lustful movements in the body. Divine knowledge does not dwell in a body given over to sensual pleasure; and whoever loves his body will not attain God's grace. Just as in the pains of childbirth a child is born who brings joy to the mother, so too, when the throat is afflicted, the fruit of the knowledge of God's mysteries is born in the soul. Just as a father cares for his children, so Christ cares for the body that suffers for His sake—and is always near His lips.

196. A pilgrim is one whose thoughts have transcended all worldly things. A monk is one who dwells apart from the world and always prays to God to grant him future blessings. A monk's wealth is the consolation found in weeping and the joy of faith that shines in the recesses of the mind. A virgin is one who has not only kept his body undefiled by carnal union but is ashamed even of the slightest reminder of it. If you love chastity, drive away shameful thoughts by practicing reading and persistent prayer; and then you will have a weapon against the natural impulses toward such things; and without this, it is impossible to see purity in the soul.

197. If you are truly merciful, then when what is rightfully yours is taken from you, do not grieve inwardly, and do not speak of the loss to outsiders. Let the harm inflicted by those who have wronged you be absorbed by your mercy, just as the bitterness of wine is absorbed by an abundance of water. Demonstrate the abundance of your mercy through the good deeds you bestow upon those who have wronged you, just as the blessed Elisha did toward his enemies, who intended to take him captive (2 Kings 6:13–23).

198. Whoever is truly humble and wise, when falsely accused, does not become indignant and says nothing in his own defense regarding the matter in which he is falsely accused, but accepts slander as the truth and does not try to convince people that he has been slandered, but asks for forgiveness. Some willingly brought upon themselves the label of immoral people, though they were not such; while others endured being called adulterers, though they were far from adultery, and with tears bore witness that they bore the fruit of a sin they had not committed, and wept as they asked forgiveness from those who had wronged them for a transgression they had not committed, even as their souls were crowned with every purity and blamelessness. Still others, so that they might not be praised for the excellent rules of life they observed in secret, presented themselves as holy fools, having been dissolved by the Divine salt; they were unshakable in their silence, so that at the height of their perfection, the Holy Angels served as heralds of their virtues.

199. The Savior referred to the various degrees of intellect among those dwelling in that realm as “many dwellings” with the Father—that is, the distinctions and differences in spiritual gifts of which they enjoy according to their intellect. For He called them “many dwellings” not because of differences in location, but according to the degree of their gifts. Just as each person enjoys the visible sun in accordance with the purity and receptivity of their eyesight, and just as the illumination from a single lamp in a single house varies, even though the light is not divided into many separate lights, so in the age to come all the righteous will dwell undividedly in one land, but each will be illuminated in his own measure by one spiritual Sun, and according to his own merit will draw to himself joy and gladness, as it were from one atmosphere, from one place, throne, spectacle, and image. – And no one sees the measure of another’s grace, whether higher or lower, so that, if he were to see another’s superior grace and his own lack, it would not be a cause of sorrow and grief for him. There, everyone, according to the grace given to him, rejoices inwardly in his own measure. Outside of all this, there is a single spectacle and a single realm—and apart from these two degrees, I mean one heavenly realm and one earthly realm, with diversity in the variety of rewards between them.

200. When the devil wishes to defile the mind with a lustful thought, he first tests their patience through their love of vanity, and the onset of this thought does not appear to be a passion. This is how he usually proceeds with those who guard their minds, into whom it is impossible to quickly implant any indecent thought. But when he tears a person away from his stronghold and the person begins to dwell on the first thought and stray from his stronghold, then the devil confronts him with something reminiscent of fornication and leads the mind astray toward indecent objects. At first, the mind is confused by the sudden influx of these thoughts—and then comes to terms with them—and proceeds from thought to action. But if the mind draws back and forestalls the first influx of thoughts, then, with God’s help, it can easily overcome the passion.

201. It is better to ward off passions by remembering virtues than by resisting them, because when passions step outside their proper sphere and rise up to battle, they imprint their images and likenesses on the mind. This battle gains great power over the mind, greatly disturbing and throwing thoughts into confusion. But if one follows the first rule we have mentioned, not even a trace of the passions remains in the mind once they have been driven away.

202. Until a person receives the Comforter, he needs the Divine Scriptures so that the remembrance of what is good may be imprinted on his mind, and so that, through constant reading, his inclination toward the good may be renewed within him and his soul protected from the subtleties of sinful ways: for he has not yet acquired the power of the Spirit, which dispels delusion and captures thoughts that are beneficial to the soul. When the power of the Spirit descends into the soul’s power active within a person, then the commandments of the Spirit take root in the heart in place of the law of the Scriptures, and then he is secretly taught by the Spirit and has no need for the aid of sensory matter; for as long as the heart learns from matter, delusion and forgetfulness immediately follow instruction; but when teaching is imparted by the Spirit, then the remembrance remains intact.

203. A fledgling bird is that mind which, through repentance, has recently emerged from the bonds of the passions, and during prayer strives to rise above the earthly, but cannot; on the contrary, it still crawls upon the face of the earth, lacking the strength to fly. However, through reading, good works, fear of God, and concern for many virtues, it gathers its thoughts into unity; for it is incapable of knowing anything beyond this. And this keeps the mind unstained for a short time; but later, memories return, and they disturb and defile the heart; because man has not yet experienced that serene atmosphere of freedom into which, only after a long time, by forgetting the earthly, he leads his mind; for he has acquired only bodily wings—that is, virtues that are performed outwardly—but has not yet seen the contemplative virtues, nor has he been deemed worthy to experience them; and these are the wings of the mind upon which a person draws near to the heavenly and departs from the earthly.

204. As long as a person serves the Lord with anything sensory, the images of that which is sensory are imprinted in his thoughts, and he conceives of the Divine in bodily images. But when he attains an inner perception, then, to the extent of that perception, his mind will, from time to time, rise above the images of things.

205. When your soul draws near to emerging from darkness, this will be the sign for you: your heart burns within you and blazes like fire day and night; and therefore you regard the whole world as dust and ashes, desiring not even food, because of the sweetness of new, fiery thoughts that are constantly stirring within your soul. Suddenly a fountain of tears is given to you, like a stream flowing of its own accord, mingling with all your activities—that is, during your reading, your prayer, and your meditation, when you eat and drink, and in all your affairs. And when you see this in your soul, take heart, for you have crossed the sea; and be so diligent in your affairs, and keep such careful watch, that grace may increase in you day by day. But until you find this within yourself, you have not yet completed your journey, nor have you entered the mountain of God. And if, even after you have found and received the grace of tears, they cease, and your fervor cools without any other change—that is, without bodily infirmity—then woe to you! What have you ruined by falling into either pride, indifference, or sloth?!—But we will write later about what follows the tears.

206. If you have no work to do, do not speak of virtues. More precious before God than any prayer or sacrifice are sorrows for Him and for His sake; and more fragrant than all incense is the scent of their sweat. Consider every virtue accomplished without physical labor to be a premature and lifeless fruit of the womb. The offerings of the righteous are the tears of their eyes, and the sacrifice pleasing to God is their sighs during their vigils. The righteous and those oppressed by the burden of the body will cry out to the Lord, and in sickness they will send up prayers to God; and at the cry of their voice, the Holy Orders will come to their aid to encourage and comfort them with hope; for the Holy Angels, by virtue of their closeness to the holy men, share in their sufferings and sorrows.

207. Wine warms the body, but the Word of God warms the mind. Those inflamed with fervor are inspired by thoughts of what they hope for and direct their minds toward the age to come. Those intoxicated by wine do not see the obstacles before them; so those intoxicated by hope know neither sorrow nor anything of this world. Blessed are those who, for the sea of sorrows and for the sake of love for God, have girded their loins with simplicity and an unquestioning disposition, and do not turn back. Those who set out on a difficult path with hope do not turn back, nor do they pause to ponder the nature of this journey. But when they have crossed the sea, then, looking back on the difficulty of the path, they give thanks to God for delivering them from the straits, the rapids, and the roughness of the journey—even though they were unaware of it at the time. Hope, setting out on a voyage, sails on with initial fervor, paying no heed whatsoever to the body and not pondering within itself whether the undertaking will be successful or not. When you wish to begin a work for God, first make a will, as one who will no longer live in this world, as one prepared for death and having despaired of this present life, as one whose time has come to an end. Begin every good work with courage, and do not approach such works with a double mind; do not waver in your heart as you trust in God, lest your labor become fruitless and your work a burden.

208. The deeds of those who live according to God are as follows: One spends an entire day striking his head against the ground, doing so in place of performing the divine services, that is, the hours. Another combines a series of prayers with constant and prolonged kneeling. Yet another substitutes God's services for himself with a multitude of tears and is content with that. Another strives to grasp the meaning of what is being read and combines this with a specific rule. Another torments his soul with hunger, so that he is unable to perform the divine services. Another, immersed in fervent meditation on the Psalms, makes his service unceasing. Another spends his time reading, and his heart is warmed. Another becomes absorbed, pondering the divine meaning in the Holy Scriptures. Another, astonished by the wonders that strike him in the verses, is held back from his usual reading and is overcome by silence. Another, having tasted all this and been satisfied, turned back and became inactive. Another, having tasted only a little and become conceited, fell into error. One was prevented from keeping his rule by a serious illness and weakness; another—by the dominance of some habit, or some desire, or self-will, or vanity, or greed, or a passion for accumulating material possessions. Still others stumbled but rose again, and did not turn their backs until they had obtained the precious pearl.

209. The beginning of everything is a good intention before God (the resolve to please God). Following this, after withdrawing from worldly affairs, come: fasting, reading, all-night and sober vigils—according to each person’s strength—and many prostrations, which are beneficial to perform during the day and often at night as well. Let your very minimum be to make thirty prostrations—then bow before the Holy Cross and end there. But there are also those who, to the best of their ability, increase this number of prostrations. Others, meanwhile, spend three hours in a single prayer, keeping their minds clear, and prostrating themselves face down on the ground without compulsion or wandering thoughts (that is, some pray frequently but in short intervals; while others pray only once but remain in prayer for a long time).

210. Our adversary, the devil, has an ancient custom of cunningly varying his struggle against those who undertake this ascetic endeavor. Employing various weapons against them and adapting to the person’s intentions, he alters his method of combat. The first tactic of the enemy’s battle. – Those who are lazy by choice and weak in thought, he attacks fiercely from the very beginning, setting strong temptations against them, so that fear might seize them from the very first endeavor, and their path might seem cruel and impassable to them—and they might say: “If the beginning of the path is so arduous and difficult, can anyone endure it to the very end, with the many struggles that lie ahead?” And the devil does not wage battle against them for long—but soon puts them to flight. This is because they embarked on the Lord’s endeavor with doubt and indifference. But God commands us to undertake this struggle with a willingness to die for His sake, promising to crown the faithful laborer with the honor of martyrdom. Since they did not resolve at the outset to give themselves up to death, they prove to be so weak. That is why they are no longer steadfast in any battle, being self-centered and, above all, sparing their bodies. And the enemy drives them away like a storm, seeing in them none of the spiritual strength one usually sees in the saints. It is by a person’s own will that he strives toward God, and God cooperates, helps, and reveals to him His providence concerning him. And the devil cannot approach a person or tempt him unless the person gives him an opening or God permits it.

211. The second method. – As for those whom the devil sees as courageous, who regard death as nothing, and who set out to do their work with great zeal, the devil does not immediately confront them, nor does he engage them in battle at their first advance, knowing that zealous warriors are not easily defeated. Therefore, as long as he sees them in this state, he does not even dare to touch them until he sees—that their zeal has cooled, and that the weapons they had prepared in their minds have been laid aside through their abandonment of the divine words and remembrances that aid and assist them. As soon as they begin to stray from their original thoughts and, of their own accord, begin to devise what serves to overcome them, through the flattery of their own reasoning, which wears them down from within, and they themselves will dig for their souls a pit of destruction through the idleness-induced drifting of their thoughts—from which coldness reigns in their minds and hearts—then he will mercilessly rush upon them. The devil has refrained from attacking them until now because a certain power surrounds those who, with ardent zeal, strive toward God, hope in Him, and believe in Him. For this reason, God wards off from them the ferocity of the devil’s malice, and it does not come near them. The enemy is restrained when he sees the Guardian who always protects them. For as long as they do not cast aside the means of help—prayers and the labors of humility—the Intercessor and Helper never departs from them.

212. Remember, then, as you follow in God’s footsteps, at every moment of your struggle, the beginning and the initial zeal you felt when you first set out on this path, and those fiery thoughts with which you first left your home and joined the ranks of the soldiers. Test yourself every day, so that the fervor of your soul may not grow cold in any of the roles you have taken on, nor in the zeal that burned within you at the beginning of your endeavor. And ceaselessly raise your voice throughout the military camp, encouraging and inspiring the sons of this land to courage, while showing the enemy’s side that you remain sober-minded. At the same time, call upon God with confidence, weep before His goodness, shed tears, and labor until He sends you a Helper. And then you will no longer be defeated.

213. The third tactic of the enemy’s battle. — When the enemy sees the strength that a person receives from God through his zeal and his faithful invocation of Him, he then tries to find some way to drive away the angel who is helping him, —namely, by attempting to stir up thoughts of pride within him, so that he might think to himself that all his strength depends on his own power, and that he himself, by his own strength, protects himself from his adversary and his slayer. Whoever believes such thoughts, instilled by the enemy, will have God's help depart from him—and he will fall into the enemy's hands. But whoever does not yield to these suggestions, but firmly holds fast to the memory of the One who assists him, and never ceases to direct the eye of his heart toward heaven—against such a one the enemy devises new methods of warfare.

214. The fourth tactic of the enemy's warfare consists in oppressing a person through his natural needs (especially the need for a wife and the need for a livelihood). (Regarding a wife.) Although he cannot force a person to commit such an act, because the person is protected by silence and his dwelling is far from the occasions and causes of sin, he nevertheless strives to make the minds of the ascetics see this as a phantom and tries to instill in them false dreams under the guise of truth. At the same time, so that they may come to desire what they dream of, he stirs up their desires and prompts them to dwell on shameful thoughts, to consent to them, and to become guilty of them. For the enemy knows that for the ascetic, victory and triumph over him are brought about by his own thoughts and are accomplished in a brief moment—as soon as a thought moves from its place and descends from its height to earth, and the will, for a single moment, shows its consent,—just as happened to many when they fantasized about feminine beauty. If, however, they were one or two steps away from the world, the enemy would often resort to actually bringing women to them. Through this and similar means, the enemy sometimes triumphed over the careless and those whose hearts were not strong. But others proved stronger than these temptations, and, aided by God's grace, they overcame the enemy and his delusions. (Regarding the second temptation). The enemy also often caused them to see, in their dreams, gold, precious objects, and other treasures; and sometimes he actually showed them these things in the hope that, perhaps, he might succeed in halting one of them in his progress through such fantasies and ensnare him in one of his nets and traps. This is allowed to happen so that it may be tested whether, when these things are removed during their life of seclusion, amid their deprivation and poverty, they are truly God-loving; and whether, when confronted with these things, they strive, out of love for God, to disregard them, and—even when tempted by them—do not allow them to gain the upper hand, regarding them as nothing in comparison with the love of God. True ascetics do not yield, and after the trial they are found purified, like gold in a crucible; but the careless and the weak are overcome even by a slight hardship in times of want and turn back, renouncing the ascetic life.

215. As soon as someone recognizes his own weakness and truly feels it, he immediately rouses his soul from lethargy and arms himself with caution. But no one can perceive his own weakness unless at least a small temptation—whether physical or spiritual—is allowed to come upon him, and he is granted deliverance from it. For then he will clearly see the futility of his own efforts and measures—he will see that his caution, self-restraint, and the safeguards for his soul, in which he hoped to find safety, were of no use whatsoever, and that deliverance came apart from all of that. From this he gains the certainty that he himself is nothing, and that only God's help saves. Whoever has come to realize that he needs God's help offers up many prayers. And to the extent that he multiplies them, so his heart is humbled. For anyone who prays and asks cannot help but be humbled. "A broken and contrite heart, O God, You will not despise" (Ps. 50:19). As soon as a person humbles himself, God's mercy immediately surrounds him. And then the heart senses divine help and finds within itself a certain strength of confidence (in God). And when a person feels that God's help truly sustains him, then his heart is truly filled with faith. From this, he comes to understand that prayer is a refuge for those seeking help, a source of salvation, a treasure of hope, a harbor that saves from turmoil, a support for the weak, a covering in times of temptation, a shield of deliverance in battle, a sharp arrow against enemies—and it becomes clear to him that the whole multitude of spiritual blessings is made accessible to him through prayer. From this point on, he begins to delight in the prayer of faith; he no longer prays with toil and weariness, but with heartfelt joy and wonder, ceaselessly pouring out expressions of gratitude, with countless acts of kneeling.

216. Driven by a great desire for God's help, a person draws near to God while abiding in prayer. But to the extent that he draws near to God with his intention, to that same extent does God draw near to him with His gifts, and does not withhold grace from him because of his great humility. Sometimes, however, the generous God withholds the gifts of grace from him, so that this may serve as an incentive for him to draw near to God, and so that, because of his need, a person may remain constantly before God, ready to receive what is for his benefit. God grants some requests quickly—namely, those without which no one can be saved—while He delays granting others. In some circumstances, He repels and dispels the enemy's scorching power from him, while in others He allows him to fall into temptation so that this trial may serve as a reason for him to draw near to God—and so that he may learn to be seasoned in temptation, and, having before his eyes the proof of his own weakness, may be increasingly established in humility. For the righteous person who has not recognized his own weakness, his deeds are as if on the edge of a razor—and he is not far from falling and from the destructive lion of pride. Whoever does not know his own weakness lacks humility; and whoever lacks it has not yet attained perfection; and whoever has not attained it always lives in fear; for his city is not founded on pillars of iron and thresholds of bronze—that is, on humility. Without humility, a person’s work (the work he seeks) cannot be perfected, and the seal of the Spirit has not yet been affixed to the scroll of his freedom—until then, he remains a slave, and his work is not free from fear.

217. Therefore, the Lord leaves His saints with reasons for humility and a contrite heart in fervent prayer, so that those who love Him may draw near to Him through humility. And He often terrifies them with the passions of their nature and the inclinations of shameful and impure thoughts, and frequently with reproaches, insults, and taunts from people; sometimes with physical illnesses and ailments; at other times, by poverty and a lack of basic necessities, or by the torment of intense fear, abandonment, the devil’s open attacks, and various terrifying events. And all this is so that they may have reasons for humility and so that they do not fall into the slumber of indifference.

218. When it happens that your soul is filled with darkness within, and just as the sun’s rays are obscured on earth by a mist of clouds, your soul is deprived of spiritual consolation for a time, and the light of grace within dims—because a cloud of passions overshadows your soul, and because the joy-giving power within you is somewhat diminished, and an unusual gloom has cast a shadow over your mind— Do not be troubled by this thought, but be patient—read the books of the teachers, compel yourself to pray—and wait for help. It will come soon, without you even realizing it. For just as the face of the earth is revealed by the sun’s rays from the darkness of the air that envelops the earth, so prayer can dispel and scatter the clouds of passion in the soul, and illuminate the mind with the light of joy and comfort.

219. Until you have reached the realm of tears, your inner self still serves the world—that is, you still lead a worldly life, and you still do God’s work with your outer self, while your inner self remains barren; for its fruit begins with tears. When you reach the realm of tears, then know that your mind has emerged from the dungeon of this world, has set its foot on the path of the new age, and has begun to breathe in the fragrance of a wondrous new air. Tears begin to flow because the birth of the spiritual infant is at hand. Grace, the mother of all, mysteriously desires to bring forth the Divine Image into the light of the age to come. But this kind of weeping is not the same as that which occurs intermittently among those who observe silence (sometimes during contemplation, sometimes while reading, sometimes during prayer). I am not speaking of this kind of weeping, but of the kind that occurs unceasingly, day and night. The eyes of one who has attained this state resemble a spring of water for two or more years, and then he comes to a stilling of his thoughts. And upon the stilling of the thoughts, to the extent that nature allows, one enters “that rest” of which St. Paul spoke (Heb. 4:3). And through this peaceful repose, the mind begins to contemplate the mysteries. Then the Holy Spirit begins to reveal heavenly things to him—and God dwells within him, and raises up in him the fruit of the Spirit. But listen further: when you enter the realm of the stilling of thoughts, then a flood of tears will be taken from you—and tears will come to you in moderation, and at the proper time.

220. There are three stages in which a person progresses: the stage of beginners, the middle stage, and the stage of the perfected. Those in the first stage have a disposition of thought inclined toward goodness, yet their minds are still swayed by passions. The second stage is a middle ground between a state of passion and a state of dispassion, where both good and evil thoughts arise equally within a person, and he ceaselessly emits both light and darkness. Moreover, if he ceases—even for a short time—to read the Divine Scriptures frequently and to form divine mental images in his mind, while maintaining caution in outward conduct—from which inner preservation arises—then a person is drawn into passions. But if he nourishes his zeal for the spiritual in the manner described, —seeking, striving, nourishing good thoughts through the reading of the Scriptures and keeping them from straying into the realm of the flesh, lovingly guarding his soul, and clinging to God with patience in tireless prayer—then God will finally open His door to him, especially because of his humility; for the revelation of mysteries comes to the humble-minded (and this is the third order).

221. Hope in God is preceded by labor for God and the sweat shed in one’s work. If you believe in God, you are doing well. But faith requires deeds, and hope in God is revealed in suffering for the sake of virtue. Do you believe that God cares for His creatures and is all-powerful? Then let your faith be accompanied by fitting deeds; and then God will hear you. Do not try to hold the wind in your hand—that is, faith without deeds. Often, a person, unaware, walks a path where there is a wild beast, or murderers, or something similar; and then God's providential care saves him from harm, or slows the traveler's progress in some way until the wild beast has moved aside, or causes him to turn aside from the path by some encounter. Sometimes a wicked serpent lies on the path, unseen; but God, not wishing to expose a person to that temptation, causes the serpent to suddenly hiss—it stirs from its place and crawls ahead of the traveler, who, upon seeing it, takes precautions and is saved. It often happens that a house, a wall, or a stone falls—and someone is sitting there—and God, in His love for humanity, commands an angel to hold back the falling object until those sitting there have moved away or been called away; and as soon as they have moved away, He immediately allows the falling object to fall. All this and the like are the work of God's general and universal Providence; but the righteous person is subject to a special, unceasing providence. God has commanded other people to manage their affairs prudently and, with God's providence, to make use of their own wisdom; but the righteous person, instead of wisdom, has acquired faith, by which he fears nothing, but "walks confidently like a lion" (Prov. 28:1). And just as his constant care is devoted to God, so God says of him: "I am with him in his affliction; I will deliver him and honor him; I will satisfy him with long life and show him My salvation" (Ps. 90:15–16). One who is lax and lazy in his work cannot have such hope. But whoever abides with God in all things, draws near to Him through the goodness of his deeds, and ceaselessly directs the eyes of his heart toward His grace—such a one may say of himself what the divine David said: "My eyes have grown dim, for I have set my hope on my God" (Ps. 68: 4).

222. When we seek to flee from the world, nothing separates us from it so much, puts our passions to death within us, and quickens us for the spiritual life as much as weeping and heartfelt, reasoned sorrow. But likewise, nothing makes us such accomplices of the world and distances us so much from the treasures of Wisdom and the knowledge of God's mysteries as frivolity and, in our carefree conduct, the flight of our thoughts. – And this is the work of the wayward demon. I therefore implore you with love to guard against the enemy's malice, lest he, through idle talk, cool the fervor of your love for Christ in your soul—He who tasted gall on the cross for your sake—and lest the enemy, instead of that sweet exercise and boldness before God, does not, while you are awake, fill your soul with many dreams, nor, while you sleep, ensnare it with absurd visions, the stench of which the angels cannot bear. Compel yourself to imitate the humility of Christ, so that the fire kindled within you by Him may blaze up more quickly— —a fire that uproots all the movements of the world that slay the new man and defile the courts of the Holy and Almighty Lord. For I dare to say with St. Paul that we are the temple of God (1 Cor. 3:16). Therefore, just as God Himself is pure, let us purify His temple, so that He may desire to dwell in it. And just as He Himself is holy, let us sanctify His temple; let us adorn it with every good and honorable deed, and perfume it with the fragrance of the peace of God's will, through pure and heartfelt prayer. Then the cloud of His glory will overshadow the soul, and the light of His majesty will shine within the heart.

223. A man who is preoccupied with many cares cannot be silent; for a multitude of tasks disrupt his stillness and silence, even if he does not wish it. A monk must place himself before the face of God and always lift his eyes to God, if he truly wishes to guard his mind, to ward off foreign impulses that creep into it, and, in the stillness of his thoughts, to discern what enters and what departs. Do not seek light in your soul without freedom from cares, nor silence and stillness while your senses are unrestrained. Without ceaseless prayer, it is impossible to draw near to God. Moreover, after the labor of prayer, imposing new concerns upon the mind leads to a scattering of thoughts. Tears, striking one's chest during prayer, and ardent zeal to continue praying awaken in the heart the fervor of the sweetness of tears, and the heart soars toward God with praiseworthy rapture, crying out: "My soul longs for You, O God, the strong and living God: when shall I come and appear before Your face?" (Ps. 41:3).—Whoever has tasted this wine and then been deprived of it knows alone in what pitiful state he is left, and what has been taken from him because of his slackness.

224. How harmful are meetings with people and conversations with them for those who live in silence! – Just as a heavy hailstorm, suddenly falling upon the fruits of the trees, beats them down and destroys them, so too do meetings with people—even if only brief—beat down the flowers of virtue that have just blossomed and luxuriously crowned the stem of the soul, planted by the streams of the waters of repentance (Ps. 1: 3). Just as a heavy frost, covering the greenery that has barely emerged from the earth, scorches it, so too does meeting with people scorch the root of the mind, which has begun to produce the grain of virtue. Just as a noble and respectable person, when intoxicated, forgets his nobility and becomes a laughingstock because of the foreign thoughts brought on by wine, so too is the chastity of the soul disturbed by the sight of people and conversation with them: —a person forgets his caution; the resolve of his will is erased from his thoughts, and the foundation for a praiseworthy way of life is uprooted.

225. Do not think, O man, that there is any practice in the entire monastic life more important than the night vigil. Through it, if the ascetic is not distracted by bodily affairs or concern for the transitory, his mind will, in a short time, soar upward as if on wings and rise to the delight of God. If a monk abides in mental vigilance with discernment, you will see him as if he were not a fleshly being. It is impossible that those who spend their entire lives in this practice should be left by God without any gifts for their sobriety, the alertness of their hearts, and the attentive striving of their thoughts toward Him. The soul that labors to remain in vigilance will have the eyes of the Cherubim, so that it may ceaselessly lift its gaze and contemplate the heavenly spectacle.

226. One who has chosen this divine labor must guard himself in every way during the day against the turmoil of social gatherings and against concern for worldly affairs; otherwise, he will endure the labor of abstaining from sleep but will reap no fruit from it; for in such a case, it will be impossible for the mind to participate properly in psalm-singing and prayer. But when someone, instead of worrying during the day, devotes himself to reading the Divine Scriptures—which strengthens the mind, serves especially as nourishment for prayer, and aids in the vigil closely connected with prayer— then in this reading he finds a guide on the right path; he finds that which is the seed of all-nourishing prayerful contemplation, which keeps thoughts from wandering and ceaselessly sows the remembrance of God in the soul.

227. Constant silence, together with reading, moderate eating, and vigil, quickly stir the mind to wonder, provided there is no cause to break the silence. The thoughts that arise in those who are silent, of their own accord and without deliberate effort, cause both eyes—from which tears flow, washing the cheeks with their abundance—to resemble a baptismal font.

228. Until one truly hates the causes of sin—from the heart—one is not freed from the pleasure produced by the power of sin. This is the most brutal struggle (against the delight in sin), one in which a person does not yield even to the point of shedding blood. In it, one's freedom is tested in the unity of one's (exclusive) love for virtue. In this struggle lies the power of sin, by which the enemy usually confuses the souls of the chaste, forcing them to experience what they had never accepted into themselves at all. And this is the time of an unseen struggle, which is extremely difficult when this battle, through acquired habit, gains great power over those who have delivered themselves to defeat by yielding to their own thoughts.

229. Beware of idleness; for in it lies certain death—and without it, it is impossible to fall into the hands of those who seek to enslave us. On that day, God will judge us not for the psalms, nor for our neglect of prayer, but for the fact that by neglecting this, we give demons entry. And when, having found a place for themselves, they enter and shut the doors of our eyes, then they will inflict upon us, in a most tormenting way, that which exposes us to God's condemnation and the most severe punishment. The observance of this—the service of psalm-singing and prayer—within the cell was established by the wise, in the spirit of revelation, to safeguard our lives; but the unwise regard the neglect of this as insignificant. Since the latter do not take into account the harm that results from this, both the beginning and the middle of their path are marked by ignorant freedom, which is the mother of the passions.

230. We cannot prevent the causes of our passions from arising; therefore, we are tempted even against our will. We do not desire sin for ourselves—but it happens that we accept the causes leading us to sin with pleasure; and then these causes become the reason for the effects of sin. Whoever loves the occasions of passion involuntarily becomes enslaved to them. Whoever hates his sins will cease to sin; and whoever confesses them will receive forgiveness. It is impossible for a person to abandon a sinful habit unless he first develops an aversion to sin, and it is impossible to receive forgiveness before confessing one's transgressions.

231. As long as a person carries within himself the poison of delight in his sins, everything he does seems proper to him. And as soon as nature strays from its proper order—whether intoxicated by wine or by lust—it makes no difference; for both remove one from one's present state, and both produce the same agitation in the body; though the means differ, the result is the same.

232. If you are alone in your cell and have not yet attained the power of true contemplation, then always occupy yourself with reading the troparia and kathismas, meditating on death, and hoping for the future. All of this focuses the mind on a single point and keeps it from wandering until true contemplation comes; for the power of the spirit is mightier than the passions. As for hope for the future, occupy yourself with remembering God, strive to understand the meaning of the troparia well, and beware of everything external that incites you to desires; at the same time, be careful even in the small things you do in your cell. Examine your thoughts, and pray that you may have discernment in all your activities; from this, joy will begin to flow to you; and then you will find sorrows that are sweeter than honey.

233. No one can overcome the passions except through visible and tangible virtues; and no one can overcome the wanderings of the mind except through the study of spiritual knowledge. Our mind is fickle, and if it is not anchored by some form of reflection, it never ceases to wander. And without perfection in the virtues mentioned above, it is impossible to attain this state of preservation; for unless one conquers one's enemies, there can be no peace. Passions serve as a barrier to the soul's hidden virtues; and unless they are first subdued by outward virtues, the inner virtues remain hidden behind them.

234. Love for God is naturally fervent, and when it overwhelms someone without measure, it fills that soul with rapture. In one who has experienced this love, an extraordinary transformation is evident: his face becomes radiant and joyful, and his body is warmed; fear and shame depart from him; he regards a terrible death as a joy; the contemplation of his mind does not allow for any interruption in his thoughts of the heavenly; he does not feel the stirrings caused by external objects, for although he does something, he is completely unaware of it—since his mind soars in contemplation, and his thoughts are always, as it were, conversing with someone. The Apostles and martyrs once revelled in this spiritual ecstasy. Some travelled the world, toiling and enduring reproach, while others, in terrible sufferings, did not lose heart but endured them valiantly. – Still others wandered in the deserts, mountains, and caves—and in their disorder they were the most well-ordered; they were regarded as foolish, yet among the wise they were the wisest.

235. Asceticism is the mother of holiness; from it comes the first experience of the mysteries of Christ—which is called the first degree of spiritual knowledge. A defiled soul does not enter the pure kingdom, nor does it commune with the spirits of the saints. Adorn the virtue of your chastity with tears, fasting, and solitary silence. A little sorrow for God's sake is better than a great deed performed without sorrow. What is accomplished without effort—that is, the practice of worldly people who perform acts of charity outwardly but gain nothing within themselves—is in vain. But strive within yourself, and suffer for Christ, so that you may be deemed worthy to partake of Christ's glory. The mind will not be glorified with Jesus unless the body suffers for Christ.

236. There are two ways to ascend the cross: one is the crucifixion of the body, and the other is the ascent into contemplation; the first is the result of liberation from the passions, and the second is the result of the effectiveness of the spirit's deeds. The mind is not subdued unless the body is subdued to it. The kingdom of the mind is the crucifixion of the body: and the mind is not subdued to God unless freedom is subdued to reason. Whoever subdues himself to God is close to having everything subdued to him.

237. The foundation of all that is good, the return of the soul from the enemy's captivity, the path leading to light and life—all this is contained in the following two practices: gathering oneself into unity and always fasting, that is, wisely and prudently making it a rule to abstain from food, to remain in one place without leaving, and to be constantly engaged in contemplation of God. From this come the subjugation of the senses, sobriety of mind, the taming of the fierce passions aroused in the body, the luminous movements of thought, diligence in virtuous deeds, tears and the remembrance of mortality, pure chastity, far removed from every fantasy and tempting thought—in short, from this comes the freedom of the true man, spiritual joy, and resurrection with Christ in the Kingdom. Whoever disregards these two paths should know that not only will he harm himself in all that has been said above, but he will also shake the very foundation of all virtues—and will fall into the following two vices, which are the opposites of the former: namely, carnal indulgence and shameless gluttony. These are the very beginnings of what is contrary to what has been said—and they make room in the soul for all passions.

238. The enemy, knowing the times of our natural needs—which prompt nature to satisfy itself—and knowing that the wandering of the eyes and the satisfaction of the belly cause the mind to become confused, strives precisely at such times to incite us to increase our natural needs and to sow in us images of deceitful thoughts, so that the passions, in an intensified struggle, may gain the upper hand over nature, and man may sink into sin. Therefore, just as the enemy watches for such times, so too must we, especially at these very times, be wise and not allow ourselves to rashly carry out the will of these suggested thoughts, not yield victory to greed, and above all, not to move from our place of silence or go where it happens to be convenient for us, so as not to thereby provide excuses for leaving the desert altogether.

239. The enemy stands before our eyes day and night, observing, waiting, and watching for any open door through which he might enter our senses. And when we allow even a single lapse in vigilance, then this cunning and shameless dog shoots his arrows at us. Sometimes nature itself begins to love peace, freedom, laughter, the soaring of thoughts, and laziness—and becomes a source of passions and an abyss of rebellion; and sometimes the enemy instills these things in the soul. Be careful not to indulge yourself in small matters, lest you come to indulge in greater ones and suffer great downfalls. And a small negligence, as someone has said, often leads to great dangers. To remain sober-minded even in small and insignificant matters—that is wisdom.

240. Do not lose heart when the matter concerns securing your life, and do not be too lazy to die for it; for cowardice is a sign of despondency, and carelessness is the mother of both. A timid person reveals that he suffers from two ailments: love of life and lack of faith. Love of life is a sign of unbelief. But whoever disregards this proves that he believes in God with all his soul and looks forward to the future. Courage of heart and disregard for danger arise from one of two causes: either great faith in God or hard-heartedness. Hard-heartedness is followed by pride, while faith is followed by humility of heart.

241. A person cannot gain hope in God unless he has first, to the best of his ability, fulfilled God's will. For hope in God and courage of heart are born of the testimony of conscience, and only through the true testimony of our mind do we have hope in God. The testimony of the mind consists in the fact that one's conscience does not condemn a person in the least, as if he had neglected something to which he is bound according to his strength. If our heart does not condemn us, "we have confidence before God" (1 John 3:21). Therefore, boldness is the result of progress in virtue and a clear conscience.

242. A person's constant silence and keeping of silence arise from the following three reasons: either for the sake of human glory, or out of ardent zeal for virtue, or because a person has within himself a certain divine conversation, and his mind is drawn to it. Virtue does not consist in the performance of many and varied bodily deeds, but in the wisest hope of the heart; for a proper purpose binds it to God. The mind, without bodily deeds, can do good; but the body, without the wisdom of the heart, even if it does something, cannot derive any benefit from it. Nevertheless, when a man of God finds an opportunity to perform a good deed, he will not hesitate to prove his love for God through the labor of his actions.

243. In the struggle against the stirrings of carnal lust, consider abstaining from the sight of women a powerful weapon for yourself; for the enemy cannot bring about in us what nature is capable of doing by its own power. Do not think that nature forgets what God has naturally instilled in it for procreation and for testing those who persevere in this struggle. But abstaining from objects of desire puts lust to death in the members, causes one to forget it, and eradicates it. Objects, when unseen, produce a slight and barely perceptible stirring; but objects, when seen, arouse passions through their proximity, nourish them—just as oil nourishes the flame of a lamp—and rekindle a passion that had already died down and been extinguished. Natural movement, without the addition of anything from outside, cannot disturb the purity of the will or disrupt chastity; for God has not given nature the power to overcome the good will's inclination toward Him. But if we sometimes willingly indulge in the sensual, and give ourselves over either to eating and drinking in excess, or to intimacy with women, looking at them, and talking about them—which kindles and rapidly spreads the fire of lust throughout the body—then we thereby transform the naturally gentle movement within the body into a fierce and uncontrollable one—through these additions to nature prompted by the impulses of our own will. Whatever God has created, He has created beautifully and in proportion. And as long as the measure of conformity to nature is properly preserved within us, natural movements cannot compel us to stray from the path: but only harmonious movements are aroused in the body, which merely indicate that there is a natural passion within us, without, however, causing the stirrings and disturbances strong enough to hinder chastity.

244. Sometimes there is a stirring in the limbs, permitted by God because of our pride. We know of this struggle that when we have been attentive to ourselves for a long time and have labored diligently—even to the point of considering ourselves somewhat successful—we are permitted to endure it so that we may learn humility. Other trials arise from our sloth and excessive indulgence of the flesh, through the abandonment of all that is painful and arduous in our way of life—especially the constant confinement to the cell and the toil of physical labor. Sorrow, hardship, and the constraints of life restrain and mortify sensuality; whereas ease, comfort, and the repose of the flesh unleash, nourish, and revive it. God and His angels rejoice when we are in need, while the devil and his minions rejoice when we are at ease. Sorrow and constraint broaden and facilitate the fulfillment of the commandments; but ease gives way to passions, and thereby hinders and suppresses the fulfillment of the commandments. In a body that is constrained, thoughts cannot give in to dangerous flights of fancy. When someone joyfully bears labors and sorrows, then he can easily rein in his thoughts, because they are rendered inactive by the labors. When a person, remembering his past sins, punishes himself, then God looks upon him with favor. God rejoices that, for straying from His path, the person has imposed punishment upon himself—which serves as a sign of repentance. And the more he imposes discipline on his soul, the more God’s favor toward him increases. But any joy whose cause is not virtue immediately stirs up lustful impulses in the one who experiences it.

245. Virtues build upon one another so that the path of virtue is not difficult or arduous, so that one may progress through them in order and find relief in doing so, and so that, in this way, even the hardships endured for the sake of virtue may become pleasant, as something good. Thus, no one can acquire true detachment unless they prepare themselves to endure temptations with joy. And no one can endure temptations unless they are convinced that, in exchange for the sorrows they have prepared themselves to endure, they can receive something that surpasses physical comfort. Whoever deprives himself of material things but has not deprived himself of the reality of the senses—that is, sight and hearing—has prepared for himself double sorrow, and will suffer and grieve all the more. For if mental images of things—without the things themselves—produce a painful sensation in a person, what shall we say when the things themselves are present and close to us? In this case, a person suffers from the sensations produced by these things just as he previously suffered while performing the action; for the memory of his habit regarding them never leaves his mind. How wonderful is the life of a hermit in this regard! In it, only thoughts remain as temptations; yet it also contributes greatly and powerfully to the taming of those thoughts.

246. Do not seek advice from a person who does not lead the same way of life as you, even if he is extremely wise. Entrust your thoughts rather to an uneducated person who has gained practical experience in the matter than to a learned philosopher who reasons based on his research without having tested it in practice. To gain experience means not merely approaching certain things and observing them without internalizing knowledge about them, but, through prolonged engagement with them, clearly perceiving their benefits and harms through personal experience. Often, a thing appears harmful on the surface, but inside it turns out to be full of benefit; and conversely, a thing often appears to be beneficial, but is inwardly full of harm. Therefore, seek the counsel of one who, having tested everything himself, is able to patiently discuss what requires deliberation in your own affairs—and can reliably point out what is truly beneficial to you.

247. When you find unchanging peace on your path, be wary; for you are far from the straight path trodden by the weary feet of the Saints. As long as you are still on the path to the city of the kingdom, let the following be a sign to you that you are drawing near to the city of God: you will encounter powerful temptations;—and the closer you come and the more you progress, the more the temptations before you will multiply. Therefore, as soon as you feel the greatest and strongest temptations in your soul along your path; know that at that moment your soul has truly and secretly ascended to a new, higher degree, and that grace has been multiplied for it in the state in which it finds itself; for in proportion to the greatness of grace, God leads the soul into the tribulation of temptations to exactly the same degree. If the soul is weak and lacks sufficient strength for great temptations, and therefore asks not to be subjected to them, and God grants its request; then know for certain that to the extent the soul lacks sufficient strength for great trials, to that same extent it is also insufficient for great gifts; and just as access to great trials is denied to it, so too are great gifts denied to it. For God does not grant a great gift without a great temptation; the gifts are determined by God in proportion to the temptations, according to His wisdom, which those He has created cannot comprehend.

248. The temptations encountered upon embarking on a virtuous life and “as it progresses” differ from the temptations permitted to “humble the pride” of the heart. The temptations that befall the soul from the spiritual rod “for its progress” and growth—and through which it is taught, tested, and led into spiritual struggle—are as follows: sloth, heaviness in the body, weakness of the limbs, despondency, confusion of thoughts, suspicion arising from physical exhaustion, a temporary loss of hope, a darkening of thoughts, a lack of human assistance, scarcity of what the body needs, and the like. These temptations give rise in the soul to a sense of loneliness and defenselessness, a darkening of the heart, and humility. The Providence, however, measures the temptations according to the strengths and needs of those who endure them. Within them coexist both comfort and defeat, light and darkness, strife and help—in short, confinement and spaciousness. And this serves as a sign that a person is prospering with God’s help.

249. The temptations that come upon people by God's permission—those who "exalt themselves" before God's goodness and offend God with their "pride"—are as follows: the deprivation of the power of wisdom that people possess; a restless sensation within themselves of wandering thoughts, permitted upon them to humble their pride; quick irritability; the desire to have everything go their own way; quarreling over words; rebuking others; a heart that despises everyone; complete delusion of the mind; blasphemy against the name of God; foolish, laughable thoughts, as if people were disregarding them, and their honor were reduced to nothing; and, both secretly and openly, in various ways, they are subjected to shame and humiliation by demons; finally, the desire to be in fellowship and interaction with the world, to speak ceaselessly and engage in reckless idle talk, to always seek out news and even false prophecies, and to promise far more than one's strength allows. And these are the essence of spiritual temptations. Among the bodily temptations are: painful, complex, prolonged, and difficult-to-cure seizures; constant encounters with wicked and godless people; falling into the hands of abusers; unexpected stumbles and dangerous falls; and ruinous misfortunes for them and their families. All that we have described belongs to the category of temptations of pride. The beginning of these appears in a person when he begins to seem wise in his own eyes. And he undergoes all these misfortunes as he internalizes such thoughts of pride: the more of them you have, the more pride penetrates you.

250. There is another kind of temptation—faint-heartedness due to a lack of patience. Every difficult circumstance and every sorrow, if not met with patience, leads to intense suffering; for patience in a person wards off misfortunes, while faintheartedness is the mother of suffering. Patience is the mother of consolation—and a certain strength, usually born of a generous heart. It is difficult for a person to find such strength in their sorrows without a divine gift, obtained through unceasing prayer and the shedding of tears. When it pleases God to subject a person to great sorrows, He allows them to fall into the clutches of faint-heartedness. And this gives rise to an overwhelming power of despondency, in which he feels his soul crushed—and this is a foretaste of Gehenna; for from this spring thousands of temptations: confusion, irritation, blasphemy, complaints against fate, perverse thoughts, wandering from one land to another, and the like. The cause of all this is your own negligence. You yourself have not taken care to seek a remedy for this. Yet there is but one remedy for all of this—humility of heart. Without it, no one can break down the barrier of these evils. As humility increases, so does patience in afflictions; as patience increases, the burden of sorrows is lightened, and comfort is received; as comfort increases, so does love for God; and as love increases, so does the joy of the Holy Spirit. God does not remove temptations from His servants, but grants them patience in temptations because of their faith and their surrender to His will.

251. A life according to God in the flesh consists of bodily deeds—bodily efforts to purify the body from passions through virtuous activity. A life of the mind is a matter of the heart, pursued unceasingly with careful thought of the judgment, as well as constant prayer of the heart, reflection on God's Providence and care, both private and general, as seen in the whole world, and guarding oneself against hidden passions, so that nothing passionate may be found in the inner and spiritual realm.

252. Repentance is given to people as grace upon grace after baptism; for repentance is a second rebirth from God. Repentance is the door to mercy; through this door we enter into God's mercy, and apart from this entrance, you will not find mercy. Repentance is the second grace, and it is born of faith and fear; fear, however, is the fatherly rod that guides us until we attain the spiritual paradise of blessings: after which it departs from us. Paradise is the love of God, in which lies the enjoyment of all blessings. The tree of life is the love of God, from which Adam fell; and since then, joy has not been found by him; but he toiled and labored in the land of thorns. Those deprived of God's love, if they walk in righteousness, eat that bread of sweat in their labors, which was commanded to the first man after his fall. He who lives in love bears the fruit of life from God, and even in this world he breathes the air of the resurrection. Love is the kingdom; the Lord mysteriously promised the Apostles that they would taste it in His kingdom. For it is said, "You will eat and drink at the table of My kingdom" (Luke 22:30)—what else does this mean but love?—Behold, "the wine that gladdens the heart of man" (Ps. 103:15). Blessed is he who drinks of this wine!

253. Just as it is impossible to cross the great sea without a ship or a boat, so no one can attain love without fear. We can cross the foul sea between us and the heavenly paradise only in the boat of repentance, which is rowed by the oarsmen of fear. But if the oarsmen of fear do not steer the ship of repentance, on which we journey across the sea of this world to God, then we will drown in this foul sea. Repentance is the ship, fear is its helmsman, and love is the Divine harbor. Fear leads us onto the ship of repentance, carries us across the foul sea of life, and guides us to the Divine harbor, which is love. All who labor and are burdened—through repentance—come to this harbor. And when we attain love, then we have attained God, and our journey is complete, and we have arrived at the island of the world to come, where the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit dwell.

254. There is knowledge that precedes faith, and there is knowledge that is born of faith. The knowledge that precedes faith is natural knowledge, while that born of faith is spiritual knowledge. Natural knowledge distinguishes good from evil, and it is called natural discernment, by which we naturally, without learning, distinguish good from evil. God has implanted this discernment in rational nature; through learning, however, it is enhanced and enriched. There is no human being who does not possess it. This is the power of natural knowledge in the rational soul, a power that is constantly brought into action within it. The honor of rational nature is the discernment that distinguishes good from evil, and the Prophet rightly likened those who have lost it to senseless beasts (Ps. 48:13).

255. Natural insight, which precedes faith, is the path to faith and to God. Having been instilled in our nature by God, it itself convinces us that we must believe in God, who brought all things into being. This faith produces fear within us, and this fear compels us to repentance; and through our actions, a person is granted spiritual knowledge—or a sense of the mysteries—which gives rise to the faith of true contemplation. Spiritual insight is not born simply from bare faith alone; but faith gives rise to the fear of God, and through the fear of God—when we begin to act in accordance with it—spiritual insight is born from the action of this fear, as St. Chrysostom said: “When someone acquires a will corresponding to the fear of God and a proper way of thinking, then he soon receives the revelation of the hidden things.” By “revelation of the hidden things,” he means spiritual insight.

256. Yet it is not the fear of God that gives rise to this spiritual insight; rather, this insight is given as a gift for the practice of the fear of God. The practice of the fear of God is repentance; and repentance, having run its full course and come to an end, leads to the place where spiritual insight is given. Spiritual insight is a perception of the hidden. And when someone perceives this invisible reality, then a different kind of faith is born within that perception—one that is not contrary to the first faith, but rather affirms that faith. This is called contemplative faith. Until then, there was hearing; now there is contemplation, and contemplation is more certain than hearing.

257. All this arises from that natural knowledge which distinguishes good from evil. It is the good seed of virtue. Following this natural knowledge within a person comes—a constant pricking of the conscience—an unceasing remembrance of death and a certain agonizing concern that continues until the very end of his life—and after this, sorrow, despondency, the fear of God, natural modesty, —sorrow for one’s past sins, proper diligence, remembrance of the common path, concern for preparing oneself for it—a tearful supplication to God for a good entry through these gates, through which every creature must pass—contempt for the world and a fierce struggle for virtue. All this is acquired through natural knowledge—and let everyone compare their deeds with this. When it becomes evident that a person has acquired this, it means that he is walking the natural path; and when he transcends this and enters into love, then he rises above nature—and struggle, fear, toil, and weariness in all things come to an end for him. These are the consequences of natural knowledge. – And we find this within ourselves when we do not cloud this knowledge with our self-indulgent will. – And we remain at this stage until we enter into love, which frees us from all of this. Let everyone, based on all that we have said, examine and test themselves to see where their path lies: whether in that which is unnatural, or in that which is natural, or in that which is supernatural.

258. A good thought takes root in the heart only through divine grace; a wicked thought approaches a person only for the sake of temptation and testing. A person who has come to know the extent of his weakness has attained the perfection of humility. God’s gifts draw the heart, stirring it to unceasing thanksgiving. The Lord bears with all human weaknesses, but He does not tolerate a person who is always grumbling, nor does He leave such a person without correction. Grace is preceded by humility; and punishment is preceded by pride. The proud are allowed to fall into blasphemy; those who boast of their active virtue are allowed to fall into fornication; and those who boast of their wisdom are allowed to fall into the dark snares of ignorance.

259. Whoever honors every person while remembering God will, by God’s secret providence, find help from every person. Whoever defends the wronged finds God as his advocate; whoever extends his hand to help his neighbor receives God’s strength to aid himself. Whoever accuses his brother of his vice finds an accuser in God. Whoever corrects his brother in private heals his own vice; but whoever accuses anyone before an assembly increases the pain of his own wounds. A friend who rebukes in secret is a wise physician, but one who heals before the eyes of many is a reviler.

260. God corrects with love, not with vengeance (God forbid)! He seeks only to heal His own image and harbors no anger. Whoever does good for the sake of reward will soon change. No matter how much a person may perfect himself in this life in his striving toward God, everything remains behind Him; but in the age to come, God reveals His face to him—though not exactly as He is. No matter how deeply the righteous here enter into the contemplation of God, they behold only an image as in a mirror, whereas there they behold the manifestation of truth.

261. A fire that has ignited in dry wood is difficult to extinguish: and if God's warmth sets upon the heart of one who has renounced the world, its blaze is not quenched—and it burns more fiercely than fire. When the power of guilt enters the limbs, the mind forgets all restraint: and the remembrance of God, when it takes hold of the pasture of the soul, eradicates from the heart all remembrance of the visible world. The sense of the age to come in this world is like a small island in the sea; and whoever approaches it is no longer tossed about by the waves of the visions of this age. A monk, as long as he sees a need in this life to labor still, grieves over separation from the body; but when he feels in his soul that he has made the most of his time and received his pledge, he longs for the age to come. As long as a merchant is at sea, fear grips his limbs, lest the waves rise up against him and the hope of his enterprise be drowned; and as long as a monk is in the world, fear takes hold of his life, lest a storm arise within him and his work—at which he has labored from his youth to his old age—be lost.

262. A sailor, while sailing across the sea, gazes at the stars and steers his ship by them until he reaches the harbor; and a monk gazes upon prayer, for it sets him aright and directs his journey toward that harbor toward which his life is directed in hourly prayer. A swimmer, stripped of his clothes, plunges into the sea to find a pearl; and a monk, having cast off all worldly things, lives out his life to find within himself the pearl—Jesus Christ—and when he finds Him, he no longer seeks anything else that exists besides Him.

263. It is harmful for a virgin to be in public gatherings and among large crowds, and for a monk's mind to be in conversation with many. A bird, wherever it may be, strives toward its nest to raise its young there; and a discerning monk hastens to his place to bring forth within himself the fruit of life. Clouds obscure the sun; and excessive talk darkens the soul that has begun to be enlightened by prayerful contemplation. It is said of a bird called the siren that anyone who hears the sweet sound of its voice is so captivated that, following it through the desert, they forget their very life because of the sweetness of its song, fall, and die. This is similar to what happens to the soul. When heavenly sweetness enters it, then, moved by the melodious sound of God's words—which are imprinted on the mind—the whole soul rushes in His wake, so that it forgets its bodily life; and the body is stripped of its desires, while the soul is lifted from this life to God.

264. A tree, unless it first sheds its old leaves, does not produce new branches; and a monk, until he uproots from his heart the memory of his past deeds, does not bear new fruits and branches in Christ Jesus. In the oyster shell where a pearl is formed, it is said that a spark of lightning produces a certain kind of spark, and from the air it takes in substance, but until then it remains mere flesh: and the monk's heart, until it takes in heavenly substance through understanding, his work is something ordinary, and he does not contain the fruit of consolation within his own shells. A dog that licks its own nostrils drinks its own blood, and, because of the sweetness of its blood, does not feel the harm it is doing to itself; and a monk who is prone to revel in vanity drinks his own life, and because of the sweetness he feels for a moment, does not realize the harm he is doing to himself.

265. Do not approach the words of the sacraments contained in the Holy Scriptures without prayer and a plea for God's help, but say: "Grant me, O Lord, to receive a sense of the power contained within them." Consider prayer the key to the true meaning of what is said in the Holy Scriptures. When you wish to draw near to God with your heart, first prove your love to Him through physical labor. In these lies the beginning of life—and the Lord has laid them as the foundation of perfection. Consider idleness the beginning of the soul's darkening, and gatherings for conversation the darkening that follows darkening. If even useful speech, when unchecked, leads to darkening, how much more so does idle talk. The soul becomes insubstantial from the multitude of prolonged conversations.

266. Moderation and established rules in one's life enlighten the mind and prevent confusion. Confusion of the mind arising from disorder (from the lack of consistent rules) produces darkness in the soul, and darkness in turn produces further confusion. Peace (of mind) is the result of good order, and from peace light is born; and from light and peace, pure air shines forth in the mind.

267. A self-seeking soul is deprived of wisdom, but a merciful soul will be made wise by the Spirit. The key to the heart's access to divine gifts is given through love for one's neighbor, and as the heart detaches itself from bodily bonds, the door to knowledge also opens before it. How beautiful and praiseworthy is love for one's neighbor, provided that the care it entails does not distract us from the love of God!

268. How pleasant is conversation with our spiritual brothers, provided that we can maintain our communion with God at the same time! It is good to care for conversations with our spiritual brothers as well, as long as moderation is observed—that is, as long as, under this pretext, we do not lose our inner work and way of life, nor our unceasing conversation with God. The latter is disrupted at the very beginning of the former; for the mind is not sufficient to sustain two conversations at once. Excessive conversation with spiritual brothers can also be harmful; and it is harmful even to look at worldly people from a distance; even without seeing them, the mere sound of their voices disturbs the peace of the heart.

269. Just as the soul is by nature superior to the body, so too is the spiritual body superior to the physical one. But just as the creation of the body originally preceded the breathing of life into it, so too do bodily deeds precede spiritual ones. And it is not a lofty life, maintained without change, that constitutes great strength. A weak drop, dripping constantly, wears through a hard stone. When the time draws near for the spiritual man to rise within you, then joy stirs in your soul, and your thoughts are enveloped within you by the sweetness that is in your heart. But as long as the world attempts to rise up within you again, then the agitation of your thoughts multiplies within you. By "the world" I mean the passions that arise from the agitation of the mind. When they are born and reach maturity, they become sins and kill the person. Just as children are not born without a mother, so passions are not born without the flight of the mind, and the commission of sin does not occur without a dialogue with the passions.

270. If patience grows in our souls, it is a sign that we have secretly received the grace of consolation. When the soul is enraptured by the joy of its hope and by God's gladness, then the body feels no sorrow, even though it is frail. Then it is able to bear a heavy burden without showing any lack of strength. This happens when the soul enters into that spiritual joy. If you guard your tongue, God will grant you the grace of heartfelt tenderness, so that you may see your own soul in it and thereby enter into spiritual joy. To the extent that a person has embarked on a spiritual struggle for God's sake, to that extent his heart receives boldness in his prayer; and to the extent that a person is distracted by many things, to that extent he is deprived of God's help.

271. The first thought that, through God's love for humanity, enters a person and guides the soul toward life "is" the thought that takes root in the "heart concerning the destiny of this nature." This thought is naturally followed by a disregard for the world; and this is how every good impulse within a person begins, leading him to life. It is this very divine power, which accompanies a person, that lays the foundation when it desires to reveal life within him. – And if a person does not extinguish this thought we have spoken of within himself through worldly cares and idle chatter, but rather nurtures it in silence, dwells upon it in contemplation, and engages with it; then it will lead him to a profound contemplation that no one is able to describe in words. Satan hates this thought and attacks with all his might to eradicate it from a person. And if it were possible, he would give him the kingdom of the whole world, just to erase such a thought from a person's mind through distraction. For the crafty one knows that if this thought abides in a person, then his mind no longer dwells on this earth of delusion, and his schemes cannot reach him.

272. Another process follows this, when a person lives a good life and draws near to the experience of contemplating and practicing it, when from above he receives "the grace to taste the sweetness of spiritual knowledge." The beginning of this process consists of the following: first, a person becomes convinced of God's providence toward humanity, is enlightened by his love for the Creator, and marvels both at the order of rational beings and at God's great care for them. From this point, the sweetness of God and the kindling of love for God begin within him, blazing in his heart and consuming his spiritual and physical passions. This love, accompanied by strong diligence and a good conscience, then begins to flare up suddenly—and a person is intoxicated by it, as by wine, and his heart is carried captive to God. To the extent that a person strives for a good life, for self-discipline, and for spending time in reading and prayer, to that same extent this power is established and strengthened within him.

273. Let us not be disheartened when we find ourselves in darkness. I mean that particular darkness in which the soul at times languishes, as if amidst waves; and whether a person reads Scripture or performs a service, in whatever task he undertakes, darkness follows darkness. Such a person abandons the task, and often is not even allowed to approach it. This hour is filled with despair and fear; hope in God and the comfort of faith in Him are completely cast aside by the soul—and the whole soul is utterly filled with doubt and fear. But God does not leave the soul in such a state for long; rather, He soon provides a way out (1 Cor. 10:13). And I will point this out to you and offer some advice: if you do not have the strength to control yourself and fall on your face in prayer, then cover your head with a cloak and sleep until this hour of darkness passes for you, but do not leave your cell. Those who desire to lead a contemplative life and who seek the comfort of faith in their journey are most subject to this temptation. Therefore, this hour torments and wearies them most of all with the wavering of the mind; and blasphemy often follows this, and sometimes a person is overcome by doubt regarding the Resurrection, and other things of which we ought not to speak. Those engaged in physical labor are completely free from these temptations. They are overcome by a different kind of despondency, known to all, which differs in its nature from these and similar temptations. Blessed is the one who endures this without stepping outside the door. However, this struggle does not end in a single hour; nor does grace return suddenly and take root in the soul, but rather gradually. And one thing gives way to another—at times temptation, and at times consolation.

274. A person consumed by unreasonable jealousy never enters the realm of the mind; and one who is alien to that realm is also alien to joy. If the realm of the mind is called perfect health, and unreasonable jealousy is contrary to that realm, then it follows that the one in whom there is malicious jealousy is already suffering from a grave illness. A heart filled with sorrow over weakness and powerlessness in obvious bodily affairs takes the place of all these bodily affairs. Bodily affairs without sorrow of the mind are like a body without a soul. Whoever grieves in his heart and gives free rein to his passions is like a man who suffers physically and whose mouth is open to any food harmful to him, or like one who has an only son—and who, little by little, kills him with his own hands.

275. Chastity and conversation with a woman are like a lioness and a sheep in the same house. Deeds without mercy before God are like a man who kills his son in the presence of his father. Just as a handful of sand thrown into the sea is insignificant, so too are the sins of all flesh in comparison to God's Providence and God's mercy. And just as a spring abundant with water is not blocked by a handful of dust, so too is the Creator's mercy not overcome by the vices of His creatures. To be resentful and to pray is like sowing on the sea and expecting a harvest. Just as a flame of fire cannot help but rise upward, so the prayers of the merciful rise to heaven. Just as water flows down a slope, so does the power of irritability when it finds its way into our hearts.

276. There is humility born of the fear of God, humility born of love for God, and humility born of joy. The humble person, out of the fear of God, is accompanied at all times by modesty in every aspect of life, orderliness of the senses, and a contrite heart. A gathering of the humble is beloved by God, like a congregation of seraphim. A chaste body is more precious before God than a pure sacrifice. These two virtues—humility and chastity—prepare in the soul a betrothal pledge for the Holy Trinity.

277. Watch over your inner self, but not as you would your eyesight; for internal strife is, without a doubt, easier to manage than external strife. Do not believe, brother, that inner thoughts can be restrained without bringing the body into a good and orderly state. Fear habits more than you fear enemies. One who nurtures a habit within himself is like a man who feeds fire. If a habit demands something once and its demand is not met, you will find it weak the next time. But if you yield to its will once, you will find it attacking you with far greater force the second time.

278. Do not be friends with anyone who loves to laugh and loves to put on a show for others; otherwise, he will teach you the habit of indulging in idleness. When someone begins to slander his brother in your presence, lower your gaze. As soon as you do this, you will show caution both before God and before him. If you give to one in need, let the cheerfulness of your face precede your gift, and comfort his sorrow with a kind word. When you do this, your kindness will be more precious to him than even a gift that exceeds his needs. In all your deeds, let bodily self-control and a clear conscience precede you; for without them, every deed is vain before God.

279. Let them persecute you, but do not persecute; let them crucify you, but do not crucify; let them wrong you, but do not wrong; let them slander you, but do not slander. Going to court is not the way of the Christian life; there is not even a hint of this in Christ's teaching. Rejoice with those who rejoice, and weep with those who weep; for this is a sign of purity. Grieve with the sick; shed tears with the sinners; rejoice with those who repent. Be friendly with all people, but remain alone in your thoughts.

280. Do not condemn or revile anyone, not even those who lead extremely wicked lives. Spread your garment over the one who has fallen and cover him. Know that this is why we must not leave the doors of our cell—so that we may not know of the evil deeds of men; and then, in the ignorance of our minds, we will see all people as holy and good. If you cannot labor with your body, at least mourn in your mind. If you cannot fast for two days, fast at least until evening; but if you cannot even fast until evening, then beware of gluttony. If you are not a peacemaker, at least do not be a lover of strife. If you are unable to silence one who condemns your friend, then at least beware of associating with him.

281. Know that if fire goes out from you and burns others, God will hold you accountable for the souls consumed by your fire. And if you do not kindle the fire yourself, but agree with the one who does and take pleasure in it, you will be counted among his accomplices at the judgment. On all the paths that people walk in this world, they find no peace until they draw near to hope in God. The heart finds no rest from toil and stumbling blocks until hope enters it, pacifies it, and pours joy into it. It is of this that the venerable lips spoke: “Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Matt. 11:28). The light of the mind gives birth to faith; faith gives birth to the consolation of hope; and hope strengthens the heart.

282. The Son of God endured the cross; therefore, we sinners boldly rely on repentance. The sorrows of the mind are sufficient to replace every bodily deed. St. Gregory says: “He who is in union with God is a temple of grace—and is always preoccupied with the thought of His judgment.” Blessed Basil said: “Unceasing prayer produces in the soul a clear thought of God; and when we establish within ourselves the remembrance of God, it is God Himself who dwells within us.” Thus we become the temple of God. A contrite heart serves as a preparation for rest in God.

283. What we acquire during our idleness is what puts us to shame during our prayer. Sobriety helps a person more than work; and distraction (the wandering of thoughts) harms him more than (physical) rest. Domestic strife arises from rest and troubles a person, but he has the ability to put an end to it. For as soon as a person abandons rest and returns to his work, these quarrels are removed from him and depart. But what is caused by a lack of self-control is not the same as what is caused by rest. As long as a person remains within the realm of his freedom during rest, he can return and govern himself according to his established rules; for he is still within the realm of his freedom. But by granting himself permission (for pleasurable thoughts), he steps outside the realm of his freedom. If a person had not completely abandoned self-observation, he would not be forcibly and involuntarily compelled to submit to that which does not bring him peace.

284. Do not, O man, grant freedom to any of your senses, lest you reach the point where it becomes impossible to return to freedom. Indolence harms only the young, while indulgence harms both the old and the perfected. Those who, through indolence, fall into evil thoughts can return to self-examination and reaffirm their noble way of life. But those who, in their eagerness for action, have neglected self-examination are led captive from a noble life into a life of debauchery.

285. We should not grieve only when we are tempted to do something, but especially when we become hardened in that same sin; for temptation often befalls even the perfect, while becoming hardened in the same sin is a complete darkening of the soul. The sorrow we feel at our temptations is credited to us by grace in place of a pure deed. Whoever, in the hope of repentance, deliberately yields to temptation a second time acts deceitfully toward God; death overtakes him unexpectedly, and he does not reach the time when he hoped to perform acts of virtue.

286. Everyone who has given free rein to the senses has also given free rein to the heart; for the workings of the heart serve as bonds for the external senses. If anyone engages in this practice with discernment, it becomes evident through the following three signs: he is not bound by bodily pleasures, he does not indulge in gluttony, and he does not allow himself to become irritable. Where these three are present, there is no true inner order, even if the outward appearance is flawless. Prudent disregard for the body gives rise to detachment from all things, disregard for peace, and indifference to human affection. If anyone willingly and joyfully accepts loss for God’s sake, then he is pure within. Whoever does not look with pleasure upon those who honor him, and does not resent those who dishonor him, has become dead to the world in this life.

287. Do not harbor hatred toward a sinner; for we are all accountable. If you rebuke him for God’s sake, then weep for him. And why should you hate him? Hate his sin, and pray for him, so that you may become like Christ, Who did not grow angry with sinners but prayed for them. Be a preacher of God's goodness; for God rules over you, though you are unworthy; for you owe Him much, yet His punishment is not evident upon you, and for the small deeds you have done, He rewards you with great things.

288. Fear God out of love for Him, not because of the fearsome name attributed to Him. Love Him as you are bound to love Him—not because of what He will give you in the future, but because of what we have received in the present, and because of this one world that He created for us. Who persuaded Him in the beginning to bring us into being? Who intercedes for us when we do not remember Him? When we did not yet exist, who brought this body of ours to life? From where does the thought of knowledge take root in the earth? What immeasurable goodness is it that restores our sinful nature to rebirth! Come, you who are discerning, and marvel. Who, possessing a wise and wondrous mind, will rightly marvel at the mercy of our Creator?

289. To the extent that a person disregards this world and is zealous for the fear of God, to that extent does God's Providence draw near to him—and in secret, a person senses the assistance of Providence, and pure thoughts are given to him to understand it. If anyone voluntarily deprives himself of worldly goods, to the very extent that he deprives himself of them, to that same extent God's mercy accompanies him, and God's love for humanity sustains him. As for the souls of those who are not strong enough to attain true life through voluntary renunciation of all things, He leads them to virtue through involuntary sufferings, as we see in the case of the poor man Lazarus. God is close to the sorrowful heart of the one who cries out to Him in distress. Even if He sometimes subjects us to bodily deprivations and other afflictions, the Lord shows great love for the soul of the afflicted, commensurate with the severity of their suffering.

290. When the longing for Christ's love does not prevail in you to the point that, out of joy in Christ, you remain dispassionate in all your afflictions, know that the world dwells in you more than Christ does. When illness, poverty, physical exhaustion, or fear of harm to the body disturbs your mind to the point that it turns you away from the joy of your hope and from your concern for pleasing the Lord, then know that it is the body that lives within you, not Christ. Simply put, whatever attachment prevails in you above all else is what lives within you. If you lack nothing you need, your body is healthy, and you fear nothing adverse—and you say that you can thus walk purely toward Christ—then know that you are sick in mind and deprived of the taste of God's glory.

291. Lest you say that there has never been a person whose mind was completely elevated above weakness when the body was crushed by temptations and sorrows, and in whom the sorrow of the mind was overcome by love for Christ, —I will remind you of the martyrs, and see how their endurance, strengthened by the power of Christ's love, overcame great sorrow and bodily illness. And it was not only they who displayed such steadfastness; there were philosophers, pagans who did not know the true God, who showed remarkable strength of courage. One of them made it a rule to remain silent—and did not waver from this decision, despite the obvious danger of death. Others completely suppressed their natural desires; still others easily endured slander; some endured cruel illnesses without sorrow; and others demonstrated their patience in sorrows and great calamities. If they endured this for the sake of empty glory and hope, should we monks—called to communion with God—not endure far more?

Volume III

Preface

Here is the third volume of the Russian edition of Dobrotolubie. Almost all the articles contained herein are taken from the Greek Dobrotolubie. The only additions are a conversation with Abba Zosima, who guided St. Mary of Egypt, and an ascetic discourse from the writings of St. Maximus the Confessor. All of this follows in the following order:

1. A monastic treatise in one hundred chapters by Blessed Diadochus, Bishop of Photiki, preceded by ten definitions of the highest degrees of the principal virtues.

2. The Venerable John of Carpathos—one hundred chapters—consisting of words of comfort and exhortation.

3. The Discourses of Abba Zosima.
4. Saint Maximus the Confessor—a) A Discourse on Asceticism, in the form of questions and answers; b) Four hundred chapters on love; c) Speculative and practical chapters selected from his seven hundred chapters.
5. The Venerable Phalassius—four hundred chapters on love, abstinence, and the spiritual life.
6. St. Theodore, Bishop of Edessa—100 edifying chapters.
7. Another certain Theodore—an edifying, contemplative discourse.
8. A highly beneficial account of Abba Philemon.
9. The Venerable Theognostus—on the active and contemplative life, 75 chapters.
10. The Venerable Philotheos of Sinai: 40 chapters on sobriety.
11. By Elder Elijah—The Garden of Flowers. Editor's Note for the HTML Version (2005) The main text of the second through fifth volumes of Dobrotolyubie has been edited to bring it in line with modern Russian spelling and pronunciation. Quotations from Holy Scripture have been left unchanged. Their meaning can be clarified, if necessary, using the modern Russian edition of the Old and New Testaments. The distinction in the spelling of the words “мир” (society, sometimes—the created universe as a whole), “миръ” (peace, order, harmony), and “μυρο” (a fragrant mixture for sacred anointing) has also been left unchanged.

Blessed Diadochus, Bishop of Photiki in Illyrian Epirus

A Brief Account of Him

Nothing is known about the origins and early life of St. Diadochus prior to his episcopate. During his episcopate, however, he was renowned both for his holy life and his wise teachings. Victor, Bishop of Utica in Africa, in the preface to his History of the Persecutions by the Vandals (Migne, Patrol. Lat.* vol. 58), written around 490, refers to himself as Diadochus's disciple, bestows this title upon himself in his own honor, and adds that “This blessed Diadochus is worthy of being extolled with every kind of praise, since he left behind a great many works on orthodox doctrine and the Christian life.”—From this, it must be concluded that he flourished in the second half of the 5th century and may have died not long before its end, as can be surmised from the fact that his signature appears in the letter from the bishops of Epirus to Emperor Leo (457–473). Other details of his life are unknown. Of his writings, the following are known to date: a) two discourses—one on the Ascension of the Lord, setting forth the orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation of the Word of God, and the other against the Arians; b) 100 chapters on the ascetic life, with 10 introductory guidelines on the ultimate limits of perfection in the principal virtues. Sofronius, Patriarch of Jerusalem, cites passages from these writings in his circular letter against the Monophysites (Bibliography of Photius, vol. 231); St. Maximus the Confessor also referred to him on more than one occasion. Regarding his chapters on asceticism, which we have included in our collection, Blessed Photius comments as follows: “This work (i.e., the 100 chapters) is exceedingly beneficial to those engaged in spiritual struggle, and for those who, through long practice, have acquired skill in the deeds leading to perfection, it contains nothing obscure; for in such a case, knowledge gained through experience readily follows the path of the teaching set forth in the text.” The compilers of the Greek edition of Dobrotolubie, in the preface to this work, state: “That our Holy Father Diadochus was a man wise in action and enlightened in contemplation is something anyone who wishes to know can discern from this work, which has come down to us intact and which he composed so beautifully, drawing spiritual wisdom from his long experience and from the divine aspirations of his heart. Dividing it into one hundred chapters, he meticulously reveals in them the deepest mysteries of this desirable virtue, enriching them with frequent citations from Divine Scripture and the contemplations of a mind enlightened by faith. It can be said that in this work he has left for all who followed him—the ascetics and the God-bearing Fathers—an exemplary teaching on holy sobriety in conjunction with all the virtues. For you will find that very many of them turn to these chapters as the most reliable guides to the truth and quote verbatim from them in their writings on temperance. This was done after the Council held during the reign of Andronikos Palaiologos by Gregory and Simeon of Thessaloniki, Gregory of Sinai, His Holiness Callistus, and many others, thereby testifying to the irreproachability of his teaching. The Holy Church honors the memory of St. Diadochus, together with all the Saints who shone through their ascetic deeds, on Cheese Saturday. During the service on this day, in the second ode, the following is sung: “I sing of Diadochus, together with Eustathius and Juvenal, the most exalted of the Fathers.”

Blessed Diadochus on the Ultimate Limits or Summit of Perfection in the Principal Virtues

1. The limit, or summit, of perfection in faith is the dispassionate immersion of the mind in God.
2. The limit of hope is the mind’s turning toward the goods to be received.
3. The limit of patience is to stand steadfast in patience toward the invisible, as if seeing it with the eyes of the mind.
4. The limit of non-covetousness is to desire not to have, just as another desires to have.
5. The pinnacle of understanding is not to be aware of oneself in ecstasy (or total devotion) toward God.
6. The limit of humility is the resolute forgetting of one’s own good deeds.
7. The limit of non-anger is a great desire not to be angry.
8. The limit of purity is a feeling constantly attached to God.
9. The limit of love is to multiply one’s friendly disposition toward those who insult and revile one.
10. The pinnacle of perfect transformation in the sweet tasting of God is to regard the sorrow of death as a joy.

A Spiritual Treatise, Divided into One Hundred Chapters of Active Practice, Filled with Spiritual Knowledge and Reasoning

*1. On the three virtues which, like leaders, must precede the spiritual contemplation of the mind.*⁷⁸

Let faith, hope, and love—and above all love—lead the way in spiritual contemplation, brothers; for those two (faith and hope) teach only to despise visible goods, while love unites the very soul with God through virtue, comprehending the Invisible with a spiritual sense.

2. When and How a Person Becomes Good.

By nature, there is but one God who is good. But a person also becomes good through zealous diligence in cultivating good character, being transformed—from what he is not by nature—by the One who is essentially good, when the soul, through zealous diligence in pursuing the good, becomes so much a part of God as it desires with all its strength and actively seeks; for it is said: “Be good and merciful, just as your Father in heaven is” (Luke 6:36; Matt. 5:48).

3. When and How Sin Begins.

There is no evil in nature, nor is anyone evil by nature; for God has created nothing evil. But when someone, through the desires of the heart, introduces the image of evil into himself, then evil—even though it does not exist in nature—begins to exist in the form desired by the one who does so. That is why, while constantly and diligently remembering God, we must not heed the habitual promptings toward evil; for the good that exists in nature is more powerful than the evil that enters nature from without through habit—since the former exists, while the latter does not, except when it is brought about.

4. When and how do we attain the state of being in the image of God?

We are all human beings created in the image of God; but to be in the likeness of God is the privilege of only those who, out of great love, have surrendered their freedom to God. For when we are not our own masters, when we deny ourselves, then we become like Him who, through His love, has reconciled us to Himself—a state that no one can attain unless they persuade their soul not to be carried away by the allurements of a self-satisfied and self-indulgent life.

5. How to ensure that the will is always ready for good alone.

Self-mastery is the free will of the rational soul, readily striving toward whatever it desires. We will have such a will ready for good alone if we always eradicate every evil thought with good thoughts.

6. What is the light of true vision, and what enables the mind to make use of this light.

⁷⁸ These headings are not found in the Greek text. They were invented by the Latin translator. Believing that they will greatly aid in understanding and remembering the wise teachings of St. Diadochus, we borrow them from him (Patrologia Graeca, Migne, vol. 65).

The light of true knowledge is the ability to distinguish good from evil without error. And then (that is, when such discernment exists and life itself is ordered according to it), the righteous path, lifting the mind toward the sun of truth, God, leads it into that boundless intellectual enlightenment—as one who, with boldness (faith and hope), has finally attained the one love. That which is righteous must be reclaimed from the hands of those who revile and trample upon it, with non-angry zeal; for zeal for piety triumphs not through (angry) hatred, but through (loving) rebuke and persuasion.

7. On what the spiritual word produces—and on how how the movement of love makes discourse about God easy and abundant.

The spiritual word instills satisfactory conviction in the intellect; for it (the word) proceeds from God through the action of love. Why, then, does our mind move effortlessly and without burden through the waves of theological contemplation, without suffering the lamentable and distressing scarcity of enlightened thoughts? In this state, it soars freely in all-encompassing contemplations, as much as the action of love desires. It is indeed a good thing—when speaking of God—to always expect, with faith, the enlightenment of the mind brought about by love; for there is nothing more meager than the mind when, without God, it undertakes to philosophize about God.

8. When it is appropriate to begin a conversation about divine matters.

Just as one who is not enlightened in the spirit should not engage in spiritual contemplation, so too one who is richly illuminated by the grace of the Holy Spirit should not venture into discourse about such matters: for there, the scarcity of luminous thoughts cloaks the mind in the darkness of ignorance, while here their abundance prevents one from speaking, since at this time the soul, revelling in the love of God, desires to enjoy the glory of the Lord in silence; Therefore, one should engage in divine discourse (conversation about God) when a moderate level of spiritual arousal is observed; for such a measure provides the soul with a certain image of glorious words (which accurately and clearly depict invisible spiritual realities), while at the same time the longed-for spiritual illumination nourishes the speaker's faith, so that the teacher may be the first to taste the fruit of knowledge that flows from love. "The laborer is worthy to receive his share of the harvest first" (2 Tim. 2:6).

9. On the gift of knowledge and the gift of wisdom, how each enlightens, and how they are acquired.

From the one Holy Spirit come both wisdom and knowledge, as with all divine gifts; but each of these gifts, like all the others, has its own distinct effect (energy). This is why the Apostle testifies that to one is given wisdom, and to another, revelation (1 Cor. 12:8). Vision unites the soul with God in an experiential (tangible) way, but it does not inspire the soul to discuss this or other spiritual matters; this is why some who wisely lead a life of solitude, though enlightened by the sense of knowledge, do not venture into discourse on divine matters. Wisdom, however, if it is granted to someone along with the knowledge that comes from the fear of God (which is rare), reveals with love the innermost effects (energies) of vision; for vision usually enlightens through an inner effect, while wisdom does so through the word. They are attained in this way: knowledge comes through prayer and profound silence accompanied by complete carefreeness; and wisdom comes through humble study of the words of the Spirit, and above all, through the grace of the all-giving God.

10. When the soul is in struggle, one must remain silent; and when it is at peace, then one should engage in conversation, while restraining the mind with humility.

When the soul is stirred by anger against the passions, one must know that this is a time to be silent, for it is the hour of battle. But when one sees that this agitation has subsided—whether through prayer or almsgiving—then let him yield to the impulse of love to utter divine words, while nevertheless restraining the wings of the mind with the bonds of humility; for if one does not humble oneself to the utmost through self-abasement, one cannot speak worthily of God's greatness.

11. The spiritual word does not lead to pride, but the word of worldly wisdom does.

Why is this so? The spiritual word keeps the soul free from vanity; for, filling every part of it with the sensation of the richness of spiritual light, it ensures that the soul has no need for human honor. That is why it also keeps the mind free from vain thoughts at all times, immersing it entirely in the love of God. The word of worldly wisdom, however, always beckons a person toward a love of glory; for it is incapable of allowing one to experience firsthand the good that comes from it (which would satisfy the heart) and, instead, bestows upon its followers a love for human praise, being itself an invention of vain people. We ourselves will recognize this quality of God's spiritual Word without error if we spend the hours when we have no need to speak in warm remembrance of God, in carefree silence.

12. On Self-Love and Love of God— and what is characteristic of those who love themselves and those who love God.

Whoever loves himself cannot love God; but whoever does not love himself because of the overflowing abundance of God's love—he alone truly loves God. Such a person never seeks his own glory, but always seeks only the glory of God. For just as the self-loving person naturally seeks his own glory, so the God-loving person naturally seeks and loves the glory of his Creator. It is characteristic of a God-loving soul, filled with the spirit of God, to seek, in the fulfillment of all the commandments it observes, the glory of God alone, while regarding itself, to delight in humility. For glory is fitting for God, because of His greatness, and humility is fitting for man, so that through it we may become one with God: for if we too wish to do this, then, following the example of St. John the Baptist, rejoicing in the glory of the Lord, we will say unceasingly: "He must increase, but we must decrease" (John 3:30).

13. When and why does it happen that a person seems to himself not to love God, as if they wished to, even though they love Him very deeply.

I saw a certain man who was always sorrowful and weeping because he did not love God as much as he wished, even though he loved Him so much that he constantly harbored in his soul a fervent desire that God alone might be glorified in him, while he himself was as nothing. Such a person does not know who he truly is, nor does he take pleasure in the very praises spoken to him. For in his great longing for humility, he does not understand his own worth, but, serving God as the law commands priests, he, through a strong inclination toward the love of God, obscures the memory of his own worth, hiding the praise due to him in the depths of his love for God, in a spirit of humility, so that in his thoughts he may always appear to himself as a lowly servant, as if the dignity required of him were completely foreign to him, out of a strong desire for humility. Acting in this way, we too ought to flee from all honor and glory for the sake of the overflowing riches of love for the Lord, who has loved us so much.

14. Concerning the one who loves God with the feelings of his heart, and how, by completely renouncing self-love, comes to a rapturous love for God.

Whoever loves God in the depths of his heart is known by Him. For to the extent that one receives love for God in the depths of his heart, to that extent does he himself abide in God's love. Why does such a person never cease, with a certain fervent zeal, to yearn for enlightenment of the mind and strive for it with such intensity that at times he feels the complete exhaustion of the very strength of his bones, becoming, as it were, unaware of himself, but entirely transformed and absorbed by love for God? Such a person is, in this life, both present and absent; for while still journeying in his body, through the movement of the soul and by the power of love, he ceaselessly draws near to God—and is strangely received by Him. For, burning ceaselessly in his heart with the inexhaustible fire of love, he necessarily remains heartily attached to God, having completely renounced self-love through the power of this love for God. "For," he says, "if we are out of our minds, it is for God; if we are in our right minds, it is for you" (2 Cor. 5:13).

15. When someone begins to love their neighbor, and why carnal love quickly fades, but spiritual love never does.

When someone begins to feel a deep love for God, then in a spiritual sense he also begins to love his neighbor, and once he has begun, he does not cease: such is the love of which all the Holy Scriptures speak. Carnal love, not being bound by a spiritual sense, evaporates very easily as soon as even the slightest occasion arises. Spiritual love, however, is not like that: even if some sorrow should be endured, in a God-loving soul under God's influence, the bond of love is not severed: for, warmed by the heat of love for God, it immediately returns to a good disposition and receives love for one's neighbor with great joy, even if a considerable offense has been received from him or great harm has been suffered; for then the bitterness of discord is completely absorbed by the sweetness of God.

16. On love for God in the heart,

how it is acquired; also on perfect love, which is free from the purifying fear of God, and of another kind of love that is imperfect, combined with purifying fear.

No one can love God with all their heart without first kindling the fear of God in the depths of their heart; for the soul comes to active love only after it has been purified and softened by the influence of the fear of God. Yet no one can attain the fear of God—with the fruit it bears—unless they are free from all worldly cares; for only when the mind is at rest in complete stillness and freedom from worry does the fear of God begin to have a saving effect upon it, purifying it through a powerful sense of that fear from all earthly coarseness, so as to raise it to full love for the all-good God. Thus, fear is the attribute of the righteous who are still being purified, in whom a moderate measure of love is present, whereas perfect love is the attribute of those who have already been purified, in whom there is no fear, since “perfect love casts out fear” (1 John 4:18). Both of these states are found only among the righteous, who, through the work of the Holy Spirit, are progressing in virtue. This is why Scripture says in one place, “Fear God, all you who are holy to Him” (Ps. 33:10), and in another, “Love the Lord, all you who are devout to Him” (Ps. 30: 24), “ ”—making it clear to us that the fear of God is characteristic only of the righteous who are still being purified, with a moderate measure of love, as has been said, whereas perfect love is characteristic of the righteous who have been purified; and in them there is no longer any fearful thought, but there remains only a ceaseless burning and clinging of the soul to God, through the work of the Holy Spirit, as the Prophet says: “My soul clings to You; let Your right hand uphold me” (Ps. 62: 9).

17. How a sick soul begins to be healed through the power of the fear of God, and how, little by little, it is brought to perfect health through love.

Just as wounds that occur in the body, if they are not cleansed and prepared as they should be, do not respond to the medicines applied by doctors; but when they are cleansed, they respond to the medicines and thereby attain complete healing: so too the soul, as long as it remains negligent and is covered with the leprosy of sensuality, cannot feel the fear of God, even if someone were to constantly preach to it about God’s terrible and inescapable judgment; but when it begins to purify itself through the act of giving itself full attention, then it begins to feel, as if it were a life-giving remedy, the fear of God burning within it, as in some fire, through the effect of reproofs; and in this way, purifying itself little by little, it finally attains perfect purification. At the same time, as much love as is added within her, so much does fear diminish, until she attains perfect love, in which, as it is said, there is no fear, but perfect dispassion, brought about by the glory of God. May the fear of God be our unceasing praise above all praises, and ultimately love—the fulfillment of the law of perfection in Christ.

18. A soul entangled by worldly cares cannot love God or even judge its own condition correctly.

A soul that has not freed itself from worldly cares will neither love God sincerely nor abhor the devil as it ought. Concern for this earthly life weighs upon it like a heavy veil, and its mind cannot establish within itself a court of judgment regarding this matter, so as to hear within itself the unerring verdicts of the court (of conscience). This is why detachment from the world is absolutely necessary.

19. What is characteristic of a pure soul.

A pure soul is characterized by words free from envy, zeal without malice, and unceasing concern for the glory of the Lord. Then (when the soul is pure) the mind faithfully sets its scales (just as the pans of a balance are set), and remains sober in its judgment of all things, as in the purest and most incorruptible court.

20. It is necessary to combine faith with deeds, and deeds with faith.

Faith without works, and works without faith, cannot be approved. A believer, in order to prove his faith, must offer works to the Lord. And the faith of our father Abraham would not have been counted as righteousness if he had not brought forth its fruit—his son—as a sacrifice to God.

21. What is faith without works, and what is faith that acts in love?

He who loves God believes sincerely and performs the works of faith in a godly manner. But one who merely believes, without abiding in love and in that very faith which he seems to possess, does not truly have it. He believes with a certain lightness of mind, lacking within himself the effective (unifying) plumb line of glorious love. Only “faith working through love” (Gal. 5:6) is the crown of all virtues.

22. One should not curiously probe the depths of faith.

He who probes the depths of faith is tossed about by waves of thought; but he who contemplates it with a simple heart enjoys a sweet inner stillness. The depth of faith, being the water of oblivion, does not tolerate being looked into or scrutinized by curious thoughts. Let us, then, with a simple mind, float upon these waters, so that in this way we may reach the harbor of God's will.

23. When the soul cannot, through the feeling of the heart or the taste perceive the fragrance of heavenly blessings, even if it desires them intensely.

No one can sincerely love or believe unless he is his own judge. For when our conscience is troubled by its own reproaches, the mind is not permitted to perceive the fragrance of the supreme blessings, but is immediately torn by doubt: by virtue of previous experiences of faith, it yearns for them with a warm impulse, yet it can no longer lovingly perceive them in the feelings of the heart, due, as I have said, to the frequent pangs of a convicting conscience. However, if we purify ourselves through the warmest prayer and attentiveness, we will once again attain this longed-for blessing, with an even greater, God-given appreciation of it.

24. On the twofold sense—the bodily and the spiritual—and how one ought to to arouse the spiritual sense to the enjoyment of heavenly things.

Just as our bodily senses involuntarily draw us toward the goods visible to us, so too does our intellectual—or spiritual—sense usually guide us toward the invisible goods when it tastes divine goodness. Everything desires what is akin to itself: the soul, being incorporeal, desires heavenly blessings, while the body, being of the earth, desires earthly delights. Thus, we will unerringly attain the ability to experience the immaterial if we refine our callous body through labor.

25. The soul's sensibility was unified in its functioning in the state of innocence; through the Fall it was divided, and the grace of the Holy Spirit restores it to the simplicity of unity.

That the natural faculty is one is taught to us by the very action of holy knowledge (the mind enlightened by grace). Through Adam's transgression, it was divided into two modes; but through the Holy Spirit, it is made one and simple again. However, no one can perceive this within themselves except those who, in anticipation of future blessings, willingly renounce the blessings of this life and, through self-restraint, dry up every desire of the bodily senses. For only in such people does the mind, because of its complete freedom from worry, perform its functions soundly and vigorously, able to taste the divine goodness in an ineffable way through the senses, and at the same time, as it progresses, to communicate its joys to the body, expressing its rejoicing through confession with a kind of boundless word of love, saying: "My heart trusts in Him, and He will help me; my body will flourish, and I will confess my devotion to Him" (Ps. 27:7). Such joy, which occurs in this instance in both soul and body, is a humble reminder of eternal, imperishable life.

26. One must keep the mind unperturbed, in order to discern correctly whether thoughts come from God or from the devil.

Those who strive for spiritual growth must always keep their thoughts under control, so that the mind may accurately discern the thoughts that arise, and, having discerned them, store the good and God-sent ones in the treasury of memory, while casting out the unwholesome and demonic ones from the recesses of the soul. And the sea, when it is calm, is visible to fishermen down to its very depths, so that almost none of the living creatures moving there are hidden from them; but when it is stirred up by the winds, it conceals in its impenetrable murkiness what it had generously revealed during the pleasant stillness; at which time the art of those who devise fishing tricks is rendered useless. The same thing happens to the contemplative mind, especially when the depths of the soul are stirred by unjust anger.

27. Why are there so few who fully understand their own failings, and what is needed to achieve this.

There are very few who are fully aware of all their failings, and whose minds never stray from remembering God. Just as our physical eyes, when healthy, can see everything clearly—even the tiniest gnats and flies flitting through the air—but when they are dusty or covered with moisture, they see only what is large and constantly before them, albeit dimly, while they are completely unable to perceive what is small through their sense of sight: so too the soul, when through self-reflection it dispels the darkness that befalls it from worldliness, then regards even its small failings as very great, adding tear to tear with great gratitude, lamenting over them—as it is said: "The righteous will confess Your name" (Ps. 139: 14); but when it is possessed by a worldly disposition, then even if it commits murder or some other punishable act, it feels little remorse; as for other failings, it cannot even perceive them, and often even regards them as virtues, and is not ashamed to defend them fervently, poor thing.

28. How the Holy Spirit purifies the soul, and what we must do to achieve this.

It is the work of the Holy Spirit alone to purify the mind. For if the Stronger One does not come to seize and bind that predator (Luke 11:22), then what has been stolen by him cannot be recovered in any way. It is fitting, therefore, to soothe the Holy Spirit within us through every virtue, and above all through inner peace, so that we may have within us the lamp of reason always shining; for when He shines unceasingly in the innermost recesses of the soul, then not only are even the smallest, dark suggestions of the demons made evident in the mind, but they also become powerless and unstable, being exposed by that Holy and glorious Light. This is why the Apostle says, “Do not quench the Spirit” (1 Thess. 5:19)—that is, do not “offend” (Eph. 4:30) the grace of the Holy Spirit with evil deeds or thoughts, lest we be deprived of that all-conquering lamp. For the Spirit, who is eternal and life-giving, does not thereby cease to exist, but His grievedness—or rather, His withdrawal—leaves our mind hardened and alienated from the light of knowledge.

29. On the unity of the soul’s sensibility before sin and its division due to sin—and on the fact when an irrational desire is united and becomes in harmony with the rational.

There is, as I have said, a single natural faculty in the soul [for the five well-known bodily senses are a separate matter; they serve the needs of the body, as the all-holy and philanthropic Spirit of God teaches us]; but it is now divided into two in the manifestations of the soul’s movements, due to the inclination toward evil, which has attached itself to the mind through disobedience. At times, it is drawn to the passionate part of the soul—from which we sweetly partake in the pleasures of this life; at other times, it delights in its rational, intellectual movements—since our mind, when we live in chastity, eagerly strives to partake of heavenly beauties. If, therefore, we become accustomed to despising the goods of this world, we will finally be able to bring the soul’s earthly desires into harmony with its rational disposition, by virtue of the communion of the Holy Spirit, who dwells within us. For unless His Divinity effectively illuminates the innermost recesses of our hearts, we will be unable to taste heavenly blessings with an undivided sense—that is, with the whole disposition of the soul.

30. When and how the mind’s discernment distinguishes true consolations from false ones.

The faculty of the mind is its discernment, which accurately distinguishes spiritual matters. Just as our bodily sense of taste, when in a healthy state, infallibly distinguishes the good from the bad—desiring what is pleasant (and turning away from what is unpleasant)—so too our mind, when it begins to function in a good frame of mind and with complete detachment from the transitory, can richly experience divine consolation and not be led astray in the least by anything contrary to it. For just as the body, by tasting earthly delights, acquires infallible experience in this sense, so too the mind, when it rises above carnal reasoning, can taste and discern the consolation of the Holy Spirit without error, as it is said: “Taste and see that the Lord is good” (Ps. 33: 9), and, having an unforgettable memory of this experience through the work of love, to discern what is best without error, according to the words of the Holy Apostle: “And this I pray, that your love may abound more and more in knowledge and every kind of discernment, so that you may test what is best” (Phil. 1: 9).

31. On Satan’s false consolation, which he instills during the repose of sleep, and how the mind dispels it by warmly invoking the name of Jesus and puts Satan himself to flight.

When the mind begins to feel the gracious comfort of the Holy Spirit, then Satan also instills his own comfort into the soul through a seemingly sweet sensation, during the tranquility of the night, at the moment of the most subtle kind of sleep (or falling asleep). If at that time the mind holds the holy name of the Lord Jesus in the warmest remembrance, and uses this most holy and glorious name as a sure weapon against delusion, then that cunning deceiver immediately withdraws, but in return finally launches an attack against the soul with his own face (and not with thoughts). Thus, by accurately discerning the deceptive wiles of the evil one, the mind succeeds more and more in distinguishing spiritual matters.

32. On the soul’s good consolation, whether in a state of wakefulness or during the repose of sleep, and how Satan attempts to deceive the soul with false comfort during sleep.

True consolation occurs either while the body is awake or as it sinks into sleep, when one, in warm remembrance of God, is, as it were, drawn close by love for Him; whereas deceptive, alluring consolation, as I have said, always occurs at the moment when the ascetic enters a subtle kind of drowsiness or absentmindfulness, accompanied by a lukewarm remembrance of God. That which comes from God clearly draws the souls of the pious ascetics into God's love through a powerful outpouring of spiritual feelings; but this usually envelops the soul in a certain wind of deceptive charm and, during bodily sleep, attempts to steal the sensation by the taste of something pleasant, even though the mind remains, to a certain extent, sober with regard to the remembrance of God. – Therefore, if, as I have said, the mind remains sober at such a time, remembering the Lord Jesus, it immediately dispels this deceptive breath of the enemy that appears pleasant, and joyfully steps forward to fight against him, having a weapon ready against him, by grace, through its most praiseworthy spiritual experience.

33. How joy in the Holy Spirit is distinguished from the devil's false joy, and when the devil sets out to deceive with false comfort.

If the soul, with an unwavering and undreamy movement, is set ablaze with the love of God, drawing even the body itself into the depths of this ineffable love—whether in wakefulness or, as I said, during the ascetic's sleep induced by holy grace, while the soul thinks of absolutely nothing else but that one thing to which it is stirred—then one must know that this is the work of the Holy Spirit. Being entirely filled with pleasant sensations from that ineffable divine sweetness, she cannot at that moment think of anything else, but only feels herself filled with an inexhaustible joy. But if, in such a state of excitement, the mind perceives a certain doubtful wavering or some impure thought, and if in this situation she invokes the Holy Name of the Lord to ward off evil—and not, moreover, out of love for God alone—then one must know that this consolation comes from the deceiver and is merely a phantom of joy. Such joy is imposed from without and does not manifest as a quality or a constant disposition of the soul; evidently, here the enemy seeks to seduce the soul. Seeing that the mind is beginning to demonstrate true discernment of its feelings, he approaches to comfort the soul with his own so-called consolations, which seem good, hoping that, being distracted by this delusional, insipid sweetness, the soul will fail to recognize its entanglement with the deceiver. By these signs we can discern “the Spirit of truth and the spirit of deception” (1 John 4:6).—However, it is impossible for anyone to taste divine goodness with the senses or to tangibly experience demonic sorrow unless one is convinced within oneself that grace has made its dwelling in the depths of one's mind, while evil spirits have no place to nest anywhere near the heart's faculties. The demons, however, do not want people to ascertain this in any way, lest the mind, knowing this for certain, arm itself against them with the constant remembrance of God.

34. On the Two Kinds of Love—Natural and Spiritual (Grace-Filled) and the Distinctions Between Them.

There is a natural love in the soul, and there is love poured into it by the Holy Spirit. The former, if we so desire, comes into motion in proportion to our will; which is why it is easily plundered by evil spirits as soon as we cease to maintain our will with sustained effort. But this love so inflames the soul with love for God that all parts of the soul cling to the ineffable sweetness of divine love in a certain boundless simplicity of disposition; for then the mind, as if filled to the brim by the spiritual (grace-filled) action (energy), pours forth a certain abundant stream of love and joy.

35. On the grace of God, how it alone calms the agitated movements of the soul.

Just as a stormy sea, when anointing oil is poured upon it, usually calms down because the richness of the oil overcomes the force of the storm's surging waves, so too our soul, anointed by the grace of the Holy Spirit, is filled with a sweet stillness; for, as the Prophet says: “But my soul, be still before God” (Ps. 61:6)—then, to its delight, every agitation within it is quelled, yielding to the grace of the Spirit that overshadows it and to the serenity it engenders. Therefore, no matter what disturbances the demons may attempt to cause in the soul at that time, it remains at peace within itself and full of joy. But no one can attain such a state, nor remain in it, unless he ceaselessly sobers and sweetens his soul with the fear of God; for the fear of the Lord bestows upon those who strive a certain kind of purity and holiness. “The fear of the Lord is pure,” says the Prophet, “enduring forever” (Ps. 18:10).

36. How and when the soul can perceive the glory of God;
and on the deceitfulness of the devil, who sometimes shows light, or something resembling light.

Let no one, upon hearing of the mind's perception, imagine that the glory of God appears to him through the senses. We say that when the soul is pure, it perceives divine consolation through a certain ineffable tasting, but not in such a way that anything from the invisible realm appears to it through the senses; “for now we walk by faith, not by sight,” as the blessed Paul says (2 Cor. 5:7). Therefore, if any of those who are striving in the spiritual life should see a light, or a vision resembling fire, or hear a voice, let him not under any circumstances take such a manifestation as true. For this is clearly a deception of the enemy—and many to whom this has happened have, through ignorance, strayed from the true path. We, however, know that as long as we live as strangers in this mortal body, we are separated from God (2 Cor. 5:6)—that is, we are unable to see Him or His wondrous heavenly things with our eyes.

37. On dreams sent by God and those inspired by the devil, and on the difference between them.

Dreams that appear to the soul through God's love are infallible indicators of spiritual health. They do not shift from one image to another; they do not instill fear, nor do they provoke laughter or sudden sorrow, but approach the soul with complete gentleness and fill it with spiritual joy; therefore, even after the body awakens, the soul eagerly seeks this joy it experienced in the dream. With demonic visions, everything is the opposite of this—they do not remain in the same form, nor do they reveal their appearance for long to those who are not confused; for they cannot be satisfied for long with that which is not of their own volition, but which they borrow solely from their own deceitfulness. At the same time, they speak at length and promise great things, while terrifying us even more with threats, often taking on the appearance of warriors; sometimes they sing flattery to the soul with a loud cry. When the mind is clear, it quickly recognizes them, and—sometimes it rouses the body through mental effort, and sometimes it prefers to remain in the same state, rejoicing that it was able to recognize their deceit and expose them even within the dream, thereby provoking their great anger against itself. – It happens, however, that even good dreams do not bring joy to the soul, but rather a certain sweet sorrow and a painless tear. This happens to those who have already attained great humility.

38. On the Virtue of Not Believing in Any Dreams.

We have explained how to distinguish between good and bad dreams, based on what we ourselves have heard from experienced elders. Let us, however, hold fast all the more to the rule—as a great virtue—that we must by no means believe any dream. For dreams are, for the most part, nothing other than idols of the mind, the play of the imagination, or, as I have already said, the devil's mockery and amusement at our expense. If, adhering to this rule, we sometimes fail to accept a dream sent to us by God, the loving Lord Jesus will not be angry with us for this, knowing that we dare to do so out of fear of demonic wiles. For although the aforementioned method of discerning dreams is sound, it does happen, however, that the soul—insensitive due to some enemy-induced rapture and having been involuntarily defiled—which, I believe, no one is free from—loses the path of sound discernment and believes evil dreams to be good.

39. An example proving that God does not hold anyone accountable for disbelieving the dreams He sends.

Let the following incident serve as proof of what has been said: a master, returning home after a long absence, stands at the gate at night and calls to his servant to open it; the servant, not recognizing for certain whether it was his master, resolutely refused to let him in, fearing that, deceived by the similarity of the voice, he might let in a villain and become a traitor to the property entrusted to him by his master; and when day broke, the master not only did not become angry with him for this, but on the contrary, he showered him with great praise, recognizing that the servant had mistook his own voice for a deception, not wishing to lose any part of his property.

40. On the soul's perception of the spiritual light within itself, on the lights of the enemy, and on how to live in the world while remaining alien to it.

There is no doubt that when the divine light begins to act tangibly within our mind, it becomes entirely luminous, so that it itself perceives abundantly this light that dwells within it. This is always the case as soon as the soul strongly reigns over the passions. But it happens that something similar appears illusory in the mind, arising from the enemy's malice—sometimes as light, sometimes as fire—as the divine Paul teaches, saying that even "Satan" sometimes "disguises himself as an angel of light" (2 Cor. 11:14). Therefore, one should not embark on the ascetic life with such a hope (that is, the hope of seeing light within oneself), lest Satan find a soul already prepared to be led astray by delusion and actually lead it astray. But one thing must be kept in mind in this regard: to attain love for God with all one's senses and with full conviction of the heart—which is to love God with all one's soul, with all one's heart, and with all one's mind (Luke 10:27). Whoever is moved by God's grace in this way, while living in the world, remains a stranger to the world.

41. On obedience—that it is the greatest of virtues, is the gateway to love and the forerunner of all virtues.

Obedience is, as is well known, the first among the introductory (beginner's) virtues; for it cuts off pride and engenders humility within us. That is why it serves as the gateway to love for Christ—God—for those who embrace it with a sincere heart. Having cast it aside, Adam fell into the depths of hell. But the Lord, having loved him, for the sake of the plan of our salvation, was obedient to His Father even unto the cross and death (Phil. 2:8), —and this even though He was in no way inferior to His majesty—so that, by His obedience, He might atone for the guilt of human disobedience and lead those who live in obedience to a blessed and eternal life. Therefore, those who take up the struggle against the devil's pride must, first and foremost, strive for this virtue—and it, leading the way, will then unerringly show them all the paths of virtue.

42. On the fact that self-restraint must be maintained in all things, so that not only the bodily virtues may be attained, but also those that purify the inner person.

Self-restraint is an essential part of all virtues; that is why "the one who trains" must "restrain himself" from everything (1 Cor. 9:25). Just as when even the smallest part of the human body is removed, the entire appearance of the person becomes disfigured, no matter how small the part that is missing—so too, when someone neglects even a single virtue, they disrupt the entire splendor of self-control, even if they do not realize it. That is why we must not only practice the virtues that are difficult for the body, but also those that have the power to purify our inner being. For what good is it to keep the body chaste when the soul commits adultery with the demon of disobedience? Or how will one be crowned who guards himself against gluttony and every other bodily lust, yet neglects vanity and vainglory, unable to endure even the slightest insult; when he knows that the light of righteousness will balance the scales (of retribution) with the righteous deeds only of those who performed them in a spirit of humility?

43. On the Benefits and Practice of Food Abstinence.

Those who strive in the spiritual life must hate all unspoken lusts so much that this hatred becomes a habit for them. As for abstinence in food, it must be observed in such a way that no one ever goes so far as to regard any food as abominable. This is a demonic act and is akin to swearing an oath. For we do not abstain from certain foods because they are evil by nature—far be it from us! —but so that, by abstaining from them, we may proportionately subdue the fiery passions of the flesh; and also so that the food remaining from our consumption may be used to meet the immediate needs of the poor—which is a sign of sincere love.

44. How to make it easy to give up the sweetness of food and other pleasures.

To eat and drink from all that is offered, giving thanks to God, is in no way contrary to the law of the vision; for everything in God's creations is "very good" (Gen. 1:31). But to voluntarily abstain from overeating and eating sweets is very prudent and wise. — Yet we cannot so willingly renounce the delights set before us unless, through actual practice and experience, we taste the divine sweetness with all our senses.

45. On the elimination of excessive self-restraint, so that the body may remain strong for spiritual feats.

Just as when burdened by an abundance of food, our body makes the mind somewhat careless and sluggish, so too, when exhausted by excessive abstinence, it makes the contemplative part of the soul despondent and unwilling to reason. It is fitting, therefore, to adjust one's physical diet in proportion to the body's strength and condition: when it is healthy, to restrain it as much as necessary, and when it is weak, to relax the restrictions somewhat. One who is striving for spiritual excellence should not let the body grow lax, but should remain as strong as is required for the task, so that the soul, too, may be properly purified through bodily labor.

46. On Easing the Usual Strictness of Abstinence on the occasion of the arrival of brothers or other travelers.

When, upon the arrival of any brothers or any traveler, vanity, taking advantage of this occasion, stirs up and, inflating us with its poison, begins to incite us not to violate our rule regarding food; then it is especially necessary to relax the usual measure of food intake somewhat. For in this way we will drive the devil away from us, as he laments the failure of his temptation; we will prudently fulfill the law of love; and we will preserve the mystery of our abstinence, keeping it hidden through this relaxation.

47. On fasting and other bodily virtues— that they alone, without a good disposition of the heart, have no value before God.

Fasting, though it is a tool that prepares those who desire chastity, has value—but not before God. Therefore, those who strive for piety should not boast about it, but should hope to achieve their goal through faith in God alone. And masters of any art, in the perfection of their skill, do not prove themselves by the quality of their tools, but by patiently completing a work, and that work itself serves as an indicator of how skilled they are in their craft.

48. On the benefit of moderation in drinking for spiritual fruitfulness in the soul.

Just as soil that is watered in moderation yields a bountiful harvest of the pure seed sown in it, while soil drenched by excessive rains yields only thorns and thistles: so too the soil of the heart, when we drink wine in moderation, reveals its natural seeds to be pure, and those sown in it by the Holy Spirit bear good fruit and are fruitful; but when we overwater it with excessive drinking, it yields only thorns and thistles in all its thoughts.

49. On intemperance in drinking, and how it gives rise to shameful lusts.

When our mind floats on the waves of drunkenness, it not only gazes passionately at the images presented to it by demons in dreams, but also, conjuring up certain beautiful faces within itself, delights in these fantasies as if they were living beings. For when the lustful parts of the body are warmed by the heat of wine, a certain urge presses upon the mind to conjure up such shadows of passion within itself with sensual delight. That is why we must, by observing moderation, avoid the harm that comes from excess. Then the mind, lacking the sweetness that drives it to depict sin, remains entirely free from daydreams and, even better, free from sensual delight.

50. On Avoiding the Consumption of Beverages That Stimulate the Appetite, and those artificially prepared.

Those who wish to subdue the rising desires of the body should not touch artificially prepared beverages, which the schemers behind such inventions call “appetizers” because they usually pave the way for a multitude of foods to enter the stomach. For not only is their nature harmful to bodies engaged in ascetic struggle, but the very senseless mixing of the substances that make up these beverages greatly offends a God-fearing conscience. For what is lacking in the nature of wine that there should be a need to temper its strength by adding various sweeteners?

51. What did the Lord wish to teach by accepting vinegar on the Cross from a sponge attached to a reed?

Our Lord and Teacher of this holy (ascetic) life, Jesus Christ, was given vinegar to drink during His suffering by those who served the devil’s commands, in order to leave us, as it seems to me, a clear example of the attitude with which we must undertake our holy struggles. By this He seems to say: those who struggle against sin should not partake of sweet foods or drinks; rather, they must patiently endure the bitterness of the struggle. One might also compare the hyssop to the sponge, so that through both a more perfect image of our purification may be presented. The former, being a hard object, represents the nature of spiritual struggles, while the latter, being used in ablutions, reminds us of the complete perfection of purification.

52. The spiritual should not go to the bathhouse; and here is why.

No one would consider going to the bathhouse sinful or unwise; but to abstain from it for the sake of self-restraint, I call a courageous and most chaste act. For in such a case, neither is our body indulged by that pleasurable washing, nor is the memory of Adam’s disgraceful nakedness stirred up in the soul, so that, like him, we might seek leaves to cover the second shame of nakedness. This is especially necessary for us, who, having recently freed ourselves from the pernicious corruption of this life, must strive in every way to remain in inseparable union with the beauty of chastity through the spotless purity of our bodies.

53. Why should a doctor be summoned in monasteries to treat an illness; and what those living in seclusion in the desert should do in such cases.

Nothing prevents one from calling a doctor during times of illness. God foresaw that there would be a need for the art of healing and willed that it should eventually be developed on the basis of human experience; for this purpose, He had already provided for the existence of medicines among His creations. However, one should not place one’s hope for healing in them, but in our true Physician and Savior, Jesus Christ. I say this, however, to those who lead an ascetic life in monasteries or in cities, for the reason that, judging by the course of events that befall them, they cannot always maintain an unceasing exercise of faith, being surrounded by love, —or even so that they may not fall into pride and the devil’s temptation, because of which some of them publicly declare before many that they have no need of doctors. But if anyone leads a hermit’s life in deserted places with two or three like-minded brothers, then no matter what ailments he may suffer, let him entrust himself to the One Lord, the healer of all our sicknesses and infirmities. Through the Lord, even in the desert itself, he finds sufficient comfort in his illnesses. Moreover, just as his act of faith can never run dry, so too does he have no opportunity to flaunt his virtue of patience, being shielded by the gentle veil of the desert. For this reason, the Lord brings those of one mind into His house (Ps. 67:7).

54. What Constitutes Cowardice in Illness, and What Constitutes Good Temper.

When we are greatly distressed by the ailments that befall us, we must realize that the naked soul is still enslaved to the love of the body. For just as it craves material pleasures, it does not wish to renounce the goods of this life; thus, it considers it a great burden not to be able, because of illness, to enjoy the things that are pleasant to the flesh. – If, however, it bears the sorrows of illness with gratitude, this is a sign that it is not far from the limits of dispassion. Why, then, does it await death itself with joy, as the means of entering into true life?

55. What is required so that the soul does not take delight in the blessings of this world, but rather to desire to be released from the body?

The soul will not desire to be freed from the body unless it becomes completely indifferent to this world (i.e., to all that is earthly and worldly). – All bodily senses resist faith, for the senses seek to enjoy only the present—that which is here and now—while faith promises the abundance of future blessings. Why should the ascetic never think of leafy, shady trees, nor of flowing springs, nor of flower-filled meadows, nor of magnificent houses, nor of pleasant conversations with loved ones—just as he should not recall rich offerings, even if he happened to have been honored with them. But he ought to make grateful use of what is necessary, and to regard this life as a kind of pilgrimage, alien to all carnal comfort. For only by restraining our thoughts in this way can we direct them entirely toward the path leading to eternal life.

56. Just as the unrestrained enjoyment of the bodily senses hinders remembrance of God and His commandments, and how to avoid this evil.

Eve was the first to warn us that sight, taste, and the other senses dispel the memory of the heart when we indulge in them without restraint. For as long as she had not gazed with lust upon the forbidden tree, she had carefully remembered God's commandment; and because of this, as if sheltered by the wings of God's love, she was unaware even of her own nakedness. But when she gazed at that tree with lust, touched it with great desire, and finally tasted its fruit with uncontrollable longing, she immediately developed an inclination toward carnal self-indulgence, and, having united with this passion as if naked, she devoted all her desire to the pursuit of earthly pleasures, thereby contributing—through the visible allure of the fruit—to her own fall and that of Adam; as a result of which it became difficult for the human mind to remember God or His commandments. We, however, always keeping God constantly in mind as we look into the depths of our hearts, will guide this heart—which is prone to the allurements of life, as if blind—for true spiritual wisdom consists in restraining the carnal impulse within us to see “what is beautiful to behold.” This is what the most experienced Job teaches us, saying, “Even if my heart follows the path of my eyes” (Job 31:7). Such conduct is a sure sign of extreme self-restraint.

57. How is it that one who walks in the Spirit knows no carnal desires, and the devil tempts his purity in vain?

Always dwelling in his own heart, he is far from all the alluring things of this life; and walking in the Spirit, he cannot know carnal desires. Since such a person thus pursues his journey protected by virtues, having these very virtues as gatekeepers of his city of purity, all the demons' schemes against him remain unsuccessful, even though at times the arrows of this lust common to all reach even the windows of nature.

58. On despondency, which sometimes assails one after the expulsion of carnal desires—what it is and how to dispel it.

When the soul ceases to desire the beautiful things of this world, a certain spirit of despondency usually creeps into it, which neither allows it to willingly labor in the service of the Word nor leaves within it a firm desire for future blessings, but also presents this present life as utterly worthless, as lacking worthy deeds of virtue, and belittles the very knowledge of , treating it as something granted to many others or as revealing nothing special to us. We will avoid this lukewarm and enfeebling passion if we confine our thoughts within extremely narrow bounds, keeping in mind only the remembrance of God; for only in this way can the spirit, having risen to its proper fervor, drive away from itself that senseless enfeeblement.

59. How great is the help in spiritual struggle from the ceaseless warm remembrance of the name of Jesus in the depths of the heart.

When we close off all escape routes for our mind with the remembrance of God, it needs to be given some task, binding upon it, to satisfy its constant restlessness. It must be given only the holy Name of the Lord Jesus, through which alone it fully satisfies its zeal in achieving the set goal. But it must be understood that, as the Apostle says, “no one can say ‘Lord Jesus’ except by the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:3). On our part, it is required that the aforementioned phrase (“Lord Jesus Christ,” etc.) be constantly uttered in the depths of one’s mind, which is absorbed in contemplation, in such a way that one does not stray into any extraneous daydreams. Those who constantly hold this holy and glorious Name in their minds in the depths of their hearts can see the light of their own mind (clarity of thought, or a definite awareness of all inner movements). Furthermore, this wondrous Name, when held in thought with intense care, very tangibly burns away every defilement that arises in the soul. “For our God is a consuming fire,” as the Apostle says (Heb. 12:29). From this, finally, the Lord leads the soul into a great love for His glory; for that glorious and much-desired Name, by drawing the mind toward it through remembrance in a warm heart, instills in us the habit of loving His goodness unhindered; because there is then nothing left to stand in the way of it. And this is that precious pearl which is acquired by those who have given up all their possessions with unspeakable joy at having found Him.

60. On the two kinds of joy—the initial and the perfect—and of the tears that lie between them.

There is a joy that is the beginning, and another that is the end: the former is not free from self-centered dreams, while the latter is strengthened by humility; between them lies godly sorrow and painless weeping. “For in the abundance of wisdom there is an abundance of understanding, and a discerning mind will find sorrow” (Ecclesiastes 1:18). For this reason, one must first call the soul to deeds of virtue through the joy that comes at the beginning; then subject it to the rebuke and testing of the truth of the Holy Spirit, both regarding sins committed in the past and regarding the inclinations still being formed in self-forgetfulness. “For in their conviction of iniquity, You have punished man, and You have made his soul wither like a spider’s web” (Ps. 38:12). So that after God’s conviction has tested her, as in a crucible, she may receive the effect of unpretentious joy in the warm remembrance of God.

61. On forgetting God and restoring remembrance of Him, the causes of the former, and the means to the latter, and on its highest manifestation.

When the soul is agitated by anger, or weighed down by gluttony, or clouded by deep sorrow, then the mind cannot maintain remembrance of God, even if it were somehow compelled to do so. For, being entirely clouded by the ferocity of these passions, it is then completely alien to its own sensibility; therefore, desire has nowhere to imprint its mark, so that through it the mind might bear an unforgettable and unchanging image of the thought of God, since then its memory becomes coarse due to the harshness of the passions. — But when the mind is free from such disturbances, then, even if forgetfulness should occasionally steal away the thought of the beloved Lord for a moment, the mind, having regained its energy and liveliness, immediately seizes upon that longed-for and saving prey with fervor; for then grace itself meditates with the soul and calls out: “Lord Jesus Christ!” just as a mother, teaching her child, repeatedly repeats the Name “Father” together with him until she brings him to the point where, instead of any other word the child is capable of, he clearly pronounces “Father,” even in his sleep. Therefore, the Apostle says, “The Spirit Himself intercedes for us in our weakness; for we do not know how to pray as we ought, but the Spirit Himself intercedes for us with groanings too deep for words” (Rom. 8:26). For since we are still infants in the perfection of this virtue of prayer, we certainly need His help, so that when His ineffable sweetness embraces and sweetens all our thoughts, we may be moved by our whole disposition to remember God and our Father and to love Him. For, as the same wonderful Paul says, “we cry out to Him, ‘Abba, Father’” (Rom. 8:15), when He disposes us to call upon God the Father.

62. On anger—when and how it may be permitted.

Anger, more than any other passion, usually disturbs the soul and throws it into confusion; but there are times when it is extremely beneficial to it. Thus, when we are unashamedly angry at the ungodly, or at those who are shameless in some other way, so that they may be saved or at least feel ashamed, we thereby bring to our soul the same benefit as meekness; for in such a case we are in every way contributing to the purposes of God’s righteousness and goodness. Likewise, when lustful desires arise in the soul, by becoming even more angry at this sin, we often sober the soul and give it the manly strength to resist it. And there is no doubt that, even when we are in a state of extreme distress of spirit, by angrily rebuking the very spirit that is causing the distress, we can rise through wisdom even above the horrors with which death boasts of subduing us: for the Lord, wishing to show us this at the resurrection of Lazarus, first rebuked hell in spirit and strengthened Himself, and only then, with an unshaken will—as He always did in all His deeds—restored Lazarus’s soul to his body. So, it seems to me, chaste anger was given to our nature by God, who created us, more as an instrument of righteousness; and if Eve had used it against the serpent, she would not have fallen prey to the destructive influence of that passionate desire. That is why I believe that one who uses chaste anger out of zeal for piety will be found more favorable on the scales of righteous retribution than one who, due to the immobility of his mind, never stirs himself to anger; for in the latter, the ruler of human thoughts and feelings remains untrained, while the other, mounted on the steeds of virtue, remains ever in the struggle and races amid the hordes of demons, ceaselessly training the four-horse chariot of self-restraint in the fear of God—which Holy Scripture has called “the chariot of Israel,” as we find in the account of the divine Elijah’s ascension to heaven (2 Kings 2:12). God taught the early Jews the four virtues in many different ways; which is why such a disciple of wisdom (courage, justice, and self-control) was taken up into heaven, having, as it seems to me, these very virtues as his steeds, when his spirit was taken up in a whirlwind of fire.

63. It is not fitting for one who is perfect in the spiritual life to engage in legal disputes.

One who has been granted holy knowledge and has tasted the sweetness of God must never bring a lawsuit (when someone files a complaint against him), nor initiate a lawsuit against anyone himself, even if someone were to strip him of the very clothes he is wearing; for the justice of the authorities of this age is inferior to God’s justice—or rather, it is nothing compared to God’s justice; and what difference is there between the children of God and the people of this age, if not that the righteousness of the latter cannot be compared to the righteousness of the former; which is why the former is called human righteousness and the latter, the righteousness of God. So too, our Lord “when he was reviled, he did not revile in return; when he suffered, he did not threaten” (1 Peter 2:23); on the contrary, not only did he endure the stripping of his garments in silence, but—what is incomparably greater—he prayed to the Father for the salvation of those who had acted wickedly against him. The people of this world, however, will not cease to litigate until they have received, with interest, what they seek from those against whom they litigate, especially when they seek profit on a loan: so that their “justice” often becomes the beginning of great injustice.

64. It is better to entrust tolerable injustice to God’s judgment to pay attention to prayer and the guarding of one’s heart than to go to court.

I have heard some pious people say that no one should be allowed to plunder what we have for our own sustenance and for the relief of the poor; lest, by condoning such evil, we become guilty of the sin of those who wrong us, and especially when we endure this from Christians, —But to act in this way is nothing other than desiring to save our possessions more than ourselves. For if, neglecting prayer and the examination of my own heart, I begin to seek judgment against those who have wronged me and to languish in the courtrooms, it is clear that what I seek is far more precious to me than my own salvation, not to mention the most salvific commandment itself. And how can I be a follower of the Gospel commandment that instructs me: “Do not resist the one who takes what is yours” (Luke 6:30), unless, according to the words of the Apostle, I “rejoice in the plundering of my possessions” (Hebrews 10:34)—when this commandment does not even exempt from the sin of greed the one who, through a court ruling, recovers what was wrongfully taken from him? Transient (temporary, or courts established by mortals to judge transient matters) cannot abrogate God’s imperishable Judgment; and the guilty party must comply with the laws to which his case is subject and by which he must defend himself. It is indeed a good thing to endure violence at the hands of those who wish to wrong us, and to pray for them, so that for the sake of their repentance—and not for the sake of their returning to us what they have stolen from us—their sin of extortion may be forgiven. For God’s righteousness requires that we accept the thief himself—and not the goods he has stolen—as free from sin through repentance.

65. Sell everything and give it to the poor; humility, above all else, inclines one to do this.

It is very fitting and, above all, beneficial to the soul that, having come to know the true path of piety, one should immediately sell all one’s possessions and distribute the proceeds to the poor, in accordance with the Lord’s commandment, and not allow oneself, under the pretext of always wishing to be able to fulfill the commandment (to help the poor), to disregard this saving command (to give everything away at once). From this we will gain, first of all, a more peaceful carefree state of mind, and from this, in turn, a poverty immune to slander—a poverty that is itself heavenly wisdom—and which gives others no cause for unjust accusations against us, since we will have nothing left that could fan the flames of greed in the hearts of the greedy. Then, more than any other virtue, humility will warm us and calm us in our innermost being, as if we were naked; just as a mother, taking her child in her arms, comforts and warms it in her embrace when, in its infantile simplicity, the child casts off its garment and throws it far from itself, finding, in its great innocence, nakedness more pleasant than the variegated beauty of its garment. For it is said: “The Lord preserves the little ones; He has humbled me and saved me” (Ps. 114: 5).

66. Giving everything away is the path to humility.

The Lord will hold us accountable for our acts of charity, “according to what one has, not according to what one lacks” (1 Cor. 8:12). Therefore, if I, in the fear of God and with fervent goodwill, obeying the Lord’s command, were to give away in a short time everything I would have distributed over many years, for what will I be rebuked when I no longer have anything? – But someone will say: (if we give everything away), where then will the poor—who are now sustained by our modest alms—receive their alms? – To such a person, here is a fitting lesson: do not presume to devise something reprehensible in God’s eyes to cover up your self-love. God will never run out of ways to provide for His creation, just as He has done from the beginning. And before this or that person was moved to give alms, were the poor left without food or clothing? Be assured, then, that it is far better, as soon as you come to know the truth, to spend everything generously in service to the poor, rejecting the foolish scheming and pride inspired by a love of wealth, and hating your own desires—which means hating your own soul— so that later, having no further reason to rejoice in self-praise for the constant distribution of our wealth, we may humble ourselves as though we were doing nothing good. For as long as we abound in wealth, we take great delight in distributing it whenever the mood strikes us, as if joyfully fulfilling a divine command; but when we have given it all away, we are filled with feelings of humility and contrition, as if we had done nothing righteous. Consequently, the soul, in great humility, turns inward, so that what we can no longer attain through daily acts of charity, we may receive through diligent prayer, patience, and humble wisdom; for it is said: “The poor and needy will praise Your name, O Lord” (Ps. 73:21). Moreover, the gift of theological discourse is not granted by God to anyone except those who have first prepared themselves to renounce all their possessions for the sake of the glory of God’s Gospel, so that in God-pleasing poverty they may proclaim the riches of the Kingdom of God. This is what is implied by the words: “You have prepared Your goodness for the poor, O God,” and by the addition: “The Lord will give the preacher a message with great power” (Ps. 77:11, 12).

67. On the gift of theology—how many and what kinds of blessings flow from it.

All the gifts of our God are very good and a source of every blessing; but none of them kindles and stirs the heart to love His goodness as much as the study of theology. For, being the foremost fruit of God’s goodness, it bestows the foremost gifts upon the soul: first, it disposes us to joyfully despise all the pleasant comforts of this life, since in it we have, in place of fleeting comforts, the ineffable riches of God’s words; and then it illuminates our mind with a kind of fiery transformation and thereby makes it a partaker of the ministering spirits. Having prepared ourselves properly, beloved, let us strive toward this virtue—glorious, all-seeing, cutting off every earthly concern, nourishing the mind with the words of God in the radiance of ineffable light—and, to put it briefly, —preparing the verbal, rational soul for undivided communion with God the Word through the holy Prophets. And in the souls of men—O wondrous miracle!—having arranged hymns that proclaim God, this divine matchmaker sings aloud of God’s greatness.

68. Why is our mind

not as eager for prayer as for theological contemplation:

and how necessary prayer is for success in such contemplation.

Our mind is, for the most part, not very inclined toward prayer, because it is constrained and limited by the virtue of prayer; but it is more eager to engage in theological contemplation, due to the breadth and boundlessness of divine contemplations. Therefore, so as not to give free rein to its rambling within us and not to indulge its desire to give itself over boundlessly to lofty flights of fancy, let us devote ourselves above all to prayer, psalm singing, and the reading of Scripture, without neglecting the interpretations of wise men, whose words are filled with true knowledge of the faith. By acting in this way, we will not only prevent him from mingling his own words with the words of grace, nor allow him, carried away by vanity, to be distracted by flights of fancy under the influence of self-satisfaction and loquacity; but we will also learn to keep him free from daydreams during contemplation and make almost all his thoughts tearful. Finding rest within himself during moments of silence, and especially reveling in the sweetness of prayer, he not only becomes free from the passionate impulses mentioned above, but also, renewed, he easily and effortlessly gains the strength to abide in divine contemplation, while at the same time excelling in discerning judgment (practical wisdom) with great humility. It should be noted, however, that prayer is higher than any breadth of contemplation; it is proper only to those who are filled with holy grace in every sensation and perception.

69. Grace initially acts most tangibly upon the soul, and then diminishes its effect and even withdraws entirely.

How beneficial this is for the soul! At first, grace usually illuminates the soul with its light, accompanied by a strong sense of it; but as progress is made in the spiritual Christian life, it then, for the most part unbeknownst to the God-loving soul, performs its mysteries within it: so that afterward (once the soul is pacified) it may lead us, in joy, onto the path of divine contemplation, as if we had just been called from ignorance into knowledge; and in the midst of our struggles (to pacify the soul from the passions), it may keep our thoughts from becoming vain. It is fitting for us to be cast into sorrow in moderation, as if we had been forsaken by grace, so that we may humble ourselves all the more and learn to submit to the Lord's decrees concerning us, and then, in due time, enter into joy, inspired by blessed hope: for just as boundless sorrow leads the soul into despair and hopelessness, so too does excessive joy lead it to conceit and boasting. I speak of those who are still infants in life and reason. Between the enlightenment of grace and abandonment lies temptation; and between sorrow and joy lies hope. For it is said: "I have waited patiently for the Lord, and He has heard me" (Ps. 39: 2)—and again: "Through the multitude of my afflictions, Your consolations have gladdened my soul" (Ps. 93: 19).

70. How harmful is loquacity to the soul, and how beneficial is silence.

Just as doors in a bathhouse that are frequently opened quickly let the internal heat escape to the outside, so too does the soul, when many people speak—even if they speak only good things—let its memory (the conscious standing in the order of spiritual things) escape through the door of speech. Consequently, the mind is ultimately deprived of its purest thoughts, and, driven by a disorderly flood of thoughts, it speaks confusedly to those present. In such a case, it no longer possesses the Holy Spirit, who keeps our thoughts free from daydreaming; for this Spirit, being good and free from all turmoil and daydreaming, shuns verbosity. — Silence, on the other hand, is beneficial, being the mother of wise thoughts.

71. How a God-loving soul ought to govern the sense of truth.

The Word of Knowledge itself teaches us that at the beginning, a God-loving soul (having set out on the path of pleasing God) is assailed by a multitude of passions, especially anger and hatred. It is subjected to this not so much by the action of evil spirits as by the very course of its progress in the spiritual life. For as long as the soul is led by worldly reasoning, even though it sees the truth being trampled upon by others, it remains indifferent to it; for, being wholly occupied with its own desires, it has no concern for God's truth. But when it begins to rise above its passions and desires, then—through detachment from worldly things and through love for God—it can no longer remain indifferent, even in a dream, to seeing God's truth being abandoned; rather, it becomes angry and indignant at the evildoers until it sees these very offenders against the truth defending its dignity, through the power of a godly thought (having come to the fear of God and repented). Thus, she naturally hates the unrighteous and loves the righteous deeply; for the eye of the soul is not deceived (led astray by a wrongful view) when its veil—the body—is refined by extreme self-restraint. However, it is far better to lament the insensitivity of the unrighteous than to hate them: for although they are worthy of hatred, the word of truth does not approve of a God-loving soul being stirred up by hatred, because when hatred is in the soul, true knowledge is rendered inactive.

72. The theological mind and the mind of the scholar.

The theological mind, sweetened and refined in the soul by the very words of God, attains its measure of dispassion with sufficient breadth. For "the words of the Lord," as it is said, "are pure words, silver refined, purified by the earth" (Ps. 11:7). And the mind of the scholar, grounded in the trial of grace-filled influences, rises above the passions. The theologian also partakes of the scholar's experience if he cultivates the most humble dispositions within himself; and the scholar, to some extent, partakes of contemplative virtue if the rational part of his soul is free from sin. For it does not happen that everyone acquires both of these gifts in perfection; so that each who possesses one of them, marveling at how the other surpasses him, may excel in humility with zeal for a righteous life. That is why the Apostle says: "To one is given through the Spirit a message of wisdom, to another a message of knowledge by the same Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:8).

73. On vocal prayer and prayer offered in the heart.

When the soul abounds with its natural fruits, it performs its psalm-singing most vocally and is inclined to pray above all with a voice. But when it is moved by the Holy Spirit, it sings and prays with all joy and sweetness in a single heart. The first state is followed by a dreamy joy (arising from self-satisfaction); the second by a spiritual tear, and then by a certain joy that loves silence: for the memory, while the voice is held in check, remains warm and inclines the heart to produce certain tear-inducing and soul-searching thoughts. In this, truly, one can see the seeds of prayer—sown with tears, yet joyfully, upon the soil of the heart, in the firm hope of a bountiful harvest (Ps. 125:5). However, when we are overwhelmed by great sorrow, then we must sing the psalms a little more loudly, suppressing the soul's cries of grief with the joy of hope, until this heavy cloud of sorrow is dispelled by the wind of the psalm's melody.

74. On Natural and Grace-Filled Love of God.

When the soul comes to know itself, it then radiates from within a certain warmth and a godly reverence: for, not being disturbed by worldly cares, it reflects a certain love (for God) from within itself into the world, seeking God, the source of peace, in proportion; but this remembrance (of the God sought) soon dissipates, either because sensory impressions cloud this remembrance, or because nature, in its poverty, quickly exhausts its own goodness. That is why the Greek sages, though they sought to achieve through self-restraint what they desired, did not attain it as they should have; for their minds were not influenced by eternal and all-true wisdom. But the God-loving warmth bestowed upon the heart by the Holy Spirit is, first of all, entirely peaceful and unceasing; furthermore, it calls all parts of the soul to love God and does not burst forth from the heart, but of its own accord fills the whole person with a certain boundless love and joy. Those who have come to know it must strive to attain it. For natural love is a sign that the nature does not thrive through self-restraint; yet it cannot elevate the mind to dispassion, as spiritual (grace-filled) love does.

75. On the light-bearing influence of grace upon the soul—and on its darkening under the influence of dark forces.

Just as the air surrounding us, when the north wind blows, becomes pure due to a certain subtlety and the refreshing effect of this wind; but when the south wind blows, it becomes, as it were, thickened due to a certain heaviness brought on by this wind, which carries away from its own regions and spreads a kind of dry mist over the entire universe: so too, when the soul receives the influence of the breath of the true and Holy Spirit, it is entirely free from demonic obscuration; but when it is strongly swept by the spirit of delusion, it becomes entirely covered by the clouds of sin. Therefore, we must always direct our striving with all our might toward the purifying and life-giving breath of the Holy Spirit—that is, toward the spirit which the Prophet Ezekiel, in a vision, saw coming from the North (– 1:4): so that the contemplative part of our soul, above all, may remain pure, and we may be deemed worthy to enter into divine visions without shame, beholding in the atmosphere of light that which is in the light. This is the light of true knowledge.

76. How the Spirit of Truth and the spirit of delusion act in the soul before and after baptism.

Some have imagined that grace and sin—that is, the Spirit of Truth and the spirit of delusion—are both hidden within the minds of those being baptized: for, they say, one calls the mind to good, while the other calls it to the opposite. I, however, have come to understand from the divine Scriptures and from the mind's own experience that before baptism, grace directs the soul toward good from without, while Satan lurks in its very depths, attempting to block the mind from all righteous paths; from the very moment we are reborn in baptism, the devil is outside, and grace is within. That is why we find that just as delusion once reigned over the soul—so truth reigns over it after baptism. After this, Satan continues to act upon the soul, just as before, and often even more fiercely, but not as one coexisting with grace—God forbid!—but rather, as it were, smoldering before the mind through the weakness of the body and the allure of wordless pleasures. This happens by God's permission, so that a person may attain the enjoyment of goodness only by passing through storm, fire, and temptation. For it is said: "We have gone through fire and water, and You have brought us to a place of rest" (Ps. 65:12).

77. The Mode of Action of God's Grace in the Soul.

Grace, as I have said, from the very moment we receive baptism, begins to dwell secretly in the very depths of the mind (spirit), concealing its presence even from the mind's own perception. But when someone begins to love God with all the will (heart) of his being, then grace speaks to the soul with an ineffable word through the senses of the mind, imparting to it a portion of its blessings. Consequently, whoever desires to hold fast to this gift within himself forever comes to desire, with great joy, to renounce all present blessings, so as to fully acquire that field in which he has found the hidden treasure of life (Matt. 12:44). For when one renounces all worldly wealth, one finds within oneself that place where God's grace is hidden. Then, as the soul progresses, the divine gift (of grace) reveals its beneficence (beneficial nature) in the mind; but at the same time, the Lord allows the demons to trouble the soul even more, both to teach it to discern good from evil with discernment and to make it more humble; for when it is subjected to such temptations, it is overcome with great shame at the disgrace of the demons' thoughts.

78. Through baptism, the Holy Spirit is poured into the heart, and the evil spirit is cast out; but this does not completely put an end to the temptations to sin.

We are made in the image of God through the intelligent (spiritual) movement of the soul; while the body is, as it were, its dwelling place. But since Adam's sin not only defiled the soul's essential characteristics but also subjected our body to corruption, the All-Holy God the Word became incarnate and, as God, through His own baptism, granted us the water of salvation for rebirth: for we are reborn in water through the action of the Holy and Life-giving Spirit, as a result of which we are immediately cleansed both in soul and body, if we approach God with a willing heart. At this moment, the Holy Spirit dwells within us, and sin (or the father of sin) is cast out by Him, since it is impossible for these two entities to coexist within the soul—which is characterized by unity and simplicity—as some have thought. Moreover, when divine grace, through Holy Baptism, unites itself in boundless love with the features of the image of God as a pledge of likeness, where is there room for the evil one—since there is no fellowship between light and darkness? (2 Cor. 6:14). Thus, as we journey along the path of holy struggles, we believe that through the "bath of rebirth" (1 Tim. 3:5), the vile serpent is cast out from the depths of the mind; yet we are not surprised that even after baptism we continue to experience both good and evil thoughts. For the bath of sanctification, though it washes away the filth of sin, does not destroy the duality of our desires, nor does it prevent demons from waging war against us and speaking deceitful words to us; so that whatever we might retain while remaining in that natural state, we may preserve by the power of God, having taken up the weapons of righteousness.

79. Grace acts through the faculties of the mind, while Satan acts through the fleshly senses and passions.

Satan, as I have said, is cast out of the soul through holy baptism; but, for the reasons mentioned above, he is permitted to act upon it through the body. God's grace is instilled into the very depths of the soul, that is, into the mind. For, as it is said, "All the glory of the king's daughter is within," invisible to demons (Ps. 44:14). That is why, when we fondly remember God, we feel that divine love, as it were, gushes forth like a stream from the very depths of our heart; whereas evil spirits attack the bodily senses and nest within them, conveniently acting—through the flesh at their disposal—upon those whose souls are still infantile. Thus, according to the divine Apostle, our mind is always in harmony with the law of the Spirit; but the fleshly senses are readily drawn away by sensual inclinations (Rom. 7:18). Consequently, in those who zealously advance in knowledge, grace, through the senses of the mind and the body itself, fills them with inexpressible joy; but when we walk the path of piety carelessly and heedlessly, the demons, finding us in this state, enslave our soul through the bodily senses, forcibly dragging it toward what it does not desire—they are murderers.

80. Against those who say that grace and sin dwell together in the hearts of the baptized.

Those who say that two entities—namely, the spirit of grace and the spirit of sin—coexist in the hearts of believers cite, in support of this view, the words of the Evangelist: "The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it" (John 1:5), and conclude that divine light is in no way defiled by coexisting with the evil one, even if divine light were to come near demonic darkness in any way. But this Gospel passage also rebukes such people, showing that they reason contrary to the Holy Scriptures. For just as God—the Word, this true light—deigned to appear to His creatures in His flesh, out of His boundless love for humanity He kindled within us the light of His holy knowledge; yet the wisdom of the world did not comprehend—that is, did not recognize—this counsel of God, since "the mind set on the flesh is hostile toward God" (Rom. 8:7): for this reason, the Theologian used this word; and after saying a few more words, this wonderful man adds: "for the true light, which enlightens every person coming into the world"—instead of: guides and gives life. "For He was in the world, and the world was made through Him, yet the world did not know Him. He came to His own, and His own did not receive Him. But to all who did receive Him, He gave the right to become children of God, to those who believe in His name" (John 1:9–12). And the most wise Paul, in explaining this very statement—"they did not receive Him" (they did not know Him)—says: "Not that I have already attained this, or am already perfect; but I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me" (Phil.

3:12). Thus, the Evangelist is not speaking of Satan when he says that he did not know the true light—for he was alien to it from the beginning—but he rightly rebukes with these words those people who, though they hear of God’s powers and miracles, do not wish to approach the light of His knowledge because their hearts are darkened.

81. There are two kinds of evil spirits: the most subtle, which wage war against the soul, and the coarsest, which act more upon the body.

The Word of knowledge teaches us that there are two kinds of evil spirits: some are more subtle, others are more grossly material. The most subtle wage war against the soul, while the coarsest usually ensnare the flesh through certain shameful, sensual impulses; which is why the spirits that attack the soul and those that attack the body are always opposed to one another, even though they share an equal zeal to harm people. When grace does not dwell within a person, evil spirits, like serpents, nest in the depths of the heart, preventing the soul from turning toward the desire for good. But when grace dwells secretly in the mind, then they, like dark clouds, flit across the parts of the heart, transforming into sinful passions and various illusory fantasies, so that by distracting the mind with these fantasies through memory, they may turn it away from communion with grace. Thus, when spirits attacking the soul inflame us with passions—especially with conceit and pride, the mother of all evils—we must then recall the decay of our own body to put this arrogance of self-glorification to shame. We must do the same when demons, waging war against the body, prepare our hearts to boil over with shameful lusts: for this very remembrance, in conjunction with the memory of God, will strongly thwart all the temptations of evil spirits. But if, in response to such a remembrance, the demons of the soul begin to instill the thought of the boundless insignificance of human nature—as having no dignity whatsoever—because of the decay of the flesh (for this is how they love to act when someone begins to torment them with such thoughts), —let us recall the honor and glory of the Heavenly Kingdom, while not forgetting to keep in mind the severity of God’s impartial judgment; so that we may prevent such fainthearted despair and thereby impart steadfastness and strength to our hearts—which are prone to swift and easy lust—to resist.

82. The devil cannot dwell in the hearts of those who are in grace; but he wages war against them through the body.

The Lord teaches us in His Holy Gospel that when Satan returns and finds his house swept clean and empty—that is, the heart barren—he takes with him seven other spirits, more wicked than himself, enters it, and makes his home there, making the person’s final condition worse than the first (Luke 11: 25). From this, we must understand that as long as the Holy Spirit dwells within us, Satan cannot enter the depths of the soul and dwell there. But the divine Paul also teaches the same understanding of this view of the matter—when, having seen the nature of this matter through ascetic (experiential) knowledge (that is, what it truly is), he says: “For I delight in the law of God according to the inner man; but I see another law in my members, waging war against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin that is in my members” (Rom. 7:22–23). As for those who have succeeded in living by the Spirit, he goes on to say: “There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who do not walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set me free from the law of sin and death” (Rom. 8:1–2). And in another passage, to show that Satan wages war from the body against the soul that has become a partaker of the Holy Spirit, he says: “Therefore, stand firm, having your loins girded with truth, and having put on the breastplate of righteousness, and having shod your feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking up the shield of faith, with which you will be able to quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one; and take the helmet of salvation, and the spiritual sword, which is the word of God” (Eph. 6:14–17). But captivity is one thing, and struggle is another; for the former implies a kind of forcible seizure into one’s power, while the latter denotes an equal and opposing struggle. This is why the Apostle says that the devil attacks the souls that bear Christ the Lord within them with fiery arrows. For this is usually the case: whoever cannot reach his opponent with his hands uses arrows against him, so that from a distance he may wound the enemy with whom he is fighting; and so Satan, since he can no longer, as before, take up residence in the minds of those who strive, due to the presence of grace within them; instead, dwelling in the body, he swoops down upon the lustful dampness to entice the soul with its allure. That is why the body must be dried up, so that the mind, drawn by lustful dampness, does not slip into the snares of sensuality and fall. From the Apostle’s own words, it is easy to see that the mind of those who strive is under the influence of divine light, which is why it is subject to God’s law and delights in it; but the flesh, by its very propensity toward evil, submits to evil spirits, which is why it is drawn to bow to their evil suggestions. From this it is self-evident that the mind is not some sort of common dwelling place for God and the devil: otherwise, just as I serve God's law with my mind, and with my flesh to the law of sin, if my mind did not freely resist the demons, willingly submitting to the beneficent influence of grace upon it, while at the same time the body is enticed by the pleasant fragrance of wordless delights, because, as I said, I allow evil spirits to take up residence within it? The Apostle says: "For I know that in me—that is, in my flesh—nothing good dwells" (Rom. 7:18). Thus, in those who resist sin through their struggles (for the Apostle does not speak of himself here), the demons wage war against the mind, while the flesh seeks to relax and entice them toward lust through soothing, pleasant sensations; for, by righteous judgment, they are permitted to hide in the depths of the body even in those who strive earnestly against sin, because the will of human reasoning is always subject to temptation. But if anyone is able, even in this life, to die through ascetic labors, then he finally becomes entirely a dwelling place of the Holy Spirit; for such a one has already risen before death—as was the blessed Paul himself, and as were and are all those who have striven and continue to strive against sin with perfect devotion.

83. Just as the thoughts instilled by Satan are regarded as coming from the heart,

The heart itself produces both good and evil thoughts; however, it does not generate evil thoughts from its own nature, but has some of them because the memory of evil has become a habit within it due to past temptations, while the greater part of them—and indeed the most wicked ones—it originates from the wickedness of demons. We, however, perceive all of them as coming, as it were, from the heart; which is why some have thought that both grace and sin dwell together in our minds, citing as proof the words of the Lord: "For what comes out of the mouth comes from the heart, and this defiles a person. For from the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, and the like" (Matt. 15:18, 20). Yet they do not know that our mind, through the action of a certain subtle sensation, becomes the recipient of those evil thoughts implanted in it by evil spirits; for, through the action of the flesh—the body, which is prone to self-indulgence—the soul is drawn into this, though we do not know how, because of its union with the flesh; for the flesh loves the allure of sensual pleasure immeasurably. For this reason, the thoughts instilled in the soul by demons seem to originate from the heart, and we make them our own when we desire to take pleasure in them: this is what the Lord rebukes, as the divine Word itself reveals, and He uttered the words cited above. For when someone delights in the thoughts that the crafty Satan instills in him and, as it were, inscribes the memory of them in his heart, is it not evident that he subsequently brings forth these thoughts from within himself?

84. An example from Scripture explaining that grace and the devil cannot dwell together in the heart.

The Lord says in the Gospel that a strong man cannot be driven out of his house unless a stronger man binds him, plunders all that he has, and throws him out (Matt. 12:29). How, then, after such humiliation, can this cast-out one enter again and remain there alongside the true master of the house, who rests in his own home as he pleases? And what king, having defeated a tyrant who rebelled against him, would want him to dwell alongside him in his royal chambers? Would he not rather kill him at once, or, having bound him, hand him over to his soldiers for the most prolonged torment and the most pitiful death?

85. Proof of the same from the experiences of the spiritual life, or of how grace and sin operate in one who is prospering.

If anyone, on the grounds that we think both of evil and of good, concludes that the Holy Spirit and the devil dwell together in the mind, let such a person know that this happens to us because we have not yet tasted or seen "how good the Lord is" (Ps. 33: 9). For at first, as I have already said above, grace conceals its presence in those being baptized, awaiting the soul's free will; but when a person turns wholly to God, then grace reveals its presence to the heart through some ineffable feeling; and again awaits the soul's response, allowing in the meantime the devil's arrows to reach the very depths of its feelings, so that it may seek God with the warmest willingness and the most humble disposition. If, as a result, a person finally begins with firm resolve to press forward in keeping the commandments and ceaselessly calling upon the Lord Jesus; then the fire of holy grace extends even to the outer senses of the heart, tangibly consuming the thorns of the human earth; hence, the devil's counsel and suggestions stop far away from that place (where the heart is with grace), merely lightly touching the passionate part of the soul. But when a person, through ascetic efforts, is clothed in every virtue—and especially in perfect detachment from worldly possessions—then grace illuminates his entire being with a profound, indescribable feeling, kindling within him the warmest love for God; then the demons' arrows are extinguished even before they reach the bodily senses, for the breath of the Holy Spirit fills the heart with deep peace, and the fiery arrows of the demons are quenched even as they fly through the air. However, even one who has attained this degree is sometimes permitted by God to be subjected to the evil influence of demons, leaving his mind unenlightened at such times, so that our free will may not be completely bound by the bonds of grace—not only because sin must be overcome through spiritual struggles, but also because a person must continue to progress in spiritual experience: for what is considered perfect in the one being taught is imperfect in comparison with the riches of God the Teacher in His love that zealously seeks progress, even if someone, striving for this progress, were to ascend to the very top of the ladder shown to Jacob.

86. God's permission is for instruction, and God's rejection is for punishment.

The Lord Himself says, "Satan has fallen from heaven" (Luke 10:18), so that he might not see the glorious dwelling place of the Holy Angels: how then can he, unworthy of fellowship with God's good servants, have the human mind as a dwelling place in common with God? Even if they say that this happens by divine permission, they do not thereby present any conclusive proof. For educational permission in no way deprives the soul of divine light; what happens in this case is only that grace, as I have already said, conceals its presence from the mind, so that, moved by the bitterness of the devil, the soul may, with all fear and great humility, seek help from God, experiencing within itself the evil influence of the enemy. Just as a mother, whose child is misbehaving because it is unwilling to submit to the rules of nursing, briefly releases it from her embrace so that the child, frightened by the ugly strangers or some wild animals surrounding it, may, in great fear and tears, yearn to return to her embrace. But by God's repulsion, the occasional permission He grants delivers the soul—which does not wish to have God within itself—to the demons, as if bound. But we are not children to be cast aside; rather, as we believe, we are the true offspring of God's grace, nourished by it through rare allowances and frequent consolations, so that, under the influence of such benevolence toward us, we may grow to reach "the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13).

87. On the Effects on the Soul of God's Disciplinary Allowance and His punitive abandonment; and on how one should act in the face of both.

Educational permission first strikes the soul with great sorrow, a sense of humiliation, and a certain measure of despair, in order to suppress its vanity and desire to impress others, and to bring it to fitting humility. But immediately afterward, it instills in the heart a tender fear of God, a tearful confession, and a great desire for the most blessed silence. As for abandonment arising from God's aversion, it leaves the soul to itself, and it becomes filled with despair and unbelief, arrogance, and anger. It is therefore incumbent upon us, knowing both this indulgence and this abandonment, to approach God during these times in accordance with the nature of each: in the former, we must offer Him thanksgiving and vows, as He mercifully chastises the unruliness of our character by depriving us of consolation, so that He may teach us, as a father, to soundly distinguish good from evil; and here, constant confession of sins, unceasing tears, and greater seclusion—so that, through such diligent effort, we may implore and move God to look upon our hearts as He did before. We must realize, however, that when, under God's permissive providence, the soul engages in a face-to-face struggle with Satan, then grace—though it hides itself—assists the soul through unseen help, so as to show its enemies that victory over them is the work of the soul alone,

88. An example illustrates what good and evil thoughts arise in the presence of grace.

And whoever is deemed worthy to contemplate the spiritual. Just as when someone, in winter, standing in an open place somewhere, turns to face the east at the beginning of the day, the front part of his body is warmed by the sun, while the back part remains untouched by the sun's warmth, because the sun is not directly overhead at that moment: so it is with those who are still at the beginning of their spiritual journey: their hearts are sometimes partially warmed by holy grace, which is why their minds then begin to bear the fruit of spiritual contemplation; but the outer parts of their hearts still remain preoccupied with carnal thoughts, because not all parts of the heart are yet illuminated by the holy light of grace in deep feeling—which some, failing to understand this, have imagined to mean that there are two opposing forces within the minds of those who strive spiritually). This is why it happens that the soul contemplates both good and evil at the same time, just as in the example given above, a person feels both cold and warmth at the very same moment. For ever since our mind slipped into the duality of knowledge, it has had a certain compulsion—even if it does not wish to—to think of both evil and good at the same moment, especially in those who attain subtlety of reasoning. No matter how hard one tries to think only of good, evil immediately comes to mind, because human memory, ever since Adam's sin, has been divided into two kinds of thought. But if we begin to fulfill God's commandments with fervent zeal, then grace, illuminating all our senses with a profound sense of His presence, will burn away all our sinful memories; and by sweetening our hearts with a peace of unceasing love, it will accustom us to think of spiritual things rather than carnal ones. This very often happens to those who are drawing near to perfection, who keep a constant remembrance of the Lord in their hearts.

89. Through baptism, grace restores the image of God, and then paints the likeness of God together with a person's efforts to acquire virtues, the highest of which is love—the supreme mark of godlikeness.

Holy Grace bestows upon us two blessings through baptism, which regenerates us, one of which immeasurably surpasses the other. But one it bestows immediately; namely, in the water itself it renews and illuminates all the features of the soul that constitute the image of God, washing away from us every stain of sin; while the other it awaits to bring about in us together with us: this is what constitutes the likeness of God. — Thus, when the mind begins to partake with great feeling of the blessings of the All-Holy Spirit, then we must know that grace begins, as it were, to paint upon the features of the image of God the features of godlikeness. For just as painters first sketch the image of a person with a single color, and then, little by little, layer color upon color, they render the image of the one they are painting so that it resembles him even down to the hairs: so too does the holy grace of God first restore, through baptism, the features of the image of God in a person, restoring him to the state in which he was when he was created; and when it sees that we desire with all our will the beauty of God's likeness, and stand naked and unafraid in its workshop, then, as virtue after virtue blossoms in the soul, and its countenance is raised from glory to glory, it imparts to the soul the features of God's likeness: whereby the senses reveal how the features of the likeness of God are reflected in us, while the perfection of that likeness we come to know through the enlightenment of grace. The mind, flourishing in a certain measure and in inexpressible harmony, perceives all virtues through the senses; but no one can attain spiritual love unless he is enlightened by the Holy Spirit in all its fullness and tangibly. For if the mind does not receive from the divine light the perfect likeness to God, then although it may possess all other virtues, it remains unparticipating in perfect love; for only when a person becomes completely like God's virtue (I am speaking of the likeness to God that is within human capacity) does he also bear the likeness of divine love. Just as when a portrait is painted of someone, the most pleasing of colors and the most essential of features—when applied to the painted face—make it, even down to the smile, completely like the person being portrayed: so too, when divine grace paints the likeness of God in a person, the radiant trait of love, once applied, reveals that the features of the image of God are fully elevated to the splendor of godlikeness. And no virtue can bring dispassion (purification and freedom from the passions) to the soul except love alone: for "the fulfillment of the law is love" (Rom. 13:10); so that although our inner man is renewed daily by the experience of love, he reaches full maturity only together with the complete perfection of love.

90. At first, one is allowed to fully taste the consolations of grace, and then they are hidden; the first to sustain zeal for spiritual struggles, and the second so that the one striving may be humbled.

The full manifestation of grace in love.... and how this comes about. At the very beginning of one's spiritual progress, if one ardently loves God's virtue, the Holy Spirit grants the soul a full and certain taste of God's sweetness, so that the mind may accurately and definitively recognize how great is the fruit of God-loving labors; but then conceals the richness of this life-giving gift for a long time, so that we—even though we may excel in all virtues—may consider ourselves to be nothing, because we do not see within ourselves that holy love has become a constant disposition. For at such times it happens that the demon of unlovingness sometimes assails the souls of those who strive in the spiritual life with such force that they treat even those who love them with hostility, and even during greetings and embraces they maintain this corrupting act of hostility. Because of this, the soul grieves deeply and suffers, for although it carries spiritual love in its memory (it is aware of the obligation of love), it cannot experience it in its feelings, due, as it seems to the soul, to the insufficiency of its most perfect efforts. That is why we must, for now, compel ourselves through forceful effort to perform acts of love, so that in this way we may come to taste it with full feeling and with assured satisfaction; yet in perfection, no one living in this flesh can attain it, except for those saints who have reached martyrdom and perfect confession—and whoever achieves this is completely transformed and even reluctantly partakes of food; for in one nourished by divine love, what desire for the goods of this world can there still be? For this reason, the most wise Paul, that great repository of knowledge, while proclaiming to us the future consolations of the righteous—based on his own assurance of this—says: “The kingdom of heaven is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 14: 17), which are the fruit of perfect love. Thus, those who are advancing in the spiritual life may often partake of the work of love here, but no one can attain it in full perfection unless the “body of death” has first been completely “devoured” (2 Cor. 5: 4).

91. On the work of grace-filled love for God.

Someone who loves God insatiably told me: when I desired to experience God’s love tangibly, the good Lord granted it to me with full sensation and satisfaction; and I felt this effect with such intensity that my soul then desired, with an indescribable joy and eagerness, to leave my body and go to the Lord, and to forget entirely the order of this temporary life. And anyone who has experienced the power of such love, even if he has suffered a thousand insults and deprivations at the hands of another, does not harbor anger toward that person, but remains spiritually attached to the one who insults and wrongs him; but he is inflamed with zeal only against those who attack the poor, or “speak lies against God,” as Scripture says (Ps. 73:6), or who otherwise live wickedly. For one who loves God far more than himself—or who loves himself not at all, but God alone—no longer stands up for his own honor, but desires only that the truth of Him who has honored him with eternal glory be honored. And he desires this not with some fleeting or transient desire, but possesses such a disposition as an unchanging character trait, due to his full experience of love for God. Moreover, one must know that a person stirred by God to such love is elevated above faith itself during the very act of love within him, just as he already holds the Venerable One in his heart with full love through faith. St. Paul clearly points this out to us when he says: “And now these three remain: faith, hope, and love; but the greatest of these is love” (1 Cor. 13:13). For whoever, as I have said, holds God in the abundance of love is, at that moment, far greater than his faith, being wholly immersed in love.

92. How necessary it is for success in theology to restore the peace that has been disrupted with others.

The work of holy knowledge, by its very nature, causes us no small amount of sorrow when, out of some irritation, we offend someone and make them our enemy. For this, it never ceases to prick our conscience until, through explanations and apologies, we succeed in restoring the offended person’s former goodwill toward us. Such anguish manifests itself with particular intensity when someone from this world becomes angry with us, even if unjustly. This weighs heavily upon us and troubles us greatly, since in every way we have served as a stumbling block and a cause of offense to them. Consequently, our mind then proves incapable of theological reflection; for knowledge, which is, by its very nature, entirely love, does not allow our thoughts to expand into divine contemplation— —unless we first embrace in love the one who is unjustly angry with us. In the event that He does not wish this, or has withdrawn from our midst, it is incumbent upon us, having accepted the image of His face into our good will with an unrestrained outpouring of the soul, to thus fulfill the law of love in the depths of our hearts. For those who desire to have knowledge of God must also represent in their minds the faces of those who are unjustly angry with an anger-free thought. When this happens, then the mind will not only move infallibly in the realm of theology, but will also rise with complete boldness in the work of love, as if ascending from the second step to the first.

93. The path of virtue is at first difficult and bitter, but then becomes easy and pleasant.

The path of virtue seems harsh and daunting to those just beginning to love piety, not because it is so in and of itself, but because human nature, from the very moment of emerging from the mother’s womb, is accustomed to living a life of indulgence in pleasures; but for those who have already managed to reach its midpoint, it appears entirely good and joyful: for when our evil inclinations are suppressed by good habits, then the very memory of senseless pleasures disappears as well; as a result, the soul already walks with great joy along all the paths of virtue. Therefore, the Lord, leading us onto the path of salvation, says that the gate is narrow and the way is hard that leads to life, and few are those who find it (Matt. 7:14); but to those who eagerly desire to begin keeping His holy commandments, He says: “My yoke is easy and My burden is light” (Matt. 11:30). Therefore, at the beginning of our endeavor, we must strive with all our might to fulfill God’s holy commandments, so that the good Lord, seeing our good intention and effort, may grant us readiness and a willing spirit to gladly submit to His glorious will: “For the Lord establishes the will” (Prov. 8: 35). After that, we will begin with great joy to do good unceasingly; and then we will truly feel that “it is God who works in us both to will and to act for His good pleasure” (Phil. 2: 13).

94. External and internal temptations enable those who strive capable of imprinting divine beauty within themselves.

Just as unwarmed and unmelted wax cannot properly imprint the seal placed upon it, so too a person, unless tested by trials and weaknesses, cannot bear the seal of God’s virtue. Therefore, the Lord says to the divine Paul: “My grace is sufficient for you; for My power is made perfect in weakness” (2 Cor. 12: 9). The Apostle himself boasts, saying: “Most gladly, then, I will boast all the more in my weaknesses, so that the power of Christ may dwell in me” (ibid.). Likewise, it is written in Proverbs: “The Lord disciplines those He loves; He punishes every son He accepts” (Prov. 3:12). The Apostle calls “weaknesses” the rebellions of the enemies of the Cross, which often befell both him and all the Saints at that time, so that they might not be exalted, as he says, by an abundance of revelations (2 Cor. 12:7); but rather, through humility, they might abide in the image of perfection, reverently preserving the divine gift through frequent humiliations. We, however, call “weaknesses” the wicked thoughts and bodily afflictions. For in those days, the bodies of the saints who struggled against sin—though subjected to deadly wounds and various other afflictions—were far above the passions that had entered human nature through sin; but now, as the peace of the churches multiplies in the Lord, it is necessary to test the bodies of the ascetics of piety with frequent afflictions, and their souls with wicked thoughts. This is especially true of those among them whose knowledge is powerful, accompanied by every sense and assurance, so that they may not fall into vanity and pride, and may, for the sake of great humility, receive, as I have said, the seal of divine beauty in their hearts, according to the words of the Holy Prophet: “The light of Your face, O Lord, has shone upon us” (Ps. 4:7). It is fitting, then, to endure with gratitude such counsel from the Lord concerning us; and then both our illnesses and our struggle against demonic thoughts will be counted as a second martyrdom for us. For he who spoke in those days through the mouths of lawless rulers to the holy martyrs—“Renounce Christ and love the glory of this age”—he himself speaks even now to the servants of God; He who then tormented the bodies of the righteous and grievously reviled the honorable teachers through those who served his devilish schemes—he himself now inflicts various sufferings upon the confessors of piety, accompanied by great revilement and humiliation, especially when, for the glory of the Lord, they help the oppressed poor with great strength. For this reason, we must, with all diligence and patience, cultivate within ourselves such a testimony of conscience before God: “I was patient, and the Lord heard me” (Ps. 39:2).

95. On the two kinds of humility—the humility of the average person and the humility of the perfect.

Humility is not easily attained: for the higher it is, the greater the effort required to attain it. It comes to those who partake of holy knowledge in two ways: when a devotee of piety is in the midst of spiritual progress, he maintains the most humble view of himself—whether because of bodily weakness, or because of adversity from those who are hostile to the zealous for a righteous life, or because of deceitful thoughts; but when the mind is fully alert and is clearly illuminated by holy grace, then the soul begins to possess humility as if by its very nature. For, being watered and nourished by divine grace through God’s goodness, it can no longer be puffed up or swollen with a love of glory, even if it were to fulfill God’s commandments unceasingly; rather, it considers itself the most insignificant of all, in the sense of communion with divine goodness, (that is, that she is such by God’s mercy). That humility is accompanied for the most part by sorrow and despondency, while this is joy mingled with all-wise modesty; the former, as I said, comes to those who are in the midst of their spiritual struggles, while the latter is bestowed upon those who are already drawing near to perfection. That is why it is not uncommon for someone to be overwhelmed by worldly successes, whereas this person, even if someone were to offer him all the kingdoms of the world, remains unshaken; not only does he not fear the most terrible arrows of sin, but he does not even feel them at all; for, being wholly spiritual, he no longer has any sense of outward glory. However, the ascetic reaches this final stage only after having passed through the first in every way: for grace will not grant us the second kind of wealth unless it first softens our will through trials, by allowing the passions to arise in an instructive manner during the first stage.

96. On guarding oneself against empty and evil thoughts and words.

Those who love the pleasures of this world move from thoughts to transgressions. Carried away by reckless passion, they express nearly all their passionate designs with lust, either in unseemly words or in lawless deeds. And those who resolve to lead an ascetic life diligently move from moral lapses to evil thoughts, or to evil and harmful speech (they have turned away from wicked deeds, but still remain in the realm of unwholesome thoughts and speech). And the demons, if they see such people—whether they are engaging in gossip and slander, or carrying on idle and inappropriate conversations, or laughing inappropriately, or becoming excessively angry, or craving vain and empty glory—immediately attack them in droves. Taking vanity as a pretext for their wickedness, and leaping through it as through some dark doorway, they plunder their souls. It is fitting, therefore, for those who devote themselves to the pursuit of virtue to desire neither glory nor the company of many, nor to enjoy frequent outings and walks, nor to slander anyone—even if that person were worthy of slander—nor to speak at length, even if they could say one good thing; for loquacity greatly scatters the mind and not only renders it incapable of spiritual work but also delivers it into the hands of the demon of despondency, who, having gradually weakened it, then hands it over to the demon of boundless sorrow, and finally to the demon of anger. That is why one must always train the mind to observe the holy commandments and to remember the glory of the Lord deeply. For, as Scripture says, he who keeps the commandments “will not be led astray by a deceitful word” (Eccl. 8:5)—that is, he will not be drawn toward impure thoughts or words.

97. Constant remembrance of the Lord and unceasing prayer combined with vigilance of the mind—is the sole means of purifying the heart.

When the heart receives the devil’s attacks with a certain burning pain, so that the one being tempted feels as if he is bearing the arrows themselves—this is a sign that the soul has come to zealously hate the passions. And this is the beginning of its purification. For if it does not endure great pain from the shamelessness of sin, it will not be able later to rejoice abundantly in the beneficence of righteousness. After this, let the one who desires to purify his heart continually warm it with remembrance of the Lord Jesus, making this alone the object of his contemplation and his unceasing spiritual labor. For those who wish to cast off their corruption should not behave in such a way that they pray at times and not at others, but must always practice prayer with a watchful mind, even if they live far from places of worship. For just as one who sets out to purify gold, if he leaves the crucible without fire even for a short time, causes the ore being purified to harden again—so too, the one who sometimes remembers God and sometimes does not: what he seems to gain through prayer, he loses by ceasing it. But it is characteristic of a man who loves virtue to consume the earthiness of the heart through constant remembrance of God, so that, as the evil gradually evaporates under the influence of the fire of good remembrance, the soul may, in full glory, rise completely to its natural radiance.

98. What does dispassion, or purity of heart, consist of? Dispassion does not mean not being assailed by demons, for in that case, according to the Apostle, we would have to “withdraw from the world” (1 Cor. 5:10); but rather, it means that when they assail us, we remain unassailed; just as warriors clad in armor are exposed to the arrows of their enemies, and hear the sound of the flying arrows, and even see the very arrows shot at them, yet remain unharmed by them because of the sturdiness of their armor. But these, being protected by iron, are not wounded during battle; we, however, by performing good deeds—clothed in the full armor of holy light and the helmet of salvation—will disperse the dark phalanxes of demons: for purity is achieved not merely by ceasing to do evil, but rather by completely eradicating evil within ourselves through all-encompassing zeal for the good.

99. On the two demons that wage the longest battle— the demon of excessive zeal and carnal lust.

And how to fight against them. When a man of God has almost conquered all his passions within himself, two demons still remain waging war against him: one torments the soul, stirring him up—through his great love of God—to excessive zeal, so that he will not allow anyone else to please God more than he does; and the other torments the body, stirring it up with a fiery impulse toward carnal lust. This happens with the body, first of all, because such lustful pleasure is inherent in our nature, having been implanted in it for the sake of procreation, which is why it is so difficult to overcome; and secondly, by God’s permission. For when the Lord sees one of the ascetics rising too high in the multiplication of virtues, He sometimes permits him to be troubled by this evil demon, so that he may consider himself the worst of all living people. Such an attack by this passion sometimes occurs after good deeds have been performed, and sometimes before, so that the movement of this passion—whether it precedes or follows the deeds—causes the soul to appear most unworthy in its own eyes, no matter how great the deeds it has accomplished may be. – But against the first (the demon that stirs up excessive zeal), we will fight by increasing our humility and love; and against the second (the demon of carnal lust)—by abstinence, patience, and a deep remembrance of death, so that through this, feeling the constant working of the Holy Spirit within us, we may become, in the Lord, superior even to these passions.

100. We must confess to God all involuntary and unknown sins:

otherwise, the hour of death will be difficult.

Those of us who have become partakers of holy knowledge will certainly have to give an account even of the involuntary wanderings of the mind, as Job says: “You have marked out my path; if I have sinned unwittingly” (Job 14:17)—and rightly so. For if anyone is always occupied with the remembrance of God and does not neglect His holy commandments, he will fall into neither involuntary nor voluntary sin. We must therefore immediately offer a contrite confession to the Lord even for our involuntary failings, incorporating it into the performance of our usual prayer rule. Since it is impossible for a person not to fall into human failings, (we should therefore always confess them to the Lord) until our conscience, in tears of love, is assured of their forgiveness: for, as St. John says: “If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness” (1 John 1:9). That is why we must constantly heed the feeling of contrite confession (and nurture this feeling), lest our conscience somehow deceive itself into thinking that it has already been sufficiently contrite and has confessed to God. For God’s judgment is far stricter than the judgment of our conscience, even if someone were to be fully convinced that they have done nothing wrong, as our wise Paul teaches, saying: “But I do not commend myself; for I have no knowledge of myself, yet I am not justified by this; but the Lord is the one who judges me” (1 Cor. 4:3–4). If, however, we do not properly confess even these (involuntary and unknown) sins, then at the hour of our departure we will find within ourselves a certain vague fear. But we who love the Lord ought to desire and pray that at that time we may be free from any fear: for whoever is in fear at that time will not pass freely by the princes of hell, because they regard this timidity of the soul as a sign of its complicity in their evil, just as it exists in themselves. But the soul, rejoicing in God’s love, at the hour of its separation from the body, soars with the angels of peace above all the dark hosts, for such a soul is, as it were, winged by spiritual love, having in this love the full and flawless fulfillment of the law. That is why those who depart from this life with such boldness will be caught up with all the saints at the Lord’s second coming. But those who, at the hour of death, are even slightly overcome by fear will then be left among the multitude of all other people, as those standing under judgment, so that, having been tested by the fire of judgment, they may receive the reward due to them according to their deeds from our good God and King Jesus Christ. For He is the God of righteousness, and He has in store for us who love Him the riches of His Kingdom, for ever and ever. Amen.

St. Maximus’s interpretation, in response to certain questions, of the following words from this hundredth chapter: “so that, having been tested by the fire of judgment...” and so on. “Those who have attained perfect love for God and, through virtue, have made the wings of their souls light enough to soar, are, according to the Apostle, caught up in the clouds and do not come to judgment; but those who have not attained such perfection—and who, even while doing good deeds, are not free from sin—these come before the judgment seat, and there, through the examination of their good and bad deeds, they are, as it were, tested by fire; if the scale of their good deeds outweighs the bad, they are spared punishment.”

Our Venerable Father John of Karpathos

A Brief Account of Him

Nothing is known about our Holy Father John of Karpathos—who he was, when he flourished, where he lived his ascetic life, or anything else concerning him. The only testimony about him comes from Blessed Photius, in the 201st reading: “I read a book in which, following the ten definitions of the principal virtues and the one hundred chapters of Diadochus, Bishop of Photica in Epirus, and several writings of St. Nilus, there is also a work by John of Karpathos, to which he gives the following title: ‘A Word of Comfort to the Monks Who Turned to Him for Comfort from India.’ And this work also consists of one hundred chapters.” – Judging by this comparison of St. John with Diadochus and Nilus, one may conclude that he was regarded as their contemporary and lived in the fifth century. Karpathos is a large island between Rhodes and Crete. St.

John was either a native of that place or lived there as a monk. – With these words, the Holy Father fatherly instills in his readers the courage to endure sorrows and withstand the temptations they face.

To the monks in India who wrote to him, one hundred exhortatory chapters

When presenting spring flowers to earthly kings, some of the petitioners were not only never rejected but were sometimes even granted special gifts. So too, at your request, as I bring you—who dwell in heaven—a hundred words of wisdom gathered from various sources, may I be graciously received and be deemed worthy of the gift of your prayers.

1. Since the King of all is eternal, His kingdom having neither beginning nor end, it is only fitting that those who have dedicated themselves to serving Him and to the virtues—which are pleasing to Him—should strive with all their hearts. For the honors of this life, however brilliant they may be, come to an end along with this life, whereas those that God bestows upon the worthy endure forever, since they are given together with immortality.

2. Blessed David, singing a song to God on behalf of all creation, mentioning the angels and all the heavenly powers, descended even to the earth, and did not omit the beasts, the cattle, the birds, or the creeping things, honoring them with such a song on their behalf as worship of the One who created them, and as if desiring that every creature might have its proper part in this. How, then, can a monk—comparable to Sapphire gold—ever allow himself to slacken in psalm-singing or grow lazy in it?

3. Just as fire embraced the bush but did not consume it, so too the heat of the body neither disturbs nor defiles either the flesh or the mind in those who have received the gift of dispassion, even if they bear a very heavy and hot body: “for the voice of the Lord cuts off the flame” (Ps. 28, 7) of nature, and God’s will and His word separate what is united by nature.

4. The moon, now waxing, now waning, represents the condition of a person who at times acts righteously, at times sins, and then, through repentance, returns to the path of virtue. The mind of the sinner is not lost—as some of you think—just as the moon’s body has not diminished, but only its light. Thus, through repentance, a person regains the radiance that is proper to him, just as the moon, after waning, is once again clothed in its usual light. “Whoever believes in Christ, even if he dies, will live” (John 11:25). “And you shall know that I am the Lord: I have spoken, and I will do it” (Ezek. 37:14).

5. When a swarm of hostile thoughts rises up against you in your mind, and you succumb to them and are defeated, know that you have temporarily separated yourself from divine grace; therefore, according to , by righteous judgment, you have been delivered into the hands of your own downfall. Strive, then, so that grace may never, even for a moment, forsake you because of your negligence. But when, having risen above temptation, you are able to surmount the wall of passionate thoughts and the wicked suggestions of the enemy’s malice that crowd in one after another, do not be ungrateful by failing to recognize in this the gift given to you from above; but confess with the Apostle, saying, “It is not I, but the grace of God that is with me” (1 Cor. 15:10), which has wrought this victory in me, raised me above the impure thoughts that rose up against me, and “delivered me from the unrighteous man,” that is, from the devil and from the old man (Ps. 17:49). Why, lifted up on high by the wings of the Spirit and, as it were, detached from the body, was I able to soar above the demons pursuing me—demons who usually ensnare the human mind with the net of sensuality? Having prayed for deliverance from this, I cry out: “You who brought me up out of the land of Egypt”—that is, out of the soul-destroying world—who, fighting for me with this hidden hand, struck down Amalek and gave me hope that the Lord will also destroy the other nations of unrestrained passions from before us (Ex. 17:14–16). This God of ours will grant wisdom and strength: for some have received wisdom, but not the strength of the Spirit to defeat their enemies. He will lift up your head above your enemies, and give you “wings like a dove’s, and you will fly and rest with God” (Ps. 54: 7). The Lord will make your muscles as strong as bronze, showing you to be steadfast, swift, and strong against your adversary, and casting all who rise up against you under your feet (Ps. 17: 35–40). Give thanks to the Lord for preserving your purity, for He has not delivered you into the hands of the lusts of your flesh and blood or of the unclean and corrupting spirits that act through them, but has protected you with His right hand as a wall. Build an altar to Him, as Moses did after putting Amalek to flight (Ex. 17: 15), and sing to Him: “For this reason I will confess to You and praise You, O Lord, and sing to Your name, extolling Your might” (Ps. 17:50), for You have delivered my life from decay and snatched me from the snares and traps of the ever-changing, manifold, and cunning malice of the world.

6. Evil demons kindle impure passions within us, renew them, exalt them, and multiply them; but meditation on the divine word, especially when accompanied by an outpouring of tears, puts them to death and destroys them, even if they are deeply rooted, and little by little renders harmful sinful actions—both of the soul and of the body—as if they did not exist: Let us only not be slothful in prayer and hope, unceasing and unwavering, as we wait upon the Lord.

7. Why does Christ offer praise through the mouths of the faithful who are like infants in their wickedness? Certainly, to crush with psalm-singing the enemy and the avenger who tyrannizes without measure—the enemy of virtues, the malicious avenger, the devil. For it is said, “With the multitude of Your glory You have destroyed Your adversaries” (Ex. 15: 7) and the enemies who wage war against us.

8. Everyone reaps the fruits of his own path—half now, and the other half in the age to come.

9. A monk must always maintain the most rigorous asceticism, not be seduced by passions, and cultivate profound silence.

10. The demons, who hate our souls, inspire certain people to bestow upon us some trifling praise, and then tempt us to take pleasure in it. If, after this, we become lax through conceit and give way to vanity, it will not be difficult for our enemies to take us completely captive.

11. It is better to accept one who reviles you than one who praises you, for, according to Scripture, the latter is no different from one who curses (Prov. 27:14).

12. When you are zealously pursuing the practice of fasting but, due to weakness, falter in it, then, with a contrite heart, turn with thanksgiving to the Provider and Judge of all. If you always present yourself as humble before the Lord in this way, you will never be haughty before any person.

13. The enemy, knowing that prayer is our most victorious weapon—and a devastating one for him—and striving in every way to turn us away from it, sometimes instills in us a desire to engage with the Hellenic writings from which we have strayed. But let us not heed his suggestions, lest we stray from the laws and order of our spiritual practice, and gather thorns and thistles instead of figs and clusters of grapes. “For the wisdom of this world is folly with God” (1 Cor. 3:19).

14. “I bring you good news of great joy,” says the angel, “which will be for all people” (Luke 2:10), and not for some group. And again: “Let the whole earth bow down to you and sing to you” (Psalm 65:4), and not just part of the earth. Singing, however, is characteristic not of those who pray tearfully to receive something, but of those who rejoice at having received what they desire. If this is so, then let us not despair, but, rejoicing, let us live our present lives, drawing from these words an incentive to such joy and contentment. However, let us temper this joy with the fear of God, as it is said elsewhere: “Rejoice in the Lord with trembling” (Ps. 2: 11). So too, the women who were with Mary fled from the tomb with fear and great joy (Matt. 28: 8). Perhaps we, too, will one day flee from the tomb in our minds with fear and joy. And it would be strange if we did so without fear; for no one is sinless, not even Moses or the Apostle Peter. Yet in such people, divine love, having triumphed, drives out fear at the hour of departure.

15. You have testimony in Scripture that the passionate person, having believed with all his heart and with all humility, receives the gift of dispassion. Today the Lord says to the “wise” thief, “You will be with Me in Paradise” (Luke 23:43); to the woman with the issue of blood: “Your faith has saved you; go in peace”—the bliss of dispassion (Mark 5:34). There are also many other similar passages, such as: “According to your faith, let it be done for you” (Matthew 9:29).

16. When, in our strict struggle against the passions, we are more severely assailed by demons with shameful thoughts, let us then, above all, be strengthened in our faith in the Lord, and let us build up within ourselves the firmest hope in the promised eternal blessings, which our enemies, out of envy, strive to deprive us of and to alienate us from. For if these blessings were not exceedingly great, the demons would not burn with such envy toward us nor would they assail us so often with wicked thoughts, hoping at least thereby to satisfy their malice and thinking to drive us to despair through this repeated and unbearable harassment.

17. Some maintain that true knowledge consists in action (based on the truth that has been recognized). Therefore, strive all the more to demonstrate both faith and knowledge through your deeds; for those who boast of knowledge alone will hear: “They profess to know God, but their deeds deny Him” (Titus 1:16).

18. For the most part, during feasts and holy gatherings—especially when someone intends to partake of the mystical meal—the demons strive to defile the ascetic with shameful fantasies and the emission of semen. But even with this, they fail to crush or weaken one who is accustomed to enduring everything patiently and courageously. And let not those who bend into a curve (like serpents), though they pretend to be straight, boast against us.

19. For your steadfastness and zeal, the enemies take revenge, tormenting your soul with various and unspeakable temptations. But take heart! From these great and innumerable sorrows, a crown is woven for you. Moreover, “Christ’s power is made perfect in weakness” (2 Cor. 12:9), and the grace of the Spirit is accustomed to flourish in the most sorrowful circumstances, as the prophetic word assures us: “For,” it says, “in darkness a light shines for the righteous” (Ps. 111:4); of course, “if only you dare to hold fast to the hope of which we boast until the end” (Heb. 3:6).

20. Nothing so disrupts a generally good disposition as laughter, jokes, and idle talk. And yet nothing renews a weary soul and prepares it for closeness with God as much as the fear of God, attentive devotion, constant instruction in God’s Word, arming oneself with prayer, and the pursuit of fruitful vigilance.

21. It is both fitting and beneficial for the soul to bear every sorrow steadfastly—whether caused by people or by demons—knowing that we deserve every hardship and blaming no one but ourselves for it. Whoever blames another for his own sorrows strays from right and proper judgment.

22. It happens that a person, though diligent, strays from the right path, stepping out of his proper place because of multiplied temptations, by which, as Scripture says, “all his wisdom and all his skill are consumed” (Ps. 106: 27). This is permitted “so that we may not rely on ourselves” (2 Cor. 1:9), “and so that Israel may not boast, saying, ‘My own hand has saved me’” (Judg. 7:2). But trust that you will once again be restored to your former glorious state, when, by God’s command, the evil one—who compels you to see and hear everything with passion and incites you to sin—will be cast away from you and driven off; for he clouds the mind as with a thick cloud and causes the flesh to feel an unspeakable heaviness and burden; and he makes the natural thought—which in itself is simple and without guile, like a newborn infant—complex and highly skilled in every sin, corrupting and perverting it by inclining it now this way, now that.

23. Man is a great being, growing inwardly and exalted for his virtues. And yet this great being fears sin as an elephant fears a mouse, “lest, while preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9:27).

24. Not only at the end of the world will the devil “speak words against the Most High,” as Daniel says (7:25); but even now it happens that, through our thoughts, he sends forth grievous blasphemies against heaven itself, dishonoring the Most High Himself, His creation, and the holy mysteries of Christ. We, however, standing firm on the rock of knowledge, must not fear this or be astonished by the audacity of this wicked one, but, arming ourselves with faith and fervent prayer and relying on the help from above, must boldly respond to the enemy.

25. With threats and abuse, the enemy boldly attacks the soul that has just departed from the body, appearing as a bitter and terrifying accuser of its failings. But one can also see then how a God-loving and faithful soul, though it had been wounded many times before by sins, does not fear his attacks and threats, but rather stands strong in the Lord, is filled with joy, and is inspired by courage, seeing the heavenly powers accompanying her and the light of faith shielding her like a wall; and with great boldness she cries out against the evil devil: “What have you to do with us, you who are alien to God? What have you to do with us, you who were cast down from heaven and are a slave to the wicked one? You have no power over us; Christ, the Son of God, has power over us and over all things; to Him we have sinned, and to Him we will give an account, having as our guarantee His mercy toward us and salvation in Him through His honorable Cross. But you, wretched one, flee from us. You are nothing to us or to Christ’s servants.”—At such bold words, the devil, who tears at the soul’s spine, will finally give way, letting out a scream, powerless to withstand the name of Christ; but the soul, being higher than him and soaring above the enemy, will silence him, just as a so-called swift-winged bird silences a raven. – After this, she is carried in joy by the divine Angels to the place destined for her according to her state.

26. That even a small temptation, sometimes permitted by God, may pose an obstacle to the zealot’s progress—let Echeinis, the tiniest of fish, confirm this to you: with a single touch, it halts a ship laden with all manner of goods and prevents it from moving forward; Recall also the one who says of himself: “I, Paul—I who once and twice intended to come to you, but Satan hindered me” (1 Thess. 2:18). Yet do not let this cause you confusion; rather, strive against it with patience, and you will receive grace.

27. When one rich in virtues, through laziness, strays from what is proper, then the sons of the evil east—the Amalekites, or else the Midianites (Judges, chapter 6)—rise up against him, —a force of lust—with their camels, that is, countless passionate memories, and they corrupt all the fruits of the earth, that is, the fruits of the best deeds and customs; as a result, Israel eventually becomes impoverished, falls into despondency, and is compelled to cry out to the Lord. Then a good thought is sent to him from above—a man who imitates Gideon in great faith and humility [for he said, “My thousand is the least in Manasseh” (Judges 6:15)]; and he takes up arms against such a multitude of attackers with three hundred weak men, and with the help of grace, he gloriously raises the trophy of victory over his enemies.

28. You cannot “tread upon the asp and the basilisk, and trample the lion and the serpent” (Ps. 90:13) unless, through prolonged prayer, you implore God to grant you the angels as your allies, so that they may lift you up in their arms and raise you above all worldly wisdom.

29. When any of those who strive earnestly is defeated, let him not lose heart or become lax in his conduct, but, inspired by the words of Isaiah, let him stand upright and take heart, singing this song: “Submit yourselves, you mighty ones,” O cunning demons! “For even if you rise up again, you will be defeated again; and whatever counsel you devise, the Lord will bring to ruin, for God is with us” (Isa. 8:9–10)—God, who raises up the fallen and causes our enemies to be torn apart by sorrow and vexation as soon as we repent.

30. It is impossible for one who is being trained through trials to avoid sorrow; but after this, such people are granted great joy, sweet tears, and divine thoughts, because they have cultivated sorrow and contrition in their hearts.

31. If neither Isaac, who desired it, nor Esau, who sought the coveted blessing, received what they hoped for (Rom. 9:16)—since God shows mercy, blesses, and anoints with the Spirit not the one we desire, but the one whom He Himself, before the foundation of the world, predestined to serve Him—then we shall by no means be disheartened or envious when we see any brothers, the lowly and the least, excelling in virtue. You have certainly heard what the Lord says in the parable: “Give this man a seat” (Luke 14:9)—so that the one who is above you may recline there. Let us marvel all the more at this Judge, who has wisely and ineffably decreed that the least and the last should take precedence and lead, while we are last, even though we excel him in both deeds and years. Whatever measure the Lord has given to each person, let us be content with that. “If we live by the Spirit, let us also walk by the Spirit,” as it is written (Gal. 5:25).

32. Do not agree under any circumstances when someone under your authority says to you: “Give me authority for a time, for the sake of virtue, to try this or that task and to carry it out in such and such a way.” For whoever speaks thus clearly desires to carry out his own will and rejects the covenants of the best obedience.

33. As you will see, the passions of the flesh and of the soul will be eradicated in time and by God’s providence, even if they are many; but the mercy of Christ will never cease. For “the mercy of the Lord is from this age and to the age to come upon those who fear Him” (Ps. 102: 17).

34. The royal treasuries will be filled with gold; and the minds of true monks will be filled with knowledge.

35. It sometimes happens that a teacher falls into disgrace and is subjected to temptations because of those who have received spiritual benefit from him. For, as it is said, “We are dishonorable”—being dishonorable as slaves to the flesh—“and weak; but you are glorious and strong in Christ” (1 Cor. 4:10).

36. The source and foundation of corruption through the flesh is passionate thought. But the one who has come to his senses after a fall drives it out of his soul through repentance. For it is said, “It would be better if you had wept, so that the wicked and unseemly thought that incited you to do this might be removed from among you” (1 Cor. 5:2). Thus, weeping opposes the spirit of corruption.

37. Who will proclaim to the one oppressed by disgrace and powerlessness toward virtue that he will behold Jesus—not only in the future, but even here, with the great power and glory of the One who is coming to him through dispassion? So, like Sarah, whose soul had grown old in barrenness and who, according to the promise, finally gave birth to a son of righteousness, will say: “God has brought me laughter”—that is, He has granted me great joy after so many years of sorrow caused by passion; or, according to another translation: “God has made me young”—“my youth is renewed like the eagle’s” (Ps. 102: 5). For having grown old before in sins and shameful passions, I have now been born again and have become young and tender, having previously been coarsened by the flesh, and now I view worldly things lightly, having embraced the simplicity and indifference proper to my nature, after my mind was restored to health through God’s abundant mercy, and my flesh became, like that of Naaman the Syrian, like the flesh of infants, through my baptism in the Jordan of knowledge; Now I am of one mind, having been delivered, by God’s grace, from the serpent’s cunning and from the horde of evil thoughts, which are highly skilled in evil and deeply rooted in the material world (immersed in sensuality).

38. Suppose the Lord Himself says to you: “At one time I took away from you such-and-such a gift, in which you found satisfaction for your mind and rest; and in their place I gave you another gift, such-and-such, equal to them. Yet you, thinking of what was taken away and paying no attention to what was given in its place, groan, suffer, and are wounded by sorrow; but you bring Me joy by accepting sorrow from Me (2 Cor. 2:2), for I cause sorrow for your benefit—to save you rather than to destroy you—as I care for the son I hold dear.”

39. Impose upon yourself the commandment not to eat fish, and see how the enemy will then begin to relentlessly drive you toward a craving for fish, and how you yourself will likewise begin to rush frantically toward tasting what you ought not even to desire, so that you may experience, as it were, what happened to Adam; for he, too, upon hearing, “You must not eat from this tree”—this one forbidden thing—rushed toward it with all his desire.

40. God saves some through wisdom, and others through simplicity and gentleness; for you must know that God will not reject the gentle.

41. Those who devote themselves more earnestly to prayer are subjected to more terrible and fierce temptations.

42. If you are predestined for dispassion, do not give in to carelessness, but strive with all your strength to attain it. For “we groan, longing to be clothed with our heavenly dwelling, so that what is mortal may be swallowed up by life” (2 Cor. 5:2:4), not only physically with the end of the world, but also spiritually here and now, as a pledge. For “death has been swallowed up in victory” (1 Cor. 15:54). And all the Egyptians who pursue us and insult us will be swallowed up by the waves of the power sent to us from heaven.

43. If you have forgotten the one who said, “I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9:27), and, “Take heed to yourselves, that you may not fall” (1 Cor. 10:12)—and also: “Watch yourselves” (a word to the spiritual), “lest you also be tempted” (Gal. 6:1), —if you have forgotten Solomon’s straying from the right path and his transgressions, after such great grace;—if you have consigned to oblivion the great Peter’s unexpected denial: then rely on your own reason, take pride in your way of life, boast of the length of your great asceticism, and give way to pride. – But, O brother, do not become lazy (lying back idly), and do not give in to carelessness—but rather fear, as long as there is breath in your nostrils, even if you have reached the age of Moses, and pray, saying: “O Lord, do not cast me off in my old age; when my strength fails, do not forsake me, O God, my Savior! In You I will sing my song” (Ps. 70:9, 6).

44. The Lord says to you, as He did to Matthew: “Follow Me” (Matt. 9:9). – If now, as you eagerly follow your long-desired Lord along the path of life, you stumble with your foot over a stone of passion and suddenly fall into sin, or if, encountering muddy places, you frequently and unwittingly slip and fall; then as many times as you happen to fall and cause excruciating pain to your body, so many times, rising again with your former zeal, run in the footsteps of your Lord until you reach Him. Thus, “in holy meditation, I have appeared before You, to see Your saving power and Your glory; and in the name of Your name I will lift up my hands, and I will be filled with joy and gladness, and my mouth will sing a song to You” (Ps. 62:3–6). It is a great honor for me to have received the name “Christian,” as the Lord tells me through the mouth of Isaiah: “It is a great thing for you to be called My servant” (Isa. 49:6).

45. Where it is said that “the Father will give good things to those who ask Him” (Matt. 7:11), and where it is said that “He will give the Holy Spirit to those who ask Him” (Luke 11:13): These words teach that God’s prayerful servants are deemed worthy not only of the forgiveness of sins but also of heavenly gifts, being strengthened in their seeking by the thought that the Lord has promised such blessings not to the righteous but to sinners. Therefore, ask persistently and with unwavering resolve, even though you are not perfect in a virtuous life, are weak, and are unworthy of anything—and you will receive great things.

46. Let the unbeliever or the one of little faith consider how an ant takes flight and how a certain worm becomes a bird, and how many other wondrous phenomena occur among creatures; so that, having cast aside the infirmity of unbelief and despair in this way, he may finally take flight and, like a tree, bring forth glorious knowledge. For “I am,” says the Lord, “the one who brings life to the dry tree and revives the withered bones” (Ezek. 17:24; 37:4 and 9).

47. Let us by no means, for the sake of bodily needs, waste away in worry; but let us believe in God with all our soul, as a certain good man once said: “Trust in the Lord, and He will trust in you”—and as the blessed Apostle Peter writes: “Be self-controlled and alert in your prayers” (1 Peter 4:7)—cast all your anxieties upon God, for He cares for you (1 Peter 5:7). If you still doubt and do not believe that He cares for you and will provide for you, look at the spider and consider how different a person is from a spider—a spider, I say, weaker and more powerless than anything else. Yet it has no possessions, makes no journeys far and wide, does not sue or get angry, and has no storehouses; it spends its life in perfect meekness, chastity, and utter silence, takes no interest in the affairs of others, but does his own thing and quietly and serenely goes about his business, thereby silently telling those who love idleness that one who is unwilling to work should not eat; and he is so silent that he far surpasses Pythagoras himself, whom the Greeks admire more than any other philosopher for his feat of self-restraint in speech; Pythagoras did not speak to everyone, but would occasionally converse secretly with his friends; he would also sometimes address oxen and eagles, uttering words that were laughable and nonsensical; he abstained entirely from wine and drank only water. The spider surpassed Pythagoras’s restraint of speech with its perfect silence; and it surpassed his abstinence from wine by shunning even water. In this silent state dwells the weak and humble spider, unwilling to go out and wander here and there, nor to indulge excessively in labor and weariness; and He who dwells on high, looking down upon the humble (and there is nothing more humble than a spider), extending His providence even to it, sends it a small catch daily, near its dwelling, causing small insects to be caught in its web for its sustenance.

48. Perhaps someone enslaved by gluttony will say: “I eat a great deal, and since I spend so much as a result, I cannot help but become entangled in many worldly cares and transactions.” But let even such a person look at the great whales grazing in the Atlantic Ocean, how abundantly they are nourished by God and never experience hunger, even though each of these beasts eats as many fish as even the most populous city cannot consume in a day. “All look to You; give them their food in due season,” sings the Holy Prophet (Ps. 107:27). Whether one eats much or little, God provides for both. Hearing this, you too—who have a vast and spacious belly—entrust your whole self to God and faith, casting aside every worldly concern and an overly anxious mind, and do not be unfaithful, but be faithful.

49. If we truly desire to please God and be most blissfully loved by Him, let us present our mind to God naked, carrying nothing from this world with us or within us—neither skill, nor knowledge, nor sophistical reasoning—even if we have studied all the wisdom of the world. For God turns away from those who approach Him with a conceited disposition, nourished by vanity and arrogance. Some commentators have rightly described vain self-conceit as self-indulgence and self-aggrandizement.

50. How can we overcome sin that has already taken root? Self-discipline is necessary (or forcing one’s will against one’s desires). For it is said: “A man toils with his own hands and drives away” (forcibly drives away) “his own destruction” (Prov. 16:26), always striving to direct his thoughts and heart toward holiness. The law does not forbid using force to overcome force (i.e., the force of sin with the force of good aspirations). When we apply self-discipline to some good endeavor (i.e., we force ourselves to put a good aspiration into action), then we await the power that is to come to us from on high, dwelling in Jerusalem (Luke 24:49)—that is, by remaining in unceasing prayer and other virtues—until this mighty power comes to us, a power that acts not like our feeble efforts, but one that cannot be expressed by bodily lips, powerfully overcoming and subduing both sinful nature and the malice of demons, overcoming the inclination of our souls toward evil, and overcoming all unseemly bodily impulses. “There was,” he says, “a noise from heaven, like a violent wind” (Acts 3: 2), to forcefully drive out from us the evil that constantly draws us toward what is evil.

51. “The enemy lies in wait in his snare, like a lion in his lair” (Ps. 9:30), hiding from us the snares and nets of impure and ungodly thoughts; but we, too, if we do not sleep, can set even greater and more dangerous snares, nets, and ambushes for him. For prayer and psalms, vigil and humility, service to others and mercy, thanksgiving, and listening to the divine words—these are an ambush for the enemy; and a snare, and a pit, and scourges, and nets, and a stranglehold.

52. Having lived to a ripe old age, the divine David, giving thanks to God who chose him, says at the end of his confession of God’s blessings: “Now Your servant has found the courage to pray to You with this prayer.” This is said to help us understand that it requires great effort and much time spent in prayer to attain the beginnings of a serene disposition of the heart—this other, certain “heaven of the heart”—where Christ dwells, as the Apostle says: “Or do you not know that Jesus Christ is in you?” (2 Cor. 13: 5)?

53. If Christ “has become for us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30), then clearly He is also our rest. For He says, “Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Matt. 11:28). It is therefore fitting to say that He became the Sabbath for mankind, that is, rest. For the human race can find rest only in Christ alone.

54. Just as there is a cup of falling and a cup of wrath, so there is also a cup of weakness, which the Lord, having received from us, delivers into the hands of our enemies at the proper time, so that it is not we but the demons who grow weak and fall.

55. Just as in external affairs there are money changers, weavers, bird catchers, soldiers, and builders, so too, in internal affairs, understand that there are also, in our thoughts, gamblers, poisoners, pirates, hunters, fornicators, murderers, and the like; such must be driven out immediately by pious resistance and prayer, especially the fornicators, so that they do not defile the holy place and do not make the man of God abominable.

56. The Lord grants salvation not only through words, as was the case with the thief who cried out to Him from the cross, but also through thoughts. Thus, the woman with the issue of blood recognized within herself (that is, she thought with faith): “If I but touch the hem of His garment, I will be healed” (Matt. 9:21); and Abraham’s servant “spoke to God in his heart” concerning Rebekah (Gen. 24:15).

57. The sin that has been committed almost immediately drives the repentant person to God, as soon as he perceives the stench, the burden, and the frenzy of sin. But whoever does not wish to turn to repentance is not driven by sin toward God; rather, sin holds him captive and binds him with unbreakable bonds, intensifying his destructive desires to the utmost.

58. Guard yourself against the spells of Jezebel (2 Kings 9:22), the most vicious of which are thoughts of pride and vain glory. You can rid yourself of them, by the grace of God, if you humble and mortify your soul, and cast yourself down before the Lord, calling upon Him to help you and confessing that the deliverance you seek is a heavenly gift. That is why it is said: “No one can receive anything unless it is given to him from heaven” (John 3:27).

59. It sometimes happens that, during a brotherhood gathering, a vain thought breaks through, prompting you to say something out of turn; but angelic thoughts inspire you to drive away this talkative, untimely thought. — Therefore, if you do not drive it away with virtuous silence, but allow it to come out, having been puffed up with conceit, then you will have to suffer the evil consequences of it—being justly subjected either to an even greater sin, or to some external misfortunes, or to severe troubles from the brethren, or to torment in the age to come: for even for an idle and vain word—spoken out of an untrained tongue, we will give an account; which is why we must carefully guard our tongues.

60. Those who are tempted by sensual pleasures, anger, vainglory, and other passions are described as being scorched by the sun by day and by the moon by night (Ps. 120: 6). Therefore, pray that the divine, dew-bestowing cloud may overshadow you, so that you may avoid the enemy’s scorching heat.

61. By no means grant bold access to yourself to those who love drunkenness and are slaves to riotous feasts, nor to those who are eager to speak shameless words, even if they are grayed by age and even if they have led a monastic life for a long time; lest their corruption cover you as well, and you be counted among the unclean and the uncircumcised of heart.

62. First, the keys are entrusted to Peter, and then he is permitted to fall into denial of Christ the Lord, so that through such a fall his self-conceit might be humbled. So too, if—having received the key of understanding—you fall prey to various temptations, do not be surprised by this; but glorify the one all-wise Lord, who, through these falls, curbs the pride that follows in the wake of divine knowledge: for temptations are a bridle, by God’s providence, capable of restraining human arrogance.

63. If the Lord often takes away our blessings, as, for example, He took away Job’s wealth—for “the Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away” (Job 1:21)—then surely the evil that the Eternal One has brought upon us will also be taken from our hands; for, as the wise man says, “Both good and evil come from the Lord” (Sir. 11:14). And He who brings evil upon us is the same One who grants us eternal joy with eternal glory. “Just as I watched over you,” says the Lord, “to destroy you and bring evil upon you, so I will rebuild you and no longer destroy you; I will plant you and no longer uproot you.” Let the popular proverb be silenced, which says: “Once things have turned for the worse, they will never be good again.” For He who has changed our affairs for the worse can certainly, once again, unexpectedly turn them into the brightest of circumstances.

64. The one who attacks the demons with greater strength and determination—whether through self-control, prayer, or some other virtue—will himself receive the deepest wounds from them, to the point that he will even fall into despair, suspecting that the condemnation of spiritual death weighs upon his soul, and will be compelled to cry out: “Who will deliver me from this body of death?” (Rom. 8:24); for the enemy compels me against my will to obey his laws.

65. It is not merely written, as some have said to one another: “Arise, let us go to the people who live in hope and dwell in peace” (Judg. 18: 9–10); and again: “Come, let us go up to Judah, and after speaking to them” with deceitful words, “we will turn them away from” the truth (Isa. 7: 5–6). Thus, the evil demons usually sharpen the swords of temptation against those who have chosen a life of silence, and they attack those who are more devout and God-fearing with greater fury, luring them into sin even through acts of piety itself, with unspeakable slander; so that, at least in this way, they might be turned away from faith in Christ, from prayer, and from hope, and thus be overcome. But we, O Lord, speaking with David (Ps. 79:19), will not depart from You until You have mercy on us and those who devour us are driven away from us; we will not depart from You until You command those who tempt us to depart from us, and we are revived by patience and steadfast dispassion. For temptation is the very essence of human life, and often, at a specific time, the One who sets our trials allows us to fall at the feet of strangers; but it is the nature of a great and valiant soul not to despair in the face of sorrowful misfortunes.

66. If the devil is so powerful that he can, even when a person does not wish it, bend him and draw him to his own will, because of his departure from his true, natural order; how much more powerful, then, is the Angel who, at a certain time, having received a command from God, can transform a person’s entire disposition for the better? And if the icy north is so powerful that it transforms the softest nature of water into the hardness of stone, what then cannot the warmest south accomplish? If the air, when extremely chilled, subjugates everything to itself and fills all with its cold—for “who can stand before the face of the frost?” (Ps. 147:6)—How, then, can heat fail to transform everything according to its own nature? For who can stand before the face of heat? Let us therefore believe that even the cold, black coal of our mind will someday—or sooner—become hot and radiant through the touch of the divine fire.

67. Even in this present age, with faithful testimony and signs manifesting in our inner Joseph, there is a state of dispassion in which our mind, having departed from Egypt, is freed from passionate desires and the hidden, most shameful bondage, and hears a language it did not know— not the language of demons, which is impure and corrupts sound reason, but the holy language of the Angels, who transform the mind from the corporeal to the incorporeal—a language that enlightens the soul that receives it.

68. I have heard some brothers who are severely afflicted in body and unable to observe fasting ask me: How can we be delivered from the devil and the passions without fasting? To such one must reply that not only by abstaining from food, but also by crying out to God from the heart, you can destroy and drive away evil impulses and those who stir them up. For it is said: “They cried out to the Lord in their distress, and He delivered them from their troubles” (Ps. 106:6); and it is also written: “From the belly of hell I cried out; You heard my voice: ‘Let my life rise from the grave’” (Jonah 2:3, 7). Why? “Until,” it says, “the iniquity—that is, the burden of sin—passes away, I will cry out to God on high” (Ps. 56: 23), so that, granting me the greatest blessing, He may destroy the very root of sin by His power, wipe out the idols of the passionate mind, and reveal to those free from idolatry our weaknesses, which are full of idols. Therefore, if you have not received the gift of self-control, know that the Lord, for the sake of your prayer and hope, desires to hear you when you call out to Him. Now that you have learned of the Lord’s judgment concerning you, do not grieve over your inability to undertake the feat of fasting, but rather strive to rid yourself of the enemy through prayer and good-natured patience. If thoughts of weakness and suffering drive you out of the city of fasting, flee to another (Matt. 10:23)—that is, to the city of prayer and thanksgiving.

69. Pharaoh said in prayer, “May God take this death away from me”—and he was heard; likewise, the demons who begged the Lord not to command them to go into the abyss received what they asked for. Will not a Christian, praying for deliverance from spiritual death, be heard all the more?

70. There is a time when one is enlightened and comforted by divine grace, but when that grace wanes, one falls into mental agitation and unseemly desires and grumbles about it, or succumbs to useless despondency, rather than zealously striving through prayer to restore within oneself that saving disposition; is like a poor man who, having received alms from the King’s palace, resents not having been ushered inside to recline at the King’s table.

71. “Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed” (John 20:29)—just as blessed are those who, humbled by the workings of grace, finding no comfort within themselves but instead facing a succession of sorrows and deep darkness, do not fall into despair, but, strengthened by faith, endure valiantly, confident that they see the unseen.

72. Humility, granted by God’s grace in due time—after many struggles, battles, and tears—to those who seek it, is incomparably stronger and loftier than the humility found in those who have strayed from virtue. Those who are deemed worthy of it are truly perfect men.

73. When the devil left the Lord, “the angels came to Him and ministered to Him” (Matt. 4:11). And just as it is not written that the angels were present during the Lord’s temptation, so too, when we are tempted at any time, the angels do not stray far away; then, after the tempters have departed, they come to us and serve us, offering divine thoughts, confirmation, enlightenment, contrition, consolation, patience, delight, and everything that saves, strengthens, and restores the soul that has labored in the struggle. It was said to Nathanael: “From now on, you will see angels ascending and descending upon the Son of Man” (John 1: 51), that is, from now on, the service and help of the angels will be poured out abundantly upon the human race.

74. Remember the High Priest, at whose right hand the devil stood to oppose him (Zech. 3:1)—that is, every righteous thought, word, and deed—so that you may not be astonished when something similar happens.

75. A monk must understand what weakness is, as in the words: “Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am weak” (Ps. 6:3), and what a turning away from God is—this is the disease of the devil and his angels.

76. Just as iron becomes impervious to fire’s penetration, so frequent prayers make the mind most powerful in the battle against the enemy; that is why the demons strive with all their might to weaken us through laziness so that we do not persevere in prayer, knowing that it is hostile to them and a weapon for the mind in battle.

77. David commended the zeal of those who had gone out with him from Ziklag against the foreigners, even though they had grown weary and remained by the stream of Bosor.⁷⁹ Why, upon returning victorious from the battle against the barbarians, and hearing some say that those who had sat by the stream out of exhaustion should not be given a share of the spoils—and seeing that they were ashamed and had nothing to say—the most gracious David defended them, saying: they had been stationed by the goods to guard them, and he set aside for them a portion equal to that which he had given to the warriors who had fought valiantly and cheerfully (1 Sam. 30: 21). Consider now this: if in any brother who at first showed fervent zeal [for the practices of fasting, vigil, and the like] and then grew somewhat lax in them, we assume that his inner virtues (his good dispositions) —faith, repentance, humility, weeping, patience, hope, generosity, and so on—then this person, who clings to them and patiently abides in them while awaiting Christ Jesus the Lord, even though weak in outward deeds, will receive, as is fitting, a certain eternal gift.

78. Those who have devoted themselves entirely to God, both in action and in contemplation, are called Levites and priests; and the “Levitical cattle” (Num. 3) are those who, though powerless to walk steadfastly along the path of virtue, nevertheless delight in virtue, desire it unceasingly, and strive for it to the best of their ability, even if they do not always succeed because of the evil that robs them of their strength. But in due time, they too—we may hope—will receive the gift of dispassion, by God’s love for mankind alone. For it is said: “You have heard the desire of the poor, O Lord” (Ps. 9:38).

79. We often notice and see the blows that the enemy inflicts upon us, both openly and covertly; but the torments and vexations he endures from us—whether we excel in virtue, repent of our sins, endure insults, bear misfortunes with equanimity, persevere in prayer, or perform other acts of piety—which tear him apart, torment him, weeps and is broken—all of this, by God’s providence, we do not see, lest we become proud. “For it is righteous before God,” as the Apostle says, “to repay with affliction those who afflict you” (1 Thess. 1:6).

80. If a stump, whether on the ground or on a rock, sprouts shoots from the moisture of the water, just as a newly planted tree does, then it is possible for us as well—when we are revived by the power of the Holy Spirit—to bring forth the incorruptibility that we have received by nature and to bear fruit, just as a newly planted tree does, even though we have fallen into the old man.

⁷⁹ The entire company that set out from Sekelag numbered 600 men. Two hundred of them, having reached the Vazorova stream, lacked the strength to go any further. David left them there to guard the supplies and continued on with 400. – Their zeal, of course, is evident in the way they set out.

81. To the soul that despairs because of the abundance of temptations and the multitude of sins, and says, “Hope is lost; we are doomed,” what does God, who does not despair of our salvation, say? “You will live, and you will see that I am the Lord” (Ezek. 37:6). But to the soul that wonders by what power and through what virtues it might be born again in Christ, it is said: “The Holy Spirit will come upon you” (Luke 1:35). Where the Holy Spirit is present, do not seek the laws of nature or the usual sequence of causes and effects. For the almighty and worshiped Holy Spirit will bring about in you, by His power, what is impossible by nature, so that you will be amazed. Moreover, He will now reveal your mind—which was once overcome—as a victor. For the Comforter, who descends upon us from above, is above all things; and He will raise you above all natural impulses and demonic passions.

82. Strive to preserve the radiance of your noble mind unharmed. If you begin to look upon everything with passion, it means that the Lord has darkened you, has cast a veil over your face—and “the light of your eyes is not with you” (Ps. 37:11). However, even if you do have this, do not grow weary or lose heart, but pray with Saint David: “Send forth Your light and Your truth to me, who am darkened by despondency—the salvation of my face and my God” (Ps. 42:3, 5); “Send forth Your Spirit, and they shall be created, and You shall renew the face of the earth” (Ps. 103: 30).

83. Blessed is the one who insatiably feasts on prayers and psalms here, day and night, and strengthens himself with the glorious reading of Scripture; for such communion will bring the soul inexhaustible joy in the age to come.

84. Strive with all your strength not to fall; for it is not fitting for a strong warrior to fall; but if you should happen to fall, rise quickly and stand once more in the good struggle. Even if the former—the fall—should happen to you ten times, due to the withdrawal of grace, let the latter—the rising—happen to you ten times as well. And so it shall be until the end of your life. For it is written, “If the righteous falls seven times, he will rise seven times” (Prov. 24:16). As long as you hold fast to the weapon of the holy schema (that is, the resolve to serve God), with tears and supplication to God, you are counted among those who stand firm, even if you fall often. As long as you remain with the monks, like a valiant warrior, you will receive wounds from the front—for which you will be praised, because even while wounded, you did not yield, did not give in, and did not retreat. But if you turn away from the monks, you will receive wounds from behind, like a fugitive and a coward who has lost his bearings and abandoned the ranks.

85. Despair is worse than sin. Judas the traitor was fainthearted and unskilled in battle; that is why he fell into despair; and the enemy, rushing in, threw a noose around him. But Peter—that firm rock—having suffered a terrible fall, like one skilled in battle, did not lose heart or despair in his extreme sorrow, but leaping to his feet, he shed the bitterest tears from a contrite and humble heart; and our adversary, seeing this, as if struck in the face by the fiercest flame, immediately recoiled and fled far away, uttering fierce cries.

86. Against the following three passions, a monk must wage an unrelenting battle to the very end: against gluttony, against vanity, and against the love of money, which is idolatry.

87. A certain king of Israel defeated the people of the troglodytes and other barbarians allied with them through psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, sung to the accompaniment of David’s instruments and with his words (2 Chron. 12:3; 20:22). You, too, have these barbaric troglodytes—demons—oppressing your senses and limbs, tormenting your flesh with lust, and inciting you to look, listen, and smell with passion; to speak indecent words; to have eyes full of fornication; and to be confused both inwardly and outwardly, in the manner of Babylon. Take care, then, to utterly destroy these troglodytes who are doing evil within you, through great faith, and through psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs.

88. Just as the Lord desires that man be saved through man, so the devil strives to ensure that man be destroyed through man. That is why one must not associate with a scornful, malicious, or talkative person, lest one end up in hell along with him. For even those who draw close to the righteous barely manage to attain salvation. But if anyone associates with a deceitful person without fear, he will meet with shipwreck, just as with a plague or leprosy. And who would pity someone who approaches a dragon with a cheerful face? Flee, then, from those who are untrained in the use of the tongue, from sowers of discord, and from those who are restless both within and without.

89. Whoever wishes to be called wise, sensible, and a friend of God should strive earnestly to present his soul to the Lord just as he received it from Him—pure, unblemished, and entirely blameless. For this, he will be crowned in heaven and blessed by the angels.

90. A single kind word once made that once-wicked robber pure and holy and led him into paradise. And a single unkind word barred Moses from entering the Promised Land. Let us not, then, regard loose speech as a minor affliction; for the slanderers and the gossipers shut the Kingdom of Heaven against themselves. – Though a man of the world may still achieve some success here, there he will have none, “but the wicked will be caught in their own destruction” (Ps. 139: 12). A certain wise man rightly said that it is better to fall from a height to the ground than to fall because of one’s tongue. We must therefore heed St. James, who writes: “Let every person be quick to listen and slow to speak” (James 1:19).

91. So that we do not drift away or become distracted, seduced by vanity, it is good to heed the Prophet, who says: “Come, my people, enter your sanctuary”—the sanctuary of your heart, hidden from every sensory impression, that formless dwelling illuminated by dispassion and the shadow of holy grace— “shut your doors” against all that is visible, “take refuge, however small it may be”—for all human life is small—and after this he adds: “until the wrath of the Lord has passed” (Isa. 26: 20), as another said: “until the lawlessness has passed” (Ps. 56:2). For lawlessness—and consequently demons, passions, and sins—are the wrath of God, as Isaiah says to God: “You were angry, and we have sinned” (64:5). A person avoids this wrath by constantly listening to his heart in prayer and striving earnestly to remain within, in his inner, impregnable sanctuary. For, as someone says, “Draw wisdom into your innermost being” (cf. Prov. 8:12; Sirach 45: 31; 51:18); for “all the glory of the king’s daughter is within” (Ps. 44:14), says another, adding: “This is the task before me, until I enter the sanctuary of God” (Ps. 72:17), “and the mountain of my inheritance” (Ps. 67: 17), “to the prepared dwelling” (Ps. 32: 14), which You, O Lord, have made “in the sanctuary prepared by Your hands” (Ps. 77: 54).

92. Let anyone who truly wishes to renounce the world imitate the blessed Prophet Elisha, who took nothing of his possessions with him, driven by his great love for God, which burned within him like a flame. Let him distribute all that he has to the needy, and having thus taken up the Cross of the Lord, let him willingly go to a voluntary death—the gateway to the eternal kingdom.

93. When you sense that the Amorite is gaining strength within you like an oak, pray earnestly to the Lord that He may dry up its fruit from above—that is, the sin committed in deed—and its roots from below—that is, impure thoughts. And may the Lord drive the Amorite from your presence!

94. Do not be surprised when you see those who mock our silence, for they themselves cannot remain silent; rather, drive away their evil influence through song, yet without malice, strengthening within yourselves your greater obedience to God, and crying out in song: “But my soul, obey God” (Ps. 61: 6); “For instead of loving me, they slandered me, yet I prayed” (Ps. 108: 4), for the healing of both myself and them.

95. Unless a strong wind blows on the sea, there will be no waves; and unless a demon attacks us, neither the soul nor the body will be stirred up by passions.

96. If you are always warmed by prayer and divine grace, then, as the divine Scripture says, you are clothed in the armor of light. Your garment is warm, while your enemies are clothed, as if in a double garment, in shame and trembling from the cold.

97. Keeping your sins in mind, do not be lazy about striking your chest, so that with such blows you may break up and soften your hardened heart, just as stonemasons break up metal-bearing soil; and you will find a vein of gold within it, and you will rejoice over the hidden treasure.

98. May the fire of desire for the highest goods and of holy contemplation of the words of the Spirit burn ceaselessly on the altar of your soul.

99. If you always strive to “put on the readiness to preach the gospel of peace” (Eph. 6:15), then you will certainly set things right both in your own home and in the home of your neighbor. But if you lose heart (when faced with adversity), you will be spurned invisibly, and according to the law, you will “inherit the name of one whose boot has been removed” (Deut. 25:9–10).

100. If, according to John, God is love, then whoever loves abides in God, and God abides in him. Whoever hates his neighbor, breaking the bond of love, has evidently received hatred instead of love. For the one who hates his fellow man, who is of the same nature as himself, is far from God, “for God is love, and whoever abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him” (1 John 4:16). To Him be glory and power forever. Amen.

Blessed Abba Zosima (Palestinian)

A Brief Account of Him

An ancient Latin translator of the conversations of the Venerable Zosima prefaces them with the following: “I hold these conversations in high esteem and value them greatly, because of the true nature of ascetic deeds clearly set forth in them, because of the abundant spiritual anointing with which they are imbued, and because of the sweetest fragrance of holiness they exude. I have never transcribed anything so willingly, nor have I ever translated anything with such joy in my heart. This led me to investigate who their author was and in what era he flourished, since neither fact was definitively known. “Not many of the Conversations have survived. They were apparently recorded by a devoted listener as he received them from the lips of an elderly elder who, during his many years of monastic life, had passed through all the degrees of Christian perfection and ascended to the very summit of holiness accessible to mortal humanity, with the help of divine grace. The author of the conversations is referred to as the blessed Abba Zosima. The only hint given about the recorder is that he was one of Abba Zosima’s constant listeners and was likely a brother at the monastery where Abba Zosima lived, near the Jordan River. “But who, then, is this blessed Abba Zosima? After a long and careful investigation into this matter, this is what I have finally concluded: that the author of our conversations is none other than the renowned Zosima, who was chosen from above to hear about the life of St. Mary of Egypt, the penitent, from her own lips, and to provide guidance to and bury this venerable mother.” He supports this view by pointing out that certain circumstances in the life of Abba Zosima, who delivers these teachings, are similar to those in the life of Abba Zosima, who saw St. Mary of Egypt and recounted her story.

1. The account of the life of St. Mary of Egypt states that Abba Zosima, having entered a certain monastery at a young age, lived there for 53 years; then, following a special inspiration from above, he moved to one of the monasteries along the Jordan River; and as he was leaving that place, he saw St. Mary. And in these very conversations, it is mentioned that Abba Zosima, who spoke them, had previously lived in a certain monastery in Tyre (ch. 24); then these conversations show him passing through Naples (in Samaria, ch. 14); and finally at the monastery of St. Gerasimus (ch. 2). The latter references clearly explain the former.

2. In the account of St. Mary, it is said of Abba Zosima that he was rich in spiritual experience and that, for this reason, many sought his counsel—not only from his own monastery but also from others near and far (p. 2—in Greek). It is clear that he did not like to write, but only spoke. Nor did he write the legend about St. Mary; rather, he passed it on orally, as it had been preserved among the brethren until St. Sophronius committed it to writing. That the author of these very instructions was the same is proven by the very manner of their presentation: he was asked, and he spoke. His twenty-ninth conversation takes place at the monastery of St. Gerasimus. It is reasonable to assume that all the others were also heard there and recorded by one of his closest disciples.

3. Abba Zosima, the author of these teachings, who loved to quote the sayings of the Fathers, cites all the earliest elders, and does so in such a way that the memory of them was still fresh at that time. This points to the end of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century. It is believed that St. Mary of Egypt passed away around the year 430. Abba Zosima moved to a monastery on the banks of the Jordan River at, one might estimate, the age of seventy. He lived in this monastery for about thirty years, for he passed away at the age of one hundred. For someone who lived in the first half of the fifth century, the sayings of the fourth-century elders would have been fresh in his memory. Such indications, which must be accepted when identifying the author of the conversations, also determine the time of their origin and how they came to be. Abba spoke; a disciple eager for spiritual edification wrote it down. Thus, all the conversations begin: “Abba Zosima spoke, or said, or recounted.” There is no doubt that just as many conversations were held, so many were recorded. These conversations appear to be an excerpt that was seen and read by John Moschus, the compiler of the Spiritual Meadow (Limonarium). The feast day of the Venerable Zosima is April 4. In the Patrology, ed. Migne, these conversations are included in vol. 78. They are also found in the manuscript Paterikon from the monastery of St. Savvas the Palestinian, where they appear at the end of the first chapter as an appendix. In the manuscript, the conversations are presented without any division. In the printed edition, there are 14 sections; however, some of these sections contain more than one conversation. In the translation, it was deemed more appropriate to treat each instruction and each narrative as a separate entry. This was all the more necessary because not all the conversations are included in the printed edition, and some of those that are included are not presented in their entirety. This resulted in 31 sections.

The Discourses of Blessed Abba Zosima

1. Making the sign of the cross over his lips, Blessed Zosima began to speak thus: God the Word, having become incarnate, bestowed great grace upon those who believed and have faith in Him. It is possible even in our time to believe and to begin doing so from now on, if we so desire. For if our will desires it and grace works within us, then anyone who desires it can regard the whole world as nothing. Then he picked up whatever came to hand—a straw, it seems, or a splinter, or some other trifle—and added: Who, because of this, would quarrel or argue, hold a grudge, or be consumed by grief, except perhaps one who has truly lost his mind? Will not a man of God, who prospers and presses on in life according to God, regard the whole world as no more valuable than this straw, even if he truly possessed everything? For, as I always say, it is not harmful to lack, but it is harmful to possess with attachment. Who does not know that, of all that we possess, nothing is more precious to us than our body? Therefore, if, when the time demands it, we are commanded to disregard even our body, how much more so should we disregard everything else we possess besides it? However, one should not simply scatter one's possessions haphazardly, just as one should not indiscriminately throw oneself into death: for such behavior is characteristic only of one who has lost his mind; but one must wait until the time demands it, so that one may then be ready for such a task. At this, he recalled a brother who had vegetables, and said: Did he not sow them? Did he not labor? Did he not harvest them? Did he not fertilize them? Yet he did not uproot them indiscriminately or cast them aside; rather, he treated them as if he did not possess them at all. That is why, when an elder came to him with the intention of testing him and began to uproot them, he did not even show himself to him but hid; and when only one root remained, he said to him, "If you wish, Father, leave this one, and we will make a feast out of it." From this, the holy elder recognized that he was a true servant of God, not a servant of vegetables, and said to him, "The Spirit of God has rested upon you, brother."—If he had been attached to the vegetables, he would have immediately revealed this through sorrow and confusion; but he showed that he regarded them as if he did not possess them at all. And Abba Zosima concluded: Demons take note of such instances; and if they see that someone is dispassionate toward material things, untroubled by their loss, they understand from this that he walks upon the earth but does not possess earthly wisdom within himself.

2. All power lies in the aspirations of the will. A fervent will can, in a single hour, bring God more of what is pleasing to Him than the labors of a long time without it. A sluggish and lazy will is inactive.

3. Demons are afraid when they see that someone, being subjected to insults, dishonor, losses, and all manner of other misfortunes, grieves not because he has suffered these things, but because, having suffered them, he did not endure them courageously: for they understand from this that he has set out on the true path and has a firm desire to walk perfectly according to God's commandments. — At this, Abba Zosima recalled St. Pachomius and how he had acted when his elder brother rebuked him, saying, "Stop, driven by vanity, from expanding the monastery." St. Pachomius was doing this by a commandment from above. Why, when he heard this, did he—as if standing up for a good cause—feel a surge of indignation; yet he said nothing against his brother at that time. But when night fell and the unpleasant stirring in his heart subsided, he went into his small prayer room and began to weep and pray, saying: "O God! I still have carnal thoughts within me; I still live according to the flesh. Woe is me! As such, 'I must die,' according to Scripture (Rom. 8:13). After such struggles, after such preparation of the heart, I am once again carried away by anger, even though it is for a good cause. Have mercy on me, Lord, lest I perish completely! For if You do not establish me completely in goodness, and the enemy finds a foothold in me—even the smallest one—I will be his captive: "For whoever keeps the whole law but stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it" (James 2:10). But I believe that if You, in Your great generosity, help me, I will finally learn to walk in the way of Your saints, always "pressing on toward what is ahead" (Phil. 3: 13), and I will put the enemy to shame as I ought. "Otherwise, Lord, how will I teach those whom You will call to live this life alongside me, if I do not first conquer myself and the enemy?" He remained in such prayer all night, speaking these words with weeping until daybreak; and from the sweat beneath his feet a pool of water formed, for it was harvest time, and the place was very hot. "I am amazed at this," said the blessed Zosima, "for his tears knew no bounds. How could God not grant such a fervent will all the blessings sought from Him, when it is dead to everything else but this?"

4. Abba Zosima also said: When someone, having brought to mind one who has insulted him, or caused him harm, or reviled and slandered him, or done him some other evil, devises schemes against him, he brings slander upon himself just like the demons; and then he himself is enough to bring slander upon him. And what do I mean by “when he devises schemes”?—If he does not remember him as a benefactor and a healer, then he is treating him most unjustly. For he brings to the surface the very passion from which you suffer, in order to heal it; and you must therefore remember him as a healer sent to you by Christ. For Christ’s sake, you must endure everything, in gratitude to Him for such a blessing. But if you do not make proper use of this and do not turn away from your evil passion, God is not to blame for this. The very fact that you suffer is a sign that your soul is sick; if you were not sick, you would not suffer. Therefore, you must be grateful for the fact that through it you have come to know the course of your illness, and you must accept with love what you have endured from it as a healing remedy sent by the Lord Jesus Himself. But if you not only fail to give thanks but take offense, rebel against it, complain, and devise schemes against it; then by doing so you are, as it were, saying to the Lord Jesus: “I do not want to be healed by You; I do not want to accept Your healing; I want to rot in my wounds; I want to be subject to demons. I do not know the Lord; and who is He that I should obey His voice (Ex. 5:2)? And what, in the end, will the Lord do?”—The Lord, being gracious toward our infirmities, has given us commandments for their healing, such as cauterization and purgatives. Therefore, whoever desires and seeks to be healed must endure in silence—even if it is painful—whatever the physician prescribes. After all, even one who is physically ill does not find it pleasant to endure incisions and cauterizations, or to take purgatives; but, being convinced that without this it is impossible to be rid of the illness, he entrusts himself to the doctor’s care, confident that through this slight pain that lies before him, he will be delivered from a severe internal disorder and a long-standing illness. But the “cauterizer,” Jesus—the Christ—is the one who inflicts offenses and harm.

5. He said further: “Destroy temptations and thoughts—and there will not be a single saint.” He who flees from the saving temptation flees from eternal life. One of the Saints says: “Who bestowed those crowns upon the holy martyrs, if not their tormentors? Who granted St. Stephen such glory surrounding him, if not those who stoned him?”—adding to this the saying of another Saint, who said: “I do not blame those who revile me; on the contrary, I call them my benefactors and honor them as such; nor do I reject the Physician of souls, who administers the medicine of dishonor to my vain soul, for fear that He might one day say to my soul: ‘I have healed Babylon, but she is not healed’ (Jer. 51: 9); and again: ‘How often I wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing! Behold, your house is left to you desolate’ (Luke 13: 34, 35).

6. He also said: Evagrius feared that the Lord, in rebuking him, might say to him: “You were afflicted with vanity, and I prescribed for you the medicine of disgrace so that you might be purified through it; but you were not healed.” – Let us therefore know that no one speaks the plain truth about us except the one who rebukes us. The Lord, who searches hearts and minds, knows that even if all people were to praise and flatter us, our whole being is nonetheless worthy of rebuke and the reproach of reproachful words. If they say, “You did such-and-such,” I will reply, “But what good is there in all that I have done?”—No one speaks a lie about me except those who praise and flatter me, and no one speaks the truth about me except those who rebuke and humiliate me; and even they do not yet speak the whole truth about me. If they were to learn—not the whole sea of my evil deeds, but only a part of them—they would be repelled by the stench and foul odor of my soul. If every limb of the human body were to turn into a tongue to rebuke us, I am convinced that even then they would not be able to fully express our dishonor. Every accuser condemns only a certain part; he cannot know the whole. If Job says, “I am full of shame” (Job 10:15), and what is full can hold nothing more, what shall we say, we who are an abyss of evil? The devil has humbled us with every sin—and we must be grateful to those who humble us through humiliation: for those who are grateful for their humiliation strike a blow against the devil. The Holy Fathers have said that if humility is brought down to hell, it will be lifted up to heaven; and conversely, if pride is exalted to heaven, it will be brought down to hell. Who would compel a humble person to harbor ill thoughts against anyone, or even to slander anyone, or to lay blame on another? For whatever a humble person endures or hears, he takes it as an occasion to slander and humble himself. At this, the blessed Zosima recalled how Abba Moses, when the clergy expelled him from the altar, saying, “Get out, Ethiopian,” began to humble himself, saying, “They did well to treat you this way, you dark-skinned man! Since you are not a man, do not walk among men. They did well.”

7. He also said: “What could be more fitting than to put into practice what we hear from our holy and active mentor, Abba Ammon, who says: Pay close attention to yourself—why you left the world and why you are here—and strive in every way, when someone causes you any sorrow, to remain silent and not utter a single word until your heart is calmed by unceasing prayer; and only then should you beg your brother for forgiveness. For whoever loves the true and straight path, when troubled by something, always strongly rebukes and convicts himself, saying: “Why are you raging, my soul, and why are you tossing about like a madwoman?” By doing this, you show that you are sick. For if you were not sick, you would not suffer. Why, then, having ceased to rebuke yourself, do you reproach your brother, who has shown you your sickness? Learn the commandments of Christ the Lord through deeds and truth, He who “when He was reviled, did not revile in return,” and “when He suffered, He did not resist” (1 Peter 2:23). Hear what He says and what He demonstrates by His actions: “I offered my back to those who struck me, my cheeks to those who pulled out my beard; I did not hide my face from insults” (Isaiah 50:6). But you, poor soul, because of a little insult and disrespect, because of some contempt and aversion, condemnation and slander, sit there weaving countless hostile thoughts, thereby bringing calumny upon yourself, just like demons. What more can a demon do to such a soul than what it does to itself? We see the Cross of Christ, and every day we read about the sufferings He endured for our sake; yet we ourselves cannot bear even a single insult. Truly, we have strayed from the right path.

8. He also said: If anyone were to live as long as Methuselah but did not walk in the straight path that all the saints walked, —I am speaking of the path of humiliation and unjust losses and their courageous endurance—that person will not prosper in the least and will not find the treasure hidden in the commandments, but will only waste all the years of his life in vain. He added: When I was with the blessed Dionysia, a certain brother asked her for something as a blessing, and she gave him what and as much as she could. But since he was given less than he had expected, he began to revile her and speak absurd words against her and me. Hearing this, she became angry and wanted to retaliate against him in some way. Realizing this, I said to her, “What are you doing? By doing this, you are bringing slander upon yourself and stripping your soul of all virtue. And how are you worthily enduring what Christ endured for your sake?” I know, madam, that you have squandered all your wealth as if it were chaff, but if you do not seek meekness, you will be like a blacksmith who strikes a piece of iron but fails to forge the needed object. Listen to what Ignatius the God-Bearer says: ‘Seek meekness, by which all the power of the prince of this world is destroyed.’ A sign that the world has been completely abandoned is not being troubled by anything. It happens that someone, having despised many treasures, becomes attached to a needle, and this attachment causes him confusion and anxiety. Then the needle takes the place of treasures for him. This is how one becomes a slave to a needle, or a cowl, or a robe, or a book, ceasing to be a servant of God. One of the wise men rightly said, “As many passions as there are in the soul, so many masters there are.” And the Lord says: “Where your treasure is, there your heart will be also” (Matt. 6:21). And the Apostle : “For whoever is overcome by something is its slave” (2 Peter 2:19). Having heard this, she looked at me in surprise and said, “May you find the God whom you long for.”

9. The blessed one also said: The soul desires to be saved, but by craving vain things and worrying about them, it shuns the labors necessary for salvation. Though in truth, it is not the commandments that are heavy, but our evil desires. It happens, however, that sometimes, fearing to drown at sea or fall into the hands of robbers, we despise everything and willingly abandon our possessions when we see that death lies before us shortly. But if, in order to live a little longer on earth, we despise everything and consider it a blessing to save ourselves—whether from robbers or from the sea—even after having lost everything—and if someone who was raving with fear just moments before hastily abandons everything just to preserve his temporary life, then why do we not apply the same reasoning to eternal life? Why is our fear of God not as strong as our fear of the sea, as one of the Saints said?

10. To confirm this, Abba recounted the following story, which he had heard from others. Once, a gem merchant boarded a ship with his children, carrying with him a great many precious stones and pearls, which he hoped to sell at a profit in the country to which he was bound. By God’s providence, he came to be particularly fond of a young boy who served him on the ship; and he comforted the boy, just as the boy comforted him, and gave him the same food that he himself ate. One day, this young boy overheard the sailors whispering among themselves, and upon listening closely, he learned that they had decided to throw the merchant overboard because of his precious stones. This saddened him greatly. When he later came to the merchant with a sad face to serve him as usual, the merchant asked him, “Why are you so sad today?”

“Nothing,” replied the boy, not daring to tell the truth. The merchant asked again, “Is there something troubling you? Tell me the truth—what is it?” The boy burst into tears and said to him, “The sailors have plotted against you in this way.” “Is that so?” asked the merchant. “Yes,” replied the boy, “that is what they have agreed upon among themselves.” Then the merchant called his children and said, “Whatever I tell you to do, do it without arguing.” Then, spreading out a cloth, he told them, “Bring the boxes here.” They brought them. And he began to lay out the stones. When he had laid them all out, he said, “Such is life!” “Because of these things, I am in danger of being thrown into the sea and, shortly thereafter, of dying without taking anything with me.” Then he ordered his children, “Throw all of this into the sea,” and as soon as he spoke, they immediately threw everything into the sea. The sailors were astonished, and their evil plan was thwarted. Having finished this story, the blessed Abba Zosima added: “Do you see where his thoughts suddenly turned? How he immediately became wise—both in words and in deeds? And this was for the sake of preserving this fleeting life. And he acted rightly, reasoning that if he were to die, what use would these stones be to him?” Yet we do not wish to endure even a small loss or deprivation with indifference for the sake of Christ’s commandments. But if we cannot help but grieve, then we should grieve over the perdition of the one who caused us harm, and not over the loss of property; for the one who has acted unjustly has cast himself out of the kingdom: “For the unrighteous will not inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6:9); but to you, the unjust, He has granted eternal life, as the Lord says to such: “Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven” (Matt. 5:12). But we, having set aside our sorrow over the ruin of a member of Christ, sit and dwell on thoughts of things that are fleeting and insignificant, perishable and worthless. Truly, we are worthy of every punishment. God has raised us to the rank of members of the body, whose head is Christ our God, as the Apostle said: “All the members of the body, though many, are one body” (1 Cor. 12:12). And the head of all is Christ (Eph. 1:22). Therefore, when a brother causes you sorrow, it is like a suffering hand or a sore eye causing another member to suffer. For we do not cut off or cast aside our hands, nor do we gouge out our eyes when they cause us pain, considering the loss of one or the other of these members to be a greater harm to ourselves; but rather, we make the sign of the cross—this most honorable seal of Christ—upon them, call upon the saints to pray, offer our earnest prayers to God on their behalf, and at the same time prepare eye ointments and poultices to heal the ailing member with their help. So, just as you pray for your eye or your hand, that they may be healed and no longer cause you pain, so pray also for your brother. Yet we, seeing how members of Christ suffer such spiritual harm, not only do we not grieve for them, but we even pray against them. This is truly characteristic of those who lack a merciful heart.

11. The blessed one also said: He who has acquired the treasures of generosity—love and compassion—first brings joy and benefit to himself, and then to his neighbor; whereas, on the contrary, malice first wounds and harms the one who harbors it. Although it may seem that he causes harm to his neighbor—in property, in honor, or even in the body itself—in reality, he deprives himself of eternal life. To this, Abba added the saying: “What is not harmful to the soul is not harmful to man either.”

12. He also said: “Someone told me, ‘Abba, there are too many commandments given to us, and the mind becomes clouded when you start to consider what you are keeping and what you are not keeping.’” I replied to him: “Let this not trouble you; but keep this in mind: if you are not attached to material things, you will easily practice every virtue. By not quarreling over them, you will not hold grudges, and then what difficulty will it be for you to pray for your enemies? Is it the same as digging the earth?” – But walk the path of patience, bear unjust losses of property with equanimity, give thanks for disgrace—and you will be a disciple of the Holy Apostles, who, returning from court after being beaten, “rejoiced that they had been counted worthy to suffer disgrace for the name of Christ” (Acts 5:41). And they, being pure and holy, accepted disgrace for the name of Christ; but we must endure disgrace because of our own sins. We are disgraceful, even if no one dishonors us—and we are cursed: “For cursed,” says the Prophet, “are those who turn aside from Your commandments” (Ps. 118: 21). Not everyone is called to endure disgrace for the sake of Christ’s name—not everyone, but only the holy and the pure, as I have said; the duty of people like us, however, is to accept disgrace with gratitude, confessing that we rightly suffer for our evil deeds. Woe to that soul which, knowing its own impure deeds and seeing that it rightly suffers what it suffers, sits there deceiving its own conscience and spinning thoughts, saying, ‘He said this and that to me, he dishonored me and reviled me’—thus bringing slander upon itself and taking the place of demons for itself. For what happens with artists also happens to the soul. Just as the master, having taught his art to a student, leaves him to work on his own and no longer needs to sit beside him, but only occasionally checks to see if he has grown lazy or ruined his work:

so too the demons, if they see a soul that is submissive and readily accepts evil thoughts, consign it to this satanic art, and no longer deem it necessary to sit beside it, confident that the soul alone is sufficient to slander itself; they only come from time to time to see if it has strayed.

13. Abba also said, “What is more convenient than to love everyone, and what is more pleasant than to be loved by everyone? And what comfort do Christ’s commandments not offer?”—But the will does not strive to fulfill them; for if it did, then with the help of God’s grace, everything would be easy for it. A slight inclination of our will toward the good draws God to our aid, as I have often said, and as the divine Anthony says: for virtue, all that is needed is our desire and experience; we need not journey far to attain the kingdom of heaven, nor cross the seas for virtue. — What rest does the meek and humble enjoy?! Truly, “the meek shall inherit the earth and delight in abundance of peace” (Ps. 36: 11).

14. The blessed one also recounted: Once we were walking—I, one brother, and several laypeople—along the road to Naples (in Samaria) and came to the place where the customs post was located. The laypeople, knowing what was required by custom there, paid the toll without saying a word; but the brother who was with me began to argue, saying to them, “How dare you demand payment from monks?!” Hearing this, I said to him, “What are you doing, brother? You are telling him nothing other than, ‘Even if reluctantly, honor me as a saint.’” It would have been another matter if, seeing your good will and humility, he himself had been ashamed and said, ‘Forgive me, I will not take it.’ But you did not act as a disciple of the meek and humble One. Pay what is due, and go on your way in peace.”

15. On another occasion, when I was in the holy city, a certain lover of Christ came to me and said: “My brother and I have had a minor disagreement; and my brother does not want to reconcile with me. Please intercede and speak to him.” I gladly agreed to this, and after summoning his brother, I spoke to him, urging him toward love and peace. He seemed convinced, but then he said to me, “No, I cannot reconcile with him, because I have sworn by the cross not to do so.” Then, smiling, I said to him: “Your oath means this: ‘I swear by Your holy cross that I will not keep Your commandments, but will do the will of Your enemy, the devil.’” Know, then, that not only are we not obligated to keep our word to do any evil deed, but rather we must repent and be contrite for having resolved within ourselves to act in this way—as the God-bearer Basil said; if Herod had come to his senses and not fulfilled his oath, he would not have fallen into the great sin of beheading the Forerunner of Christ. Finally, I cited for him the account from the Holy Gospel of how, when the Lord wished to wash St. Peter’s feet, the latter, with the zeal characteristic of those who swear, said, “You shall not wash my feet”—and then not only consented to it but even desired more (John, chapter 13).

16. The blessed one spoke again: “I was asked how one should restrain anger,” and I replied, “The beginning of restraining anger is not to speak while the angry agitation persists.” We see an example of this in Abba Moses, who, when the fathers—wishing to test him—spoke among themselves in the assembly, saying, “Why does this Ethiopian enter our assembly?”—upon hearing this, remained silent; and when, after the assembly, some asked him if he had been embarrassed, he replied, “I was embarrassed and did not speak” (Ps. 76:5). But that was in the beginning. Later, when he had matured—and had been ordained a deacon—he not only remained silent but was also unperturbed. Here is what happened: The archbishop, wishing to test him, said to the clergy, “When Abba Moses enters the sanctuary, send him out, and, following him, eavesdrop on what he says.” When he entered the sanctuary, the clerics said to him, ‘Get out, you black-skinned Ethiopian.’ And he went out, saying to himself, ‘They have treated you well; since you are not a human being, why do you enter the assembly of people?’ (The True Tale of Abba Moses, chs. 3, 4). Now he not only remained silent in the face of ridicule, but he was not embarrassed; and not only was he not embarrassed, but he even rebuked himself. To be embarrassed and to remain silent is characteristic of the imperfect and the beginners; but even not to be embarrassed is the mark of the perfect, as the Prophet says: “I prepared myself and was not embarrassed” (Ps. 118:60). And this is a great virtue. — Yet we often find ourselves standing below even the most novice of beginners when we do not strive to overcome ourselves and force ourselves to remain silent when anger arises, thinking—due to our great negligence—that this virtue is too lofty and inaccessible to us. We do not even show a desire to begin this labor upon ourselves and thereby draw God’s grace to our aid; or, if we do appear to show a desire, it is feeble, unsteady, and unworthy of receiving any blessing from God.

17. To this the blessed one added: The course of our life is as follows: whoever contributes the effort of his own will to the task receives what he needs from grace. Just as a farmer may sow only a little, but if God blesses his labor, he reaps a great harvest, as it is written of Isaac: “Isaac sowed in that land and reaped a hundredfold harvest of barley that summer; the Lord blessed him” (Gen. 26:12): so if the Lord blesses the work of our free will, we will do everything effortlessly, without compulsion, and with joy—and derive benefit from everything. Prayer offered with self-discipline and patience gives rise to prayer that is easy, pure, and joyful. And the one that occurs through self-discipline is the work of the will, while the one performed with delight is the work of grace. Do we not see the same thing in the process of mastering the arts? Let the one who takes up an art do so with a firm desire to learn; at first, he works with difficulty, fails to harmonize one part with another, and often makes mistakes. But he does not lose heart; instead, he takes up the task again, and even if he makes mistakes again, he does not abandon the task, demonstrating to his teacher the steadfastness of his will. If he loses heart and abandons his efforts, he will learn nothing; but if, despite frequently making mistakes, he does not abandon the task but patiently continues to labor and work, then eventually, with God’s help, he will master the craft and begin to produce all his works little by little, without burden, with pleasure, and with such success that what he earns from it is sufficient for his full sustenance. So too in the matter of the spiritual life, one who resolves to cultivate virtues must not think that he will succeed in them immediately, for that is impossible; but let him exert effort, and even if at first his progress is not entirely smooth, he must not give up on what he has begun, or else he will not achieve success; rather, he must make new and renewed efforts, just as one who wishes to learn any art does. When he labors in this way with patience, without losing heart, God will look upon the work of his will and grant him the strength to do all things without compulsion. And this is precisely what Abba Moses meant when he said: the strength for those who wish to acquire virtues lies in not losing heart when they happen to fall, but in renewing their zeal and labor toward the same end.

18. He also said: Every virtue requires both effort and time, as well as a sincere desire for it; above all, it requires God’s assistance. For if God does not assist our will, our labor will be in vain, just as the labor of a farmer who has tilled and sown his fields will be in vain if God does not cause his seed to sprout. God’s assistance, however, requires our prayers and supplications; for it is only through them that we draw God’s help to intercede for us. If we neglect prayer, how will God look upon our labor? Likewise, even if we pray, but lazily, distractedly, or grow bored quickly during prayer, we will not be granted anything, as I have always told you: for God looks upon our will and, judging by it, bestows His gifts. Was not Abba Moses once the leader of robbers? Did he not commit a multitude of crimes, so that he had to hide from his master because of his wickedness? But since he set about his task courageously and with such fervent resolve, everyone knows to what heights he rose, so that he was numbered among God’s chosen ones, as the writer of his life story says. As for us, although at the beginning of our renunciation we show the warmth of zeal, over time, through our own negligence, we lose it, becoming attached to things that are cold, empty, and worthless, in place of love for God and our neighbors; and moreover, if we manage to do something good, we attribute it to ourselves, as if we had accomplished it by our own strength rather than having received it from God; whereas the truth says: “What you have, you did not receive; you were given it. If, then, you were given it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?” (1 Cor. 4:7).

19. He also said: The Lord Jesus would not have been impoverished or weakened in His ability to bestow upon us the same blessings with which He enriched the holy patriarchs, had He seen that we use what He has already given us for our own good and for His glory. But since He sees that, because of our disorderliness, we turn the small and few gifts He has already given us to our own harm, He—being loving toward humanity—does not entrust us with greater ones, lest we perish in the end. If He saw that we were using what little He has already given us for our own good, He certainly would not be powerless to grant us even more, as I said earlier. God, as I always say, being good, has given us the freedom and the ability to derive benefit from everything; but through our partiality and abuse, we destroy God’s gifts and deprive ourselves of them when, through our own malice and wickedness, we turn the blessings already granted to us to our own harm.

20. The blessed one also often said: No one can harm a faithful soul; but whatever suffering it endures will be counted as a blessing. A worker, though weighed down by labor, continues to work cheerfully, confident that he will receive his reward after his labor; but the unfaithful, when faced with hardship, suffers as if in hell because of his unbelief. The faithful, despite all their hardships, remain faithful and confidently await their reward for their patience—from this they draw great comfort; but the unfaithful, having no faith, what comfort can they possibly receive from the Lord? He sits and smolders in his thoughts, even when faced with a minor sorrow, ranting to himself: “He said that to me, but I, too, have something to say to him”—he holds a grudge and plots impossible things that he is utterly powerless to carry out. For not everything that people plot can they actually accomplish. No; but only what God permits—and this, too, He alone determines through the course of events. Often one plans to do evil to another; but if God does not permit it, his efforts are in vain, and human free will is merely tested thereby. How often did people plot to harm the holy patriarchs! Yet since God did not permit it, no one could do them any harm, as it is written: “Do not let anyone oppress them, nor let kings speak against them; do not touch my anointed ones, and do not deal treacherously with my prophets” (Ps. 104: 14–15). But when God wishes to display the abundance of His power, He moves even the hearts of the most unmerciful to mercy, as it is written in the Book of Daniel: “And God granted Daniel favor and kindness in the sight of the chief of the eunuchs” (Dan. 1: 9). Blessed is the soul that, through its longing for God, has truly prepared itself to receive His gifts; for He does not forsake such a soul in anything, but protects it in all things, even in those things for which it does not ask Him out of ignorance. The Wise One spoke well: “The wise man dwells under the shelter of God” (Ps. 30: 21). How many times did Saul attempt to kill the blessed David? What did he not do? How did he fail? But since the Lord protected David, all of Saul’s schemes came to nothing; and not only that, but he himself was often delivered into the hands of the Holy One, who nevertheless spared him, harboring no bitter or vengeful malice toward him.

21. Once Abba was asked: “How can one avoid becoming angry when others humiliate and slander you?” He replied: “Whoever considers himself the most insignificant in his own heart is not disturbed by any humiliation, as Abba Pimen said: ‘If you humble yourself, you will have peace.’”

22. Abba also said: A certain brother who lived with me and received the schema from me—one whom I strove to teach every virtue and whom I sometimes treated with leniency because of his weakness, since he was of a delicate constitution—said to me one day: “My Abba! I love you very much.” I replied to him: “I have not yet met a person who loves me as much as I love him. Now you say that you love me—and I believe it—but if something unpleasant should happen to you because of me, you will not remain the same.” As for me, no matter what I may suffer from you, I will always remain equally fond of you, and nothing can turn me away from loving you.” Not long after that—and I do not know what came over him—he began to say many things to me, even shameful words; and I heard it all. Then I said to myself: He is a healer in the service of Jesus, sent to heal⁸⁰ my vain soul. From such people, one who is mindful of oneself can regain what one loses through those who flatter him. He is my true benefactor. And I always remembered him as my physician and benefactor. To those who told me about his words, I said: “He recognized only my obvious faults, and even then, not all of them, but only a part; my hidden shortcomings, however, are innumerable.” Some time later, he met me in Caesarea (of Palestine). He approached and, as was his custom, embraced and kissed me, and I him, as if nothing had happened between us. After such slander, he embraced me in this way when we met, no doubt because I showed him no suspicion and not the slightest sign of offense, even though I had heard it all. But he himself fell at my feet and, embracing them, said: “Forgive me, my father, for the Lord’s sake, that I spoke so much ill of you.” I, in turn, kissed him tenderly and said to him: “Do you remember, my God-loving friend, how, when you told me, ‘I love you very much,’ I replied that I had never met a person who loved me as much as I love him, and that if something unpleasant were to happen to you, you would not remain the same, and that no matter what suffering I might endure because of you, I would always treat you the same, and nothing could tear me away from my love for you?” – Let your heart be assured that nothing you said was hidden from me; but wherever and to whomever, I heard it all, and I never said that it was not so, and no one could persuade me to say anything bad; but I also said: ‘What he says is true, and he speaks out of love’; and, considering you my own, I have never failed to remember you in my prayers, and to give you even greater proof of my love for you, I will reveal to you that once, when my eye became very sick, I remembered you, placed the sign of the Holy Cross upon it, and said: “Lord Jesus Christ! For his sake, heal me!”—And I was healed at once.

23. The blessed one also often said: We humans do not know how to make others love and honor us; we have lost all sense of this. If someone shows a little patience toward his brother when he is angry or grieves over him, he will soon come to his senses, and, realizing how the other had been patient with him, will lay down his very soul for him. At this, the blessed one once recalled a certain brother who had told him that he had an Abba who was very meek, whom the whole country revered as an angel of God because of his great virtue and the miracles he performed. One day, this brother, moved by the enemy, approached him and began to slander him to the utmost in front of everyone. The elder stood calmly, watching his lips, and then said, “The grace of God is in your mouth, my brother!” But the brother, becoming even more enraged, shouted, “I know why you’re saying this, you senseless and gluttonous old man—it’s just to make yourself look meek.” The elder replied: “Truly so, my brother; what you say is just.” After this, someone asked the elder: “Were you not troubled, O elder of God?” “No,” he answered, “but I felt in my soul that it was, as it were, covered by Christ.” – To this, the blessed one added: “Truly, we ought to thank such people and honor them—those who are passionate, as doctors who heal the wounds of their souls, and those who are dispassionate, as benefactors who bring them the kingdom of heaven.”

24. The blessed one also said: “When I was still at the monastery in Tyre, before I left there, a certain elder, renowned for his virtues, came to us.” When we began to read the book of memorable tales and the wise sayings of the holy elders—for the blessed one loved to read them and, as it were, breathed them in and drew from them instruction in every virtue—and came to the story of that elder who, when robbers came to him and said that they had decided to take everything in his cell, he calmly replied to them: “Take, my children, whatever you see fit”; and when they had taken everything and left, leaving behind a single bag, he picked it up and ran after them, shouting: “My children! Take back from me what you forgot in our cell”; and they, struck by the elder’s lack of malice, returned everything to his cell, saying to one another in repentance: “Truly, this is a man of God”—as soon as we had read this, the elder said to me: “You know, my Abba, this story has been of great benefit to me.” I said to him: “How so, Father?” He replied: “Once, while I was staying in the regions near the Jordan, after reading this, I marveled at the elder and said: ‘Lord, grant me to walk in the footsteps of those whose way of life (schema) You have enabled me to adopt.’ And so this desire remained within me. And then, two days later, robbers approached and knocked on the door. I immediately recognized that they were robbers and said to myself, ‘Thanks be to God! Now is the time to show the fruit of my desire.’ Then, opening the door, I welcomed them warmly, and after lighting a lamp, I began to show them my belongings, saying to them, ‘Do not be afraid; as I believe in the Lord, I will hide nothing from you.’ They asked me, ‘Do you have any gold?’ ‘Yes,’ I replied, ‘here are three coins,’ and I opened the vessel before them. They took them and left in peace. ‘As for me,’ said the blessed one with a smile, ‘I asked him, ‘Did they return to you, as those did to that elder?’ ‘God forbid,’ he replied at once; ‘I never even thought they would return.’” – To this the blessed one added: “Such was the elder’s zeal, and this is what his readiness to imitate the saints brought him—that he not only did not grieve but even rejoiced, as one who had been granted some special blessing.”

25. As I mentioned earlier in our conversation, the blessed one said that if we show a little patience toward our brother who is angry, we will win his soul; now I want to tell you a story about this that I heard from the blessed Sergius, the abbot of Pedia. He told me: Once we were traveling with a certain holy elder and lost our way. Not knowing where to go, we ended up in a sown field and trampled a little of the greenery. Seeing this, a farmer who happened to be working there at the time began to scold us harshly, shouting angrily: “You monks! Do you fear God?” “If you had the fear of God in your hearts, you would not have done this.” The holy elder immediately said to us, “For the Lord’s sake, say nothing.” Then he turned gently to the farmer and said, “You speak the truth, my child; if we had the fear of God, we would not have done this.” The farmer began to scold them angrily once more. The elder said to him once more: “You speak the truth that if we were monks, we would not have done this. But, for the Lord’s sake, forgive us; we admit that we have sinned against you.” This so moved the farmer that he approached, threw himself at the elder’s feet, and said: “Forgive me, for the Lord’s sake, Father, and take me with you.” “And indeed,” said the blessed Sergius, “he followed us, and upon arriving at the monastery, he took the schema.” “This,” added Abba Zosima, “is what the meekness and kindness of the holy elder, with God’s help, were able to accomplish—a soul created in the image of God, which is more desirable to God than the darkness of the worlds with all their riches.”

26. Abba Zosima also said: Once, when I was with Blessed Sergius, he said to me, “Read something from Scripture for us.” I began to read Proverbs, and when I came to the passage that says, “Where there are many trees, the fire rages; but where there is no one to stir it up, the quarrel dies down” (Prov. 26:20)—I asked him, “What does this saying mean?” He replied, “Just as trees are the (material) cause of a fiery flame, and if there are not enough of them, the fire soon goes out—so too do passions have their causes; and if one cuts off these causes, the passions remain inactive.” Specifically: the causes of fornication, as Abba Moses said, are: eating and drinking without restraint, sleeping to one’s heart’s content, sitting idly, amusing oneself, engaging in idle talk, and loving to dress up. If one cuts off all of this, the passion for fornication will be powerless. Again, the causes of anger, as he also said, are: giving and taking (engaging in troublesome transactions), doing as one pleases, loving to give orders, and considering oneself wise. Whoever cuts these off will find that the passion of anger has no power over him. The same applies to all passions. And this is what Abba Sisoy meant when a brother asked him, “Why do the passions not depart from me?” He replied, “Because their vessels—that is, their causes—are within you; give them their pledge, and they will depart.”

27. On another occasion he said: A double-tempered person, in whom the outburst of anger does not subside, is one who is not satisfied with the first provocation but stokes himself up to a second outburst of anger. Whoever, having been inflamed with anger, immediately comes to his senses and, realizing his fault, asks forgiveness from the brother at whom he was angry, is not called double-angry; the quarrel subsides within him; for as soon as he, realizing his fault, is reconciled with his brother, the quarrel no longer has a place within him. But whoever, having become angry, does not acknowledge his fault, but instead stirs himself up even more to anger, and regrets not that he became angry, but that he did not say even more than what he said in his anger—such a person is called double-angry; and the strife within him does not subside, because after the anger has passed, resentment, animosity, and malice take hold of him. — May the Lord Jesus Christ deliver us from such a disposition, and grant us a share in the meek and humble.

28. He also often said that great vigilance and no small amount of wisdom are needed to counter the devil’s cunning; for it happens that he sometimes stirs up anxiety and discontent over nothing, suggesting even seemingly righteous pretexts so that it may appear that anger in the given situation is justified and has a valid reason. But whatever he may suggest, let those who truly wish to walk in the way of the holy monks know that no irritation, however justified it may seem, should be permitted, as Macarius says: “Monks should not become angry”; and furthermore: “One should not cause sorrow to one’s neighbor.” He also told us the following: Once I commissioned a skilled scribe to copy some books for me. When he had finished, he sent word to me: “I have finished; send for whatever you deem appropriate and take them.” A brother, having heard of this, went to the scribe on my behalf, paid the agreed-upon fee, and took the books. Meanwhile, unaware of what had happened, I sent our brother with a letter and payment to collect them. The scribe, realizing from this that he had been mocked by the brother who had taken the books, became very angry and said, “I will certainly go and punish him—both for mocking me and for taking what was not his.” When I heard about this, I sent word to him: “You surely know, my brother, that we acquire books in order to learn from them love, humility, and gentleness; but if the very purpose of acquiring books leads to quarrels, then I do not want to have them, so as not to quarrel: “for it is not fitting for a servant of God to quarrel” (2 Tim. 2:24). Thus, by refusing the books, I ensured that no deliberate offense was caused to that brother.

29. Once, while sitting with us and conversing about matters of salvation, the blessed one began to quote sayings of the holy elders; and, having come to the saying spoken by Abba Pimen—that he who condemns himself finds peace everywhere—and to the one spoken by Abba of Mount Nitria in response to the question, “What have you gained most of all, Father, on this path?” ‘To always accuse and reproach myself,’ he replied, whereupon the questioner added, ‘And there is no other way but this.’ Recalling these sayings, the Blessed One said, ‘What power the words of the saints have! And truly, whatever they said, they spoke from experience and truth, as the divine Anthony testifies.’ Their words are powerful precisely because they were spoken by those who lived them, just as one of the wise commands everyone to do: “Let your life confirm your words.” At this, Abba told us the following story: When I had not yet been at the Lavra of Abba Gerasimus for very long, we were sitting one day with a brother dear to me and conversing about matters pertaining to the salvation of the soul. I recalled the words of Abba Pimen and that other elder of Nitria mentioned above, and the brother said to me: “I have come to know the truth of these words through experience, and I have tasted the peace that comes from living by them.” I lived in sincere friendship with a certain deacon of this Lavra. I do not know why, but he began to suspect me of a certain matter, took offense at it, and began to look at me gloomily. Noticing this gloom, I asked him to explain the reason for it, and he said to me, “You did such-and-such a thing.” Not being aware of having done such a thing, I began to assure him of my innocence; but he replied, “I’m sorry, I am not convinced.” Returning to my cell, I began to search my heart to see if I had ever done such a thing—and found nothing. Later, when he took the chalice to offer it, I swore to him that I did not recall having done that thing; but even then he was not convinced by this. Then, coming to my senses again, I recalled these words of the elders, and with complete faith in their truth, I turned my thoughts inward and said: The deacon sincerely loves me, and moved by this love, he revealed to me what is in his heart toward me, so that I might watch myself carefully, lest I do such a thing. However, my poor soul, as you say, what deed have you not done? You have committed thousands of evil deeds, and you have forgotten them. Where is what you did yesterday, or ten days ago? Do you remember that? So have you not done this as well, just as you did that—and forgotten it, just as you forgot what came before? Thus, I resolved in my heart that I had truly done this; but just as I had forgotten what came before, so I forgot this as well. And I began to thank the Lord and the deacon, for through him the Lord had enabled me to recognize my sin and repent of it. Then I rose, and with these thoughts in mind, I went to my brother to confess before the deacon and to thank him. But as soon as I knocked on the door, he opened it first and bowed to me, saying, “Forgive me; I was deceived by demons into suspecting you of that deed; for God has truly assured me that you are not guilty of it,” and he would not let me reassure him further, saying, “There is no longer any need for that.” After recounting this, the blessed Zosima added: “This is what sincere humility did for the heart of the brother who loved him—that he not only did not take offense at the deacon’s actions, nor was he insulted by him—first, because the deacon had suspected him, second, for not believing his assurances of innocence—but he even took upon himself a sin that had not been committed, and not only that, but he also thanked the deacon. Do you see what this virtue accomplishes? To what heights of excellence does it elevate those who love it? For if the brother had wished, he would have had a thousand reasons to become a demon through the deacon. But since he was devoted to virtue, not only did he not take offense at him, but he even thanked him, for virtue had taken hold of his heart. So if we, too, had first sown within ourselves the seeds of meekness and humility and prepared our hearts for them, the enemy would have no place to sow his evil seeds there. But when he finds us empty of good thoughts—or worse yet, inciting ourselves to evil—he seizes upon these opportunities to fill us with his wickedness. But when there is a love for virtue, the opposite is true: for then the Lord, seeing how the soul longs to be saved and how earnestly it cultivates good seeds within itself, fills it with His gifts because of its good will.

30. Once, the blessed Abba, recalling an elder who had been robbed by a brother living next door—and that, knowing this, he had never rebuked that brother but had worked even harder, saying, “Perhaps the brother is in need”—marveled at the kindness of the saints and recounted the following incident. During my stay in Pediaa, an abbot told me the following: near our monastery lived an elder who was of a most blessed soul. A brother living next door to him, one day while the elder was away, led by the devil’s temptation, opened the elder’s cell, went inside, and took his belongings and books for himself. When the elder returned and, upon opening his cell, did not find his belongings, he went to that brother to tell him about it. But upon entering the brother’s cell, he saw his belongings lying in the middle of it, because the brother had not yet had time to put them away. Not wishing, however, to embarrass the brother or rebuke him, he pretended to be seized by a sudden stomachache and went outside—where he stayed for quite some time, as if attending to a need, so that the brother might have time to put the belongings away in the meantime. When he returned to him afterward, he began to talk about something else and did not expose the brother. A few days later, the elder’s belongings were found in his possession, and he was arrested and taken into custody. The elder knew nothing about this; but upon hearing that his brother was in prison—and not knowing why he was there—he came to me,” says the abbot, “for he used to visit us often,” and asked, “Please do me a favor: give me a few eggs and some plain bread.” I said to him, “Surely you have someone with you now?” “Yes,” replied the elder; and he took these things so that he could go to the dungeon and comfort his brother. As soon as he entered the dungeon, the brother fell at his feet and said: “I am here because of you, Abba, for it was I who stole your belongings”—but “your book is with so-and-so, and your clothes are with so-and-so.” The elder said to him, “Let your heart be assured, my son, that I did not come here for that reason; I did not even know that you were here because of me; but when I heard that you were here, I was grieved and came to comfort you; here, look—eggs and fresh bread. Now I will go and do whatever it takes to get you out of here.” He went and asked some of the officials who knew him because of his virtue; and they ordered that the brother be released from prison.

31. It was also told of the same elder that once he went to the market to buy himself some clothes. He bought them and paid one gold coin. He still had to pay the rest in small change. He took the clothes and placed them beneath him, and began counting out the small change onto a small board. Just then, someone approached and tried to pull the clothes out from under him. Sensing this, the elder understood what it meant, and out of pity for the man, he began to rise little by little, as if stretching while holding the coin, until the man had pulled the clothes out and left; and the elder did not rebuke him. “After this, the blessed Zosima said: What were those clothes of his worth, or the things stolen from him? But how precious is his free will! He showed that, even while possessing them, he was as if he had nothing at all. When they were taken from him, he remained the same, neither grieving over it nor becoming angry; for, as I always say, it is not possession itself that harms, but possessing with attachment. Even if this elder had possessed the whole world, he would have been as though he possessed nothing: for by what he did, he showed that he was free from everything. Let us, then, brothers, strive to imitate the examples of the holy fathers and zealously fulfill their words, so that, having borne good fruit here, we may be made worthy of eternal blessings, in Christ Jesus, our Lord, to whom be glory and power with the Father and the Holy Spirit, now and ever and to the ages of ages. Amen.

Saint Maximus the Confessor

A Brief Account of Him

St. Maximus of Constantinople was of noble birth. Having received a comprehensive education—in theology, philosophy, and every other subject required at that time—he was appointed to the imperial court by Emperor Heraclius and performed the duties of chief secretary with success and to great acclaim. When the Monothelite heresy arose—for which both the emperor and the patriarch were partly to blame—and turmoil began in the palace, in the city, and in other regions of the empire, St. Maximus regarded this as a blessed opportunity to fulfill his long-standing desire to leave the world and enter a monastery. Having withdrawn from public affairs, he entered the Chrysopolis Monastery (641) and devoted himself with all zeal to ascetic practices, following the strict monastic rules, setting for all and in every respect an example worthy of imitation. Consequently, when a new abbot was needed at the monastery, he was unanimously elected by all to this office, which he fulfilled with dignity, without indulging himself or seeking to please men. Meanwhile, the Monothelite heresy continued to grow and spread, supported by the court and the patriarch; turmoil grew along with it. Unwilling to tolerate the turmoil, St. Maximus left the monastery and set out for Rome. On his way, he stopped for a time in Carthage, in Africa, where, at a council held there, he denounced the untenability of Monothelitism in the person of Pyrrhus, the Patriarch of Constantinople, who was present but had been removed from office. He then sailed to Rome, where he soon took part in a council against the Monophysites, convened by Pope St. Martin, in response to the emperor's decree to accept and sign the Typikon—a statement of the creed he had composed, which included Monophysite heresy. At this council, Monophysitism, the imperial typikon, and “ ” all those who accepted this heretical doctrine were condemned and anathematized. This conciliar decree was then disseminated far and wide, throughout the West and the East. Enraged by this, the emperor ordered the arrest of Pope St. Martin and St. Maximus and their transport to Constantinople. Upon their arrival there, St. Martin, after enduring unimaginable tortures, was exiled to Chersonesos, where he died (655). As for St. Maximus, they set about trying to win him over to their side, which they did with great zeal: first in the imperial palaces; then in a prison in Constantinople; then to the Thracian town of Vizia, the site of the holy martyr's first imprisonment; and finally, after being summoned from there, back to Constantinople, to the monastery of St. Theodore, where he was held—in a more solemn and menacing atmosphere. The trial was conducted by senators, with bishops sometimes present as well. The aim was to persuade St. Maximus to accept their teachings, or at least to sign the typikon, or at least to remain silent. Nothing succeeded. The truth of Orthodoxy, as spoken by St. Maximus, proved victorious every time, compelling his opponents not only to remain silent but also to bow down before him. They attempted to shake the courage of this champion of the truth through promises, threats, and instructions on how to circumvent the truth unnoticed by others—and finally, at the last meeting, through beatings. Nothing helped; and St. Maximus was exiled to a second place of confinement via Selinvri to Pervera, on the western shores of the Sea of Marmara. But the enemies of the truth could not rest; and St. Maximus was summoned once more to Constantinople for final exhortations, which were conducted with greater persistence, yet also to no avail, in three sessions: in the imperial chambers, in the prison, and again in the chambers, where the final decision was made: to spare the martyr's life but to subject him to torments worse than death. And with this aim, they handed him over to the city prefect. This same inhuman torturer, seizing the reverend father, led him into the praetorium, ordered him to be stripped naked, and, having laid him on the ground, commanded that he be flogged with the sharpest whips. And they beat the elder of God so inhumanely that not a single spot on his body remained unharmed, and the ground beneath him was stained with blood. – Then, barely breathing, they cast him into a dungeon. In the morning, they took the Saint back to the praetorium—and subjected him to an even more brutal punishment: they cut out his tongue, which had spoken for God and denounced heresy, and severed his right hand with a knife and an axe for writing instructive and expository books. Then, having dragged him out of the praetorium, stripped and barefoot, they paraded him through the marketplace for public humiliation, showing the people his severed tongue and hand. Finally, after such inhuman torments and humiliations, they sent the Saint into distant exile in Mingrelia; and there they imprisoned him in the Schemar Prison, where, after suffering for three years and enduring every kind of hardship, St. Maximus departed to the Lord, having been comforted before his death by a prophetic vision. This took place in the year 662. The commemoration of St. Maximus is observed on January 21. St. Maximus left behind many writings—some dogmatic and some polemical, but most of them moral and ascetic in nature. The Greek work On Charity includes the following from his writings: four hundred chapters on love; seven hundred chapters on the Most Holy Trinity and the Incarnation of the Word of God; as well as numerous chapters on virtues and passions; and an exposition on the Lord's Prayer. We have included the following in our collection: all the chapters on prayer, as they are; and from the seven hundred chapters, we have selected those that are more easily understood, as well as those that are more moral and ascetic in nature. In place of what is omitted here, we have included, based on Migne's edition, a word of ascetic wisdom. Thus, the following works by St. Maximus are presented:

1. The Ascetic Discourse, in the form of a disciple's questions and the elder's answers
2. Four Hundred Chapters on Love (in a new translation)
3. Speculative and Practical Chapters, selected from the seven hundred chapters of Greek Philanthropy

1. Words of Asceticism, in the form of a disciple's questions and the elder's answers

1. A brother asked the elder: "I beg you, Father, tell me, what was the purpose of the Lord's Incarnation?" – The elder replied: "I am surprised at you, brother, that even though you hear the Creed every day, you ask me this." – "I will tell you, however, that the purpose of the Lord's Incarnation was our salvation." The brother said: "Explain this to me, Father." – The elder replied: "Since man, originally created by God and placed in Paradise, transgressed the commandment and was subjected to corruption and death; then, despite the fact that through God's manifold providence in every way and form he was guided toward the good, he continually prospered only in evil, driven to despair by a multitude of carnal passions: for this reason, the only-begotten Son of God, the eternal Word, proceeding from God the Father, the source of life and immortality, appeared to us who were sitting in darkness and the shadow of death (Isa. 9:2, Matt. 4:16), having been incarnated by the Holy Spirit and the Most Holy Virgin—and showed us the example of a godly life, giving the holy commandments with the promise of the kingdom of heaven to those who would live by them, and the threat of eternal torment to those who would transgress them; and having endured the saving Passion and risen from the dead, He granted us the hope of the resurrection and eternal life, having by His obedience atoned for the guilt of original sin and by His death destroyed the power of death, so that "just as in Adam all die, so also in Him all will be made alive" (1 Cor. 15: 22); and finally, having ascended into heaven and seated Himself at the right hand of the Father, He sent down the Holy Spirit as a pledge of life—for the enlightenment and sanctification of our souls, and to assist those striving for salvation in fulfilling His commandments. Behold, in brief, what was the purpose of the Lord's Incarnation!

2. The brother said: "Father, I would like to hear briefly what commandments I must keep in order to be saved." – The elder replied: The Lord Himself said to the Apostles after His Resurrection: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you" (Matt. 28:19–20). Thus, everything commanded by Him must be observed by every person baptized in the name of the Life-giving and God-originating Trinity. The Lord has inseparably united the observance of all the commandments with true faith, knowing that if one is separated from the other, it is impossible for a person to be saved. That is why David, though he had the true faith (he was not content with it alone), said to God: "I have set my face toward all Your commandments; I have hated every way of unrighteousness" (Ps. 118: 128). Against every path of unrighteousness, the Lord has given us commandments that are contrary to it; and if anyone neglects any of them, he thereby embarks on the opposite path of unrighteousness.

3. The brother said: "Father, who can keep all the commandments—when there are so many of them?!" – The Elder replied: "The one who imitates the Lord and follows Him step by step." The brother said: "But who can imitate the Lord? The Lord was God, even though He became man, but I am a sinful man, enslaved by countless passions. How then can I imitate the Lord?" The elder replied: "None of those who are enslaved to the world and its vanities can imitate the Lord; but those who can say, 'We have left everything and followed You' (Matt. 19:27), receive the strength to imitate the Lord and to be guided by all His commandments." The brother asked, "What kind of power?" The elder replied, "Listen to what He Himself says: 'Behold, I give you authority to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you' (Luke 10:19)."

4. Having received such power and authority, the Apostle Paul said: "Be imitators of me, just as I also am of Christ" (Phil. 3:17). And again: "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, who do not walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit" (Rom. 8:1). And further: "Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires" (Gal. 5: 24). Also: "I have been crucified with Christ, and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 6: 14).

5. Speaking prophetically of this same power and help, David said: "He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High will rest in the shadow of the God of heaven. He says to the Lord: 'You are my shield and my refuge, my God, in whom I trust'" (Ps. 90:1–2). And a little further on: "You will tread upon the asp and the viper; you will trample the lion and the serpent... 'He will command His angel concerning you to guard you in all your ways'" (11–13). But those who are attached to the flesh and love the vanity of the world, listen to what they hear from the Lord: "Whoever loves father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me" (Matt. 10:37). And again: "Whoever does not carry his own cross and follow me cannot be my disciple" (Luke 14:27). Also: "Whoever does not renounce all his possessions cannot be my disciple" (33). And so, whoever desires to be His disciple, to prove himself worthy of Him, and to receive strength from Him against the spirits of wickedness, abstains from every habit that indulges the flesh and frees himself from every attachment to material things; and in this way strives against invisible enemies for the sake of the Lord's commandments—just as the Lord Himself set an example for us in Himself, both when He was tempted in the wilderness by their prince, and when, having appeared in the world (during His public ministry), He was tempted by those who acted under their influence.

6. The brother said: "But, Father, there are many of the Lord's commandments; and who can keep them all in mind in order to strive for them all, especially I, a man of limited understanding?—Why would I wish to hear a brief word (a simple rule) so that, by keeping it, I might secure my salvation?" The elder replied: "Although there are many commandments, brother; they are all summed up in one word—the following: 'You shall love the Lord your God... with all your strength, with all your mind; and your neighbor as yourself'" (Luke 10:27). Whoever strives to keep this word fulfills all the commandments at once. But whoever does not renounce, as stated above, every attachment to material things cannot truly love either God or his neighbor. It is impossible to be attached to material things and love God at the same time. And this is what the Lord meant when He said, "No one can serve two masters" (Matt. 6:24). And: "You cannot serve both God and mammon" (Luke 16:13). For to the extent that the mind clings to the things of this world, to that extent it becomes enslaved by them and despises God's commandment, transgressing it without fear.

7. The brother said: "What kinds of things do you mean by 'attachment,' Father?" The elder replied: "To food, to money, to possessions of every kind, to glory, to relatives, and other such things." The brother said: "But didn't God create all these things, Father, and give them to people for their use?" How then can He now forbid us even to touch these things?" The elder replied: "Indeed—God created all this and gave it to people for their use—and everything that came from God is good (Gen. 1:31) (and was then given to us) so that, by making good use of it, we might please God. But we, being weak and earthbound in our thinking, have preferred material things to the commandment of love, and, having become attached to them, we therefore quarrel with others. We ought to prefer love for every person—which serves as a sign of love for God—to all that is visible and even to the body itself, as the Lord Himself shows in the Gospel, saying, "If you love Me, keep My commandments" (John 14:15). What, then, is this commandment, the observance of which will prove that we love Him? Listen to what He says again: "This is my commandment, that you love one another" (John 15:12). Do you see—mutual love for one another constitutes love for God, which is the fulfillment of every commandment of God (Rom. 13:10)? That is why the Lord commands not only that we not be attached to the things of this world, but also that we renounce all our possessions for the sake of those who sincerely desire to be His disciples.

8. The brother said: "You said, Father, that love for every person should take precedence over all visible things and even over one's own body; but how can I love someone who hates me and turns away from me?" Whoever envies me, spreads slander, plots against me, and attempts to do me harm—how can I love such a person?—Judging by nature, it seems to me, Father, that this is impossible; for the feeling of sorrow naturally compels one to turn away from the one who caused the sorrow. – The elder replied: For reptiles and beasts, which are governed by nature, it is indeed impossible not to take revenge, to the best of their ability, for the harm done to them; but for those created in the image of God, governed by reason, honored with the knowledge of God, and having received the law from Him, it is possible not to turn away from those who insult them and to love those who hate them. That is why the Lord, saying, “Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you,” and so on (Matt. 5:44), commands this—certainly not as something impossible, but as something possible; otherwise, He would not have prescribed punishment for those who transgress this commandment. That such love is possible was demonstrated in practice by the Lord Himself and His disciples, who labored for the love of their neighbor even unto death and prayed fervently for those who killed them. But we, since we are attached to material things and pleasure and prefer (material things and pleasures) to the commandments; we are therefore unable to love those who hate us; and not only that, but often, because of them, we even turn away from those who love us, proving ourselves to be worse in character than beasts and creeping things. Since we are thus unable to follow in God’s footsteps, we cannot know His purpose, from which we might draw strength for ourselves.

9. The brother said: “Behold, Father, I have left everything—my family, my possessions, the pleasures and glory of the world—so that I have nothing left but this body; and yet I cannot love a brother who hates me and turns away from me, even though I do my best not to repay him evil for evil.” Tell me, what must I do so that I may love such a one from the heart—and indeed anyone who insults me or slanders me in any way?” The elder replied: “It is impossible to love one who insults you, even for one who has renounced the world and all that is in the world, unless he truly knows the Lord’s purpose. But when the Lord grants him to know it, and he becomes eager to walk according to its guidance, then he will be able to love from the heart those who hate and insult him, just as the Apostles loved, for they knew it.”

10. The brother said: “What is this purpose of the Lord? Please explain it to me, Father.” – The elder replied: “If you wish to know the Lord’s purpose, listen carefully.” Our Lord Jesus Christ, who is God by nature and who, out of love for humanity, chose to become man, was born of a woman and was subject to the Law, according to the divine Apostle, so that by keeping the commandments as a man, He might annul the ancient curse of Adam. Knowing that the entire Law and the Prophets hang on two commandments: – “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and your neighbor as yourself”—He determined to act in this way from beginning to end, so that He might keep these commandments perfectly, yet in a human manner. But the devil, who deceived man in the beginning and thereby gained dominion over death, the devil, seeing how the Father testified about Him at His baptism, and how He, having received from heaven—as a man—the Holy Spirit, then went out into the wilderness to be tempted by him—the devil—directed all his attacks against Him, hoping to make Him prefer the goods of this world to love for God. Knowing, however, that there are three things around which all human desires and pleasures revolve—namely, food, money, and glory—by which he always plunges people into the abyss of destruction, he attempted to tempt even the Lord with these three; but the Lord, proving Himself above all this, sternly commanded: “Get behind Me, Satan.”

11. This is the mark of love for God (that is, to stand above such things), and Satan, unable to persuade the Lord Jesus Christ to transgress it because of what he had promised, What he had promised, he then attempted in every way, when the Lord began His public ministry, to lead Him to violate the commandment of love for one’s neighbor, acting through the lawless Jews. To this end, when the Lord taught the ways of life and demonstrated by His deeds a model of heavenly living, proclaimed the resurrection of the dead, and promised believers eternal life and the kingdom of heaven—while threatening unbelievers with eternal torment—and to confirm the truth of His words performed wondrous divine signs, calling the people to faith,—he incited the lawless Pharisees and scribes to various slanders against Him, so that, unable to withstand the temptations as they had hoped, He would be moved by hatred toward His slanderers—and he, the schemer, would thus have achieved his goal by portraying Him as a violator of the commandment to love one’s neighbor.

12. But the Lord, as God, knowing his schemes, did not harbor hatred toward the Pharisees who were incited against Him (for how could this be possible, when He is goodness itself?), but rather, through His love for them, He confounded the instigator himself. Thus, since they, being subjected to hostile incitement, might not accept Him—and if they did accept Him, it was because they willingly, through inattention and carelessness, yielded to the instigator’s suggestions—yet the Lord instructed them, rebuked them, reproached them, wept over them, and at the same time never ceased to do them every kind of good; He bore slander with equanimity, endured suffering with patience—showing toward them every act of love. With such love for those incited against Him, He astonished the instigator. What a wondrous battle! Instead of hatred, He shows love, and through His goodness He overthrows the father of malice. Having endured so much evil from them—or, more accurately, for their sake—having striven to the point of death, in human terms, for the commandment of love, and having won a complete victory over the devil, He finally received, for our sake, the crown of the Resurrection;—and in this way, the new Adam renewed the old. —This is the meaning of the words spoken by the divine Apostle: “Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus,” and so on (Phil. 2:5).

13. Such was the Lord’s purpose: to be obedient to the Father even unto death, as a human being for our sake, keeping the commandment of love, and to strike down the devil, suffering at his hands through the scribes and Pharisees he incited. Thus, freely yielding as if to grant him victory, He defeated the one who sought to defeat Him and wrested the world from his tyranny. “For Christ was crucified in weakness” (2 Cor. 13:4), but by this weakness He put death to death and abolished the one who holds the power of death (Heb. 2:14). So too did Paul himself experience weakness, and he boasted “in his weaknesses, so that the power of Christ might dwell in him” (2 Cor. 12:9).

14. Reflecting on this victory, St. Paul wrote to the Ephesians: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities,” and so on (Eph. 6:12). And to those who are at war with invisible enemies, he commanded them to take up the armor of righteousness, the helmet of hope, the shield of faith, and the spiritual sword, “so that they may extinguish all the flaming arrows of the evil one” (vv. 11–14). Illustrating this struggle in practice, he said: “For I do not run aimlessly; I do not fight as one who beats the air. But I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9: 26–27), and again: “To this very hour we go hungry and thirsty, we are in rags, and we are in distress” (1 Cor. 4:11), and further: “in toil and hardship, through many sleepless nights, in the cold and in nakedness” (2 Cor. 11:27).

15. With the same struggle he waged war against the demons that stir up carnal lusts, driving them away by exhausting his body. Showing us, by his very example, the way to victory over those demons who incite hatred and, for that very purpose, stir up the most careless against the godly—so that, being tempted by them, they might come to hate them and thereby transgress the commandment of love—he said: “When we are rebuked, we bless; when we are persecuted, we endure; when we are slandered, we console: for we have become the world’s refuse, the scum of the earth until now” (1 Cor. 4:12–13). The demons inspired people to rebuke, slander, and persecute the Apostle in order to incite him to hatred toward those who rebuked, slandered, and persecuted him—with the aim of leading him to violate the commandment of love. But the Apostle, unaware of their intentions, blessed those who rebuked him, endured those who persecuted him, and implored those who slandered him to turn away from the demons inciting them to do so and to turn to the good God; and in this way he always defeated the host of demons that teach evil, overcoming evil with goodness, following the example of the Savior. In this way, he and the other Apostles delivered the whole world from the demons and dedicated it to God, overcoming through their victory those who thought they had triumphed. And so, brother, if you, too, hold fast to this same goal, you, too, will be able to love those who hate you; but if you do not, you will not be able to; for otherwise, it is impossible.

16. The brother said: “Truly, Father, it is so, and not otherwise.” – And for this reason, the Lord—who was reviled, struck on the cheeks, and subjected to other sufferings at the hands of the Jews—endured it all, having compassion on them as those who, out of ignorance, were committing “ ” and were deceived, just as He said on the cross: “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34), while triumphing on the cross over the cunning and deceit of the devil and his princes; for even unto death He endured the struggle against them for the sake of the commandment of love, as you have said. He has granted us this victory over them; and having destroyed the power of death, He bestowed His resurrection as life upon the whole world. But pray for me, Father, that I may fully comprehend the purpose of the Lord and His Apostles, and then remain sober-minded during times of temptation, not being deceived by the schemes of the devil and his demons.

17. The elder replied: “If you always keep these words in mind, you will be able to discern (the wiles of the evil one).” But when you realize that just as you are tempted, so too is your brother tempted, forgive your tempted brother, and resist the tempting devil—who seeks to incite you to hatred toward your tempted brother—without yielding to his wiles. This is precisely what James, the brother of God, teaches when he says in his epistle: “Submit yourselves to God; resist the devil, and he will flee from you” (4:7). And so, if, as has been said, you always keep the above in sober thought, you will be able to discern the purpose of the Lord and His Apostles, and to love people, showing compassion toward them when they act wrongly, while always opposing the cunning demons through love. But if you and I are dissolute, careless, and negligent, and surrender our thoughts to carnal pleasures, then we will not be waging war against the demons, but against ourselves and our brothers; and we will be pleasing the demons by waging war against people for their sake.

18. The brother said: “Yes, Father; the demons always take advantage of my negligence to rise up against me. But I beg you, Father, tell me how I should attain sobriety.” The elder replied: “Complete detachment from earthly things and constant study of the Holy Scriptures lead the soul to the fear of God, and the fear of God leads to sobriety.” And then the soul begins to see how the demons wage war against it through thoughts, and to repel them—as David also said: “My eye looks upon my enemies” (Ps. 53:9). Encouraging his disciples to engage in such a struggle against the demons, the chief Apostle Peter said: “Be sober and watchful, for your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour; resist him, firm in your faith” (1 Peter 5:8). And the Lord said: “Watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation” (Matthew 26:41). Likewise, Ecclesiastes says: “If the spirit of the ruler comes upon you, do not leave your post” (10:4). The post of the mind is virtue, knowledge, and the fear of God. Finally, the wonderful Apostle, who labored with great sobriety and courage, said: “Though we walk in the flesh, we do not wage war according to the flesh; for the weapons of our warfare are not of the flesh, but are mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds: casting down arguments and every lofty thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ, and being ready to punish every disobedience” (2 Cor. 10:3–6). — So if you, too, imitate the saints and, with great effort, empty yourself of everything for God’s sake, you will be sober-minded.

19. The brother said: “What must one do, Father, to be able to remain constantly with God?” The elder replied: “It is impossible for the mind to remain always with the one God unless it acquires the following three virtues: love, self-control, and prayer. Love tames anger, self-control dries up lust, and prayer, freeing the mind from all thoughts, presents it naked before God Himself. These three virtues embody all truth; and without them, the mind cannot abide with the one God.

20. The brother said: “I beg you, Father, teach me how love tames anger.” The elder replied: “The work of love is to love one’s neighbor and do him good, to be long-suffering toward him, and to endure all that he inflicts, as has often been said. Possessing such qualities, love naturally tames anger in the one who has acquired it.” The brother said: “These are no small matters; but blessed is the one who has been able to acquire it. I, however, am truly far from it; yet I ask you, Father, tell me, what does it mean to be long-suffering?”

21. The elder replied: “To remain steadfast in spirit amid misfortunes, to endure every evil, and to await the end of the trial, without allowing oneself to be overcome by anger, or to speak a foolish word, or to suspect anything, or to think anything unbecoming of a godly person, as Scripture says: “The patient one endures for a time, and afterward joy will be his reward: ‘for a time he hides his words and his mind from the confessions of the faithful’” (Sirach 1:23–24).

22. Such are the characteristics of long-suffering!—And not only this, but also considering oneself to be the cause of temptation is a characteristic of long-suffering. And perhaps this is indeed the case (i.e., that the cause lies within us). For much of what happens to us occurs for our instruction, or for the purification of past sins, or for the correction of present negligence, or for the prevention of future falls. Whoever considers that a temptation has befallen him for any one of the reasons mentioned will not become angry when he is afflicted—especially when he is aware of his own sins at that moment; he will not blame the one through whom the temptation came: for whether through him or through another, he was in any case destined to drink the cup of God’s judgments;—but he will lift his mind to God and give thanks to Him who permitted the temptation, blaming himself alone and willingly accepting correction, as David did toward Shimei and Job toward his wife. But the unwise person often asks God for mercy; yet when mercy comes, he does not accept it, because it did not come as he wished, but as the Physician of the soul judged to be beneficial. That is why he is faint-hearted and restless—sometimes he is angry at people, and at other times he hurls blasphemies at God; and in this way he reveals his ingratitude and fails to receive healing from the rod of discipline.

23. The brother said: “You have explained this well, Father. But I beg you, tell me also how self-restraint dries up lust.” The Elder replied: “Abstinence teaches one to refrain from everything that does not satisfy a necessary need but merely provides pleasure; it does not allow one to touch anything except what is necessary for life; it does not let one pursue what is pleasant but commands one to seek only what is useful; and it instructs one to measure food and drink according to need, to prevent excessive moisture from accumulating in the body, and to sustain the body's life alone, keeping it free from lustful desires. This is how abstinence dries up lust. – On the contrary, pleasure and an abundance of food and drink inflame the belly and kindle the strongest urge of shameful lust, drawing a person, like an irrational animal, toward unlawful mingling. Then the eyes become shameless, the hands are unrestrained, the tongue speaks only what tickles the ear, and the ear willingly listens only to vanity; the mind neglects God, and the soul not only commits adultery in thought but also draws the body into an unseemly act.

24. The brother said: "Truly so, Father. But I ask you to teach me also about prayer, how it detaches the mind from all thoughts." The elder replied: "Our thoughts are ideas about objects, some of which are sensory and others intellectual. When occupied with them, the mind carries within itself and sifts through thoughts about them." But the grace of prayer unites the mind with God, and—by uniting it with God—frees it from all thoughts. Then the mind, conversing with God in its nakedness, becomes godlike. Having become such, it asks God for what is godly, and never fails in its petition (it always receives what it asks for). That is why the Apostle commands us to "pray without ceasing" (1 Thess. 5:17), so that by uniting our minds with God more frequently, we may gradually cast aside our attachment to material things.

25. The brother said: "But how can the mind pray unceasingly? For when we sing or read, when we converse with someone, or serve someone, we naturally distract it with many thoughts and images." The elder replied: "Divine Scripture does not command anything impossible." The Apostle himself, through whom these words were spoken, sang, read, and carried out his (apostolic) ministry—and yet he prayed unceasingly. – To pray unceasingly means to keep one's mind fixed on God with great reverence and fervent desire, to cling to hope in Him, and to trust in Him in all things—in deeds and in circumstances. Being in this frame of mind, the Apostle says: "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress?"—and so on (Rom. 8:35). And shortly thereafter: "I have come to know that neither death nor life, nor angels" (38). And again: "We are afflicted in every way, but not crushed; perplexed, but not driven to despair; persecuted, but not destroyed; always carrying in the body the death of the Lord Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our body" (2 Cor. 4:8–10).

26. Being in this state of mind, the Apostle prayed unceasingly; for in all his affairs and circumstances, as has been said, he clung to the hope of God. And all the saints always rejoiced in their afflictions, hoping through them to attain the perfection of divine love. That is why the Apostle said: "Most gladly, then, I will boast—in my weaknesses, so that the power of Christ may dwell in me" (2 Cor. 12:9). And a little further on: "When I am weak, then I am strong" (v. 10). But woe to us poor souls, for we have strayed from the path of the Holy Fathers, and because of this, we are devoid of any spiritual work.

27. The brother said: "Father, why is it that I have no contrition?" The elder replied: "It is because you and I lack the fear of God before our eyes. It is because we have become a refuge for every kind of evil, and we despise God's terrible punishments as mere fantasies." How could one not be contrite when hearing, for example, Moses speak on behalf of God about sinners: "For a fire will be kindled by My wrath," "it will blaze down to the depths of hell: it will consume the earth and its crops, and burn the foundations of the mountains" (Deut. 32:22–23). And again: "I will sharpen my sword like lightning; my hand will execute judgment; I will take vengeance on my enemies and repay those who hate me" (41). Or as Isaiah cries out: "The lawless in Zion have turned away; terror will seize the wicked; your strength of spirit will be in vain; you will be consumed by fire. Who will tell you that the fire is burning? Who will tell you of the place of everlasting rest?" (Isa. 33:14). And again: "They will go out and see the corpses of those who have rebelled against me; for their worm will not die, and their fire will not be quenched, and they will be a disgrace to all flesh" (Isa. 66:24). Or as Jeremiah says: "Give glory to the Lord your God before it grows dark, and before your feet stumble against the dark mountains; and you will wait for the light, but there will be only the shadow of death, and you will be cast into darkness" (Jer. 13:16). And again: "Hear this, you foolish and senseless people, who have eyes but do not see, and ears but do not hear. Will you not fear Me," says the Lord, "or be ashamed before Me?" (Jer. 5:21–22). And again: "Your apostasy will punish you, and your wickedness will condemn you; acknowledge and see that it is evil and bitter for you to forsake Me, says the Lord... I planted you as a fruitful vine, entirely true; how have you turned into a bitter, foreign vine?" (Jer. 2: 19–21)? And again: "I did not sit among the merry-makers, but I feared the power of your hand; I sat alone, for I was filled with bitterness” (Jer. 15:17). Who, too, would not be horrified upon hearing what Ezekiel says: “Your end has come, and I will pour out my wrath upon you; I will take vengeance on you according to your ways, and I will bring upon you all your abominations. My eye will not spare, nor will I have pity... and you will know that I am the Lord who strikes” (Ezek. 7:3, 9). Who would not be crushed upon hearing how Daniel describes the Day of Judgment, saying: “I looked, and there were thrones set in place, and the Ancient of Days took His seat; His clothing was white as snow, and the hair of His head was like pure wool; His throne was a blazing fire, and its wheels were burning fire. A river of fire was flowing and coming forth from before Him; thousands upon thousands served Him, and myriads stood before Him; the court was seated, and the books were opened” (Dan. 7:9–10), that is, the deeds of each person. And again: “In a night vision, behold, one like a son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and he came to the Ancient of Days and was presented before him; and to him were given dominion and glory and a kingdom, so that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him: His dominion is an everlasting dominion that will not pass away, and His kingdom will never be destroyed. My spirit was greatly agitated within me, I, Daniel, and the visions of my head troubled me” (Dan. 7:13–15).

28. Who will not tremble upon hearing what David says: “God has spoken once; I have heard it twice: for the power belongs to God, and to You, O Lord, is mercy; for You will repay each person according to his deeds” (Ps. 61: 12, 13)? – And again, what does Ecclesiastes say: “The conclusion of the matter: Hear everything, fear God, and keep His commandments, for this applies to every person; for God will bring every creature into judgment for every sin, whether good or evil” (Eccl. 12:13–14)?

29. Who will not tremble upon hearing the same from the Apostle, who says: “For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive what he has done while in the body, whether good or evil”? (2 Cor. 5: 10; Rom. 14: 10). Who, then, will not weep after this over our unbelief and the blindness of our souls—that, having heard all this, we do not repent and shed bitter tears over such negligence and such carelessness on our part, which Jeremiah, foreseeing, said: “Cursed is everyone who does the work of the Lord carelessly” (Jer. 48:10). If we were concerned for the salvation of our souls, we would tremble at the word of the Lord and hasten with all diligence to fulfill His commandments, from which our salvation comes. But we, despite hearing from the Lord Himself, “Enter through the narrow gate that leads to life” (Matt. 7:13–14), have chosen the broad and spacious path that leads to destruction. Therefore, when He comes to judge the living and the dead, we will hear from Him: “Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Matt. 25:41).

30. And we will hear this not only when we commit evil deeds, but also if we neglect to do good and fail to love our neighbor. And if, on top of that, we commit evil deeds, how will we endure that day in such a wretched state of soul? Moreover, we must know that “You shall not commit adultery, You shall not steal, You shall not murder”—and so on—were said to the ancients through Moses (Matt. 5:28). But the Lord, knowing that for a Christian to attain perfection in life, merely observing these commandments is not enough, said: “Truly I tell you, unless your righteousness surpasses that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven.” That is why, both before and after those words, He always demanded perfect holiness of the soul—for the sake of which the body is also sanctified—and prescribed sincere love for all people, through whom we may attain love for Him Himself. He set this example for us in Himself and in His disciples, as has been said many times.

31. What excuse can we have on that day, having such an example before us, yet remaining so negligent? Lamenting over us, Jeremiah says: “Who will give water to my head, and a spring of tears to my eyes, that I may weep day and night” for this people (Jer. 9:1)—that, having been made worthy of such grace, we remain in such negligence, or worse, are filled with every kind of evil. I hear Moses speaking of us as well: “Jacob ate and was satisfied; he grew fat and plump; then he abandoned the God who made him and turned away from the God of his salvation” (Deut. 32:15). Micah also weeps over us, saying: “Woe to me, for my soul! For the righteous have perished from the earth, and there is no one among men who does what is right; everyone wrongs his neighbor with malice; they prepare their hands for evil” (Micah 7:2–3). Likewise, the Psalmist spoke of us, praying: “Save me, O Lord, for the godly have become few; for truth has dwindled among the sons of men” (Ps. 11:2).

32. Mourning for us, the Apostle also speaks prophetically: “They have all turned aside; together they have become worthless; there is no one who does good—not even one. Their throats are open graves; with their tongues they have practiced deceit; the poison of vipers is under their lips; their mouths are full of curses” and bitterness. Destruction and wickedness are in their paths, and they do not know the way of peace. There is no fear of God before their eyes” (Rom. 3:12–18). And again, in a prophetic vision concerning our present evil life, he writes to Timothy: “But know this: in the last days perilous times will come. For people will be self-centered, lovers of money, boastful, arrogant, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, unholy, unloving, unforgiving, slanderers, intemperate, savage, without love, traitors, and reckless”—and so on (2 Tim. 3:1–4). Woe to us, then, for we have reached the very extremes of evil. For who among us is not guilty of the listed forms of wickedness? Has not this prophecy been fulfilled in us? Are we not all gluttons? Are we not all pleasure-seekers? Are we not all madly attached to material things? Are we not all quick-tempered? Are we not all vindictive? Are we not all traitors to every virtue? Are we not all slanderers? Are we not all gossipers? Are we not all disrespectful? Are we not all hostile toward our brothers? Are we not all conceited? Are we not all arrogant? Are we not all proud? Are we not all vain? Are we not all hypocritical? Are we not all deceitful? Are we not all envious? Are we not all disobedient? Are we not all lazy? Are we not all deceitful? Are we not all careless? Are we not all negligent regarding the Savior’s commandments? Are we not all filled with every kind of evil? Have we not become idolatrous shrines instead of temples of God? Instead of the Holy Spirit, a refuge for evil spirits? Do we not call God “Father” only in pretense? Have we not become, instead of sons of God, sons of Gehenna? Have we not become worse than the Jews, we who now bear the great name of Christ? And no one takes offense at hearing such truth. Even those (the Jews), though lawless, said, “We have one Father, God”; but from the Savior they heard, “You are of your father the devil, and you wish to do the desires of your father” (John 8:41, 44).

33. Is it not just for us, who have transgressed His commandments, to hear such things from Him? Behold, the Apostle called those who are led by the Spirit “sons of God.” “As many as are led by the Spirit of God,” he says, “these are the sons of God” (Rom. 8:14). How, then, can we be called children of God when we are led by carnal reasoning? Those who are led by the Spirit, he says, are clearly recognized by the fruits of the Spirit. The spiritual fruit, says the Apostle, is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control (Gal. 5:22). Do we possess any of these? Is it not rather the opposite? Therefore, we ought not to be called children of God, but rather the opposite. That which is born of someone is like the one who begot it. But the Lord says, “What is born of the Spirit is spirit” (John 3:6). We, however, have become flesh that lusts against the Spirit, and therefore the following judgment rightly applies to us: “My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for he is flesh” (Gen. 6:3). How can we even call ourselves Christians when we have nothing of Christ within us?

34. Someone might say: “I have faith in Christ; is this faith in Him alone enough for my salvation?” But the Apostle James counters this, saying: “Even the demons believe—and tremble” (James 2:19). And again: “Faith without works is dead in itself” (17:26).—Do we even believe in Him?! How can we say that we believe Him regarding the future when we do not believe Him regarding the present and the here and now? And we do not believe: for we are attached to material things, we live according to the flesh, and we wage war against the Spirit. But those who truly believe in Christ and have received Him into themselves through the fulfillment of His commandments say: “It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me. And the life I now live in the flesh, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me” (Gal. 2: 20). That is why, suffering for Him for the salvation of others—as faithful imitators of Him and true fulfillers of His commandments—they said: “When we are reviled, we bless; when we are persecuted, we endure; when we are slandered, we comfort” (1 Cor. 4:12). For they heard His word, which commanded: “Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, and pray for those who mistreat you” (Matt. 5:44). Thus, through their words and deeds, Christ, who was at work within them, was revealed. But since we act contrary to all His commandments, we find ourselves filled with every kind of impurity. That is why we have become, instead of the temple of God, a house of commerce; instead of a house of prayer, a den of thieves; instead of a holy race, a sinful race; instead of the people of God, a people filled with sin; instead of the holy seed, an evil seed; instead of the sons of God, sons of lawlessness; For having abandoned the Lord’s commandments, we serve evil spirits through impure passions—and have provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger.

35. That is why the great Isaiah, lamenting over us and at the same time desiring to help us in our fall, cries out, saying: “Why do you continue to wound yourselves by committing lawlessness? Every head is sick, and every heart is in sorrow: from the feet even to the head, there is no soundness in it—neither scab, nor sore, nor a burning wound; there is no bandage to apply, nor oil, nor a dressing?” (1:5–6). What, then, follows from this? “The daughter of Zion will be left like a bush in a vineyard, like a storehouse of fruit in a garden, like a city under siege” (v. 8). Showing us this desolation of our soul, the Apostle also said: “And just as they did not see fit to acknowledge God in their understanding, God gave them over to a depraved mind, to do what ought not to be done—filled with every kind of unrighteousness, wickedness, deceit, and greed; filled with malice, murder, strife, deceit, and malice; whisperers, slanderers, blasphemers, irritators, boastful, proud, inventors of evil, disobedient to parents, senseless, unyielding: unloving, untrustworthy, unmerciful. But some, having come to know God’s righteousness—that those who practice such things deserve death—not only do them themselves but also approve of those who practice them. “For this reason God gave them over to the passions of dishonor, to defile their own bodies among themselves” (Rom. 1:28–32, 26, 24). And what follows from this? “The wrath of God,” it says, “is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men” (v. 18).

36. Signifying this desolation of the soul, the Lord said: “Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I wanted to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing! Your house is left to you desolate” (Matt. 23:37–38). Isaiah again saw how we, monks, perform our services only in a physical sense, while neglecting spiritual service to God; yet, despite this, we are puffed up. He said: “Hear the word of the Lord, you rulers of Sodom; listen to the law of God, you people of Gomorrah. ‘What do I care for your many sacrifices?’ says the Lord. ‘I am sated with burnt offerings of rams and the fat of lambs; I have no desire for the blood of bulls and goats. Who has asked these things from your hands to be carried about in My courtyard? And even if you bring Me a seventh of the grain, it is in vain: incense is an abomination to Me; I will not endure your new moons, your Sabbaths, or your appointed feasts; my soul hates your fasts, your solemn assemblies, and your festivals; you have become a burden to Me—I will not endure your sins. When you spread out your hands to Me, I will turn My eyes away from you; even if you multiply your prayers, I will not listen to you.” Why is that? “For,” He says, “your hands are full of blood” (Isaiah 1:10–15), since “whoever hates his brother is a murderer” (1 John 3:15). Therefore, any ascetic labor devoid of love is displeasing to God.

37. And God, exposing our hypocrisy from afar, says: “These people honor Me with their lips, but their hearts are far from Me; in vain do they worship Me”—and so on (Isaiah 29:13). And what our Lord said in rebuking the Pharisees is very applicable to us, the hypocrites of today, who, having been granted such grace, turn out to be even worse than they were in character. Do we not also tie up heavy and unbearable burdens and lay them on people’s shoulders, while we ourselves do not even want to touch them with a finger (Luke 11:46)? – Do we not also do all our deeds so that we may be seen by others (Matt. 6:5)? Do we not also love to take the places of honor at banquets and to sit in the front rows at assemblies? Do we not also love to be called “Teacher, Teacher” by people—and do we not even persecute to the point of death those who do not accord us such honor? Have we not also taken the key of understanding, yet instead of opening the way with it, we shut the kingdom of heaven before people—so that we ourselves do not enter and do not let others enter either? Are we not also blind leaders, who strain out a gnat but swallow a camel? Do we not also clean the outside of the cup and the plate, while inside we are full of robbery, greed, and intemperance? Do we not also tithe mint, dill, and cumin, yet neglect justice and the love of God? Are we not like whitewashed tombs, appearing righteous to people on the outside, yet inside filled with hypocrisy, lawlessness, and every kind of impurity? Do we not build the tombs of the martyrs and adorn the reliquaries of the Apostles, while in character we are like those who killed them (Matt. 23: 3–32)? Who, then, will not weep for us in this condition? Who will not pity our captivity? For because of this, we, the honorable sons of God, have been counted as earthen vessels. Because of this, our gold has grown dim, and our fine silver has changed (Lamentations 4:1–2). Because of this, we, the Nazirites of Zion, who shone brighter than snow, have become like Ethiopians—once whiter than milk, now blacker than ink. Because of this, our appearance has turned blacker than soot; our iniquity has increased beyond the iniquities of Sodom; because of this, we, the sons of the day and of light, have become sons of the night and of darkness (1 Thess. 5:5). Because of this, we, the sons of the kingdom, have become sons of Gehenna. Because of this, we, the sons of the Most High, die like men, and fall like one of the princes (Ps. 80:7). For this reason, we have been delivered into the hands of lawless enemies—that is, the evil and ferocious demons—and to the most unrighteous and deceitful ruler on earth, that is, their prince Satan, for we have sinned and committed lawlessness by transgressing the commandments of the Lord our God (Dan. 3: 29–32), having trampled underfoot the Son of God and regarded the blood of the covenant as nothing (Heb. 10: 29). But, O Lord, “do not deliver us up to the end, for the sake of Your name; do not destroy

Your covenant, and do not withdraw Your mercy from us” (Dan. 3: 34–35), for the sake of Your bountifulness, our Father who art in heaven, for the sake of the goodwill of Your Only-Begotten Son, and for the sake of the mercy of Your Holy Spirit. “Do not remember our former iniquities; may Your bounties, O Lord, quickly come upon us, for we have become very poor. Help us, O God, our Savior, for the glory of Your name; O Lord, deliver us and cleanse us of our sins for the sake of Your name” (Ps. 78: 8:9), remembering our origin, which Your Only-Begotten Son, out of love for mankind, took from us and now holds for us in heaven, giving us a firm hope of salvation, lest we become worse through despair. Help us and deliver us, for the sake of His precious blood, which He shed for the life of the world; for the sake of His holy Apostles and martyrs, who shed their blood for His name; and for the sake of the holy Prophets, Fathers, and Patriarchs, who strove to please Your holy name. Do not despise our prayers, O Lord, and do not forsake us in the end. For we do not trust in our own righteousness, but in Your mercy, by which You provide for our people. We pray to You and ask for Your grace, that the sacrament prepared for us by Your Only-Begotten Son for our salvation may not be a cause of condemnation for us; do not cast us away from Your presence. Do not despise our unworthiness, but have mercy on us according to Your great mercy; and by the abundance of Your bounties, cleanse us of our iniquities, so that, having approached the face of Your glory without condemnation, we may be made worthy of the protection of Your Only-Begotten Son, and not be found to be deceitful and unrepentant slaves to our sins. O Almighty Lord, hear our prayer, for we know no other God but You; we call upon Your name. You are the One who works all things in all, and from You we seek all help. Look down from heaven, O God, and behold us from the dwelling place of Your holy glory. “Where is Your zeal and Your strength? Where is the abundance of Your mercy and Your kindness, since You have been patient with us? For You are our Father, since Abraham did not beget us, nor did Israel give birth to us; but You, O Lord, are our Father; save us, for from the beginning Your holy name has been upon us”—and Your Only-Begotten Son and Your Holy Spirit. “Why have You led us astray, O Lord, from Your way, and hardened our hearts so that we do not fear You?” Bring back Your servants, O Lord, for the sake of Your holy Church and for the sake of all Your saints from of old; “that we may at least inherit Your holy mountains: our enemies have trampled Your sanctuary. We were as in the beginning, when You did not rule over us, nor was Your name called upon us” (Isaiah 63:15–19).

38. “If the heavens were to be opened, the mountains would tremble before You and melt away, as wax melts before the fire; the fire would consume Your enemies, and Your name would be feared by those who oppose You. When You perform Your glorious deeds, the mountains will tremble before You. From of old we have not heard, nor have our eyes seen a God, except You, and Your works, which You will do for those who wait for Your mercy. For mercy is reserved for those who do what is right, and Your ways will be remembered: You were angry, and we have sinned.”—It would be better to say: we have sinned, and You were angry. “For this reason we have gone astray, and we have all become like the unclean, like a city of the unclean; all our righteousness is like this: and we have fallen away like leaves because of our iniquities; so the wind carries us away, and there is no one to call upon Your name or to remember to hold You back; for You have turned Your face away from us and delivered us up because of our iniquities. And now, O Lord, You are our Father; we are the work of Your hands, all of us. Do not be too angry with us, and do not remember our iniquities in the time of judgment; but look upon us now, for we are all Your people. The city of Your sanctuary lies desolate; Zion is like a wilderness; Jerusalem has become a curse. Our holy house, and the glory which our fathers blessed, has been consumed by fire, and all our glory has fallen together. And You, O Lord, have endured all these things; You have remained silent and have humbled us greatly” (Isaiah 64:1–12).

39. This happened to Your ancient people as a foreshadowing, but now it has truly been fulfilled in us. “We have become a byword to our neighbors,” the demons, “a mockery and a scorn to those around us” (Ps. 78:4). But look down from heaven and see, and save us for the sake of Your holy name. Grant us to discern the schemes of our enemies and deliver us from their wiles. Do not withhold Your help from us, for we are not sufficient in ourselves to defeat those who attack us; but You are mighty to save us from all our enemies. Save us, O Lord, from all the afflictions of this world, through Your goodness, so that, having crossed the sea of life with a clear conscience, we may appear pure and blameless before Your awesome throne and be made worthy of eternal life.

40. After hearing all this and being overcome with deep contrition, the brother said to the elder with tears in his eyes: “As far as I can see, my father, there is no hope of salvation for me. ‘For my iniquities have overtaken my head’ (Ps. 37: 5). Tell me, I beg you, what should I do?” The elder replied: “It is impossible for people to save themselves; but with God all things are possible, as the Lord Himself said (Matt. 19: 26), and so 'let us present ourselves before Him in confession... let us worship and bow down before Him, and weep before the Lord who made us: for He is our God' (Ps. 94: 2:6), for we hear His word spoken through the Prophet Isaiah: "When you return, you will be saved" (Isa. 30: 15). And again: "Can the hand of the Lord not save? Or has He made His ear too heavy to hear? But your sins have come between you and God; because of your sins, He has turned His face away from you, so that He may not have mercy" (Isa. 59: 1–2). Why does He say: "Wash yourselves; be clean; remove the wickedness from your souls before My eyes; cease from your wickedness; learn to do good; seek justice; defend the oppressed; judge for the fatherless; plead the cause of the widow; then come, and let us reason together," says the Lord. "Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they are red as crimson, they shall be as white as wool. "And if you are willing and obedient, you shall eat the good of the land; for the mouth of the Lord has spoken these words" (Isa. 1: 16 – 20); He also speaks through Joel: "Return to Me with all your heart, with fasting, weeping, and mourning; rend your hearts, not your garments, and return to the Lord your God, for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love" (Joel 2: 12–13). And to Ezekiel He commanded, "Say: 'Son of man, speak to the house of Israel, saying: "Our transgressions and our iniquities are upon us, and we are consumed by them; how then can we live?" Say to them: 'As I live,' declares the Lord God, 'I take no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but rather that the wicked turn from his ways and live; turn back, turn back from your evil ways! Why should you die, O house of Israel?'" (Ezek. 33:10–11). The Third Book of Kings, showing the abundance of God's goodness, says this: When Ahab—who was in the vineyard of Naboth, which he had taken as an inheritance after Jezebel had Naboth killed—heard the words of Elijah, who said: "Thus says the Lord: Because you have killed and taken possession—in the very place where the dogs licked up his blood, there the dogs will lick up your blood as well... And Jezebel's dogs will devour her in the outskirts of Jezreel." When Ahab heard these words, he hid himself from the Lord's presence; he went about weeping, tore his clothes, and girded himself with a sackcloth, and fasted, and "was clothed in sackcloth" day and night. "And the word of the Lord came to Elijah, saying, 'Have you seen how Ahab has humbled himself before Me? Therefore, I will not bring the evil upon him during his lifetime'" (1 Kings 21:19, 23, 27, 29). And the prophet David says: "I acknowledged my iniquity and did not conceal my sin. I said, 'I will confess my transgressions to the Lord,' and You forgave the iniquity of my heart. Therefore, every godly person will pray to You in times of need" (Ps. 31: 5, 6). In the Gospel, the Lord says: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 4: 17). And when Peter asked Him, "How many times, if my brother sins against me, shall I forgive him—up to seven times?" Being by nature good and inexpressibly merciful, He answered him: "I do not say to you, up to seven times, but up to seventy times seven" (Matt. 18:21–22). What can compare to such mercy? To what shall we liken such love for humanity?

41. Having thus come to know the fear of God, as well as His goodness and love for humanity, from both the Old and New Testaments, let us turn to Him with all our hearts. Why should we perish, brothers? Let us cleanse our sinful hands, reform our double-minded hearts, grieve, be contrite, and weep over our sins. Let us cease from our evil deeds; let us trust in the Lord's mercy, fear His judgments, and resolve to keep His commandments. Let us love one another with all our hearts; let us say, "You are our brothers"—and may the name of the Lord be glorified even by those who hate and revile us. Let us forgive one another when we are tempted by one another, for we are all fought against by our common enemy. Let us resist our evil thoughts, calling God to fight alongside us, and thereby drive out from within ourselves the evil and unclean spirits. Let us subdue the flesh to the spirit, mortifying it and bringing it into subjection through all manner of afflictions. Let us purify ourselves from every defilement of the flesh and the spirit. Let us encourage one another in love and good deeds. Let us not envy others, nor become angry with those who envy us. Let us show mutual compassion and heal one another with humility. Let us not condemn or mock one another, for we are members of one another. Let us cast aside apathy and carelessness, and let us courageously strive against the evil spirits. We have Jesus Christ the Righteous One as our Advocate before the Father; and He is the atonement for our sins: let us therefore pray to Him with a pure heart, with all our soul, and He will forgive our sins. "For the Lord is near to all who call upon Him in truth" (Ps. 144: 18). Why does it say: "Offer to the Lord a sacrifice of praise, and pay your vows to the Most High; call upon Me in the day of your distress, and you will be delivered, and you will glorify Me" (Ps. 49: 14:15). And what does Isaiah say again? "Loose every yoke of injustice, tear up the deeds of oppression, set the oppressed free, and tear up every unjust decree. Break your bread for the hungry, and bring the poor and homeless into your house; if you see a naked person, do not turn away, and do not despise your own kin. Then your light will break forth like the dawn, and your healing will quickly appear; your righteousness will go before you, and the glory of the Lord will surround you.” And what comes next?—“Then you will call, and God will answer you; while you are still speaking, He will say, ‘Here I am.’ Then your light will shine in the darkness, and your darkness will be as the noonday; and your God will be with you always, and you will be satisfied as your soul desires” (Isaiah 58:6–10). Do you see that when we break every bond of injustice and set our hearts on doing good to our neighbor with all our soul, then we will be clothed in the light of knowledge, freed from the passions of wickedness, filled with every virtue, illuminated by the light of God’s glory, and delivered from all ignorance; —and as we pray to Christ, we will be heard, and we will always have God with us and be filled with divine desires.

42. Let us love one another, and we will be loved by God. Let us be patient with one another, and He will be patient with our sins. Let us not repay evil with evil, and He will not repay us according to our sins. We will find the remission of our sins in forgiving our brothers; for God’s mercy toward us is hidden in our mercy toward our neighbors. That is why the Lord said: “Forgive, and you will be forgiven” (Luke 6:37). And: “For if you forgive others their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you” (Matthew 6:14). And again: “Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy” (Matthew 5:7). And: “With the measure you use, it will be measured to you” (Matthew 7:2). Thus the Lord has prepared for us the way of salvation, “and granted us the right to become children of God” (John 1:12). After this, our salvation is already in our hands.

43. Let us therefore surrender ourselves entirely to the Lord, that we may receive Him entirely, and through Him become gods. For this is why He became man, being by nature God and Lord. Let us submit to Him wholeheartedly, and He will tirelessly repel our enemies. “If only my people would listen to Me,” He says, “Israel, if only they would walk in My ways, I would subdue their enemies for them; and I would lay My hand upon those who oppress them” (Ps. 80: 14–15). Let us place all our hope in Him alone; let us cast all our sorrow upon Him—and He will deliver us from every affliction and sustain us throughout our lives. Let us love every person with all our heart; but let us not place our hope in any person. Only to the extent that the Lord protects us do our friends help us and our enemies grow weak before us. But when the Lord forsakes us, then our friends also forsake us (leaving us helpless), and our enemies overcome us. But even those who trust in themselves will fall a terrible fall, while those who fear the Lord will be exalted. That is why David said: “I do not trust in my bow, nor will my sword save me; for You have saved us from those who hate us, and You have put to shame those who hate us” (Ps. 43:7–8).

44. Let us not entertain thoughts that downplay our sins and deceptively assure us that they have already been forgiven. It was to warn us against such thoughts that the Lord said: “Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep’s clothing but inwardly are ravenous wolves” (Matt. 7:15). As long as our minds are still troubled by sin, know that we have not yet attained its forgiveness; for we have certainly not yet produced fruits worthy of repentance. The fruit of repentance is the dispassion of the soul; and dispassion is the eradication of sin. We do not yet possess perfect dispassion if at times we are troubled by passions and at other times we are not. We have not, therefore, attained perfect forgiveness of sins. We were freed from original sin through holy baptism; from those sins which we dared to commit after baptism, we are freed only through repentance.

45. Let us therefore repent sincerely, so that, having been freed from passions, we may attain the remission of sins. Let us despise temporal goods, lest, by quarreling with others over them, we violate the commandment of love and fall away from the love of God. Let us walk by the Spirit and not fulfill the desires of the flesh (Gal. 5:16). Let us be vigilant and sober, and shake off the slumber of carelessness; let us emulate the holy ascetics of Christ and imitate their deeds, forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what lies ahead. Let us imitate their tireless zeal, their fervent dedication, their steadfastness in self-control, the holiness of chastity, the steadfastness of patience, the unshakable serenity, the sincerity of compassion, the imperturbable meekness, the warmth of zeal, the genuine love, the lofty humility, the perfect detachment from worldly goods, the courage, the benevolence, and the quiet demeanor. Let us not indulge in the pursuit of pleasure; let us not allow our thoughts to grow lax; let us not defile our conscience. Let us live in peace with all and in holiness, without which no one will see the Lord (Heb. 12:14). Above all, brothers, let us flee from the world and from the ruler of this world. Let us renounce the flesh and its desires. Let us ascend to heaven and there establish our dwelling place, imitating the divine Apostle, so that we may reach the Prince of Life and partake of the fountain of life. Let us form a choir with the Angels and Archangels, and let us sing the praises of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be glory and power with the Father and the Holy Spirit, now and ever and to the ages of ages. Amen.

2. Four Hundred Chapters on Love

Preface to Elpidios

I am sending you, Father Elpidios, a treatise on the ascetic life, as well as a treatise on love comprising four hundred chapters—equal in number to the four Gospels—which may not entirely meet your expectations, but is the best we can offer. Nevertheless, let your holiness know that this, too, is not the fruit of my own mind. But having read the writings of the Holy Fathers and gathered from them what draws the mind's attention to my subject—and having condensed much into a little in the form of sayings or chapters for the sake of easier memorization and mental review— I am sending this to Your Reverence, asking that you read it with a good intention, seeking only benefit, and paying no attention to the lack of eloquence, and that you pray for my unworthiness, which is devoid of any spiritual fruit. I also ask that you not regard what is written as a burden (as if I were placing heavy burdens on your conscience); for I am fulfilling the commandment of obedience. I say this because there are many of us today who weigh down consciences with instructive words, but very few who teach by example or learn from example. Take the trouble to delve more carefully into each chapter. For not everything, I think, is easily understood by everyone; but much of it will require much study on the part of many, even though, on the surface, it is expressed very simply. It may be that what is revealed in them in this way will also prove beneficial to the soul. But this will certainly be the case, by God's grace, if one reads not with a skeptical spirit, but with the fear of God and love. Whoever reads this or any other book not for spiritual benefit, but to find statements with which to reproach the author, in order to vainly show himself to be more knowledgeable than the author, will find nothing useful revealed to him anywhere, ever, or in any way.

The First Hundred on Love

1. Love is a benevolent disposition of the soul, by which it prefers nothing in existence to the knowledge of God. But it is impossible for anyone who is attached to anything earthly to attain such a loving disposition.

2. Love is born of dispassion; dispassion, of hope in God; hope, of patience and magnanimity; these last two, of self-restraint in all things; self-restraint, of the fear of God; and the fear of God, of faith in the Lord.

3. One who believes in the Lord fears the torments of hell. One who fears these torments refrains from passions. One who refrains from passions patiently endures sorrows. One who endures sorrows will place hope in God. Hope in God detaches the mind from every earthly attachment. A mind detached from this will come to love God.

4. One who loves God prefers the knowledge of God to all that He has created, and constantly strives for it with eagerness.

5. If all that exists comes into being through God and for God, and God is best known through that which has come into being through Him, then one who turns away from God and occupies himself with lower things thereby shows that he prefers to God that which has come into being through Him.

6. Whose mind is attached to God by love regards all visible things as nothing, even his own body as if it were foreign.

7. If the soul is better than the body, and God, who created it, is incomparably better than the world, then one who prefers the body to the soul, and the world created by God to God Himself, is no different from an idolater.

8. Whoever turns his mind away from love for God and from abiding in His presence, and instead attaches it to anything sensual, prefers the body to the soul, and what came into being through Him to God the Creator.

9. If the life of the mind is the enlightenment of knowledge, and this light is born of love for God, then it is rightly said that there is nothing higher than divine love.

10. When, drawn by love, the mind ascends to God, it perceives neither itself nor anything else that exists at all. Illuminated by the boundless divine light, it becomes insensitive to all creation, just as the physical eye is to the stars when the sun shines.

11. All virtues assist the mind in loving God, but above all, pure prayer. Lifted up to God by it, the mind is beyond all that exists.

12. When, through love, the mind is enraptured by divine knowledge and, having transcended all that exists, perceives divine boundlessness—then, following the example of the divine Isaiah, having come to realize his own insignificance out of amazement, he sincerely proclaims the words of this prophet: “Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips; yet with my own eyes I have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts” (Isa. 6:5).

13. One who loves God cannot help but love every person as oneself, even though one does not approve of the passions of those who have not yet been purified. Therefore, when one sees their conversion and reform, one rejoices with immeasurable and inexpressible joy.

14. An impure, passionate soul is filled with lustful and hateful thoughts.

15. Anyone who sees in his heart a trace of hatred toward any person, for any transgression, is completely alien to the love of God. For love of God in no way tolerates hatred of a person.

16. “Whoever loves Me,” says the Lord, “will keep My commandments” (John 14:15). “And this is My commandment: that you love one another” (John 15:12). Therefore, whoever does not love his neighbor does not keep the commandments; and whoever does not keep the commandments cannot love the Lord either.

17. Blessed is the person who can love everyone equally.

18. Blessed is the person who is not attached to any mortal or temporary thing.

19. Blessed is the mind that, transcending all creation, delights unceasingly in divine beauty.

20. Whoever, in caring for the flesh to the point of lust, bears a grudge against a neighbor over something temporary, serves the creature more than the Creator.

21. Whoever guards his body against indulgences and illnesses has in it a partner in the service of what is best.

22. He who flees all worldly desires places himself above all worldly sorrows.

23. He who loves God inevitably loves his neighbor as well. And such a person cannot hoard his possessions, but manages them in a godly manner, giving to everyone who asks.

24. One who practices charity, imitating God, makes no distinction between the wicked and the good, between the righteous and the unrighteous, in matters of bodily needs. But he distributes equally to all, in proportion to their need; though he prefers the virtuous to the wicked because of the good disposition of their will.

25. Just as God, who is by nature good and dispassionate, loves everyone equally as His creatures, yet glorifies the virtuous as kindred to Him in character, and shows mercy to the wicked out of His goodness, and, while punishing them in this age, brings them to repentance: so too does a man of sound mind and free from passion love all people equally—the virtuous by nature and because of the goodness of their will, and the wicked, both by nature and out of compassion, showing them mercy as those who are foolish and walking in darkness.

26. The disposition of love is shown not only by the distribution of one’s possessions, but even more so by the teaching of God’s Word and by physical service.

27. One who has sincerely renounced worldly things and serves his neighbor out of love without hypocrisy is more quickly freed from every passion and becomes a partaker of divine love and divine knowledge.

28. One who has acquired divine love within himself, like the divine Jeremiah, “is not weary of following the Lord his God” (Jer. 17:16); but he courageously endures every hardship, insult, and reproach, harboring no ill will whatsoever toward anyone.

29. When you are insulted by someone or humiliated in any way, guard against thoughts of anger, lest they—by severing you from love because of this insult—lead you into the realm of hatred.

30. When you suffer from reproach or dishonor, know that you have received great benefit from it, for through this humiliation, pride has been providentially driven out of you.

31. Just as the memory of fire does not warm the body, so faith without love does not produce the light of knowledge in the soul.

32. Just as the light of the sun draws a healthy eye toward itself, so the knowledge of God naturally draws a pure mind toward itself through love.
33. A pure mind is one that has emerged from ignorance and is enlightened by the Divine light.
34. A pure soul is one that has been freed from passions and is constantly rejoiced by divine love.
35. Passion is worthy of censure, as it is an unnatural movement of the soul.
36. Impassivity is a peaceful state of the soul in which it is not easily moved toward evil.
37. Whoever has, through his own diligence, attained the fruits of love will not turn away from it, even if he were to endure a thousand evils. Let Stephen, a disciple of Christ, and those like him, and Christ Himself—who prayed to the Father for His murderers and asked Him to forgive them, since they were acting in ignorance (Luke 23:34)—bear witness to this.
38. If the nature of love is to be patient and kind (1 Cor. 13:4), then it is evident that one who is angry and malicious is alien to love. But one who is alien to love is alien to God, for “God is love” (1 John 4:8).
39. “Do not say, ‘We are the temple of God,’” says the divine Jeremiah (7:4). Do not say, “Faith in our Lord Jesus Christ alone can save me.” For this is impossible unless you also acquire love for Him, demonstrated by your deeds. As for faith alone: “Even the demons believe—and tremble” (James 2:19).
40. The works of love consist of: zealous kindness toward one’s neighbor, generosity, patience, and the prudent use of material goods.
41. One who loves God grieves no one, nor is he grieved by anyone over temporary matters; rather, he grieves and is grieved by a single saving sorrow, the kind with which the blessed Paul himself was grieved and with which he grieved the Corinthians (2 Cor. 2:4).
42. One who loves God lives an angelic life on earth, fasting and keeping vigil, singing and praying, and always thinking well of every person.
43. If everyone strives to attain whatever they desire, yet God is incomparably better and more desirable than all goods and desired things—what zeal, then, must we show to attain Him, who is by nature good and desirable?
44. Do not corrupt your flesh with shameful deeds; do not defile your soul with evil thoughts; and the peace of God will descend upon you, bringing love with it.
45. Exhaust your flesh through fasting and vigil; and do not be lazy in your practice of psalm-singing and prayer; and the sanctification of chastity will descend upon you, bringing love with it.
46. He who has been deemed worthy of divine knowledge and has attained its enlightenment through love never becomes puffed up with a spirit of vanity; but he who has not been deemed worthy of it is very easily led astray by it. However, if such a person, in everything he does, keeps his eyes fixed on God, doing all things for His sake, then with God’s help he will easily avoid this affliction.
47. One who has not yet attained divine knowledge, inspired by love, often thinks that what he does is according to God; but one who has been deemed worthy to receive such knowledge from the heart repeats the words of Patriarch Abraham, which he spoke when he was honored by God’s appearance: “I am but dust and ashes” (Gen. 18: 27).
48. He who fears the Lord has humility as his constant companion, and through its reminders he returns to love and gratitude toward God. Recalling his former life according to the spirit of the world, his various transgressions, the temptations he faced from his youth, and how the Lord delivered him from all of them and led him from a life of passion to a life according to God, he receives both fear and love; and ceaselessly, with deep humility, gives thanks to God, the benefactor and ruler of our lives.
49. Do not defile your mind by harboring thoughts of lust and anger, lest, having fallen away from pure prayer, you fall into a spirit of despondency.
50. The mind loses its boldness before God when it converses with evil and impure thoughts.
51. The foolish person, driven by passions, when stirred up by anger, becomes agitated and hastens without reason to flee from his brothers; but when inflamed by lust, he then, repenting, returns and engages in conversation with them. The prudent person, however, acts differently in both cases. When angered, he cuts off the causes of his agitation and frees himself from resentment toward his brothers; when overcome by lust, he refrains from unspoken urges and idle conversation.
52. During times of temptation, do not leave your monastery; but courageously endure the turmoil of thoughts, especially those that bring sorrow and despondency: for in this way, having been wisely tested by afflictions, you will gain firm hope in God. But if you leave it, you will prove yourself to be neither skilled, nor courageous, nor steadfast.

53. If you wish not to fall away from divine love, then do not let your brother go to sleep while he is angry with you, nor go to sleep yourself while you are angry with him: “but go and be reconciled to your brother, and when you return” (Matt. 5:24) with a clear conscience, offer Christ the gift of love in earnest prayer.

54. If, according to the words of the Divine Apostle, one who possesses all the gifts of the Spirit but has no love gains nothing, then what diligence must we exercise to acquire it (1 Cor. 13:3)?

55. If love “does no harm to a sincere person” (Rom. 13:10), then does not the one who envies his brother, who is grieved by his brother’s good reputation, who tarnishes his name with slander, or who maliciously accuses him out of ill will, make himself an enemy of love and subject himself to eternal condemnation?

56. If love is “the fulfillment of the law” (Rom. 13:10), then is not the one who bears a grudge against a brother, plots against him, curses him, and rejoices in his downfall a transgressor of the law, and is he not worthy of eternal torment?

57. If “whoever slanders a brother or condemns a brother slanders the law and condemns the law” (James 4:11), and since the law of Christ is love (John 13:34), does the slanderer not fall away from the love of Christ and make himself guilty of eternal torment?

58. Do not lend your ear to the tongue of the slanderer, nor your tongue to the ear of one who delights in evil speech, whether speaking or listening to words against a neighbor: lest you fall away from divine love and find yourself alienated from eternal life.

59. Do not accept reproach against your father, nor encourage anyone who dishonors him; lest the Lord be angered by your deeds and cut you off from the land of the living.

60. Shut out the slanderer’s words—let them not enter your ears—lest you sin with him a double sin: by becoming accustomed to this destructive passion yourself, and by failing to prevent him from slandering your neighbor.

61. “But I say to you,” says the Lord, “love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who persecute you” (Matt. 5:44). Why did He command this?—To free you from hatred, grief, anger, and resentment, and to enable you to attain the greatest treasure of perfect love; which cannot be possessed by anyone who does not love all people equally, following the example of God, who loves all people equally, “who desires all people to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4).

62. “But I say to you, do not resist an evildoer; but if anyone strikes you on the right cheek, turn the other to him as well; and if anyone wants to sue you and take your tunic, let him have your cloak as well; and if anyone forces you to go one mile, go with him two” (Matt. 5, 39–41). Why? So that you may remain free from anger, anxiety, and sorrow—and so that your lack of malice may teach him, and both of you may be brought under the yoke of love, for the Lord is good.

63. We harbor passionate imaginings about the very things to which we were once attached. That is why the one who overcomes passionate imaginings naturally despises the imagined things as well. For the struggle against memories of things is just as much more difficult as the struggle against the things themselves, just as it is easier to sin in thought than in deed.

64. Some passions are bodily, and others are of the soul. Bodily passions are prompted by the body, while those of the soul are prompted by external objects. But both are cut off by love and self-restraint: the former by love, and the latter by self-restraint.

65. Some passions belong to the soul’s irritable faculty, and others to its desiring faculty. Both are aroused by the senses; they are aroused when the soul is devoid of love and self-restraint.

66. It is more difficult to overcome the passions of the soul’s irritable faculty than those of the desiring faculty; that is why the Lord has provided the most powerful remedy against them—the commandment of love.

67. All other passions concern only either the irritable part of the soul, or the desiring part, or the thinking part, such as forgetfulness and ignorance; but despondency, encompassing all the powers of the soul, suddenly, in a single breath, sets almost all the passions in motion, which is why it is more grievous than all other passions. The Lord, in His goodness, having provided a remedy against it, says: “By your endurance you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19).

68. Never strike any of the brothers, especially without cause, lest he, unable to bear the sorrow, depart; and then you will never escape the reproach of your conscience, which will always cause you sorrow during prayer and drive your mind away from boldness before God.

69. Do not tolerate those who bring you the temptations of suspicion regarding any person whatsoever, for those who in any way allow themselves to be tempted by events—whether they occur intentionally or unintentionally—do not know “the way of peace” (Rom. 3: 17), which, through love, leads those who love Him to the knowledge of God.

70. One who treats people differently according to their dispositions—loving one and hating another for this or that reason, or sometimes loving and sometimes hating the same person for the same reasons—does not yet possess perfect love.

71. Perfect love does not divide the single nature of human beings according to their different dispositions; but, always regarding that nature, loves all people equally: loving the good as friends and the wicked as enemies, doing them good, being long-suffering, enduring what they inflict, by no means repaying them with evil, but even suffering for them when circumstances require it, so that, if possible, they too may become friends; but even if this is impossible, He does not withdraw His favor from them, always showing the fruits of love equally to all people. So too our Lord and God, Jesus Christ, in showing His love for us, suffered for all humanity and granted to all equally the hope of the resurrection, although, of course, each person makes himself worthy of either glory or the torments of hell.

72. Whoever does not regard glory and disgrace, wealth and poverty, joys and sorrows as nothing has not yet attained perfect love. Perfect love not only regards all these things as nothing, but also temporal life and death themselves.

73. Listen to what those who have attained perfect love say: “Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword? As it is written, ‘For Your sake we are being put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep to be slaughtered.’ But in all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us. For I know that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other created thing, will be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 8:35–39).

74. Listen again to what they say about love for one’s neighbor: “I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying, as my conscience testifies to me through the Holy Spirit—that I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart; for I could wish that I myself were cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who are Israelites,” and so on. (Rom. 9:1–4). Moses and other saints spoke in the same way.

75. Whoever does not regard ambition and sensuality—and the greed that results from them and is born of them—as anything at all cannot cut off the causes of angry irritation; and whoever does not cut them off cannot attain perfect love.

76. Humility and self-mortification (physical privations) free a person from all sin; for the former cuts off the passions of the soul, and the latter those of the body. This is what the blessed David did, as is evident from his following prayer to God: “Behold my humility and my toil, and forgive all my sins” (Ps. 24:18).

77. Through the commandments, the Lord makes those who keep them dispassionate; and through the divine dogmas, He grants them the light of knowledge.

78. All dogmas speak either of God, or of visible and invisible creations, or of the providence and judgment revealed in them.

79. Almsgiving heals the irritable part of the soul; fasting dries up lust; prayer purifies the mind and prepares it for the contemplation of reality. For the Lord has given us commandments according to the capacities of our souls.

80. “Learn from Me,” says the Lord, “for I am gentle and humble in heart” (Matt. 11:29). Gentleness protects the irritable mind from agitation, and humility frees the mind from pride and vanity.

81. The fear of God is twofold. One arises from the threat of punishment, which in turn gives rise within us, in due course, to self-restraint, patience, hope in God, and dispassion, from which love springs. The other is connected with love itself, producing reverence in the soul so that, out of the boldness of love, it does not fall into contempt for God.

82. The first kind of fear is “driven out” by perfect love (1 John 4:18), which has dispelled it from the soul, leaving it no longer afraid of torment; but the second kind, as has been said, is always accompanied by love. The following words of Scripture apply to the first: “The fear of the Lord turns a person away from evil” (Prov. 15:27); “and: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Prov. 1:7); and to the second: “The fear of the Lord is pure, enduring forever and ever” (Ps. 18: 10); “and: there is no want for those who fear Him” (Ps. 33: 10).

83. “Put to death, therefore, your earthly members: sexual immorality, impurity, passion, evil desire, and greed, and so on” (Col. 3: 5). Here the Apostle calls carnal reasoning “the earth”; fornication, the sin committed in deed; impurity, consent to it; passion, a passionate thought; evil desire, the mere acceptance of a lustful thought; and greed, the substance that gives rise to and sustains passion. The Divine Apostle commanded that all these, as elements of carnal reasoning, be put to death.

84. First, memory brings a simple thought into the mind; and if it lingers there, this sets passion in motion; if you do not eradicate passion, it inclines the mind toward consent; and when this happens, then one has already reached the point of sin in deed. That is why the most wise Apostle, writing to Christians who had converted from paganism, first commands them to cease committing sin in deed, and then, moving backward to the previous order, to reach the very cause of it. The cause that gives rise to and rekindles passions, as stated above, is greed, which, in my opinion, here signifies gluttony, as the mother and nurturer of fornication. For gluttony—not only with regard to possessions but also with regard to food—is evil; just as self-restraint—not only with regard to food but also with regard to possessions—is good.

85. Just as a bird tied by the leg, having begun to rise upward, is pulled back down to the ground by the rope: so the mind, not yet having attained dispassion, though it soars toward the knowledge of heavenly things, is pulled back down to the ground by its passions.

86. When the mind is completely freed from passions, it then proceeds unhindered toward the contemplation of being, directing its path toward the knowledge of the Holy Trinity.

87. When the mind is pure, upon receiving concepts of things, it is stirred to spiritual contemplation of them; but when it becomes impure through sloth, it simply imagines thoughts of other things, and when it perceives anything human, it transforms it into shameful and evil thoughts.

88. If no worldly thought ever assails your mind during prayer, know that you are not outside the realm of dispassion.

89. When the soul begins to feel healthy, it will also begin to have pure and serene dreams.

90. Just as the physical eye is drawn to the beauty of visible things, so is the pure mind drawn to the knowledge of the invisible. By “invisible,” I mean the incorporeal.

91. It is a great feat not to be attached to things, but it is far greater to be dispassionate toward their images; for through our thoughts, evil spirits wage war against us—a war more fierce than the one waged through the things themselves.

92. One who has excelled in virtue and been enriched with knowledge—seeing things as they truly are by nature—always acts and speaks according to sound reason, never deviating from it. For it is by this standard that we judge whether we use things wisely or unwise, and whether we are virtuous or vicious.

93. The sign of perfect dispassion is when, both while awake and asleep, images of things always arise in the heart in their simplest form.

94. By fulfilling the commandments, the mind is freed from the passions; through spiritual contemplation of the visible, it is freed from passionate thoughts about things; through knowledge of the invisible, it is freed from the contemplation of visible things; and finally, through knowledge of the Holy Trinity, it is freed even from the very knowledge of invisible things.

95. Just as the sun, rising and illuminating the world, reveals both itself and the objects it illuminates, so the Sun of Righteousness, shining in a pure mind, reveals both Himself and the understanding of all that has come into being from Him and all that is to come into being.

96. We know God not by His essence, but by the splendor of His creations and His providence over them. In them, as in a mirror, we see His boundless goodness, wisdom, and power.

97. A pure mind dwells either in simple thoughts about human affairs, or in the natural contemplation of the visible, or in the contemplation of the invisible, or in the light of the Holy Trinity.

98. When engaged in the contemplation of visible things, the mind either examines their natural properties, or what they signify, or seeks their very cause.

99. When engaged in the contemplation of invisible things, it seeks to understand their natural properties, the cause of their existence, what follows from this, and what God's providence and judgment are regarding them.

100. When, however, it is in God, it first seeks, out of ardent love, to comprehend His nature; yet it finds consolation in this not from the knowledge of what is within Him—for this is impossible and beyond the capacity of any created nature—but is consoled by the knowledge of what surrounds Him, such as: eternity, boundlessness, indescribability, goodness, wisdom, and all-pervading power— —all-provident and all-judging. And it is only in Him that it is comprehensible to anyone that He is boundless; and the very knowledge of His incomprehensibility is a knowledge that transcends the mind, as the great theologians—Gregory and Dionysius—have said.

The Second Hundred on Love

1. One who sincerely loves God prays without any distraction, just as one who prays without any distraction sincerely loves God. But one whose mind is fixated on anything earthly cannot pray without distraction. And so, one whose mind is attached to anything earthly does not love God.

2. A mind that dwells for a long time on thoughts of anything sensual inevitably develops a passion for it—whether it be desire, lamentation, anger, or resentment—and, unless it attaches no importance to that thing, it cannot free itself from that passion.

3. Passions, taking possession of the mind, bind it to material objects; and, separating it from God, compel it to concern itself with them. On the contrary, the love of God, prevailing over the mind, loosens its bonds, persuading it not to value not only sensory objects but even temporal life itself.

4. The purpose of the commandments is to make one's thoughts about things simple, while reading and contemplation serve to make the mind immaterial and formless. The result of this is prayer without distraction.

5. For the mind to be completely freed from passions so that it may pray without distraction, the active method alone is not sufficient unless it is accompanied by various spiritual contemplations. The active method frees the mind from intemperance and hatred; the contemplative method, on the other hand, delivers it from forgetfulness and ignorance, and in this way the mind gains the ability to pray as it ought.

6. There are two highest states of pure prayer. One occurs among those who lead an active life, the other among those who lead a contemplative life. One arises in the soul from the fear of God and good hope; the other from divine love and utmost purity. The sign of the first state is when one gathers the mind away from all worldly thoughts, offering prayers without distraction or confusion, as if God Himself were standing before him, just as He truly does. The sign of the second is when, in the very act of prayer, the mind is enraptured by the divine and boundless light, and feels neither itself nor anything else that exists, except for the One who, through love, brings about such illumination within it. In this state, as he strives to comprehend the words about God, he receives pure and luminous knowledge of Him.

7. Whoever loves something desires to embrace it in every way; and he removes everything that hinders him in this, so as not to be deprived of it. So too, the one who loves God cares for pure prayer and casts out from himself every passion that stands as an obstacle to it.

8. Whoever rejects self-love, the mother of all passions, will, with God's help, easily cast aside all other passions as well, such as anger, sorrow, resentment, and the like. But whoever is possessed by the first will, even if unwillingly, be afflicted by the latter as well. Self-love, however, is a passionate love for the body.

9. People love one another in a praiseworthy or reprehensible way for the following five reasons: either for God's sake—as the virtuous person loves everyone, and even the unvirtuous person loves the virtuous; or by nature—as parents love their children, and vice versa; or out of vanity—as the one praised loves the one who praises him; or out of self-interest—as the rich man is loved for his wealth; or out of sensual pleasure—as the one who works for his belly, and the one who prepares feasts for what lies beneath the belly. The first of these is praiseworthy, the second is mutual, and the rest are driven by passion.

10. If you hate some, while others you neither love nor hate; if you love some only moderately, while others you love very strongly; then from this inequality, recognize that you are still far from perfect love, which inspires one to love every person equally.

11. “Turn away from evil and do good” (Ps. 36: 27)—that is, fight against your enemies to subdue your passions, and then be vigilant so that they do not multiply; and fight again to acquire virtues, and afterward be vigilant to preserve them. And this, indeed, would be “to work and to keep” (Gen. 2:15).

12. By God’s permission, those who tempt us either inflame the soul’s desiring faculty, or agitate its irritable faculty, or cloud its thinking faculty, or afflict the body with sufferings, or deprive it of bodily needs.

13. Demons either tempt us themselves or incite people who do not fear the Lord against us: they tempt us themselves when we withdraw from people, just as the Lord was tempted in the wilderness; they tempt us through people when we interact with them, just as the Lord was tempted through the Pharisees. But by looking to our example—that is, the Lord—we will repel them in both cases.

14. When the mind begins to make progress in the love of God, then the spirit of blasphemy begins to tempt it, instilling in it such thoughts that no human being could conceive, but only the devil, their father. And he does this out of envy toward the lover of God, so that, having conceived such thoughts and fallen into despair, he may no longer dare to soar toward God through his usual prayer. But the deceiver gains nothing from this that serves his purpose; rather, it makes us more steadfast. For as we are tested and struggle against him, we become more experienced and sincere in our love for God. “Let their sword enter their own hearts, and let their bows be broken” (Ps. 36: 15).

15. The mind, turning to the visible, naturally comprehends things through the senses. Neither the mind, nor the natural understanding of things, nor things themselves, nor the senses are evil; for these are all God’s creations. What, then, is evil here? Evidently, it is the passion that clings to the natural understanding of things. And this passion has no place in the use of natural concepts about things, provided the mind remains vigilant.

16. Passion is an unnatural movement of the soul, either out of senseless love or out of reckless hatred toward something sensual, or for the sake of something sensual: out of senseless love, whether for food, or for women, or for wealth, or for fleeting glory, or for any other sensual thing, or for the sake of it; – out of senseless hatred, when, as stated above, one hates any of the aforementioned things without reason, or hates someone because of them.

17. Or again—evil is an erroneous judgment about known things accompanied by their improper use. Thus, with regard to things, a correct judgment regarding sexual intercourse sets procreation as its goal. But whoever has in mind only the pleasure of lust errs in judgment, regarding what is evil as good. And such a person, when having sexual relations with his wife, abuses this. In a similar way, one should reason about the understanding and use of other things.

18. When demons, having turned your mind away from chastity, surround it with lustful thoughts, then cry out to the Lord with tears: “Those who persecute me have now overtaken me; my joy, deliver me from those who have overtaken me” (Ps. 16:11; 31:7). And you will be delivered.

19. The demon of lust is heavy and presses hard upon those who struggle against this passion, especially when they neglect moderation in food and when they meet and converse with women. At first, it imperceptibly captures the mind with a craving for sensual pleasure; then, through the gateway of memory, it enters the silent mind, and just as it inflames the body, so it presents various shameful images to the mind; and in this way, it entices the mind to consent to sin. If you do not want this to continue within you, embrace fasting, labor, vigil, and virtuous silence accompanied by diligent prayer.

20. Those who ceaselessly seek our souls seek, through passionate thoughts, to plunge them into mental or actual sin. But when they encounter a mind that rejects them, then they “will be put to shame and disgraced”; when they find a mind engaged in spiritual contemplation, then they will turn back and “be put to shame very quickly” (Ps. 34: 4; 6: 11).

21. The work of the “deacon” is carried out by the one who anoints the mind for sacred deeds and drives away passionate thoughts from it; the work of the “presbyter” is carried out by the one who enlightens the mind with knowledge of reality and destroys false knowledge; the work of the “bishop” is accomplished by the one who completes his perfection through the holy anointing of the Holy Trinity, to whom worship is rendered.

22. Demons grow weak when, through the fulfillment of the commandments, our passions diminish; they perish when, by virtue of the soul’s dispassion, they vanish completely from it, finding nothing in it by which they clung to it or with which they waged war against it. This is what is meant by: “They will be weakened and perish before Your face” (Ps. 9:4).

23. Some people abstain from passions out of human fear, others out of vanity, still others out of self-discipline; and still others are freed from passions by God's providence.

24. All the words of the Lord contain the following four elements: commandments, doctrines, warnings, and promises; and for their sake we endure every kind of austerity in life, such as: fasting, vigils, sleeping on the bare ground, privations and hardships in obedience, insults, dishonor, torment, death, and the like. "For the words of Your lips," says the Prophet, "I have kept the ways of affliction" (Ps. 16:4).

25. The reward for self-restraint is dispassion; for faith, knowledge; dispassion gives rise to discernment, and knowledge to love for God.

26. The mind, when it leads an active life in the proper manner, excels in prudence; and when it leads a contemplative life in the proper manner, it excels in knowledge. The former leads the one who strives in it to distinguish virtue from vice; the latter introduces its participant into the knowledge of the properties of incorporeal and corporeal beings. The mind becomes worthy of the gift of—that is, theological knowledge—only when, soaring on the wings of love, it has transcended all that has been said above and, having attained abiding in God, contemplates His attributes in spirit, as far as the human mind is capable.

27. If you wish to engage in theology, do not seek what is in God Himself; for this cannot be found not only by the human mind, but by the mind of any other being that exists after God. But consider, as far as possible, the attributes that clothe Him, such as: eternal essence, boundlessness, indescribability, goodness, wisdom, and the power that creates all things, providentially governs all things, and judges all that exists. For among men, he is already a great theologian who, even if only to some extent, reveals these attributes of God.

28. A man is strong who has united knowledge with action: for then he thereby dries up lust and tames anger; and thereby he lifts up his mind and dwells with God.

29. When the Lord says, "I and the Father are one," He thereby signifies the unity of nature; but when He again says, "I am in the Father, and the Father is in Me," He demonstrates the indivisibility of the Hypostases. Thus, the Trivites (Tritheists), by separating the Son from the Father, fall into an abyss on both sides: either, by acknowledging the Son as consubstantial with the Father but separating Him from the Father, they are compelled to say that He is not begotten by the Father, and in this way fall into the heresy that acknowledges three gods and three principles; or, while acknowledging the Son as begotten by the Father but separating Him from Him, they must necessarily admit that He is not consubstantial with the Father, and thus subject the Lord of time to time. According to the teaching of the great Gregory, one must preserve the one God and confess the three Hypostases, each with its own distinct nature. For, according to his teaching, the Trinity is divided yet indivisible; and united yet distinct. What a wondrous division and union! But what wonder would there be if the Father and the Son were united and divided just as one person is united with and separated from another, and nothing more?

30. One who is perfect in love and has attained the summit of dispassion knows no distinction between what is his own and what is another's, or between his own and another's, or between the faithful and the unfaithful, or between the slave and the free, or even between male and female. But having risen above the tyranny of the passions, and beholding the one human nature, he regards all equally and is equally disposed toward all. In him there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither male nor female, neither slave nor free, but Christ is all and in all (Gal. 3:28).

31. From the passions lying within the soul, demons draw their inspiration to stir up passionate thoughts within us. Then, by overwhelming the mind with these thoughts, they compel it to consent to sin; having conquered it in this, they lead it into mental sin; and once this is accomplished, they lead it—like a captive—to the very act of sin. After this, having finally laid waste to the soul through these thoughts, they depart along with them. Only the idol (the mental image) of sin remains in the mind, of which the Lord speaks: "When you see the abomination of desolation standing in the holy place" (Matt. 24: 15). Let the reader understand that the holy place and the temple of God is the human mind, in which the demons, having desolated the soul with passionate thoughts, have set up the idol of sin. I believe that no one who has read Josephus doubts that what the Lord said has come to pass historically. Some, however, say that the same will happen in the time of the Antichrist.

32. Three principles impel us toward goodness: the seeds (of goodness within us) from nature, the holy Powers, and our free will. The seeds of nature—for example, when we treat others as we would like to be treated; or when we see a person in distress and need, and naturally feel compassion for them. The Holy Powers—when, feeling an impulse toward a good deed, we find (within ourselves) a favorable disposition and succeed. Finally, there is good will, when, distinguishing good from evil, we choose the good.

33. Similarly, there are three principles that drive us toward evil: passions, demons, and evil will. Passions, when we desire something recklessly; for example, food at the wrong time and without need, or a wife without the intention of procreation and who is unlawful; likewise, when we become angry or distressed at someone we should not, such as one who has dishonored us or caused us harm. Demons: when, during moments of our weakness, having discerned an opportune time, they suddenly assail us and, with great force, stir up the aforementioned passions and those like them. Finally, evil will: when, knowing what is good, we choose evil.

34. The reward for deeds of virtue consists of dispassion and knowledge. For they are the means by which we attain the Kingdom of Heaven, just as passions and ignorance lead to eternal torment. And therefore, whoever seeks them for the sake of human glory, rather than because they are good in themselves, hears from Scripture: “You ask and do not receive, because you ask with wrong motives” (James 4:3).

35. Among human actions, many are good in themselves, but may become evil for some reason. For example, fasting and vigil, prayer and psalm-singing, almsgiving and hospitality are, in themselves, good deeds; but when done out of vanity, they are no longer good.

36. In all our deeds, God looks at our intention—whether we do them for Him or for some other reason.

37. When you hear the words of Scripture: “He will repay each person according to their deeds” (Rom. 2:6), remember that God rewards with good not for what is done without a right intention—even if it seems good—but specifically for what is done with a right intention. For God’s judgment looks not merely at what is done, but at the intentions with which it is done.

38. The demon of pride employs a twofold deceit: either he persuades the monk to attribute his good deeds to himself rather than to God, the Giver of all that is good and the Helper in righteousness; or, when the monk refuses to do so, he incites him to belittle his less perfect brothers. But he does not realize that even through such actions, the demon is inciting him to reject God’s help. For by belittling those who, unlike him, were unable to prove themselves righteous, he presents himself as having demonstrated exceptional righteousness through his own strength. This is impossible, as the Lord said: “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15:5). For our weakness is such that even when we desire what is good, we cannot bring it to completion without the Giver of all that is good.

39. Whoever has come to know the weakness of human nature has gained experiential knowledge of God’s helping power. And such a person, having already accomplished some things with its help and striving to accomplish others, never belittles anyone. For he knows that just as it helped him and delivered him from many passions and misfortunes, so it is powerful enough to help everyone whenever He wills, and especially those who strive for His sake; though, due to certain circumstances, He does not free everyone from passions all at once, but, as a good and compassionate Physician, He heals everyone who comes to Him in due time.

40. When passions lie dormant, pride sets in—either because their causes are hidden, or because the demons slyly withdraw.

41. Almost every sin arises from the delight of self-indulgence, and is therefore eradicated by suffering and sorrow—whether voluntary or involuntary—through the act of repentance or through some misfortune, prudently brought about by God’s Providence toward us. “For if we would judge ourselves,” says Scripture, “we would not be condemned; but when we are judged by the Lord, we are disciplined so that we may not be condemned with the world” (1 Cor. 11:31–32).

42. If an unexpected temptation comes upon you, do not blame the one through whom it came, but seek the reason why it came; and you will find correction. For whether through him or through someone else, you were meant to drink the bitterness from the cup of God’s judgments.

43. The more wicked you are, the less you should resist suffering, so that, humbled by it, you may cast out your pride.

44. Temptations come upon people; some bring pleasures, others sorrows, and still others bodily sufferings. For the Physician of souls, according to His decrees, administers the remedy, looking at the cause of the passions lying within the soul.

45. Temptations are sent to some to atone for sins committed in the past, to others to put an end to sins they are currently committing, and to still others to prevent sins they might commit in the future; except for those that come to test a person, as was the case with Job.

46. The prudent person, reflecting on the healing nature of God's providence, bears with gratitude the afflictions that befall him through it, blaming no one else for them but his own sins; but the unwise, when they sin and are punished for it, regard either God or people as the cause of their misfortunes, failing to comprehend the wisdom of God's providence in this matter.

47. There are means that halt the movement of the passions and prevent them from growing; and there are others that diminish them and lead to their extinction. Thus, fasting, labor, and vigil prevent lust from growing; while solitude, contemplation, prayer, and love of God diminish it and lead to its disappearance. The same applies to irritability: magnanimity, forgiveness, and meekness halt it and prevent it from growing; while love, charity, goodwill, and love for humanity diminish it.

48. Whose mind is ceaselessly directed toward God, in that person desire grows into a longing for God, and all irritability is transformed into divine love. For through prolonged communion with divine illumination, the mind, having become entirely luminous, restrains and subdues its desiring part within itself, transforming it into an unceasing, as has been said, desire for God and an unwavering love for Him—transforming it entirely from the earthly to the divine.

49. Not everyone who is free from envy, anger, and resentment toward those who have offended them already possesses love for them: for one may, without loving them, refrain from repaying evil with evil, in accordance with the commandment; but it is not so easy to repay evil with good without forcing oneself to do so; for the disposition to do good even to those who hate one is characteristic of perfect spiritual love alone.

50. One who does not love another is not necessarily one who hates him; likewise, one who does not hate is not necessarily one who loves. But he may be in the middle with regard to him—that is, neither loving nor hating. For a loving disposition in the soul is usually produced by the five motives listed in Article 9 of this second hundred: one praiseworthy, one mutual, and three reproachful.

51. When you notice that your mind delights in material things and dwells pleasantly on thoughts of them, know that you love them more than God. "For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also," says the Lord (Matt. 6:21).

52. A mind that clings to God and abides in Him through prayer and love becomes wise, good, strong, compassionate, merciful, generous, and, simply put, possesses within itself nearly all the divine attributes. But one who turns away from Him and becomes entangled with material things, giving himself over to sensual pleasure, becomes either beast-like or savage, and because of this, wages war against people.

53. Scripture calls worldly things "the world," and those who occupy their minds with them are worldly people, to whom—to their greater shame—it says: "Do not love the world, nor the things that are in the world. For everything in the world—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life—is not from the Father but is from this world" (1 John 2:15–16).

54. A monk is one who has turned his mind away from sensory things and, through self-restraint, love, psalm-singing, and prayer, continually abides with God.

55. In a spiritual sense, a "herdsman" refers to a man of action, for the righteous deeds performed in the spiritual life are like working livestock. That is why James says, "The herdsman are your servants." A shepherd of sheep, on the other hand, is a contemplative man, for the thoughts grazed by the mind on the mountains of contemplation have the significance of sheep. That is why "every shepherd of sheep is an abomination to the Egyptians"—that is, to the opposing forces (Gen. 46:34).

56. A depraved mind, when the body is aroused by the senses to its natural lusts and pleasures, follows them and aligns itself with their fantasies and desires. But a virtuous mind restrains itself and diverts its attention from passionate fantasies and desires, and moreover strives to improve its actions.

57. Among the virtues, some are bodily, and others are spiritual. The bodily virtues are: fasting, vigil, sleeping on the bare ground, service, manual labor—so as not to be a burden to others, or for the sake of almsgiving, and so on. And the spiritual virtues are: love, generosity, meekness, self-control, prayer, and so on. And so, if it happens that due to some necessity or physical condition—for example, illness or some other similar reason—we are unable to fulfill the bodily virtues mentioned above, we have the Lord's forgiving mercy, for He knows the reasons for this; but if we fail to practice the spiritual virtues, we will have no excuse, for they are not subject to such obstacles.

58. Love for God inclines the believer to despise every fleeting pleasure, every bodily suffering, and every sorrow. May all the Saints, who suffered so much for Christ, bear witness to this.

59. Beware of the mother of all evils, self-love, which is an irrational love for the body. For from it, under the guise of blessing, the first three fundamental and root passions—namely, gluttony, greed, and vanity—are born, drawing their pretexts from the body’s necessary needs; and from these springs the entire family of passions. That is why, as has been said, one must be very wary of self-love and combat it with great vigilance. For with its eradication, all its offspring are also eradicated.

60. The passion of self-love prompts the monk to spare the body and indulge it in food under the guise of preserving health and exercising prudent control over the body, so that, gradually yielding to its demands, he may fall into the abyss of sensuality; as for the layperson, precisely because he is a layperson, he is tempted “to care for the flesh in lust” (Rom. 13: 14).

61. The highest state of prayer, they say, is when the mind, during prayer, is outside the flesh and the world, completely immaterial and invisible. Whoever maintains such a state unbroken truly prays unceasingly.

62. Just as the body, when dying, is completely separated from all earthly things, so too the mind, when dying in the act of the most perfect prayer, is detached from all worldly thoughts. And if it does not die such a death, it cannot be with God or live with Him.

63. Let no one deceive you, humble monk, with the thought that you can be saved by indulging in sensual pleasure and vanity.

64. Just as the body sins through its deeds and, to keep itself in check, has bodily virtues to practice self-control, so the mind sins through passionate thoughts and, to keep itself in check, has spiritual virtues to practice self-control by viewing things with purity and impartiality.

65. Just as days are followed by nights and summers by winters, so too are vanity and sensuality followed by sorrows and painful sufferings, whether in this present age or in the age to come.

66. It is impossible for one who has sinned to escape the coming judgment without voluntarily undertaking painful labors in this life, or without suffering from involuntary misfortunes.

67. For five reasons, they say, God permits us to be afflicted by demons: the first reason is so that, as we are afflicted and struggle, we may come to discern virtue from sin; the second is so that, having attained virtue through struggle and toil, we may hold fast to it firmly and unwaveringly; third, so that, succeeding in virtue, we may not become conceited, but may learn humility; the fourth is that, having experienced through action how evil sin is, we may come to hate it with perfect hatred; finally, the fifth and most important reason is that, having become dispassionate, we may not forget our own weakness, nor the strength of the One who has helped us.

68. Just as the mind of the hungry longs for bread, and that of the thirsty for water, so the mind of the glutton longs for varied delicacies; that of the lustful, for women’s faces; that of the vain, for human honors; that of the avaricious, for profits; the vindictive one—of revenge against those who have offended him; the envious one—of the downfall of the one he envies. The same is true of other passions. For a mind besieged by passions embraces passionate thoughts, both while the body is awake and in sleep.

69. When lust increases, the mind dreams of things that bring pleasure; and when anger increases, it sees things that inspire fear; impure spirits intensify the passions, taking our negligence as their ally and inciting them; while the holy angels diminish them, urging us to practice virtue.

70. Frequent arousal of the soul’s lustful desires instills in the soul an irresistible habit of indulging in pleasurable pursuits, while frequent outbursts of irritability make the mind timid and rob it of courage. The former is healed by prolonged fasting, vigil, and prayer; the latter, by charity, philanthropy, love, and mercy.

71. Evil spirits wage war against us either through material things or through passionate thoughts about material things: through material things against those who are caught up in them, and through thoughts against those who have withdrawn from material things.

72. Just as it is easier to sin in thought than in deed, so too is the battle waged through thoughts more difficult than the battle waged through material things.

73. Things are outside the mind, but thoughts about them are within it. Therefore, it is within the mind’s power to use them for good or for evil. For the misuse of thoughts leads to the misuse of things.

74. The mind receives passionate thoughts in the following three ways: through the senses, through the condition of the body, and through memory. Through the senses—when things that make an impression on them, such as those for which we have a passion, arouse passionate thoughts in the mind; through the condition of the body—when the body’s altered state, caused by a lack of moderation in diet, the influence of demons, or some illness, prompts it toward passionate thoughts or rebellion against Providence; through recollection—when memory revives thoughts of things to which we are attached and thus stirs up passionate thoughts in the mind.

75. Of the things given to us by God for our use, some are found in the soul, others in the body, and still others in the environment surrounding the body. In the soul are its faculties; in the body are the senses and other members; around the body are food, possessions, money, and so on. Whether we make good or bad use of these things and the contingencies that arise from them reveals us to be either virtuous or vicious.

76. Among the aforementioned events, some occur within the soul, some within the body, and others in the world around the body: within the soul—knowledge and ignorance, remembrance and forgetfulness, love and hatred, fear and boldness, joy and sorrow, and so on; in the body—pleasure and fatigue, sensitivity and numbness, health and illness, life and death, and the like; in the environment surrounding the body—abundance and scarcity, wealth and poverty, honor and dishonor, and so on. Of these, some are regarded by people as good, and others as evil; whereas, in the strict sense, none of these is evil, but becomes evil or good depending on how it is used.

77. Knowledge is by nature a good, just as health is. But the opposite has brought far greater benefit to many, for to the wicked, knowledge does not serve the good, even though it is, as has been said, good by nature. Likewise, health, wealth, and joy do not serve them for good, for they do not use them for their own benefit; for such people, the opposite is more beneficial: and consequently, this (i.e., the opposite) is not evil in the strict sense, even though it appears to be evil.

78. Do not abuse your thoughts, lest you be compelled to abuse material things as well; for if you do not first sin in thought, you will never sin in deed.

79. The “image of the earthly” (Adam) consists of the principal vices, such as: folly, cowardice, intemperance, and falsehood. The “image of the heavenly” consists of the principal virtues, such as: prudence, courage, chastity, and justice. “But just as we have put on the image of the earthly, so let us also put on the image of the heavenly” (1 Cor. 15:49).

80. If you wish to find the path that leads to life, seek it in that Way Who said, “I am the way, the door, the truth, and the life” (John 14:6; 10:9); and there you will find it. But seek diligently, for “few are those who find it” (Matt. 7:14); lest, having been left behind by these few, you find yourself among the many.

81. The soul refrains from sin for the following five reasons: either out of fear of people, or out of fear of judgment, or for the sake of future reward, or out of love for God, or, finally, because of the pangs of conscience.

82. Some say that there would be no evil in creatures if it were not for a certain external force that draws us toward it. But this force is nothing other than our neglect of the mind’s natural activity. That is why those who are diligent in this regard always do good and never do evil. And so, if you too desire this, cast aside negligence, and in doing so you will also cast aside evil, which is the sinful use of thoughts, accompanied by abuse and worldly things.

83. By the very nature of the rational part within us, it should, by submitting to the divine word, rule over the irrational part within us. Let this order be observed in all things—and there will be no evil in creatures, nor will anything be found that leads to it.

84. Some thoughts are simple, while others are complex. The simple ones are dispassionate, while the complex ones are passionate, as they are composed of passion and thought. Nevertheless, it can be seen that many of the simple ones follow in the wake of the complex ones when they begin to move toward sinning in thought. Let us take gold as an example. A passionate thought about gold came to someone’s mind, and he set out mentally to steal it: and so, in his mind, he had already committed a sin. The thought of gold was followed by thoughts of a purse, a chest, a storeroom, and so on. Here, the thought of gold was complex, for it was combined with passion; whereas the thoughts of the purse, the chest, and so on were simple, for the mind had no passion for them. The same is true of every other thought—a vain thought, a thought about a wife, and so on. For not all thoughts that follow a passionate thought are themselves passionate, as shown in the example. From this we can discern which thoughts are passionate and which are not.

85. Some say that demons, by touching the private parts of our body during sleep, arouse the passion of lust; then, once aroused, this passion brings the image of a woman to mind through memory. Others, however, believe that the demons themselves appear to the mind in the form of women; then, by touching the private parts of the body, they arouse a desire for women; and dreams of this kind occur. Still others believe that the passion prevailing in the approaching demon stirs up the same passion in the person, and in this way the soul is inflamed with such thoughts and conjures up images through memory. Similarly, regarding other passionate dreams, some say that this is how they occur, while others say that it is that way. However, by none of the aforementioned means can demons arouse any passion, neither while the body is awake nor during sleep, if love and self-restraint are inherent in the soul.

86. Some of the commandments of the law must be observed both physically and spiritually, while others only spiritually. For example: “Do not commit adultery, do not murder, do not steal,” and similar commandments must be observed both physically and spiritually; and spiritually in three ways. On the other hand, circumcision, observing the Sabbath, sacrificing a lamb, eating unleavened bread with bitter herbs, and the like, are to be observed only spiritually.

87. There are three principal moral states among monks: the first is when one sins in no way through one’s actions; the second is when one does not allow passionate thoughts to linger in the soul; the third is when one regards in one’s thoughts, without passion, the images of women and those who cause offense.

88. One is free from greed who has renounced all property and possesses nothing on earth except his body; having cast aside all attachment even to it, he has entrusted all care for himself to God and to godly people.

89. Among those who acquire wealth, some do so dispassionately; therefore, when they lose it, they do not grieve, just as they once joyfully accepted the plundering of their possessions (Heb. 10:34). Others, however, acquire it with passion; therefore, when they face the prospect of losing their possessions, they grieve, just like the rich man mentioned in the Gospel, who “went away sorrowful” (Matt. 19:22); and if they do indeed lose them, they grieve mortally. Thus, the loss of possessions reveals whether one is a dispassionate or a passionate accumulator.

90. Demons attack those who are devoted to prayer, instilling in their minds simple thoughts about sensory things and thereby distracting them from prayer; they attack those devoted to knowledge, keeping passionate thoughts within them for as long as possible; and they attack those engaged in active life—tempting them to sin through their actions. – The accursed ones fight against everyone in every way possible to turn people away from God.

91. Those who, by God’s providence, are trained in piety in this life are tested by the following three temptations: either by the offer of pleasant things, such as good health, beauty, many children, wealth, fame, and the like; or by the sorrow of losing children, possessions, or fame; or by what causes suffering to the body, such as illnesses, torments, and so on. To the first group, the Lord says: “Whoever does not renounce all his possessions cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:33); to the second and third groups: “By your endurance you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19).

92. It is said that the condition of the body is altered, and through this, the mind is given passionate or dispassionate thoughts, by the following four causes: angels, demons, the air, and food. Angels, it is said, affect it through their words; demons, through their touch; the air, through its changes; and food, through the quality of food and drink, as well as their excess or scarcity. In addition to these, changes are also brought about by memory, hearing, and sight, when the soul is first affected by sorrowful or joyful circumstances. Having been affected by them, the soul brings about a change in the body’s condition; and the altered condition of the body, as previously stated, induces corresponding thoughts in the mind.

93. Death is, in essence, separation from God; the sting of death is sin, which Adam, having taken into himself, was at once cast out from the tree of life, from paradise, and from God, whereupon bodily death necessarily followed. Life, however, is none other than the One who said, “I am the life” (John 14:6). He, having been in death, raised the dead back to life.

94. When something is written, it is written either for one’s own remembrance, or for the benefit of others, or for both, or to the detriment of some, or for show, or out of necessity.

95. “The valley of the shadow of death” (Ps. 22:2) is active virtue; “still waters” are knowledge of creation.

96. “The shadow of death” is human life. And whoever is with God, and with whom God is, can boldly say: “Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for You are with me” (Ps. 22:4).

97. A pure mind views things rightly; a tongue trained by practice presents what it sees as if before the eyes of others; and an open ear receives it; but one deprived of these three condemns the speaker.

98. He is with God who knows the Holy Trinity, its creation, and its providence; and who keeps the passionate part of the soul dispassionate.

99. They say that the “rod” signifies God’s judgment, and the “staff,” His Providence. Whoever has come to know this may say: “Your rod and Your staff, they comfort me” (Ps. 22:4).

100. When the mind is stripped of passions and enlightened by the contemplation of what is, then it can abide in God and pray as it ought.

The Third Hundred on Love

1. The prudent use of thoughts and things brings about chastity, love, and knowledge; while the imprudent use brings about intemperance, hatred, and ignorance.

2. “You have prepared a table before me,” and so on. “Table” here signifies active virtue: for it is prepared by Jesus Christ against those who oppose us; the “oil” that anoints the mind signifies the contemplation of creation; God’s “cup” signifies the knowledge of God; His “grace” is His Word and God Himself: for through His Incarnation He pursues us day after day until He has reached all those who are to be saved, as He did with Paul. “House” signifies the kingdom into which all the saints will dwell; and the length of days signifies eternal life (Ps. 21:5–6).

3. Sins arise in us from the improper use of the powers of the soul—that is, the powers of desire, passion, and reason. The improper use of the power of reason is ignorance; the improper use of the powers of passion and desire is hatred and intemperance. The proper use of these powers, however, is knowledge, prudence, love, and chastity. And if this is so, then nothing that has been created and brought into being by God is evil.

4. It is not food that is evil, but gluttony; not procreation, but fornication; not money, but the love of money; not glory, but vanity: and if this is so, then there is nothing evil in existence except abuse, which arises from the mind’s neglect of the cultivation of nature (the powers of the soul and their proper direction).

5. This, says Blessed Dionysius, is what constitutes evil in demons: reckless irritability, mad lust, and rash imagination. But recklessness, madness, and rashness in rational beings are a deprivation of reason, intellect, and prudence; and such deprivation occurs only after one has possessed or held something. Consequently, there was a time when they possessed reason, intellect, and reverent prudence. And if this is so, then demons are not evil by nature; rather, they became evil through the abuse of their natural powers.

6. Some passions give rise to intemperance, others to hatred, and still others to both intemperance and hatred.

7. Gluttony and the love of delicacies are the causes of sexual immorality; the love of money and vanity are the causes of hatred toward one’s neighbor; their common root, self-love, is the cause of both.

8. Self-love is a passionate and reckless love of the body. Love and self-control are its opposites. It is evident that whoever possesses self-love possesses all passions.

9. “No one,” says the Apostle, “has ever hated his own flesh” (Eph. 5:29): yet nevertheless “mortifies” it and “subjugates” it (1 Cor. 9:27), giving it nothing but “food and clothing” (1 Tim. 6:8); and these alone, simply because they are necessary for life. Thus they love it dispassionately, and, as a servant of the Divine, “nourish and warm” it solely with what makes up for its lack.

10. Whoever loves someone tries in every way to please that person. And so, whoever loves God naturally strives to do what is pleasing to Him; but whoever loves the flesh does what satisfies it.

11. What is pleasing to God is love, chastity, contemplation, and prayer; what is pleasing to the flesh is gluttony, intemperance, and everything that leads to them. That is why “those who are in the flesh cannot please God” (Rom. 8:8); “but those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5:24).

12. When the mind is inclined toward God, it treats the body as a servant and gives it nothing more than what is necessary for life; but when it is inclined toward the flesh, it becomes enslaved to its passions, and its care for the body always takes the form of lust (Rom. 13:14).

13. If you wish to rid yourself of evil thoughts, heal your passions; then you will easily drive them from your mind. Specifically, regarding the passion of sexual immorality—fast, keep vigil, labor, and withdraw into solitude; regarding anger and sorrow, attach no importance to glory, disgrace, or other earthly things; regarding resentment, pray for the one who has offended you—and you will be freed.

14. Do not measure yourself against the weakest of people, but rather expand yourself in accordance with the commandment of love. By measuring yourself against others, you will fall into the abyss of pride; but by expanding yourself in accordance with love, you will reach the heights of humility.

15. If you truly keep the commandment to love your neighbor, why then do you harbor bitterness and resentment toward him? Is it not clear that you prefer the temporary over love, and by defending it, you wage war against your brother?

16. Gold has become so desirable to people not so much out of necessity as because, through it, many satisfy their lust for pleasure.

17. There are three reasons for the love of wealth: sensuality, vanity, and unbelief; and unbelief is stronger than the first two.

18. The hedonist loves silver so that he may enjoy himself with its help; the vain person, to gain glory; and the unbeliever, to hide and store it, fearing hunger, old age, sickness, or exile, and placing more hope in it than in God, the Creator and Provider of all creatures, even down to the smallest and most insignificant animals.

19. Four kinds of people accumulate wealth: the three mentioned above, and a fourth, the household-minded person; it is evident that only the latter accumulates it rightly, so that his hand may never be empty when it comes to providing what is needed to everyone.

20. All passionate thoughts either stir up the soul's desiring faculty, or agitate its irritable faculty, or cloud its thinking faculty; hence it happens that the mind becomes blind to spiritual contemplation and prayerful ascent. Therefore, a monk—especially one who practices silence—must pay close attention to his thoughts, discern their causes, and cut them off. He should discern them in this way: the soul's lustful power is aroused by passionate memories of women, and their cause is intemperance in food and drink, as well as frequent and unwise association with women. They are cut off by hunger, thirst, vigil, and solitude. – The irritable power is stirred up by passionate memories of people who have grieved us; the cause of this is sensuality, vanity, and love of pleasure, because of which the passionate person is grieved—either because he has lost them or because he has not received them. They are cut off by regarding these things as nothing—by despising and humbling them out of love for God.

21. God knows Himself and knows His creatures, and the Holy Powers know God and know God's creatures. But the Holy Powers know God and His creatures not in the same way that God knows Himself and His creatures.

22. God knows Himself through His blessed nature, and His creatures through His wisdom, by which and in which He created all things; whereas the Holy Powers know God, who exists beyond all participation, through participation (in His knowledge), and His creatures through the perception of the intelligent contemplations present within them.

23. Creatures are outside the mind; yet the mind receives their contemplation within itself. But this is not the case with God, who is ever-existent, boundless, and indescribable, who has bestowed upon all that exists from Him both being, well-being, and everlasting existence.

24. The rational and intellectual nature partakes of the Holy God—that is, of His goodness and wisdom—through its very existence, its capacity for well-being, and the grace of eternal existence. By this grace, it knows God; and it knows His creatures, as stated above, through the perception of the all-ordaining wisdom contemplated in them—a wisdom that is subtle and is mentally constructed in the mind.

25. God, bringing rational and intelligent beings into existence through His supreme goodness, bestowed upon these creatures four divine attributes that sustain, protect, and save them: being, eternal existence, goodness, and wisdom. Of these, He bestowed the first two upon the being, and the last two upon the moral faculties: upon the being—existence and eternal existence; and upon the moral faculties—goodness and wisdom—so that the creature might be made, through participation, to be what He Himself is in essence. Hence it is said that man is created in the image and likeness of God: created in the image—as a being—of the Being, as an ever-existing—of the Ever-Existing—though not without a beginning, yet infinitely; created in His likeness—as the good one is good, as the wise one is wise—thus becoming, by grace, what God is by nature. Every rational being is created in the image of God, but only the good and the wise are created in His likeness.

26. All rational and intelligent being is divided into two—that is, into the angelic and human natures; and the entire angelic nature is in turn divided into two principal moral unions and communities: the holy and the accursed—that is, the Holy Powers and the wicked demons; and the entire human race is divided into only two unions: the pious and the impious.

27. God, as self-existence, self-goodness, and self-wisdom—or, to put it more precisely, as the One who exists above all these things—has absolutely nothing opposed to Himself. But creatures, since they all exist solely by participation and grace—and rational and intelligent beings, moreover, possess the capacity for goodness and wisdom—have opposites, namely, non-existence as opposed to existence, and evil and ignorance as opposed to the capacity for goodness and wisdom. Their eternal existence or non-existence lies in the power of the One who created them, while their participation or non-participation in His goodness and wisdom lies in the will of rational creatures.

28. The Greeks, believing that the nature of creatures has been with God from eternity and that they have received only their qualities from Him, say that there is nothing opposed to their nature, and that the opposite lies solely in their qualities. But we maintain that the single divine nature, being eternal, infinite, and bestowing eternity upon all other natures, has no opposite; whereas the nature of creatures has non-being as its opposite, and their eternal existence or non-existence lies within the power of the Being Himself. But since His gifts are irrevocable and unchangeable, the creature, as it is now, will always be so, sustained by His almighty power, even though it has, as has been said, non-being as its opposite—for it has been brought from non-being into being and possesses, in His will, the power to be or not to be.

29. Just as evil is the absence of good, and ignorance is the absence of knowledge, so too is non-existence (non-being) the absence of existence (being)—not of that which is not truly existent, for this has no opposite—but of that which exists by participation in the truly Existent. The deprivation of the first two depends on the will of the creature; but the deprivation of the second consists in the will of the Creator, Who, out of goodness, always wills that beings exist and are always blessed by Him.

30. All creatures are either rational and intelligent beings capable of containing opposites within themselves—that is, virtue and vice, knowledge and ignorance—or various bodies composed of opposites, such as earth, air, fire, and water. Some are entirely incorporeal and immaterial, although some of them are associated with bodies; others, however, consist solely of matter and form.

31. All bodies are by nature immobile; they are moved by the soul—some by the rational soul, others by the irrational soul, and still others by the insensitive soul.

32. Among the powers of the soul, one is nutritive and vegetative, another is imaginative and impulsive, and yet another is rational and intellectual. Plants share in the first; speechless animals share in the second along with the first; and humans share in the third along with the first two. The first two powers are perishable, while the third is regarded as imperishable and immortal.

33. The holy powers, imparting enlightenment to one another, also impart to human nature both the virtue and the knowledge that exist within them: virtue, that is, God-imitating goodness, by which they bestow benefits upon themselves and one another, and upon the beings lower than themselves, making them God-like; —knowledge, so to speak, either of something supreme concerning God; for, as the Prophet says, “You, O Lord, are high above all forever” (Ps. 91:9); or of something most profound concerning corporeal beings, or of something most precise concerning incorporeal beings, or of something most lucid concerning providence, or of something most certain concerning judgment.

34. Impurity of the mind consists, first, in false knowledge; second, in ignorance of anything universal; I say this with regard to the human mind, for it is not proper for an angel to be ignorant of even anything particular; third, in passionate thoughts; fourth, in consenting to sin.

35. The impurity of the soul consists in its failure to act in accordance with its nature; for this gives rise to passionate thoughts in the mind. The soul acts in accordance with its nature when its passionate faculties—that is, the irritable and the desiring—remain dispassionate when influenced by things and by the thoughts concerning them.

36. The impurity of the body is sin committed through action.

37. He loves silence who is impartial toward worldly things; he loves all people who loves nothing human; and he has knowledge of God and the Divine who is not tempted by anyone, neither because of that person’s failings nor because of the suspicious thoughts aroused about him.

38. It is a great thing not to be partial toward things, but it is far greater still to remain dispassionate when thinking about them.

39. Love and self-restraint keep the mind dispassionate toward both things and thoughts about them.

40. The mind of the God-loving person is not armed against things or thoughts about them, but against the passions associated with these thoughts. That is, he does not rise up against a woman, nor against one who has wronged him, nor against his imaginings of them: but against the passions associated with these imaginings.

41. The monk's entire battle against demons consists in separating passions from thoughts; for otherwise it is impossible for him to view things dispassionately.

42. A thing is one thing, a thought is another, and a passion is yet another: a thing, for example, is a husband, a wife, gold, and so on; a thought is a simple recollection of any of these; a passion is either wordless love or reckless hatred toward any of them. — A monk's struggle lies in such a passion.

43. A passionate thought is a thought composed of passion and thought. Let us separate passion from thought, and a pure thought will remain. We separate them, if we wish, through spiritual love and self-restraint.

44. Virtues detach the mind from passions; spiritual contemplations detach it from simple thoughts; and pure prayer presents it to God Himself.

45. Virtues exist for the knowledge of creatures; knowledge, for the knower; and the knower, for the unknowable object of knowledge; and above all this stands the One who guides beyond knowledge.

46. God, who is self-sufficient, brought creatures into being from nothingness not because He had any need, but so that they might, according to their capacity, partake of His bliss and find joy; and He Himself rejoiced in His works, seeing them rejoice and be insatiably satisfied by the Insatiable One.

47. The world has many who are poor in spirit, but not in the proper sense; many who weep, but either over the loss of possessions or the loss of children; many who are meek, but toward impure passions; many who hunger and thirst, but for the unrighteous seizure of others' property and the accumulation of wealth; many who are merciful, but toward the body and bodily things; and pure in heart, but out of vanity; and peacemakers, but those who subject their souls to the flesh; many who are persecuted, but for their own lawlessness; many who are reviled, but for shameful sins. But blessed are only those who both act and suffer for Christ and because of Christ. Why? "For theirs is the kingdom of heaven"; and: "For they shall see God" (Matt. 5:3, 8); and so on. They are not blessed because they act and suffer in this way, for those mentioned above do the same; but because they act and suffer for Christ's sake and because of Christ.

48. In everything we do, as has been said many times, God looks at the purpose—whether we do it for Him or for some other reason. Therefore, when we wish to do something good, let our aim be not to please people but to please God, so that, always keeping our eyes fixed on Him, we may do everything for Him; otherwise, we will bear the labor in vain and forfeit our reward.

49. And during prayer, banish from your mind even simple thoughts about human affairs and contemplations of all creation, so that by dwelling on lesser things you may not stray from Him, Who is incomparably better than all that exists.

50. If we truly love God, then by this very love we will drive away the passions. To love Him is to prefer Him to the world, and the soul to the flesh—with contempt for all worldly things, with constant devotion to Him—through self-control, love, prayer, and psalm-singing, and so on.

51. If, while paying attention to God for a long time, we take careful care of the passionate part of the soul, then we will no longer be led astray from the right path by the temptations of our thoughts; but by understanding their causes more precisely and cutting them off, we become prudent, so that the prophetic word is fulfilled in us: "My eye will be on my enemies, and my ear will hear those who rise up against me with deceit" (Ps. 91:12).

52. When you see that your mind is turning piously and righteously toward worldly thoughts, know that your body also remains pure and sinless. But when you see your mind mentally engaged in sins and you do not put a stop to it, know that your body will not delay in falling into them as well.

53. Just as things serve as a world for the body, so thoughts serve as a world for the mind; and just as the body commits adultery with a woman's body, so the mind commits adultery with thoughts of women through the imagination of its own body: for it mentally beholds the image of its own body copulating with the image of a woman. Likewise, in his thoughts, he takes revenge with the image of his own body against the image of the one who has wronged him. The same is true of other sins: for whatever the body does in the world of things, the mind does mentally in the world of thoughts.

54. Should we not be horrified, tremble, and be driven to distraction by the fact that, while God the Father judges no one, but has entrusted all judgment to the Son" (John 5:22); —while the Son cries out:

“Do not judge, so that you may not be judged” (Matt. 7:1), “Do not condemn, so that you may not be condemned” (Luke 6:37); and likewise the Apostle: “Do not judge anything before the time, until the Lord comes” (1 Cor. 6:5); and again: “For when you judge another, you condemn yourself” (Rom. 2:1); when, I say, this is the case—why have people, having ceased to weep over their own sins, taken judgment out of the Son’s hands, and now, as if they were sinless, judge and condemn one another? Heaven is appalled by this, and the earth trembles; yet these insensitive ones are not ashamed!

55. Whoever prays into the sins of others, or judges a brother on the basis of suspicion, has not yet begun the path of repentance, has not taken it upon himself to recognize his own sins—which are truly as heavy as a multi-pud lead weight—and does not know why a person becomes “hard-hearted, loving vanity, and seeking falsehood” (Ps. 4:3); and therefore, like a madman wandering in darkness, having set aside his own sins, he dwells on the sins of others—whether real or imagined—based on mere suspicion.

56. Self-love, as has been said repeatedly, is the cause of all passionate thoughts; for from it arise the three principal thoughts of the desiring part of the soul: gluttony, greed, and vanity. Then, from gluttony arises the lustful thought; from avarice the covetous thought; from vanity, the proud thought; while all the others follow each of these three, such as: the angry, sorrowful, resentful, despondent, envious, slanderous thoughts, and others. These passions bind the mind to material objects and draw it down to earth, weighing it down like the heaviest stone, whereas by nature it is lighter and more ethereal than fire.

57. The beginning of all passions is self-love, and their end is pride. Self-love is a reckless love of the body. Whoever cuts it off cuts off all the passions that arise from it.

58. Just as earthly parents are partial toward those born of them, so too is the mind naturally attached to its own thoughts; and just as the most partial of parents see their children as the most modest and well-behaved of all, even though they might be the most deserving of ridicule in every respect: so too does an unwise mind regard its own thoughts as the most reasonable of all, even if they are the most absurd of all. To the wise, however, their own thoughts do not appear that way; but even when they have confirmation that they are true and good, they trust their own judgment all the less, and instead appoint other wise people as judges of their thoughts and reasoning, lest their efforts be in vain (Gal. 2:2); and from them they accept confirmation.

59. When you overcome any of the most shameful passions—such as gluttony, fornication, anger, or greed—a thought of vanity will immediately assail you; and when you overcome that, a thought of pride will take hold of you.

60. All dishonorable passions, when they control the soul, drive the thought of vanity from it; but when they are overcome, they open the way for it to enter.

61. Vanity gives rise to pride, sometimes being driven out and sometimes remaining. But when driven out, it leads to conceit, and when it remains, to arrogance.

62. Vanity is eradicated by secret action, and pride by attributing to God the deeds done properly.

63. One who has been granted the knowledge of God and has truly tasted its sweetness despises all pleasures arising from the power of desire.

64. One who is led by earthly desires craves either food, or the satisfaction of bodily urges, or human glory, or wealth, or something else that follows from these; and if the mind finds nothing better than these things to which to transfer its desire, it will not resolve to despise them for the rest of its life. Far superior to these, however, is the knowledge of God and of divine things.

65. Those who despise pleasures do so out of fear, or in hope, or because they recognize their insignificance; or else out of love for God.

66. Knowledge of divine things without attachment to them does not persuade the mind to completely despise the material world, but is akin to a mere thought about a sensory object. Therefore, one can find many people who possess much knowledge yet wallow in carnal passions, like pigs in the mud (2 Peter 2:22). For having been somewhat purified during their zeal for what is good and having gained a certain measure of knowledge of it, they later grew lazy and became like Saul, who, having been granted the royal throne but having begun to live unworthily of it, was cast down from it with terrible wrath.

67. Just as a mere thought of human things causes the mind to despise the Divine, so too a mere knowledge of the Divine does not persuade it to despise the human entirely; for here the truth still dwells in shadows and conjectures; and therefore requires the blissful devotion of holy love, which unites the mind with spiritual contemplations and persuades it to prefer the immaterial to the material, the intellectual to the sensory, and the Divine.

68. Not everyone who has cut off the passions and simplified his thoughts has thereby turned them toward the Divine; but he may be attached neither to the human nor to the Divine, which happens only to active people who have not yet been granted knowledge, and who abstain from the passions either out of fear of torment or in hope of the Kingdom of Heaven.

69. "We walk by faith, not by sight," and our knowledge is still as in a mirror and in riddles (2 Cor. 2:7). Therefore, we need long practice in it, so that through prolonged instruction and diligence, we may acquire an unshakable habit of unceasing contemplation.

70. If, having temporarily set aside the causes of our passions, we engage in spiritual contemplation but do not devote all our time to it, having this as our sole occupation: we will easily turn back to carnal passions, having gained no other fruit from it except mere knowledge mixed with conceit, the end of which is the gradual clouding of knowledge itself and the mind's complete deviation toward material objects.

71. The passion of love, when reprehensible, occupies the mind with material objects; but the passion of love, when praiseworthy, binds it to the Divine. For the mind, as a rule, inclines toward whatever objects it dwells upon; and toward whatever it inclines, it also turns its desire and love—whether toward divine, immaterial, and conceptual objects, which are proper to it, or toward carnal things and passions.

72. God created both the invisible and the visible worlds; and He also created the soul and the body. And if the visible world is so beautiful, how much more so is the invisible one? If the invisible world is better than this one, how much more exalted is God, who created them both? If the Creator of all good things is better than the best of all created things, then why has the mind abandoned what is best and turned instead to what is worst—that is, to carnal passions? Is it not evident that it has become accustomed to this, having dealt with it from birth, while it has not yet experienced at all that which is better and higher than all else? Thus, if through long-term abstinence from sensual pleasures and instruction in divine matters we gradually wean him from such a habit, then, as he gradually succeeds in this, he will be drawn to the divine and come to recognize his own dignity, and finally transfer his entire devotion to God.

73. One who speaks dispassionately about a brother's sin does so for two reasons: either to correct him or to benefit another. But if he speaks—whether to the person himself or to another—without these aims, then he speaks to condemn or slander his brother, and such a person will not escape being forsaken by God, but will inevitably fall into either the same or another transgression, and, having been exposed and rebuked by others, will be put to shame.

74. Those who commit the same sin should not be judged equally based on the act itself, but differently (judged according to the cause of the sin): for some sin out of habit, while others do so out of a sudden, uncontrollable impulse. In the latter case, a person had no thought of the sin before committing it, nor does he have any inclination toward it afterward; on the contrary, he grieves deeply and is tormented by what has happened. It is quite different for one who sins out of habit: for even before the sin, he did not cease to sin in thought, and after committing it, he remains in the same frame of mind.

75. Whoever practices virtue out of vanity also seeks knowledge out of vanity. But such a person no longer does or says anything for the sake of edification; rather, in everything, he seeks to gain glory from those who see his deeds or hear his words. This passion is revealed when, if some of these people begin to slander his words or deeds, he is deeply distressed—not because they have not been edified, for he had no such intention, but because he feels humiliated or belittled by them.

76. The passion of love of money is revealed when someone always receives with joy but gives with sorrow. Such a person cannot be truly frugal (see p. 19).

77. A person who suffers endures suffering for the following reasons:—either out of love for God, or in the hope of a reward, or out of fear of torment, or out of fear of people, or due to natural endurance, or for the sake of future pleasure, or out of self-interest, or out of vanity, or out of necessity.

78. It is one thing to rid oneself of thoughts, and another to be freed from passions. Often one is rid of thoughts when the objects toward which one had a passion are not in sight; but passions, meanwhile, remain hidden in the soul and are revealed when the objects appear. Therefore, one must observe the mind in the presence of such things and discern toward which it has a passion.

79. A sincere friend is one who, when a neighbor is tempted, endures alongside him—without confusion or anxiety—the sorrows, hardships, misfortunes, and calamities that have befallen him, as if they were his own.

80. Do not despise your conscience, which always gives you the best counsel; for it offers you divine and angelic counsel, frees you from the secret defilements of the heart, and, at the hour of your departure from this world, grants you boldness before God.

81. If you wish to be wise and at the same time humble, rather than a slave to the passion of pride, then always seek in things what is hidden from your understanding; and when you discover that there is much that is diverse and unknown to you, you will marvel at your own ignorance and humble your own wisdom. And by recognizing your own insignificance, you will come to know many great and wondrous things. But boasting about your knowledge prevents you from making progress in learning.

82. He who does not resist the healing remedies sincerely desires salvation; and these remedies are sorrow and grief, brought about by various misfortunes. But he who resists misfortunes knows neither what trade is taking place here on earth, nor what profit he will take with him when he departs from here.

83. Vanity and the love of money are mutually generative. For some grow rich through vanity, while others, having become rich, become vain. But such is the way of the world. A monk, however, is more vain—when he is unworldly; but when he possesses silver, he hides it, ashamed that he has something unbecoming of his calling.

84. It is characteristic of a monk's vanity to take pride in virtue and its consequences; but it is characteristic of his pride to take pride in his successes, to belittle others, and to attribute these things to himself rather than to God. It is characteristic of the vanity and pride of a layperson to boast and take pride in beauty, wealth, strength, and sound judgment, or worldly prudence.

85. The successes of laypeople are the downfall of monks, and the successes of monks are the downfall of laypeople. The successes of laypeople consist in wealth, fame, power, pleasures, physical well-being, having many children, and similar things, in which, upon entering, a monk perishes. The "successes" of a monk, however, are non-possessiveness, obscurity, powerlessness, abstinence, suffering, deprivation, and the like; when involuntarily subjected to these, a lover of the world regards them as a great misfortune and is often close to the danger of putting a noose around his neck—and some have indeed done so.

86. Food was created for two reasons: for nourishment and for healing. Therefore, those who partake of it with the wrong intention, and who do not use what God has given for its proper purpose, are condemned as hedonists. And with regard to all things, their improper use is a sin.

87. Humility is born of pure prayer, accompanied by tears and sorrow. For by constantly calling upon God for help, it prevents one from foolishly relying on one's own strength and wisdom, and from exalting oneself above others—two fierce diseases of the prideful passion.

88. It is one thing to struggle against a simple thought, so that it does not stir up passion, and another to struggle against a passionate thought, so that we do not consent to sin. Both of these kinds of struggle prevent thoughts from lingering within us.

89. Sorrow is inseparable from resentment. Thus, when the mind sees with grief, as in a mirror, the face of the brother who has offended it, it is evident that it harbors resentment. "The way of the vengeful leads to death" (Prov. 12:28); "for whoever harbors a grudge is lawless" (Prov. 21:24).

90. If you bear a grudge against someone, pray for him; and by separating, through prayer, your sorrow from the memory of the wrong he has done to you, you will halt the momentum of the passion; and by becoming friendly and compassionate, you will completely drive the passion from your soul. When another harbors malice toward you, be kind and humble toward him, and live peacefully with him, and you will deliver him from that passion.

91. The sorrow of the envious is difficult to stop. For he regards as a misfortune for himself that which he envies in you. And there is no other way to calm him except by concealing it from him. But if it is beneficial to many, yet causes him sorrow, which side should be disregarded? You must side with what is beneficial to many; yet, as far as possible, do not neglect him either, and do not let yourself be carried away by the deceitfulness of passion, offering help not to the passion itself but to the one suffering from it; but, with humble wisdom, regard him as superior to you, and give him preference over yourself at all times, in every place, and in every matter. And you can put a stop to your own envy if you rejoice in the joy of the one you envy and grieve with him over what he grieves about, fulfilling the Apostle's command: "Rejoice with those who rejoice, and weep with those who weep" (Rom. 12:15).

92. Our mind stands between two entities, each of which instills what is characteristic of it: one virtue, the other vice—that is, between an angel and a demon. But the mind has the power and strength to follow or resist whichever it chooses.

93. The Holy Powers guide us toward the good; and the natural seeds of goodness and good will help us; while the temptations of demons are empowered by the passions and evil will.

94. A pure mind is sometimes taught by God Himself, who descends upon it; at other times, the Holy Powers inspire it with goodness, and at still other times, the nature of things as it is contemplated by the mind.

95. A mind worthy of knowledge must keep its thoughts dispassionate toward things, its contemplation free from error, and its state of prayer serene. But it cannot always maintain this, as it is obscured—like smoke—by the intrusions of carnal impulses, at the instigation of demons.

96. We do not become angry at everything that causes us sorrow; for there are more events that cause sorrow than those that provoke anger. For example: something broke, something was lost, someone died. In such cases, we are merely saddened, but in others we are both saddened and angry, not being in a prudent frame of mind.

97. The mind, when receiving thoughts about things, usually changes its appearance anew in accordance with each thought; but when contemplating them spiritually, it is transformed differently in accordance with each contemplation. But when it is in God, it becomes utterly formless and invisible. For, contemplating the One who is of one form, it itself becomes of one form and entirely radiant.

98. The perfect soul is that in which the entire power of desire is wholly directed toward God.

99. A perfect mind is one which, having come to know the Unknowable through true faith, has surveyed all of His creations in general and received from God all-encompassing knowledge of His providence and judgment within them, to the extent that this is accessible to human beings.

100. Time is divided into three parts: and faith extends to all three of these parts; hope to one, and love to two. Faith and hope have a limit; but love, uniting with the Infinite and ever increasing, endures for all eternity. And that is why “love is the greatest of these” (1 Cor. 1:3, 13).

The Fourth Hundred on Love

1. First, the mind is amazed when contemplating the boundlessness of God—that unfathomable and much-desired abyss; second, it is astonished by how God brought all that exists into being out of nothing. But just as “His greatness has no end” (Ps. 141: 3), “so His wisdom has no limit” (Bar. 3: 18).

2. For how can one fail to marvel, contemplating that inaccessible and wondrous source of goodness? Or how can one not be filled with awe, pondering how and from where the verbal and rational nature, and the four elements from which bodies are composed, came into being, when there was no substance pre-existing their creation? What is this power that, having moved to action, brought them into being? But the sons of the Hellenes do not accept this, not knowing almighty goodness and its life-giving, mind-transcending wisdom and reason.

3. God, who has existed from eternity as the Creator, creates—whenever He wills—through His consubstantial Word and Spirit, by His boundless goodness. Do not ask: “How is it, then, that the Creator, being good from all eternity, has appeared only now?” For I also tell you that the unfathomable wisdom of the infinite Being is beyond human understanding.

4. The Creator, having from eternity within Himself the knowledge of all that exists, brought it to fruition and set it in motion whenever He willed. For it is inappropriate to doubt whether the almighty God can bring anything to fruition whenever He wills.

5. Investigate why God created what He did; for this can be known; but do not probe into how and why He did so not long ago: for this is beyond your understanding. For among divine things, some are comprehensible to man, while others are not. Contemplation, if left unchecked, can cast one into the abyss, as one of the Saints (Gregory the Theologian) said.

6. Some say that creatures have coexisted with God from eternity; but this is impossible. For how can beings that are finite in every respect coexist from eternity with the Infinite, and how can they be creatures at all if they are coeternal with the Creator? But this is the argument of the Greeks, who conceive of God, the Creator, not as a nature at all, but merely as a set of attributes. We, however, recognizing God as almighty, say that He is the Creator not merely of attributes, but also of qualified natures. If this is so, then creatures have not coexisted with God from eternity.

7. The Godhead and the Divine are knowable in some respects and unknowable in others. They are knowable through contemplation of what surrounds Him; they are unknowable in that He is in Himself.
8. In the simple and infinite nature of the Holy Trinity, do not seek any inclination or capacity, lest you make It complex, like created beings: for that is absurd and does not apply to God.
9. Simple, uniform, without qualities, peaceful, unperturbed, serene—one nature that is boundless, almighty, and all-sustaining. Every creature, however, is composed of essence and accidents and is always in need of God's Providence, as it is not free from changeability.
10. Every intellectual and sensory nature, when brought into being, received from God the power to receive impressions from things; the intellectual received the power to think, and the sensory, the power to feel.
11. God merely communicates, whereas a creature both receives and communicates: it receives existence and well-being, but communicates only well-being; yet the corporeal nature does so differently than the incorporeal nature.
12. An incorporeal being conveys well-being by speaking, acting, and being contemplated; whereas a corporeal being conveys it only by being contemplated.
13. The eternal existence or non-existence of rational and intellectual beings depends on the will of the Creator, who made "all things very good"; but whether they exist as good or evil by their own choice depends on the will of these creatures.
14. Evil is not perceived in the nature of creatures, but in their errant and irrational movements.
15. The soul moves wisely when its desiring power is tempered by self-restraint, its passionate power yearns for love while turning away from hatred, and its intellectual power abides in God through prayer and spiritual contemplation.
16. One who, during times of temptation, does not show magnanimity in the face of sorrowful events but cuts himself off from love for his spiritual brothers does not yet possess perfect love or a deep understanding of God's Providence.
17. The purpose of God's Providence is to reunite those who have been torn apart in various ways by evil through true faith and spiritual love. The Savior suffered so that "He might gather into one the scattered children of God" (John 11:52). Therefore, whoever is unwilling to bear heavy trials, endure sorrowful events, or suffer painful tribulations walks outside of God's love and the purpose of His providence.
18. "Love is patient and kind" (1 Cor. 13:4): does not the one who is faint-hearted in the face of sorrowful events, who harbors malice toward those who have grieved him, and who cuts himself off from love for them, stray from the purpose of God's Providence?
19. Consider this: is it not within yourself, rather than in your brother, that the evil lies which separates you from your brother? And hasten to be reconciled with him, lest you fall away from the commandment of love.
20. Do not neglect the commandment of love; for through it you will be a son of God, but by transgressing it, you will prove yourself a son of Gehenna.
21. Love between friends is destroyed: if you are envious, or become the object of envy; if you cause or suffer harm; if you dishonor or suffer dishonor; and finally, if you harbor and hold onto suspicious thoughts about your brother. So, have you not done or suffered something like this, and is that why you are turning away from the love of friends?
22. If you have been tempted by a brother, and your distress has led you to hatred, do not be overcome by hatred, but overcome hatred with love. You can overcome it in this way: by praying sincerely to God for him, by accepting the apology offered by your brother, or by healing yourself with his apology, acknowledging yourself as the cause of the temptation and resolving to be patient until the storm passes.
23. Long-suffering is the one who waits until the end of the temptation and receives praise for what he has endured.
24. "A patient man is rich in understanding" (Prov. 14:29); for he relates everything that happens to the final end, and in anticipation of it endures all sorrow. The "end," according to the Apostle, is "eternal" life (Rom. 6:22). "This is eternal life, that they may know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom You have sent" (John 17:3).
25. Do not be quick to reject spiritual love; for there is no other path to salvation left for people.

26. Do not regard as wicked and evil today the one whom you yesterday honored as a spiritual brother and a man of virtue, out of hatred for him—hatred born in you through the instigation of the evil one—but with long-suffering love, remembering yesterday’s goodness, cast today’s hatred out of your soul.

27. Do not now revile the one whom you praised yesterday as good and extolled as virtuous, calling him depraved and evil, simply because your love has turned to hatred, using slander against your brother as an excuse for this evil hatred you harbor toward him; but continue to offer him the same praise, even if you are still grieved, and you will easily return to saving love.

28. Because of the resentment toward your brother that still lurks within you, do not alter your customary praise of him in conversations with other brothers by subtly interweaving criticism into your words; but speak of him in conversation with sincere praise and pray earnestly for him as you would for yourself—and soon you will be freed from destructive hatred.

29. Do not say, “I do not hate my brother,” when you turn away from the memory of him, but heed what Moses says: “You shall not hate your brother in your heart; you shall rebuke your neighbor, and not bear sin because of him” (Leviticus 19:17).

30. Even if, due to some temptation, your brother continues to slander you, do not depart from a loving state of mind, and do not allow that same evil spirit to disturb your thoughts. You will not be led out of it if, even when reviled and slandered, you bless him and wish him well. Such is the path of wisdom in Christ, and whoever walks this path will dwell with Him.

31. Do not regard as well-intentioned those who direct words at you that stir up annoyance or hostility toward your brother, even if it seems they are speaking the truth; but turn away from such people as from deadly serpents, so that you may put a stop to their slander and free your soul from bitterness.

32. Do not wound your brother with insinuations, lest you receive the same in return and thereby drive the spirit of love from both of you; but with loving boldness, go and rebuke him (Matt. 18:15) to remove the causes of grief and to free both yourself and him from anxiety and vexation.

33. Examine your conscience with the utmost care to see if it is your fault that your brother will not be reconciled with you, and do not reject its rebuke with false reasoning—for it knows your innermost thoughts and will rebuke you at the hour of your departure from this world, and during prayer it will be a stumbling block to you.

34. In times of peace, do not dwell on what your brother said in a moment of anger—whether something unpleasant was spoken to your face or said about you to another in your absence, which you later heard about—lest, by harboring thoughts of ill will, you return once more to the destructive hatred of your brother.

35. A rational soul that harbors hatred toward another person cannot be at peace with God, who has given us this commandment: “If you do not forgive others their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses” (Matt. 6:15). Even if your brother does not want peace, keep yourself free from animosity by praying sincerely for him and not speaking ill of him to anyone.

36. The ineffable peace of the holy angels is based on these two dispositions: love for God and love for one another; likewise, the peace of all the saints from of old. And so our Savior has most wisely said: “On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets” (Matt. 22:40).

37. Do not be self-indulgent; then you will not hate your brother. Do not be self-loving; then you will love God.

38. If you desire to live with your spiritual brothers, renounce your own desires at their door; for in no other way can you be at peace either with God or with those who live with you.

39. One who has attained perfect love and has ordered his entire life according to it calls “Jesus” the Lord “by the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:3). The opposite of this, however, results in the opposite.

40. Love for God always seeks to open the mind to conversation about God and the divine; love for one’s neighbor, on the other hand, always inclines one to think well of him.

41. It is characteristic of one who loves vain glory, or is attached to anything material, to take offense at people over trivial matters, to hold a grudge against them, to harbor hatred toward them, or to be enslaved by shameful thoughts; but all this is foreign to a God-loving soul.

42. When you do not speak or do anything shameful in your thoughts, when you do not hold a grudge against those who have harmed you or slandered you, and when, during prayer, your mind is constantly detached from material things and images—know that you have attained a measure of dispassion and perfect love.

43. It is no small feat to free oneself from vanity; one is freed from it through the secret cultivation of virtues and frequent prayer; and the sign of this freedom is not to hold a grudge against those who have slandered you or are slandering you.

44. If you wish to be righteous, provide what is fitting for each part of yourself—that is, the soul and the body: for the thinking part of the soul—reading, spiritual contemplation, and prayer; for the impulsive part—spiritual love, which is the opposite of hatred; to the desiring part—chastity and self-restraint; and to the flesh, food and clothing, which alone are necessary.

45. The mind acts according to its nature; when it keeps the passions in check, it contemplates the meaning of all that exists and abides with God.

46. Just as health and sickness are seen in the body of an animal, and light and darkness in the ocean, so too are virtue and vice in the soul, and knowledge and ignorance in the mind.

47. A Christian attains wisdom through these three paths: the commandments, the dogmas, and faith. The commandments detach the mind from the passions; the dogmas lead it to the knowledge of the Being; and faith leads it to the contemplation of the Holy Trinity.

48. Some ascetics drive away only passionate thoughts, while others cut off the passions themselves. Passionate thoughts are driven away either by psalm-singing, prayer, contemplation of God, or some other appropriate occupation; the passions, however, are cut off by contempt for those things to which one is attached.

49. We are prone to passion toward women, wealth, glory, and so on. One can attain indifference and contempt toward women if, having renounced the world, one diligently strives, as one ought, to mortify the body through abstinence; toward wealth—if he convinces his mind to be content with what he has; toward fame— —if he comes to love the secret cultivation of virtues offered to God alone. The same applies to other passions. Whoever despises all these things never comes to harbor any animosity.

50. One who has renounced worldly things—such as a wife, possessions, and the like—has made the outer man a monk, but not yet the inner man; whereas one who has renounced passionate thoughts has made the inner man—that is, the mind—a monk as well. It is easy to make the outer man a monk, if one so desires; but it is no small feat to make the inner man a monk.

51. Who, then, in this category has been completely freed from passionate thoughts and has been deemed worthy to attain pure prayer, detached from all things—which is the mark of an inner monk?

52. Many passions lie hidden in our souls; they are revealed, however, when their objects appear.

53. Perhaps someone may remain unmoved by passions in the absence of their objects, having attained a small measure of dispassion; but as soon as the objects appear, the passions immediately begin to entice the mind.

54. In the absence of the object of a passion, do not consider yourself to possess perfect dispassion. But when an object does appear, and you remain unmoved neither by it nor by the memory of it, then know that you have entered the realm of dispassion; yet even then, do not be complacent: for although long-standing virtue subdues the passions, if you neglect it, they will be stirred up again.

55. He who loves Christ undoubtedly imitates Him as much as possible. Christ, for His part, never ceased to do good to people; when met with ingratitude and reviled, He was long-suffering; when beaten and killed by them, He endured it all, imputing no evil to anyone. These three actions constitute the works of love for one's neighbor; without them, anyone who claims to love Christ or to inherit His Kingdom is deceiving himself. For the Lord said: "Not everyone who says to Me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the Kingdom of Heaven, but the one who does the will of My Father" (Matt. 7:21). And again: "Whoever loves Me will keep My commandments" (John 14:15, 21), and so on.

56. The entire purpose of the Savior's commandments is to free the mind from intemperance and hatred, and to elevate it to love for Him and for one's neighbor, from which the light of holy, active knowledge is born.

57. Having been granted by God a certain knowledge, do not neglect love and self-control; for they, by purifying the passionate part of the soul, prepare for you a smooth path to knowledge.

58. The path to knowledge is dispassion and humility; "without these, no one will see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14).

59. Since “the mind boasts, but love builds up” (1 Cor. 8:1), join love with the mind, and you will be free from pride; you will be a spiritual steward, edifying both yourself and all who draw near to you.

60. Love builds up because it does not envy, is not provoked by those who envy, and does not boast publicly about what is worthy of envy; it does not consider itself to have already attained perfection (Phil. 3:12), and regarding what it does not know, it is not ashamed to admit its ignorance. In this way, it protects the mind from conceit and always disposes it to excel in knowledge.

61. Knowledge is usually followed by conceit and envy, especially in the beginning. Conceit manifests itself only inwardly; but envy manifests itself both inwardly and outwardly: inwardly (on my part) toward those who possess knowledge, and outwardly (toward me) from those who lack it. Love repels these three vices: conceit, because “it does not boast”; internal envy, for “it does not envy”; external envy, for “it is patient and kind” (1 Cor. 13:4).—Therefore, one who possesses knowledge must also acquire love, so that it may keep the mind unharmed in all things.

62. One who has been granted the gift of knowledge but harbors resentment, ill will, or hatred toward another is like one who pierces his own eyes with thorns and thistles. Thus, knowledge necessarily requires love.

63. Do not concern yourself entirely with the flesh, but having assigned it a task according to its strength, turn your whole mind toward the inner life. For “physical training is of little value, but godliness is of value in every way” (1 Tim. 4:8), and so on.

64. He who dwells within—and cares ceaselessly for the inner life—practices self-control, is patient, shows mercy, and is humble; and not only that, but he also contemplates, studies theology, and prays. This is precisely what the Apostle means when he says, “Walk by the Spirit” (Gal. 5:16), and so on.

65. One who does not know how to walk the spiritual path does not concern himself with passionate thoughts, but focuses all his attention on the flesh—and either indulges in gluttony, debauchery, vexation, anger, and resentment, thereby clouding his mind; or he engages in ascetic practices to an excessive degree, thereby suppressing his thoughts.

66. Scripture does not take away from us anything given to us by God for our use, but it curbs intemperance and corrects recklessness. That is, it does not forbid eating, having children, or possessing money and spending it wisely; but it does forbid gluttony, adultery, and the like. It does not even forbid thinking about such things, for that is why the mind was created; but it does forbid thinking about them with passion.

67. Some of the things we do for God are done in accordance with the commandments, while others are not done in accordance with the commandments but, so to speak, as a voluntary offering. In accordance with the commandments—when we love God and our neighbor, love our enemies, do not commit adultery, do not murder, and so on—for which, if we violate them, we are subject to condemnation. Acts not based on the commandments include preserving our virginity, living a celibate life, renouncing all possessions, living as hermits, and so on. These actions serve as offerings so that, if through weakness we fail to fulfill a commandment, we may appease our gracious Lord with these offerings.

68. One who has chosen a celibate life or virginity must have “loins girded” and a “lamp burning” (Luke 12:35): “loins girded” through abstinence; and a “lamp burning” through prayer, contemplation of God, and spiritual love.

69. Some of the brethren think that they cannot possess the gifts of the Holy Spirit; for, through their neglect of keeping the commandments, they do not know that whoever has true faith in Christ possesses within himself, in a condensed form, all the gifts of God. But since, through our idleness, we are far removed from active love for Him—which would reveal to us the divine treasures within us—we rightly consider ourselves strangers to God’s gifts.

70. If, according to the words of the Divine Apostle, Jesus Christ dwells in our hearts “through faith” (Eph. 3:17), “and in Him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom” and knowledge (Col. 2:3), then all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are found in our hearts. They are revealed to the heart as each person is purified by the commandments.

71. “This is the treasure hidden in a field” (Matt. 13:44) of your heart, which you have not yet found because of your idleness. For if you had found it, you would have sold everything and bought that field. But you, having left that field, are working around it, where there is nothing but thorns and thistles.

72. That is why the Savior says: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8). They will see Him and the treasures within Him when they purify themselves through love and self-control, and all the more so the more they are purified.

73. That is why He also says: “Sell your possessions and give alms” (Luke 12:33), “and all these things will be clean for you” (Luke 11:41)—not as those who are preoccupied with things pertaining to the body, but as those who strive to purify their minds from hatred and intemperance, which the Lord calls the “heart” (Matt. 15:19). For all that defiles the mind prevents it from seeing Christ living within it through the grace of holy baptism.

74. Scripture calls the virtues “paths”; but love is the greatest of all virtues; which is why the Apostle said: “And I will show you a still more excellent way” (1 Cor. 12:31), one that leads one to despise all material things and to prefer the eternal to the temporal.

75. Love for God opposes lust; for it inclines the mind to abstain from sensual pleasures; and love for one’s neighbor opposes anger, for it compels one to despise glory and wealth. And these are the two coins that the Savior gave to the innkeeper (Luke 10:35) so that he might care for you. But do not be ungrateful by joining the robbers, lest you be wounded again and end up not merely barely alive, but dead.

76. Purify your mind of anger, resentment, and shameful thoughts; and then you will be able to recognize Christ dwelling within you.

77. Who has enlightened you with faith in the Holy, Consubstantial, and Worshiped Trinity? Or who has made known to you the incarnate plan of the One from the Holy Trinity? Who taught you about the incorporeal, about the origin and end of the visible world, or about the resurrection from the dead and eternal life, or about the glory of the Kingdom of Heaven and the Last Judgment? Is it not the grace of Christ dwelling within you, which is the pledge of the Holy Spirit? What is greater than this grace? Or what is better than such wisdom and knowledge? What is higher than such promises? If, even after all this, we remain idle and negligent, and do not purify ourselves of the passions that blind our minds and prevent us from seeing such truths more clearly than the sun itself, then we must blame ourselves, and not deny that grace dwells within us.

78. God, who has promised you eternal blessings and has placed the Spirit as a pledge in your heart, has commanded you to take care of your life so that the inner person, having been freed from passions, may begin to taste those blessings even in this present life.

79. As you become worthy of lofty divine contemplations, take special care to cultivate love and self-control, so that, by keeping the passionate part of your soul serene, you may have unceasing light within your soul.

80. Rein in the soul’s irritable nature with love; subdue its lustful nature with self-control; and lift up its thinking nature through prayer: and the light of your mind will never be dimmed within you.

81. The causes that destroy love are as follows: dishonor, harm inflicted, slander against one’s faith or way of life, beatings, blows, wounds, and the like; and furthermore, when this happens either to the person himself or to any of his relatives or friends. Whoever breaks off love for any of these reasons has not yet understood the purpose of Christ’s commandments.

82. Try as much as you can to love every person. If you cannot do this yet, then at least do not hate anyone. But you will not be able to do even this unless you despise all earthly things.

83. If someone has slandered you, do not hate him, but hate the slander and the demon that incited him to it. But if you hate the one who slandered you, then you have come to hate the person and have broken the commandment; and what he did with words, you are doing with deeds. But if you keep the commandment, show him an act of love, and if you can, help him, so that you may turn him away from evil.

84. Christ does not want you to harbor hatred or resentment toward anyone, nor anger or malice toward anyone, in any way whatsoever, or for any temporary reason. This is what the four Gospels preach to everyone.

85. Many of us speak, but few act. Yet no one should distort the word of God to suit their own carelessness; rather, they should confess their weakness without hiding God’s truth, lest, along with transgressing the commandments, they also become guilty of misinterpreting the word of God.

86. Love and self-restraint free the soul from passions; reading and contemplation of God deliver the mind from ignorance; and standing in prayer places the one who prays before God Himself.

87. When the demons see that we despise the things of this world, yet do not wish to hate people or fall away from love because of them, they then spread slander against us so that, unable to bear the distress, we may come to hate the slanderers.

88. There is no burden heavier for the soul than slander—whether it be against one’s faith or one’s conduct—and no one can disregard this except the one who, like Susanna, looks to God, the only One who is mighty and can deliver from troubles, just as He delivered her and revealed the truth to people as proof; just as He revealed it concerning her, and comforts the soul with hope.

89. Depending on how you pray for the one who slandered you, God will certainly reveal the truth about you to those who were led astray.

90. In essence, there is only one God; but in the disposition of the soul, there is only one who imitates God: for his chief aim is to unite the wicked with the good in essence, so that they too may become good. For this reason, when reviled, he blesses; when persecuted, he endures; when slandered, he comforts; when killed, he prays for those who kill him (1 Cor. 4:12–13). He does all this so as not to stray from his primary goal—love.

91. The Lord’s commandments teach us to make blessed use of the things that are in between. Blessed use of these intermediate things purifies the state of the soul; a pure state of the soul gives rise to discernment; and discernment gives rise to dispassion, from which perfect love is born.

92. One who, when tempted, cannot overlook a friend’s transgression—whether it is actually committed or merely appears to be so—does not yet possess dispassion. For the passions hidden in such a person’s soul, when stirred up, blind the mind and prevent one from perceiving the rays of truth and distinguishing good from evil. Should we not conclude that such a person has not yet attained perfect love, which drives out the fear of judgment (1 John 4:18)?

93. “A true friend is not treacherous” (Sir. 6:15): he regards his friend’s misfortunes as his own and bears them together with him, suffering even unto death.

94. There are many friends, but only in times of prosperity; in times of trial, however, you will scarcely find even one.

95. One must love every person from the heart, but place one’s hope in God alone, and serve Him alone with all one’s strength. For as long as He preserves us, all our friends favor us, and none of our enemies are able to harm us. But when He forsakes us, all our friends turn away from us, and all our enemies gain power over us.

96. There are four main kinds of God’s abandonment: one is providential abandonment, as was the case with the Lord Himself, so that through this apparent abandonment He might save those who were abandoned; another is abandonment as a trial, as was the case with Job and Joseph, so that one might be revealed as a pillar of courage and the other as a pillar of chastity. Another is abandonment for spiritual edification, as was the case with the Apostle Peter, so that through humility an abundance of grace might be preserved in him. Finally, there is abandonment through rejection, as was the case with the Jews, so that through punishment they might be turned to repentance. All these forms of abandonment are salvific and filled with God’s grace and love for humanity.

97. True keepers of the commandments and those who are truly initiated into the mysteries of God’s judgments do not abandon friends who are being tempted by God’s permission; but those who despise the commandments and are uninitiated into the mysteries of God’s judgments rejoice with a friend when he prospers, but when the one being tempted suffers, they abandon him. It sometimes happens that they take the side of the adversaries.

98. Christ’s friends love everyone sincerely, but are not loved by everyone. Worldly friends, on the other hand, do not love everyone, nor are they loved by everyone. Christ’s friends preserve their bond of love to the end; but worldly friends do so only until they come into conflict with one another over some worldly matter.

99. “A friend is faithful, and kinship is strong” (Sir. 6:14). For even in a friend’s prosperity, he is a good counselor and a like-minded partner; and in times of suffering, he is the most sincere defender and the most compassionate advocate.

100. Many have spoken at length about love, yet you will find it only among Christ’s disciples, if you seek it; for they alone had true Love as their teacher of love, of whom it is said: “If I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, but have not love, I am nothing" (1 Cor. 13:2–3). For whoever has obtained love has obtained God Himself; "for God is love" (1 John 4:8): To Him be glory forever. Amen.

3. Speculative and Practical Chapters, Selected from the Seven Hundred Chapters of the Greek "On Love"

1. There is one God—beginningless, incomprehensible, possessing the full power to be (as He is), completely excluding any thought of "when" or "how" He exists, as He is inaccessible to all and unknowable by any creature in His nature.

2. Everything that exists is called conceivable and knowable—that is, such that there are demonstrable principles for its knowledge. God, however, is called inconceivable, but it is believed from the conceivable and knowable that He exists.

3. Knowledge of created things has its own proof, its own foundations obtained by natural means, by which they are naturally defined. God, however, is believed to exist solely on the basis of the foundations found in these things, granting the devout a confession and faith in His existence that is more certain than any proof. Faith is true knowledge, having unprovable foundations, serving as a confirmation of things that transcend the mind and language,

4. God is the beginning, the middle, and the end of all that exists: the beginning as Creator, the middle as Provider, and the end as Completer; for, as Scripture says, "from Him and through Him and to Him are all things" (Rom. 11:36).

5. There is no soul more honorable than one that is rational by nature. God, being good, creates every soul in His image and brings it into being as self-moved—(free). Then each, according to its own will, either chooses honor or brings upon itself dishonor, of its own accord, through its own deeds.

6. God, as it is written, is the Sun of Righteousness (Mal. 4:2), shining equally upon all with the rays of His goodness. The soul, however, depending on its disposition, is usually either like wax, as one who loves God, or like mud, as one who loves material things. Just as mud, by its very nature, is dried up by the sun, while wax is naturally softened by it, so too every soul that loves material things and the world, receiving from God enlightening inspirations and, according to its disposition, rejecting them, hardens like mud and, like Pharaoh, brings ruin upon itself; but every God-loving soul, on the other hand, is softened like wax and, receiving the imprints of the images of divine things, becomes a dwelling place for God in the spirit.

7. He who has enlightened his mind with divine insights, trained his speech to ceaselessly honor the Creator with divine songs, and sanctified his senses with pure and unblemished perceptions—he has added to the natural goodness of existence, in its image, well-being in its likeness through a voluntary disposition of goodwill.

8. He who compels his mind to contemplate the one God and His perfections, who makes speech the true interpreter and explicator of these perfections, and who has trained his senses to gaze piously upon the visible world and all that is in it, proclaiming to the soul the greatness of the intellect hidden therein—he preserves his soul unstained.

9. God, having freed us from the bitter bondage of the tyrants—the demons—has bestowed upon us the benevolent yoke of godliness: humility, by which all the devil's power is subdued, and every good is established in those who accept this yoke and is preserved from being stolen away.

10. The believer fears God; he who fears God humbles himself; he who humbles himself becomes meek, having adopted a disposition impervious to unnatural impulses of anger and lust; the meek keep the commandments; he who keeps the commandments is purified; he who is purified is enlightened; he who is enlightened is deemed worthy to lie with the Bridegroom—the Word—in the treasury of mysteries.

11. Just as a farmer, surveying a field suitable for planting trees, sometimes unexpectedly stumbles upon a treasure: so too every ascetic, humble and sincere, and even-tempered in spirit, free from the thickets of earthly passions, like the most blessed Jacob, when asked by his father about the secret of his success: "What is this that you have so quickly found, my son?" may answer, saying: "What the Lord your God has given me" (Gen. 27:20). For when God, without any effort on our part, bestows upon us—who did not expect it—profound insights into His wisdom, we think that we have suddenly discovered a spiritual treasure. A skilled and experienced ascetic is a spiritual farmer who takes what is perceived through the senses in visible things—like a wild tree—transplants it into the spiritual field, and thereby discovers a treasure: the grace-filled vision of the manifestation of God's wisdom in created things.

12. Let the one who seeks knowledge for the sake of showing off, and who does not attain it, not envy his neighbor, nor be consumed by sorrow; rather, let him undergo the preparatory labor for knowledge, as prescribed—the labor of active virtue. By zealously performing this in advance with the body, he will prepare the soul to receive knowledge.

13. Those who rightly seek knowledge of things with a pious intention, without any thought of showing off before others, will encounter most luminous insights into them and find guidance toward a truer knowledge of themselves. To such, the Law says: having entered the Promised Land, you will inherit “great and good cities” that you did not build, “houses full of every good thing” that you did not construct, “springs that have been dug” that you did not dig, “vineyards and olive groves” that you did not plant (Deut. 6: 10, 11). For the one who lives not for himself but for God is filled with divine gifts, which are not always evident because of the threatening onslaught of the passions.

14. The hypocrite, as long as he thinks he has not been exposed, remains at peace and is silent, content with the glory he derives from appearing righteous; but when he is exposed, he spews out scathing words, thinking to cover up his own shame by reviling others. To such a person, the Word of Scripture—comparing him to the offspring of a viper, as one who is wicked—commands him to produce fruits worthy of repentance, that is, to transform his innermost disposition of the heart in accordance with the image he presents.

15. One who pretends to be a friend in order to harm his neighbor is a wolf, concealing his wickedness under sheep’s clothing. Such a person, upon encountering a simple disposition, or anything said or done with Christian sincerity, seizes upon it and devours it, and then showers those whose words and conduct he attacks with countless insults, “as one who spies on the liberty of the brethren which is in Christ” (Gal. 2:4).

16. He who feigns silence with evil intent devises a plot against his neighbor; but failing in this, he turns to his own passion, inflicting torment upon his heart. But he who remains silent for the sake of good fosters friendship and departs rejoicing, as one who has received enlightenment that has dispelled the darkness.

17. In a gathering of brothers, the one who hastily interrupts the conversation does not hide (i.e., reveals) that he is afflicted by a love of glory; having been caught up in this, he offers many direct and indirect thoughts on the subject at hand, desiring to disrupt its flow.

18. The wise person, both teaching and learning, desires to learn and teach only what is useful; but the supposed sage, whether asking questions or being asked, offers only that which feeds curiosity.

19. Whatever blessings of grace a person receives by God’s favor, he must pass on to others without envy, according to the Lord’s word: “Freely you have received; freely give” (Matt. 10:8). He who hides a gift under the ground slanders the giver, as if he were cruel (Matt. 25:24), and renounces virtue for the sake of sparing the flesh. But whoever sells the truth to his enemies will later, when condemned, accept death by strangulation, unable to bear disgrace as a lover of glory.

20. Those who still fear the battle against their passions and dread the attacks of invisible enemies ought to remain silent; that is, in the struggle for virtue, one should not resort to conflict, but turn to prayer, entrusting to God the care of oneself and one’s protection—as it is written in the Book of Exodus: “The Lord will fight for you; you need only be still” (Ex. 14:14). But those who, after the defeat of their pursuing enemies, seek—in a spirit of gratitude—to understand what path of virtue they should take, should simply keep their hearts open and listen to what the Lord says, as was commanded to Israel: “Hear, O Israel” (Deut. 6:4)! But for those who, having purified their hearts, yearn uncontrollably for divine guidance, it is fitting to have reverent boldness, as a result of which they are told: “Why do you cry out to Me?” (Exodus 14:15). Thus, for those who are commanded to remain silent out of fear, it is fitting only to take refuge in God; but for those commanded to listen, readiness to hear and fulfill the divine commandments is fitting; and for those who have attained spiritual understanding, ceaseless crying out in prayer is fitting—both in asking for the removal of evils and in expressing thanksgiving for the blessings received.

21. The soul can never reach out toward the knowledge of God unless God Himself, in His gracious condescension toward it, touches it and lifts it up to Himself. Nor could the human mind ever ascend so high as to receive some divine illumination, were it not for God Himself, who exalts it—as far as the human mind is capable of being exalted—and enlightens it with divine radiance.

22. According to the Gospel, only a believer can move a mountain (Matt. 17:19) of sin through a life of active goodness, rooting out from within his former attachment to sensual things, which are fleeting and changeable. Whoever has become a disciple, receiving from the Word the broken pieces of bread—symbolizing spiritual guidance—will feed thousands with them, demonstrating through his deeds the multiplying power of the Word (Matt. 15:32 et seq.). And whoever is able to become an Apostle heals “every infirmity and every disease and casts out demons” (Matt. 10:1): “casts out demons,” that is, drives away the influence of the passions; “heals diseases,” that is, through hope he restores a godly disposition to those who have lost it; he cures infirmities, that is, he rouses and strengthens those who have grown lax through sloth with the word of judgment. But he who has received “authority to trample on serpents and scorpions” (Luke 10:19) destroys the beginning and the end of sin.

23. An apostle and a disciple are, of course, both believers; but a disciple is not always an apostle, though he is always a believer; whereas a believer alone is no longer a disciple or an apostle. However, it is possible, through life and contemplation, for this third (the believer) to rise to the rank and dignity of the second (the disciple), and for this second to rise to the rank and dignity of the first (the Apostle).

24. That which is produced in time according to a temporal order, once it has attained perfection, comes to a halt, because its natural growth then ceases. But that which the grace of God produces according to the order of the virtuous life, even after attaining perfection, is again impelled toward growth: for here it is the case that the end of one thing serves as the beginning of another. Whoever has cut off within himself the corrupt passions dwelling in him through active virtue has thereby begun other most divine transformations “from glory to glory” (2 Cor. 3:18): for God, who works within him, never ceases to do good, just as He never began to do so; for just as it is the nature of light to shine, so it is the nature of God to do good. Why, according to the law—which corresponds to the state of temporal things that are born and die—is the Sabbath observed by ceasing from work; but according to the Gospel—which corresponds to the state of spiritual and intellectual things—it is celebrated by performing good deeds, although those who do not understand that the Sabbath is for man, and not man for the Sabbath—and that the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath—take offense at this (Mark 2:27–28).

25. To experience spiritual joy, it is not enough for the soul merely to subdue the passions unless it also acquires virtues through the fulfillment of the commandments. “Do not rejoice,” says the Lord, “because the demons are subject to you”—that is, the workings of the passions—“but rejoice because your names are written in heaven”—that is, that by the grace of sonship, for the sake of virtue, you have been transferred to the category of dispassion.

26. Until we have, through the mind, detached ourselves from our natural state and from everything that comes after God, we cannot consider ourselves to have acquired an unshakable habit of virtue. For only when such a disposition is established within us through love will we come to know the power of the divine promise; for the perfect immutability of the worthy is established, as we must believe, precisely where the mind has previously rooted that power through its love. And one who has not withdrawn from himself and from everything that can be conceived in any way, and who has not established himself in a silence that transcends all thought (the stilling of all movements of the mind), cannot in any way be free from changeability.

27. The great Moses, after he had already set up his tabernacle outside the camp—that is, after he had firmly established his heart and mind beyond all that is visible—began to worship God; and after he had entered into darkness, that is, into the invisible and immaterial realm of knowledge, he remained there, performing the most sacred mysteries (or is consecrated for that purpose) (Ex. 33: 7; 20: 21).

28. In Holy Scripture, one can distinguish between the flesh and the spirit, as if it were a kind of spiritual person. And whoever were to say that the letter of Scripture is the flesh, while its meaning is the spirit or the soul, would not err against the truth. It is clear, however, that the wise person is one who, having cast aside the flesh as something perishable, clings entirely to the spirit as that which is imperishable.

29. The one who fulfills the law through life and conduct abstains from certain passionate deeds, offering to God as a sacrifice the activity of the speechless passions. And this is sufficient for his salvation, given his spiritual infancy.

30. Nurtured by the prophetic word to reject the works of the passions, he also strives to set aside any sympathy for them and any association with them that arises in the soul, so that, by showing himself to be abstaining from sin with the worse part—that is, the flesh—and with the better part—that is, the soul—he may not be secretly sinning with uncontrollable passion.

31. Having sincerely embraced the Gospel way of life, he cuts off within himself both the beginning and the end of sin, and practices every virtue both in deed and in thought, offering to God a sacrifice of praise and confession, as one delivered from the active assault of the passions, free from the mental struggle against them, and possessing only an insatiable delight that nourishes the soul with hope for future blessings.

32. Sensation—or the perception of sensory impressions—accompanies the “active” person, who labors to practice virtues; whereas insensitivity—or the lack of being swayed by sensory impressions—is characteristic of the “contemplative” person, who focuses his mind on God, detaching it from the flesh and the world. The one who strives to free the soul from the natural bonds of sympathy with the flesh—the “active” one, through labor on the path of goodness—often feels weary and senses his good disposition waning; but the one who, having torn out the thorns of this sympathy through practice and abiding in contemplation, can no longer be captivated or held back by anything, having been purified of that by which those who sought to dominate him usually wounded and held him captive.

33. Just as the fruit of disobedience is sin, so the fruit of obedience is virtue; and just as disobedience is followed by the transgression of the commandments and the severing of the covenant with the One who gave the commandments, so obedience is followed by the fulfillment of the commandments and the closest union with the One who commanded them. For he who keeps the commandment through obedience has fulfilled the truth and preserved unbroken the unity of love with the One who commanded. But he who transgresses the commandment through disobedience has committed sin and cut himself off from the unity of love with the One who commanded.

34. Whoever, after the breaking of the union due to transgression, seeks to be reunited again, first turns away from the passions, then from passionate thoughts, then from nature and all that is natural (i.e., from the material world), then from mental concepts and knowledge of them (i.e., from the spiritual world), and finally, having transcended the diversity of Providence’s plans (the course of events), approaches the Unity itself in a way that is unknown: in that Unity, having beheld his own immutability, he “rejoices with an inexpressible joy” (1 Pet. 1:8), “as one who has found the peace of God, which surpasses all understanding” (Phil. 4:7), and who, to those deemed worthy of it, ceaselessly protects them from falling.

35. The fear of Gehenna compels those being led onto this path (beginners) to avoid sin; the desire for a reward of blessings imparts readiness to those who are progressing in the practice of virtues; and the mystery of love elevates the mind above all created things, making it blind to everything that comes after God. For only those who have become blind to everything other than God does the Lord enlighten, revealing to them what is most divine (Ps. 145:8).

36. On the Lord, as on a foundation of faith, as we rebuild the lofty edifice of virtues, let us lay upon this foundation “gold, silver, and precious stones,” that is, pure and unadulterated theology, a life that is bright and glorious, divine thoughts, and pearl-like contemplations; and not “wood, hay, and straw” (1 Cor. 3:12)—that is, not idolatry or a passion for the sensual, not an irrational life, not passionate thoughts devoid, like ripe ears of grain, of wise understanding.

37. Let the one who devotes himself to spiritual knowledge keep the steps of his soul steadfast before the Lord, as God said to Moses: “But you, stand here with me” (Exod. 33:2 ff.). It is important to understand, however, that there are distinctions even among those who stand before the Lord, if the wise read the following carefully: “There are some standing here who will not taste death until they see the kingdom of God come with power” (Mark 9:1). For the Lord does not always appear in glory to all who stand before Him; but to those who are just beginning their journey toward Him (the beginners), He comes in the form of a servant, while to those who are strong enough to follow Him in the ascent to the high mountain of His Transfiguration, He appears in the form of God, in which He existed before the world began. Thus, it is possible for the same Lord to appear differently to those who approach Him—to one in one way and to another in another, according to the faith of each, which varies the vision.

38. It is said of one who leads an active life that he dwells temporarily in the flesh, like a stranger whose aim is, through the practice of virtues, to sever from his soul any sympathy for the flesh and to detach himself from material delights. And of one who leads a contemplative life, it is said that he dwells in virtue itself, as one who contemplates the truth in mirrors and, as it were, in riddles. For he has not yet beheld, through a face-to-face experience, the true forms of the hoped-for blessings as they truly are. And every saint, with regard to future blessings, “walks as a stranger,” crying out: “I am a sojourner and a stranger, as were all my fathers” (Ps. 38: 7, 13).

39. It is always good, having detached ourselves from all things, to seek God, as we are commanded (Ps. 45:11; 104:4). For although, by the very nature of this present life, in seeking Him we cannot reach the depths of God, perhaps, having attained even a little of His depth, we will behold the holiest of the holy and the most spiritual of the spiritual. The High Priest illustrates this figuratively when, from the Holy Place (the first part of the tabernacle), which is holier than the courtyard, he enters the Holy of Holies, which is holier than the Holy Place.

40. If the Son of God and the Father, the Word of God, became the Son of Man and a human being for this very reason—so that He might make people gods and sons of God—then let us believe that we will be where “Christ Himself, as the head of the whole body,” (1 Cor. 1:18), who became our “Forerunner” to the Father according to His humanity. For in the assembly of the gods—that is, of those who are saved—God will stand in the midst, distributing the rewards (according to each one’s worthiness) of that bliss, without, however, separating the worthy from one another by place.

41. Whoever still indulges in the passionate desires of the flesh lives in the land of the Chaldeans, as a servant and maker of idols. But when, having come to sound judgment, he gains some understanding of the way of life befitting his nature (and develops a sympathy for it); then, having left the land of the Chaldeans, he goes to Haran in Mesopotamia (Gen. 11:28–31)—that is, to a state bordering on virtue and sin, not yet purified of sensual allure. And when he goes beyond the limits of this middle, sensual understanding of good, he then enters the land of goodness—that is, a state free from all sin and ignorance—which the true God reveals and promises to give as a reward for virtue to those who love Him.

42. Let the one who is eager to attain wisdom in the spirit of piety, having taken up the battle against invisible forces, pray that both natural discernment (of good and evil)—whose light is not great—and the enlightening grace of the Spirit may abide with him; of which the first guides the flesh toward active virtue, while the second guides the mind to prefer above all else fellowship with wisdom (Wisdom of Solomon 8:2), “by which the strongholds of evil and every exaltation that sets itself against the mind of God are destroyed” (2 Corinthians 10:4). This is also demonstrated by Joshua, who prays, “May the sun stand still over Gibeon”—that is, may the unwaning light of God’s knowledge be preserved in him on the mountain of mental contemplation—“and the moon over the wilderness”—(Josh. 10:12)—that is, may the natural distinction between good and evil, which transcends carnal weakness, remain unchanging with regard to virtue.

43. “Gibeon” is the exalted mind; and “the wilderness” is the flesh, humbled by death. “The sun” is the Word, which enlightens the mind, gives it the power for contemplation, and delivers it from all ignorance; and the “moon” is the natural law, which obliges the flesh to submit lawfully to the spirit in order to accept the yoke of the commandments. The moon is taken as a symbol of nature because of its changeability. However, in the saints, nature remains unchanging because of their unchanging habit of virtue.

44. The Lord is not to be sought outside of those who seek Him, but those who seek Him must seek Him within themselves by faith, as evidenced by their deeds: “The word is near you,” says the Apostle; “in your mouth and in your heart—that is, the word of faith” (Rom. 10:8); for the search for the word of faith is the search for Christ Himself.

45. Without dwelling on the height of God’s boundlessness, let us not despair of God’s love for humanity, as if, because of such height, it could not reach us; nor, recalling the immeasurable depth of our fall through sin, let us not doubt the possibility of the resurrection of the virtue that has been put to death within us. Both are possible for God—both to descend and enlighten our minds with knowledge, and to restore virtue within us once more, and to exalt us with Himself through works of righteousness. “Do not say in your heart,” says the Apostle, “‘Who will ascend into heaven?’—that is, to bring Christ down; or ‘Who will descend into the abyss?’—that is, to bring Christ up from the dead” (Rom. 10:6–7).

46. Like animals, those who live for their senses alone abuse God’s creations to satisfy their passions. Paying no heed to the clear word of wisdom—that they might know and glorify God through His creations, and understand where we come from, what we are, what our purpose is, and toward what end we were created through the visible world—they wander in darkness their entire lives, grasping with both hands nothing but ignorance of God.

47. Those who pay attention only to the letter of Holy Scripture and, bound by the law to bodily service, associate the dignity of the soul with the sacrifices of speechless animals, think they can please God through these offerings. They are very concerned with the body and its outward purifications, but they pay no heed to the beauty of the soul, which is marred by the wounds of the passions, even though it is for the soul’s sake that the multitude of visible things was created and the entire Law and all the divine Word were revealed.

48. The fact that the Lord “is set for the fall and rising of many in Israel” (Luke 2:34), if both aspects are taken in a positive light, means: for the fall of each believer into passions and evil thoughts, and for the rising of virtues and every God-loving thought.

49. “Out of fear of the Jews, they were sitting in an upper room with the doors locked” (John 20:19)—that is, out of fear of the spirits of malice, firmly established in the realm of revelations, at the height of divine contemplations, having shut off their senses like doors, —do not accept the God-Word who comes unbeknownst to them, who, appearing to them not according to the order of sensory phenomena, grants you dispassion through peace, and through the breath—communion with the Holy Spirit—conferring authority over evil spirits and revealing the symbols of His mysteries.

50. “The land of the Chaldeans” is a life of passion, in which sinful idols are set up and worshiped. “Mesopotamia” is a way of life that veers from one extreme to the other. And “the Promised Land” is a state (of the spirit) filled with every kind of (spiritual) blessing. Anyone who, like ancient Israel, does not care for this state of well-being, falls back into the slavery of the passions and is deprived of the freedom that has been granted.

51. It should be noted that none of the saints went to Babylon of their own free will: for it is inappropriate and unwise for those who love God to choose what is evil instead of what is good. If, however, some of them were involuntarily taken there along with the people, we understand by “them” those who, not of their own accord but due to special circumstances—for the sake of saving those in need of guidance—set aside the lofty discourse of knowledge and turned to the teaching on the passions: by virtue of which circumstance the great Apostle deemed it more necessary to remain in the flesh—that is, to continue teaching moral doctrine to his disciples—even though he had every desire to renounce moral teaching and be with Christ through pure and simple spiritual contemplation (Phil. 1:29).

52. Just as the blessed David, playing the harp, soothed Saul, who was tormented by an evil spirit (1 Sam. 16:23), so every spiritual word—sweet because of the contemplative insights that permeate it—soothes a mind afflicted with epilepsy, freeing it from the evil conscience that oppresses it.

53. “A man of fair complexion with kind eyes,” like the great David (1 Sam. 16:12), is one who, through the radiance of a life lived according to God, possesses a word of wisdom that shines as brightly as that life itself. In such a person, good deeds are combined with contemplation; the former shines with various virtues, while the latter shines with divine thoughts.

54. One who prays to receive daily bread certainly does not receive it entirely as it is in itself, but as the recipient is able to receive it. To all who ask, He gives Himself—the Bread of Life (John 6:35)—as a who loves mankind; yet not to all in equal measure, but more to those who have done great deeds of righteousness, and less to those who are lacking in such deeds: to each according to the capacity (or disposition) of his mind to receive it.

55. To the one who lives an active life, the Lord is present through virtues, but He is absent from the one who attaches no value to virtue. Again, to the contemplative man, He is present through true knowledge of things; but He is absent from the one who, to any degree, falls short in this regard.

56. At the beginning of teaching people piety, the matter usually proceeds as if it pertained only to the body. And in the early stages of approaching godliness, we speak more according to the letter than according to the spirit. Then, gradually drawing closer to the spirit and refining the carnal nature of our speech with spiritual contemplations, we come to dwell purely in Christ, as much as is possible for human beings; so that we can say, following the Apostle: “Though we once knew Christ according to the flesh, yet now we know Him no longer in that way” (2 Cor. 5:16). This is due to the simple (or pure) approach of the mind to the Word without any veils over it, since we have already progressed from a carnal understanding of the Word to the vision of “His glory, as the only-begotten of the Father” (John 1:14).

57. Whoever has begun to live the life in Christ has transcended both the righteousness of the Law and natural righteousness: as the Divine Apostle makes clear when he says, “In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision counts for anything” (Gal. 6: 15)—in other words, using the term “circumcision” to denote righteousness under the law, and the term “uncircumcision” to allude to a similar righteousness according to the law of nature.

58. The Word of God is the way (John 14: 6) for those who, leading an active life, faithfully and steadfastly run the race of virtue, turning neither to the right out of vanity nor to the left out of the temptation of the passions—and directing their steps toward God: which Asa, king of Judah, failed to observe to the end

(3 Kings 15:23), fell ill, as it is said, in his old age with his legs, having become feeble and too weak to continue on the path of life according to God.

59. "I am the door," said the Lord (John 10:9). For He leads those who have successfully completed the entire path of virtue, in the blameless course of their active lives, into the realm of knowledge and, like light, reveals to them the most radiant treasures of wisdom. He is the same—the way, the door, the key, and the kingdom: the way, as a guide; the key, as the one who unlocks the entrance to the divine treasures for the worthy; the door, as the one who leads in; the kingdom, as the inheritance, and as the One who is present in all through communion.

60. The Lord is called "light, life, resurrection, and truth: Light," both as the illuminator of souls, as the dispeller of the darkness of ignorance, as the enlightener of the mind to the understanding of perplexing things, and as the revealer of mysteries accessible only to the pure; "life," as the Giver to souls who love Him of the proper movement within the realm of divine things; "resurrection," as the One who rouses the mind from its dead attachment to the material and purifies it from all corruption and lifelessness; "truth," as that which grants the worthy an unwavering disposition toward good deeds.

61. It is not the one who merely reverently honors God with words who glorifies God within himself, but the one who, for God's sake and because of the commandments, patiently endures sufferings and labors. Such a person is in turn glorified by God with the glory that exists in God, as a reward for virtue, bearing within himself the grace of dispassion through communion. For everyone who glorifies God within himself through sufferings endured for the sake of virtue in his active life is himself glorified in God through the dispassionate illumination of the divine rays in a state of contemplation. And the Lord, speaking of His voluntary passion, says: "Now the Son of Man is glorified, and God is glorified in Him. If God is glorified in Him, God will glorify Him in Himself, and will glorify Him at once" (John 13:31–32). From this it is clear that sufferings for the sake of virtue will be followed by divine gifts of grace.

62. As long as the soul makes its passage from strength to strength and from glory to glory—that is, progressing from one virtue to a greater virtue, and ascending from one level of knowledge to a higher—it does not cease to be a stranger, as it is said: "My soul has wandered far" (Ps. 119: 6). For the distance is great, and it must pass through many degrees of knowledge until "you enter the place of wonderful dwelling, even the house of God, amid the sound of joy and praise, the noise of the festive crowd" (Ps. 41:5)—always adding a voice to the voices, a spiritual voice to the spiritual voices, as one progresses in spiritual contemplations, rejoicing in the things clearly perceived—with joy and fitting thanksgiving. Such celebrations are observed by all who have received the grace of "the Spirit who cries out in their hearts, 'Abba, Father'" (Gal. 4:6).

63. "A wonderful dwelling place" is an impassive and unshakable disposition toward the virtues, through which God the Word, having come, adorns the soul with the various beauties of the virtues, as a tabernacle. The house of God is knowledge composed of many and varied contemplations, through which God, having visited the soul, fills it with an abundance of wisdom. "The voice of joy" is the exultation of the soul as it beholds the multitude of virtues. Confession is thanksgiving for the glorious satisfaction or fulfillment with wisdom. "The sound" is the ceaseless, mysterious praise that arises from the blending of both—that is, joy and confession.

64. Having courageously overcome carnal passions, and having won sufficient victories over unclean spirits, and having cast their thoughts out of the realm of his soul, let him pray that he may be granted a pure heart and that a righteous spirit may be renewed within him—that is, that through God's grace he may be completely cleansed of evil thoughts and filled with divine thoughts.

65. He who has made his heart pure not only comes to know the meaning and significance of things that are secondary and exist after God, but, having passed beyond all of them, beholds God Himself in a certain way: in this lies the ultimate limit of all good. When God visits such a heart, He deems it worthy to inscribe His words upon it by the Spirit, as upon the tablets of Moses, to the extent that the heart has cultivated itself through good deeds and contemplation, in accordance with the commandment that mysteriously decrees: "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gen. 35:11).

66. The mind of Christ, which the saints receive—as it is said, "We have the mind of Christ" (1 Cor. 2:16)—does not come by depriving us of our own mental faculties, nor does it essentially and personally take the place of our mind; rather, it illuminates the power of our mind by its own nature and draws its activity into union with itself. In my view, the mind of Christ is possessed by one who thinks about everything in His spirit and is led through all things to think of Him.

67. We are called the body of Christ, according to the Apostle's words: "You are the body of Christ, and individually members of it" (1 Cor. 12:27)—not because we are deprived of our bodies while being His body, nor because He personally passes into us or is divided among our members; but because, like the flesh of Christ, our own is freed from sinful corruption. For just as Christ was sinless by nature, both in body and soul, as a human being, so too we who believe in Him and are clothed with the Spirit in Him can, by our own free will, be sinless in Him.

68. As long as anyone remains in this life, no matter how perfect he may be, according to his present condition—in action and contemplation—he possesses only in part both knowledge and prophecy and the pledge of the Holy Spirit, but not in full—since he is yet to attain the perfect state, which reveals the truth face to face to the worthy, just as it is in itself: so that he will not merely possess a part of the fullness, but will bear within himself the fullness itself through communion. For the Apostle says that then all (i.e., those who are saved) "will reach the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4: 13); "in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Col. 2:3); upon the revelation of "which will be abolished in part" (1 Cor. 13:10).

69. Some ask: What will be the state of those who attain perfection in the Kingdom of God? Will there be progress and advancement (toward ever greater goodness), or will there be a single, unchanging state? What will the bodies and souls be like then, and how should we think about this? Upon reflection, one might say that, just as in physical life, food has a dual purpose—sometimes it serves to nourish growth, and sometimes to sustain those being nourished—namely, —as long as we have not yet reached the full measure of bodily growth, we nourish ourselves for growth, but when the body ceases to increase in size, then it is nourished not for growth but for preservation: so too, with regard to the soul, nourishment has a twofold significance. It is nourished by virtues and contemplation when it prospers, until, having transcended all that exists, it reaches the measure of Christ's fulfillment: but having attained this, it ceases to progress or to increase itself by the prescribed means, and, being nourished directly by imperishable food in a manner that transcends understanding—and perhaps for that very reason by the highest form of growth— it receives it now only to preserve the God-like perfection given to it and to experience the immeasurable delights of that food, through which, by receiving the well-being that always sustains it in the same way, it becomes a god through participation in Divine grace, having itself ceased all actions of mind and sensation, and having caused the natural actions of the body—united with it to the extent of its accessible deification—to cease as well; so that through soul and body the one God shines forth, overcoming their natural characteristics with an abundance of glory.

70. Some of those who love God seek to understand the nature of the difference between the eternal dwellings and the promised inheritances—whether it will be determined by place, or by the quantity and quality of each person's spiritual perfections. Some hold the former view, while others hold the latter. Whoever has come to know that "the kingdom of God is within you" (Luke 17:21) and that "in my Father's house there are many dwelling places" (John 14:2) will side with the latter view.

71. The Kingdom of God the Father, by His omnipotence, is present in all believers; but by grace, it is present in those who have completely renounced every inclination toward natural life—both of the soul and of the body—and have attained spiritual life; so that they can say, "It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 2:20).

72. He who, through the labors of virtue, has been able to "put to death the members that are on the earth" (Col. 3:5) and, by fulfilling the commandments of the Word, overcomes the world that is within him, will have no sorrow, just as one who has already left the world behind and begun to dwell in Christ, the conqueror of the world of passion and the giver of every kind of peace. For whoever has not renounced attachment to material things will certainly have sorrow, as his feelings fluctuate along with the changes in that which is changeable by nature; but whoever has begun to dwell in Christ no longer perceives, in any way, changes in material things, whatever they may be. That is why the Lord says: "I have told you these things so that in Me you may have peace. In the world you will have tribulation, but take heart; I have overcome the world" (John 16:33). That is to say, in Me, the Word, you will have peace, being delivered from the vicissitudes and turmoil of earthly things; but in the world—that is, in your attachment to material things—you will have sorrow, because of the ceaseless change from one thing to another within it. Both will experience sorrow: the one who acts virtuously, because of the labor associated with it, and the one who loves the world, because of losses and deprivations in material things; but for one it is salvific, while for the other it is ruinous and destructive. For both, the Lord is the source of peace: for the former, because after the labors of virtue He grants him the peace of dispassion in a state of contemplation; and for the latter, because through repentance He removes from him his habitual attachment to the transitory.

73. We must be not only slayers of bodily passions but also destroyers of the soul's passionate thoughts, imitating that Holy One who says: "In the morning I will destroy all the sinners of the earth, to cut off from the city of the Lord all who commit iniquity" (Ps. 100:8); that is, bodily passions and unlawful thoughts of the soul.

74. Whoever, with godly and righteous discernment, preserves the path of virtue unblemished by straying to the side opposed to it will understand the visitation of God that comes upon him for the sake of dispassion, as the same holy Prophet assures us, saying: "I will sing and understand the way of the blameless when He comes to me" (Ps. 100: 2).

75. One who is being led onto the path of piety should not be guided solely by a desire to fulfill the commandments, but also by the remembrance of the severity of the judgments of divine justice, which should frequently spur him on to deeds of virtue; so that he may both desire the divine out of love and refrain from evil out of fear. This is why it says, "I will sing of your mercy and judgment, O Lord" (Ps. 100: 1), testifying that just as one, sweetened by love, converses prayerfully with God, so one, strengthened by fear, sends up a song to Him.

76. There is but one pre-eternal and pre-substantial good Being, the Triune Unity—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—who together constitute the infinite of the three infinite ones; concerning His being—how He is, what He is, and in what way He is—all understanding is beyond the reach of created minds. It eludes all the understanding of those who reason, by no means because of its natural inner hiddenness, and its knowledge immeasurably surpasses all knowledge.

77. One God the Father, the Begetter of the One Son, and the Source of the One Holy Spirit; an indivisible Unity and an inseparable Trinity; the beginningless Mind, the sole Begetter of the One, the essentially beginningless Word, and the Source of the One ever-existing Life, that is, the Holy Spirit.

78. One God, the One who is without beginning and co-eternal, having no parts and being indivisible; the One is both the One and the Trinity

79. Christ God is born, and, by assuming flesh endowed with a rational soul, becomes man—He who bestowed being upon all that exists from the One who sustains all, and whom the Virgin, having given birth to Him supernaturally, did not lose any sign of her virginity. For just as He became man without altering His nature or changing His powers, so too does He make and preserve as a Virgin the One who gave birth to Him and is His mother, pointing to one miracle within the other and, at the same time, using each to veil the other. God Himself, by His very nature— —is always mysteriously hidden; and if He sometimes reveals Himself from His natural hiddenness, He does so in such a way that by very act of revealing it, He makes it even more hidden. Thus (and in His birth as a human being) He makes the Virgin a birthing mother, so that the very act of birth formed the unbreakable bonds of virginity.

80. Let us gaze with faith upon the mystery of the Divine Incarnation, and simply glorify, without questioning, the One who deigned to do this for us. For who, relying on the power of his own reason, can explain how the Word of God is conceived? How is flesh formed for Him without seed? How is He born without decay? How is the Mother the one who remained a Virgin even after giving birth? How does He who is above all perfection grow in years (Luke 2:52)? How did He, being pure, receive baptism? How did He Himself, though hungry, satisfy the hungry? How did He, who was weary, give strength? How did He, who suffered, grant healing? How did He, who was dying, give life? And—putting the last before the first—how can God be man, and—what is even more mysterious—how can the Word, in His hypostasis, be essentially in the flesh, while in His nature He remains hypostatically one with the Father? How is He both God by nature and, naturally, a man, without renouncing either nature—neither the divine nature by which He is God, nor our human nature by which He became man? – All these mysteries are encompassed by a single faith, which confesses things that exist, things that are beyond words and understanding (Heb. 11: 1).

81. Adam, having disobeyed the commandment, learned that the birth of our nature has its origin in sensual pleasure. The Lord, banishing this from nature, did not deem it fitting for Himself to be conceived from seed. The woman, having transgressed the commandment, showed that the birth of our nature begins with pain. The Lord, having removed these from human nature, did not allow the mother to suffer decay after giving birth; so that He might remove from human nature both voluntary pleasure and, because of it, involuntary suffering, becoming the destroyer of that of which He was not the Creator—and so that He might teach that another life must mysteriously begin in the spirit, a life that may begin with suffering and illness, but ending in every way with divine delight and endless joy. For this reason, the Creator of man becomes a human being and is born as a human, so that He may save humanity; and by healing passions with passions, He will appear as the slayer of our passions, renewing our spiritual dispositions with love through His own fleshly privations.

82. It is beneficial for virtue to labor amidst painful trials; for in such cases, it graciously bestows upon all who endure them the reward of a dispassionate soul, through which the soul, united with God in love, turns away in disposition from the flesh and the world. The exhaustion of the body is the strengthening of the soul.

83. Carried away by the allure of sensual pleasure, we have preferred death to true life. Let us therefore gratefully endure the bodily labor that destroys this pleasure, so that when death destroys it—along with the death that arose through it—we may receive the life returning to us, which was once sold for pleasure but is now bought back for a few labors of the flesh.

84. If, when the body is healthy and well-fed, the power of sin usually increases, then it is clear that when it is in want, the power of virtue should flourish. Let us therefore bear with courage the weariness of the flesh—this purifier of the soul’s defilements and the cause of future glory. “For the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom. 8:18).

85. Just as doctors who treat the body do not prescribe the same medicine for everyone, so too God, in healing the diseases of the soul, does not know a single method of healing suitable for all; but by providing what is necessary for each soul, He brings about healing. Let us therefore give thanks to Him as we are being healed, even if what happens to us involves suffering; for the outcome is blessed.

86. Nothing reveals the disposition of the soul as clearly as the rebellions of the weary flesh: for if it yields to them, it shows that it loves the flesh more than God; but if it remains unshaken by such temptations, it reveals that it honors virtue more than the flesh; for this reason it will receive God as a fellow inhabitant within itself—He who was pleased to suffer in our nature for its sake—and, as He once called out to His disciples: “Take heart; I have overcome the world” (John 16:33).

87. If all the saints have shared in corrective discipline, then let us, too, be grateful along with them when we are corrected, so that we may be deemed worthy to share in their glory. “The Lord disciplines those He loves, and He punishes every son He accepts” (Prov. 3:12; Heb. 12:6).

88. Adam, having accepted the rib (his wife, taken from his rib), which offered him sweetness, cast humanity out of Paradise. But the Lord, who was willing to be pierced by a spear in His side, admitted the thief into Paradise. Let us therefore love the painful mortification of the flesh and hate its pleasures: for the former leads into Paradise and makes us partakers of its blessings; while the latter drive us out of it and deprive us of its blessings.

89. If God suffers in the flesh, having become man, who then will not rejoice when suffering, having God as a partner in that suffering? For suffering with Him is a path to the kingdom. True is the one who said, “If we suffer with Him, we will also be glorified with Him” (Rom. 8:17).

90. If it is absolutely necessary to suffer, because of the desire for pleasure that our first parent mingled with our nature, then let us courageously endure these temporary sufferings, which dull the sting of that desire within us and deliver us from the eternal torments that would result from it.

91. The end of all good is love, for it guides, leads, and draws all who walk in it toward God, the supreme good and the source of all good, remaining ever faithful, never failing, and always unchanging. Faith is the foundation upon which hope and love follow, as it firmly establishes the truth. Hope is the stronghold—with love and faith standing on either side of it—as it demonstrates to both the faithfulness of the One believed in and the loveliness of the One loved, and teaches the way to attain them. Love is the fulfillment of these, embracing all that is ultimately desirable and offering rest in it; instead of faith in what is and hope for what will be, it brings about (and within itself) the possession of these as present and the enjoyment of them as inherent.

92. There are three evils, the greatest and most pernicious, and, to put it simply, the progenitors of all evil: ignorance, self-love, and hatred, which are closely intertwined and mutually reinforcing. For from ignorance of God comes self-love, and from this comes hatred toward one’s fellow human beings. And no one disputes that the evil one produces and stirs them up within us, teaching us to misuse our faculties—reason, desire, and energy.

93. We must, with our reason—instead of ignorance—ascend to God through the pursuit of knowledge of Him—through desire, having purified it of the passion of self-love, to direct all our desire solely toward God—and by energy, having freed it from hatred, to strive to attain the one God and to create within ourselves the divine and blissful love that unites us with God and reveals the lover of God as God—a love that arises from them (i.e., the knowledge of God and the desire for God) and for the sake of which they exist.

94. When we reject self-love—which, as I have said, is the beginning and mother of all evils—then everything that stems from it will be cast aside along with it; for when it is gone, no form or trace of evil can possibly remain within us.

95. We ought to honor and love ourselves and one another just as Christ Himself first showed by His example, deigning to suffer for us.

96. The act and proof of perfect love for God is a sincere and benevolent disposition toward one's neighbor. For "whoever does not love his brother, whom he has seen, how can he love God, whom he has not seen?" says the Divine John (1 John 4:20).

97. Behold the door through which the one who enters steps into the Holy of Holies and is deemed worthy to be a beholder of the ineffable beauty of the Holy and Royal Trinity.

98. It is impossible for us to be in fellowship with God—we who rebel against Him with our passions and willingly pay tribute to the evil tyrant and destroyer of souls, the devil—unless we first wage a resolute war against this deceiver. For as long as we willingly enslave ourselves to the passions of wickedness, we remain enemies and adversaries of God, even though we call ourselves believers. And we will derive no benefit from the world when our soul, corrupt in its disposition, rebels against its Creator and refuses to be under His kingly authority; meanwhile, it sells itself to countless evil masters who plunge it into sin and flatteringly teach it to choose, instead of the path of salvation, the path that leads to ruin.

99. God created us so that we might become partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. 1:4), partakers of His eternal essence, and become like Him (1 John 3:2) through the grace of deification, for the sake of which all that exists is ordained and sustained, and that which does not yet exist is brought into being and generated.

100. If we wish to be called and to be God's own, let us undertake the task of not betraying the Word to our passions, like Judas, nor of denying Him, like Peter. Renouncing the Word, however, is a refusal to do good out of some fear, while betrayal is a deliberate sin in deed and a willful impulse toward sin.

101. Human pride and carnal reasoning, having set people against one another and misinterpreted the law, have divided the single nature (of those of one nature) into many parts; and by bringing into force the hard-heartedness that now prevails, they have, through such a mindset, turned nature itself against itself (that is, people against one another). Therefore, whoever, through sound judgment and noble wisdom, succeeds in destroying this disposition of nature shows mercy first to himself and then to others, having set his heart aright according to nature, and through such a disposition naturally drawing near to God and demonstrating in himself what it means to be created in His image, and how magnificently God, having created our nature in the beginning in His own likeness and clearly reflecting His own goodness within itself, arranged it to be in every way equal to Himself—not violent, peaceful, not turbulent, closely bound in love with God and with itself,—such that through it we embrace God with longing (i.e., as a longed-for good) and one another with compassion (as beings of the same nature).

102. The God who loves humanity became human in order to draw human nature (i.e., all people) to Himself and to prevent it from falling into evil; by which it divides itself against itself and rebels against itself, without any restraint, due to the fickle volatility (changeability) of its disposition toward others.

103. Let us renounce, with all our strength, the pleasures of this life and the fear of its sorrows, and let us certainly rid ourselves of every passionate thought and every demonic wile. For it is for the sake of pleasure that we love our passions, and because of sorrows that we flee from virtue.

104. The allure and sweetness of sin usually vanish along with the very means by which it is committed; which is why a person, having discovered through experience itself that every sinful pleasure is invariably followed by sorrowful displeasure, has come to desire the pleasure with all his heart, while feeling utter aversion toward displeasure and sorrow—seeking the former with all his might and striving in every way to avoid the latter, believing—though, in fact, is entirely impossible—to separate them from one another in this way, and to satisfy his wicked self-love with pleasure alone, enduring absolutely no sorrow, having forgotten—as is usual when blinded by passion—that sinful pleasure is never without the bitterness of dissatisfaction. For the bitterness of sorrow is naturally mingled with the sweetness of sin, although those who partake of it forget this because the passionate sweetness prevails over them: for what one possesses always so occupies one's attention that it completely obscures from one's senses what lies ahead. In this way, by pursuing pleasures out of self-love, while striving by every means to avoid all bitterness for the same reason, we give rise to countless corrupting passions within ourselves.

105. No one experiences such a sense of sweetness and bitterness as when, having been freed from every carnal inclination, one unites—or rather, clings—with one's mind to God, who is truly the most lovable, the most precious, and the most exalted good.

106. Just as no one can serve God purely unless he has completely purified his soul, so too can he not serve God without indulging the body for its own sake. By performing this corrupting service to the body—and thus being a being who loves pleasure—man has constantly experienced both sweetness and bitterness in power and action, always tasting from the tree of disobedience, in which the knowledge of good and evil is dissolved at the same time, a knowledge actually experienced through the senses.

107. Where reason does not reign, there usually prevails the power of the senses, with which the power of sin is inextricably intertwined, drawing the soul through pleasure toward the desires of the flesh, which are naturally akin to it: as a result of which, having taken upon itself—as if it were its natural duty—a passionate and pleasure-seeking care for the flesh, it leads a person away from true natural life and inclines him to become, for himself, the architect of evil, which has no independent existence.

108. For the rational soul, evil is the neglect of its natural blessings, arising from a passionate attachment to the flesh and the world, which the mind—having become the guide—destroys in accordance with its knowledge of spiritual orders, correctly interpreting the origin and nature of the world and the flesh, and driving the soul into the spiritual realm that is its own, where the law of sin does not intrude at all, having no sense that could serve as a bridge to convey it to the mind (or into the rational spiritual realm); since the former relationship between this sense and the soul has already been destroyed and all sensory spectacles have been left behind, so that the mind, having transcended them, no longer perceives them at all, having become alien to them both in disposition and by nature.

109. Just as the mind, holding the passions in its power, makes the senses instruments of virtue, so too do the passions, when they hold the mind in their grasp, incline the senses toward sin. And one must look at this soberly and consider how the soul should maintain a proper and virtuous course of action, using the very means it previously employed in committing sins to generate and strengthen virtues.

110. The Holy Gospel introduces a renunciation of the carnal life and an embrace of the spiritual life. I am speaking of those who always die (1 Cor. 15:31) according to the flesh—that is, according to the human life in the flesh in this world—but who live only for God by the Spirit, as the Divine Apostle says: they no longer live their own lives, but Christ lives in them (Gal. 2:20). In the same way, those who endure great sorrows, torments, and afflictions in this world, and who joyfully endure persecution and all manner of temptations, are also considered dead to the flesh.

111. Every passion arises from and is generated by the combination of some sensory object with a sensation, accompanied by a deviation of the natural active powers—that is, the senses, or desire, or reason—from their proper natural mode of operation. If now the mind, having discerned the purpose of this combination of elements—that is, the sensory object, the sensation, and the natural active force participating in it—is able, through its reasoning, to restore each of these to its naturally proper order and to contemplate each in and of itself, that is, the sensible object without relation to the sense, the sense without connection to the sensible object, and the active power participating in this—desire, for example, or some other—without a passionate disposition toward the sensible object or the sense, and without allowing the passion itself to direct its contemplation—if, I say, the mind succeeds in doing this; then it will grind it down and scatter it like the calf that was once cast by the Israelites (Ex. 32: 20), this composition of passion, whatever form it may take, and scatter it upon the waters of knowledge, completely destroying even the subtlest thought of passion by restoring the things that produce it to the order proper to them by nature.

112. A life stained by many falls into sin arising from carnal passions is “a defiled garment” (Jude 23). For by the manner of his life, as by a kind of garment, every person usually reveals what he is—righteous or unrighteous: one has a clean garment, that is, a virtuous life, while another's life is entirely stained by evil deeds. – Or rather, “garments defiled by the flesh” refer to an inner disposition and state of mind that gives the soul its character, as it is according to conscience (or before conscience), by virtue of the recollection of the evil impulses and actions arising from the flesh—and seeing these garments constantly upon itself, it (the soul) is struck by the stench of the passions. For just as from the spirit, through the rational combination of virtues with one another, imperishable garments are formed in the soul—and by putting them on, it appears good and glorious—so, from the flesh, through the interweaving of various passions—by their affinity with one another—a certain impure and defiled garment is produced for it, revealing the soul as it is, superimposing upon it another image and likeness in place of the Divine.

113. The firm and sure foundation of hope for the deification of human nature lies in the Incarnation of God, which makes man a god to the same extent that God Himself became man. For it is clear that He who became man without sin can deify human nature without transforming it into the Godhead, by exalting it to Himself to the same extent that He Himself humbled Himself for the sake of man. —Teaching this in a mysterious way, the great Apostle says that “in the coming ages the immeasurable riches of God’s grace will be made known through us” (Eph. 2:7).

114. The soul, covered with the impurity of sensual pleasures as with rust, is purified by painful labor, and every inclination toward the material is completely eradicated from it when it comes to know through experience the harm of loving it; for this reason, God permits the devil, by righteous judgment, to afflict people with agonizing sorrows.

115. Pleasure and sorrow, and the desire and fear that follow them, were not originally created together with human nature; otherwise, they would be among the characteristics defining that nature; but, according to the teaching of the great Gregory of Nyssa, they were introduced after the loss of the perfection inherent in our nature, having been grafted onto the most irrational part of our nature; and through them, immediately after the transgression of the commandment, our likeness to speechless animals became manifest and clear, instead of the blessed image of God. For it was fitting that, upon the obscuring of the dignity of reason, human nature should justly bear punishment from the very thing through which it had acquired the traits of irrationality. Thus God wisely arranged it so that man might thereby come to appreciate the superiority of reason.

116. Passions are also good in the hands of those who are zealous for a good and salvific life, when, having wisely separated them from the carnal, we use them to attain the heavenly; namely: when we transform desire into a vigorous movement of spiritual longing for divine blessings; the love of pleasure—into a life-giving joy arising from the mind’s rapture at divine gifts; fear—into a cautionary vigilance against future torment for sins; sorrow—into repentance aimed at correcting present evil; and, in short, when we use these passions to destroy or prevent present or anticipated evil, as well as to acquire and preserve virtue and knowledge, just as wise physicians destroy or prevent damage already present in the body from poison or the body’s impending exposure to the venomous echidna.

117. The law of the Old Covenant, through active wisdom, purifies our nature from all defilement; and the law of the New Covenant, through contemplative guidance, mentally elevates the mind from the corporeal to the spiritual visions of things that are akin to it.

118. Holy Scripture calls those who are just beginning and still in the antechambers of the Divine court of virtues “the fearful” (those guided by fear); but those who have acquired a commensurate skill in understanding and in the practice of the virtues are usually called “those who are making progress”; and those who, through spiritual understanding, have ascended to the very summit of true knowledge of the virtues, are called “perfect.” Thus, one who has turned away from the old cycle of passions and, moved by fear, has surrendered his entire disposition to the divine commandments is not deprived of any of the blessings befitting beginners, even though he has not yet acquired skill in the virtues nor become a partaker of the wisdom “spoken of among the perfect” (1 Cor. 2:6). Likewise, the one who is making progress is not deprived of any of the blessings belonging to his rank, even though he has not yet attained the same ultimate knowledge of divine things that is characteristic of the perfect. And the perfect, who have already been mysteriously granted contemplative theology and have purified their minds of all material fantasies, are those who have internalized Divine love, bearing a complete and flawless likeness to the image of Divine beauty.

119. There are two kinds of fear: one is pure, and the other is impure. The fear that arises from sin, driven by the anticipation of torment, is impure; for it is caused by a sin one is conscious of having committed, and it will not last forever, because it disappears along with the removal of the sin through repentance. But the fear that always dwells in the soul even without this anxious dread of sin is pure and will never depart; for it is in some way inherent in God, as a tribute from the creatures, expressing the natural reverence of all before His majesty, which surpasses every kingdom and power.

120. The Holy Spirit is present in all people in general, as the One who embraces all, provides for all, and stirs up the natural seeds (of goodness) in all. But in those living under the law, He is specifically present as the revealer of transgressions of the commandments and the illuminator of the prophecies concerning Christ. In all those who are in Christ, however, in addition to the above, He is also the bestower of sonship, or the producer of adoption. And as the giver of wisdom, He is not present simply or unconditionally in any of the aforementioned persons, but only in those who, understanding the matter, have made themselves worthy of His divine indwelling through their God-like life. For anyone who does not carry out God's will, even if he is faithful, has an unwise heart, as a breeding ground for evil thoughts, and a body subject to sin (i.e., guilty of sin), as it is always filled with impure, passionate desires.

121. God, who desires all people to be saved and who longs for their deification, withers their pride and vanity like a barren fig tree with a curse (Matt. 21:19), so that they, having preferred true righteousness to merely appearing righteous, and having cast off the hypocritical cloak of virtuous pretense, may genuinely embrace virtue, as the Divine Word desires, and lead the rest of their lives piously, striving more to maintain a good disposition of the soul before God than to display outwardly virtuous pretense before people.

122. The devil is God's enemy and avenger. He is an enemy—when, out of hatred for Him, he feigns a false yet pernicious love for us humans; by stirring up various passions and enticing our will with the sweetness we expect from them, he leads us to prefer temporal goods over eternal ones, thereby stealing all the disposition of our soul and completely turning us away from the love of God, making us willful enemies of the One who created us. The Avenger—when, pouring out all his hatred toward us, he demands punishment for us, who through sin have become, as it were, subject to him. For nothing is so pleasing to the devil as to see a human being put to death. And when this is permitted to him, he swoops down like a storm upon those over whom, by God's permission, he has gained authority, devising one after another ways to inflict involuntary sufferings upon them (for their voluntary passions)—not to carry out God's command, but to satisfy his passionate hatred toward us; so that the soul, exhausted under the weight of sorrows and misfortunes, might cast aside all hope of divine help, and the infliction of grievous misfortunes, instead of serving as a lesson, might become the cause of the loss of faith in God's very existence.

123. Without God's permission, even the demons themselves cannot serve the devil in any way. For God knows how, with fitting benevolence and goodness, to permit the devil, through his servants, to inflict various punishments for the sins we have committed. Scripture clearly demonstrates this in the story of Job, where it is written that the devil could do absolutely nothing to Job without God's permission.

124. God, being good and desiring to completely root out from us the seed of evil—that is, the lust for pleasure that deprives the mind of divine love—He permits the devil to bring afflictions and sufferings upon us: so that through these afflictions He may purify the soul from the poison of past lusts and instill in it hatred and complete aversion toward present lusts, which flatter the senses alone, —since their previous gratification brought nothing beneficial but painful consequences—and so that, in this way, the very most tormenting and misanthropic power of the enemy may become the proximate cause of a return to virtue for those who have willfully sinned against it.

125. One who suffers for having trampled upon God's grace, if he comes to understand the purpose of the divine providence that is healing him, will accept the misfortune that has befallen him with gratitude and joy, and will willingly correct the sin for which he is being punished; but whoever remains insensitive to such healing intentions is justly deprived of the grace granted to him and is given over to the turmoil of the passions, being left to carry out what he was inwardly inclined and eager to do.

126. Whoever, by God's permission, is led to correction through a sorrowful misfortune brought upon him by involuntary temptations, yet does not accept it with gratitude, and, out of pride—by which he considers himself righteous—does not repent without delay; such a person, as one who resists the divine decrees of righteous judgment and willfully refuses to submit, by God's command, to the yoke of the king of Babylon, is taken captive, suffers chains and bonds, famine, death, and the sword, and is utterly driven from his land. All this and much more of the same sort is endured by the one who, driven from his own land—from a disposition and habit of virtue and wisdom—because of his own unwillingness, out of pride and a vain opinion of himself regarding the purification of his sins, willingly chooses, according to the Divine Apostle, "in afflictions, hardships, and distresses" (2 Cor. 12:10; 6:4). The great Apostle knew that outward humiliation through arduous physical circumstances has the power to preserve divine treasures in the soul; which is why he willingly endured them, both for himself and for those to whom he was to reveal in himself an example of faith and virtue; so that they, even if they suffered anything through their own fault, like the one who was subjected to penance, the Corinthian (1 Cor. 5:5), might have before them one who suffered innocently, as a source of comfort and an example of his patience to follow.

127. The Divine Apostle calls the various works of the Holy Spirit “different gifts,” all imparted by the same Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4). Such a manifestation of the Spirit is given in proportion to the faith present in each person, in the participation in a particular gift; namely, each believer, according to his faith and the spiritual disposition within him, receives a corresponding work of the Spirit, which gives him the disposition and strength sufficient to fulfill one commandment or another.

128. Just as one receives the word of wisdom, another the word of knowledge, another faith, and yet another some other gift listed by the great Apostle (1 Cor. 12:8–12), so one receives through the Spirit the gift of perfect, direct, and immaterial love for God, in proportion to his faith; another, through the same Spirit, receives the gift of perfect love for one’s neighbor; yet another receives some other gift, through the same Spirit, as I have said; for each has his own gift at work within him. For the Apostle calls every disposition that is active and powerful in fulfilling the commandments a gift of the Spirit.

129. Faith is a power that keeps everything within in a state of harmony, or it is harmony itself, bestowing a supernatural, direct, and perfect union of the believer with the God in whom he believes.

130. Since man, consisting of soul and body, is subject to the action of two laws—namely, the law of the flesh and the law of the Spirit—of which the law of the flesh has a sensory effect, while the law of the Spirit has a mental or spiritual effect; whereby the law of the flesh, acting sensually, usually binds one to matter, while the law of the spirit, acting mentally or spiritually, produces an immediate union with God: it is therefore entirely natural that whoever “does not ponder in his heart” (Luke 11: 23)—that is, does not sever the direct union with God that has been accomplished through faith; such a person, being dispassionate, and even more so having become like God by virtue of union with God through faith, “will say to this mountain, ‘Move from here to there,’ and it will move” (Matt. 17: 20): by which saying it is pointed out, as with a finger, that the reasoning and the law of the flesh are truly heavy and difficult to move, and for our natural powers, completely immovable and unshakable.

131. The power of irrational self-preservation—or animality—has become so deeply rooted in human nature through the senses that many regard a human being as nothing more than flesh, capable only of enjoying this present life.

132. The Lord—having said, “Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness” (Matt. 6:33), that is, first of all the knowledge of the truth, and then the active pursuit of virtuous conduct—clearly showed that believers must seek the one divine knowledge and, adorning it with deeds, virtue.

133. Since there are many things that believers must seek in order to know God and attain virtue—such as freedom from passions, endurance of temptations, understanding of virtues and the kinds of deeds corresponding to them, the expulsion of the soul’s inclination toward the flesh, the alienation of the senses from the sensual, the complete detachment of the mind from all created things—and, generally speaking, there is a countless multitude of things necessary for turning away from sin and ignorance and for acquiring knowledge and virtue—the Lord said: “Whatever you ask for in prayer, you will receive if you have faith” (Matt. 21:22)—thereby expressing that, in general, everything that contributes to the knowledge of God and to virtue is what the godly, with reason and faith, should seek and ask for: for all of this is salvific for us, and the Lord always grants it to those who ask Him.

134. “A fragrance from life to life” (2 Cor. 2:16) was the Apostle, both by his example, inspiring the faithful to actively strive to acquire the fragrance of virtues, and as a preacher, leading those obedient to the word of grace from a sensual life to a spiritual life; “a stench of death leading to death,” he was to those who had plunged from the death of ignorance into the death of unbelief, causing them to sense the condemnation awaiting them.

135. There are three powers in the soul: the rational, the impetuous (energetic), and the concupiscent. Through the rational power, we seek to know what is good; through the concupiscent, we desire the good we have come to know; and through the impetuous, we strive and struggle for it. Those who love God, striving with these powers toward divine virtue and knowledge—seeking one, desiring the other, and striving with the third—receive imperishable nourishment and the knowledge of divine things that enriches the mind.

136. God, who created human nature, together with bestowing upon it, by His will, existence, also endowed it with the power to act appropriately; by this power I mean the movement (impulse) toward the practice of virtues, which is essentially inherent in our nature and which is consciously manifested in action according to the will of the one who possesses it.

137. If a person relies solely on the sensory, bodily distinction of things based on their pleasantness or unpleasantness; then, having transgressed the Divine commandment, he partakes of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil—that is, of sensuous speechlessness, or irrationality—being able to distinguish well only that which serves to preserve the integrity of the body, and consequently accepting what is pleasant as good and avoiding what is unpleasant as evil. But if he adheres entirely to rational reasoning, which clearly distinguishes the temporal from the eternal, then, having kept the divine commandment, he partakes of the tree of life—that is, of the wisdom formed in the mind—being able to distinguish well what serves the salvation of the soul, and consequently to accept the glory of eternal blessings as good, while rejecting the transience of temporal blessings as evil.

138. Good for the mind is an dispassionate inclination toward the spiritual, while evil is a passionate inclination toward the sensual. For the senses, however, good is a passionate movement toward the body, through the indulgence of lustful desire, while evil is an unpleasant state resulting from the deprivation of this.

139. Grapes yield wine; wine causes intoxication; intoxication leads to delirium (which is evil—a temporary loss of reason). Is it not the same with the active mind—which can be likened to a grapevine, —that, when cultivated with virtues, produces knowledge, and knowledge produces a good ecstasy that frees the mind from the bonds of the senses?

140. Along with thoughts of sensory objects, the evil one insidiously instills imaginations of their outward appearances and forms, through which passionate desires for those objects are usually aroused based solely on their outward appearance, when our rational activity halts in its passage toward the mental and spiritual through (or through) the sense that lies in between. It is here that the enemy succeeds in corrupting the soul, plunging it into passionate agitation.

141. The Word of God is light and fire, inasmuch as it illuminates natural thoughts and consumes unnatural ones; just as it dispels the darkness of the sensory life for those who, through the fulfillment of the commandments, strive toward the hoped-for better life, while those who willingly, out of love for the flesh, cling to this dark night of (sensory) life are punished by the fire of judgment and condemnation.

142. The power of our mind is by nature capable of knowing corporeal and incorporeal beings; but regarding the Holy Trinity, it receives knowledge solely by grace, believing only that it exists, but by no means daring to inquire what it is by nature, as the demonic mind does.

143. Having beheld the splendor of future blessings with the pure eye of faith, one willingly obeys the command to leave one's homeland, one's kin, and one's father's house, setting aside all sympathy and attachment to the flesh, sensation, and all that is sensual; and when any temptation from this world should arise, he rises above nature, preferring the cause of his calling to nature itself, just as the great Abraham preferred God to Isaac (Gen. 22:1 ff.).

144. Whoever strives to practice virtue and study the Divine Scriptures—not for the sake of glory, nor out of greed, nor out of flattery or a desire to please men, nor for show (1 Thess. 2:3–5)—but does, speaks, and thinks everything for God's sake, such a one walks the path of truth with understanding.

145. Whoever fasts and abstains from all food that stirs up the passions, and does many other things that may contribute to the deliverance of the soul from sinful inclinations, prepares the way of which it is said (Luke 3:4): “Prepare the way of the Lord.” But whoever adopts such a way of life out of vanity, greed, flattery, a desire to please others, or for any other reason—rather than to please God—does not “walk in the righteous paths of God”: he undertakes the labor of preparing the way, yet is not deemed worthy to have God walk along this path.

146. One who has dedicated himself to the true life, knowing that every affliction—whether voluntary or involuntary—is death “to the mother of death, lust” (James 1:15), accepts every encounter with sharp, involuntary temptations with joy and gladness, using patience to make these afflictions into smooth and easy paths—to the honor of a higher calling (Phil. 3:14)—which unerringly guide him as he devoutly follows the divine course. For the mother of death is lust; and the death of lust is affliction, whether voluntary or involuntary.

147. Anyone who, through self-control, has subdued lust—which is multifaceted and complex, intricately intertwined with all the senses—has “made crooked paths straight,” and by enduring the unbearable and cruel afflictions he encounters, has made rough paths smooth. Why, as a reward for virtue and for the labors undertaken for its sake—having undertaken them rightly and lawfully, having conquered lust with a longing for virtue, and having suppressed the pain of sorrows with a love for the truth—and having courageously accomplished divine feats in both respects, he will “behold,” as it is written, “the salvation of God” (Isa. 40: 5).

148. Having straightened out the twists and turns of voluntary passions—that is, the movements of lust—through self-restraint, and having smoothed over the sharp turns of involuntary temptations—that is, various kinds of afflictions—through patience, and having made the paths level, this one will truly “see the salvation of God”, having become pure in heart, and through the power of virtues and devout contemplation, he beholds God at the end of his struggles and feats, according to the Lord’s word: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5: 3), receiving as a reward for their efforts in practicing virtue the grace of dispassion, without which no one will see God.

149. As long as the mind retains a living remembrance of God, it seeks the Lord through contemplation (Ps. 26:4, 8), but not simply, rather “in the fear of the Lord” (2 Chron. 26:5), that is, by keeping the commandments. For whoever seeks the Lord without this fulfillment does not find Him, because he did not seek the Lord in the fear of the Lord. “And the Lord will prosper him” (ibid.); for the Lord prospers everyone who, with knowledge, does what is right, teaching him various virtues and revealing to him the true meaning of created things.

150. Without faith, hope, and love, just as nothing evil is ultimately eradicated, so too nothing good is fully established within us. Faith persuades the struggling mind to turn to God and stirs it to boldness through the assurance that every spiritual weapon is at its disposal; hope serves as an unfailing guarantor of divine assistance, promising the destruction of opposing forces; and love makes the mind inseparable—or rather, utterly inseparable—from its kinship with the Divine, even in the midst of battle itself, binding all the strength of its disposition to the longing for the Divine.

151. Faith comforts the struggling mind, inspiring it with the certainty of help; hope, by presenting assured help before the eyes, repels the attacks of adversaries; and love renders the onslaught of enemies dead (or ineffective) to the God-loving mind, completely rendering it powerless through its ardent striving toward God.

152. Turning to God in and of itself clearly testifies to the fullest heartfelt acceptance of divine hope, without which there is never, in anyone or for any reason, an aspiration toward God: for it is the nature of hope to present the future as the present before one’s eyes and to assure those struggling against the power of the adversary that the God who protects them does not in any way abandon them—for Whom and for Whose sake the saints must fight. For without some expectation—whether difficult or easily fulfilled—no one ever turns toward the good.

153. Every mind, girded with divine power, has, as it were, certain elders and princes: – the “power of thought,” in which rational faith is generated, teaching one always to contemplate the ineffable attributes of God and to enjoy future blessings with hope as if they were present; – “the power of desire,” in which divine love is established, binding the will to the desire for the purest Divinity and holding fast the disposition toward the desired;—and “the power of motivation,” in which divine peace is firmly established, directing all the movement of desires toward the love of the Divinity. Every mind has these powers as its allies in the eradication of evil and in the cultivation and preservation of virtue.

154. One who has not first purified oneself of passions should not engage in the contemplation of natural things, for the images of sensible objects can draw the mind—which has not been completely freed from passions—into passion. For the mind, which, out of indulgence in the senses, lingers long in its reveries on the appearances of sensory objects, becomes a source of impure passions and lacks the strength to turn, through contemplation, to the mental objects that are akin to it.

155. Whoever, during the uprising of the passions, courageously restrains the senses, completely banishes daydreaming and the memory of sensory objects, and utterly suppresses the mind’s natural inclinations toward investigating what lies outside itself—that person will, with the help of divine grace, triumphantly put to shame the evil and tyrannical violence of the passions and the devil that has risen up against him.

156. When the mind is deranged, anger is uncontrollable, lust is bestial, and, as a result, ignorance, self-will, and shameful impulses take hold of the soul—then sinful habit emerges with force, intertwined with various sensual pleasures.

157. A mind that has learned to wisely avoid invisible battles or clashes (with invisible enemies) should neither engage in natural reasoning nor do anything else during an attack by evil forces, but only pray, weary the body with labor, diligently suppress material speculation, and guard the city walls—that is to say, the sentinel virtues of the soul, or the means of preserving virtue, namely, self-control and patience—so that the enemy might not, by any means, beguile the soul with his wiles and draw its inclination to his side, thereby turning it away from God by feeding it “murky corruption” (Avvakum 2:15), and by a false good might not lead the heart, which seeks the better, toward the worse.

158. Whoever has courageously restrained the senses through prudent and all-encompassing self-restraint and patience, and through the powers of the soul has blocked the entry of sensory images into the mind—such a one effectively thwarts all the devil’s evil schemes, sending him back in shame “by the same way he came” (2 Kings 19:33).

159. Whoever, during the onslaught of temptations, refrains from thoughts of worldly things and instead devotes himself to prayer, gathering his mind away from everything else and turning it toward himself and toward God, slays the sinful inclination, and thereby puts the devil to flight in shame—the devil who stirs up that very inclination—in the hope of which he approached the soul with his customary audacity, rising up against the truth with proud thoughts: for even the great David, having known, suffered, and acted—and who, by experience, knew very well the order of all mental battles—said: “When the sinner rose up against me, I was struck dumb and humbled, and I kept silent about my blessings” (Ps. 38, 2:3); and after him, the divine Jeremiah, commanding the people, “Do not go out into the fields or walk along the roads, for the enemy’s sword is all around” (Jer. 6:25).

160. Natural desires and pleasures do not bring reproach upon those who experience them, since they are necessary consequences of the constitution of our nature. For nature provides us, even against our will, with pleasure—such as food that satisfies prior hunger, – and drink that quenches the pangs of thirst, – and sleep that restores the strength exhausted by wakefulness, – and everything else that comes to us according to our natural needs, necessary for the well-being of our nature, and useful for the acquisition of virtue by those who are zealous for it. All such things are appropriate for anyone who avoids sinful inclinations, within reasonable limits that prevent one from falling into slavery to the reprehensible and unnatural passions that arise arbitrarily within us—passions that have no other source in us except for the uncontrolled movement of natural needs and desires within the mind, which are not innate for the purpose of leading us to an immortal and everlasting life.

161. It is the work of the Highest Good that it has made not only the divine and incorporeal natures of rational beings reflections of the ineffable divine glory—as beings capable, in accordance with their capacity, of perceiving all the inconceivable splendor of inaccessible beauty— but has also imprinted clear traces of its greatness upon sensible creatures—who in many ways fall short of intelligible beings—traces capable of transporting the human mind, as it delves into them, directly to God, elevating it above all that is visible, as if ushering it into the realm of supreme bliss.

162. The active wisdom of the doer elevates him above the passions, while the contemplative wisdom of the knower places him above all that is visible, raising his mind to objects akin to it (4, 100).

163. Knowledge united with action, and action united with knowledge, constitute the throne of God and the footstool of His feet: the throne through knowledge, the footstool through action. If, then, anyone were to call “heaven” such a human mind—purified of all reveries about the material world and always engaged in, or rather adorned with, detached thoughts about the Divine—that person, it seems to me, would not be straying beyond the bounds of truth.

164. The starting point of the movement of every passion is usually a sensory object related to it. For without such an object—which, through the mediation of some sense, draws the powers of the soul to itself—a passionate movement would never arise; since there is no passion without a sensory object. If there were no wife, there would be no fornication; if there were no food, there would be no gluttony; if there were no gold, there would be no love of gold. Thus, the source of every passionate movement of our natural powers is a sensory object—or a demon—which, through it, incites the soul to sin.

165. Between God and man stand sensory objects and those contemplated by the mind. The human mind, desiring to reach God, must not be enslaved to sensory things in active life, nor by any means be held back by mental objects in contemplative life.

166. The wrath of God is a painful sensation experienced by those being instructed; and this painful sensation is caused by the infliction of involuntary hardships in life, through which God often leads the mind—which is puffed up with virtue and knowledge—to modesty and humility, enabling it through these hardships to know itself and recognize its own weakness; having sensed this weakness, it casts aside the vain pride of the heart.

167. The wrath of the Lord is the curtailment or withholding of divine gifts, which (withholding) is for the benefit of every mind that thinks highly of itself and boasts of the blessings God has given it, as if they were the fruit of its own virtues.

168. The divine—truly—limit and law of Providence in the course of events is to punish in such a way as to teach, through misfortunes, gratitude to those who, while in a better state, proved ungrateful, making the trial of present afflictions a path to the recognition of the divine power that was at work in their previous prosperity: otherwise, if Providence had allowed us to boast unhindered about the good within us, we would certainly have fallen into godless pride, imagining that the acquisition of virtue and knowledge is achieved by our own natural powers rather than by grace.

169. One who thinks he has already reached the pinnacle of virtue will no longer seek the source of all good, attributing to himself alone the power to succeed in doing good, and thereby depriving himself of the confirmation and protection of salvation—that is, God. But whoever feels within himself a natural lack of strength for good never ceases to hasten to the Almighty to make up for what he lacks.

170. Righteous anger befalls a mind that is overly wise about itself—that is, when it is abandoned, or allowed to suffer attacks from demons, both in action and in thought; so that through this he may come to realize his natural weakness and become aware of God’s power and grace, which envelop him and accomplish all that is good within him, and humble himself by casting far from himself that unnatural and alien haughtiness, lest another wrath befall him—the wrath of the withdrawal of the gifts previously bestowed.

171. He who has not come to his senses through the first manifestation of wrath—that is, abandonment—and has not humbled himself by recognizing it as a good teacher of gratitude, encounters another wrath that befalls him, taking away the effect of his former gifts and depriving him of the strength that had protected him until now. For thus says God concerning ungrateful Israel, presenting it in the form of a vineyard: “I will take away its hedge, and it shall be plundered; I will break down its wall, and it shall be trampled; I will forsake my vineyard; it shall not be pruned or hoed, and thorns shall grow up in it as in a wasteland; I will command the clouds not to rain upon it” (Isa. 5:5–6).

172. There is yet another path that leads to wickedness: indifference to the loss of virtue. For one who is accustomed to disobeying God (by disregarding His commandments) will even renounce God Himself when circumstances demand it (by threatening death for faithfulness to the commandments): since he prefers earthly life to God and considers earthly pleasures in the heart to be better than any of God’s commandments.

173. A God-loving and virtuous person, like Hezekiah, who has wisely girded himself with strength against the demons, if he should happen to experience the assault of evil spirits waging an invisible battle against him in his mind, and if, through prayer, he receives from God an angel sent to him—that is, a word of great wisdom—and, having crushed and scattered this entire devilish phalanx, yet does not attribute the cause of such victory and salvation to God, but to himself alone; —such a person does not give God His due (2 Chron. 32:25), failing to match the greatness of salvation with an abundance of thanksgiving, and failing to commensurate his goodwill toward Him with the benefactor’s kindness.

174. Let us enlighten the mind with divine insights, and adorn the body with manners befitting these insights, making it, through the rejection of passions, a rational vessel of virtue. For the passions inherent in the body, when governed by reason, are not blameworthy; but when their movement is allowed without this restraint, then they give cause for reproach. This is why it is said that we must reject those passions whose movement is natural, but whose exercise is often unnatural, not being governed by reason.

175. He who has become haughty in his heart because of the gifts he has received and has become conceited, “as if he had not received them” (1 Cor. 4:7), justly experiences God’s wrath upon him when God permits the devil to entangle him in his thoughts, both to shake the active order of his virtues and to darken the light of his mental understanding, so that, having sensed his own weakness, may recognize the source of the power that alone overcomes our passions, and, having repented and humbled himself, may cast aside the pride of self-conceit, thereby appeasing God to turn away from him the wrath that usually falls upon the unrepentant—a wrath that withdraws the grace that guards the soul and leaves the ungrateful mind empty.

176. No one can truly bless God unless he has sanctified his body with virtues and enlightened his soul with true knowledge. A disposition toward virtue is the face of the contemplative mind, as toward heaven, lifted up to the heights of true knowledge.

177. Blessed is the one who has truly realized that God, within us as within organs, accomplishes every deed and contemplation, virtue and knowledge, victory and wisdom, goodness and truth, so that we contribute absolutely nothing to this of our own accord, except for a single disposition that desires the good; possessing which, the great Zorobabel says, addressing God: “Blessed are You, who have given me wisdom, and to You we confess, O Lord God, the Father of our fathers. From You comes victory, and from You comes wisdom, and Yours is the glory, and I am Your servant” (2 Esdras 4, 60–59). As a truly grateful servant, he attributed everything to God, the Giver of all things; having received from Him, he possessed wisdom; and in his confession he attributed to Him all the power of the bestowed blessings, which are, as has been said, a combination of victory and wisdom, virtue and knowledge, action and contemplation, goodness and truth: for, combining with one another, they radiate the rays of God’s single glory and splendor.

178. All the perfections of the saints were clearly gifts from God, so that no one possesses anything at all except the gift bestowed, which God Himself, as the Lord of all, measures according to the degree of gratitude and goodwill of the recipient, who remains the possessor of only that which is consecrated to God.

179. Each of us, in proportion to the faith that dwells within us, receives the manifest working of the Spirit: thus, each person becomes a dispenser of grace for himself. This is why none of the wise will ever envy another who is abundantly blessed, since it is up to him to acquire the disposition that determines the reception of divine blessings.

180. The reason for the difference in the distribution of divine blessings is the measure of each person’s faith (Rom. 12:6); and in accordance with how we believe, we also have a zealous readiness to act in the spirit of faith. Thus, the one who acts (in the spirit of faith) demonstrates, by the measure of his activity, the measure of his faith, receiving grace to the extent that he has believed. And the one who does not act in this way demonstrates, by the measure of his inaction, the measure of his unbelief, suffering deprivation of grace to the extent that he has succumbed to unbelief. Why, then, does the envious person act wrongly toward those who do good, when the growth of faith and deeds—and consequently the reception of grace, which comes in proportion to faith (and deeds consistent with it)—is clearly in his own hands and not in the hands of others?

181. “And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him,” says Isaiah, “the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and might, the Spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord; and He shall be filled with the fear of the Lord” (Isa. 11:3–4). The characteristics of these spiritual gifts are as follows: “fear”—refraining from evil deeds; “strength”—performing good deeds; “counsel”—discerning what is contrary to duty; “piety”—an infallible vision of what is right; “knowledge”—the comprehension, through action itself, of the rationality hidden within the virtues; “understanding”—the soul’s perfect disposition toward what is known (the savoring of it); “wisdom”—the ineffable union with God, which, through communion, makes one who partakes of it a god.

182. The spirit of “the fear of God” is abstinence from evil deeds; “the spirit of fortitude” is a zealous striving and movement toward the energetic fulfillment of the commandments; “the spirit of counsel” is the skill of discernment (between good and evil), by which we rationally fulfill the commandments, separating the worse from the better; the “spirit of piety” is the infallible perception of the forms of the virtues, by acting in accordance with which we never stray from sound judgment; the “spirit of knowledge” is the correct understanding of the commandments and their rational foundations, upon which the forms of the virtues are based; “the spirit of reason” is harmony with the forms and foundations of the virtues (the resolve to fulfill the former and act according to the latter)—or, better said, the transformation (of oneself according to them)—by which the natural powers are fused with the forms and foundations of the commandments; “the spirit of wisdom” is an exaltation toward the Cause of being in the most spiritual understandings contained in the commandments, and union with It, by virtue of which—though in a manner unknown—we are initiated, as far as this is accessible to humans, into the understanding of things as they exist in God, and we communicate this to others through speech that flows from the heart, as from a certain spring.

183. Blind faith is possessed by one who, by virtue of that faith, does not keep God’s commandments. For if God’s commandments are light (Proverbs 6:23), then it is clear that one who does not keep God’s commandments remains without divine light, bearing a mere nominal—rather than a true—divine title.

184. No one who sins can cite the weakness of the flesh as an excuse for sin. For union with God the Word, through the fulfillment of the oath, has restored the whole nature to strength, thus making the inclination of the will toward the passions inexcusable for us. The divinity of the Word, being ever present by grace to those who believe in Him, silences the law of sin that is in the flesh (Rom. 8:2).

185. Knowledge that is not restrained by the fear of God produces pride, leading the one who has become proud because of it to regard as his own that which has been given. But activity, increasing together with divine love, without acquiring knowledge beyond what must be done, makes the doer humble in spirit.

186. The heavenly dwelling is an impassive, virtuous habit, and knowledge free from any error that might confuse the mind.

187. The first kind of dispassion is complete abstinence from evil deeds, as seen in beginners; the second is the complete rejection of thoughts of mentally planning evil, which occurs in those who walk the path of virtue with reason; the third is the complete stilling of passionate desire, which occurs in those who ascend from visible things to mental contemplations; the fourth form of dispassion is complete purification even from the simplest and most bare-boned daydreaming, which arises in those who, through knowledge and contemplation, have made their minds a pure and clear mirror of God. Thus, one who has purified himself of passionate deeds, freed himself from mental attachment to them, suppressed the lustful impulse toward them, and made his mind pure even of the simplest thought concerning them—possessing these four principal dispassionate states—departs from the realm of material creatures and enters the order of intellectual beings, which is divine and peaceful.

188. The first dispassion is defined as the body's impulse toward actual sin that does not move from its place (the impulse exists, but is not allowed to proceed); the second is the complete rejection of the soul's passionate thoughts, by which the impulse made possible by the first dispassion is suppressed, lacking the passionate thoughts that would stir it to action; the third is the complete stillness of the desire for passions, for the sake of which the second also occurs, consisting in the purity of thoughts; the fourth form of dispassion is the complete setting aside in one's thoughts of all sensual fantasies, through which the third also begins, since there are no sensual fantasies painting pictures of the passions.

189. The beginning and end of everyone's salvation is wisdom, which at first gives rise to fear, and then, having reached perfection by the end, gives rise to love. Or rather, at the beginning it is itself, as a matter of prudence, fear, in order to keep its lover from evil; and then, toward the end, it naturally becomes love, filling with spiritual joy those who, by living in communion with it, have forsaken the possession of all visible goods.

190. Every confession humbles the soul, sometimes teaching it to acknowledge that it is justified by grace, and sometimes compelling it to admit that it is itself to blame for its sins, due to its own negligence.

191. Confession takes two forms in content: one consists of feelings of gratitude for the blessings bestowed; the other consists of feelings of self-reproach and the awareness of the evil one has done. For confession refers both to the grateful remembrance of God's blessings, deeply felt, and to the frank acknowledgment of evil deeds by those guilty of them. Both of these give rise to humility. For both the one who gives thanks for blessings and the one who chastises himself for transgressions are usually humbled: the former, considering himself unworthy of the blessings bestowed; and the latter, imploring forgiveness for his transgressions.

192. The passion of pride consists of two forms of ignorance, or unawareness, which, coming together as one, produce a single, fused line of reasoning (prideful). For the proud person is one who acknowledges neither divine help nor human weakness. Thus, pride is a deprivation of both divine and human knowledge.

193. Vanity is a turning away from the goal that is according to God and a turning toward another goal that is not according to God. For the vain person is one who cares for virtue for his own glory rather than for God's, and who, through his labors, seeks only to earn fleeting human praise.

194. The people-pleaser is concerned with one thing only: that his outward behavior be ostentatious, and that he may earn a kind word from a flatterer, captivating first the eyes and then the ears of those who are delighted or amazed only by what is seen and heard, and who define virtue solely by what the senses perceive. Flattery, therefore, is the display of good manners and words before people and for the sake of people.

195. Hypocrisy is the pretense of friendship, or hatred disguised as friendship, or enmity operating under the guise of goodwill, or envy mimicking the character of love, or a life adorned with a false appearance of virtue rather than true virtue, or the pretense of righteousness—merely appearing to exist, or deception that takes the form of truth—all of which those who are morally corrupt, imitating the serpent, manage to devise.

196. God is the cause of all creatures and of all the good found within them. Therefore, one who exalts himself through virtue or knowledge—and to the extent of his virtue, that is, his success in it through the help of grace—without acknowledging his own weakness, has clearly not escaped the evil spirit of pride; one who does good for the sake of his own glory has preferred himself to God, pierced as he is by the thorn of vanity; one who practices virtue or speaks of it merely “so that people may see him” (Matt. 23:5) has placed human approval above divine approval, afflicted by the passion of seeking human approval; and he who has merely embellished his conduct with a mere outward appearance of virtue—maliciously, for the sake of deception—and who conceals an evil disposition of the heart behind a veneer of piety, traffics in virtue through the cunning of hypocrisy. Is it not evident that each of these has directed his aim toward something other than the Cause of all things?

197. Demons neither hate chastity nor despise fasting, just as they do not despise the distribution of possessions, hospitality, psalm-singing, diligence in reading, solitude, lofty contemplation, sleeping on the bare ground, vigil, or anything else that characterizes a life according to God, —as long as the purpose of such deeds is set on something pleasing to them.

198. The demons that wage war in the absence of virtue are those who teach fornication and drunkenness, greed, and envy; and those who wage war in the presence of virtue are those who teach conceit, vanity, and pride, and in this way, through a subtle deception, secretly sow discord within us.

199. Oh, if only we, too, would respond to these spirits of malice—who invisibly approach us under the false guise of spiritual friendship and, with the “good” intention of “bringing about our death” through sin (Rom. 7:3), say, “Let us also build together with you” (2 Esdras 5:65)—might we reply: “It is not for you or for us to build a house for the Lord our God. We alone will build it for the Lord, the God of Israel” (2 Esdras 5:68). “Alone”—because, having been freed from the spirits that wage war due to a lack of virtue, which we have already avoided, we do not wish to be tempted again by you; having risen above them through an abundance of virtue, and fall into a downfall as much more ruinous as the first, inasmuch as in the former there was easier hope of recovery, for we were then among those condescendingly forgiven because of weakness; but in this case, either there is no weakness at all, or it is very difficult, for we will be in a state of being hated for our pride. — And we are “not alone,” for we have the holy angels as our helpers in goodness, and even more so God Himself, who reveals Himself to us through works of righteousness and builds us into a holy temple, free from every passion.

200. “The prayer of a righteous person is powerful and effective,” as it is written (James 5:16). It is effective in two ways: first (when the one praying is righteous), and offers prayer to God through deeds in accordance with the commandments—a prayer that does not consist merely of words, nor is it uttered as an empty sound of the voice, nor is it idle and lacking any solid foundation, but is active and alive, being inspired by deeds in accordance with the commandments. For the power and effectiveness of prayer depend on the fulfillment of the commandments through the cultivation of virtues; consequently, the righteous person has a strong and mighty prayer, supported by the commandments. Second, when someone, asking for the prayer of the righteous, himself performs the works of prayer—promising to reform and actually reforming his former life—and through this good conversion makes the prayer of the righteous strong and all-powerful.

201. The prayer of the righteous is of no benefit to the one who resorts to it when that person takes greater delight in sinful deeds than in virtues. Thus, the great Samuel once wept for the sinning Saul, but he was unable to appease God on his behalf, having failed to accompany his weeping with the sinner’s appropriate repentance. Why, then, does God, stopping His servant from useless weeping, say to him: “How long will you weep for Saul? I have rejected him, so that he may no longer reign over Israel” (1 Sam. 16:1)?

202. Again, the most compassionate Jeremiah, praying for the Jewish people who had clung to demonic delusion to the point of madness, is not heard, because his prayer was not supported by the conversion of the godless Jews from this delusion. Therefore, stopping him from his ceaseless but fruitless entreaties, God says: “Do not pray for these people, and do not ask that they be spared; do not intercede with Me on their behalf, for I will not listen to you” (Jer. 7:16).

203. It is a sign of great ignorance—not to say madness—to seek salvation through the prayers of the saints for one who delights in his heart in pernicious deeds, and to ask for forgiveness for that very thing in which, with self-praise, he is at the same time truly defiling himself in thought and feeling. One who asks for the prayers of the righteous must not allow them to be rendered fruitless and ineffective—if he truly hates evil—but, by strengthening them with his own virtues, must make them effective and powerful enough to rise up to the Almighty, who grants forgiveness of sins.

204. “The prayer of the righteous is powerful,” whether it is offered by the righteous person himself or by someone who asks the righteous person to offer it. On the part of the righteous person, it is aided by the fact that it gives him boldness before the One who is powerful to grant the requests of the righteous; and on the part of the one who asks the righteous person to pray, it is aided if he abandons his former wickedness and turns wholeheartedly to virtue.

205. The Word of Truth knows two kinds of sorrow, the first of which is formed invisibly in the soul, while the second is visibly arranged in the sensory realm: the former embraces the entire depth of the soul, being caused by the scourges of conscience, while the latter weighs down the senses, restraining them from their natural outpouring with the burden of grievous misfortunes.

206. Just as the word of truth recognizes two kinds of sorrow, so too does it recognize two kinds of temptation: some arise internally within the realm of the will through the stirring of evil desires, while others come from outside the will in the form of involuntary troubles, sorrows, and misfortunes. The former is the cause of mental sorrow, and the latter of sensory sorrow (5, 90).

207. A temptation arising within the realm of the will causes sorrow to the soul but brings pleasure to the senses; conversely, an involuntary temptation comforts the soul (when it meets it rationally) but burdens the flesh with sorrow.

208. I believe that when the Lord and our God taught His disciples how to pray, He, with the words, “Lead us not into temptation” (Matt. 6:13), urged them to pray for deliverance from temptations arising in the realm of the will—that is, from stirrings of lust that shake one’s good dispositions and intentions; and the great James, called the brother of the Lord, in teaching those who strive for the truth not to be surprised by the trials they encounter, had in mind involuntary trials when he said: “Consider it pure joy, my brothers and sisters, whenever you face various trials” (James 1:2), that is, those that occur involuntarily, beyond our control, and cause sorrow and hardship. – This is clearly shown by the words that follow both of these sayings: for there the Lord adds: “but deliver us from the evil one”; and here the great James states: “knowing that the testing of your faith produces endurance; and let endurance have its full effect, so that you may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing” (James 1:3–4).

209. Perfect is the one who fights against voluntary temptations with self-restraint and endures involuntary ones with patience; and “whole” is the one who performs deeds with knowledge and does not leave contemplation idle.

210. The mind and the senses, being opposed to one another, have natural functions, due to the extreme dissimilarity and difference of their objects. The mind has as its objects mental and incorporeal entities, which it perceives incorporeally; the senses, on the other hand, have as their objects sensible and corporeal natures, which they perceive sensually.

211. As soon as the intellect begins to regard the senses as its own natural power, it becomes entangled in the appearances of sensible things and becomes the inventor of carnal pleasures, lacking the strength to rise above the nature of visible things because of its partiality toward the senses.

212. Salvific pleasure is the joy of the soul arising from virtue; and soul-beneficial displeasure is the suffering of the flesh for the sake of virtue. For he who passionately indulges in sensory pleasures does not direct his desire toward what is proper; and he who shuns the contingencies that cause the deprivation of these pleasures flees from that from which one ought not to flee.

213. Just as the eye cannot perceive the sensible without sunlight, so the human mind can never attain spiritual contemplation without spiritual light. For sensible light naturally illuminates the senses to perceive sensible things; whereas spiritual light enlightens the mind to the contemplative comprehension of the supersensible.

214. Inventing arbitrary difficulties and inducing involuntary ones, though they subdue desire by curbing its active movement, do not, however, destroy the power or capacity for procreation, which lies in our nature as a law. – For virtuous self-discipline usually engenders dispassion of the will, not of nature; and through this dispassion of the will, the mind is visited by the grace of divine delight.

215. It is impossible that the Lord—who is by nature wise, righteous, and almighty— – as the wise One, did not know the means of healing (our nature afflicted by sin); as the righteous One, desired to bring about the salvation of man in a sovereign manner, by the will of one who had fallen under the yoke (and guilt) of sin; or, as the almighty One, was not able to accomplish what was required for our healing.

216. God's wisdom is revealed in the fact that He truly and substantially became human; His righteousness in the fact that, through His birth, He assumed a nature capable of suffering like ours; His omnipotence in the fact that, through His sufferings and death, He secured for our nature eternal life and unchanging freedom from passion.

217. Envious of both God and us, the devil deceitfully suggested to man that God was envious of him, and thereby led him to transgress the commandment. He is envious of God so that His truly all-praised power, which deifies man, might not become manifest; and of man—so that he might not, through virtue, visibly become a partaker of divine glory. Thus, this most wicked one envies not only us—because of the glory we have before God through our virtue—but also God—because of the manifestation of His all-praised love in our salvation.

218. God, by the single, boundlessly powerful will of His goodness, embraces and sustains all—angels and humans, the good and the evil. Yet they all partake of God to varying degrees, not as He passes through them unimpeded, but in accordance with their disposition.

219. We do not recognize a distinction of persons in Christ, because the Trinity remained the Trinity, and after the Word became incarnate, no new person was added to the Holy Trinity through this incarnation. But we do recognize in Him a distinction of natures, so as not to confess the flesh to be consubstantial with the Word by nature.

220. A perjurer is one who swears falsely in the name of the Lord—that is, one who promises God to live virtuously but then turns all his attention to something else, alien to the vow he uttered with his own lips, and by failing to keep the commandments breaks the solemn vow of a godly life. In short, one who has chosen a life according to God but has not become completely dead to this present life is a liar and a perjurer; just as one who has sworn to God—that is, who has promised to walk blamelessly through God-pleasing deeds—and has not fulfilled that promise.

221. Whoever endures the onslaught of involuntary temptations, like the blessed Job and the valiant martyrs, with unshakable wisdom, is a mighty lamp, preserving within himself the unquenchable light of salvation, received by the power of the Lord. But even the one who knows the wiles of the evil one and is familiar with the battles (clashes, skirmishes) in unseen conflicts—this one, too, illuminated by the light of knowledge, is a lamp to others, who, like the great Apostle, can rightly say: "We do not understand his thoughts" (2 Cor. 2:11).

222. Just as a lamp cannot remain unquenched without oil, so too the light of spiritual gifts cannot be preserved without a disposition that has become a habit—one that nourishes inner goodness with words, deeds, and character befitting it, as well as with feelings and thoughts in harmony with it. For every spiritual gift requires, in accordance with its nature, a disposition (or state of mind) that continually pours into it, like oil, a certain mental substance, so that it may remain whole and intact through the good disposition of the one who has received it.

223. God is called and is the Father by grace only to those who bear witness to their spiritual rebirth from God through virtuous character. In these character traits, one sees, as it were, the face of the soul, reflecting in its virtues the distinct features of the God who begot it; and those who possess them inspire those who observe them to glorify God, presenting their lives as a model of virtue to be imitated. For God is not usually glorified by mere words, but by deeds of righteousness, which proclaim His divine majesty far more eloquently than words.

224. Whoever demonstrates within himself knowledge animated by action, and action animated by knowledge, has found the precise way of God's true work within us. But whoever possesses any one of these qualities in isolation from the other has either turned knowledge into an empty fantasy (unconfirmed and uncontrolled) or transformed action into a soulless idol. For knowledge without action is no different from the dreams of the imagination, lacking action to confirm it; and action without meaning is the same as an idol, lacking the knowledge that animates it.

225. Truly, pride is a cursed passion—a haughtiness consisting of a combination of two evils, pride and vanity: of these, pride turns away from the Creator of virtue and nature, while vanity distorts both nature and virtue itself; for in the proud, nothing is done according to God, and in the vain, nothing occurs according to nature.

226. The written law, by deterring one from wrongdoing through fear, accustoms one to righteousness; in time, however, this habit gives rise to a love of truth, from which springs a steadfast disposition toward goodness, leading to the forgetting of past vice.

227. Circumcision, in a spiritual sense, is the complete severing of the inclination toward carnal lusts.

228. The Sabbath is the stilling of the passions, or their complete inactivity.

229. God commanded that the Sabbath, the new moons, and the feasts be observed, not because He wanted people to honor the days merely as days: for that would mean legitimizing the worship of the creature rather than the Creator (Rom. 1:25), on the grounds that the days themselves are naturally worthy of honor and therefore worthy of worship. But by commanding us to honor these days, He symbolically commanded us to honor Himself. For He Himself is the Sabbath— —as rest from the toils and cares of life and from the labors of righteousness; He is also the Passover, as the liberator of those held captive in the bitter labor of sin; and He is Pentecost, as the beginning and the end of all things.

230. We recognize as spiritual sacrifices not only the mortification of the passions, which are subdued by “the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God” (Eph. 6:17), but also the consecration of all natural powers to God and their offering as a whole burnt offering to God through the fire of the Spirit’s grace.

231. The power of sin, or carnal reasoning, is cut off by the grace of holy baptism, and active obedience to the divine commandments completely puts it to death by the sword of the Spirit.

232. The passion of gluttony, with its lustful thoughts, has, like a sword, destroyed many virtues: it kills the seeds of chastity through intemperance; it corrupts the righteousness of justice through licentiousness; it severs the natural bonds of charity with self-love; and, in short, the passion of gluttony is the destroyer of all the fruits of virtue.

233. Every zealous seeker of salvation is devoted to both virtuous deeds and holy thoughts: for without virtue and knowledge, no one has ever succeeded in attaining salvation. The work of virtue is to bring bodily impulses into order through sound reasoning, skillfully restraining them from inappropriate inclinations as with a bridle; and the work of knowledge is to carefully consider and reasonably deliberate how one ought to act, and then to prepare oneself to carry it out.

234. Anyone who has put to death “the members that are on the earth” (Col. 3: 5), and has extinguished all his carnal reasoning, and has cut off every sympathy for it—so that he might say with the blessed Apostle Paul: “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ” (Rom. 8:32)—such a person has become without father, without mother, and without a genealogy, like the great Melchizedek (Heb. 7:3), having nothing by which his flesh and nature might hold him back, because of the complete union with the Spirit that has been accomplished within him.

235. I do not think it is right to call the end of this life “death,” but rather deliverance from death, removal from the realm of corruption, liberation from bondage, an end to anxieties, the cessation of strife, an exit from darkness, rest from toil, the calming of turmoil, shelter from shame, escape from passions, and, generally speaking, the end of all evils—from which the Saints, having reformed themselves through voluntary self-denial, have made themselves strangers and sojourners in this life. For, valiantly struggling against the world, against the flesh, and against the rebellions arising from them, and having suppressed the delusion born of the sympathy of the senses with the sensual, they preserved within themselves the dignity of the soul without being enslaved.

236. The saints were good and benevolent, kind-hearted and merciful, having shown an equal disposition of love toward the entire human race; by the power of this love, they faithfully preserved throughout their lives the best of all goods—that is, humility— this guardian of all good and destroyer of the evil opposed to it, they remained impervious to all the temptations that beset us—both those that arise of our own volition and those that do not—suppressing the former through self-restraint and repelling the latter through patience.

Blessed Abba Falasius

A Brief Account of Him

Our reverend Father Falasius flourished in the first half of the seventh century and served as a presbyter and abbot of a monastery in the Libyan deserts. This blessed Abba combined his love for piety with a love for spiritual enlightenment and devoted much time to the study of Holy Scripture. He was a contemporary of St. Maximus the Confessor, with whom he maintained spiritual communion. Several letters from St. Maximus have been preserved; indeed, an entire book is dedicated to him, containing an explanation of difficult passages in Holy Scripture. St. Maximus held this Abba in high esteem and, in one letter, even calls him his mentor. His blessed repose likely occurred no later than 660. The four hundred sayings of his presented here—on love, abstinence, and the spiritual life—are full of edification. They are all primarily of a moral and ascetic nature, but there are also some that contain dogmatic ideas, which St. Damascene used in his exposition of the faith. If one reads only the initial letters of the sayings in sequence according to the original text, a specific idea emerges—which is placed at the beginning of each hundred.

Abba Falassius on Love, Abstinence, and the Spiritual Life, to Presbyter Paul whose acrostic reads as follows: To my spiritual brother and beloved Lord Paul of Falassia, seemingly a man of silence, but in truth a vain merchant.

The 101st Hundred

1. Love, wholly directed toward God, unites those who love with God and with one another.
2. The mind that has attained spiritual love thinks nothing of its neighbor that is unbecoming of love.
3. Under the guise of love, hypocrisy is concealed by one who blesses with his lips but despises in his heart.
4. One who has attained love bears with equanimity all the sorrow and grief inflicted upon him by his enemies.
5. Love alone unites all creatures with God and with one another in unity of mind.
6. True love is possessed by the one who allows neither suspicion nor a single word against his neighbor.
7. One who does nothing that might disrupt love is honorable before God and people.
8. Sincere love is characterized by the true word “from a good conscience” (1 Tim. 1:5).
9. Whoever passes on words of reproach to a brother—words heard from others—hides envy under the guise of goodwill.
10. Just as physical virtues attract praise from people, so do spiritual virtues attract praise from God.
11. Love and self-restraint purify the soul, while pure prayer enlightens the mind (spirit).
12. A man is strong who drives away evil through his actions and his mind.
13. He who has attained dispassion and spiritual understanding has found grace with God.
14. If you wish to rid yourself of passionate thoughts, cultivate self-control and love for your neighbor.
15. Guard yourself against intemperance and hatred, and you will encounter no stumbling blocks during prayer.
16. Just as one cannot find fragrances in a garbage pit, so too—in a vindictive soul—one cannot find the fragrance of love.
17. Bravely restrain anger and lust, and you will soon be rid of evil thoughts.
18. Vanity destroys the concealment of good deeds, and pride drives away all humility.
19. Hypocrisy and lies are characteristic of vanity, while conceit and envy are characteristic of pride.
20. A ruler is one who has mastered himself and subjected both soul and body to the mind (spirit).
21. A friend’s sincerity is revealed in times of trial, when he stands by us in our time of need.
22. Calm your emotions through silent solitude, and subject the thoughts that arise in your heart to strict judgment.
23. Do not respond to painful insults with resentment, but treat flattery with hostility.
24. Silent solitude, prayer, love, and self-control—these are the four-horse chariot that lifts the mind to heaven.
25. Wear down the flesh with fasting and vigil, and you will drive away the tormenting, lustful thought.
26. “As wax melts before the face of fire” (Ps. 67:3), so does an impure thought melt away from the fear of God.
27. It is a great evil for a rational soul to linger long in shameful passion.
28. Endure patiently the blows of sorrowful and heart-rending misfortunes; for through them, God’s providence seeks to purify you.

29. Having cast aside your possessions and renounced the world, renounce at last your evil thoughts as well.
30. It is fitting for the mind to always learn from the words of God.
31. Just as it is God's work to govern the world, so it is the soul's work to govern the body.
32. With what hope shall we meet Christ, we who are still enslaved to carnal pleasures?
33. Lust is destroyed by suffering and sorrow, whether they arise of our own accord or are sent by Providence.
34. The love of money is the food of the passions, for it sustains and nourishes all-encompassing, self-indulgent lust.
35. Sorrow gives rise to a lack of pleasure (or the satisfaction of sensual desire); pleasure, however, is intertwined with every passion.
36. By whatever measure you measure out to your body, so will it be measured out to you by God (Matt. 7:2).
37. The acts of divine judgment are the recompense for deeds performed through the body.
38. Virtue and knowledge give birth to immortality; their loss, however, has become the mother of death.
39. Sorrow for God removes desire; and the removal of desire is the resurrection of the soul.
40. Impassivity is the soul's steadfastness against evil; yet it cannot be attained without the grace of Christ.
41. Christ is the Savior of soul and body, and whoever follows in His footsteps is freed from all that is evil.
42. If you wish to attain salvation, renounce the pleasures of the flesh, and embrace self-control, love, and prayer.
43. True discernment is characteristic of dispassion, by which all things are done in due measure.
44. Our Lord and God is Jesus Christ; and the mind that follows Him will not remain in darkness.
45. Gather your mind and watch over your thoughts; and those you find to be passionate, fight against them.
46. There are three sources from which thoughts arise: the senses, memory, and the fullness of the body; but the most troublesome of these are those that arise from memory.
47. Whoever is granted wisdom becomes a partaker of the understanding of the incorporeal ones and knows the beginning of the world and its end.
48. Do not neglect the proper course of action, and your mind will be enlightened; for to such it is promised: "I will open to you hidden and unseen treasures" (Isa. 45:3).
49. Whoever has been freed from passions has found favor with God, and whoever has been deemed worthy of knowledge has been granted great mercy.
50. The mind, freed from passions, becomes luminous, being constantly illuminated by the contemplation of all that exists.
51. The light of the soul is knowledge; deprived of it, the unwise walk in darkness.
52. The unwise spend their lives in darkness; and the darkness of ignorance envelops them.
53. Whoever loves Jesus will be delivered from evil; and whoever follows Him will behold the true light.
54. The mind, freed from passions, perceives subtle thoughts, both when the body is awake and when it sinks into sleep.
55. A mind that has attained the highest degree of purity feels constrained by created beings and desires to be beyond all creation.
56. Blessed is the one who has attained boundless boundlessness; and only the one who has transcended all limits can attain this.
57. Those who revere God ponder His words; those who love Him discover the truth within them.
58. The mind, moved by righteousness, finds the truth; but one moved by any passion will not attain it.
59. Just as God is unknowable in His essence, so too is He indefinable in His greatness.
60. The wisdom of a being that has neither beginning nor end is unfathomable.
61. The salvation of every creature lies in the all-benevolent providence of its Creator.

62. The Lord sustains all who fall and raises up all who are cast down, through His mercy.
63. Christ is the Judge of the living and the dead, and the righteous Rewarder of every deed (Acts 10:42; Ps. 61:13).
64. If you wish to rule over your soul and body, be quick to cut off the causes of the passions.
65. Bind the powers of the soul to the virtues, and every impulse of the passions will be severed from them.
66. Rein in the urges of lust with self-restraint, and the urges of anger with spiritual love.
67. Silent solitude and prayer are the most powerful tools of virtue; for by purifying the mind, they make it perceptive.
68. Only spiritual conversation is beneficial; in all other cases, silence is preferable.
69. Of the five kinds of conversation, engage in three; do not overindulge in the fourth; and abstain from the fifth.
70. Silence loves those who have no attachment to anything worldly; and it loves all people who love nothing human.
71. The true teacher is conscience; whoever obeys it remains unblemished.
72. Conscience offends only those who have either reached the pinnacle of virtue or have fallen into the very depths of evil.
73. Perfect dispassion gives rise to pure thoughts; and perfect knowledge brings one face to face with the Incomprehensible.
74. He who has not attained carnal pleasures grieves with a disgraceful sorrow; but he who has despised them remains carefree.
75. Sorrow, in general, is the deprivation of desired pleasure, whether that which comes from God or that which comes from the spirit of the world.
76. The Kingdom of God is goodness and wisdom; whoever attains them dwells in heaven.
77. Woe to the man who, though his soul is the body, prefers the ways of the world to God.
78. One has attained love equal for all who does not envy those who excel in goodness, but pities those who do not care about it.
79. He who has established the requirements of virtue as a law for both soul and body ought to rule properly.
80. A good spiritual merchant is one who, for the sake of the future, has renounced both the pleasures and the sorrows of this life alike.
81. The soul is strengthened by love and self-restraint, and the mind (spirit) by pure prayer and spiritual contemplation.
82. When listening to a helpful word, do not judge the speaker, lest you deprive yourself of edification that saves the soul.
83. An evil heart harbors evil thoughts and turns a neighbor's virtues into faults by misinterpreting his deeds.
84. Do not trust a thought that condemns your neighbor, for whoever has an evil treasure also harbors evil thoughts.
85. A good heart produces good thoughts; for his thoughts are shaped by the treasure he holds.
86. Guard your thoughts and flee from evil, lest your mind be clouded and you begin to see things distortedly.
87. Reflect on the Jews and guard yourself against their deeds. Blinded by envy, they blasphemously called the Lord and God "Beelzebub."
88. Malicious suspicion clouds the mind and causes it to mistake what is wrong for what is right.
89. Passions spring from all virtues; that is why passionate people misinterpret virtues as passions.
90. If the mind remains in joy or sorrow for a long time, it soon falls into the passion of despondency.
91. A pure conscience delights the soul, while an impure thought casts it down into the abyss.
92. When passions arise, they drive away vanity; but once they are driven away, vanity returns.
93. If you wish to rid yourself of all passions at once, embrace self-control, love, and prayer.
94. The mind that abides in God through prayer frees even the passionate part of the soul from passions.
95. God, having given being to all creatures, embraces them all together through His providence.

96. Though He is the Lord of all, He was pleased to become a servant, thereby demonstrating the highest degree of His providence toward creation (Phil. 2:7).

97. God the Word, having become incarnate without change, united Himself with all creation through the flesh.

98. It is a wondrous miracle in heaven and on earth that God is on earth and man is in heaven; so that, by uniting humans with the angels, He might bestow deification upon them all together.

99. The sanctification and deification of angels and humans is the knowledge of the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity.

100. The forgiveness of sins is liberation from the passions; whoever has not been freed from them by grace has not yet attained forgiveness.

The Hundred and Second

The acrostic reads as follows: “ ” Pray for me, my most honest brother; for I expect great misfortunes, as I deserve, because of my own willful actions—sorrows of the soul and afflictions of the body.

1. Do you wish to be rid of your passions all at once?—Renounce the mother of all passions: self-love.

2. The health of the soul is dispassion and wisdom, and it is impossible to attain it for one who is enslaved by carnal pleasures.

3. Abstinence with patience and love with generosity dry up sensuality, both bodily and spiritual.

4. Self-love is the source of the soul’s vices; self-love, in turn, is love of the body (or self-pity).

5. A distinctive feature of reason is to submit oneself to the mind, and at the same time to subdue and enslave the body.

6. It is a disgrace for a rational person to submit to the irrational and to concern oneself only with the satisfaction of shameful desires.

7. It is ruinous for a rational soul to abandon its Creator and grovel before the body.

8. You are commanded to keep the body as a slave; to be enslaved by its pleasures is unnatural.

9. Sever the bonds of fellowship with the body, and give this slave nothing but what is strictly necessary.

10. Enclose your senses within the fortress of silent solitude, so that they may not lead the mind astray toward their characteristic desires.

11. The most powerful weapons for one who remains silent with patience are self-restraint, love, prayer, and reading.

12. The mind never ceases to dwell on the objects of carnal pleasures until, having subdued the flesh, it devotes itself to contemplation.

13. We strive to keep the commandments in order to free ourselves from passions, and to uphold the divine dogmas in order to be deemed worthy of knowledge.

14. The serenity of the soul comes from dispassion and knowledge, and it is impossible to attain it for one enslaved by carnal pleasures.

15. Subdue the body by cutting off its lustful desires, and you will free it from the heavy bondage of those desires.

16. Created free and called to freedom, do not allow yourself to be enslaved by impure passions.

17. Through sorrows and joys, desires and fears, the demons bind the mind to the sensual.

18. The fear of God restrains lusts, and sorrow for God drives away sensuality.

19. The desire for wisdom despises fear, and the sweetness of knowledge drives away sorrow.

20. Scripture contains the following four subjects: commandments, dogmas, warnings, and promises.

21. Abstinence and labor curb lust, while silent solitude and divine love dry it up.

22. Do not wound your brother with cryptic, suspicious words; for you yourself, if it should happen, would not be able to bear such treatment.

23. Anger is restrained by magnanimity and lack of malice, and it is destroyed by love and compassion (forbearance).

24. To whom knowledge is given, the light of understanding is given; but whoever, having received it, dishonors it will see darkness.

25. Observance of the commandments gives rise to dispassion; and dispassion of the soul is guarded by knowledge.

26. Transform sensory perception into intellectual contemplation, and you will elevate the senses above the sensory realm.
27. A woman symbolizes the soul engaged in ascetic practice; through union with her, the mind gives birth to virtue.
28. The study of God's words teaches the mind of God to those who seek it truly, reverently, and zealously.
29. Just as light is to those who see and to what is seen, so is God to those who think and to what is thought.
30. The sensible firmament signifies the firmament of faith, upon which all the saints shine like the heavenly bodies.
31. Jerusalem is the heavenly one—the knowledge of the incorporeal; for in it the vision of the world is contemplated.
32. Do not neglect the life of action; otherwise, your knowledge will diminish; and then, because of the famine that will ensue, you will go down to Egypt (Gen. 26:1–2).
33. Spiritual freedom is liberation from the passions: which no one attains without the grace of Christ.
34. The Promised Land is the Kingdom of Heaven, for which impassivity and knowledge make us worthy.
35. Spiritual Egypt is the darkness of the passions, into which no one descends unless he first experiences famine.
36. Fill your ear with spiritual words, and you will turn your mind away from impure thoughts.
37. God alone is good and all-wise by nature; but the mind, too, can become such through communion with Him, if it strives for it.
38. Control your appetite, your sleep, your anger, and your tongue—“and your foot will not stumble over a stone” (Ps. 90:12).
39. Strive to love every person equally, and you will drive away all passions at once.
40. Sensory perception is common to both the mind and the senses; but the knowledge of the spiritual belongs to the mind alone.
41. It is impossible for the mind to engage in spiritual matters unless it first cuts off its inclination toward the senses and the sensory.
42. Natural feeling has a predisposition toward the sensory, and, being distracted by it, distracts the mind as well.
43. Put the senses in the service of the mind, and do not give them time to distract it.
44. When the mind begins to dwell on sensual matters, divert its attention from the senses by lifting it to a spiritual understanding of what lies before it.
45. A sign that the mind has devoted itself to spiritual matters is contempt for everything that delights the senses.
46. The mind, striving toward the contemplation of spiritual objects, derives unceasing delight from this.
47. When the mind is enriched by knowledge of the One, then the senses, too, are certainly subjugated to it.
48. Do not let your mind wander among sensory things, lest it accumulate the joys and sorrows inherent in them.
49. For those whose mind is always occupied with spiritual matters, the desirable part of the soul becomes a divine weapon.
50. It is impossible for the mind to be filled with knowledge unless the desirable part of the soul is first adorned with the virtues proper to it.
51. The mind becomes detached from the world when it completely cuts off all sensation toward the sensual.
52. The distinguishing feature of the rational part of the soul should be the pursuit of knowledge of God, and that of the desiring part—love and self-restraint.
53. The intellect cannot always be occupied with anything sensory if there is no inclination toward it.
54. The mind is perfect when it is filled with knowledge; the soul is perfect when it is established in virtue.

55. The mind's inclination toward the sensual makes it a slave to bodily pleasures.
56. The mind, too, is moved from its place of knowledge when the desirable part turns away from its virtues.
57. We have received "the right to become children of God" (John 1:12), but we do not become them unless we cast off our passions.
58. Let no one think that he has truly become a child of God unless he has already acquired divine traits within himself.
59. The adoption of good or bad habits makes one a son of God or of Satan.
60. A wise man is one who listens to himself and hastens to purify himself of every defilement.
61. A hardened soul feels nothing even when it is scourged and is incapable of feeling any gratitude toward a benefactor.
62. One clothed in impurity is cast out of the divine wedding halls and becomes a partaker of utter darkness (Matt. 22:12–13).
63. He who fears God cares for his soul and delivers himself from an evil fate.
64. It is impossible for one who has forsaken God and slavishly indulges in carnal pleasures to obtain God's mercy.
65. Jesus Christ is the Word who said, "No one can serve two masters" (Matt. 6:24), even though we do not want to believe it.
66. A defiled soul becomes hardened by passions and, without cutting and cauterizing, is incapable of believing.
67. Those who have become calloused need severe trials; for without intense pain, they cannot be softened.
68. A wise man cares for his soul and, through voluntary self-mortification, avoids involuntary torments.
69. Care for the soul consists of self-mortification (acts of self-denial) and humility, for the sake of which God forgives all sins.
70. Just as lust and anger multiply sins, so abstinence and humility erase them.
71. Sorrow for God breaks the heart; it is born of the fear of hellish torments.
72. Sorrow for God purifies the heart and distances it from impure pleasures.
73. Patience is the diligence of the soul (the desire to tax the soul); where such diligence exists, the love of pleasure is banished.
74. Every sin is committed for the sake of pleasure; every forgiveness, however, comes about through suffering and sorrow.
75. Those who do not undertake to repent through voluntary suffering are subjected to involuntary suffering by God's providence.
76. Christ is the Savior of the whole world; and He has granted repentance to people for their salvation (Matt. 4:17).
77. Repentance gives rise to the observance of the commandments; and the observance of the commandments purifies the soul.
78. The purification of the soul is its liberation from passions; and liberation from passions gives birth to love for God.
79. The soul that loves God is pure, and the mind that has been freed from ignorance is pure.
80. Strive to keep God's commandments even unto death; for, having been purified through them, you will enter into life.
81. Use your body as a servant of the commandments, keeping it as free from sensuality and as free from pain (healthy) as possible.
82. The rebellion of the flesh arises from neglect of prayer, diet, and silence.
83. Good silence gives birth to the children of the good—love, self-control, and pure prayer.
84. Reading and prayer purify the mind; love and self-control, however, purify the desiring part of the soul.
85. Always observe the same degree of self-restraint, lest you fall into its opposite through inconsistency.

86. Having laid down laws for yourself, do not betray yourself by later interpreting them in a sophistically twisted manner; for whoever in this way leads himself away from them deceives himself (he is a devil to himself).

87. Passionate souls are mental sunsets; for in them the sun of truth has set.

88. He is a son of God who has become like God in goodness, wisdom, strength, and truth.

89. The sickness of the soul is an evil inclination; its death, however, is sin, committed through one's actions (Rom. 5:12).

90. Spiritual detachment is perfect dispassion, in which the mind withdraws from all things of this world.

91. Observe all things in accordance with the virtues of the soul, for from this the fruit of righteousness is born.

92. The contemplation of mental objects is said to be incorporeal, as it is entirely foreign to matter and form.

93. Just as the four elements are not alien to matter and form, so too are the bodies composed of them not alien to them.

94. The Word, who became flesh out of love for humanity (John 1:14), neither altered what He was nor changed what He became.

95. We speak of God—the Son who became incarnate—both as being of the Godhead and of humanity, and in the Godhead and in humanity, as well as being of two natures and in two natures.

96. We confess one Person in Christ, with two natures united inseparably.

97. We glorify the one, indivisible Person in Christ, and we confess the unconfused union of the two natures in Him.

98. We worship the triune, single Divine nature, and we glorify the consubstantial Holy Trinity.

99. The Fatherhood, Sonship, and Proceeding are proper to each of the three Persons; but the Being, Nature, Divinity, and Goodness are common to all three Persons.

Number 103

whose acrostic reads: “ ” Evil should not be considered that which burdens the flesh but purifies the soul; rather, that which offends the conscience but delights the flesh.

1. Think well of Him who is good by nature, and think well of every person.

2. On the Day of Judgment, we will have to give an account before God for our words, deeds, and thoughts.

3. Our habit of doing good or evil compels us to think, speak, and act in ways that are good or evil.

4. A mind possessed by passions conceives unseemly thoughts; and these thoughts are revealed through words and deeds.

5. A passion precedes an evil thought; the cause of passions is the senses; and the cause of their evil use is, clearly, the mind.

6. Restrain your emotions, subdue your thoughts, and use the commandments as a weapon to conquer your passions.

7. Evil is deep-rooted and requires a sustained struggle; for a deeply ingrained habit is not easily uprooted.

8. A sustained effort of self-control and love, accompanied by patience and silence, consumes the passion that has taken root.

9. Lift up your mind in prayer more often, and you will dispel the thoughts that swirl in your heart.

10. Asceticism requires patience and courage; for sensuality is driven out only through long-term and willing self-discipline.

11. You will successfully perform the deeds of asceticism if you do everything in moderation and according to the rule.

12. Always maintain the same measure in your ascetic practices, and do not violate the established rule unless absolutely necessary.

13. Just as love and self-control purify the thoughts, so do contemplation and prayer—“every thought and every plan that is not in accordance with Christ” (2 Cor. 10:5).

14. Ascetic labors—namely, fasting, vigil, patience, and generosity—purify the conscience.

15. Whoever cheerfully endures the blows of involuntary temptations becomes humble, skilled (in spiritual matters), and trustworthy.
16. Patience is rooted in the soul's desire for self-discipline; it consists in enduring the hardships and involuntary temptations that arise.
17. Bearing terrible slanders with equanimity gives rise to a lack of malice; patience, however, eradicates all that is evil from the soul once and for all.
18. The blows of severe misfortunes tear the heart apart, and the sorrow they engender drives away sensuality.
19. There are four principal passions, which Providence wisely uses one against the other.
20. For sensuality is destroyed by the inducing of sorrow, and the fear of hellish torments causes lust to wither away.
21. A prudent mind instructs the soul in spiritual deeds and trains the body for every kind of physical endeavor.
22. Strive to show that a monk is not merely an outward person, but also an inward one—by purifying them of passions.
23. The first renunciation is liberation from possessions; the second and third are liberation from passions and ignorance.
24. Anyone who wishes to do so can easily renounce possessions; but it takes no small effort to renounce attachment to them.
25. He who keeps lust in check will also master anger; for in lust lies the cause of anger.
26. So then, have we been cleansed of passionate thoughts and, as a result, tasted pure and immaterial prayer, or not yet?
27. The mind is great if it has been freed from passions, has renounced all created things, and abides in God.
28. The one who prospers meditates on the following three subjects: the fulfillment of the commandments, the knowledge of the dogmas, and faith in the Holy Trinity.
29. A mind freed from passions is occupied with the following: subtle thoughts, the contemplation of created things, and the eternal Light.
30. The worst passions are hidden within our souls; yet they become evident when their deeds are exposed.
31. It sometimes happens that the mind remains unperturbed and attains a certain degree of dispassion; yet it remains unrefined due to the absence of things (or objects for active practice).
32. Passions are set in motion by the following three things: by the recollection of their objects, by the satisfaction and repose of the body, and by the senses, as has been said.
33. The mind, having properly governed the senses and brought the body into order, has but one battle—the battle with memory.
34. Passions are set in motion through the senses when there is a lack of self-restraint and spiritual love.
35. Moderate fasting, vigil, and psalm-singing generally regulate the body's constitution.
36. The following three things clearly impair the body's constitution: an irregular diet, changes in climate, and demonic influence.
37. Passionate thoughts are subdued by the following: prayer, reading, self-restraint, and love.
38. First, silence your senses, and then combat your thoughts with the weapons of virtue.
39. A sin of the mind is the misuse of thoughts for evil—and an active sin is the misuse of things for evil.
40. The misuse of thoughts and things is ungodly and unrighteous—the use of both for evil.
41. Sinful passions are the bonds that keep the mind captive to the senses.
42. One who has no attachment to deeds or things, nor to the memory of them, possesses perfect dispassion.
43. A good soul does good to one's neighbor, and if met with ingratitude, remains magnanimous toward him, and patiently endures any harm suffered at his hands.
44. Evil thoughts are evil itself, and one who has not purified himself of them will not learn true knowledge.

45. Whoever listens to Christ enlightens himself, and whoever imitates Him improves himself.
46. Resentment is a disease of the soul; it arises either from insults, losses, or suspicious thoughts.
47. The Lord blinds the mind of the envious because they do not grieve righteously over their neighbor's blessings.
48. A slanderous soul has a three-edged tongue, for it wounds itself, the listener, and sometimes even the one being slandered.
49. He who prays sincerely for the one who has offended him is free from malice; and he who does not withhold gifts from him is freed from resentment.
50. Hatred toward one's neighbor is the death of the soul; and this is what the slanderer's soul possesses and brings upon itself.
51. Sloth arises from the corruption of the soul; but a soul afflicted by sensuality is not diligent.
52. He who loves the Lord Jesus devotes himself to ascetic labors; and perseverance in these labors drives away laziness.
53. The soul is strengthened by ascetic labors—and by doing everything in moderation, it drives away laziness.
54. He who rules over his belly dries up lust, and his mind does not bow down to lewd thoughts.
55. The mind of the chaste is a temple of the Holy Spirit; but the mind of the glutton is a dwelling place for ravens (Isa. 34: 11).
56. Gluttony gives rise to a craving for various delicacies, but fasting makes even a single loaf of bread sweet.
57. He who secretly rejoices with the one who is envied is freed from envy; and he who conceals that which might be envied frees others from envy.
58. Keep away from one who lives carelessly, even if his name is great among many.
59. Make a hardworking man your friend, and you will find in him a covering for your sins.
60. The careless person has sold himself to many masters; and however they lead him, so he lives.
61. Negligence, like a friend, favors you in times of peace; but in times of temptation, like an enemy, it rises up against you.
62. It lays down its own soul for you before the passions arise, but when they do arise, it takes your soul for itself.
63. A neglected field becomes overgrown with thorns, and a negligent soul is filled with impure passions.
64. A wise mind restrains its soul, exhausts the body, and subjugates the passions to itself.
65. Visible actions are indicators of invisible inner ones, just as the fruits a tree bears reveal what kind of tree it is.
66. Words and deeds expose the hypocrite, just as they reveal the secret false prophet.
67. A mind that has lost its reason does not instruct its soul, but leads it away from love and self-control.
68. The cause of impure thoughts is a corrupt character, sustained by vanity, pride, and arrogance.
69. Those possessed by these passions are characterized by hypocrisy and deceit, as well as cunning, mockery, and the most vile lies.
70. Such people are also enslaved by envy and zeal, anger and fury, sorrow and resentment.
71. Such is the path of those who live in indifference, and such are the treasures hidden within me.
72. Austerity (strict bodily asceticism) and humility save the soul and deliver it from the passions mentioned above.
73. The mark of a wise mind is a helpful word, and the mark of a good soul is a good deed.
74. An enlightened mind utters wise words, and a pure soul cultivates divine thoughts.
75. The thoughts of the zealous teach wisdom, and his words enlighten those who hear them.
76. When a soul is imbued with good dispositions, it cultivates good thoughts; but when it is imbued with evil inclinations, it gives rise to wicked thoughts.
77. A passionate soul is a breeding ground for evil thoughts, and from its treasure house it brings forth evil (Matt. 12:35).
78. A good treasure is a virtuous habit, and a good mind brings forth good things from it.

79. A mind moved by divine love cultivates good thoughts about God, but one moved by self-love gives rise to the opposite.

80. A mind moved by love for one's neighbor constantly thinks good thoughts about him (1 Cor. 13: 5); but a mind moved by the opposite assumes evil in him.

81. The cause of good thoughts is virtue; the cause of virtues is the commandments; and the cause of their fulfillment is a good will.

82. Virtues and vices—whether present in the soul or departing from it—incline the soul toward good or evil, prompting it to have thoughts that are hostile to one another.

83. The cause of evil thoughts is passion; the cause of passions is disobedience to the commandments; the cause of disobedience is seduction by the senses; and the cause of seduction is the mind's neglect of the proper control of the senses.

84. In those who are making progress, good dispositions can still be easily turned into their opposites; but in those who are perfect, these dispositions are unshakable.

85. The strength of the soul is an unshakable habit of virtue; he who has attained it said, "Who shall separate us from the love of God?" (Rom. 8:35).

86. Self-love precedes all passions; pride follows them all.

87. The three principal sinful passions have their origin in the passion of self-love.

88. These three are gluttony, vanity, and greed, from which all other passions arise.

89. Gluttony is followed by fornication; vanity is followed by pride; and the rest follow all three.

90. Following all three are sorrow, anger, resentment, envy, sloth, and others....

Prayer

1. Christ, Lord of all! Deliver us from all these things—both from the destructive passions and from the thoughts they engender.

2. We were created for Your sake, that we might find bliss in You, having been placed in the Paradise You planted.

3. But we have brought this present disgrace upon ourselves, having preferred what is destructive to blessed delight.

4. For this reason, we have received our just reward within ourselves, inheriting death instead of eternal life.

5. Now, O Lord, just as You have always watched over us, continue to be our guardian to the end—just as You were pleased to become incarnate for our sake, so save us all.

6. For You came to save us who were lost; do not, then, exclude us from the company of the saved.

7. Raise our souls to life and save our bodies, cleansing us from every defilement.

8. Break the bonds of the passions that hold us captive, just as You broke the hosts of unclean demons.

9. And deliver us from their tyranny, that we may serve You alone, the eternal Light.

10. When, after the resurrection from the dead, we form with the Angels a single, blessed, and eternally indissoluble choir.

The One Hundred and Fourth whose acrostic reads: “ ” But pray diligently to our God, that we may be delivered from evils—both real and imaginary, and those merely regarded as such.

1. Whoever has detached his mind from the love and caresses of the flesh has, by the Life-giving Spirit, “put to death the deeds of the flesh” (Rom. 8:13).

2. Do not think of renouncing your inclination toward the flesh if your mind is still occupied with what is proper to the flesh.

3. Just as sensation and the sensory are proper to the flesh, so the mind and the intellectual are proper to the soul!

4. Turn your soul away from the senses and the sensory, and your mind will dwell in God and be occupied with spiritual matters.

5. Intellectual beings, which are known by the mind alone, are akin to the Divine; but the senses and sensory things are created to serve the mind.

6. Let the senses and sensory things serve you for spiritual contemplation, not for the gratification of the flesh's lusts.
7. You are commanded to "put to death the deeds of the flesh" so that, through arduous struggles, you may resurrect the soul that has been deadened by the pleasures of the flesh.
8. Be ruled by God, and rule over your senses; and, being superior, do not allow that which is inferior to you to have power over you.
9. God is eternal, infinite, and boundless, and He has promised eternal, infinite, and ineffable blessings to those who obey Him.
10. It is the nature of the mind to dwell in God and to reflect upon Him, as well as upon His providence and His terrible judgments.
11. You have the power to lean toward one thing or another, but stand on the side of what is better, and you will subdue what is worse.
12. The senses and the sensible are good, as creations of the good God; yet they cannot in any way be compared to the mind and the intellectual.
13. God created the rational and intellectual nature capable of knowing all things and God Himself, and He produced the senses and the sensory realm for the purpose of serving this end.
14. Just as it is inappropriate for a slave who is not bound to subjugate a benevolent master, so it is inappropriate for the rational mind to submit to the mortal body.
15. A mind that does not rule over the senses falls into sin through them: for, being beguiled by sensual pleasures, it usually gives rise to debauchery.
16. Keeping the senses under your control, lock away your memory securely as well; for first the impressions received through the senses, and then the recollection of them, set the passions in motion once more.
17. Exhaust your body and pray more often—and you will soon be rid of prejudiced thoughts.
18. Study the divine words unceasingly; for diligent practice in this eradicates the passions.
19. Reading, vigil, prayer, and psalm-singing free the mind from wandering after things of the passions.
20. Just as spring stirs plants to life, so too does dispassion stir the mind toward the knowledge of the One Who Is.
21. Keep the commandments, and you will find peace; love God, and you will attain knowledge.
22. Through labor and the sweat of your brow, you are condemned to eat the bread of knowledge.
23. Negligence led our forefather to fall, and instead of the consolations of paradise, it condemned him to death.
24. Command your own Eve, too, to guard against the serpent; lest, having been beguiled by him, she offer you the forbidden fruit.
25. Just as the soul naturally gives life to the body, so virtue and knowledge give life to the soul.
26. A mind that fancies itself wise is a cloud without water, carried by the winds of vanity and pride.
27. As you abstain from vanity, beware also of fornication, lest, in avoiding honors, you fall into dishonor.
28. While avoiding vanity, look to God, lest you otherwise fall into conceit or immorality.
29. It is characteristic of vanity to act for show; and of pride—to belittle others and to be angry.
30. As you avoid gluttony, guard against seeking the approval of others, and against feigning a cheerful countenance to appear hypocritical.
31. Fasting is beautiful when it delights in eating little and is content with meager fare, while also avoiding the desire to please others.
32. When fasting until evening, do not eat your fill, lest you end up rebuilding what you have just destroyed.
33. When abstaining from wine, do not drink too much water either; for otherwise, you will still be providing fuel for immorality.
34. Pride causes one to turn away from God's help, to trust in oneself, and to exalt oneself above others.
35. There are two remedies against pride; if one does not make use of them, he will encounter, unwillingly, a third that is very severe.
36. Pride is driven away by prayer with tears, by not belittling anyone, and by involuntary sorrows.

37. Discipline through trials is a spiritual rod that teaches humility to those who are puffed up in their folly.
38. It is wise not to yield to the thoughts of one who secretly slanders a neighbor.
39. Just as a gardener who fails to pull up weeds allows them to choke the vegetables, so a mind that fails to purify its thoughts ruins the fruits of ascetic labor.
40. A wise man is one who heeds counsel, especially when that counsel is offered by a spiritual father in accordance with God's will.
41. One who is enslaved by passions cannot even understand counsel and is utterly incapable of submitting to spiritual guidance.
42. One who does not accept counsel does not walk in the right paths, but is always swept along by rapids and into abysses.
43. A monk is a mind that has renounced the sensual and does not even allow itself to entertain lustful thoughts.
44. A healer is a mind that has healed itself and, through that very healing, heals others.
45. Seek virtue, and then strive not to lose it, lest you live in shame and die without mercy.
46. Our Lord Jesus Christ has granted light to all, but those who do not believe in Him keep themselves in darkness.
47. Do not consider the loss of virtue a small matter; through it, death entered the world.
48. Obedient fulfillment of the commandments is the resurrection of the dead; for life is the natural consequence of virtue.
49. The death of the body necessarily follows the death of the mind through transgression of the commandment.
50. Just as Adam, having transgressed the commandment, fell into death, so the Savior, having been obedient, put death to death.
51. Put sin to death, lest you rise again as a dead person and pass from the lesser death to the greater.
52. Because of Adam's transgression, the Savior became incarnate to fulfill the oath and raise all to life.
53. Whoever has put the passions to death and freed himself from ignorance passes from this life into eternal life.
54. By studying the Scriptures, you will find the commandments; and by fulfilling what is written, you will be freed from the passions.
55. Keeping the commandments purifies the soul, and the purification of the soul makes it a partaker of the light.
56. The tree of life is the knowledge of God; by partaking of Him, one becomes pure and remains immortal.
57. The beginning of an active life is faith in Christ, and its end is love for God.
58. Jesus Christ is our Lord and God, who has granted us faith in Him so that we may receive eternal life.
59. He appeared to us, uniting the Godhead with soul and body, so that, as God, He might deliver both soul and body from death.
60. We cultivate faith in order to attain love, from which the light of knowledge is born.
61. The following will result from the pursuit of faith: the fear of God, abstinence from pleasures, endurance of hardships, hope in God, dispassion, and love.
62. From sincere love comes knowledge of nature; and after that comes the fulfillment of the highest desires, that is, the grace of theology.
63. The mind that restrains the passions certainly restrains them by the power of the fear of God, believing in God and in what He has threatened and promised.
64. Of those to whom faith is granted, self-restraint is required; once established, this gives rise to patience, which sustains the habit of diligence.
65. The mark of patience is a love for labor; relying on this, the mind embraces the hope that it will obtain what has been promised and avoid what has been threatened.
66. The anticipation of future blessings unites the mind with what is hoped for; and while remaining in this union, it forgets the blessings of the present.

67. One who has tasted what is hoped for abandons the present; for then he devotes all his desire to the latter.
68. Future blessings have been promised by God Himself, and the believer longs for the future as if it were the present.
69. A sign that the mind dwells in the hoped-for blessings is when it strives to establish within itself a complete forgetfulness of earthly things and expands in the knowledge of future blessings.
70. The truth is good, which God of truth teaches, confirming it from every side to the God-loving soul.
71. The blessings prepared for the heirs of the promise are eternal, existing before all ages, and transcending both mind and word.
72. Let us conform ourselves to the rules of piety, so that, having strayed into passions, we may not fall away from hope.
73. Jesus Christ is the One of the Holy Trinity, and it is He with whom you are to be a co-heir.
74. Having been taught by God the knowledge of what exists, one will have no difficulty believing the Scriptures regarding what is foretold in them.
75. The Holy Spirit, finding the mind stripped of passions, accordingly secretly leads it into the knowledge of what is hoped for.
76. In accordance with the purification of the mind, the soul is also guided toward the knowledge of the divine words.
77. One who has brought his body into proper order and who practices divine knowledge is, by this very knowledge, purified more and more.
78. The mind, beginning to contemplate divine matters, starts with faith, and then, moving and progressing among these matters, returns once more to faith—but to a higher one.
79. It is observed that fear follows the beginning of this contemplation, while love precedes its end.
80. The mind, beginning to contemplate from a faith that is attentive (or that understands what to believe), attains in theology that which extends beyond the limits of all reason—defined by an unforgettable faith (always present in consciousness, abiding immovably within it) and by the contemplation of the hidden.
81. The words about God spoken by our holy and blessed Fathers are not to be understood as being in accordance with Him (corresponding to His essence and majesty), but as being about Him (revealing Him to us to the extent that our minds can comprehend).
82. All words, whether affirmative or negative, are understood to refer to Him, that is, to God.
83. Thus, “being,” “Divinity,” “grace,” and other such terms are used in the affirmative; while “beginningless,” “boundless,” “invisible,” and the like are used in the negative.
84. Since there is one nature, transcending all understanding and speech, and one hidden Divinity of the Holy Trinity, everything that is spoken of and contemplated concerning It is spoken of and contemplated collectively.
85. Just as the Holy Trinity is believed to be one Godhead, so too are the three Persons of the one Godhead confessed.
86. The positive and negative attributes mentioned above are generally applied to the entire Holy and consubstantial Trinity, with the exception of personal attributes, some of which are positive and others negative.
87. The personal attributes of the Divine Hypostases are—fatherhood, sonship, and procession—and others properly attributed to the Persons.
88. A Hypostasis is defined by the nature together with its personal attributes; thus, each Hypostasis possesses both what is common to the nature as a whole and what is proper to the Hypostasis itself.
89. Among the attributes common to the entire Holy Trinity, the negative ones are considered the most important; but this is not the case with regard to the personal attributes. For among these, as has already been said, some are positive and others are negative—such as, for example, unbegottenness and begottenness, and the like. “Unbegottenness” differs from “begottenness” in meaning: for “unbegottenness” denotes the Father, while “begottenness” denotes the Son.
90. Terms and names are used to clarify what is contemplated concerning the nature of the Holy Trinity, as stated (see ch. 81); but not concerning the essence of the nature: for what pertains to it is unknowable to the mind and inexpressible in words, but known to the One Trinity.

91. Just as the single nature of the Godhead is called Triune, so the Holy Trinity is confessed to be consubstantial.

92. The Father is contemplated as both without beginning and as the beginning—without beginning, as the Unbegotten, and as the beginning, as the Father of the Son and the Source of the Holy Spirit, Who eternally exist from Him and in Him.

93. The One, moving toward the Trinity, remains the One; and the Trinity, reducing itself to the One, remains the Trinity. This is truly wondrous!

94. The Son and the Holy Spirit are confessed not to be without beginning, yet to be eternal: not without beginning, in that they are related to the Father as the beginning and source; and eternal, in that one is begotten from eternity and the other proceeds from eternity, existing with the Father.

95. The indivisible, single Divinity of the Trinity is always rightly contemplated, and the three distinct hypostases of the one Divinity are always rightly confessed.

96. The personal attributes are: of the Father, being unbegotten; of the Son, being begotten; and of the Holy Spirit, proceeding. The origin of the Son and the Holy Spirit is confessed as timeless. For just as light comes from the Sun and is in the Sun, so too do They have eternal existence from the Eternal One and in the Eternal One.

97. The personal attributes of the hypostases are always contemplated as immutable and unchanging, while the common nature, or Divinity, is contemplated as indivisible.

98. We confess the One in the Trinity and the Trinity in the One as indivisibly divided and separately united.

99. A single principle is contemplated in the Godhead—the Father—the source of the Son and the Spirit, as their Parent and: the eternal source of the co-eternal, the boundless source of the co-boundless; and these three are consubstantial and indivisible. The Creator of all things—the Provider and Judge—is the Triune God: the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit. For it is said that from Him, through Him, and in Him are all things: to Him be glory forever. Amen (Rom. 11:36).

100. We confess the Son and the Holy Spirit to be co-eternal with the Father and co-begun, in that, being eternal and without beginning, they derive their existence—and their origin—from Him and in Him. They are eternally with the Father and in the Father, and the Father is eternally with Them. There has never been a moment when the Father was without Them, nor They without Him. Such is the nature of God—one in essence and three in persons—to whom be glory and power forever and ever. Amen.

St. Theodore, Bishop of Edessa

A Brief Account of Him

The son of prayerful and visionary parents, residents of Edessa, Theodore showed no aptitude for learning when he began his studies, but prayed to God for the revelation of meaning. Once, he hid beneath the Holy Table during the Liturgy, and a certain young man, having fed him honey, instilled in him a love for solitude. The presiding bishop, upon learning of this, ordained Theodore as a reader, and he remained at the monastery, where he easily and freely studied the sciences of the time under the guidance of his mentor, Sophronius. At the age of 18, having lost his parents, he distributed his estate, setting aside only a portion for his sister, and at the age of 20 he withdrew to the monastery of St. Savvas, near Jerusalem, where he spent 12 years in the communal quarters and 24 years in seclusion. He was called out of this seclusion by decree of the Patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem and ordained as Bishop of Edessa (), to which he then traveled. Upon arriving in Edessa, he devoted all his energies to the welfare of the Church and the faithful; but his efforts encountered great obstacles from the Muslims, the rulers of the city, and the heretics who filled it. Seeing that his efforts were in vain and that his life was even in danger, St. Theodore went to Baghdad to the Caliph Mawiya to seek his favor. After healing the caliph of his illness, he persuaded him to issue orders to the rulers of Cilicia, Syria, and Mesopotamia to return the property of the Church of Edessa to it and not to prevent people from converting to Orthodoxy. Upon returning to Edessa, he was joyfully received by the Orthodox flock, which subsequently grew through the conversion of heretics and was beneficently guided by this zealous shepherd, who was divinely inspired. Foreseeing the approach of death and wishing to rest in his former secluded cell, St. Theodore set out for Palestine, where, at the site of his ascetic labors, he soon passed away on the 9th day of July, the date on which his memory is commemorated. At that time, Michael reigned in Constantinople with his mother Theodora—the 9th century. The one hundred soul-saving chapters presented here were composed by him at the request of the elders of the monastery while he was still in seclusion. The compilers of Greek Philanthropy write of them: “We cannot say with certainty whether St. Theodore left any other writings. However, we include these one hundred chapters, which he laboriously compiled, among the other patristic writings on sobriety; for they aptly depict the matter of sacred sobriety and can therefore bring rich spiritual benefit to those who read them with due attention.”

One Hundred Most Beneficial Chapters by Our Venerable Father Theodore of Edessa

1. Since, by the grace of the good God, having renounced Satan and his works, we have been united to Christ—as in the beginning in the font of rebirth, so now again in monastic vows—let us keep His commandments. This is required of us not only by our solemn vow, but also by our natural duty; for, having been created by God from the beginning “very good,” we must remain so. Although sin, arising from our inattention, has produced within us that which is unnatural to us; yet, through the abundant mercy of our great God, we have been called again, renewed by the passion of the Passionless One, and redeemed by the blood of Christ the Lord, thus being delivered from the ancient transgression of our forefathers. Therefore, if we become righteous, there will be nothing great in this; but it will be all the more worthy of pity and condemnation if we fall away from righteousness.

2. Just as a good deed, when done without true faith, is entirely dead and ineffective, so too does faith alone, without righteous deeds, not deliver us from eternal fire. For “Whoever loves Me,” says the Lord, “will keep My commandments” (John 14:23). Therefore, if we love the Lord and believe in Him, we will bear witness to this by keeping His commandments, so that we may obtain eternal life. But if we despise the observance of His commandments—to which all creation submits—how can we call ourselves faithful, we who are more honored than any creature, yet are the only ones among them who disobey the commands of the Creator and prove ungrateful to our Benefactor?

3. By keeping Christ’s commandments, we give Him nothing—for He lacks nothing and is the Giver of all good things—but we benefit ourselves, earning eternal life and the enjoyment of unspeakable blessings.

4. Anyone who opposes us in the fulfillment of God’s commandments—be it a father, a mother, or anyone else—is detestable and hateful to us, lest we hear: “Whoever loves father or mother more than Me, or anyone else among men, is not worthy of Me” (Matt. 10:37).

5. Let us therefore bind ourselves with all our might to the fulfillment of the Lord’s commandments, lest we be bound by the unbreakable bonds of evil desires and sensual pleasures; for in that case, the judgment concerning the barren fig tree will be pronounced upon us as well, saying, “Cut it down; why should it use up the soil?” (Luke 13:7). For, He says, “everyone who does not bear good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire” (Luke 3:9).

6. One who is overcome by lusts and pleasures, and who turns to the world, will soon fall into the snares of sin; and sin, once committed, is like fire in a reed bed, like a stone rolling down a mountain, like a stream swelling as tributaries flow into it. So it is; and every sin destroys the one who commits it.

7. Through sin, the soul departs from its natural order, and, becoming wild because of this and filled with the thorns of sinful pleasures, it becomes a dwelling place for fearsome beasts, as it is said: “There the onocentavres rest; there the hedgehog makes its nest, and demons meet with the onocentavres” (Isa. 34: 14–15)—which are various sinful passions. But when it calls itself back to its natural order (for it can do so, if it wills, while still bound to the flesh), it will subdue itself through diligent self-discipline and begin to live according to God’s law; then the beasts that had previously taken up residence within her will flee, and the Angels, the guardians of our lives, will arrive, making the day of her conversion a day of joy and gladness; then the grace of the Holy Spirit will come upon her, teaching her how not only to preserve herself in goodness—but also to prosper even more in it.

8. The Fathers call prayer a spiritual stronghold, without which we cannot go out to battle, lest we be wounded by the enemy’s spears and led away to their land. But no one can attain effective, pure prayer unless he sits before God with a righteous heart; for God is the One who grants prayer to the one who prays and instructs man in wisdom.

9. The fact that passions trouble the soul and attack it is beyond our control; but the fact that passionate thoughts linger within us and stir up the passions is within our control. The former is sinless, since it lies beyond our control; but the latter, if we courageously resist and overcome it, brings us crowns, and if, by yielding, we are defeated, subjects us to torment.

10. There are three principal passions: lust for pleasure, love of money, and love of glory. These are followed by five other spirits of malice; and from these, ultimately, a great multitude of passions and all manner of diverse sinful inclinations are born. That is why whoever overcomes the first three rulers and leaders of the passions thereby also overthrows the five passions that follow them, and then subdues all the passions.

11. Whatever we have done out of passion is what stirs the soul through passionate memories. But when passionate memories are completely erased from the heart, to the point that they no longer even approach it, this serves as a sign of the forgiveness of past sins. For as long as the soul is passionately attached to anything sinful, one must acknowledge that the dominion of sin still resides within it.

12. Carnal and materialistic passions are usually diminished and withered away by bodily sufferings (voluntary privations and bodily ascetic practices); while spiritual and invisible passions are destroyed by humility, meekness, and love.

13. Passionate lust is subdued by abstinence combined with humility; burning anger is tamed by love; and a wandering mind is focused by diligent prayer, with remembrance of God. Thus are all three parts of the soul purified. It was with a view to correcting these that the Divine Apostle said: “Pursue peace and holiness, without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14).

14. Some are perplexed as to which comes first—whether thoughts set the passions in motion, or the passions set thoughts in motion—since some say one thing and others say the other. I, however, say that thoughts are set in motion by the passions: for if there were no passions in the soul, passionate thoughts would not trouble it.

15. It is the custom of the demons who are always at war with us to place obstacles in the way of virtues that are within our power and easy to practice, while instilling a strong desire for those that are beyond our power and untimely (which it is not yet time for us to undertake); specifically: they compel those who are succeeding in communal obedience to perform the deeds of the silent ones; and they instill in the silent ones and hermits the desire to adhere to the rules of communal life. In the same way, they act with regard to every virtue. But let us “not be ignorant of their schemes” (2 Cor. 2:11), knowing that everything done in its own time and in its proper measure is good, while everything excessive and untimely is harmful.

16. Those who move about in the world and encounter objects of passion are assailed by demons, who draw them into passionate deeds; but those who live in the desert, where such objects are absent, are troubled by passionate thoughts. In this second form of battle, it is far more difficult to achieve victory than in the first. There, the task requires time, place, and other conveniences; the mind, however, is easily swayed and uncontrollable in its thoughts. To combat this invisible battle, we have been given pure prayer, in which we have been commanded to abide unceasingly. It makes the mind strong in battle and always ready for it, since it can be performed without the involvement of the body.

17. Pointing to the complete mortification of the passions, the Apostle says: “Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5:24). For when we put the passions to death, destroy lusts, and subject the thoughts of the flesh to the Spirit—only then do we take up the cross and follow Christ. And withdrawal from the world is nothing other than this putting to death of the passions and the manifestation of the life hidden in Christ.

18. Those who suffer from the rebellions of this mortal body and are weary from its almost constant warfare should not blame the flesh for this, but themselves; for if they did not give it strength, extending their care for it to the point of lust, they would not suffer so much from it. Or do they not see those who have crucified their flesh with its passions and lusts and bear the likeness of Jesus’ death in their own mortal flesh—how they have it as a helper, especially in good deeds—not as an adversary, but as one that is submissive and guided by God’s law? Let them do the same, and then they too will taste such peace.

19. Any association of thought with any forbidden lust, or any inclination toward lustful pleasure, is sinful for a monk. For at first the thought begins to cloud the mind with its covetous nature; then the soul inclines toward sinful pleasure, unable to withstand the struggle; and finally, a union takes place, which, as has been said, is sin. If this continues, a passionate attraction arises from it, which little by little leads to the sinful act itself. For this very reason, the Prophet praises those who smash the infants of Babylon against the rock (Ps. 136: 9). The meaning of this is clear to the wise and discerning.

20. Angels, being ministers of love and peace, rejoice in our repentance and progress in virtue; therefore, they strive to fill us with spiritual contemplations and assist us in every good deed. On the contrary, demons, servants of wrath and malice, rejoice when virtue is diminished, and direct all their efforts toward luring our souls into shameful fantasies.

21. Faith is a virtue that fosters a good disposition; it instills in us the fear of God; and the fear of God teaches us to keep the commandments, or to lead a good and active life; from an active life springs true dispassion; and the fruit of dispassion is love, which is the fulfillment of all the commandments, binding and holding them all together

22. Just as a healthy body senses the illness that seizes it; but one who does not recognize this suffers from insensitivity: so too the mind, insofar as it retains its full natural activity, is aware of its own powers and sees from where the more tyrannical passions assail it, directing a more urgent resistance against that part. But its condition is dire if it spends its days in insensitivity, like one fighting an enemy at night, since it does not see the enemy's intentions.

23. When our mental power is unwaveringly devoted to the contemplation of virtues, and when the desiring power is directed solely toward them and toward their Giver, Christ the Lord, while the irascible power arms itself against the demons—then our powers act in accordance with their nature.

24. According to St. Gregory the Theologian, the rational soul is tripartite. He called the virtue of the intellectual power prudence, knowledge, and wisdom; the virtue of the irascible power—courage and patience; and the virtue of the appetitive power—love, chastity, and self-restraint; Yet truth has a part in all of them, teaching us to act properly. Through prudence, it wages war against hostile angels, defending the virtues; through chastity, it views things dispassionately; through love, it compels us to love all people as ourselves; through self-restraint, it cuts off all sensual pleasures; and through courage and patience, it arms itself against invisible battles. Such is the melodious harmony of the soul's organ.

25. Let him who strives for chastity and longs for blessed purity—which no one would err in calling dispassion—mercilessly chastise and subdue the flesh, invoking divine grace with a humble mind—and he will receive what he desires. But whoever indulges the body without restraint in eating and drinking will be tormented by the spirit of fornication. For just as a great quantity of water extinguishes a flame, so hunger and thirst—or, in general, any form of self-restraint combined with humility of soul—destroy the inflamed desires of the flesh and shameful fantasies.

26. Let the passion of resentment depart completely from your soul; and by no means give place to enmity within yourself. For just as fire is hidden in straw, so is resentment lurking in the heart. But rather, pray fervently for the one who has offended you and do him good, as much and in whatever way you can, so that you may save your soul from death and not be presumptuous during your prayer.

27. The Lord rests in the souls of the humble, but in the hearts of the proud dwell the passions of wickedness; for nothing strengthens them against us as much as haughty thoughts; and, conversely, nothing so effectively uproots these former evils from the soul as blessed humility, which is rightly called the slayer of passions.

28. May your soul be purified more and more from evil memories, and may it be enlightened by the best of thoughts, always keeping in mind what has been said—that at the hour of departure, a heart given to sensual pleasures is a prison and a set of chains, while a diligent heart is an open door. For truly, when pure souls depart from the body, angels accompany them, guiding them to a blessed life; but souls that have been defiled and have not been purified by repentance are snatched away—alas for me!—by demons.

29. A head adorned with a precious diadem, sparkling with Indian gems and pearls, is beautiful; but incomparably more beautiful is the soul, rich in the knowledge of God, radiant with luminous contemplations, and having the All-Holy Spirit dwelling within it. And who can worthily describe such a blessed soul in words!

30. Do not allow anger and fury to take root in your soul; for “a hot-tempered man is not honorable” (Prov. 11:25); “but in the heart of the meek rests wisdom” (Prov. 14:33). If the passion of anger takes hold of your soul, those who live in the world will be found better than you, and you will be covered with shame, having proved yourself unworthy as a monk.

31. In every temptation and in every battle, let prayer be your invincible weapon—and you will triumph through the grace of Christ. But let it be pure, as our wise Teacher commands us, saying: “I want men everywhere to pray, lifting up holy hands without anger or disputing” (1 Tim. 2: 8).—Whoever neglects such prayer will be given over to temptations and passions.

32. It is written, “Wine gladdens the heart of man” (Ps. 103:15). But you, who have vowed to weep and mourn, turn away from such merriment—and you will be gladdened by spiritual gifts. If, however, you take pleasure in wine, you will spend your life in the company of shameful thoughts, and you will endure many sorrows.

33. Do not spend the feasts in drunkenness, but in renewal of the mind and purity of soul. For by filling your belly with feasting and wine, you will provoke the wrath of the One to whom the feast is dedicated.

34. We are commanded to stay awake in psalm-singing, prayer, and Scripture reading at all times, but especially on feast days. A monk who stays awake refines his mind for soul-nourishing contemplation, while excessive sleep dulls the mind. But be careful not to indulge in idle memories or sinful thoughts during your vigil; for it is better to sleep than to stay awake for the sake of such vanities and to defile yourself with unworthy pursuits.

35. Both the one who nurtures a serpent in his bosom and the one who harbors a wicked thought in his heart will be put to death: the former by being struck in the body by a poisonous sting, and the latter by having injected deadly poison (of thought) into his soul. But just as we swiftly slay the offspring of vipers, so too will we not allow evil thoughts to take root in our hearts, lest we suffer bitterly from them later.

36. A pure soul—a chosen vessel—can rightly be called “a sealed garden, a spring sealed up” (Song of Songs 4:12) and “the seat of understanding” (Proverbs 12:23). But a soul defiled by impure passions is filled with the stench of sin.

37. I have heard from experienced and active elders that sinful thoughts in the soul arise from vanity in clothing, overindulgence of the belly, and harmful conversations.

38. Let the desire for possessions not take root in the souls of ascetics. A monk who is greedy for possessions is like a leaky ship, tossed about by the waves of anxiety and plunged into the depths of sorrow. The disease of the love of money, which gives rise to many passions, is rightly called the root of all evil (1 Tim. 6:10).

39. Detachment from worldly possessions and silence are a treasure hidden in the field of monastic life. Go, then, sell everything you have and give it to the poor, and with that you will buy the field; after digging it up and finding the treasure, guard it carefully within yourself from theft, so that you may be enriched with wealth that cannot be stolen.

40. Once you have begun to live with your spiritual father and have experienced the benefit he brings, do not allow anyone to turn you away from your love for him or from living with him; do not condemn him in any way; do not speak ill of him, even if he rebukes you or even strikes you; do not lend an ear when someone else slanders him; and by no means associate with those who revile him, lest the Lord be angered against you and blot you out of the book of life.

41. The feat of obedience is founded on self-denial and renunciation of all things, as we have learned. Let the one who undertakes it fortify himself with three bulwarks: faith, hope, and pure and divine love, so that, being protected by them, he may successfully strive in this good feat and receive the crown of righteousness.

42. Do not be a judge of your father’s deeds, but a doer of his commandments. The demons, as is their custom, will begin to point out his faults to you, in order to deafen your ears to his teachings, and thereby either make you a weak and fearful warrior in battle, or, through mere thoughts of unbelief, weaken you and make you indolent toward every form of virtue.

43. He who does not heed his father’s commandments proves himself a transgressor of the very best points of his vow. But he who has instilled obedience within himself and cut off his own will with the sword of obedience has fulfilled what is due of him—what he promised to Christ the Lord before many witnesses.

44. Observing the monks, we have clearly seen and confirmed that the enemies of our life—the demons—vehemently rage against the fathers who strive in obedience, gnashing their teeth at them and devising all manner of malicious schemes against them. And what do they not do, what do they not suggest, to tear them away from their fathers’ bosom? They present pretexts for disobedience, as if they were blessings; they create discontent; they stir up animosity toward the father; they portray his instructions as reproaches, and these reproaches, like sharp arrows, pierce the heart. “And why,” they say, “have you, being free, become a slave—and a slave to a heartless despot?” “How long will you bear the yoke of slavery, never seeing the light of freedom?”—After this, they suggest: “You would be better off practicing hospitality, visiting the sick, and caring for the poor.” Then they extol the virtue of complete seclusion and silence; and they sow all manner of evil weeds into the heart of the devout ascetic, just to cast him out of his father's spiritual enclosure and, having pulled him from his peaceful harbor, cast him into the sea, where a storm of the soul rages wildly. If they finally succeed in this, they take him into their power and, like a captive, force him to act according to their evil desires.

45. Do not, therefore, lose sight of the wickedness of your enemies and adversaries while remaining obedient to your spiritual father, and do not forget the vows of your calling before God: do not let yourself be overcome by insults, nor fear reproaches, revilements, or mockery; do not be led astray by the temptations of sinful thoughts; do not flee from a father's sternness; and do not dishonor the blessed yoke of humility through insolent self-indulgence and self-will; but, having laid the Lord's word in your heart: "Whoever endures to the end will be saved" (Matt. 10:22). "Run with endurance the race set before you, looking to Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith" (Heb. 12:1–2).

46. Just as a goldsmith, by placing gold in the crucible, refines it to its purest state, so too does the novice monk, who devotes himself to the struggles of submission to the will of his fathers and is refined by all the sorrows of a God-fearing life, learning obedience through toil and great patience, purge himself of all bad habits and become filled with humility, becomes entirely radiant, and worthy of heavenly treasures, a life free from sorrow, and a blessed abode, from which sorrow and sighing have fled and where unceasing joy and gladness are planted.

47. True and deeply rooted faith gives birth to the fear of God; and the fear of God teaches us to keep the commandments: for, as it is said, where there is fear, there is observance of the commandments; and in the observance of the commandments lies active virtue, which is the beginning of contemplation; and the fruit of all this is dispassion; through dispassion, love is established within us; and the beloved disciple speaks of love: "God is love, and whoever abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him" (1 John 4:16).

48. How truly beautiful and good is the monastic life! How truly beautiful and good it is when it flows within the bounds and according to the laws established for it by its founders and leaders, who were instructed by the Holy Spirit. For a soldier of Christ ought to be unworldly (possessing nothing), unburdened by any worldly plans or affairs, as the Apostle says: "No one serving as a soldier gets entangled in civilian affairs, but strives to please the one who commissioned him" (2 Tim. 2:4).

49. It is fitting, therefore, for a monk to be unworldly, dispassionate, free from every sinful desire, not a glutton, not a drunkard, not stingy, not lazy, not covetous, not a lover of pleasure, not a lover of glory: for if anyone does not renounce all such things, he cannot properly lead this angelic life; but for those who do act in this way, it is a good yoke and a light burden, since, in such a case, divine hope makes everything easy for them. This life is pleasant, its deeds are delightful, and its blessings are a good portion that will not be taken away from the soul that has attained it.

50. Having renounced worldly cares and taken up the monastic life, do not desire wealth in order to distribute it to the poor; for this, too, is one of the deceptions of the evil one, leading to vanity, so as to plunge the mind into a multitude of troublesome cares. Let you have only bread and water; with these alone you can earn the reward of hospitality. Even if you lack these, simply by welcoming a stranger with a kind heart and offering him a word of comfort, you can thus earn the reward of hospitality. You have an example of this in the poor widow, of whom the Lord testified in the Gospel that, with her two mites, by virtue of her good will, she surpassed the alms of the rich.

51. This is said of those who live in silence. But those who are under their father's authority should keep one thing in mind: never to deviate in any way from their father's command; for by fulfilling this properly, they fulfill all that is required of them; conversely, those who deviate from the precise fulfillment of this duty will remain unskilled in every form of virtue and spiritual life.

52. Here is yet another piece of advice for you, lover of Christ: love the life of a pilgrim—that is, be like a pilgrim, a stranger to the affairs of your own country; do not be enticed by parental concerns or the affections of relatives; avoid staying in the city and sit patiently and unceasingly in the desert, saying with the Prophet: "I have fled and taken refuge in the desert" (Ps. 54:8).

53. Seek out places that are secluded and far from the world, and even if you are troubled there by a lack of basic necessities, do not be afraid; even if enemies surround you like bees or angry wasps, waging all manner of war against you and disturbing you with all sorts of thoughts, do not be afraid; do not lend them a willing ear, and do not flee from the field of battle, but rather endure everything courageously, singing to yourself and saying: “I have waited patiently for the Lord; He has heard me and answered my prayer” (Ps. 39:2). And you will see God’s greatness, His intercession, His care, and all His saving providence toward you.

54. You should have as friends those who are edifying to you and who share your way of life; for Scripture says, “Let those who are peaceful be your friends, your spiritual brothers, and holy fathers,” of whom our Lord also said: “My mother and my brothers are those who do the will of My Father in heaven” (Matt. 12:49).

55. Do not be partial to varied and expensive foods, and do not feast on them; for, as Scripture says, “she who feasts on such things,” (1 Tim. 5:6) “is dead while she lives.” And even with inexpensive foods, if possible, avoid overeating. For it is written: “Do not be enticed by the fullness of the belly” (Prov. 24:15).

56. Do not allow yourself to be outside your cell too often if you have chosen a life of silence; for this is very harmful—it robs you of grace, clouds your thoughts, and weakens your zeal. That is why it is said: “The fumes of lust corrupt a mind that is free from malice” (Wisdom of Solomon 4:12). Cut off all contact with the outside world, lest your mind become clouded and disturb the order of your silence.

57. While sitting in your cell, do not go about your tasks aimlessly, nor waste your time in idleness: for, as they say, one who travels without a purpose toils in vain. But find for yourself a good deed, and gather your mind. Always keep the hour of death before your eyes; remember the vanity of the world—how deceptive it is, and at the same time how unstable and insignificant—and reflect on the circumstances of the dreadful trial at the Last Judgment, how our bitter accusers will then visibly present our deeds, words, and thoughts, which they have stored up, and which we accepted. Bring to mind the torments of hell and how souls will be confined there. Also envision that great and dreadful day—that is, the day of the general resurrection, the standing before God, and the final judgment of the infallible Judge. Imagine the torments, shame, and the condemnation of conscience that will befall the sinners, and how they will be rejected by God and cast into eternal fire, to the worm that never dies, into impenetrable darkness, where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth; and as you survey all the other torments, do not cease, groaning, to bathe your face, your garments, and the place where you sit with tears. With such thoughts, as I have seen, many have brought upon themselves an abundance of tears and have wonderfully purified all the powers of their soul.

58. Reflect also on the blessings reserved for the righteous, their placement at Christ’s right hand, the voice of the Lord—the Master—calling them blessed, the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven, the gifts bestowed upon them that surpass understanding, that sweetest light, joy without end, unbroken by any sorrow, those heavenly dwellings where the angels dwell, and all else promised to those who fear the Lord.

59. May such thoughts remain with you at the table, accompany you to sleep, and rise with you. Take care never to forget them, but wherever you may be, do not turn your mind away from remembering them, so that evil thoughts may flee from you, and divine consolations may fill your soul. A soul that is not protected and armed with these thoughts cannot maintain silence properly; for a spring that contains no water bears that name in vain.

60. And this is the way of life prescribed for those who practice silence: fasting to the best of one’s ability, vigil, sleeping on the bare ground, and all manner of other voluntary privations, for the sake of future rest; for as Scripture says, “The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom. 8:18); especially pure, unceasing, and uninterrupted prayer: it is a strong wall, a pleasant refuge, the protection of virtues, the eradication of passions, the improvement of the soul, the purification of the mind, rest for the afflicted, and comfort for those who weep; prayer is a conversation with God, a contemplation of invisible things, and for those who long for confirmation of their truth, a communion with the angels, success in good deeds, and the confirmation of what is hoped for. Embrace this queen of virtues, O ascetic, and strive with all your strength to keep her within yourself; pray day and night, in good spirits and in distress; pray with fear and trembling, with an alert and sober mind, so that your prayer may be pleasing to the Lord: for Scripture says: “The eyes of the Lord are on the righteous, and His ears are open to their prayer” (Ps. 33: 16).

61. One of the ancients said very truthfully and appropriately that, of the demons who oppose us, the first to enter the fray are those entrusted with gluttonous desires, who instill the love of money and incline us toward vanity; while all the others, following behind them, carry off those wounded by them.

62. And indeed, upon closer examination, we have come to realize that it never happens for a person to fall into any sin or any passion unless he has first been wounded by one of these three. That is why the devil then tempted the Savior with these three thoughts; but the Lord, proving Himself inaccessible to them, commanded the devil to withdraw from His presence, thereby granting us victory over him as the good and philanthropic Lord, who took on a body like ours in every way except sin, and showed us the true path to sinlessness; by following this path, we build within ourselves the new man, “renewed in the image of the One who created him” (Col. 3: 10).

63. The words of David teach us to hate demons with perfect hatred, as enemies of our salvation. And this is very helpful in the pursuit of virtue. But who, then, will be the one who hates the enemies of salvation with perfect hatred? The one who sins not only in deed but also in thought. For as long as the vessels of their love—that is, the causes of the passions—remain within us, how can hatred for them take root in us? For a heart given to sensual pleasure is powerless to nurture hatred for them within itself.

64. The wedding garment is the dispassion of the rational soul, which has withdrawn from worldly pleasures, renounced all unseemly desires, and devoted itself entirely to God-loving thoughts and the purest contemplations. But as soon as she indulges in the passions of immorality and becomes entrenched in them, she is stripped of this garment of chastity and clothed in torn and defiled rags, just as it is shown in the Gospels that the one bound hand and foot and cast into outer darkness (Matt. 22: 13), had a garment woven from such thoughts and deeds, which the Word of the Lord deemed unworthy of the divine and imperishable bridal chamber.

65. Regarding self-love, which hates everyone, one of the wise men rightly said: the fierce battle of self-love, like a certain tyrant, stands at the head of all the thoughts with which those three and those five captivate our mind.

66. It would be remarkable if anyone, always satiating himself to the full with delicacies, were able to attain dispassion. By dispassion, however, I do not mean abstaining from sin in deed—for that is self-restraint—but rather, when one has completely cut off the very arising of passionate thoughts from the heart—which is also called purity of heart.

67. It is easier to purify an impure soul than to restore to health one that has been purified but has once again been wounded by the passions; for those who have only just cast off worldly bonds—no matter what sins they may happen to fall into—find it easier to attain dispassion; but for those who “tasted the good word of God” (Heb. 6:5) and have already walked the path of salvation, only to stray back into sin, the path to dispassion is blocked by obstacles that are almost insurmountable. This is due to an established habit of sin and a deep-rooted inclination toward sin, but no less so because the demon of habitual sin, swirling before the eyes of the mind, ceaselessly presents images of that sin. Nevertheless, a zealous and diligent soul will readily accomplish even this most difficult task, with the assistance of God’s grace—which is loving and long-suffering toward us, calling us to repentance, and receiving those who return with inexpressible abundance of mercy—as we learn from the parable of the prodigal son in the Gospels.

68. None of us can, by our own strength, escape the wiles and schemes of the evil one, but only through the invincible power of Christ. Therefore, those who dream of abolishing sin—which is abolished by God’s grace alone—through their own deeds and the strength of their will are dangerously mistaken. For this reason, John Chrysostom, the luminary of the Church, says that human effort alone is insufficient unless it is accompanied by help from above; and again, help from above will be of no use unless it is accompanied by one’s own effort. Both Judas and Peter exemplify these two aspects: the former, having received so much from grace, derived no benefit from it because he did not apply his own will or contribute his own effort; and Peter, though he showed zealous readiness, fell because he did not receive help from above. It is thus evident that virtue is woven from both of these. Therefore, I ask that, just as we entrust everything to God and do not slumber ourselves, so too, while striving with zeal, we should not think to set everything right through our own efforts.

69. God does not want us to see Him as doing nothing—which is why He does not do everything Himself—nor does He want us to think too highly of ourselves—which is why He has not entrusted everything to our will and our efforts; but by removing what is harmful from both sides, He has left what is beneficial. The Psalmist also teaches us well, saying: “Unless the Lord builds the city, those who build it labor in vain” (Ps. 126: 1). Nor is it possible to “tread upon the asp and the basilisk, and trample the lion and the serpent” (Ps. 90:13) unless one has first purified oneself as much as human strength allows and received the power to do so from Him who said to the Apostles: “I give you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy” (Luke 10:19). That is why we are commanded to implore the Heavenly Father in prayer: “Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one” (Matthew 6:13). For if, without Christ’s strength and help, we do not deliver ourselves from the fiery darts of the evil one and do not attain to dispassion, then we labor in vain, hoping to accomplish anything worthy through our own strength or zeal. Therefore, whoever desires to stand firm against the devil's wiles and render them ineffective, and to become a partaker of divine glory, must, with tears and sighs, with an insatiable desire and a fervent soul, seek God's help and divine intercession night and day. But whoever wishes to receive these things must purify his soul from every worldly pleasure and from all passions and lusts. For it is of such souls that God says: "I will dwell in them and walk among them" (2 Cor. 6:16), and the Lord said to His disciples: "Whoever loves Me will keep My commandments, and My Father will love him, and We will come to him and make Our home with him" (John 14:23).

70. One of the ancients spoke a most wise and beneficial word concerning thoughts, saying: Examine your thoughts at the threshold of the heart (as they enter it)—whether they are our own or from the adversary; and those that are our own and good, bring them into the innermost treasury of the soul and keep them there, as in an inviolable treasury, but those that are hostile, after chastising them with the scourges of sound reasoning, drive them out immediately, giving them no rest or place even in the vicinity of your soul; or better yet, strike them down entirely with the sword of prayer and the most divine teaching, so that through such an extermination, the fear of thieves may fall upon their very leader as well. Know that whoever so thoroughly purifies his thoughts becomes a true zealous defender of the commandments.

71. Let the one who strives to cut off the thoughts and impulses that battle and disturb him rally more allies and fellow warriors and draw them close to himself for a joint struggle; —namely, humility of soul, bodily labor, and every other form of ascetic self-denial, and especially prayer from a contrite heart with many tears, as David sings: "Behold my humility and my labor, and forgive all my sins" (Ps. 24: 18) and: "Do not ignore my tears, O Lord" (Ps. 38: 13), and again: "My tears have been my bread day and night" (Ps. 41: 4). Again: "I have mixed my drink with weeping" (Ps. 101:10).

72. The devil, the adversary of our lives, uses various thoughts to belittle our sins and often covers them with forgetfulness, so that we may slacken in our efforts and no longer think to mourn our failings. But we, brothers, will not allow ourselves to forget our failings, even if it seems they have already been forgiven through our repentance; rather, we will always remember our sins and never cease to mourn them, so that, having acquired humility as a faithful companion, we may avoid the snares of vanity and pride.

73. Let no one think he can bear the labors and succeed in virtue by his own strength; for the source of all that is good for us is God, just as the source of all that is evil is the deceiver of our souls—the devil. Therefore, when you do something good, give thanks to the source of it; and when something evil befalls you, attribute it to the ruler of such things.

74. He who combines knowledge with corresponding action is a praiseworthy spiritual cultivator, watering the field of the soul from these two most delightful sources. In this way, knowledge inspires the mind with the contemplation of what is best, while the action corresponding to it puts to death "the members that are on the earth: fornication, impurity, passion, and evil desire" (Col. 3: 5). When these are put to death, then the beautiful flowers of virtue bloom, bearing abundant spiritual fruit—"love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control" (Gal. 5: 22–23). Then, at last, this chaste worker, having crucified "the flesh with its passions and desires," will say with the God-bearing preacher: "It is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me; and the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself up for me" (Gal. 2: 20).

75. And here is something else that must not be hidden from you, lover of Christ: when a single passion finds a place within you and takes root to the point of habit, it brings other passions into the same house; for although the passions compete against one another, just as do their instigators, the demons, they all seek our ruin in unison.

76. The bloom of the flesh, which is made to wither by ascetic struggles and whose every desire is cut off—this is the one who "bears the marks of Christ the Lord on his mortal body" (Gal. 6:17).

77. The end of ascetic labors is the peace of dispassion, while the end of the flesh's various comforts is the passions of dishonor.

78. Do not allow yourself to consider the length of your monastic life a worthy achievement, and do not be caught up in self-praise because of your long sojourn in the desert and your patient endurance of harsh ascetic struggles there, but keep the Lord's word in mind: that you are still an unfree servant and have not yet fulfilled the commandments of your Master. And indeed, as long as we remain in this present life, we have not yet been called back from exile, but still sit by the rivers of Babylon, still suffer under the yoke of Egyptian bondage, and have not yet seen the Promised Land: for we have not yet cast off the old man, who smolders with alluring lusts; we have not yet been clothed in the image of the heavenly one; we still bear the image of the earthly. Therefore, there is no room for self-praise, but we must weep, praying to the Almighty to save us from the bitter slavery of Pharaoh, to deliver us from his fierce tyranny, and to lead us into the good land of promise, so that we may finally find rest in the Sanctuary of God, being deemed worthy to stand at the right hand of the Majesty on High. These blessings, which surpass even the greatest minds, we may be deemed worthy of not by the deeds we manage to perform in righteousness, but by God's immeasurable mercy. Let us not cease to shed tears day and night, imitating the one who said: "I am weary with my groaning; every night I wash my bed with my tears; I drench my couch with my weeping" (Ps. 6:7). For those who sow in tears will reap with joy (Ps. 125:5).

79. Drive away from yourself the spirit of loquacity, for in it lurk all manner of malicious passions: from it comes falsehood, from it comes insolence, from it comes mockery, obscenity, idle talk, and much more; so that through it the saying is truly justified: "Through much talk you will not escape sin" (Prov. 10: 19).—"A man of few words is a throne of wisdom" (Prov. 12: 23). But the Lord also said that we will have to give an account for every idle word (Matt. 12: 36).

80. We have been commanded not to respond in kind to those who slander and rebuke us, or attack us in any other way—that is, not to slander in return, nor to rebuke in return, but rather to speak kindly of them and bless them. For when we live at peace with those who are not at peace, we are then at war with the demons; but when we are at enmity and at war with our brothers, we are at peace with the demons—whom we have been taught to hate with perfect hatred and to wage unceasing war against them.

81. Avoid using deceitful words to cause your neighbor to stumble, lest you yourself be made to stumble by the all-deceitful devil. For listen to what the Prophet cries out: "The Lord detests the man of blood and the flatterer" (Ps. 5: 7) and again: "The Lord will destroy all flattering lips and the tongue that speaks deceit" (Ps. 11: 4). Likewise, avoid condemning your brother when he falls, lest you fall away from kindness and love. For whoever lacks kindness and love toward his brother has not known God; for God is love, as John, the son of Thunder and Christ's beloved disciple, proclaims (1 John 4:8).—If Christ, the Savior of all, laid down His life for us, then we too must lay down our lives for our brothers (1 John 3:16).

82. Love is rightly called the mother of virtues, the head of the Law and the Prophets. Let us, then, undertake every effort until we attain that blessed love, and through it free ourselves from the tyranny of the passions, and ascend to heaven, soaring on the wings of virtue, and behold God, as far as this is possible for human nature.

83. If God is love, then whoever has love has God within himself. But when love is absent, we are of absolutely no benefit, and it is entirely impossible to say that we love God. For St. John says: "If anyone says, 'I love God,' yet hates his brother, he is a liar" (1 John 4:20), and again: "No one has ever seen God; but if we love one another, God abides in us, and His love is perfected in us" (1 John 4:12): from this it is clear that love is the highest of all the goods mentioned in Holy Scripture; – and there is not a single kind of human virtue that unites and harmonizes us with God which is not connected to love and does not proceed from it, being in some ineffable way embraced and protected by it.

84. When receiving brothers who come to us, let us not be burdened by this, nor regard it as a violation of silence, so as not to break the rule of love; nor shall we invite them as though we were doing them a favor, but rather as those who themselves receive good from them, and let us welcome them as those who are indebted to them, with a prayer of " " and a joyful countenance, as Patriarch Abraham showed us by example. Therefore, the Theologian teaches, saying: "My children, let us not love in word or speech, but in deed and in truth; and by this we know that we are of the truth" (1 John 3:18–19).

85. The Patriarch, having chosen hospitality as his constant practice, sat before his tent and invited passersby—all without distinction, even the ungodly and the barbarians—offering them a meal without hesitation. Therefore, he was deemed worthy of that wondrous fellowship at the table, having hosted the Angels and the Lord Himself. Let us, too, devote ourselves to hospitality with all zeal and readiness, so that we may welcome not only angels but God Himself. For the Lord says: "Inasmuch as you did it to one of the least of these My brothers, you did it to Me" (Matt. 25: 40). It is good to do good to all, but especially to those who have nothing with which to repay you (Luke 14:14).

86. Whoever's heart does not stray into breaking God's commandments, or into negligence, or into entertaining hostile thoughts, is pure in heart and worthy to hear: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. 5:8).

87. Let us strive to exercise reasonable control over our senses—especially sight, hearing, and speech—making it our rule to see, hear, or speak nothing out of passion, but everything for the benefit of our souls. For nothing is more prone to sin than these faculties when they are not governed by reason; and, conversely, nothing is more conducive to the cause of salvation than when reason governs them, keeps them in order, and leads them where they ought to go and where it wills. For when they run amok, then the sense of smell becomes indulgent—and the sense of touch reaches out with frenzy toward what is improper, and a countless multitude of passions arise; but when they are kept in order by reason, then great peace and unperturbed stillness manifest themselves throughout us.

88. Just as precious myrrh, though contained in a vessel, fills the air of a dwelling with its fragrance, bringing a pleasant sensation not only to those near it but also to those standing far away: so too does the fragrance of a virtuous and God-loving soul, emanating through all the bodily senses, reveal to all who behold it the virtue hidden within. For whoever sees that the tongue utters nothing inappropriate or indecent, but only what is beneficial to those who hear; that the eyes gaze modestly; that the ears do not take in any unseemly melodies or words; that the feet walk with dignity; and that the face is not distorted by laughter, but rather suggests tears and weeping ready to flow—Who, seeing all this, would not recognize what an abundant fragrance of virtues is contained within? That is why the Savior says: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and glorify your Father who is in heaven" (Matt. 5:16).

89. The path that Christ and our God called "narrow and difficult" in the Gospel, He later called "a good yoke and a light burden" (Matt. 7:13–14; 11:30). How, then, can these two things—which seem to be opposites—be seen as one and the same?—Thus: by its very nature, this path is harsh and difficult; but by the will of those who follow it and by their good hopes, it is desirable, beloved, and more sweet than sorrowful for souls who love what is good. That is why you see that those who have chosen this narrow and sorrowful path walk along it with greater readiness than along the spacious and broad one. Listen to what Blessed Luke says about the Apostles, how they, after being flogged, returned from the council rejoicing (Acts 5: 40, 41). But surely this is not the nature of whips; they do not cause sweetness and joy, but rather sorrow and pain. If, then, the whips were sweet for Christ's sake, what is so surprising if, for His sake, other forms of suffering and the afflictions of the flesh are likewise sweet?

90. Tormented and held captive by our passions, we often ask ourselves in bewilderment, "Why are we enduring this?"—We must understand that such captivity befalls us because of our turning away from the contemplation of God. But if anyone clings with his mind to our God and Lord, then—as God is faithful—the Savior Himself will deliver such a soul from every bondage, as the Prophet says: "I have set the Lord always before me; because He is at my right hand, I shall not be shaken" (Ps. 15:8). What could be sweeter than always having the Lord at one's right hand, covering and protecting one, and keeping one from wavering? But whether we are deemed worthy of this depends on us.

91. The Fathers spoke well and unquestionably true when they said that a person will find no peace unless he has acquired and established within himself such an inner disposition that, in the world, there is nothing but God; that he turns his mind to nothing else, but desires Him alone and remains attached to Him alone. Such a person will truly find peace and freedom from the tyranny of the passions. "My soul clings to You," says the Psalmist, "and Your right hand upholds me" (Ps. 62:9).

92. Pride, sensuality, and the love of glory drive the remembrance of God from the soul; and when the remembrance of God is cut off, then the turmoil of the passions takes root within us.

93. Self-love is the mother of countless passions. Therefore, when someone uproots self-love from his heart, he will easily gain the upper hand over other passions as well, with the Lord's help. For from it are usually born anger, sorrow, resentment, sensuality, and unbridled audacity; and whoever is overcome by it is inevitably overcome by other passions as well. By self-love we mean a passionate inclination toward and love of the body, accompanied by the fulfillment of carnal desires.

94. Whoever loves something desires to be with it unceasingly and turns away from everything that prevents him from dwelling with and communing with the beloved object. Clearly, this is because even one who loves God always longs to abide with Him and converse with Him. We attain this through pure prayer. We must therefore devote ourselves to it with all our strength; for it unites us to our Lord. Such was the one who said: “O God, my God, to You I cry out in the morning; my soul longs for You” (Ps. 62:2). For the one who turns his mind away from all that is evil and is continually pierced by divine love cries out to God in the morning.

95. As we have learned, dispassion is born of self-control and humility; and knowledge is born of faith; through them, the soul flourishes in discernment and love. Those who have instilled divine love within their hearts, on the wings of pure prayer, continually soar to its very height, “until they reach the full knowledge of the Son of God, to a mature man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4: 13).

96. Through active virtue, lust is subdued and anger is restrained; and through contemplation and meditation, the mind is inspired, and, rising above all material things, it dwells with God and attains true bliss in Him.

97. Our first task is to subdue the passions and, to the best of our ability, overcome them; our second task is to acquire virtues and not leave our soul empty and inactive; and our third task is to soberly guard the fruits of our virtues and labors: for we are commanded not only to work diligently but also to guard them vigilantly.

98. “Let your loins be girded and your lamps burning,” says the Lord (Luke 12:35). The proper girding of our loins, by which we become well-prepared and ready for action, is self-control accompanied by humility of heart; and by self-control I mean the cutting off of all passions. And the source of light for the spiritual lamp is pure prayer and perfect love. In this way, those who are truly well-disposed are like people who are waiting for their Lord; when He comes and knocks, they will immediately open the door to Him, and He, having come with the Father and the Holy Spirit, will make His home with them. “And blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when He comes, will find doing so” (Luke 12:36–37).

99. A monk must, as a son, love God with all his heart and with all his mind; as a servant, he must revere Him and obey Him, and fulfill His commandments with fear and trembling: he must burn with zeal, be clothed in the full armor of the Holy Spirit, find rest in the hope of receiving eternal life, to carry out all that is commanded without fail, to live a sober life, to guard his heart from evil thoughts, to engage constantly in holy contemplation of God through good thoughts, to examine himself daily regarding his thoughts and deeds, to make up for what is lacking, and not to be puffed up by what has been done, calling oneself an unworthy servant who has not fulfilled one’s duty as one ought; to give thanks to the All-Holy God for everything and to ascribe to Him all that is right in one’s life; to do nothing at all out of vanity or to please men, but to do everything in secret, hoping for praise from the one God alone; but first and foremost, to be fortified in one’s soul by the Orthodox faith in all the dogmas of the Universal Church, handed down to it by the God-proclaiming Apostles and by the Holy Fathers: for those who live in this way will receive a great reward—eternal life and an indestructible dwelling—with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the consubstantial and Triune God.

100. “The end of the matter, listen to this: Fear God and keep His commandments, for this is the duty of every person,” says Ecclesiastes (12:13). “I,” he says, “am showing you in a few words what the way of God consists of: fear God and keep His commandments.” The fear mentioned here, of course, is not a mere fear of punishment, but a perfect fear that brings about perfection—a fear we are bound to have out of love for the One who gave the commandments. For if we refrain from sin out of fear of punishment, it is clear that if we were not to face these horrors, we—being inclined to sin—would certainly commit them without hesitation. But if we abstain from sins not out of fear of punishment but out of aversion to the sins themselves, then we act out of love for our Lord, fearing to provoke His wrath. When we fear that we might neglect something commanded, such fear is pure, because it arises from the good itself; and it purifies our souls, being equivalent to perfect love. Anyone who possesses this fear and keeps the commandments because of it is a true human being—that is, a person as he ought to be. Knowing this, let us fear God with such fear and keep His commandments, “so that we may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing in virtue” (James 1:4), possessing humble wisdom and a contrite heart, and ceaselessly offering to the Lord the prayer of the great Saint Arsenius: “My God! Do not forsake me; but grant me, by Your grace, to make a start at it.” For all our salvation lies in God’s goodness and love for mankind. To Him be glory and power and worship—to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—now and ever and to the ages of ages. Amen.

I have done nothing good before You,

The Venerable Theodore of Edessa

A Brief Account of Him

The present contemplative treatise deserves a place among other ascetic writings, due to its wise interpretation of the inner phenomena of our spiritual life and the drawing of appropriate lessons from them for those engaged in spiritual struggle. The author of this treatise is unknown. In the title, he is referred to as the Venerable Theodore. But who he was is not clear. The compilers of the Greek “Dobrotolubie,” seeing in this treatise ideas similar to those contained in the one hundred chapters of St. Theodore of Edessa, attributed it to the latter and placed it following his one hundred chapters. However, His Eminence Filaret of Chernigov writes (On the Fathers, §277, note 10) that this treatise can be attributed to St. Theodore of Edessa only speculatively. Indeed, the treatise itself provides no definitive indication to that effect. Therefore, while leaving it up to each individual to acknowledge or not acknowledge the attribution of this saying to St. Theodore of Edessa, and considering its reading beneficial for all who seek benefit from reading, we place it—following the example of the Greek Dobrotolubie—immediately after the one hundred chapters of St. Theodore of Edessa.

The speculative discourse of our venerable father Theodore

1. How great a feat it is to break these strong bonds of materialism, to free oneself from its bondage, and to acquire the habit of doing good! Truly, a noble and courageous soul is needed to renounce all that is material.

2. What, then, should one seek after this? It is not merely purification from the passions; for this is not yet a virtue in itself, but only a preparation for virtue. However, the purification of bad habits must be accompanied by the acquisition of virtues.

3. The purification of the soul consists of: “in the intellectual aspect”—the transformation and complete abandonment of worldly, alluring habits, that is, everyday cares and concerns, bad inclinations, and inappropriate speculations and conjectures; “in the part of the appetitive faculty”—not to strive for anything material, nor to be guided by sensation, but to be submissive to reason; “in the part of the irascible faculty”—not to be disturbed by anything that happens.

4. And after such purification and eradication of everything that renders our powers impure, and after their reordering, there follows the ascent toward spiritual perfection and deification: for he who has turned away from evil ought to do good (Ps. 33: 15). In doing so, one must first of all deny oneself, and thus, taking up the cross, follow the Lord in order to attain the highest state of deification.

5. What, then, is this ascent toward perfection and deification? “In terms of the mind,” it is the most perfect knowledge of existence and of the One who is above all that exists, to the extent that this is accessible to human nature; “in terms of desire”—an all-encompassing and unceasing desire and striving toward the supreme good; “as regards the faculty of impulse”—the most vigorous and active movement toward the desired, unceasing and unwavering, its forward progress unhindered by any misfortunes encountered; but marching on unstoppably, without turning back.

6. The soul’s movement toward the good must be as much stronger than its movement toward the evil as intellectual beauties surpass sensory ones; thus, its care for the body must be permitted only to the extent necessary to satisfy its needs and sustain life, so as not to bring our animal organism to a violent breakdown. But while this is easy to recognize in theory, it is very difficult to put into practice; for it is not possible to eradicate the soul’s ingrained habits without effort.

7. Just as mastery of any art is not attained without sweat, so too, in regard to the blessed nature—God—intense contemplation and the extension of attention are achieved through much labor and over a long period of time, until the desiring power becomes accustomed to the consequences of such striving and tastes its fruits. In this process, our mind must resist sensuality, which draws us toward the earthly; hence our battle and unceasing struggle against the flesh until death: although at times it may seem to diminish, as a result of the taming of anger and lust, and the subjugation of the senses under the yoke of the mind, enriched by experienced knowledge and skill in this battle.

8. It should be noted, however, that an unenlightened soul, not usually receiving help from God, can neither be truly purified nor ascend to the divine light, as has been said; for what has been said must be understood as referring to the faithful. To clarify this further, it is necessary to briefly explain the distinction between our various forms of knowledge. Among the earthly forms of knowledge, one is natural, and the other is supernatural. What this second form is will become clear from the first.

9. We call “natural knowledge” that which the soul can acquire, through investigation and inquiry, using natural methods and powers, concerning creation and the Creator—of course, to the extent that this is accessible to a soul bound to matter. For the mind’s energy is weakened by its contact with and fusion into the body, and because of this, it cannot be in direct contact with intellectual objects, but must conceive of them through the imagination, whose nature is to form extended and substantial images. Thus, the mind, insofar as it is in the flesh, requires corresponding images of things in order to judge and understand them. Whatever kind of knowledge the mind, as it is, acquires by this natural means, we call natural knowledge.

10. Supernatural knowledge, on the other hand, is that which comes to the mind by a means that transcends its natural modes and powers, or in which the object of knowledge relatively surpasses the mind bound to the body, so that such knowledge is evidently proper to the incorporeal mind. It comes from the one God when He finds the mind purified of all material attachments and filled with divine love.

11. Not only knowledge, however, is thus divided, but also virtue: for some virtue is such that it does not exceed nature and is rightly called natural; while another is imparted from the first source of good, and, since it exceeds our natural powers and condition, must properly be called supernatural.

12. Having explained this, we hold that even the unenlightened can possess natural knowledge and natural virtue, but by no means the supernatural. For how could he acquire them without having a share in the supreme Cause that is active here? The enlightened, however, can possess both.

13. I will add just one more distinction here: supernatural virtue cannot be acquired without first acquiring natural virtue; yet nothing prevents one from becoming partaker of knowledge of the supernatural even without natural virtue. It must be understood, however, that just as animals possess sensation and imagination, so does man; only in him are these faculties far superior and more elevated: so it is also with natural virtues and knowledge: both the enlightened and the unenlightened possess them, but in the enlightened they are in a far better and higher state than in the unenlightened.

14. I will add this as well: of the kinds of knowledge called natural, that which concerns virtues and their opposite inclinations is also of two kinds: one is abstract, when the philosopher, reflecting on such dispositions, has not tested them in practice—such knowledge is sometimes shaken by doubts; and the other is active, and, so to speak, heartfelt, when knowledge is confirmed by the actual testing of such dispositions—such knowledge is evident and true, never wavers, and admits of no doubt.

15. Meanwhile, as this is the case, we learn that there are four things that oppose the mind in the pursuit of virtue: “the first” is a predisposition toward habits contrary to virtue, which, by virtue of long-standing habit, leads one to incline toward the earthly; “second,” the influence of the senses, which, carried away by sensory beauties, draws the mind along with them; “third,” the weakening of the mind’s energy, to which it is subjected because of its union with the body. For the relationship between sight and the visible—and, in general, between the senses and the sensible—is not the same as that between the mind and the intelligible. — I am speaking of the mind of the soul while it still dwells in the body. — For immaterial minds come into more active contact with the intelligible than sight does with the visible. — But just as when vision is clouded—it reflects the forms of the things it sees not clearly, not precisely, and, moreover, in a blurred manner—so too our mind, though it is aware of the intelligible, cannot effectively perceive intelligible beauties; and at the same time, it cannot desire anything from them, since the degree of inclination corresponds to the degree of knowledge—and it is immediately drawn back to sensory beauties, which appear clearer to it; for it is necessarily drawn to whatever appears before it as good, whether true or not. — In addition to all this, there is also (a fourth) factor: the attacks of inhuman, impure spirits. And it is impossible to say how many and what kinds of snares they set to capture souls, alas! — Everywhere along the way, in myriad and varied forms—in the senses, in speech, in the mind, in, one might say, all that exists—from which no soul would have escaped if He who took the lost sheep upon His shoulders—those who fix their eyes upon Him—had not, through His boundless care, made them superior.

16. To avoid all this, we need the following three means, of which the “first” and greatest is to turn our eyes wholeheartedly toward God and to ask Him for a helping hand, placing all our hope in Him, based on the sincere conviction that if He does not intercede, we will inevitably fall captive to those who draw us toward themselves. The “second,” which I believe is the cause of the first, is the ceaseless nourishment of the mind through knowledge. By this knowledge, I mean the knowledge of all that exists—both sensible and intelligible—as it is in itself, and how it relates to the First Cause, since it exists from and for that Cause—as well as the contemplation of the Author of all that exists, made accessible to us through what proceeds from Him. For the examination of the nature of creatures purifies one from a passionate attachment to them, frees one from being beguiled by them, and elevates one to their source, enabling one—as in a mirror—to see, within the beautiful, the wondrous, and the great, that which is most beautiful, most wondrous, and greatest; or rather, that which is above all beauty, wonder, and greatness. Always dwelling in such thoughts, how can the mind fail to desire true good? For if it sometimes turns toward what is foreign to it, will it not all the more turn toward what is its own? Once the soul is captivated by this, to what of the things that exist below will it allow itself to cling, when such things usually distract it from the One who loves it and whom it loves? Indeed, it will even become dissatisfied with life in the flesh, as something that places obstacles in the way of acquiring and savoring true goods. For if, as has been said, it is unclear how the mind perceives mental beauty in the material world, yet mental blessings are such and so abundant that even a small trickle from the sea of that beauty and a faint glimmer of its rays can persuade the mind to soar beyond all that is non-mental, and to rush toward those blessings alone, by no means allowing itself to turn away from the sweetness of that beauty, even if, because of this, it should happen to fall into something bitter. And the “third” thing that must accompany this is the mortification of our fleshly spouse; for otherwise it is impossible to perceive clearly and distinctly the aforementioned manifestations of those heavenly goods. The flesh is mortified through fasting, vigil, sleeping on the bare ground, wearing the necessary coarse garments, and engaging in arduous labor. Thus the flesh is put to death, or rather, is crucified with Christ. Having thus become refined and purified, light and well-ordered, it readily follows the movements of the mind without resistance and, together with it, ascends to the heights. – Without this, however, all our efforts in this regard prove futile.

17. When this noble trinity is in harmony within itself, it gives rise in the soul to the image of the blessed virtues. And it is impossible for a soul adorned by this trinity to bear even a trace of sin or to lack any virtue. In such souls, the mind is no longer troubled by the pursuit of wealth—which has already been cast aside—nor by glory—which has already been spurned—from which the soul, as long as it remains attached to them, is wounded by many passions. And just as I assert that it is impossible for a soul attached to wealth and glory to soar to the heights, so I do not say that it is possible for a soul that has labored for quite some time in the three spiritual practices mentioned—to the point of having mastered them—to concern itself with them. For if, in such a state of mind, it considers nothing to be a true good except the Supreme Good, and among other goods, the best is that which, as it is convinced, most closely resembles the first—how then can it love and willingly accept gold and silver, or anything else among earthly things?—The same applies to glory.

18. Even this most insatiable thing—I mean, worry—does not then attack the mind from the opposite side. – For what would he have to worry about, being unattached to anything in this world and not engaging in any of it? The cloud of worries is composed of the vapors of the principal passions—sensual desire, love of money, and love of glory—so that one who is free from these is also free from worry.

19. Such people—who are accustomed to these three spiritual practices—also lack nothing in prudence, which is regarded as the companion of wisdom and is the most powerful of the means that lead away from sorrow. For the study of the virtues involves the precise discernment of what is good and what is contrary to it; and for this, prudence is required. Under its guidance, experience and the struggle against the flesh teach how best to do good and resist evil.

20. And fear is inherent in them. For as love increases, so does fear; and the greater the hope of obtaining good, the greater the fear of failing to obtain it. And this gnaws at the souls of those wounded by love far more than the threat of countless torments; for to obtain it is the greatest bliss, while to fail to obtain it is the greatest misery.

21. In order for the word to guide us along the way and in other respects, we must begin at the end: for everything that comes into being derives from its end both the distinction of its parts and their proper order. The end of our life is bliss, or, which is the same thing, the kingdom of heaven, or the kingdom of God. And this itself is not merely the vision of the most royal Trinity, but also the reception of divine attraction, and, as it were, the experience of deification, and through this attraction, the filling of what is lacking in us and the perfection of what is imperfect. And this is the nourishment of spiritual beings—this filling of what is lacking through that divine attraction. Here a certain unceasing cycle is fulfilled, beginning with the same and ending with the same. For the more one understands, the more one desires; the more one desires, the more one savors; the more one savors, the more one is stirred toward greater understanding once again; and immediately this unchanging movement—or, perhaps, unchanging stillness—begins.

22. Thus, the end of life—as far as it is accessible to our understanding—is such. Now we must consider how one should proceed toward it. For rational souls—who are intelligent beings and differ little from the minds of the angels—life here is a struggle, and life in the flesh is given to them as a trial. The reward for this feat and struggle is the aforementioned state—a gift worthy of both divine goodness and divine justice: justice, because these blessings are not attained without one’s own toil and sweat; divine goodness, because the gift immeasurably surpasses any personal effort, and also because the very ability to do good is a gift from God.

23. But what, then, is the feat here?—a rational soul is united with an animal body made of earth, which has existence and is drawn toward the lower realm. It is united with this body in such a way that from these two—soul and body—which are completely opposed to one another, a single being has come into being, not through transformation or mixing of these parts—God forbid!—but in such a way that from these two, each retaining what is proper to its nature, a single person has been formed in two perfect natures. Thus, this composite being—man—being a kind of dual-natured creature, manifests in action the characteristics proper to each nature in particular. – It is natural for the body to desire that which is like itself—the bodily. Such a desire for the like is natural to all beings, since their very existence depends on the realization within themselves of that which is like themselves. It is also natural for the body to take pleasure in the like through the senses; furthermore, rest is pleasing to it when it is weary. This is what is natural and desirable to our animal nature. – For the rational soul, as a rational nature, it is natural and desirable to seek that which is equally rational, and to take pleasure in what is proper to that mode. Above all else, however, love for God is naturally rooted within it. And it naturally desires to take pleasure in Him and in other intellectual things, but it cannot do so unhindered.

24. The first man was able to perceive and take pleasure in both the sensible through the senses and the intelligible through the intellect without hindrance. But he ought to have been primarily concerned not with the lesser, but with the greater; although in and of himself he could enter into communion with the intelligible through the intellect and with the sensible through the senses. I am not saying that Adam should not have made use of his senses: for it was not in vain that he was endowed with a body; but that he should not have primarily delighted in the sensible, and for the sake of the sensible; but rather, perceiving the beauty of creatures through sensory impressions, he should have turned to the Author of that beauty and delighted in Him with wonder, having all the more reason to marvel at the Creator, rather than clinging to the sensory and marveling at it, while neglecting the intellectual beauty of the Creator. This is how Adam should have acted.

25. But since he made poor use of his senses, he began to marvel at the beauty of the sensory world; and, seeing the fruit as pleasing to the eye and good to eat, he tasted it, abandoning the delight found in intellectual things; then the righteous Judge, deeming him unworthy of the contemplation of God and all that exists—things he had despised—cast him out, “making darkness his dwelling” and separating him from all non-material objects (Ps. 17:12). For the unholy should not be granted what is holy; but since he loved it, God permitted him to take delight in it, leaving him to live by the senses with only faint traces of spiritual life.

26. This is why the struggle to attain communion with intellectual things has become the most arduous for us: for it is not within our power to delight in the intellectual with the mind just as we delight in the sensible with the senses, even though we receive great assistance toward this through baptism, by which we are purified and exalted. Nevertheless, to the extent that it is accessible to us, we must still exercise ourselves in the intellectual, not in the sensory; we must marvel at and desire the intellectual, while marveling at nothing in the sensory and desiring to take pleasure in nothing of the sensory for its own sake (as something sensory and for the satisfaction of the senses): for in truth, the sensory cannot bear any comparison with the intellectual. We see that both the essence of essence and the beauty of beauty are more wondrous. But we must relate to them exactly as they are. Is there any madness greater than to love what is shameful more than what is magnificent, and what is base more than what is honorable? And this is true even when we treat created things this way, whether they be of the intellect or of the senses. But what can be said if we treat even the One Who is above all in this way, preferring to Him formless and insignificant matter?

27. And this, then, is our task now—to watch over ourselves carefully, so that we may always delight in the intelligible, directing both our mind and our desire toward it, and by no means allow ourselves to be robbed by the sensible, being carried away by sensation to an astonishing degree for its own sake. But if it is necessary to make use of the senses, we must use them to recognize the Creator through His creatures, seeing Him in them just as we see the sun in the waters, since the First Cause of all things is reflected in creation to the extent that it is capable of containing Him.

28. Such is the task before us; but how to accomplish it is a matter that requires reflection. For, as has been said, the body desires to take pleasure in the things proper to it through the senses, and the more it is satisfied, the more it desires. And this is contrary to the soul's aspiration. Therefore, let the soul's first concern be to rein in all the senses, so as not to take pleasure in the sensual, as has been said. Since the body, the stronger it becomes, the more strongly it strives for what is its own; and the more strongly it strives toward this, the more uncontrollable it becomes; therefore, the soul must strive earnestly to mortify the flesh through fasting, vigils, standing in prayer, sleeping on the bare ground, and all manner of other privations, so that, having exhausted its strength, it may be humble and submissive in its spiritual endeavors: this is the main task that lies before it. But since it is easy to desire this yet difficult to carry it out, and many omissions from what is required are committed in the process—because the senses distract one even while one is fully attentive—therefore a third remedy has been wisely devised: prayer and tears. Prayer gives thanks for the blessings bestowed and asks for the forgiveness of sins and the bestowal of strength for further progress; for without Divine help, the soul, as has already been said, cannot do anything properly on its own. Furthermore, it brings about union with the One whom the soul has sought, delight in Him, and a complete, ardent striving toward Him with all one's strength: for this is the most important matter in a virtuous life—that is, this inclination of the will to desire this as strongly as possible. – And tears possess great power: they appease the Lord regarding our transgressions, purify the defilement caused by sensual pleasures, and inspire a longing for the heavenly.

29. So this is the whole matter: the main thing is the contemplation of mental or spiritual goods and the wholehearted desire for them; by virtue of this, the subjugation of the flesh—the parts of which are fasting, chastity, and the like—is all mutually supportive; for this very purpose, and along with it, prayer. Each of these practices is divided into many parts, all of which, however, are interconnected, so that one requires the other, and one cannot exist without the other.

30. Let no one think that the love of glory and the love of money belong to the carnal passions. The carnal passion is solely the love of pleasure, which finds its proper remedy in the mortification of the flesh. The two passions mentioned, however, are the products of ignorance. Having neither experienced nor come to know true goods—whether intellectual or spiritual—the soul has invented false goods, thinking to find solace in wealth amid its poverty of spiritual goods; it cares for wealth both to satisfy the love of pleasure and the love of glory, and for its own sake, regarding it as a kind of good. We may say, then, that all this is the product of ignorance of true goods. The love of glory does not arise from a scarcity of bodily needs: for nothing bodily is satisfied by it ; but rather from a failure to experience and a lack of knowledge of the first good and true glory.

31. And ignorance serves as the root not only of the love of glory, but, in short, of all evils. For it is impossible that one who has properly come to know the nature of things—and where each of them comes from and what purpose it serves—should then, having forgotten his ultimate end, rush toward earthly things. The soul will not desire a good of which it knows for certain that it only appears to be a good. Even if habit tyrannically draws it toward something, it can, by virtue of precise and clear knowledge of the matter, overcome habit itself. But even before habit took hold, it was beguiled by ignorance. Therefore, above all else, and as early as possible, one must strive to acquire true knowledge of all that exists, and then, in accordance with that knowledge, inspire one's will with a longing for the First Good. It is not difficult for one who has truly recognized their complete vanity to despise all present goods.

The Venerable Abba Philemon

A Brief Account of Him

The patristic writings have not told us in what era our most reverend father Philemon—the most sober and tearfully contrite of our godly fathers—lived. But that he was a most devout and experienced man, and loved silence more than any other of the elders—as the most faithful imitator of the great Arsenius—this will become clear to those who wish to see it from the present account. For, remaining patiently day and night in prayer and supplication within his desert cave, washing himself with the ever-flowing springs of tears and the sweetest weeping, and having risen above all that is sensory and mental in love for God, he always stood before God as one who was deaf and mute, and was deemed worthy of the wondrous enlightenment of His divine grace; from this, as from the radiance of the sun, this ever-memorable one, in his utter silence and stillness, was enriched with the gift not only to speak and reason, but also to perceive and foresee. A faithful witness to this is the account of him presented here, in which his most discerning teaching on holy sobriety is set forth—both in its active and contemplative aspects—based on his own long-standing experience. Therefore, whoever desires to cast off the filthy and vile garments of the passions—or, in other words, to shed the old man and clothe himself in the bright garment of dispassion and grace, or in the new man in Christ Jesus—will readily attain what he desires by frequently studying this teaching of the elder and faithfully putting it into practice to the best of his ability.

A Most Beneficial Account of Abba Philemon

1. It was said of Abba Philemon the hermit that he had shut himself away in a certain cave, not far from the Lavra, called Romieva, and devoted himself to ascetic labors, mentally repeating to himself what, as is reported, the great Arsenius used to say to himself: “Philemon, why did you come here?” He remained in this cave for quite some time. His task was to twist prayer ropes and weave baskets, which he gave to the steward; in return, he received small loaves of bread, on which he subsisted. He ate nothing but bread and salt, and even that not every day. He apparently took no care of his body at all, but, practicing contemplation, he was illuminated by divine enlightenment, and, partaking of the ineffable guidance from above, he remained in spiritual joy. When he went to church on Saturdays and Sundays, he always walked alone, deep in thought, not allowing anyone to approach him, lest his mind be distracted from his task. In the church, however, standing in a corner with his face bowed down, he shed streams of tears, lamenting ceaselessly, and pondering in his mind the remembrance of death and the image of the holy fathers—especially Arsenius the Great, in whose footsteps he strove in every way to follow.

2. When heresy arose in Alexandria and its environs, he withdrew from there and went to the Nikanor Lavra. Upon his arrival, the Most God-loving Pavlin gave him his own secluded place and ensured complete silence for him. For a whole year, he did not allow anyone to see him, and he himself did not disturb him in the least, except when he brought him the necessary bread. The Holy Resurrection of Christ arrived. When, during a visit, a conversation arose between them and the topic turned to the hermit’s life, Philemon realized that this most devout brother, Pavlin, also harbored the noble intention (of living as a hermit). Pavlin abundantly instilled in him words of asceticism—from the Holy Scriptures and the teachings of the Fathers—showing everyone that it is impossible to please God without perfect solitude, just as Moses, the God-enlightened father, also teaches—that silence gives birth to asceticism, and asceticism gives birth to weeping, weeping to fear, fear—humility, humility—insight, insight—love, and love makes the soul sound and dispassionate, and then a person comes to know that he is not far from God.

3. He (Philemon) said to him: “You must, through silence, completely purify your mind and engage it in unceasing spiritual work.” Just as the eye, turning to the sensible, gazes intently at the visible, so the pure mind, turning to the intelligible, is captivated by what is spiritually contemplated, so that you cannot tear it away from it. And to the extent that, through silence, it is stripped of passions and purified, to that extent it becomes worthy of knowledge (of those spiritual things). The mind, however, becomes perfect when it enters the realm of essential knowledge and unites with God. Then, possessing royal dignity, it no longer feels poverty nor is it carried away by false desires, even if you were to offer it all the kingdoms of the world. Therefore, if you wish to attain such virtues, flee swiftly from the world and run with zeal along the path of the saints; cast aside concern for your outward appearance, wear simple clothing, and keep your adornment humble. Maintain a simple disposition, speak plainly, walk without vanity, and speak with sincerity. Learn to love living in poverty and being overlooked by all. Above all, take care to preserve your mind’s clarity and sobriety; be patient in all hardships, and in every way preserve the spiritual blessings you have already acquired, keeping them intact and unchanging. Watch over yourself carefully and do not accept any of the pleasures that creep in secretly. For although silence tames the passions of the soul, if you allow them to flare up and intensify, they usually rage even more fiercely, and draw those who permit this toward sin with even greater force. Likewise, physical wounds, when rubbed and torn open, become incurable. Even a single word can turn the mind away from the remembrance of God when demons urge it to do so, and the senses agree with them. It is a great feat and a great fear—to guard the soul. Therefore, you must withdraw completely from the world and, having detached your soul from all sympathy for the body, become without a city, without a home, possess nothing, have no money, seek no gain, be free from cares, have no companions, be ignorant of human affairs, be humble, compassionate, good, meek, gentle in disposition, and ready to receive from divine guidance enlightening impressions in your heart. For it is impossible to write on wax without first erasing the letters previously inscribed upon it, as the great Basil teaches us. Such was the likeness of the Saints, who, having completely withdrawn from all worldly customs and preserving within themselves an unshakable heavenly wisdom, were enlightened by the divine laws and shone forth with pious deeds and words, “having put to death the members which are on the earth” (Col. 3: 5)—through self-control, the fear of God, and love. For through unceasing prayer and study of the Divine Scriptures, the spiritual eyes of the heart are opened and behold the King of Powers—and there is great joy, and an uncontrollable divine desire is kindled powerfully in the soul, whereby the flesh is also drawn there by the action of the Spirit, and the whole person becomes spiritual. This is what those who practice blessed silence and the strictest ascetic life are deemed worthy of—those who, having withdrawn from all human comfort, converse ceaselessly, alone with the one Lord who dwells in heaven!

4. Having heard this, that God-loving brother, pierced in his soul by divine love, (left his place) and, together with him (Philemon), reached the skete where the greatest of the fathers had completed their path of piety. They settled at the Lavra of St. John Kolov, entrusting their care to the Lavra’s treasurer, since they wished to live in silence. And they remained there, by the grace of God, in perfect silence, attending communal church services on Saturdays and Sundays, and remaining in their cells on other days; each of them performing his prayers and devotions privately.

5. The holy elder (Philemon) had the following rule of worship: at night he would chant the entire Psalter and the hymns (the nine included in the Psalter), without haste or restlessness; he would read one passage from the Gospel, then sit down and remain seated, saying to himself, “Lord, have mercy!” with full attention and for quite a long time, until he could no longer utter this invocation; and finally he allowed himself to fall asleep. Then, at dawn, he would again chant the first hour, and sitting on his seat facing east, he would alternately sing (psalms) and read, as he pleased, from the Epistles and the Gospel. Thus he spent the entire day singing unceasingly, praying, and delighting in the contemplation of heavenly things; his mind was so often carried away in contemplation that he did not know whether he was on earth.

6. The brother, seeing that he was so earnestly devoted to his prayerful duties and was sometimes completely absorbed in divine thoughts, said to him: “Is it not difficult for you, Father, at such an advanced age, to mortify and subdue your body in this way?” He replied, “Believe me, God has instilled in my soul such zeal and such love for prayerful service that I am unable to fully satisfy its longing; yet my love for God and my hope for future blessings overcome my bodily weakness.” Thus, all his desire was wisely lifted up to heaven, even during meals, and not only at other times.

7. Once, a brother who lived with him asked him: “What are the mysteries of contemplation?” And he, seeing the brother’s persistence and that he was sincerely seeking edification, said to him: “I tell you, my child, that to the one whose mind has been completely purified, God reveals visions of the most ministering powers and ranks (of the angels).”

8. He also asked him the following: “For what reason, Father, do you take greater delight in the Psalter than in any other part of Divine Scripture, and for what reason, when you sing softly, do you appear as if you are conversing with someone?” To this he replied: “God has imprinted the power of the psalms upon my soul, just as He did upon the Prophet David himself, and I cannot tear myself away from the delight of the manifold contemplations hidden within them; for they encompass all of Divine Scripture.” He confessed this to the questioner with great humility, for the sake of edification, and after much persistent entreaty.

9. A certain brother named John, having set out from the coast, came to this holy and great Father Philemon, and, embracing his feet, said to him: “What shall I do, Father, to be saved?” For my mind wanders and flits here and there, where it ought not to.” And he, after a brief pause, said: “This (spiritual) affliction is characteristic of those who are superficial, and it dwells within them. And it is within you, because you have not yet attained perfect love for God; the warmth of love and knowledge of Him has not yet come to you.” The brother said to him, “What should I do, Father?” He replied, “Go and take this secret teaching into your heart, and it will purify your mind of this.” The brother, not understanding what was being said, asked the elder, “What is this secret teaching, Father?” And he said to him: “Go and be sober in your heart, and in your thoughts, with fear and trembling, say: ‘Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me!’” This is how the blessed Diadochus also instructs beginners.

10. The brother went and, by God’s grace and through the father’s prayers, found peace and took delight in this teaching for a short time. But then that delight departed from him, and he could no longer perform this practice or pray with a sober mind. So he went back to the elder and told him what had happened. The elder said to him: “Now you have come to know the path of silence and wise conduct, and you have tasted the sweetness that comes from it. Keep this always in your heart—whether you are eating, drinking, conversing with someone, traveling, or sitting in your cell—never cease to pray with a sober mind and an undistracted spirit, to sing, and to learn from prayers and psalms; even while attending to your most basic needs, do not allow your mind to be idle, but compel it to learn and pray in secret. In this way, you may comprehend the depths of Divine Scripture and the power hidden within it, and give your mind unceasing activity, so that you may fulfill the Apostolic word commanding: “Pray without ceasing” (1 Thess. 5:17). Pay close attention to yourself and guard your heart against harboring evil thoughts, or any vain and useless ones; but always—whether you are sleeping, rising, eating, drinking, or conversing—let your heart secretly and mentally either study the psalms or pray: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me!” Likewise, when you sing the psalms aloud, be careful not to speak with your lips while your thoughts wander elsewhere.

11. The brother asked him again: “I see many vain dreams while I sleep.” The elder said to him: “Do not be lazy or fainthearted; but before you fall asleep, offer many prayers in your heart and resist with your thoughts the devil’s temptations to lead you according to his will, so that God may receive you.” Do your utmost to fall asleep with psalms on your lips and wise instruction in your mind, and by no means allow your mind, through carelessness, to accept foreign thoughts; but with whatever thoughts you prayed, learn from them as you lie down on your bed, so that even while you sleep, they may remain within you, and when you awaken, they may converse with you. Also recite the Holy Symbol of the Orthodox Faith before you fall asleep; for believing in God according to the Orthodox faith is the source and safeguard of all good things.

12. His brother asked him again: “Father, out of love, tell me, what is the work of your mind? Teach me, so that I too may be saved.” He said to him, “Why are you so curious to know this?” The younger brother stood up, embraced the saint’s feet, and, kissing them, begged him to tell him. After some time had passed, the elder said, “You are not yet ready to bear this.” It is the nature of a man accustomed to dwelling in the blessings of truth to assign to each sense its proper task; and it is impossible for one who has not become completely pure of the world’s vain thoughts to be deemed worthy of this gift. Therefore, if you truly desire this, keep this secret teaching in a pure heart. For if prayer and the teaching of the Scriptures abide in you unceasingly, the eyes of your soul will be opened, and there will be great joy within it, along with a certain ineffable and fervent feeling, as the Spirit and the flesh are warmed, so that the whole person becomes spiritual. Therefore, whether by night or by day, if God grants you the grace to pray undistracted with a pure mind, set aside your prayer rule, and, with all your strength, strive with all your heart and mind to cleave to God. And He will enlighten your heart in the spiritual work you have undertaken. To this he added: Once an elder came to me, and when I asked him about the state of his mind, he told me: ‘For two years I remained in prayer before God, imploring Him earnestly with all my heart that He might grant me the grace to have the prayer He entrusted to His disciples constantly and undistractedly imprinted upon my heart; and the bountiful Lord, seeing my effort and patience, granted me what I had asked for.’ And here is what else he told him: Thoughts about vain things that arise in the soul are the affliction of a soul that is idle and has given itself over to negligence; therefore, according to Scripture, we must guard our minds with every kind of vigilance, sing sensibly without distraction, and pray with a pure mind. Therefore, brother, God desires that we show Him our zeal, first through our labors (asceticism and good deeds), then through love and unceasing prayer—and He will grant us the path to salvation. It is clear, then, that there is no other path leading to heaven except the complete turning away from all that is evil, the acquisition of all that is good, perfect love for God, and dwelling with Him in holiness and righteousness; so that whoever possesses these things will soon ascend to the heavenly host. But at the same time, it is imperative for everyone who desires to ascend to the heights to put to death the members that are on the earth. For when our soul is delighted by the contemplation of true goodness, it no longer returns to any of the passions aroused by the sweetness of sin; but, having turned away from all carnal lusts, it receives the vision of God with a pure and undefiled mind. Therefore, we need great self-discipline, much physical labor, and purification of the soul, so that we may dwell God in our hearts, that we may sinlessly fulfill His divine commandments, and that He Himself may teach us to steadfastly keep His laws, shedding upon us, like the rays of the sun, His influence through the grace of the Spirit implanted within us. Through toil and trials, we must purify the image in which we were created—rational and capable of comprehending all understanding and of becoming like God—by refining our senses, cleansing them of all defilement through the refining fire of trials, and thereby being transformed into royal dignity. God created human nature to share in every good, capable of mentally contemplating the rejoicing of the Angels of glory, dominions, powers, principalities, authority, the unapproachable light, and the most radiant glory. But when you have cultivated a virtue, take care that your thoughts do not rise above your brother, because you have cultivated it and he has not; for this is the beginning of pride. When you struggle with a passion, take care not to become discouraged or lose heart because the battle is fierce; but rise up, humble yourself before God, and say with the Prophet from the bottom of your heart: “Judge, O Lord, those who wrong me” (Ps. 34:1), for I am not strong enough against them. And He, seeing your humility, will soon send you His help. When you are traveling with someone, do not engage in idle conversation, but direct your mind to the spiritual practice that He followed, so that this good habit and the forgetfulness of worldly pleasures may remain in him, and he may not stray from the harbor of dispassion. Having instructed the brother with these and many other words, the elder sent him on his way.

13. But not long afterward, he came again and, beginning his speech, asked, “What should I do, Father? During my nightly vigil, sleep weighs me down and prevents me from praying with a clear mind and staying awake longer; and I want to take up some work while I sing.” To this the elder replied: “When you are able to pray with a clear mind, do not engage in manual work; but when drowsiness overtakes you, then, making a small effort against the thought and resisting it, take up your work.” The brother asked again: “Father, are you yourself not weighed down by sleep during your service?” The elder said: “It’s not that easy; however, when drowsiness sometimes overtakes me, I make a small effort; but I begin to read the Gospel of John from the beginning, lifting the eye of my mind to God, and it disappears immediately.” I do something similar with regard to thoughts; namely, when one of them arises, I confront it like a fire with tears, and it disappears. You, however, cannot yet arm yourself against them in this way; but rather, hold fast to this secret teaching and strive to perform the services established by the holy fathers—both the daily prayers, such as the hours: the Third, Sixth, and Ninth Hours and Vespers, and the nightly services. And with all your strength, strive not to do anything to please people, and be careful not to fall out with any of the brothers, lest you distance yourself from your God. Also strive to keep your mind undistracted, attentively focused on your inner thoughts. When you are in the Church and intend to partake of the Holy Mysteries of Christ, do not leave until you have received full communion. Standing in one place, do not move from there until the dismissal; and within yourself, reflect that you are in heaven, standing before God with the holy angels, about to receive Him into your heart; prepare yourself for this with fear and trembling, lest you be unworthy to partake of the Holy Gifts. Having thus well equipped the brother and commended him to the Lord and to the Spirit of His grace, the elder dismissed him.

14. In addition to this, a brother who lived with him recounted the following. Sitting beside him one day, I asked him whether he had been tempted by demonic slanders while living in the desert. He replied: “Forgive me, brother—if God were to allow temptations from the devil to come upon you, such as those I was subjected to, I do not think you would be able to bear their bitterness.” I am seventy years old, or perhaps a little older, and I have endured many temptations while living in various deserts in complete silence; as for what I experienced and endured from these demons, it is not beneficial to recount the bitterness of it to those who have not yet experienced silence. In such temptations, I have always acted in this way: I placed all my hope in God, to whom I made vows of renunciation, and He quickly delivered me from every need. That is why, brother, I no longer concern myself with my own welfare; but knowing that He cares for me, I bear the temptations that come upon me with great ease. And the only thing I offer to Him of my own is to pray unceasingly. It helps greatly in this the hope that the greater the sorrows and misfortunes that assail us, the greater the crowns they prepare for those who endure them: for before the righteous Judge, the two balance each other out. Knowing this, brother, do not give in to faintheartedness. You have entered the midst of battle to fight, and fight on, encouraged also by the fact that there are very many who fight for us against the enemy of God—more than the enemy’s hordes. And how could we possibly dare to stand against such a fearsome adversary of our race if the mighty right hand of God the Word did not embrace us, shield us, and cover us? How could human nature endure his slanders? For as Job says, “Who can uncover the face of his garment? Who can enter the folds of his robe? From his mouth come forth things like burning torches, and they scatter like fiery sparks. From his nostrils comes the smoke of a furnace burning with coals of fire. His soul is like a coal, and flames come forth from his mouth. Power dwells in his jaws; destruction flows before him. His heart is hardened like a stone; he stands firm like an anvil. He stirs up the abyss like a copper furnace; he regards the sea as a distillery, and the depths of the abyss as a captive. He surveys all that is high, yet he himself is king over all that dwells in the waters" (Job 41:4–25). This is the one against whom we wage battle, brother! This is how the Word has portrayed this tyrant! Nevertheless, victory over him comes easily to those who, as they ought, lead a life of solitude—because they possess nothing within themselves that belongs to him, because of their renunciation of the world, because of their lofty virtues, and because we have One who fights on our behalf. For tell me, who, having drawn near to the Lord and received His fear into their mind, has not been transformed in nature and enlightened by the divine laws and deeds, and has not made their soul bright and capable of shining with divine insights and thoughts? He never allows it to be idle, for it has God within it, Who stirs the mind to strive insatiably for the light. And with the soul thus continually influenced, the spirit does not allow it to be corrupted by passions; but like a king, breathing forth terrible wrath and punishment, he mercilessly cuts them down. Such a person never turns back, but through the practice of virtues—with hands raised to heaven and intelligent prayer—wins the victory in battle.

15. That brother also recounted that Abba Philemon possessed, among other virtues, this one: he could not bear to hear idle talk, and if anyone, losing himself, spoke of anything unrelated to the benefit of the soul, he would not respond to it at all. Likewise, when I left on some errand, he did not ask, "Why are you leaving?" And when I returned, he did not say, "Where were you?" or "What did you do and how?" So once I sailed to Alexandria for a necessary errand, and from there, on a matter of church business, I set out for Constantinople without informing the servant of God; then, having stayed there quite some time and visited the devout brothers there, I finally returned to him at the hermitage. Upon seeing me, the elder rejoiced, and after the customary greeting and offering a prayer, he sat down; but he did not ask me anything at all, instead remaining absorbed in his usual contemplative practice.

16. Once, wishing to test him, I did not give him any bread to eat for several days. He, however, did not ask for bread nor say anything about it. Then, bowing before him, I asked: "Please, Father, tell me—were you offended that I did not bring you food as usual?" He said: "Forgive me, brother! "Even if you do not give me bread to eat for twenty days, I will not ask you for it; for as long as I endure with my soul, I also endure with my body." Thus was he absorbed in the contemplation of true goodness.

17. He said: "Ever since I came to the hermitage, I have not allowed my thoughts to wander beyond the walls of my cell; nor have I allowed any other thought into my mind except the fear of God and the judgments of the age to come, keeping in mind the judgment that threatens sinners, eternal fire, and utter darkness, and how the souls of sinners and the righteous live, and what blessings are prepared for the righteous, and how each receives his reward according to his labor: one for the labors of asceticism, another for almsgiving and sincere love, yet another for non-covetousness and complete renunciation of the world, another for humility and perfect silence, one for extreme obedience, and another for wandering. Keeping all this in mind, I do not allow any other thought to take hold within me, and I can no longer be with people or occupy my mind with them, lest I stray from divine thoughts.

18. To this he added the story of a certain hermit, saying that he had already attained dispassion and received bread for food from the hand of an angel, but because of sloth (a weakening of attention) he was deprived of such an honor. For when the soul relaxes the mind's discerning and intense attention, then darkness envelops that soul. Where God does not shine, everything is shrouded in darkness; and then the soul cannot gaze upon the one God or tremble at His words. "I am the God who is near," says the Lord, 'and not a God who is far off. Can a man hide in secret places so that I cannot see him? Do I not fill heaven and earth?'" (Jer. 23:23–24). And he recalled many others who had suffered similarly. He also cited the fall of Solomon, who, he said, had received such wisdom and was so highly praised by all—for, like the morning star rising at dawn, he illuminated everyone with the radiance of his wisdom—yet lost such glory for the sake of a small pleasure. Therefore, it is dangerous to indulge in laziness; but we must pray unceasingly that no other thought, once it takes hold, may separate us from God, and that nothing else may take His place in our minds. Only a pure heart, having become the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, beholds clearly within itself, as in a mirror, God Himself, the source of all that exists.

19. Hearing this, the brother who lived with Abba Philemon said, "Observing his deeds, I realized that the passions of the flesh had completely ceased to act within him, and that he was a zealous lover of all perfection, so that he was always seen being transformed by the Divine Spirit (from glory to glory) and sighing with inexpressible sighs, reflecting within himself and weighing himself (or keeping himself balanced, as on a scale), and striving in every way so that nothing that might come would disturb the purity of his mind and no defilement might secretly cling to him. “Seeing this,” he says, “and stirred by a zeal for such a way of life, I turned to him with earnest supplication, saying, ‘How might I, too, attain purity of mind like you?’ He replied, ‘Go—work hard; for this requires labor and the pain of the heart.’ Spiritual blessings, which are worthy of earnest seeking and labor, will not come to us if we lie on our couches and sleep. Nor do earthly blessings come to anyone without labor. Whoever wishes to prosper must first of all renounce his own desires and acquire unceasing lamentation and detachment from worldly goods, paying no heed to the sins of others but only to his own, and lamenting only those day and night, and having no vain friendship with any of mankind: for the soul that grieves over its wretched condition and is pierced by the memory of past sins is dead to the world, just as the world dies to it; that is, then the carnal passions become powerless, and man is powerless against these passions. Moreover, the one who has renounced the world, united himself with Christ, and abides in silence loves God, preserves His image, and is enriched by His likeness; for from above he receives the gift of the Spirit from Him and becomes a dwelling place for God, not for demons, and presents righteous deeds to God. Thus, the soul, having become pure in life, free from the defilements of the flesh and devoid of any stain or vice, will finally be crowned with the crown of righteousness and will shine with the beauty of virtues. But in whom, at the beginning of renunciation, does no lamentation take root in the heart—neither spiritual tears, nor the memory of endless torments, nor true silence, nor unceasing prayer, nor the singing of psalms and instruction in the Divine Scriptures—in whom has this not become a habit, so that, because of the continuity of this practice, he is compelled—even unwillingly—to do so by reason of his mind—and the fear of God does not reign in his soul: such a one still rests in fellowship with the world and cannot have a pure mind in prayer; for only piety and the fear of God purify the soul from passions and, by setting the mind free, lead it into its natural contemplation and enable it to touch upon theology, which it receives in the form of bliss (“Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God”),—which, for those who are becoming like this, already serves as a pledge of the future and keeps their spiritual disposition unshakable. Let us therefore strive with all our strength toward the practical exercise of virtues and ascetic deeds, through which we are elevated to piety—that is, to mental (spiritual) purity—the fruit of which is theological contemplation, which is natural to the mind. For action is an ascent toward contemplation, as the discerning and most theological mind (of Gregory the Theologian) says. For if we neglect such action, we will be alien to all wisdom; for even if someone were to reach the very summit of virtue, he would still need the labor of asceticism, which restrains the unruly desires of the body, and the strict guarding of his thoughts. And in this way alone can we attain the indwelling of Christ. For the more our righteousness increases, the more our spiritual maturity grows; and finally, the mind, having reached perfection, clings entirely to God and is illuminated by the Divine light—and the ineffable mysteries are revealed to it. Then he will truly know where wisdom is, where strength is, where the intellect for understanding all things is, where longevity and life are, where the light of the eyes and peace are. For as long as he is engaged in the struggle against the passions, he has no opportunity to enjoy these things; since both virtues and vices blind the mind: the former so that it may not see the virtues, and the latter so that it may not see the vices. But when he finds rest from the struggle and is granted spiritual gifts, then, being constantly influenced by grace, he becomes entirely enlightened and remains steadfast in the contemplation of spiritual things. Such a person is not attached to anything earthly; but has passed from death to life. Whoever embraces an exemplary life and strives to draw near to God must have a pure heart and clean lips, so that the word, coming forth from clean lips as pure, may worthily extol God, since the soul, having cleaved to God, converses with Him unceasingly. Let us therefore, brothers, aspire to reach such heights of virtue and cease to grovel on the ground, clinging to our passions. He who strives and has attained closeness to God, who has partaken of His holy light and been pierced by love for Him, enjoys a certain and incomprehensible spiritual joy in the Lord, as the divine psalm says: “Delight yourself in the Lord, and He will give you the desires of your heart; He will make your righteousness shine like the light, and your justice like the noonday sun” (Ps. 36: 4, 6). And what love is as strong and as unstoppable as that which flows from God into a soul purified of all evil? Such a soul, from the true disposition of the heart, says: “I am wounded with love” (Song of Songs 2:5). The splendors of divine beauty are ineffable and inexpressible! No word can depict them, nor can the ear contain them. Whether you point to the radiance of the dawn, the brightness of the moon, or the light of the sun, all these pale in comparison to that glory, and are more meager in the presence of the true light than the deepest night or the darkest gloom is before the purest midday. So testified our own Basil, the most wonderful of teachers, having come to know this through experience and having been taught this.

20. The brother who lived with Abba recounted this and even more. But who would not marvel at the following as well, as proof of his great humility? Having been ordained a presbyter long ago, and having so sincerely touched the heavenly realm with both his life and his mind, he avoided the Divine Liturgy in every way as if it were a burden, so that throughout the many years of his ascetic life he very rarely agreed to preside over the Holy Meal (for the Divine Liturgy). But even the Divine Mysteries—Communion—he did not partake of, despite such a constantly cautious life, when it happened that he entered into fellowship and conversed with people; though in doing so he spoke to them of nothing earthly, but only of what was beneficial to the soul for those seeking conversation with him. And when he intended to partake of the Divine Mysteries, he would first plead with God at length, appeasing Him with prayers, psalm-singing, and confessions. He was terrified by the voice of the deacon, who proclaims at that moment, saying, “Holy things to the holy.” For at that moment, he said, the entire Church is filled with holy angels, and the King of Powers Himself, performing the sacrament in a mysterious way and transforming the bread and wine into His own body and blood, enters our hearts through Holy Communion. Therefore, he added, we must approach the Holy Communion of Christ’s most pure Mysteries with purity and holiness, as if existing outside the flesh, without any doubt or hesitation, so that we may partake of the enlightenment that comes from them. Many of the Holy Fathers saw holy angels who warned them (against all that was unworthy); which is why they themselves remained in deep silence, speaking to no one.

21. And here is something else that (that brother) said: whenever the elder himself needed to sell his handicrafts, so that no lie, oath, superfluous word, or any other form of sin might arise—if he were to converse or bargain—he would stand there pretending to be a holy fool; and anyone who wished to buy his handicrafts would take them from him and pay whatever price they wished. He made small baskets; and this wise man would accept whatever was given for them with gratitude, without saying a word.

The Venerable Father Theognostus

A Brief Account of Him

Whether the Venerable Theognostus, the subject of the following chapters, was the Alexandrian exegete mentioned by Photius in the 106th reading, or someone else, and in what era he lived, we cannot say with certainty. But just as a tree is known by its fruit, so too was he among those who lived well by their “deeds” and “mind,” and who, through the purity of their lives, were deemed worthy to have the Holy Spirit dwelling within them. Enlightened in his mind by the Holy Spirit’s illuminations and inspired by its life-giving breath, he sang a kind of sacred song, uttering these very chapters, which, by virtue of the grace and spiritual contemplations hidden within them, delight both the ears and the minds of readers and stir within them a living zeal to live according to their instruction; for in them a faithful model of an active life is set forth, and an infallible path to the contemplative life is indicated. Furthermore, those who wish may learn from them what a priest, honored by the office of the priesthood, ought to be and how he ought to act. And in general, to those who diligently read them, they will provide rich moral edification and true guidance toward saving sobriety.

On the active and contemplative life, and on the priesthood, the chapters for which the acrostic reads: To the Most Reverend Fathers, Lazarus and Barlaam, from Theognostus, who is meager in every way and unworthy above all others living in this present world.

1. Consider yourself to possess true virtue when you regard all that exists on earth as utterly worthless, always keeping in your heart—with a clear conscience—the readiness to depart to the Lord. If you wish to be known by God, remain unknown to people as much as possible.

2. Beware of excessive bodily comforts, and abstain from them, lest they detract from the value of your labors. Consider it a loss not the deprivation of sensual pleasures, but the loss of what is better through the indulgence in them.

3. With all your being, consider yourself an ant and a worm, so that you may become a person created by God; for if the former does not come first, the latter will not follow. The more you humble yourself in your self-perception, the higher you will rise in reality. When you consider yourself nothing before the Lord, like the Psalmist (38:6), then you are secretly great out of smallness; and when you realize that you possess nothing and know nothing, then you are rich in both deed and mind, praiseworthy before the Lord.

4. Wipe away the backbone of the sinner and the wicked—that is, sensuality and deceit, from which all evil springs; wipe them away through self-control and humble benevolence: so that, even if sin were to be rigorously scrutinized in you at the time of judgment, nothing of the sort would be found in your deeds; for transgressions are erased when, having come to hate the causes that led to them, we begin to wage war against them, and we will turn our initial defeat into a final victory.

5. There is nothing better than pure prayer, from which, as from a spring, all virtues flow—prudence and meekness, love and self-control, and intercession and comfort descending from above because of tears. Its goodness consists in keeping the mind attentive to what is spoken by the tongue and thought by the mind, and in an insatiable, constant longing for communion with God, when the mind, through contemplation of the Existent, hastens after its Lord and, with ardent love, eagerly seeks to find the Invisible; and when it encounters the darkness that veils Him, it returns to itself once more, with all-reverent humility, content with what is now revealed for its benefit through contemplation, and finding comfort in that; yet remaining in the blessed hope of ultimately attaining the desired goal when the vision “as in a mirror, in a riddle” comes to an end, and the pure, unceasing “face-to-face vision” of Him begins (1 Cor. 13:12).

6. Refrain from higher contemplations if you have not yet attained the utmost dispassion; do not pursue what cannot be attained, and do not seek what is beyond your strength. If you wish, as someone says, to become a theologian and a contemplative through the way of life, ascend to this level and, through purity, attain purity (Theology). Having mentioned theology, I remind you, —take care not to stretch toward its heights to the point of boundlessness, and know that it is not fitting for us, still nourished by the milk of virtue, to attempt to soar there, lest we waste our feathers in vain, as happens to young fledglings, even though the sweetness of knowledge strongly entices our desire. But when, having been purified by chastity and tears, we are lifted up from the earth, like Elijah or Habakkuk, foreshadowing or prefiguring the rapture that is to come on the clouds, and through contemplative prayer—pure and unworldly—having risen above the senses, we seek God, then, perhaps, we will touch upon theology to some extent.

7. Likewise, if you desire to be deemed worthy of divine vision and the illumination of the mind, first love a peaceful and silent life, and, having detached yourself from everything, come to know both yourself and God. If this comes to pass, then nothing will stand in your way, and—like a gentle breeze (the voice of coolness)—within your inner being, which is pure and undisturbed by any passion, you will wisely behold the One who is invisible to all, proclaiming salvation to you through the most profound knowledge of Him.

8. Just as thunder is immediately expected after a flash of lightning, so too, where divine purification has shone forth, the storm of passions subsides. And where this occurs, the pledge of that (future) bliss is established within the one who has attained it. But there is neither a sense of divine mercy nor hope of dispassion in a soul that loves the world more than its Creator, that nurtures attachments to the visible, and that craves carnal pleasures and delights with all its desire.

9. Do not seek the Divine—what it is and where it is—with your mind; for it is supernatural and cannot be confined to a place, being above all that exists. But show within yourself, as in a mirror, the God-Word—who is described through the Incarnation—as much as this is possible; for in this case, He, emitting rays of light through His divine nature, is mentally conceived as being in a specific place, while remaining omnipresent, due to the indescribable nature of the Divine. However, to the extent that you purify yourself, to that extent you will become worthy of divine illumination.

10. Desiring true knowledge and certain assurance of salvation, first learn to sever the soul’s passionate bonds with the body; and, having stripped yourself of attachment to the material, descend into the abyss of humility—and you will find the priceless pearl of salvation, as in a shell, hidden in divine knowledge, and which foreshadows for you the radiance of the Kingdom of God.

11. For one who has faithfully fulfilled spiritual obedience, having subjugated the flesh to the spirit, human obedience is not required; for such a one abides in obedience to the Word of God and the Law, like a grateful servant. But for those in whom there is a struggle and a war of the body against the soul, it is necessary to have a leader and ruler and to obey him, as one who, with knowledge of the matter, knows how to steer the helm of our life and equip us with the necessary weapons in due time, so that invisible adversaries may not take us captive, and passions may not overwhelm us through our inexperience.

12. When no passion disturbs you, the divine desire will grow within you, in your heart; when, moreover, you no longer fear death, regarding it as sleep, but rather long for release from the body: then you will obtain, as is fitting, the pledge of salvation, and you will carry the Kingdom of Heaven within yourself, rejoicing with inexpressible joy.

On the Priesthood

1. Having been deemed worthy of the divine and honorable priesthood, you must first and foremost always offer yourself as a sacrifice by mortifying your passions and carnal pleasures, and in this way dare to approach the life-giving and awesome sacrifice, lest you be consumed by the divine fire like some easily combustible substance. For if even the Seraphim did not dare to touch the coal without tongs (Isaiah 6:6), how can you touch it without dispassion? Through it, you will have a sanctified tongue, purified lips, and a soul that is pure along with your body, and your very hands will shine brighter than any gold, as servants of the supernatural fire and sacrifice.

2. Contemplate deeply the power of these words, for every day you behold this saving mystery of God, which, when the elder Simeon once saw it, he was astonished and asked for death; and if you have not received revelation from the Holy Spirit that you are a favored mediator between God and mankind, like an angel, then do not dare, to your own ruin, to undertake the all-holy and awe-inspiring celebration of the Divine Mysteries, before which the angels bow in reverence and from which many of the saints have reverently refrained, lest, like Zana, they be taken from among the living by the judgment of the Most High.

3. “Take heed to yourself,” as the Apostle said (1 Tim. 7:16). Take heed to yourself and always offer up a sacrifice for your past sins, so that whatever was in you—or perhaps still is—that is impure due to weakness may be consumed by the divine fire. In this way, you will be able—as it were, a chosen, useful, pure vessel, worthy of such a sacrifice—to transform yourself from a silver or even a gold vessel, even if you were once made of wood or clay, provided that, through your bold hope, you have God inclined to show you mercy. For where God is ready to hear, there are no obstacles to the transformation of one thing into another.

4. Take heed to the angel-like honor to which you have been raised, and strive with every virtue and purity to remain blameless in the rank to which you have been called. See what became of the fallen Lucifer because of his pride. Do not suffer the same fate by dreaming of great things for yourself, but rather, considering yourself dust, ashes, and shame, always weep that, despite this, you are admitted to Divine Communion and to the performance of the awe-inspiring sacred rite of the Holy Mysteries, by God’s boundless love for humanity and His ineffable goodness.

5. One who has received the priesthood must be pure from all passions, especially from fornication and malice, regarding which one should not even entertain the slightest thought; lest you be subjected to wrath and a curse, like a leper or one defiled by soot, when he dares to touch the king’s body.

6. Washed white by streams of tears more than by snow, with a conscience bright in purity, partake of the Holy Mysteries as a saint, revealing the inner beauty of your soul through an outward, angelic countenance. But take heed: in the celebration of the Divine Mysteries, do not be satisfied with human traditions alone, but may grace be with you, secretly and mysteriously enabling you to comprehend the higher meaning therein.

7. Longing for incorruption and immortality, celebrate the life-giving and imperishable mysteries with piety and reverence, desiring at the same time to depart from this world, having become perfect through faith. But if you fear death, then you have not yet been united in love with Christ, Whom you are privileged to partake of with your own hands, and Whose flesh you are nourished by. For if this were so, you would hasten to go to the place where your Beloved is, regarding neither life nor flesh as anything.

8. Having become a partaker of God’s flesh and a priest and fellow partaker through Holy Communion, you are bound to be united with the likeness of His death, “no longer living for yourself,” but, according to the Apostle, for Him who was crucified and died for you (2 Cor. 5:15). But if you live passionately for the flesh and the world, you are preparing yourself for eternal torment after death—unless, before your death, you voluntarily cease to offer this bloodless sacrifice. Who does not know that many who have unworthily performed the sacred rites, having been snatched away from here by sudden death, have been sent straight to the torments of the hereafter?

9. A certain priest and monk, renowned for his piety and revered by many as honorable in outward appearance, but inwardly secretly indulging in lust and defiling himself, while celebrating the Divine and Holy

Liturgy, reached the Cherubic Hymn and, bowing as usual before the Holy Table, began to read, “No one is worthy”... he suddenly died, because his soul left him in that position.

10. There is nothing more desirable than sound reason and wisdom. For from these spring the fear of God and love for God: the former purifies through reverence and self-restraint, while the latter perfects through a serene disposition and prudence, and enables the mind to soar freely in lofty contemplations and ascents toward heaven. But without fear, it is impossible to proceed directly to divine love, and, bypassing love, to soar to the hoped-for and rest in it.

11. Go, then, you who desire salvation; run with zeal and without knowing weariness until you reach your goal—seek diligently, ask unceasingly, knock patiently until you succeed, having raised firm faith and humility like a banner at the top of the ladder. But do not consider yourself to have attained what you desire when you receive the forgiveness of sins, but when you cease to fear the uprising of all passions, being ready without fear and with boldness to depart from the body.

12. With many tears, seek to receive assurance of your salvation, but not before your death, if you are humble and wise, lest you later, having become carefree, lose heart regarding the matter of salvation; but then, near the end, to obtain it—which is, however, certain—pray that, having boldly and foolishly imagined that you possess it, you might not find yourself failing to reach the place you dreamed of when the long-awaited time finally comes. Where, then, will you go, wretched one, without the pledge and the certain, saving assurance given by the Holy Spirit?!

13. Having desired God-given dispassion, first seek this desired state through obedience and humility, so that, by taking a different path toward it, you may not cause yourself in vain labor. Those who have attained dispassion, however, must not regard as such the one who is sometimes besieged by passions and at other times is at peace and undisturbed by them, but rather the one who constantly enjoys dispassion, and who, even when the causes of passions are present, remains unmoved by them, and when thoughts of them arise, suffers no distress from them.

14. With insults and reproaches, the enemy boldly attacks the soul that has departed from the body, like a bitter and fearsome accuser of its failings. But one can then see how the God-loving soul, though it was once often wounded by many sins, is not in the least shaken by his attacks and threats, but, being established in the Lord, is filled with joy and boldness, seeing the Holy Powers accompanying her; and, being shielded by the light of faith, with great fearlessness, cries out to the evil one: “What have you to do with me, you fugitive from heaven and slave of the evil one? You have no power over us. Christ, the Son of God, has authority over us, as He does over all things. To Him we have sinned, and to Him we will give an account, having Him as our guarantor of mercy and of our salvation in Him through His glorious Cross. “But you, wretched one, flee from us; you are nothing to us or to Christ’s servants.” At such bold words from the soul, the devil finally breaks, torn by screams, unable to withstand the name of Christ. The soul, after this, having passed through the realm of the princes of the air, is joyfully carried by the Divine Angels to the place assigned to it according to its nature.

15. Let not love for fleeting things draw you down to earth, O wise one of the heavens. For if any attachment to earthly goods binds you, you are like an eagle caught by a net around its talon, unable to soar to the heights. Therefore, regard and esteem all things as “rubbish” (Phil. 3:8), in the hope of something better; and when the time comes, having cast off the very flesh, you will freely follow the Angel who leads you.

16. Just as it is impossible to deposit a coin lacking the royal seal alongside ordinary coins in the royal treasury, so it is impossible, without true knowledge and dispassion, to receive the pledge of that bliss, and to depart from here with boldness and confidence toward what is hoped for and to be united with the elect. By “guidance,” I do not mean wisdom, but the infallible knowledge of God and the divine, through which the God-loving person, unbound by earthly passions, is elevated to deification by the grace of the Holy Spirit.

17. Even if you have gone through everything pertaining to the active life, do not rely on yourself in this, as if you had already attained dispassion and could move about the world carefree; lest, in such a case, having taken on passionate dispositions, you encounter something contrary to the order of your life before returning to yourself. But always, under the watchful eye of fear, take diligent care of your changeable and fickle nature, prudently keeping your distance from the causes of the passions. For dispassion, which is utterly unchanging, is found only in those who have attained perfect love and, through unceasing contemplation, are held aloft above all that is sensory and have ascended to the heights of humility—those whom the flame of passions no longer touches, for it is quenched by the voice of the Lord, so that they (the perfect ones) may be transformed into incorruptibility.

18. Do not desire dispassion before its time, lest you suffer the same fate as the first man, who, being immature, tasted the tree of knowledge; but by laboring patiently in all-encompassing self-restraint and unceasing prayer, and by maintaining, with self-contempt and extreme humility, your active habits and disciplines, you will subsequently, at the opportune time, receive the grace of dispassion—this haven of rest—after storms and tribulations. For God is not resentful; He will open the door to dispassion at the proper time for those who walk in righteousness.

19. “Go to the ant, you sluggard” (Prov. 6:6)—and learn from it the love of labor. But do not forget that God has no need of our good deeds, for He lacks nothing and is filled with all things; but He Himself bestows bountifully and graciously, and saves by His grace those who are wise, faithful to Him by choice, and grateful; though He graciously accepts their works according to their ability. Therefore, if you labor as one who is indebted to Him for the good He has previously bestowed upon you, you do well—and God’s mercy is near to you; but if you think of God as a debtor to you for the good you do in your own eyes, then you have gone astray, having strayed from the straight path: for how can a benefactor be a debtor?—Nevertheless, go on as a hired hand; and, progressing little by little, you will attain, by God’s mercy, what you seek.

20. Would you like me to show you another path to salvation—or rather, to detachment? Pester your Creator with all your might through prayer, so that you may not stray from your goal, always presenting before Him, as intercessors, the heavenly hosts and all the Saints, together with the Most Holy Theotokos; and do not seek dispassion, as one unworthy of such a gift, but earnestly seek salvation, and with it you will receive dispassion as well; of these, one is like silver, and the other like pure gold; and have, above all, a secret work, O servant of God, and certain secret mysteries of the Word to God—those who worship you, by whom He is pleased and honored.

21. Strive to receive the pledge of salvation within, in your heart, as an unquestionable assurance; lest, otherwise, at the hour of departure, you unexpectedly encounter fear and trembling. Consider yourself to have received this pledge when your heart no longer looks upon you with favor in any transgression, and your conscience no longer accuses you of your sins; when the wildness of beastly passions has been subdued within you by the grace of God; when tears of consolation flow of their own accord, and your mind prays with purity and without distraction; and when you joyfully and willingly await death—which is terrifying to many, and which they would wish to avoid.

22. “The words of eternal life,” which, as the Apostle Peter testified (John 6:68), the Word of God possesses, are words concerning what has been accomplished through Him, by which those who are secretly guided to Him already obtain, even from here, eternal life, the pledge of the Spirit, and an unshameful hope of salvation. But this is not granted to those who prefer the flesh to the soul, who are partial to earthly goods, and who take pleasure in them.

23. A “rational” (logikoz—reasoning) person is not one who possesses the spoken word (the ability to speak articulately): for every human being is such; but rather one who, by rational power, seeks and investigates how to find God. However, he will never find that which is, by nature, Supernatural. This is impossible for any nature; but in the most wise ordering of all that exists, in the providence over it, its preservation, direction, and governance, the “beauty” of this “cunning Creator” and “Progenitor” is, as it were, contemplated and perceived (Wisdom of Solomon 13:1, 4, 5), just as a housebuilder is known by the work of his hands.

24. You cannot attain detachment as you ought without dispassion, nor dispassion without love, nor love without the fear of God and pure prayer, nor these without faith and carefree trust, by which the mind, inspired, casts aside earthly speculation, soars to the heavenly realm, and surveys it, seeking its Lord.

25. Cherish purity as the apple of your eye, that you may be a temple of God and a dwelling place pleasing to Him; for without chastity it is impossible to become one with God. This gives rise to love for God, detachment from the world, and withdrawal from it, and is preserved by humility, self-control, unceasing prayer, spiritual contemplation (meditation on God), tears, and reflection—the benefits of which you will not attain without dispassion.

26. Let no one deceive you into thinking that, contrary to the Apostle’s word (Heb. 12:14), one can behold God without “holiness” (purity). For the Lord, who is all-good and surpasses all purity, does not will to reveal Himself inwardly to the impure. Just as one who loves his father or mother, or his daughter or son, more than Him is unworthy of Him, so too is unworthy of Him the one who prefers something temporary and material to love for Him—and all the more so this vile and foul sin. God turns away from those who do not turn away from this impurity, for “the perishable must put on the imperishable” (1 Cor. 15:50).

27. You will not attain divine love without knowledge, nor knowledge without faith; by faith I mean not merely a bare faith, but one born of the practice of virtue. You will attain true contrition when, through self-restraint, vigilance, prayer, and humility, you have dried up the lustful pleasure entwined with your flesh, you will be crucified with the Lord Jesus, and you will no longer live according to the flesh, but will begin to live by the Spirit, in accordance with the hope of “a higher calling and election” (2 Peter 1:10).

28. “In this I know that You have desired me,” the Prophet cries out to God, “for my enemy will not rejoice over me” (Ps. 40:12), as he continues to torment and dishonor me with passions until the end. But before the end, deliver me from his hands, and, having granted me to live spiritually as is pleasing to You, deign, after a blessed departure, to present me, saved, before Your throne—bearing from here the pledge of salvation, by Your mercy, and the unquestionable assurance thereof; for I consider it an unbearable calamity—more bitter and more terrible than death and hell itself—to be found unprepared and trembling at the hour of my departure.

29. Faith and hope are no simple or casual matters; but faith requires a steadfast soul, and hope a righteous character and heart. Moreover, who would readily believe in the unseen without grace? And who will have hope for an uncertain future if they have not had some genuine experience of the Lord’s gifts, from which they might receive assurance of the future as of the present? Both of these virtues require the strength of our will, as well as God’s guidance and help; without them, our labor is in vain.

30. True virtue is born either of knowledge, or of dispassion, or of both together. Therefore, if anyone were to seek this in us in vain, it would be true that our virtue is only an apparent virtue, and not a true one. For if it were not so, it would be rich in fruit, not merely in leaves. Thus, one who is moved to do good—whether by a desire to please others, by self-indulgence, or by something else displeasing to God—is deceitful and does not love God. But if we correct the motivating cause, we will undoubtedly attain perfection in true virtue, which, in due time and in due measure, will bring us both knowledge and dispassion through the grace of our all-good God.

31. “Discern the enemy’s schemes” (2 Cor. 2:11) through the enlightenment of grace, and, humbling yourself before God with tears, confess your weakness, considering yourself nothing, even though our deceiver leads us to think that we are something. Do not seek the bestowal of gifts if they do not contribute to salvation and the preservation of humility; rather, seek unpretentious knowledge as the foundation for the knowledge of God, and strive not to be constantly tormented by passions as by tyrants, and to be freed from the flesh through dispassion, or at least through sorrow for your sins.

32. Just as one cannot soar upward without wings, so one cannot attain the hoped-for without certain assurance of it even while still here; and this assurance arises from humility, or from the grace of the Holy Spirit in those who have fully pleased God—to whom impassivity is certainly characteristic, either in part or in full, depending on the degree of their pleasing God and their purification. But those who depart from the body in a different state—as in the winter of the passions or on the Sabbath (that is, without works of virtue) (Matt. 24:20)—are subject to judgment and torment at the time of reckoning.

33. You who are being saved now, give thanks to God the Savior. And if you wish to offer gifts to Him, offer gratefully from your widowed soul two mites—that is, humility and love. And He will accept them—as I well know—more than the great wealth of good deeds that many cast into the treasury of salvation. But if, like Lazarus, you are in need of revival, having died to your passions, send these very virtues, like dear sisters, as intercessors before Him—and you will certainly receive what you seek.

34. Even if you properly maintain the active vigilance of a virtuous life, by this alone you cannot reach the haven of dispassion, so that you may pray purely and without distraction; unless, at the same time, your mind is embraced by spiritual contemplations of enlightening knowledge and understanding of reality, by which, being inspired and enlightened, it would soar rapidly upward in true prayer—breathing entirely of love—toward the lights of the higher, immaterial orders that are akin to it, and from there, as far as possible, to the great Light, to the Triune Godhead.

35. We will not be punished in the age to come for having sinned, nor will we be condemned for this reason, having been created with a changeable and fickle nature; but rather for having sinned and not repented, and for not having turned from the evil path to the Lord, even though we were given the power and time to repent. God is good and merciful toward those who repent, even though He is portrayed as threatening and wrathful; but this is directed against evil and sin, not against us, whom He is always ready to accept as soon as He sees a tear of contrition on our faces. Indeed, He treats us according to our deeds and dispositions, rewarding each person according to the merit of his or her life.

36. When you happen to stumble from your upright standing, do not tremble, but, straightening yourself as quickly as possible, hasten to return to your former state of well-being through sorrow, regret, self-reproach, and a plentiful outpouring of tears, in a spirit of contrition; by virtue of which, having risen from the fall that has befallen you, you will enter the bosom of saving joy, resolving in your heart to stand firm henceforth, so that, having again provoked the Judge, you may not need tears and contrition for purification: for if this does not happen here, then we will certainly not escape the torments we deserve in the future.

On the Priesthood

1. Once again, we turn to the most honorable priesthood: what angelic disposition and what purity it demands, and how, upon accepting it, it requires even greater steadfastness and chastity than before; for if that which is impure must be purified to some extent, how can that which is pure be allowed to be defiled? Otherwise, if we allow the light to be darkened, and mix something foul with the fragrant oil, then, alas, we are bound to inherit—and ruin, like the sacrilegious, such as Ananias and Sapphira.

2. Even if it seems to you that, from a vessel of perdition and unworthiness, you have worthily entered the angelic and divine order of the priesthood—by virtue of a certain measure of purity, having become a vessel of election pleasing to the Lord, according to the Apostle—nevertheless, guard with all your heart the unblemished honor with which you have been graced. Guard this divine gift as the apple of your eye, lest, having partaken without due care, you be cast down from on high into an abyss from which it will be difficult for you to find a way out.

3. As a wise man, understand that if “God is the one who justifies, who then will condemn?” (Rom. 8:34). And if, having been called, you have entered the blessed and exalted order of the divine priesthood, you need not worry about your past life—even if you happened to have sinned—but immediately, with God’s help, purify yourself and make amends. But after this, let your first concern—attentive and sober—be not to tarnish this grace; so that if anyone should foolishly condemn your ordination to the priesthood because of your past deeds, he may hear, as a rebuke, the divine voice crying out: “What God has made clean, do not you call unclean” (Acts 10:15).

4. The office of the priesthood is light, and its yoke is a blessing; but only for those who, upon accepting it, begin to amend their lives as they ought, and who have not attempted to obtain the grace of the Holy Spirit through purchase. For if what is unbuyable and unsellable is deemed to have been purchased through human striving and a perishable gift, then just as this calling did not come from above, so too will this burden be very heavy—since it is borne unworthily and beyond one’s strength, and this yoke will harshly wear down the back and crush the strength of the one who bears it, until it completely exhausts and wears him out, unless he lays it down.

5. Having boldly taken up the yoke of the priesthood, walk in the ways of righteousness and speak the word of truth with righteousness, working out your salvation through it with fear and trembling. For our God is a consuming fire: and if you touch Him, whether you are like gold or silver, do not fear being burned, as the Babylonian youths in the furnace; but if you are like grass and reeds, made of flammable material, like one who is wise only in earthly matters, then fear that you may be burned by the heavenly fire, unless you flee from wrath, like Lot, by abstaining from dreadful mysteries, or hasten to wash yourself in the tears of repentance. Only by being drenched with the water of tears will you become impervious and invulnerable to the fire of truth, like the once-frail plant of the thicket. In that case, I do not know if there is any sin—to which we are so prone due to our weakness—that cannot be erased by the divine fire through worship performed with complete purity or through effective purification.

6. Since you have not been able to break away from and purify yourself of your passionate inclinations—due to long-standing habit—how dare you, wretched one, touch that which is even untouchable to the angels? Therefore, either tremble and abstain from the divine liturgy, thereby appeasing God’s justice, or, as an insensitive and incorrigible person, allow yourself to fall into the hands of the living God, Who will not spare you out of love for humanity, but will punish you mercilessly for shamelessly daring to approach the royal wedding feast with a defiled soul and in rags, when you are unworthy even to enter the royal palace, let alone to recline at His feast.

7. I knew one of the consecrated who dared to approach the Divine Mystery unworthily, because of the lustful passion that possessed him. For this, he fell into a severe and incurable illness and was already nearing death. Since, having done everything in his power to cure his illness, he had not succeeded in the least—and the illness not only persisted but grew worse—he came to his senses and, realizing that he was dying because of his unworthy celebration of the Liturgy, made a solemn vow never again to participate in the sacred service. These words were immediately followed by the healing of his illness, so that not a trace of it remained.

8. The order of the priesthood and the sacred vestments are resplendent, but only if the ordained one also possesses a soul that shines with purity within. But when he defiles himself through carelessness, and the conscience that bears witness to this shame is despised, then light becomes darkness, the cause of eternal gloom and fire, unless, having abandoned this path—which is treacherous on both sides—he chooses another: a virtuous life lived with humility, leading safely to the Kingdom of God.

9. Salvation is attained through virtue even in a lowly state, and not through a noble priesthood that demands a life equal to that of the angels. Therefore, either be dispassionate like an angel, as if existing outside the world and the flesh through contemplation, and thus ascend this heavenly ladder; or, recognizing your weakness, fear the height that threatens a great fall for the unready, and cling to the life the life common to the majority—yet no less than that special life which leads to God and unites one with Him—in which, even if you should happen to fall, it will be easier for you to rise again through repentance, by the grace of our all-merciful God.

10. “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 15:50). But you, partaking of the flesh and blood of God, are made one body with Him and mingled with His blood; therefore you already have the Kingdom of Heaven within you: how then are you besieged by the passions of flesh and blood? I fear that the Spirit of God will not abide in you, as in the “flesh” (Gen. 6:3), and at the hour of Judgment you will be cut in two: then they will take the most honorable priesthood from you, as from one unworthy of such grace, and send you to eternal torment in hell.

11. It is as if the fear of God is absent from your eyes, for you seem to regard the unworthy performance of the priestly office as a trivial matter, being deceived by self-love, which suggests to you that the Deity is good. On this Daphan and Avirron once rested, until the earth swallowed them up. – You, too, should be horrified by this, and truly fear where there is fear (Ps. 13: 5), keep in mind how great a matter the Divine Liturgy is: and either, if you are worthy and pure—not to say, angelic—exercise the authority of the Divine priesthood, or withdraw from this awesome ministry, as a reasonable person; otherwise, if you are now negligent in this matter and deceive your conscience, which accuses you, with sophistry, you will one day—when all is rightly judged and condemned—cry out with a groan: “The fear of which I was afraid has come upon me, and the terror of which I dreaded has overtaken me” (Job 3:25)!

12. Soberly and with deep sorrow, first offer up the world-saving Holy Sacrifice for your own purification, with contrition and tears; for who, like you, will grieve for you and offer a sacrifice on your behalf when you die? Therefore, foreseeing what is to come, remember yourself as if already buried, offering these holy gifts to God at the table in intercession for your salvation, recalling His voluntary and merciful sacrifice here.

13. What an indescribable and inexpressible consolation it is when the soul, confident of its salvation, departs from the body, laying it aside as a garment! For, as if already in possession of the hoped-for blessings, it leaves the body without a care, going in peace toward the Angel who descends from above to meet it with joy and gladness, and together with him passes unhindered through the air, without being subjected to any attack by the spirits of malice, but ascending with joy, boldness, and cries of thanksgiving, until it reaches the presence of the Creator, and there receives the decree to be placed among the host of those like itself and equal in virtue, until the general resurrection.

14. I will tell you a terrifying thing; but do not be surprised. — Even if you do not attain dispassion, perhaps because of tyrannical inclinations, yet if, at the hour of your departure, you are in a state of profound humility—no less than that of the dispassionate—you will be carried aloft on the clouds. For though the treasure of the dispassionate may consist of every virtue, the precious gem of humility is more honorable and exalted than all of them, and to those who acquire it, it brings not only reconciliation with God but also entry, together with the elect, into the bridal chamber of His Kingdom.

15. Receiving from God the forgiveness of your sins, glorify Him, for He does not remember your evil nor take vengeance on you for it, and guard yourself with all your might against willful falls. For although even in such cases it is possible to receive forgiveness every day until the very moment of death, you prove yourself ungrateful if you sin so easily and knowingly. However, if, using the rock of hope to drive away the dog of despair, you implore God's goodness unceasingly and patiently, many of your sins will be forgiven, so that you too may come to love the All-Merciful and Most Blessed One in the age to come.

16. When, by the working of divine grace, you stand before God in prayer with tears, fall prostrate, stretching out on the ground in the shape of a cross, and, striking your head, ask for forgiveness here, as deliverance from corruption and deliverance from temptations; but do not desire to depart as you wish, but as, when, and where God wills; and even with love, express your readiness to depart together with these tears to the Lord in deep humility, so as to quench the flame of your desire and longing; but be willing to endure a delay for the time being, if God sees fit to provide something better. Seek only one thing earnestly and persistently—that you may not fall away from God—by refraining from doing, saying, intending, or undertaking anything that would lead to this.

17. As one who dwells in the flesh, do not attempt to investigate the mental and spiritual realms as they truly are, even though the intellect of your soul inclines you toward this when it is pure. For as long as the incorporeal soul, held in the bonds of flesh and blood, does not cast off this heaviness and does not come to dwell with the intellectual powers, it cannot, as it ought, contemplate them or understand them. Therefore, as you prepare to emerge from your material bonds—as from a second, dark womb—into that immaterial and luminous existence, be of good cheer, praising your benefactor who leads us through death to the better life we long for—remain constantly sober and vigilant, for the impure demons that roam around us, always slandering our well-being and treacherously watching our every step until the very end of life—and until your very end, tremble for yourself, because of the uncertainty of the future, since you were created to be fickle and changeable by your own free will.

18. The enemy confronts us with cruel and terrifying temptations when he senses that the soul has attained the highest degrees of virtue. This is evidenced by the words of prayer and its elevation above the material duality of the flesh and the senses. And then the enemy of mankind tempts us so maliciously that we are even driven to despair in this life. But he, in his vanity, does not know what blessings he brings upon us, making us more experienced through patience and weaving crowns of light for us.

19. There is no other feat as great as that of chastity and virginity. He who honestly preserves celibacy is a source of wonder to the angels and is crowned no less than the martyrs. For how much toil and sweat is required of one who, being bound by flesh and blood, always strives to imitate the incorporeality of the incorporeal through purity? And truly, this endeavor is so great and lofty that it would be impossible—as something supernatural—if God did not manifest from on high His intercession, strengthening and upholding our frail and mortal nature, and in a certain way raising it up from the earth through divine love and the hope of the promised rewards.

20. The flesh, weakened by overindulgence in food and sleep, is a great obstacle to chastity. True chastity, however, remains unshaken even in the dreams of sleep. For if the mind takes pleasure in them while asleep, this is a sign that it harbors this passion deep within. But if, by God's grace, it is granted to converse with God in sleep, it is clear that it remains untouched by this passion; which is why it serves at all times as a vigilant guardian of the soul and body, keeping them in peaceful harmony with one another, like a dog keeping watch over them against treacherous wolves, and thereby averting predation.

21. I will tell you something strange; but do not be surprised. There is a certain hidden mystery that takes place between God and the soul. This happens to those who attain the highest degrees of perfect purity, love, and faith, when a person, having been completely transformed, unites with God—as one belonging to Him—through unceasing prayer and contemplation. At this stage, Elijah seals the heavens against rain and consumes the sacrifice with heavenly fire; Moses parts the sea and, with a wave of his hand, puts the Amalekites to flight; Jonah is delivered from the whale and the depths of the sea. For there is a certain necessity in this for the most philanthropic God, but only to the extent that it is in accordance with His will. He who is deemed worthy of this, though clothed in flesh, has transcended the bounds of decay and mortality, accepting death as one would an ordinary sleep—a sleep that, to his comfort, transports him to that which he has always longed for.

On the Priesthood

1. Revering the Lord's sufferings, the self-emptying of the Word of God for our sake, as well as the sacrifice and union within us of the life-giving and divine Body and Blood—of which we partake not only in Communion but also in the celebration of the Divine Liturgy—humble yourself like a lamb led to slaughter, regarding all as truly superior to you, and be careful in every way not to wound anyone's conscience. Without first purifying yourself, do not dare to partake of the Holy Mysteries, lest you be burned like hay by the Divine Fire, or, like wax, melt and spill out?

2. And truly, if you perform this divine, most holy, and awe-inspiring sacrament as you ought, and your conscience reproaches you in nothing, then in nothing else will you find such certain hope of salvation as in it. For from it you will receive greater benefit than from any other deed or contemplation. – But if this is not the case, then see for yourself what this means. – And it is certainly better, in recognition of one's own weakness, to renounce the high office of the priesthood than to accept it, bear it, and—while appearing exalted to many—in reality, through one's unworthiness, be like a corpse, worthy of weeping.

3. The ministry of the holy priesthood, its propitiation of God, and its unceasing intercession for all before Him far surpass all psalm-singing and prayer, just as the sun surpasses the stars. For we offer up the Only-Begotten Himself as a sacrifice, —Him, who out of love for mankind laid down His life for sinners, we offer and present in supplication not only for the remission of sins, but also for the granting of all that we need and for which we pray: and the Body, united with the Divinity, like a burning coal consumes every iniquity and enlightens the hearts of those who approach with faith; likewise, the Divine and all-honored Blood, more effective than any hyssop, washes away and purifies every impurity and defilement of those who dare to approach the Holy Mysteries with every kind of contrition and hopeful devotion. Where else can one find anything like this?!

4. The body of God the Word, which has not ascended into heaven—as one of the Saints said—is not consumed after descending from heaven, but the very bread and the very wine are transformed into the Body and Blood of Christ, when this is performed with faith, fear, love, and reverence for the divine mystery by those entrusted with the honorable priesthood, in which mystery this transformation from one into the other is accomplished through the action and inspiration of the All-Holy Spirit. What purity and holiness, then, are required of the priest who touches the Divine Body, and what boldness is required when he must act as a mediator between God and people, having as his intercessors, together with the Most Holy Mother of God, the heavenly angelic hosts, and all the saints from ages past? It seems to me that they are angelic or archangelic: for qualities must correspond to rank.

5. You must note, brother, that the Holy Gifts, which are to be consecrated, are left uncovered after the Creed so that they may, in a sense, pray for those who offer them and cry out with ineffable voices to Him who lives in heaven, that He may not despise them, but look upon them, remembering the voluntary exhaustion of His Son for sinners, His ineffable descent, and His philanthropic sacrifice; for He did not grant redemption and salvation to the righteous through His sufferings, but had mercy on us who had fallen and raised us up, as He is good and without malice.

6. Although you strive for pure prayer—which unites the incorporeal mind with God in an incorporeal way—and have already attained the point where, as in a mirror, you see the fate that awaits you after the end of this earthly life, having received the pledge of the Spirit and having acquired the Kingdom of Heaven within yourself with all your senses and with full assurance; nevertheless, do not allow yourself to be released from the flesh without foreknowledge of death, but pray earnestly for this and be confident in your heart that you will attain it, if it pleases God and is beneficial to you, before your departure, —for which you should prepare yourself day and night, casting aside all fear, as if you had already traversed the airy realms and avoided the spirits of malice, so that you might already be in the heavenly realms with boldness and without fear, placed among the angelic ranks and numbered among the righteous chosen from of old, and beholding God, as much as this is possible, or in every way beholding the blessings prepared for us by Him, and contemplating God the Word, who with His rays illuminates all that is above the heavens, worshiped with a single act of worship together with His most pure flesh, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, by all the heavenly powers and all the Saints. Amen.

The Venerable Philotheos of Sinai

A Brief Account of Him

Our venerable father Philotheus was the abbot of the monastic community on Mount Sinai, and thus received the epithet “of Sinai.” It is unknown when he lived or when he died. His present work, divided into 40 chapters, is beautifully composed and filled with—it is impossible to say—such great spiritual wisdom and soul-saving insight. For this reason, it would be unjust to separate it from the collection of other patristic writings on sobriety. – And it deserves greater attention: for if anyone were to call it an accurate interpretation and a true rule for sobriety, clarity of mind, and purity of heart, he would not be erring from the truth.

Our Holy Father Philotheos of Sinai’s 40 Chapters on Sobriety

1. There is a mental struggle within us that is more arduous than the physical one. The seeker of piety must strive for this and pursue this goal with his mind, so that, like a pearl or a precious stone, the memory of God may be perfectly treasured in the heart. One must forsake everything, even the body, and despise this very life itself, in order to acquire the one true God in one’s heart. For St. Chrysostom said that a single intelligent vision of God is sufficient to destroy the evil ones.

2. Those waging the spiritual battle must, with all zeal, choose for themselves—according to the guidance of the Divine Scriptures—spiritual practices and apply them to the mind as healing balms. Thus, from the morning, says one, one must stand courageously and unceasingly at the door of the heart, with a firm remembrance of God and the ceaseless prayer of Jesus Christ in the soul, and with this mental vigilance slay all the sinners of the earth, that is, with a faithful, strengthened, and soul-elevating remembrance of God, to cut down—for the Lord’s sake—the heads of the powerful and the origins of thoughts that stir up strife; for, as we know, even in the ascetic labors of the mind there is a certain divine order and sequence of action. – This is how one should discipline oneself (for the sake of the kingdom) until the appointed time for eating arrives. Afterward, having given thanks to the Lord—who, in His boundless love, nourishes us with both spiritual and physical food—one must occupy oneself with remembrance and reflection on death. And the next day, we must again resolutely set about our morning tasks. For even with such a daily routine, we will barely manage, in the Lord, to escape the snares of the enemy of our minds. Such a practice, however, once established within us, gives rise to the following three virtues: Faith, Hope, and Love, of which Faith disposes us to the true fear of God, and Hope, having overcome servile fear, leads a person to the love of God. If Hope does not put us to shame—for it usually gives rise to a twofold love upon which the Law and the Prophets depend—then Love, for its part, never fails, neither in this age—for here, in its partaker, it is the cause of the fulfillment of the divine commandments—nor in the age to come.

3. It is very rare to find those who are silent in mind. This is the hallmark only of those who employ every means to draw Divine grace to themselves and to be filled with the spiritual consolation that flows from it. – And so, if, like them, we wish to pursue the work of the mind—this philosophy of Christ—in the preservation of the mind and in sobriety, let us begin this path by abstaining from many foods, resolving to take food and drink in as small a measure as possible. Sobriety is rightly called a path, because it leads to the Kingdom—both the one within us and the one to come—and a spiritual workshop, because it refines and polishes the dispositions of the mind and transforms the passionate into the dispassionate. It is also like a small window of light through which God, drawing near, reveals Himself to the mind.

4. Where there is humility, remembrance of God with sobriety and attentiveness, and frequent prayer directed against the enemies—there is the place of God, or the heaven of the heart, in which the host of demons fears to stand, because God dwells in this place.

5. Nothing is more destructive than loquacity, nor more harmful than an unrestrained tongue; and nothing so greatly disrupts and destroys the riches of the soul. For what we build up within ourselves each day, loquacity destroys anew; and what we gather with toil, the soul squanders again through the malice of the tongue. What is worse than this (unrestrained tongue)? It is an uncontrollable evil. We must set a limit on it, rein it in, restrain it, and—to put it this way—compel it to serve only necessity. —And who can express all the spiritual harm that comes from an unrestrained tongue?

6. The first gate leading into the spiritual Jerusalem, into the mind's attention, is the reasonable silence of the lips, even though the mind itself is not yet silent; the second is measured (defined by a small measure) self-restraint in food and drink; the third, which purifies the mind and body, is the constant remembrance and reflection on death. Having once beheld the beauty of this last one, and having been moved and delighted by it—not with the eye but with the spirit—I desired to take her as my companion for a lifetime, having fallen in love with her grace and splendor. How humble, joyful yet sorrowful, and pensive she is; how she dreads the future righteous torment and how she fears the prolongation (by chance) of life! From her physical eyes she usually pours forth healing living water, and from her mental eyes—an abundant spring of wise thoughts, which, flowing and leaping, gladdens the mind. It was this very one, as I said, the daughter of Adam—that is, the remembrance of death—whom I always longed to have as my companion, to sleep with her, to converse with her, and together with her to explore what is to become of me after I cast off this body; but often this pernicious forgetfulness—this darkened daughter of the devil—prevented me from doing so.

7. There is a battle in which the spirits of malice secretly wage war against the soul through thoughts. For since the soul is invisible, those malevolent forces, in accordance with its nature, attack it with an invisible battle. And one can see, in both them and her, weapons, strategies (the deployment of troops and the conduct of battle), deceptive ruses, and terrifying attacks (a swift onslaught intended to intimidate), as well as mutual hand-to-hand combat, victories, and defeats on both sides. There is only one thing missing in this mental battle we are describing, compared to a physical battle: a specific time for declaring war. In a physical battle, a time is usually set, and the rules pertaining to it are observed; but this (mental) battle strikes suddenly, without warning, in the very depths of the heart, and having cast the lot (by choice; or, having gained the upper hand through the heart's consent to what is suggested), it kills the soul through sin. For what reason and for what purpose is this battle and struggle waged against us? It is so that we may not fulfill God's will, for which we pray, saying, "Thy will be done in us" (Luke 11:2), that is, God's commandments. And if anyone, having steadied his mind and turned away from wandering through perfect sobriety in the Lord, begins to carefully observe their (the invisible enemies') incursions (into the heart) and their entanglements (clashes with the sobering mind) occurring in the fantasies of the imagination, he will come to know this from experience. Therefore, the Lord, directing His purpose against the malicious demons—and since God foresaw their designs—established His commandments in opposition to their purpose, with a warning to those who violate them.

8. Once we have acquired some skill in self-restraint and in turning away from the visible evils produced by the five senses, we will then be able to guard our hearts with Jesus and be enlightened by Him, and with a certain warmth of disposition, to savor His goodness with our minds. For we have embraced the law of purifying the heart for no other reason than so that, when the clouds of evil thoughts are driven from the atmosphere of the heart and dispersed by unceasing attention, we may, as on a clear day, clearly see the Sun of righteousness—Jesus—and be enlightened to some extent in our minds by the words of His majesty; for these words are not usually revealed to everyone, but only to those who purify their minds.

9. We must maintain this state of mind daily, as befits standing before the face of God. For the Prophet Hosea says: "Keep mercy and justice, and draw near to your God" (Hosea 12:6). Again, the prophet Malachi speaks on behalf of God: "A son honors his father, and a servant fears his master; but if I am a father, where is my honor? And if I am a master, where is my fear?" says the Lord Almighty (1:6). The Apostle also writes: "Let us cleanse ourselves from every defilement, both of the flesh and of the spirit" (2 Cor. 7:11). And Wisdom instructs: "Guard your heart with all diligence, for from it flow the springs of life" (Prov. 4:23). And the Lord Jesus Christ Himself commands: "Clean the inside of the cup, so that the outside may also be clean" (Matt. 23:26).

10. The fruit of inappropriate, empty talk is sometimes hatred toward us from those who listen; sometimes reproach and ridicule, when they perceive the folly of our words; sometimes the defilement of the conscience; and sometimes condemnation from God and the grieving of the Holy Spirit—which is more terrible than anything else.

11. One who, purifying his heart and uprooting sin from it by the Lord, strives to acquire divine knowledge and succeeds in perceiving with his mind what is invisible to many, must not be haughty toward anyone because of this. What among created beings is purer than the incorporeal, and what is more knowledgeable than an angel? Yet even he, having become haughty, was cast down from heaven like a flash of lightning. God counted his pride as impurity. – It is well known how those who dig for gold act (that is, be beneath all, as they are beneath the earth, in order to obtain the gold of knowledge).

12. The Apostle says: “Everyone who competes in the games exercises self-control in all things” (1 Cor. 9:25). For it is impossible, with a belly full of food, to wage war against the principalities, against the invisible hostile forces—those who are bound by this flesh, which is heavy and always lusts against the spirit. “For the kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking” (Rom. 14:17). “The mind set on the flesh is hostile toward God; for it does not submit to God’s law, nor indeed can it” (Rom. 8:7). It cannot, obviously, because, being earthly and composed of bodily fluids, blood, and mucus, it is always drawn to earthly things and delights in the ruinous pleasures of this age. “For the mind set on the flesh is death; but those who are in the flesh cannot please God” (Rom. 8:8).

13. We need great humility if we sincerely care about keeping our minds in the Lord—first, in relation to God, and (second), in relation to people. We must always and in every way break our hearts, seeking out and putting into practice everything that can humble it. As is well known, the memory of our former life in the world breaks and humbles the heart, if we recall it as we ought. Likewise, the memory of all our sins from our youth, when we review them in our minds one by one, usually both humbles us and brings forth tears, and moves us to wholehearted thanksgiving to God, just as the constant, effective (and deeply felt) remembrance of death does, which at the same time gives rise to joyful weeping with sweetness and a sober mind. Above all, the remembrance of the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ humbles our pride and inclines us to cast our eyes down to the ground, when one goes over them in memory and recalls everything in detail. This also brings tears. Moreover, God’s great blessings—especially those bestowed upon us—truly humble the soul when one enumerates them in detail and reflects upon them; for we are engaged in a battle against proud (ungrateful to God) demons.

14. Do not, out of pride, shun these saving remedies for the soul, if you are one who needs them. For otherwise, you are no longer a disciple of Christ, nor an imitator of Paul, who says of himself, “I am not worthy to be called an apostle” (1 Cor. 15:9); and in another place confesses that he was formerly a blasphemer, a persecutor, and a violent man (1 Tim. 1:13). – Do you see, you proud one? Here is a saint, yet he did not forget his former life. Indeed, all the saints, from the beginning of creation until now, have clothed themselves in this ultimate holy garment of God (that is, humility). Our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, being God—incomprehensible, unknowable, and inexpressible—was clothed in humility throughout His entire life in the flesh; so that holy humility must rightly be called both a divine virtue and a sovereign commandment and garment. Likewise, the angels and all those luminous divine powers practice and preserve this virtue, knowing by what fall the proud Satan fell, and how he serves as an example of how one ought to fear falling (into this sin), the wicked one lies in the abyss, having been revealed before God as the most dishonorable of all creatures because of his pride. We also know by what fall Adam fell because of pride. Having such examples of this virtue that leads to pride before our eyes, let us always humble ourselves in every way, to the best of our ability, making use of the remedies indicated above. Let us humble ourselves in soul and body, in our reasoning, in our desires, in our speech, in our thoughts, in our outward appearance, both externally and internally. What we must be especially careful about is ensuring that Jesus Christ, the Son of God and God Himself, who stands in our place, does not turn against us. “For the Lord resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble” (Prov. 3:34). “No one who is haughty is pure before the Lord” (Prov. 16:5); “but whoever humbles himself will be exalted” (Luke 18:14). “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart,” says the Savior (Matt. 11:29).—We must therefore pay attention.

15. “Take heed to yourselves,” says the Lord, “lest at any time your hearts be weighed down with gluttony and the like” (Luke 21:34). “Everyone who competes in the games exercises self-control in all things,” according to the words of the Apostle (1 Cor. 9:25). Knowing all these sayings addressed to us in the Holy Scriptures, let us lead our lives in self-restraint. First of all, by renouncing a variety of foods, let us accustom our bodies to a virtuous habit and order, giving them food in moderation. For in this way, the outbursts of lust are easily tamed and brought under the control of reason; and, to speak the truth in all sincerity, so too are the outbursts of anger. But it is also easier to abstain from other sins in this way, since even those who practice virtue through deed and experience regard comprehensive abstinence—that is, keeping away from every kind of evil—as a virtue in itself. Thus, the reason for purity—after God, the source and giver of all good things—is abstinence from gluttony, practiced equally every day and in measured amounts.

16. Just as Satan, in his opposition to God and in his desire to prevent God's will—that is, His commandments—from being fulfilled, wages war against God through us by attempting to hinder its fulfillment: so again, God, desiring that His holy will—that is, as I have said, the divine and life-giving commandments—be fulfilled through us, by His own power, thwarts the wicked one's pernicious intent. God Himself thwarts the enemy's foolish desire to resist Him by enticing people to transgress His commandments, through human weakness. And see, is this not how it happens?—All the divine commandments establish laws for the threefold nature of the soul and make it sound through what they command. For those who strictly follow them, this tripartite nature becomes truly sound. But the devil wages war day and night against this very tripartite nature of the soul. If Satan wages war against the tripartite nature of the soul, it is clear that he is thereby waging war against Christ's commandments; for Christ, through His commandments, imposes the law upon the tripartite nature of the soul—that is, the soul's irascible, desiring, and thinking faculties. – And consider: the warning that whoever is angry with his brother without cause will be subject to judgment (Matt. 5:22), and His commandments that follow—these are remedies for the irascible part. The enemy attempts to subvert this commandment—and the others established along with it—from within through thoughts of strife, resentment, and envy. This adversary (ours and God's) knows that the ruler of the irascible part is the power of thought. That is why he first directs his arrows at it through thoughts—as I have already said—of suspicion, envy, strife, quarrelsomeness, cunning, and vanity, and inclines the mental power to relinquish its inherent authority, and, having handed the reins over to the irascible part itself, to leave it without any control. Then, having cast aside its ruler, irritation unrestrainedly pours out through the mouth in words everything that was previously stored in the heart—what had been treasured there until then by means of hostile thoughts, amid the mind's negligence. The heart is then filled not with the Spirit of God or with divine thoughts, but with (unbridled) malice; for, as the Lord says, “Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks” (Luke 6:45). When, in this way, the evil one leads a person to the point where he begins to spew forth in words what was previously secretly conceived within, then this captive (of the enemy) will not merely call his brother “a fool or a madman,” but will utter the most vexing words, and will even go so far as to commit murder. – Such are the schemes the Evil One employs against the commandment God has given us not to be angry in vain. – Yet it would be possible to avoid not only hurtful words but also what follows them, if, the moment irritation arises, through prayer and attention to what is happening within, the thoughts (the thoughts that fan the flames). Thus, the destroyer of souls achieves his evil goal only when he finds someone who, under the influence of the thoughts he has planted in their heart, is ready to violate the divine commandment.

17. And what does the Divine Lord's commandment prescribe regarding the desire of the flesh? “Whoever looks at a woman to lust after her has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Matt. 5:24). – And what kind of snare does the evildoer weave in his mind against this commandment, seeing that such a commandment has been given? Since the objects capable of arousing lust are distant, he turns inward, and there he wages a lustful battle against the aforementioned commandment. – He does this by painting and imprinting lewd images in the soul; sometimes even words are heard that stir up passion; and there are many other things known to those who have been tempted in mental battles.

18. What commandment, finally, provides guiding principles for the power of the mind? “But I say to you: Do not swear at all. Let your ‘Yes’ be ‘Yes,’ and your ‘No’ be ‘No’” (Matt. 5:34). Also: “Whoever does not renounce all his possessions cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:33). And: “Enter through the narrow gate” (Matthew 7:13). Are these the commandments for the mental faculty?—Our adversary, desiring to make even this mental faculty—like some valiant commander—subordinate to himself, first robs it of sound judgment through thoughts of gluttony and indolence; having thus deprived it of its inherent authority over the other powers and having mocked it as if it were a drunken leader, he compels it to carry out his suggestions and desires, using irritability and lust as his accomplices in this. These forces—lust and irritability—being left as mental powers, begin to turn all five of our senses, like obedient servants, into instruments for manifest sins. And behold what sins and downfalls result from this! When the mind does not restrain and bind the senses from within, then the eyes dart about everywhere out of curiosity, the ears delight in listening to trivial matters, the sense of smell becomes indulgent, the mouth becomes unrestrained, and the hands reach out to touch what they ought not to. This is followed by falsehood instead of truth, folly instead of wisdom, fornication instead of chastity, and timidity instead of courage. And these four principal virtues—that is, truth, wisdom, chastity, and courage—are of such a nature that, if they are sound and strong in the soul, they govern the three parts of the soul well; and a well-governed soul keeps the senses from all that is out of place. And then the mind, abiding in tranquility, while governing the other faculties according to God's will and in obedience to Him, easily prevails in the battle of the mind. But when, through inattention, it allows the other faculties to fall into confusion, then, being overcome by the wiles of the evil one, it transgresses the divine commandments. For the transgression of the commandments inevitably entails, in one way or another, either corresponding repentance or torment in the age to come. And so it is a very good thing for the mind to remain ever sober; for by this, having been established as it ought to stand by its very nature, it becomes the true guardian of the divine commandments.

19. The (sin-loving) soul, being fenced in and surrounded by spirits of malice as by a wall, is bound by the chains of darkness—and because of this darkness that surrounds her, she cannot pray as she ought: for she is bound by it in secret (in her innermost depths, or without even knowing how), and is blinded in her inner eyes. But when she (coming to her senses) begins to turn to God in prayer and strives to remain sober in prayer, then little by little she begins to be freed by the power of prayer from the darkness; otherwise, there is no way to be freed from it. At this time she comes to realize that within her heart there is another struggle, another hidden conflict, another war of thoughts, stirred up by spirits of malice, as Holy Scripture also testifies when it says: "If the spirit of the ruler rises up against you, do not leave your place" (Eccl. 10:4). The place of the mind, however, is its firm standing in virtue and sobriety. – There is a firm standing both in a virtuous life and in a sinful one. For Scripture says: "Blessed is the man who does not walk in the counsel of the wicked, nor stand in the way of sinners" (Ps. 1: 1). And the Apostle teaches: "Stand firm, having your loins girded with truth" (Eph. 6: 14).

20. Let us hold fast to Christ with all our might; for there are many who seek in every way to drive Him from our souls. And let us not allow Jesus to be led astray by the "crowd" of thoughts "dwelling in the soul" (John 5:13). But it is impossible to hold onto Him without painful spiritual effort. Let us strive to follow in the footsteps of His life in the flesh, so that we too may live our lives humbly. Let us take to heart His sufferings, so that, imitating Him, we may patiently endure all sorrow. Let us taste His ineffable, watchful forbearance toward us, so that through this sweet tasting in our souls, we may come to know how good the Lord is. Above all this—or rather, before all else—let us believe in Him without doubt in everything He says, and let us await daily His providence directed toward us; and whatever may happen, whatever we may encounter, let us accept it with gratitude, love, and joyful contentment, so that we may learn to look to the One God, Who governs all things according to the divine laws of His wisdom. When we do all this, then we will not be far from God. (Let us also know that) piety is an endless perfection, as one of the God-bearing and spiritually perfect men said.

21. Whoever makes good use of the time of his life, constantly being occupied with thoughts and remembrance of death, and thereby wisely delivers his mind from passions; such a person usually perceives the constant temptations of demonic influences more keenly than one who lives without the memory of death, hoping to purify the heart through the action of reason alone, rather than by always keeping a sorrowful and lamentable thought. Such a person, imagining that his quick wit allows him to keep all destructive passions in check, without realizing how he is bound by the worst of them all, falls into pride (as one who hopes to succeed in anything) without God. He must remain deeply sober so as not to lose his reason through arrogance. For, as the Apostle Paul says (1 Cor. 8:1), souls who gather knowledge from here and there usually become puffed up before those who, as it seems to them, know less than they do—for the reason, I think, that there is no spark of edifying love within them. But whoever has a constant thought of death is more perceptive than one who does not, noticing the temptations of demons, conveniently driving them away, and trampling them underfoot.

22. The sweet remembrance of God—that is, Jesus, with heartfelt anger and saving sorrow, usually destroys all the allurements of thoughts, various suggestions, words, daydreams, and dark imaginings—in short, everything with which the all-destructive enemy arms himself and with which he boldly attacks, seeking to devour our souls. Jesus, when invoked, easily consumes all these things. For there is no salvation for us in anyone else but Christ Jesus. The Savior Himself said this, declaring: "Without Me you can do nothing" (John 15:5).

23. And so, at every hour and every moment, let us guard our hearts with all diligence against thoughts that cloud the mirror of the soul, in which only Jesus Christ—who is the wisdom and power of God the Father—should be imprinted and reflected. Let us ceaselessly seek the Kingdom of Heaven within our hearts; and surely we will mysteriously find within ourselves the grain, the pearl, the leaven, and all else, if we purify the eye of our mind. It is for this very reason that our Lord Jesus Christ said, “The kingdom of God is within you” (Luke 17:21), meaning by this the Divinity dwelling within the heart.

24. Sobriety, leading to radiance, purifies the conscience. And the conscience, thus purified, drives out all darkness from within, just as light suddenly shines forth when the veil covering it is removed. And once the darkness is banished, the conscience, through unceasing true sobriety, once again reveals what had been forgotten or what lay hidden, unrecognized. At the same time, through this very sobriety, it teaches an invisible struggle against enemies known to the mind and a war of thoughts, —teaches how to hurl spears in this single-handed combat, how to skillfully shoot (at the enemies) the arrows of good thoughts, preventing their arrows from striking the mind, and, like an arrow, directing it to take refuge in Christ, who is the desired light instead of the pernicious darkness. Whoever has tasted this light understands what I am talking about. The taste of this light torments the soul with hunger; it feeds on it but is never satisfied, and the more it tastes of it, the more it craves it. This light, which draws the mind to itself like the sun draws the eyes, is a light that is inexpressible in itself, yet becomes interpretable—not through words, but through the experience of the one who receives its influence—or, to put it more precisely, who is pierced by it—commands me to be silent, even though the mind would still like to delight in a conversation about what is now being discussed.

25. “Pursue peace with all people, and holiness, without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14), for the sake of attaining love and purity: for they themselves are peace and holiness. But we must arm ourselves with anger against the demons alone, who wage war against us in thought and rage. But listen to how we should wage the battle that rages within us at every moment, and act accordingly: combine prayer with vigilance—and vigilance will strengthen prayer, and prayer will strengthen vigilance. Sobriety, constantly watching over everything within, notices how the enemies attempt to enter there, and, blocking their entry to the best of its ability, at the same time calls upon the Lord Jesus Christ for help, so that He may drive out these cunning warriors. In doing so, your attention blocks their entry through contradiction; and Jesus, when called upon, drives out the demons along with their delusions.

26. Guard your mind with the utmost concentration. As soon as you notice an (enemy) thought, immediately contradict it, but at the same time hasten to call upon the Lord Jesus for vengeance. And the sweetest Jesus, while you are still speaking, will say: “I am with you to intercede for you.” But even after all these enemies have been subdued through your prayer, continue to watch over your mind diligently. Behold, waves of thoughts—more numerous than before—will rush at you one after another, so that your soul seems to be plunging into an abyss and is ready to perish. But Jesus, once more prompted by a disciple, rebukes the evil winds (of thoughts) as God does, and they subside. You, having gained freedom from the enemy’s attacks—for an hour or a minute—glorify the One who saved you, and immerse yourself in contemplation of death.

27. With all our heart’s attention and in a spirit of devotion, let us walk our path. Attention and prayer, when combined daily, create something akin to Elijah’s fiery chariot (), lifting those who partake of them to heavenly heights. And what am I saying? For the one who has established himself in sobriety or strives to do so, the pure heart becomes a mental heaven, with its own sun, moon, and stars, and becomes the receptacle of the incomprehensible God, through a mystical vision and exaltation (the triumph of the mind). Whoever has love for divine virtue should strive at every moment to utter the name of the Lord and, with all zeal, to translate words into deeds. Whoever, with some effort, restrains his five senses—by which the soul is usually harmed—makes the struggle and battle of the heart the lightest possible for the mind. And so, strive to ward off all external influences (those harmful to the soul), and fight the thoughts arising from them within using God-given spiritual means, guided by the art of: Through the labor of vigil, rein in the urges toward sensual pleasures; be moderate in eating and drinking; and sufficiently weaken your body so that you may make the battle of the heart easy for yourself in advance. By all this, you will be doing yourself a favor, not another. Torment your soul with thoughts of death, and gather your scattered mind through remembrance of Christ Jesus; especially at night, when the mind is usually clearer and brighter, clearly contemplating God and all that is divine.

28. Let us not shun the labors of bodily asceticism either: for just as wheat springs from the earth, so from these labors spring spiritual joy and experience in goodness. Let us not use false reasoning to set aside the demands of conscience, for it inspires us with what is salvific and active, and always declares what our duty is and to what we are bound, especially when it is purified by a living, active, and subtle sobriety of mind. In this case, because of its purity, it usually renders a clear judgment (on everything that comes before it—a judgment that is just and decisive)—one that excludes all hesitation. For all these reasons, we must not be led astray by false reasoning; for it proclaims to us within a life pleasing to God, and, strictly rebuking the soul if it has defiled the mind with sins, shows the way to amend transgressions, inspiring the fallen heart to repent, and pointing out to it a remedy with sweet persuasion.

29. The smoke rising from firewood is often harsh on the eyes; but then it reveals light to them and brings comfort to those whom it previously troubled. And attention, keeping the eyes of the mind constantly strained, wearies and burdens the head. But Jesus, when called upon in prayer, comes and enlightens the heart. The memory of Him, together with the illumination (of our inner being), brings the greatest of all blessings (that is, the Lord Himself).

30. The enemy, having grown accustomed to disturbing our minds, desires to lead us to eat dust along with him, so that—though created in the image of God—we might live by the belly. But God said, “I will put enmity between you and the woman” (Gen. 3:15). For this reason, we must always cry out to God, so that through this we may go about our daily lives without being struck by the devil’s fiery arrows. “I will cover,” says God (through the Psalmist), “those who know My name” (Ps. 90:14). And again: “But near to those who fear Him is His salvation” (Ps. 84: 10).

31. The blessed Apostle, the chosen vessel, speaking in Christ, having great experience in the inner, invisible, spiritual battle taking place within us, said in his epistle to the Ephesians: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6: 12). The Apostle Peter also says: “Be sober and vigilant, because your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour; resist him, firm in your faith” (1 Pet. 5:8–9). Our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, speaking about the different dispositions with which people heed the words of the Gospel, said: “Then the devil comes and snatches the word from their hearts”—a theft he commits by instilling a wicked forgetfulness, “so that those who have not believed may not be saved” (Luke 8:12).—And again the Apostle (Paul) says: “I delight in God’s law in my inner being, but I see in my members another law waging war against the law of my mind and making me a prisoner” (Rom. 7:22–23).—They said all this to teach us and to make known to us what was hidden from us.

32. When the mind loses self-reproach and humility, it usually becomes boastful, thinking that it stands above many. Desiring to gain an awareness of our own weakness, let us be wise in the same way as the one who said: “Brothers, I do not consider myself to have attained it; ‘but one thing I do: forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus’ (Phil. 3:13–14). Again: “‘I do not run aimlessly; I do not fight as one beating the air. No, I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified’” (1 Cor. 9:26–27). Do you see what humility is, and at the same time, what the pursuit of virtue is? Do you see what humility is like in St. Paul, such a great and noble man? (But listen to what else he says.)—Christ says, “I came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am the foremost” (1 Tim. 1: 15). – And how can we not be humble, given the wretchedness of our nature? For what is worse than dust? And we must remember God, for that is why we were created; and we must train ourselves in the discipline of self-restraint so that it may be easier to follow in the footsteps of our Lord.

33. It is impossible for one who gives in to evil thoughts to be free from sin in his outward conduct. Those who do not root out evil thoughts from their hearts cannot help but manifest them in corresponding evil deeds. The reason why someone looks with lust is that his inner eye has already strayed and become darkened. Likewise, the reason for the desire to hear shameful things lies in the eager listening, with the ears of the soul, to everything that evil demons whisper within to our ruin. We must purify ourselves in the Lord, both inwardly and outwardly; each of us must guard our senses and purify ourselves daily from the influences of the passions and from transgressions. Just as in the days of our former folly, when we were caught up in the world’s vanity of the mind, we devoted our whole mind and all our senses to the allure of sin, so now that we have turned to a life according to God, we must devote our whole mind and all our senses to the living and true God, to God’s truth and will.

34. First comes “impact” (προσβολή—a collision, the action whereby a thrown object strikes the target at which it was aimed); then “combination” (συνδυασμός—a union, the mind’s attention is fixed on the object, so that the soul is occupied solely by the object that has struck it and captured its attention); further, “combination” (the object that struck and captured the attention aroused desire—and the soul consented to it—and the union was formed); following this, “captivity” (the object took the soul captive, which desired it, and, bound like a slave, leads it to action); finally, “passion” (πάθος—a sickness of the soul), which, through frequent repetition (the satisfaction of the same desire) and habit (of the actions by which it is satisfied), has become ingrained in the soul (becoming a trait of character). Here is the battlefield for achieving victory in the struggle taking place within us! This is also how the Holy Fathers define it.

35. And—“attachment,” they say, is a mere thought, or an image of some thing that has just arisen in the heart and presented itself to the mind; “association” is a dialogue with what has presented itself (an object or image), whether passionate or dispassionate; “combination” is the soul’s inclination toward an object visible to the eye of the mind, accompanied by delight; captivation is the violent and involuntary carrying away of the heart (into captivity), its retention there, and its fusion—as if into a single life (sunousia)—with the object that has captivated it, from which fusion our good state vanishes (peace is lost); Passion, in general, they say, takes root in the soul through a long-standing attachment (to some object). Of all these (actions or states), the “first” is sinless, the “second” is not entirely so; the “third” depends on the condition of the ascetic (perhaps in proportion to the effort and struggle); “struggle,” however, is the cause either of crowns (when one stands firm) or of torments (when one falls).

36. Captivity is one thing during prayer and another when not praying. Passion is undoubtedly subject either to equivalent (counterbalancing) repentance or to future torment. Whoever resists or remains dispassionate toward the first—that is, the attachment—cuts off all that is shameful in one fell swoop. – Such is the battle waged by evil demons against monks and laypeople alike, in which there is both victory and defeat, as we have said. Crowns await the victors, while torment awaits those who fall and do not repent. Let us, then, wage war against them in our minds so as not to carry out their evil counsel in visible sinful deeds. Let us strive to find the heavenly kingdom within ourselves, cutting off every sin from our hearts. Through such a beautiful endeavor, we will preserve the purity of our hearts and unceasing contrition before God.

37. Many monks are unaware of the delusions of the mind that it endures from demons. They are diligent in their deeds, paying no heed to the mind, and lead lives of simplicity and guilelessness. I believe that, having never tasted purity of heart, they are completely unaware of the darkness of inner passions. Those who do not know the battle of which St. Paul speaks may not have been tested by experience in what is good, and they regard only sins committed in deed as falls, disregarding the mental victories and triumphs that the physical eye cannot see, because they are hidden and known only to God, the sole rewarder, and to the conscience of the one who strives. It seems that the following words of Scripture are addressed to such people: “They say, ‘Peace, peace, when there is no peace’” (Ezek. 13:10). We must pray for those brothers who, out of simplicity, find themselves in such a state, and teach them as much as possible to turn away not only from visible evil deeds but also from the evil that works within the heart. For those, however, who have a divine desire to purify the eye of the soul (that is, the soul’s very vision), there is a different work of Christ and a different sacrament.

38. A deep awareness of death truly combines many virtues within itself. It is the mother of tears, the guide to all-encompassing self-restraint, the reminder of Gehenna, the mother of prayer and tears, the guardian of the heart, the source of self-reflection and discernment—whose fruits, a deep fear of God and the purification of the heart from passionate thoughts, encompass many of the Lord’s commandments. In such a heart, then, one beholds a struggle and a feat endured with the utmost difficulty. And this is the very concern of many of Christ’s warriors.

39. Some unexpected misfortune or calamity usually disrupts mental focus and, having torn the mind away from its salvific state of mind—extinguishing the desire for what is best—draws it toward sinful strife and discord. The cause of such a calamitous misfortune for us is that we take no precautions against temptations (which are ready to assail us at any moment, from who knows which direction).

40. None of the misfortunes that are constantly ready to befall us will disturb or sadden us, provided that, realizing their inevitability, we always keep this in mind. That is why the Divine Apostle Paul says: “I take pleasure in weaknesses, in hardships, in needs” (2 Cor. 12:10). And again: “All who desire to live godly lives in Christ Jesus will be persecuted” (2 Tim. 3:12). To Him be glory forever and ever. Amen.

Elijah, presbyter and exarch

A Brief Account of Him

It is unknown whether this Elder Elijah, also called Ekdik, is Elijah of Crete, the interpreter of the theological writings of St. Gregory the Theologian, or someone else. However, judging by the chapters that follow, it is clear that he was a man of the highest wisdom—both in outward wisdom and, especially, in spiritual wisdom; and his words are expressive and powerful, though at times somewhat obscure. Therefore, we do not think it would be an exaggeration to call this collection of writings—as the chapters of the wise Elijah are titled—a sort of spiritual garden, filled not only with colorful grains but also with fruit trees—and let us not be ashamed to invite those seeking spiritual consolation into this paradise, in full confidence that all their spiritual senses—sight, smell, and taste—will find rich satisfaction here (abridged from the preface by Grech. Dobrot.). The title of the chapters by Elder Elijah—Anflogion, meaning “flower-speech” or “collection of flowers”—suggests that they were composed while reading the Holy Fathers, whose thoughts the elder of God, having assimilated them and wishing to preserve them for himself, recorded, expressing them sometimes in the Fathers’ own words and sometimes in his own. Consequently, readers might have seen in them reflections of one or another of the Fathers, or even attributed them to one of them, as indeed happened in the West. There, in the Vatican Codex of the works of St. Maximus, they are attributed to this Father; and Migne, a recent editor of the works of the Holy Fathers, included them among the works of St. Maximus, following his seven hundred chapters—both speculative and practical—under the title: other chapters, taken from the Vatican Codex of the Works of St. Maximus (Patrologia Graeca, vol. X). We believe that the compilers of the Greek Dobrotolubie found it more convenient to determine to whom these chapters should be attributed, and we follow their lead, recognizing these chapters as the work of a certain Elder Elijah. We note for the record that in the Greek Dobrotolubie, the chapters are divided into two halves (109–140). In Migne’s edition, the chapters are numbered consecutively from beginning to end. We follow the latter in this regard. The reader will notice that in our translation, the chapter numbers are not consecutive, with some omissions. These omissions indicate that the corresponding chapters have also been omitted due to their obscurity. There are, however, very few such instances.

A Flower Garden Compiled with Great Wisdom by Elijah, the Youngest Presbyter and Ecdicus

1. A Christian who truly believes in God should not carelessly give in to complacency, but should always expect temptation and be ready to face it, so that when it comes, he will not be surprised or confused, but will gratefully endure the burden of sorrow, keeping in mind what is said in the Psalter along with the Prophet: “Test me, O Lord, and try me” (Ps. 25:2)—and that, in another Psalm, the Prophet did not say, “Your punishment will destroy me,” but rather, “It will set me right in the end” (Ps. 17:36).

2. The beginning of goodness is the fear of God, and the end is love for God. The beginning of all good is an active mind and purposeful action. For neither is action without reason good, nor is reason without action fruitful (progressive).

3. The work of the body is fasting and vigil, and the work of the lips is psalm-singing. But prayer is better than psalm-singing, and silence is more precious than words. The work of the hands is that which is done by them without complaint; and that of the feet is that which is carried out by them at the first command. The work of the soul is self-restraint with simplicity and simplicity that acts with self-restraint; and that of the mind is prayer in contemplation, and in prayer, the contemplation of God.

4. Mercy and truth preside over all virtues; their fruit is humility, and from it springs, according to the Holy Fathers, prudence, without which none of the aforementioned virtues can see (or attain) its end.

5. Action that despises the yoke of reason turns out to be like a young donkey, wandering uselessly here and there; and reason, casting off the honorable tunic of action, does not appear respectable, even though it goes to great lengths to appear so.

6. A courageous soul, like a wife holding two burning lamps—the active and the contemplative—fulfills her duty throughout her life. The opposite is true of a soul pampered by pleasures.

7. Voluntary suffering is not enough for the soul to achieve complete liberation from sin unless, in addition, it is refined in the fiery furnace of involuntary suffering.

8. Unless the soul, for complete purification from sin, passes—like a sword—through fire and water, that is, through voluntary and involuntary labors and hardships, it cannot remain unscathed when faced with unpleasant misfortunes.

9. Just as there are three main causes of voluntary temptations—health, wealth, and fame—so too are there three causes of involuntary temptations: loss, illness, and slander. All of this serves as a means of edification for some, but of ruin for others.

10. The truly virtuous person has goodness rooted within; for the vain, however, it exists only in thought. The enemy of virtue harbors evil on the surface, while the self-indulgent hedonist harbors it deep within the heart.

11. It is rare and unintentional for one who hates evil to act improperly; yet for one who still harbors the causes of evil, this happens frequently and willingly.

12. Those who are not inclined to repent sin more frequently; but for those who sin not out of inclination, repentance is all the more easily accomplished—and, moreover, the need for it rarely arises.

13. Let feeling and conscience accompany the spoken word, so that the Divine Word, who said, “He will be in their midst” (Matt. 18:20), may not be put to shame because of the insolence or lawlessness of what is said or done.

14. One cannot yet say of a person who does not defile his soul by his deeds that he keeps it unstained by his words; nor can one yet say of one who keeps it pure from words that he does not defile it by his thoughts. For the sinner does so in three ways (that is, by deed, word, and thought).

15. You cannot clearly see the face of virtue as long as you still delight in the image of sin. The latter will seem hateful to you only when you desire to taste the former and turn your face away from such an image.

16. Demons first assail the soul through thoughts, not deeds; but, of course, their main focus is on deeds. The cause of deeds is hearing and sight, while the cause of thoughts is habit and demons.

17. The sinful part of the soul is threefold, manifesting itself in deeds, words, and thoughts. But the virtue of sinlessness is sixfold: for it requires guarding the five senses and the spoken word from falling into sin. “If anyone does not sin in speech, he is a perfect man, able to keep the whole body in check,” says St. James (3:2). The same applies to the five senses.

18. The inarticulate part of the soul is divided into six parts: the five senses and the spoken word, which, when dispassionate, sobers up all the other parts, being inseparably distributed among them, but when passionate, defiles them all.

19. Neither can the body be purified without fasting and vigil, nor the soul without mercy and truth; nor, likewise, the mind without contemplation and communion with God (that is, without prayer). Of these two, the latter is the most significant.

20. Moving in the circle of these virtues, the soul makes its refuge—which is patience—inaccessible to the arrows of temptation. “By your patience you will save your souls,” says the Lord (; Luke 21:19). But if it finds itself in a different situation, then, like a city unprotected by walls, even at the sound of the crash and noise heard from afar, it is greatly shaken by the blows of fear.

21. Not all who are wise in speech are also wise in spiritual matters; but all who are wise in spiritual matters are also wise in external matters. For this external realm (the body, the senses, one’s circumstances), though it holds everyone in its thrall (—taking tribute from all), does not receive the same tribute from everyone; some even refuse to pay it altogether.

22. Reason, which is by nature indivisible, is nevertheless divided into different portions: for one is given a greater portion and another a lesser one; until active virtue, multiplying and expanding with the help of the general virtues, accomplishes all possible good through each of them. For it is always the case that, in proportion to the insufficiency of the active life, a lesser measure of reason is attained.

23. Time and moderation are the companions of prudent silence; its meal consists of truth; by virtue of which the father of lies, having come to the wandering soul (which has withdrawn from everything), finds in it nothing of what he usually seeks.

24. Truly merciful is not the one who arbitrarily gives away what is superfluous, but the one who willingly yields what is necessary to those who would take it.

25. Some acquire the non-material through material wealth, by being steadfast in almsgiving; while others, through the non-material, detach themselves from the material, by abiding in the sense (or taste) of an inexhaustible good.

26. Everyone finds it pleasant to be rich in blessings, but it is regrettable if the one who, by God’s providence, has received wealth is not allowed to enjoy it for much longer.

27. Do not take offense at the one who, against your will, has “operated” on you (i.e., exposed the evil hidden within you through rebuke); but, looking upon the impurity that has been cast out, reproach yourself, and bless God, who was the cause of such an arrangement concerning you.

28. Do not lose heart when you see the severity of your (spiritual) illness; but by employing the most effective remedies against it—namely, arduous spiritual struggles—distance yourself from it, if you sincerely care for the health of your soul.

29. The more you feel your spiritual ailments, the more grateful you should be to the one who has pointed them out to you through his rebukes. For through this, he has become the instrument of your complete purification, without which the mind cannot enter the pure realm of prayer.

30. When you are rebuked, you must either remain silent or defend yourself meekly if the rebuke is slanderous—not to assert your own position, but to correct the error of the rebuker, who may have been led astray, perhaps through ignorance of the matter.

31. Just as the overconfident person is unaware of his own shortcomings, so the humble person is unaware of his own good qualities: for in the former, all self-knowledge is hidden by self-reproach, and in the latter, by what is pleasing to God.

32. Reproach stirs up energy in the soul, while praise relaxes it and makes it lazy in doing good.

33. The foundation of wealth is gold, and that of virtue is humility. And just as one who cannot increase his gold remains poor, though he may not appear so at all, so too, without humility, the virtuous person cannot bear good fruit.

34. Just as a merchant without gold is no merchant, even if he were very capable of it, so too will one who strives without humility fail to see the good fruits of virtue, even if he relies heavily on his own prudence.

35. Just as one must excel in keeping all the commandments, so too must one who fears being found a stranger among those reclining at the wedding feast delve deeper and deeper into humility.

36. Combine self-restraint with simplicity, and truth with humility—and you will find yourself a fellow guest at the table of truth, to which every other virtue loves to be brought, as if to a feast.

37. A good character testifies to the beauty of virtue, and the propriety of one’s conduct to the peace of the soul.

38. The first virtue is to sin in nothing; the second is not to be ashamed to confess one’s sin; yet one must not be shameless about it, but rather humble oneself, and when rebuked, rebuke oneself as well, and willingly accept penance; for if this does not happen, nothing offered to God has any value.

39. Along with voluntary suffering (acts of self-mortification), one must meekly accept involuntary suffering, which consists of slander, losses, and illnesses. One who does not meekly accept these latter things, but is dissatisfied with them and grumbles, is like one who always wishes to eat his bread without salt.

40. Though a master, one who takes on the appearance of a servant is the one who, with divine words, washes the stained garment (of the soul) of his neighbor and mends the torn parts by applying patches. Let the one who does this, however, be careful not to do so out of vanity, but rather so that, by doing so and receiving the reward for it, he does not forfeit the dignity of authority that is his due.

41. “The Lord will guard your going out and your coming in” (Ps. 120:8)—through self-restraint in food and speech. For whoever is moderate in food—which enters the body—and in speech—which leaves it—avoids the lust of the eyes and tames unwise anger, which the ascetic must be most careful to prevent from breaking through. From this, active life gains strength, and contemplative life gains steadfastness.

42. Others, however, exercise careful vigilance regarding the intake of food but pay no heed to the words that come out of their mouths. Such people, according to Ecclesiastes, do not know how to root out anger from the heart and lust from the flesh (Eccl. 11:10)—which is how the heart is purified by the Holy Spirit who renews us.

43. Let your stomach burn with the scarcity of food, and let your heart be constrained by the restraint of your tongue; and your energies—both your desire and your irritability—will always be at your service for the good.

44. The ascetic must know when and with what foods to nourish the body—as an enemy—and when to comfort and strengthen it—as a weary friend—so as not to mistakenly offer it friendly nourishment when it is an enemy, or hostile nourishment when it is a friend, and, having provoked it with both, find it, in the hour of temptation, on the side of the warring enemies.

45. When one who partakes of food prefers nourishment to the delight of the throat, then the grace of tears comes upon him and begins to comfort him with such power that he forgets every other pleasure, being fully sated by the incomparable sweetness of these tears.

46. For those who widen their path, tears dry up, but for those who love the narrow path, they flow in a mighty stream.

47. Neither the sinner nor the righteous is without sorrow; but the former grieves that he has not yet completely turned away from sin, and the latter grieves that he has not yet attained all that is good.

48. Prayer and silence are among the virtues that are within our power; fasting and vigil, however, are among the virtues that are not entirely within our power, since they also depend on one's physical constitution. The ascetic must therefore choose what is most feasible and beneficial for him.

49. The house of prayer is patience, for it is sustained by patience; and its nourishment is humility, for it is nourished by humility.

50. Do not bind yourself to small things, and you will not be enslaved by great ones: for it never happens that a greater evil arises before a lesser one.

51. In one in whom mercy and truth reign, all that is pleasing to God is also present; for mercy does not judge anyone without compassion, and truth does not show favoritism to anyone without justice.

52. He who dissolves self-restraint with simplicity will partake of the bliss that awaits there.

53. You cannot cut off the passions that battle against you unless you first cease to cultivate the soil from which they draw their nourishment.

54. Some strive to purify only the body, while others strive to purify the soul as well: for some have received the strength to abstain only from sinful deeds, while others have received the strength to abstain from passions as well; but those who have received the strength to abstain even from lust are very few.

55. A person is passionate if their inclination toward sin is stronger than their thought, even if they have not yet sinned; a person is lustful if the action (energy) of sin is weaker than their thought, even though they are overcome by passion within; a person is partial if they are freely—or rather, servilely—attached to both; one would be dispassionate if such diverse sinful movements and states were unknown to him (if he did not experience them).

56. Passion is driven out of the soul by fasting and prayer; sensuality by vigil and silence; partiality by stillness and attentiveness. Impassivity, however, is established by the remembrance of God.

57. From the lips of dispassion, like honeycombs, drip the words of eternal life. Who, then, will be deemed worthy to touch those lips with his own, to dwell among his breasts, and to be perfumed by the sweet fragrance of his garments? —That is, to enjoy the fruits of the virtues, whose fragrance surpasses all the aromas known to us through the senses (Song of Songs 4:10, 11)?!

58. Every soul will be stripped of the visible; but as for the body of sin, not many of those who have enjoyed the delights of this life will be stripped of it.

59. All who are alive are dead in the flesh; but only those who have hated sin with all their hearts are dead to sin.

60. The rational soul, situated at the boundary between the sensory and the intellectual light, is able, through one, to see and perform bodily acts, and through the other, spiritual ones. But since the intellectual light within it has been dimmed, while the sensory light has become clearer—due to a habit established from the beginning—it cannot fully extend its vision toward divine things unless, during prayer, it is wholly immersed in the intellectual light; but she is forced to remain in the space between darkness and light—in (sensual) darkness, wandering out of habit and inclination, and in (intellectual) light through mere daydreaming.

61. May prayer abide with the mind, like a ray of sunlight; without it, sensual concerns, like waterless clouds drifting about, deprive the mind of its natural brightness.

62. A passionate mind cannot enter the narrow gate of prayer unless it first abandons its sensual, pleasure-seeking concerns; but it will always merely suffer in vain, circling in the shadow of those concerns.

63. If the mind does not cast aside all excessive concern for the sensual, it cannot easily be lifted up by sorrow; nor can it understand its own station.

64. Prayer, strengthened by tears, expels from the soul all thoughts hostile to it; but the wandering of the mind, intensified by idle talk, brings them back again—and with them, the expeller also drives out the all-destructive evil of insolence (lack of restraint in gaze, speech, and movement).

65. Fasting is the image of the day because of its openness, and prayer is the image of the night because of its obscurity and secrecy. Whoever practices both as they should, combining each with the other, will reach the city of their purpose, from which “sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee” (Isa. 54:11).

66. Spiritual work can take place and endure without a corresponding physical activity. And blessed is the one who has preferred the better, non-material (i.e., spiritual) work to material (i.e., physical) work. Whoever possesses it makes up for the absence of outward deeds by living a life of prayer, hidden from others but manifest to God.

67. The Apostle urges us to endure through faith, to rejoice through hope, and to persevere in prayer, so that the blessing of joy may remain within us. If this is so, it follows that whoever lacks patience also lacks faith; whoever does not rejoice lacks hope; for he has rejected the cause of joy—prayer—and does not abide in it (Rom. 12:12; Col. 4:2; Heb. 12:1).

68. Just as in ancient times, having strayed from its realm, the mind forgot its glorious radiance: so now, having forgotten all that is here, it must return there once more through prayer.

69. Just as a mother’s withered breasts are to a child, so is prayer that offers no comfort to the mind. But when prayer is different (that is, when it fills the mind with comfort), then the mind becomes like a child who, overcome with delight, falls asleep in his mother’s arms.

70. One cannot be at one with prayer unless he has renounced all material things except food and clothing (1 Tim. 6:8). Detach yourself from everything else if you wish to be in prayer with a single-minded focus.

71. Not everyone has the same goal in prayer; some have one goal, while others have another. One prays that, if possible, his heart may always be with prayer, and that he may ascend ever higher in it; another, that he may (gain the habit) of not being interrupted in prayer by distracting thoughts; yet all pray (generally speaking), either to be preserved in goodness or not to be led astray into evil.

72. If no one leaves prayer without being humble—for everyone, when praying, is humbled in humility—then it is evident that whoever displays haughty insolence outwardly is not praying in humility.

73. If, while in prayer, you contemplate the widow who compelled the hard-hearted judge to do her justice, you will not “lose heart” (Luke 18:3) when the blessings sought through prayer are slow to come.

74. Prayer will not abide with you if you linger in vain thoughts within and in empty conversations without; but it is seen to return quickly to the one who, for its sake, cuts away much within himself.

75. If the words of prayer do not enter the depths of the soul, then tears will not wash the cheeks of the soul.

76. The key to the Kingdom of Heaven is prayer. Whoever holds it properly beholds the blessings set aside (promised) for its friends. But whoever sees only the present has not yet found the boldness to pray.

77. During prayer, the mind cannot speak boldly before God: “You have loosed my bonds; I will offer You a sacrifice of praise” (Ps. 115:7); unless, driven by a longing for what is better, it has cast off timidity (fear for one’s life from the constraints of the flesh) and sloth, excessive sleep, and gluttony—all of which lead to downfall.

78. One who is distracted by thoughts during prayer stands outside the first veil (outside the tabernacle in the courtyard); behind this veil, inside the tabernacle (in its front part, called the Holy Place), is one who prays with undivided attention; and into the Holy of Holies enters only the one who, having pacified natural thoughts and movements, abides with the One Who is above all nature, receiving from Him the necessary enlightenment.

79. When the soul, having emptied itself of all that is external, unites with prayer, a kind of flame, as it were, surrounds it and makes its whole being, like iron, permeated with fire. And then the soul—still the same soul—becomes impervious, like red-hot iron, to everything foreign.

80. For those who lead an active life well, prayer sometimes, like a cloud overshadowing them, tempers their scorching thoughts, and sometimes, as if watering them with raindrops, reveals spiritual contemplations to them.

81. The mind, aspiring upward, does not immediately ascend there, but only after it has completely despised all earthly things and devoted itself to divine pursuits.

82. When you free your mind from all attachment to bodies, food, and money, then whatever you do will be counted as a pure gift from you to God. And you will be rewarded for this by the opening of the eyes of your heart, and you will clearly learn from it the laws of God, which will seem sweeter than honey and honeycomb to your discerning palate, because of the pleasure they bring.

83. You cannot make your mind superior to the desires for the body, money, and food unless you lead it into the pure land of the righteous, in which (or under the influence of which), once the remembrance of death and God has taken root in your heart, it will destroy within you every rebellion of earthly desires.

84. There is nothing more terrifying than the memory of death, and nothing more wondrous than the memory of God; the former instills saving sorrow, while the latter fills one with spiritual joy. For the Prophet David sings: “I remembered God and was glad” (Ps. 76: 4); and the Wise One teaches: “Remember your end, and you will never sin” (Sir. 7: 39).

85. Until the mind beholds “the glory of God face to face” (2 Cor. 3:18), the soul cannot proclaim in its heart: “I will rejoice in the Lord” (Ps. 103: 34), “I will rejoice in His salvation” (Ps. 19: 6). For the veil of self-love lies upon her heart, which cannot be removed without voluntary and involuntary sorrows and deprivations; and as long as it remains upon her, it prevents her from seeing how all things are and come to be.

86. Not after the exodus from Egypt—that is, not after sin was cut off by action—and not after crossing the sea—that is, not after sympathy for and inclination toward sin were cut off; but after their sojourn in the wilderness—that is, after enduring all manner of hardships, deprivations, and sorrows—the leader of Israel is deemed worthy to behold the Promised Land, that is, dispassion, which possesses a powerful intellectual contemplation (Deut. 34:1).

87. Those who journey through the wilderness—that is, those in whom sin lies dormant—know of the blessings of that blessed land by hearsay alone; those who observe it with their own eyes see these blessings—that is, those engaged in the labors of virtue and obedience embrace them with hope; but those who are deemed worthy to enter it are satisfied by them with all their senses, as with honey and milk.

88. He who still has natural, carnal impulses has not yet been crucified with Christ, nor has he who harbors carnal thoughts and sympathies been buried with Him: how, then, can such a one be united with Him so as to “walk in newness of life” (Rom. 6:4)?

89. From time immemorial, it was commanded to bring to the temple “the firstfruits of the threshing floor and the winepress” (Exod. 22:29). Now, however, we must offer to God, as the firstfruits of active virtue, self-control and truth, and as the firstfruits of contemplative virtue—love and prayer: using the former to cut off the desires of lust and anger, and the latter to cut off vain thoughts and the sins they engender.

90. The beginning of active virtue is self-restraint and humility, truth and chastity; its end is peace of mind and holy purity of the body.

91. Truly good action requires not only doing good with a good spirit, but also doing it properly—that is, the doer must observe both the proper time and the proper measure in relation to the action being performed.

92. Just as action without contemplation is not firm, so contemplation without corresponding action is not true. Action must be imbued with contemplation, just as contemplation must be confirmed by action: so that, on the one hand, evil may be overcome, and on the other, virtue may be powerfully manifested in the fulfillment of benevolent intentions.

93. The goal of the active life is the subjugation of the passions, and the goal of the contemplative life is the vision of virtues.

94. In the arena of active virtue, many “run, but only one receives the prize” (1 Cor. 9:24)—namely, the one who strives to reach its goal with the aid of contemplation.

95. The active person cannot remain in contemplation for long. For, in relation to contemplation, he is like a traveler who has been welcomed into someone’s home but from which he must soon depart.

96. Those engaged in active service enter prayer through the gates of God’s commandments; but those engaged in contemplation dwell in the courtyard of the virtues, singing spiritual hymns and songs: the former give thanks for having been freed from their bonds; the latter, for having taken captive those who rose up against them in battle.

97. Consider thoughts to be the oarsmen of the ship of the mind, and the oars to be the life-giving forces of the soul—vigor (energy) and desire, will, and volition (choice, resolve). The active person always has need of these, but the contemplative does not always.

98. For the active person, due to the multitude of perceptions of sensory things, a veil lies upon the heart during prayer, preventing it from opening because of sympathy for those things. Only the contemplative person, who lacks such sympathy, can, with an open heart, partially behold the glory of God.

99. The courtyard of the rational soul is the senses; the temple is reason; the high priest is the intellect. And so, in the courtyard stands the intellect, entertaining itself with untimely thoughts; in the temple, it is engaged in timely reflections; but the one who has been deemed worthy to enter the Divine sanctuary is concerned with neither the one nor the other.

100. In the house of the active soul dwell “weeping, lamentation, and sorrow” (Ezek. 2:10), because of the burden of labor; but in the contemplative soul, “the voice of joy and praise” (Ps. 41:5) is heard, because of the comfort of knowledge.

101. Contemplation of spiritual things is paradise. The spiritual man enters it in prayer, as into a house; but the active man, in relation to it, is like a passerby who would like to look inside but cannot, because the fence around that house is higher than his spiritual stature.

102. A man of action cannot adorn himself with perfect moral beauty unless, like the patriarch Abraham, he too “leaves his home”—the natural law—“and his kinship”—the self-indulgent life that has become like him. For only in this way will he, like a seal, receive the circumcision of the carnal desire (Gen. 17:11; Rom. 4:11), because of which a veil has lain upon us from birth, preventing us from attaining perfect freedom.

103. For the active life, fasting and vigil are “girding the loins”; and for the contemplative life, silence and prayer are “burning lamps” (Luke 12:35).

104. An imperfect mind is not permitted to enter the fruitful vineyard of prayer; like a poor person, it receives only “the gleanings of the grape harvest” (Deut. 24:21)—mere psalm-singing.

105. Just as not all who are deemed worthy to speak with the King are invited to His table, so too not all who approach God for a prayerful conversation are led into a state of prayerful contemplation.

106. The bridle of anger is timely silence; for speechless desire, abstinence; and for uncontrollable thoughts, a brief prayer.

107. Neither the one who desires to descend into the depths to retrieve the pearl of the senses from there, nor the one who desires to ascend on high to find the spiritual pearl there, will attain what they desire and seek, unless the former strips himself of his garments and the latter of all that is sensual.

108. The mind, focusing inward toward the heart during prayer, is like a bridegroom conversing with his bride; but the one who does not enter within himself is like one standing outside the bridal chamber, groaning, “,” and crying out: “Who will bring me into the city of refuge?” (Ps. 59:11)? Or who will be my guide, so that during prayer I may “not look upon vanity and false folly” (Ps. 39:5)?

109. Just as food without salt is to the throat, so is prayer, when offered without contrition, to the mind.

110. The soul still seeking prayer is like a woman in labor; but the soul that has found prayer is like a woman who has given birth and is filled with joy because of the birth (John 16:21).

111. Once, the Amorite dwelling on the mountain struck down those who “were moved to ascend to the top of the mountain” (Num. 14:44–45; Deut. 1:44). But now, wicked forgetfulness drives away those who, before attaining purity of heart, attempt to ascend to the very summit of pure prayer.

112. Prayer, as prayer, is like bread that strengthens beginners; prayer combined with some form of contemplation is like anointing oil; and prayer without imagery is like fragrant wine, which, when drunk insatiably, leads to ecstasy (Ps. 103: 15).

113. The ascetic must restrict his body to a single kind of food—and his mind to a single-word prayer. Then, no longer held back by passions, he will be able to soar in ecstasy toward the Lord during prayer.

114. One who threatens dogs with a stick provokes them against himself; and one who compels himself to pray with purity provokes the demons.

115. When, through unceasing practice in prayer, the words of the Psalms are imprinted on the heart of the one who prays; then, like good soil, he himself begins to bring forth—sometimes roses of contemplation in the spiritual realm, sometimes lilies of understanding the beauty and harmony of the material world, and sometimes violets of insight into the manifold, inscrutable judgments of God.

116. The soul, having completely renounced itself and devoted itself entirely to prayer, descends from the realm where it soars above all creatures—not when it wishes, but when He who disposes of all our being by measure and weight sees fit.

117. A warrior lays down his weapons when the battle ends; and the contemplative lays down his thoughts when he ascends to the Lord in detachment.

118. A commander grieves when he fails to gain spoils in war; but one who leads an active life grieves when he is not granted spiritual contemplation in prayer.

119. A deer runs to the springs of material waters (Ps. 41:2), as if wounded by a beast; but the soul, pierced by the sweetest arrow of prayer, longs for spiritual enlightenment.

120. The stars hide at sunrise; and thoughts cease when the mind returns to its own realm.

121. And the contemplative mind, when, drawn by the needs of nature, descends from heaven to earth, may exclaim the same as he who said: Is there anything more wondrous than Divine beauty? And what thought is more joyful than the contemplation of Divine splendor? And what feeling is as vivid and uncontrollable as love, kindled by God in a soul purified of all evil, which then says from the fullness of its heart: "I am wounded by love" (Song of Songs 2:5; 5:8)?

122. To say, "My heart is warmed within me, and a fire is kindled in my teaching" (Ps. 38:4), is fitting for one who never tires of pursuing God in prayer and who has chosen not to see "the day of man" (Jer. 17:16).

123. Let the active soul also speak, like the bride in the Song of Songs, when, having cast aside all her vices, evil demons, and wicked thoughts, they begin to compel her "to look again upon vanity and false delights" (Ps. 39:5): "I have taken off my garment—how shall I put it on again? I have washed my feet—how shall I defile them?" (Song of Songs 5:3)?

124. How blessed are you, O God-loving soul, if you can boldly cry out to God: "Tell me," O Good Shepherd, "where You feed" Your sheep, and "where at noon You give rest" to Your lambs, "so that," following them, I may not "wander among the flocks of Your rivals" (Song of Songs 1:6)?

125. The active soul, seeking to hold fast to the word of prayer but unable to do so, cries out like the bride in the Song: "On my bed at night, I sought him whom my soul loves; I sought him, but I did not find him; I called to him, but he did not answer me. "I will rise," then, with the most earnest prayer, "and go about the city, through the streets and the squares, and seek him whom my soul loves" (Song of Songs 3:1–2). Perhaps I will find Him, in all things and beyond all that exists; "and I will be satisfied when I behold His glory" (Ps. 16:15).

126. If one who has welcomed the King into his home thereby becomes glorious and is filled with a joy surpassing all other joys, what then must the soul feel, having purified itself and welcomed the King of Kings into itself according to His unfailing promise (John 14:23)? And will it leave within itself anything that has not been cast out—anything that might seem to disturb those who serve Him? Or will it not take care to receive into itself that which is clearly pleasing to Him?

127. One who expects to be summoned before the King in the morning—what else will he concern himself with but devising words that will please the King?—And every soul that observes this in relation to God will not be found unprepared for the judgment there.

128. Blessed is the soul which, in anticipation of the Lord's coming at any moment, regards the toil of the entire day—and indeed the night as well—as utterly meaningless, thinking that as soon as morning comes, He will immediately appear to her.

129. God sees everyone; but only those who see nothing but God during prayer see God Himself. And those who see God in this way are heard by Him; but those who are not heard do not see Him. Blessed is the one who believes that what is seen comes from God; for such a one will not stray from the path of pleasing Him (Ps. 15:8).

130. The blessings of the kingdom that exists within us have not been seen by a peace-loving eye, nor heard by an ambitious ear, nor have they come to mind in a heart deprived of the Holy Spirit; these are the pledges of the blessings that are to be bestowed upon the righteous in the future Kingdom of Christ. Whoever does not enjoy these fruits of the Spirit here cannot be deemed worthy to enjoy them there either.

131. The thoughts of active men are like those of deer. For just as these sometimes roam the mountain peaks, fearing the hunters, and sometimes descend into the valleys, desiring to enjoy what is there: so too these men—they cannot remain constantly in spiritual contemplation, due to their inability to do so, nor can they always engage in the natural order of affairs, due to their need for rest from them, which those affairs do not provide.

132. It is not so much a matter of blocking a river's path so that it does not rush downward as it is of halting the mind's inclination so that it does not become enslaved to visible things, but rather turns upward toward that which is akin to it, focusing itself in prayer; for the latter is natural to it, while the former is not.

133. A captive freed after a long captivity does not rush home as swiftly as the mind, having been freed from material attachments, which, with joyful steps, hastens toward the heavenly things that are its own.

134. To one who does not pray with attention but is distracted in prayer, the psalm seems to be in a foreign language, and he himself becomes, to the psalm, as one who speaks a foreign language (1 Cor. 14:17). The demons make a mockery of such a person.

135. It is not the same thing for one to be crucified to the world as it is for one to crucify oneself to the world. For some, fasting and vigil serve as nails, while for others, it is non-covetousness and self-abasement. Moreover, without the latter, the labors of the former are useless.

136. One who is possessed by a passion for beauty and ambition cannot pray with a pure heart. For attachment to these things and vain thoughts entangle such a person like ropes and, during prayer, drag him down, just as happens to a tethered bird when it attempts to take flight.

137. It is impossible for the mind to be at peace in prayer unless it first attains fellowship with self-control and love; of which the first strives to destroy the body's enmity toward the soul, and the second the soul's enmity toward one's neighbor, for God's sake: from which ultimately comes "the peace that surpasses all understanding" (Phil. 4:7), and makes its dwelling in the one who is thus pacified (John 14:23).

138. The work of righteousness of one who strives to enter the Kingdom of God must abound in good deeds: in almsgiving by giving "out of one's own poverty" (Mark 12:44; Luke 21:4); and in labors undertaken for the sake of peace, through self-denial and endurance for the Lord's sake.

139. Some passions are of the flesh, and others are of the soul. Whoever renounces the former but pays no heed to the latter is like a man who, to protect himself from wild beasts, has built himself a high and sturdy fence, yet willingly allows birds to peck at the glorious clusters of the vineyard of his mind.

140. One cannot help but open one's senses, just as one cannot keep the city gates shut. But one must take care that, when they are opened as necessary, nothing enters through them that would benefit our enemies or become a cause of strife.

141. Many ascend the cross of self-inflicted suffering (voluntary physical privations); but few accept its nails (nailing themselves to it forever). Many are slaves to voluntary obedience; but only those who have renounced ambition voluntarily subject themselves to humiliation.

142. In those whose every action is not preceded by the fear of God, their thoughts are in confusion, like sheep without a shepherd; but in those upon whom it descends or precedes them, their thoughts remain in meekness and order, like sheep in a sheepfold.

143. The fear of God is the son of faith; he himself is the guardian of the fulfillment of the commandments, like a shepherd keeping his sheep in a lush pasture. Whoever has not acquired his mother will not be deemed worthy to be counted among the sheep of the Lord's flock.

Volume IV

The Venerable Theodore the Studite

's Ascetic Instructions to Monks

Preface

The fourth volume of our series Dobrotolyubie consists entirely of the instructions of Saint Theodore the Studite to monks. Initially, the intention was to compile an excerpt of this holy father's monastic teachings solely from his previously known Short Catechism. But before this work was undertaken, God enabled the elders of the Russian Panteleimon Monastery on Mount Athos to find his larger Catechism on the island of Patmos, at the local monastery of St. John the Theologian, in three volumes, and to transcribe it. – Then the idea arose to compile an anthology of St. Theodore's teachings for the monks, drawing not only from the Small Catechism but also from the Larger Catechism. And so it was done. The number of these monastic lessons necessitated setting aside an entire volume of our Dobrotolyubie for them—which is not to the detriment of our collection. For this will fill a major gap in the lessons on monastic life, namely, the lack of guidance on how to transform the ordinary, visible structure of monastic life into a means of furthering the primary goal of monasticism. All the ascetic writings, both in the previous three volumes and in this fifth and final one, focus on the inner life—and it is explored there in every respect. But the monastic order, in its relation to the goals of monasticism, has been taken into account by no one except St. Theodore the Studite. He, too, discusses the inner life, but only as guiding principles. His main focus, however, is always on something monastic, specifically from the perspective of how it relates to the primary goal of monasticism. He regards even the most menial act of obedience as no less valuable before God than the highest, provided it is performed in the proper spirit. And he constantly inspires everyone with the assurance that every labor of theirs is a step toward the Kingdom of Heaven, toward the martyr's crown. For monastic brothers, this is an invaluable book. But there is also much of value here for the laity. In St. Theodore's writings, a rare teaching passes without his touching in some way upon death, judgment, hell, and the Kingdom of Heaven. For the attentive reader, the picture of these events will be indelibly imprinted on the mind—and for everyone, it will serve as a source of motivation for repentance and inspiration for a virtuous life. – That is why, whereas Greek Philanthropy included nothing from Saint Theodore, we felt obliged to present his teachings for the edification of the monastic brotherhood. The numbering of the excerpts runs consecutively from beginning to end, rather than by volume. The volume from which a sermon is taken, and its number according to that volume, is listed at the end of the table of contents for the selected sermon. The sermons of the Small Catechism are listed under the name of the fourth volume. Saint Theodore's sermons do not always address a single subject but cover many, and sometimes touch on unrelated matters, depending on the current needs of monastic life. Meanwhile, the tables of contents for the sermons in the manuscripts indicate a single, more prominent subject; consequently, the full content of the sermons is not entirely apparent from the tables of contents. This necessitated the compilation of new, more detailed tables of contents, which are hereby presented. We consider it worthwhile to include a brief note on the manuscripts of St. Theodore's sermons held in the library of the Russian Monastery of St. Panteleimon on Mount Athos, as well as those that are partially in our possession here in Russia. At the Monastery of St. Panteleimon on Mount Athos:

1. A Large Catechism, recently transcribed in simple handwriting on plain paper, in three volumes: the first contains 87 sermons, the second 124, and the third 60. A total of 271 lessons. This number includes those from * * that have not survived. The manuscript from which this copy was made dates from the 11th century and is on parchment. The former Metropolitan of Pelusium, Amphilochius, now retired, undertook the task of transcribing it.

2. The Small Catechism in a single volume, in an 11th-century manuscript on parchment. It contains 134 lessons. Note

3. The library of the St. Petersburg Theological Academy holds a manuscript of the Small Catechism on parchment, dating from before the 11th century—perhaps even the 9th century. It was a gift from the Monastery of St. Savvas near Jerusalem, presented by the late abbot of that monastery, Archimandrite Joasaph.

4. The Moscow Synodal Library holds three ancient parchment manuscripts of the sermons of St. Theodore from the 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries. The first contains 126 sermons; the second, 123; and the third, 76. As can be seen from their tables of contents—which were kindly provided by the Most Reverend Synodal Sacristan, Archimandrite Vladimir—they are taken from the Small Catechism. From these Catechisms, anthologies of sermons for church use in monasteries have long been compiled. There are two such anthologies in use at the Monastery of St. Panteleimon:

5. One containing 105 sermons, drawn exclusively from the Small Catechism.

6. The other contains 95 sermons, drawn almost equally from Volumes 1 and 2 of the Larger Catechism and from the Smaller Catechism. Only the latter are available to us in a translation prepared and published by the Optina Hermitage. They are also available in print only among the Greeks. In Western editions of the Holy Fathers—both earlier ones and the recent ones by Abbot Migne—only the Small Catechism is included, and even then only in a Latin translation. The question may arise: why are excerpts from the teachings offered rather than the complete teachings? – We reply that our aim is not merely to produce a book, but to convey the edifying content it contains. Excerpts better serve this purpose. However, as one can easily see, these excerpts are almost complete sermons, with minor abridgments—sometimes at the beginning, sometimes at the end, and sometimes in the middle. But everything presented here consists of the Holy Father’s own words. Furthermore, some sermons have not been fully preserved, some have not been preserved at all, and the content of others is unclear. All such passages have been omitted. – Therefore, we must wait until complete manuscripts are found somewhere. Then we can translate the sermons in their entirety all at once. Note from the Editor of the HTML Version (2006)

The main text of volumes two through five of Dobrotolyubie has been edited to bring it in line with modern Russian spelling and pronunciation. Quotations from Holy Scripture have been left unchanged. Their meaning can be clarified, if necessary, using the New Russian edition of the Old and New Testaments. The distinction in the spelling of the words “mip” (society, sometimes—the created universe as a whole), “мир” (peace, order, harmony), and “μυρο” (a fragrant mixture for sacred anointing) has also been left unchanged.

A Sketch of the Life of St. Theodore the Studite⁸¹

St. Theodore, the son of noble and distinguished parents (his father was in charge of collecting the imperial taxes), was raised in the Christian faith, learned all the wisdom of the Greeks, became an excellent orator and a capable philosopher, and at the same time an enlightened theologian. When the iconoclastic persecutions intensified under Constantine Copronymus, his parents renounced the secular life and took the monastic vows; St. Theodore, however, remained in Constantinople to complete his education. After Copronymus, his son Leo—also a heretic—reigned, and after him, his wife Irene reigned with her son Constantine. Irene remained faithful to Orthodoxy, as did her son; and together with St. Patriarch Tarasius, she convened the Seventh Ecumenical Council of the Holy Fathers, at which the iconoclastic heresy was condemned and anathematized. Present at this council was Plato, the maternal uncle of the Venerable Theodore, who, upon the council’s conclusion, took with him to the desert the Venerable Theodore and his brothers Joseph and Euthymius—who had resolved to take the monastic vows—and settled with them in Sakkudion, a beautiful, elevated place surrounded by forest and abundant in water. The place was secluded, and the only way in was along a single path. They grew fond of it and established a monastery there, along with a holy church dedicated to St. John the Theologian. Brothers began to gather around them, and monastic life proceeded in good order under the guidance of the wise Plato.

St. Theodore, who surpassed everyone in education and gifts, excelled above all others in asceticism after his tonsure, mortifying his flesh through fasting, vigils, and the most menial and arduous labors for the monastery : for he chopped wood, carried water, dug the soil in the garden and vegetable patch, and fertilized it, training himself in humility. Above all, however, he was concerned with cultivating a character that was pious and pleasing to God. To this end, he made it a rule to confess to his elder, Plato, every thought and movement of his heart each day, striving to perfect what was approved and to correct what was not. Every day, too, he set aside a certain time for contemplation of God and mental prayer, so that, standing before God alone with an undisturbed mind, he might offer Him a secret form of worship. He loved to read the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as well as the writings of the Holy Fathers, especially St. Basil the Great; and from them, he derived the rules and statutes of monastic life, which he held in such high esteem and considered so essential that he did not recognize as a monk anyone who did not observe them.

The blessed elder Plato, seeing such progress in St. Theodore’s asceticism, decided to ordain him to the priesthood—which St. Tarasius, the Patriarch, carried out upon his recommendation and intercession. Saint Theodore, having thus received ordination not so much by choice as by necessity, not only did not relax his discipline in any way, but redoubled his ascetic efforts; he was an example of virtuous monastic life to all and had many imitators, both in his own monastery and elsewhere.

After some time, the blessed elder Plato, sensing that his infirmities of old age were increasing, desired to withdraw from his duties and spend his final years in silence, appointing St. Theodore as his successor. It so happened that he fell ill, and, having summoned the brothers, he told them that he was sick and that no one knew how the illness would end; which is why he wished to choose a successor for himself—and asked: whom would they prefer? They all replied with one voice: “Theodore.” Blessed Plato then transferred authority and all the responsibilities of the abbotship to him, while he himself withdrew to a life of rest.

⁸¹ This biography was written by the monk Michael. See Patrologiae Graecae Migne, vol. 99. The text here is an excerpt.

From his very first days in this office, St. Theodore not only increased his own ascetic efforts but also demanded strict observance of the monastic rules from everyone; in particular, he fought against carelessness, mere outward propriety, and greed. Some of the brethren grumbled, but little by little they improved. And generally speaking, asceticism in the monastery was revitalized.

Things were going so well for St. Theodore within the monastery. Outside, however, sorrows and tribulations soon began. The first cause of this was the unlawful marriage of the young Tsar Constantine, which St. Theodore denounced mercilessly. He was married to Maria, the daughter of the merciful Filaret. But then he fell in love with another woman and married her, abandoning his first wife. The marriage was performed by a certain Joseph, the church steward, against the will of Patriarch Tarasius, who thereafter tried in every way to annul this marriage but did not succeed; and, fearing greater evil—for the emperor threatened to instigate iconoclasm—he ceased to press the matter with him.

But Blessed Theodore did not remain silent; especially since the nobles and dignitaries had also begun to do the same. Fearing that such lawlessness might become law, St. Theodore wrote to all the monks, instructing them to regard the king as excommunicated from the Church, or as having excommunicated himself, since by his own actions he had subjected himself to the penalty of excommunication. This became public knowledge and reached the tsar's ears. At first, the tsar was grieved by this, because his new wife, Theodota, was related to Blessed Theodore on her mother's side. Hoping, however, to reconcile him to himself through flattery, he ordered his adulterous wife to send him a large number of gifts, along with a request for his prayers for himself and his family. But the blessed one refused to even look upon the gifts or the messengers who brought them. The king resolved to find a way to see the saint himself and speak with him. To that end, he arranged to pass by the saint's monastery, as if traveling on official business, in the hope that St. Theodore would come out to meet him with the monastic community to offer a royal greeting and invite him into the monastery.

But when the saint learned of this, he ordered the gates to be locked and not to be opened, no matter how much they knocked. "They knocked and knocked, but left empty-handed. For this, the king flew into a rage against the reverend father and ordered him to be beaten and sent into exile." "They arrived, beat him so severely that his flesh was torn apart by the wounds, and the ground was stained with blood"—and they sent him to Thessalonica. At the same time, all the senior fathers of the monastery—eleven in number—were also sent into exile. St. Theodore bore it all with equanimity; and he wrote to the suffering brethren, comforting them and urging them to bear the sorrow that had befallen them with meek submission. "It is God's will, and whatever comes from God is for our good, if we humbly submit to it." He also wrote to the Pope and received a comforting reply from him, praising him for his zeal for God and his unshakable courage.

Meanwhile, the tsar lived a dissolute life and ruled the kingdom even more poorly. For this, he was deposed from the throne and soon died. The kingdom passed once again into the hands of his mother, Irina, who restored the veneration of icons. She immediately restored all those imprisoned by her son to their former positions. St. Theodore once again gathered his scattered children; and monastic life resumed in good order among them. But a few years later, another calamity befell them—one not so much grievous as troublesome: the Agarians were approaching the Imperial City. Not wishing to expose himself to harm at their hands, St. Theodore left his Sakkudion and moved to the Imperial City—where the empress and St. Patriarch granted him the Studion Monastery, from which the monks had been driven out by the iconoclast Kopronymus, and where new monks had not yet been recruited: there were only about twelve men there at that time.

Having accepted this monastery, St. Theodore renovated what needed repair, added what was missing, settled his brothers there, and monastic life resumed its usual course. The brotherhood grew, and soon numbered a thousand. Unable to oversee everything personally, the saint shared this task with other most worthy elders, to whom he entrusted the maintenance of proper order in the various aspects of monastic duties, and for each of them he wrote appropriate rules. The reverend took special care to ensure that the brethren would not need to go into the city for any reason. To this end, he established all manner of workshops within the monastery: they had their own tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, glaziers, blacksmiths, masons, and so on and so forth. The brothers were assigned to these occupations according to their abilities and inclinations, under the leadership of a special administrator and overseer. Everything was done as in the world, but not in a worldly manner. Order and reverence reigned everywhere: hands were set to work, while the lips were always reciting the Lord's Prayer and the Psalms of David. Any violation of order, great or small, was punished with a specific penance. To ensure that such punishment was rarely necessary, the reverend father always included, in his teachings—while expounding on general Christian and monastic laws—those rules that governed the order of life in his monastery. This refreshed everyone’s memory of what was proper and rekindled in each person the zeal to prove themselves diligent in everything, even the smallest matters. Meanwhile, the tyrant Nikiforos deposed Queen Irina from the throne, and his first act was to provoke the Church by reinstating Joseph, a court priest who had married Constantine to Theodota and had been defrocked for that very reason—in violation of the canons of the Holy Church. Patriarch Nikiforos, who, according to St. Tarasia, was a most worthy man, resisted this as much as he could; but later, seeing the king’s fury and fearing the worst for the Church at his hands, he readmitted Joseph to communion. But St. Theodore did not yield; he openly denounced the king’s injustice. Enraged by this, the king sent St. Theodore into exile. He did the same to his brother Joseph, to the elder Plato, and to many other monks of the Studion.

At that time, neighboring barbarians attacked Thrace, and the king had to march against them. Before setting out, he sent messengers to St. Theodore, using both flattery and threats to persuade him to agree with him. But St. Theodore, moved by the Spirit of God, replied to him thus: “It was your duty, O king, as you went into battle, to repent and make amends for what you have destroyed in the Church of God. But since you did not do this, know for certain that you will not return alive from battle. Such is God’s righteous judgment upon you.” And indeed, the king was killed in battle. After him, his son Stavrikios assumed the throne; but he, too, soon died from a wound sustained in battle. A certain Michael Kyropalates was chosen to reign, a man truly worthy of royal authority, good and orthodox. He released St. Theodore from captivity, along with all those who had suffered with him; he honored them and abolished the schism in the Church. Joseph, however, was once again excommunicated from the Church as a corrupt element. At that time, the holy and venerable elder Plato departed to the Lord and was buried with honor by the Patriarch himself at the Studion Monastery. After the passing of his spiritual father, Plato, St. Theodore and his brethren lived in peace and tranquility for only two years. Then the iconoclastic storm arose again and stirred up the entire Church.

It was instigated by the new emperor, Leo the Armenian. He had been a military commander in the eastern provinces and rebelled against the pious Emperor Michael, who, to avoid a civil war, had himself laid aside the imperial purple and donned the monastic hair shirt, ceding the kingdom to the rebellious tyrant. At first, this Leo presented himself as pious and meek; but once he had consolidated his hold on the kingdom, he began to blaspheme against the holy icons and to condemn icon veneration. St. Patriarch Nikiforos, explaining to the king the true meaning of icon veneration, urged him not to disturb the peace of the Church by opposing its teaching on this matter. But the king paid no heed; on the contrary, relying on his royal authority, he sought to force everyone to submit to his own reasoning. To this end, he gathered all the prominent priests and monks, along with the Holy Patriarch and St. Theodore, and openly revealed his heresy before everyone, praising those who did not venerate holy icons and rebuking those who did.

He based this reasoning primarily on the second commandment: “You shall not make for yourself an idol, nor any likeness,” and so on. He also offered the following arguments: How can one depict the indescribable, or fit the immeasurable into an icon the size of an elbow? How can one call a figure painted with colors a god? The spiritual fathers respectfully explained to the tsar that the Old Testament laws are not unconditionally binding on Christians; that icons depict God not as the indescribable and the inconceivable, but as He chose to reveal Himself to the saints—and especially as He revealed Himself in the Incarnation; and that by “God” they do not mean the canvases and paints, but the One Who is depicted in the icons; and that, by gazing upon His image, they lift their minds to Him. They presented these ideas in various ways; but Saint Theodore, as if uniting all of them into one, delivered a lengthy speech to enlighten the king. “From whence, O king, did this evil intention come upon you—to introduce a heretical decree into the Holy Church and to tear apart her glorious robe, woven by divine grace and the teaching of the Apostles and the Fathers?—Are you drawing wisdom from the Old Law? Then draw wisdom wisely.

Examine all the passages of the Old Testament that forbid the creation of images and likenesses and their veneration—what do they say? – They speak of the fact that, having made any image or likeness, one should not venerate it as a god or offer it divine worship—not that one should not make, possess, or honor images and likenesses at all. The Holy Church, however, does not deify images and likenesses made by human hands, but only venerates them as representations of that which is worthy of honor. Consequently, neither the Second Commandment nor any of the numerous passages in the Old Testament writings similar to this commandment—of which there are many—apply to the icons of the Holy Church. These include—to give an example—God’s command to create images of cherubim and place them in the most honorable place, above the Ark of the Covenant, and the command to make a serpent and look upon it with reverence for deliverance from the serpent's venom, and the like.

Thus, the Old Law does not reject the creation of icons or their veneration, provided that both are carried out with reason. And what do we see in the New Grace? The Lord and our Savior Himself depicted Himself on a cloth and sent it to Abgar, who was healed by touching it; St. Luke painted an image of the Mother of God holding the Pre-eternal Infant in her arms, and when he presented it to her, she bestowed upon it the blessing of her Son and God; after that, holy icons have never ceased to exist in the Church of God, many of which have been miraculous and remain so to this day. Does not all this show, more clearly than the sun itself, that icon painting and icon veneration are of divine, not human, origin? "And what do you say: 'I do not want the invisible and indescribable Divinity to be depicted with paints'? We, too, believe that the Divinity is invisible and indescribable; yet we depict the Divinity on icons not as It is in essence, but as It was pleased to reveal Itself to us, especially in the Incarnation."

"Whoever condemns the icon of Christ the Savior condemns the very Incarnation of the Lord." Having heard all this, the king became angry and said to the Venerable Theodore: "I have long known how quarrelsome and proud you are, thinking that no one is wiser than you; and now you speak so boldly to me, as if I were a common man, that you ought to be punished at once. But I spare you until the righteousness of our reasoning is more clearly revealed and acknowledged; and if you do not submit then, do not expect mercy." After this, the fathers who were then in the royal chamber decided to say no more. What is there to say to one who seeks not instruction but wishes to impose his will on the faith like a ruler? But Blessed Theodore said: "Understand, O King, and listen! It is not your business to examine and regulate the matters of faith of the Holy Church. Your duty is to uphold the order of the world.

But keeping the faith and the Holy Church in proper order is the task of the shepherds and teachers of the Church. Listen to the Apostle, who says: 'God has appointed in the Church, first apostles, second prophets, third teachers,' and so on (1 Cor. 12:28). Do you see?—Teachers, not kings.—And other passages of Scripture command that the affairs of the Church be governed by the shepherds and teachers of the Church, not by kings." The king said: "Are you the one who will expel me from the Church?" – The saint replied: "No, not I. It is the laws of the divine Apostles and the Holy Fathers that expel one from the Church. Following them, we also affirm that even if an angel from heaven were to preach to us anything contrary to the faith, let him be anathema.

Therefore, if you wish to remain within the Church of Christ with us, who worship the icon of Christ, then follow the Patriarch in all things and the Holy Synod that exists with him." At these words, the king flew into a rage and drove everyone away from him. – Following this, the king's decree began to be proclaimed throughout the city by the Greek eparch, ordering that no one dare interpret or engage in disputes concerning the faith, but that all should follow the king's will. This news reached St. Theodore as well. And he said to those who conveyed this to him: "Judge for yourselves whether it is right in the sight of God to obey you rather than God" (Acts 4:19)? It is better to have one's tongue cut out than to remain silent and fail to defend the true faith when attempts are made to distort it." From that time on, he began to teach everyone fearlessly and to urge them to hold fast to the true faith handed down by the Fathers: he called some to him, went to others himself, and wrote letters to still others; he also frequently visited the Patriarch, both to find comfort in their shared faith and to encourage him to endure the impending sorrows and persecutions with equanimity.

These persecutions and tribulations soon came to pass: the Patriarch was deposed and exiled from the Imperial City, and all the other Orthodox bishops were sentenced to imprisonment; the icons were desecrated, thrown to the ground, trampled underfoot, and set ablaze; and widespread turmoil broke out throughout the city. Seeing this, the Venerable Theodore was deeply grieved in his soul, and to counter the open desecration of the icons with their open veneration, he decided to hold a procession around the monastery on the upcoming feast of the Ascension, during which the brethren, taking the icons and raising them high, sang as they walked: "We worship Your most pure image, O Good One," and other similar hymns.

When the emperor learned of this, he sent him a stern warning that if he did not cease defending icon veneration, he would face imprisonment, wounds, and death. Since the saint could not stop doing so, either in word or in writing, he was sentenced to imprisonment, sent to Apollonia (in Asia or Bithynia), and confined in a dungeon in a fortress called Metopa. However, even from there he sent messages far and wide, urging people to strictly adhere to the veneration of icons as upheld by the Church. His messages even reached the king; and he immediately sent a certain Nikita, son of Alexeyev, to transfer the Venerable One from there to a place called Vonita and to imprison him there, with a strict prohibition against speaking or writing about icon veneration! When the messenger conveyed the tsar's command to him, he replied: "I gladly accept the change of location, for God is everywhere; but I cannot refrain from speaking or writing"; and, after being transferred to another place, he did indeed speak and write. Upon learning of this, the king, in his anger, sent the same Nikita to the Venerable One again—to inflict severe wounds upon him.

When the messenger told St. Theodore of this, he joyfully cast off his robes himself and offered his body to be beaten. But when Nikita saw how emaciated the Venerable One's body was, he could not bring himself to strike him. And he returned without having touched the saint. The saint, remaining behind, once again fearlessly proclaimed the truth regarding holy icons, speaking at length with those who came to him and writing letters far and wide. He also wrote to the Patriarchs of Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome, describing what was happening in Constantinople and asking them to help Orthodoxy both through prayer and through action. A certain cleric of the Church of Asia happened to visit him; after listening to the Saint's teachings, he rejected the iconoclastic heresy and converted to Orthodoxy—and upon returning to his own place, he converted another cleric as well. When the bishop learned of this, he complained to the emperor about the Venerable One; and the emperor ordered the governor of Asia to inflict severe wounds upon St. Theodore. The governor sent one of his men to inflict 50 wounds upon the Venerable One. But this messenger, too, upon seeing the Venerable One's naked body, was too ashamed to raise his hand; and, bowing to him, he returned without carrying out the king's evil command. No sooner had this messenger returned to the one who had sent him than a new messenger from the king himself, named Anastasius—a cruel and heartless man—appeared before St. Theodore. With his own hands, he beat the Saint, inflicting up to 100 wounds upon him; he did the same to his disciple Nicholas; and having then confined both of them to a dark and cramped place, he ordered that they be kept in dire straits—and departed.

This cruel order was strictly enforced: the place was dark, foul-smelling, and damp; through a small window, they were thrown a small piece of bread—not enough even for one person—and given a mug of water, sometimes once every other day or longer, as if the intention were to starve them to death; the pain from their wounds and the rough treatment by the guards only added to their suffering. In such distress, St. Theodore, inspired by his faith, resolved to sustain himself solely on the Most Pure Body of the Lord from the provisions he had brought with him—yet he gave everything he received to his disciple.

After some time, a certain royal nobleman was passing through that area; upon learning of the plight of the Reverend Father and his disciple, he ordered that their suffering be alleviated, that they be given more food and drink, and that they be treated more mercifully. Thus more than three years passed. Then one of St. Theodore's letters fell into the king's hands, in which the king's wickedness was denounced and he was exhorted to hold fast to Orthodoxy and courageously endure persecution and torment for its sake. The king flew into a rage and sent a certain beast-like nobleman to show the message to the Reverend Father; and, upon verifying that it was indeed his, to beat him to the point of death. The Reverend acknowledged the letter as his own—and was beaten mercilessly, left barely breathing. The same fate befell his disciple. Having sated his malice, the messenger returned to his master; and the martyrs, having suffered cheerfully for the truth, began to care for one another.

St. Theodore could not move and lay exhausted, barely breathing, taking neither food nor drink. The disciple was somewhat stronger, and, forgetting himself, devoted all his care to the Saint, feeding and giving him barley broth mixed with some kind of herb. When the saint had recovered somewhat, he in turn helped his disciple, especially in tending to his wounds. They cleaned each other's wounds and cut away the hanging shreds of flesh, washed away the pus, and applied ointment to the sores with whatever they could find. Thus they suffered for ninety days, and before they had fully recovered, another messenger arrived from the king—cruel and inhuman—with an order to take the passion-bearers to Smyrna. This was carried out under harsh guard, amid deprivation, abuse, hardship, and every kind of exhaustion.

Only God's special help gave the martyrs the strength to reach their destination. There they were handed over to a bishop—a wicked man and a teacher of heresy—and confined in a low, cramped, and dark hut, where they endured all manner of hardships and privations. Not long afterward, the king's former unmerciful official, Anastasius, arrived; after inflicting a hundred lashes on the Venerable One, he returned. The Venerable One, however, endured all this with equanimity, giving thanks to God. At that time, the province of Smyrna was ruled by the king's nephew and like-minded associate. He fell ill and was nearing death. One of his servants, a faithful believer, reminded him of St. Theodore, who possessed the gift of healing.

The sick man sent a message to the Reverend Father asking for his prayers. The Reverend Father, having recounted all the atrocities the man had committed against the Orthodox, for which he was bound to suffer eternal torment, urged him to repent, even at the very end. The governor was horrified by what awaited him and turned to the Reverend, asking for forgiveness and promising to convert to Orthodoxy if he were healed. St. Theodore sent him an icon of the Most Holy Mother of God, commanding him to venerate it for the rest of his life. Upon receiving the icon, the governor immediately felt relief and began to recover. His recovery was already nearing its end when he once again fell back into his former superstition, having been led astray by the heretical Bishop of Smyrna. Then the sick man received holy oil from this bishop as a blessing. But as soon as he was anointed with it, he relapsed into his former illness—and breathed his last in agony. The Venerable One suffered in Smyrna for more than a year and a half.

And he would have suffered longer, but the wicked king was killed, and Michael (Travlius or Valvos), who succeeded him, was indifferent to the faith and allowed everyone to believe as they wished. Under his rule, all those who had been exiled and imprisoned during the previous reign were set free. An order came to release St. Theodore and his disciples as well. (St. Theodore had spent about seven years in these imprisonments under Leo the Armenian; and before that, five years under Constantine for denouncing the illegality of his marriage.) All of his disciples who had been in exile then gathered around the Venerable One; and he, together with them, made his return home, being joyfully and lovingly welcomed everywhere; for the entire Church rejoiced at his return. Upon reaching Chalcedon, he met with St.

Patriarch Nikiforos; and they comforted one another as fellow sufferers for the same righteous cause of the faith. Together with him, they went before the emperor and persuaded him to embrace Orthodoxy. But the emperor said, “I do not wish to worship icons—nor do I want them to be visible in Constantinople; keep them wherever you wish, and honor them as you see fit.” From there, St. Theodore went with his disciples to the region of Criscentius, and having settled there, he hoped at last to find peace. But due to a rebellion led by a certain Thomas, who sought to seize the imperial throne, he was forced to take refuge in Constantinople for the duration of the uprising; for he did not wish to live permanently in a city steeped in heretical iconoclasm. Once this storm had subsided, he did not return to the regions of Kriskentios, but went to Akritos’ Heronis, to the Church of St. Trifon, where he spent the rest of his life in ascetic endeavors, surrounded by his disciples. Finally, the time came for his blessed passing, in the 67th year of his life. When news of this spread, people began to flock to the Venerable One from all directions—of every rank and station, from near and far. Everyone wished to hear his words, and the Venerable One spoke; but he was so weak from exhaustion that even those standing close by could barely hear him. Therefore, scribes were stationed nearby so that those unable to hear the Saint’s words would not be deprived of his edification. Anyone who wishes may read them in the codex of the Reverend Father’s sermons. His illness, however, subsided somewhat, and the saint was able to walk; he attended church and, on the following Sunday, celebrated the Divine Liturgy, delivered a sermon to the brethren, and dined with them. Likewise, on the following day, November 6, on the feast of St. Paul the Confessor, he celebrated the Divine Liturgy, instructed the brethren, and was present for the singing at Vespers that same evening. But upon returning to his cell, he took to his bed again and began to feel ill. He was ill for four days, and on the fifth day he departed to the Lord, to a life free from suffering.

As the hour of his passing drew near, the brothers gathered around him and wept as if for their father and teacher. Looking at them, he too shed a few tears and said: “Behold, fathers and brothers, the end of my life has come ! We must all drink from this cup—some sooner, others later—but no one can escape it. I am departing by the path our fathers took; I am going to the place of eternal life, where is God and our Lord, whom my soul has loved, whom my heart has desired, to whom I have called myself a servant, though I have not performed my duties as I ought. – You, my beloved brothers and children, abide by the words I have entrusted to you, and hold fast to the true faith and a godly life. You know that I have never ceased to proclaim the Word of God to you—both in the Church and in private. Now, I earnestly beg you: keep this in your minds and preserve it. I have sorrow in my heart because of you, for I must give an account of you. Take care, then, to depart from here so that you may appear blameless before the face of the Lord.” Having said this and taken his leave, he instructed his disciples to take the candles, light them, and sing the closing hymn. The disciples, standing around him, began to sing: “Blessed are the blameless” (Ps. 118); and when, singing in turn, they had sung: “I will never forget Your righteous judgments, for by them You have given me life” (v. 93), —with these words, the Venerable One gave up his spirit (826). The angels of God received it and carried it to the throne of God, as the Venerable Hilarion of Dalmatia, who saw this in a vision, truthfully testified.

On this day, November 11, in commemoration of St. Mina, while walking alone in his garden and singing psalms, he heard some wondrous voices and smelled an indescribable fragrance. Amazed that such a thing could be, he looked up at the sky and saw a great multitude of white-robed figures, with bright, joyful faces, descending from on high with songs to meet a certain honorable person. Upon seeing this, the blessed one fell to the ground in terror and heard someone say, “This is the soul of Theodore, the abbot of Studion, who suffered to the point of bloodshed for the icons and has now passed away; it is solemnly ascending the mountain, and the heavenly hosts are descending to meet it.” – Blessed Hilarion recounted this vision to other virtuous fathers: they noted the day and hour of this event, and by the timing realized that it was precisely then that the praiseworthy Theodore of Studion had passed away. The passing of St. Theodore was accompanied by many miracles, of which there were not a few—both before his passing and afterward—from his coffin and his holy relics.

1. How exalted is the monastic life

1. 1) How exalted is the monastic life. – 2) Every act of obedience, when performed according to God’s will, leads to paradise, even if it is very simple. – 3) A list of virtues that lead to paradise. [1, 2]⁸²

1. God brought us into the world so that, by pleasing Him with good deeds, we might become heirs to the Kingdom of Heaven. To us monks, however, after bringing us into the world, He granted a particularly great grace, consisting in the fact that, having chosen us from among all people, He placed us before His face to serve His kingdom. Let each one now carefully examine whether he is living in accordance with the calling to which he has been summoned, and whether he is concerned with nothing else but pleasing God.

2. In carrying out our duties, we must act as if we had received the command directly from God Himself. God requires of the living that they do what is within their power. And let us do so, taking every care to avoid one thing: that we do not deceive ourselves with vanity before others or with conceit before ourselves, as if we were doing something great. The Lord has a reward ready for every worker: the steward will rejoice with the first martyr Stephen; the baker himself will be pure bread for the Lord; the gardener will enjoy the bounties of paradise, being deemed worthy to dwell there; and every other person—the vineyard keeper, the woodworker, the scribe, the gatekeeper, and in general, whoever performs any duty—if they carry it out as work for the Lord, will receive a worthy reward. The Lord sees everything; nothing is hidden from Him; and He will reward all things in a divine manner.

3. “Stand firm in the faith, be courageous, be strong; let love be your rule in everything” (1 Cor. 16:13–14); die daily so that you may live forever; flee from evil thoughts just as you would from evil deeds; consider loquacity a great sin, laughter an act of fornication, gluttony and satiety slavery to lust; keep your thoughts sorrowful, your eyes downcast; be pure in body and soul; be inspired by hope; do not become attached to anything on earth; fear the One God. If we conduct ourselves in this way, if we maintain this disposition, then we will rejoice with the angels and be glad with all the saints forever.

2. Do not think highly of yourself

2. 1) Do not be conceited. – 2) Live for all your brothers, just as every member of the body lives for the whole body. – 3) Our obedience is not burdensome, but through the renunciation of our own will, we deserve the crowns of martyrdom. [1, 3]

4. You have acted wisely, men called by God, in leaving the world behind and setting the eyes of your hearts on God. Strive, then, to live in a way pleasing to God, and in doing so, “do not think of yourselves more highly than you ought” (Rom. 12: 16)—neither in terms of spiritual virtues nor physical advantages—lest you hear: “What do you have that you did not receive? “But even if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?”” (1 Cor. 4:7). Whoever does much does so by the grace of Christ, having received power from God above—not for oneself, but for one’s neighbor.

5. You are all servants to one another, helpers to one another, as living members of one body. If the eye does not guide the hand, if one hand does not support the other, if the foot does not walk as the good of the whole body requires, if, in general, each member begins to act according to its own will; then not only will they fail to preserve their own strength, but by disrupting themselves, they will also disrupt the entire body.

Therefore, let everyone rejoice when it falls to him to labor more for others, enduring cold, rain, and heat; but let him who sits idle weep and be contrite, like a useless member, living in the body not for the body's sake and worthy only of being cut off.

6. Let not your ears be weighed down by hearing this. On the contrary, consider how little and how few labors are required of us to attain the Kingdom of Heaven. We do not shed blood like the martyrs; our limbs are not cut off, nor are our bones broken; but if we add to our light and few labors a renunciation of our own will, with a desire to please God and to serve our brothers with love, then through this we become like the long-suffering martyrs, and even like the Lord Himself, who endured crucifixion and death for our sake. Take heart, then, as you labor! Martyr's crowns await you.

3. Stay alert: for the enemy does not slumber—as a comfort to the shepherd

3. 1) Be vigilant: for the enemy does not slumber—as a comfort to the shepherd. – 2) Do not lag behind in your labor, for for every labor a reward is immediately set aside in heaven. – 3) Instructions: to the canonarch; – 4) to the lamp-bearer; – 5) to the hospital attendant; – 6) To the sick. [1, 4]

7. I know from the Holy Fathers, and especially from my righteous elder, that the devil never sleeps nor slacks off in his efforts to destroy our souls; but he is always watchful and eager to sow his tares, “while men sleep” (Matt. 13:25). So stay alert, my God-called children, and be sober-minded, lest any of you fall into the devil's snare. I love to hear of the progress of each of you; I am comforted by the obedience of one, the humility of another, and the diligence of a third. But my soul hates the disobedient son—the grumbler and the proud, the idler and the sluggard, the whisperer and the chatterbox. “But who am I, speaking thus?” I am your shepherd, though unworthy; you are my sheep, for whom I will give an account to the Lord who has entrusted them to me.

8. Therefore, all of you, tend the flock; tend it well; tend it with one mind and in unity. Let no one fall behind. The enemy will lead the one who falls behind astray and destroy him; just as the wolf snatches up the straying sheep and carries it off into the forest or the mountains. The work of salvation is not easy; the path to it is multifaceted, exhausting, and requires strenuous labor, vigilance, and contentment with little—little food, little rest, poor clothing—and above all, it requires the renunciation of one's own will. The Lord measures each person's reward in proportion to their labors; and crowns are set aside daily for each of those who labor.

9. We must perform the church services with all propriety, reverence, and warmth of heart. And you, my child, the canonarch (master of ceremonies), as the one appointed to oversee this first and greatest of our duties, be vigilant; keep the choir in order; observe precisely the times designated for each hymn, and carry out all other duties as commanded regarding the psalms and stichera, in good conscience. Let those who are able to sing do so; and those who are better suited to reading, assign them to reading. Do not be negligent, but be attentive, and assign to each of the brothers with fairness what to read or sing on one day and what on another—some on ordinary days, some on feast days—judging by their voice, pronunciation, and speed of reading, so that even outsiders, if any happen to be present, may benefit. May everything be done in an orderly and proper manner (1 Cor. 14:40), so that you may be deemed worthy to hear from the Lord: “Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a little, I will set you over much” (Matt. 25:21), and be numbered among the saints in heaven.

10. And you, lamp-lighter, be diligent and meticulous in fulfilling the duty entrusted to you; for it is from God and divine. Guard the lighting of the temple as you would your own two eyes; for it is performed in the presence of God. If the one who lights candles before a king is entirely attentive so as to please him before his eyes, how much more, my child, should you, with fear and love, light the lamps for God the King of kings, to whom all creation is subject, as well as clean the lamps, maintain the lampstands, and ensure the proper light. And see to the cleanliness of the church: sweep it at least twice a week, dust the icons so they do not deteriorate, and keep everything else in order and tidy, taking every precaution not to damage anything belonging to the church.

11. You are the third on my mind, my child, the hospital attendant. Follow the instructions given to you. You are worthy of great rewards in this most difficult, tireless, martyr-like service—one that is exalted and worthy of the highest reward. Do not wait for or seek rest here in order to receive it there. If you labor well here, you will undoubtedly find peace there. Some read, others pray, still others observe silence, and others perform other praiseworthy deeds; but you, too, keep pace with them—or even surpass them. – As soon as it is light, go from one sick person to another, inquire about the condition of each one's illness, and prescribe what is necessary and beneficial for each. If you persevere in such labors, you will enter the Kingdom of Heaven as a crowned one.

12. As for you, my children who are sick, accept with gratitude everything that happens to you, being content with what you are given. If, however, you desire anything beyond that, simply mention it; and whatever the brother assigned to you does for you afterward, be grateful with love. Do not grumble: it is enough that your brother serves you like a slave out of love for God and provides what is suitable for each of you, according to the monastery's means. If you do not conduct yourselves in this way, you will be worthy of great torments.

4. Remember death and the day of reckoning, and be zealous for your vows

4. 1) Remember death and the day of reckoning, and be zealous for your vows. – 2) Guard your speech. – 3) The brothers are like the hands, eyes, and feet of the abbot. – 4) Even our physical labor is spiritual; work while encouraging one another.... Christ be with you. – 5) A lesson and encouragement for the cook. [1, 5]

13. Let us contemplate the heights of heaven and the depths of the earth, and our own nature—that we, as human beings, die, being carried from here to the realms beyond, beyond the bounds of this world. Without any concealment, we will then stand before the face of the righteous Judge to give an account of our deeds; after which we will be received either into the kingdom of heaven, if we have acted well, or into the unquenchable fire, if we have remained in sin. Let us therefore continually rekindle that zeal for a God-pleasing life with which we entered this monastery, recalling the words we spoke and the vows we made at that time, and being mindful of our duty to always remain faithful to them; for by these words we will be judged.

14. Keep your lips pure, speaking only what is pleasing to God. Do not allow flattery or unjust reproaches. And “let no corrupting talk come out of your mouths” (Eph. 4:29).

15. Those of you who labor are my hands. Labor, then, my hands, and do not grow weary as you reach out to do what is right; for “the arm of the Lord will strengthen you” (Ps. 88:22). You are my eyes, set to watch over others. Watch carefully, foreseeing and warning those who might fall, so that you yourselves may become worthy of divine favor. I also have feet. My feet, stand firm on the right path of God's commandments. These are the ones who courageously and cheerfully bear the burdens of their fellow brothers; for this, if they persevere in this good disposition, they will be carried to eternal rest. With these words, I wish to lift up those who have fallen, stir up those who have grown slothful to zeal, and give courage to those who have fallen into despondency.

16. Rejoice, take comfort, and be inspired by zeal. Do not shrink from anything—neither spiritual nor physical labor—for even our physical being, when consecrated to God, is spiritual. Moreover, whoever is diligent in physical matters is also diligent in spiritual ones. Exhort and encourage one another in prayer, in obedience, and in humility. Stir one another up to every good work, conducting yourselves in all things with propriety and decorum. Follow one another's example and help one another; and in this way you will be “children of Christ and heirs in part” (1 Cor. 12:27). I firmly believe that Christ is your Head. With Him as your Head, whom do you have to fear? And what will you not receive with Him? You will be rulers of heaven and earth, and you will inherit all that has been promised.

17. And a word to you, my child, the cook—who struggles daily in the fire, chopping wood, cooking meals, carrying water, cleaning and washing vegetables, blackening your face, soiling your clothes, sweating and baking in the heat, striving in every way to provide the brothers with the meals they need—you will share in the glory of the saints, and the warm bosom of Abraham will give you rest. Just endure patiently, spending your day in joy, and be so diligent and conscientious in your work that your service will even appear to you in your dreams. From early morning, rush like a fire to fulfill your duties, and you will emerge victorious, having done your work well.

5. Compete with one another in what is good, but not in what is evil

5. 1) Compete with one another in what is good, but not in what is evil. – 2) We live as if sailing across the sea; the spiritual significance of all the vicissitudes of our voyage lies in this. – 3) The exemplary brother is a source of blessing to the brotherhood, while the wicked one is a source of harm. – 4) The reward is immeasurable; we do not journey in vain; rejoice. [1, 6]

18. These are now days of blessing, a time for action, the summer of God's favor. Let us not allow ourselves to waste not only the summer but even a single day; may our zeal and concern for salvation be unyielding, our mutual competition be for good, and our eagerness to imitate one another's virtues be righteous. If we see an outstanding virtue in someone—meekness, for example, piety, obedience, humility, or anything else praiseworthy—let us be moved by a noble desire to be their equals in this. From this will spring forth among us a bond of peace and a loving disposition. Let us not, through competition, learn what is contrary to this—and, seeing someone careless, let us not be careless; seeing someone gluttonous, let us not be gluttonous; seeing someone talkative, let us not be talkative. But as wise people, taught by God Himself, “test everything; hold fast to what is good” (1 Thess. 5:21).

19. Let us hold fast to the anchor of our faith, hoist the sail of hope, and with all our energy cross the great sea of this earthly life; for during this voyage, winds will inevitably assail us—I mean the rebellions of the flesh, —the surging of carnal desires, the whirlpools arising from the depths of the heart, wicked thoughts, and many other things similar to what happens when sailing the sea: pirates—malicious demons; shoals—blindness from ignorance; underwater rocks—unforeseen snares against our soul; the dangerous flooding of the hold—the concealment of sins and sinful thoughts, from which the soul perishes, just as sailors perish who do not heed the flooding of the hold, sinking sleepily into the depths of the sea along with the ship. But we, most honorable brothers, will guard ourselves against all such things and walk vigilantly in the way of God; above all, we will lay bare everything that takes place in our hearts, so that the flood of evil thoughts may not overflow our souls and “the utter abyss may not engulf us,” according to a certain prophetic word (Jonah 2:6).

20. Always ready for anything in the brotherhood, both in spiritual feats and in physical labor, he shines like a heavenly star and guides many. Diligent in matters of piety, sincere and worthy of heaven, serious and silent—he is an angel on earth, serving God and the Lord of all creation as if before the throne of the cherubim. He who benefits others with his virtues and stirs within them a zeal for spiritual endeavors is a radiant sun, gleaming with gold and warming the entire community. But who is gloomy, dark, and night-like, who casts a shadow over those beneath him and makes them like himself? Who, if not the one who, through arrogance, sensuality, mockery, idleness, shameful deeds, slander, insolence, and impurity—by associating with evil thoughts—resembles Satan, who fell from heaven? We must not submit to the influence of such people.

21. Your labor is not long, but your reward is eternal; suffering is brief, but joy is everlasting; hardship is temporary, but rest is infinite. There you will rejoice, “where all who rejoice dwell” (Ps. 86:7), from where “sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee away” (Isa. 35:10), where there is no weeping, but only joy. So are you laboring in vain? Are you laboring in vain? By no means! On the contrary, it is wise, exalted, wondrous, blissful, apostolic, martyr-like, fatherly, angelic, and heavenly, and pleasing to God—you have departed (from the world), come (to us), been born of us through spiritual birth, grown up, become warriors, armed yourselves with spiritual weapons, and are striking down the Amalekites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, and other tribes of the passions. You have left behind the sea of the world (by renouncing it), crossed the Jordan through the enlightening and purifying second baptism in the reception of the schema (for it is effective repentance), and from here you begin to enter into your inheritance, into the land which our faithful God has shown you through His promise—a land flowing with the honey and milk of immortality and everlasting life. Rejoice in this, exult, and be glad, seeing such love of God for mankind. Before our eyes is life, before us is joy, at our feet is bliss; the door is ajar—“Run, that you may obtain” (1 Cor. 9:24). Who, then, can remain indecisive? Who will not rush forward and strive with ever-increasing zeal, seeking to outpace others in obtaining the treasures that lie ahead?

6. Against lust; for by this fire the eternal fire is kindled; and death may overtake one in the act

6. 1) Against lust; for by this fire the eternal fire is kindled; and death may overtake one in the act. – 2) If you stumble, rise up, hating sin and loving what is good. – 3) Avoid minor sins, especially idle talk; topics for conversation are prescribed. [1:7]

22. Be courageous and stand valiantly against the devil's wiles, knowing that our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against our invisible and bitter persecutor, Satan, and the apostate forces under him. Therefore, if a lustful thought assails anyone, let him not be troubled or confused; but through prayer, groaning, and the outpouring of tears, let him turn it back and ward it off, recalling that (eternal) fire and the fact that what now burns within us serves as the cause of that (eternal) flame. Therefore, no matter how many times a day such a thought assails you, root it out completely—and we will not be condemned. If this lust is accompanied by a darkening of the mind and a sense of the burden of asceticism, lift up the eye of your heart in sorrow and cut through this snare of the devil by reflecting on the possibility of dying at any moment. May everyone who labors be strengthened by the thought of rest in eternal life.

23. May the grace of our Lord overshadow you, and may He grant you the steadfastness to endure your present hardships. Strive in the struggle and the battle, and do your utmost to complete the journey without stumbling. But if such a thing should happen—which I do not wish for you, however—rise up quickly. Consider what is visible. “The heavens are high,” as it is written, “and the earth is deep” (Prov. 25:3). And who among those cast down by sin will ascend to them? Therefore, detest them, hate them, turn away from them; but strive for what is good and do what is pleasing to God.

24. I implore you: just as we avoid major sins, let us also avoid the so-called minor ones—that is, idle talk and frivolity. Be gentle and meek toward everyone; and even when you converse merely to dispel boredom, let your conversation be wholesome. Let your conversation be either about your upcoming work, or about resolving a question regarding some passage of Scripture, or about reading according to the rule, or about the life of some saint, or about our departure from the body, the coming of angels to us, and our account before the Lord and God for our entire life in the flesh; how the saints will depart to unspeakable joy, while the sinful will go to inconsolable torment; and how, ask one another, we may avoid this passion (idle talk) and acquire the virtue opposed to it (wise speech); how does a tear burst forth and flow, and what causes it to dry up? And how, through sincere obedience, humility, and silence of the lips, are the shoots of the soul watered and do they blossom, like the tree of life, in the midst of paradise; but they are dried up by loquacity, laughter, inappropriate and untimely glances, grumbling, harsh speech, oversleeping, overeating, and every other passion to which we wilfully give ourselves over.

7. A high calling; give thanks by keeping your vows

7. 1) A lofty calling; give thanks by keeping one’s vows. – 2) The main thing is to attain God. – 3) Faithfulness to one’s calling makes one a citizen of heaven; the deeds of this faithfulness. – 4) Offerings to God on Epiphany. – 5) Words from Scripture about the greatness of the promised blessings. [1, 8]

25. Behold, the Lord and our God reveals His goodness to people, shining with rays of love for humanity, to draw all to Himself; and He has especially brought us monks out of darkness into the light. What thanks, then, shall we offer to God, who has chosen and called us? – This: that we may live with the aim of excelling in piety, having put aside a life of passion and sensual pleasure. —Let us, then, brothers, be mindful of our calling; let us keep before our eyes what monastic life requires and the vows we have made in the presence of the angels; and let us live in such a way that we are ready, as soon as God calls us, to pass from here—as from a sojourn—to our own dwelling with complete joy.

26. Do you see the insignificance of this present life? Do you see how fleeting and transient human life is? – There is but one good portion, one blessed life, and one insatiable grace—to attain God through the observance of His commandments. But this requires labor and intense self-discipline.

27. You are citizens of Jerusalem, inhabitants of paradise, and members of the choir of the Holy Angels—if you stand firm in your calling, remain faithful to it, love it with all your heart, compel yourselves to do its works, abstain from everything contrary to it, and discipline yourselves in every way. Rejoice, then, in the fear of the Lord, and purify yourselves from every impure disposition; be radiant and shine forth as children of light; show respect, obedience, and meekness to your elders; may brotherly love abound richly among you; and may the pursuit of your own will and self-will be abhorrent to you.

28. Behold, the day of the Epiphany has come! The Lord from heaven—let us meet Him with pure hearts. Let us prepare holy dispositions and, as a gift from all creation to the All-Holy One, let us offer a renewed life, godly contemplations, and a heart burning with love for God; let us also offer—some love for silence, some unceasing vigilance, some frequent prayer, self-restraint, meekness, and patience—all of these, so that you may lack nothing.

29. God, through His Saints, reveals the glory that awaits us in the future. St. Paul exclaims: “We are unworthy to share in the glory that is to be revealed to us” (Rom. 8:18); St. David sings: “Better is one day in Your courts than a thousand” (Ps. 83:11)—and: “I will be satisfied when I behold Your glory” (Ps. 16:15); and among the other prophets, one cries out that from there “sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee away” (Isa. 35:10). And how many more such testimonies can the seeker find in Scripture, which reveal to us the inconceivable delight, the boundless joy, and the indescribable blessings promised by God to those who please Him. Let us therefore stand firm in this, be strengthened, be built up, and be perfected in Christ our God.

8. Do not grow weary: the labor is small; the reward is immeasurable

8. 1) Do not grow weary: the labor is small; the reward is immeasurable. – 2) Do not indulge the flesh, imagining that you are already walking the path of death. – 3) Offer every sacrifice—for the sake of the commandment... without fearing anything. [1, 9]

30. Do not stop or give in to laziness in serving God, and, despite the difficulties of the present time, do not deprive yourselves of the joy that awaits in the age to come. But everything—both words and deeds—endure with good cheer, and arrange your lives so that you may accept one another in God’s love and help one another in difficult matters. Even if you were to live a whole century in heroic deeds, it could not compare to a single hour of the immeasurable fullness of eternal immortality. Moreover, it is both blissful and—to put it in human terms—highly advantageous to suffer a little, as if in a dream, and in return to receive an infinitely blissful life.

31. Let us not indulge the body, which the Saints regarded as an enemy and subdued in every way through self-restraint, since indulging it is contrary to the spiritual life. Soon we will depart from this life. We see examples of this in our brothers, who one by one are laid to rest. — And will we remain here? Certainly not. – But oh! Oh, brothers! How dreadful is the matter of death! Why must we, as if inspired from above, constantly keep ourselves in a state of contemplation, reflecting that we are, as it were, already dying—that any moment the separation of the soul from the body will take place, the Angels will come (let me not say: the demons will also rush in; for that happens to those enslaved by their passions), and the call will be heard: “The time has come, soul, come forth!” What toil and what anguish the breaking of this union will bring then!—Then good deeds and a clear conscience will be a great help, a comfort, and an intercession for those who are departing. Then obedience will inspire boldness, humility will attract favor, a tear will move Him to mercy, the abundance of good deeds will gain the upper hand over the demons, patience will intercede for every deed—and the enemies will retreat empty-handed, while the soul, with the Angels, will go to the Savior in great joy. Then—there is cause for fear if, by any means, the soul, dwelling in the habit of passion, is found to be possessed by sin: for then the demons will gain the upper hand and cast the poor soul down with them into the abyss of hell, into darkness and the tormenting Tartarus. Such is the benefit to that soul (from indulging the passions)!

32. Let us therefore purify ourselves while we are still here. Let us shed blood in our struggles, and let nothing separate us from God’s commandment: neither toil, nor sickness, nor pleasure, nor rest, nor any form of contentment. Even if we were to die every day, we will endure it with joy, striving to live above worldly wisdom. We will fear nothing but God, the dreadful Judge: neither man, nor beast, nor fire, nor sword, nor sea, nor anything else that seems terrifying; for man, created in the image of God, is the lord and master of earthly creatures.

9. To cultivate, sow, and irrigate the field of the soul so that it may bear spiritual fruit

9. 1) Cleanse, sow, and water the field of the soul so that it may bear spiritual fruit. – 2) Moderation in food and sleep, and the fruits thereof. – 3) Endure meager clothing and footwear. – 4) Willingly endure suffering for the sake of the future. [1, 10]

33. Like good soil watered by the rain from the grace-filled streams of the Holy Spirit, bear fruit and cultivate virtues, like ears of grain full of life. Just as you renew your fields, so purify the soil of your soul from the thorns of the mind with the fire of the fear of God and the sword of truth. Sow, then, according to the Apostolic command, not in the flesh, lest you reap corruption from the flesh; but sow in the Spirit, that you may reap spiritual fruit from the Spirit [Gal. 6:8]—learning patience, perseverance, generosity, humility, and mutual love for one another, while hating envy, deceit, seduction, slander, and calumny.

34. Also cultivate self-restraint. Self-restraint means providing the body with food in accordance with its needs, neither overburdening it nor depriving it too much, just as one does when loading a ship; for when it is too full, it may sink, and when it is too light, it is in danger of capsizing. The same applies to sleep: one should get as much as is beneficial. A balanced diet leads to restful sleep, and then to alertness during psalm singing, attentive listening to the readings, and a clear understanding of every word of the divine hymns. When the soul is delighted by all this, it is put in a good frame of mind, warmed, and enlightened, tasting the fruits of moderation in all things. But from overeating come heavy dreams; from both of these come a clouding of the mind, a failure to understand the words of the hymns, a tightening of the lips, and a darkening of the eyes, the soul, and the body: for the inner state corresponds to the outer. Then the thief of the soul, rushing in, steals whatever he wishes. That is why the Lord said, “Watch” (Matt. 26:41).

35. God loves a heartfelt word, a meek reply, a cheerful—not a troubled—face, a gentle disposition, and humble conversation. – Whoever bears hardships more patiently than others, whoever gives thanks when he lacks necessary clothing, shoes, or a head covering—that person is a true servant of God, exchanging temporary and insignificant things for future great blessings. I take care to satisfy everyone’s needs, and I say this so that, when certain things are lacking, no one will be distressed, annoyed, or complain. There are also those who, burning with love for God, voluntarily deprive themselves of other things. But certainly, everyone who gratefully accepts what is given to them, whenever and whatever it may be, does good.

36. The Kingdom of Heaven lies before us, and the reward of eternal bliss awaits those who please God. Who, then, would not rush to seize such treasures that are offered? Who would not willingly resolve to endure suffering, to be destitute, to endure cold and frost, and to mortify himself through ascetic deeds, for the sake of such and such blessings? – But you are not uninvolved in such labors and feats; for by cutting off your own desires, by renouncing everything, by every kind of endurance, you die daily, while at the same time your life is hidden in Christ Jesus, our Lord. When our life, Christ the Lord, is revealed—then you too will begin to rejoice with Him forever (Col. 3:4). Do not, therefore, seek rest here, but regard your suffering here as a guarantee of eternal rest there.

10. The Lord is coming—be patient; and what will sustain you?

10. 1) The Lord is coming—be patient—and find sustenance. – 2) Behold—this is your end—and paradise: there we will forget all our hardships. – 3) There, in the Lord’s palaces, there is rejoicing for those who have suffered for evil: who would not willingly choose them? – 4) Rejoice that you live in hardship and poverty: such is the monastic life. – 5) Help one another in everything—and the Lord is near. [1:11]

1. Walk in the way of God, having the Lord with you daily, as He has promised. For He Himself, through His Apostles, said to all “who seek His covenant and His testimony” (Ps. 24: 10) that He would be with them “until the end of the age” (Matt. 28: 20). His ways and paths are unfathomable. He is invisibly present to the eyes of the mind and converses silently with those who are pure in heart. Hold fast to your righteous path, avoiding the snares of the envious devil. Take up the wings of God’s love, so that you may soar on par with the clouds, above all earthly snares. Anoint your feet with the oil of joy and chastity, without fearing to walk the sorrowful path of the Lord. If you thirst from faintheartedness, drink the water of patience; if you hunger from spiritual weariness, partake of the bread that nourishes and strengthens the human heart—the word of wisdom, which bestows good strength and courage. You are well-prepared and alert; but as you gaze upon the mountain, do not take upon yourselves burdens that are hard to bear—that is, the enemy’s evil intentions. It is enough for one who walks the path leading from earth to heaven to walk this path without faint-heartedness, without taking on any burden.

2. You have judged well and acted wisely in leaving the world behind; now you are devoutly drawing near to the house of God, laboring for the Lord and serving Him daily, turning away from all that is temporary—family, homeland, and every desire of the flesh. Our work is the work of the angels. We shall endure a little longer, suffer a little more. The end and limit of our life is already drawing near; we shall be taken up by the holy angels, and we shall begin to rejoice forever, having become heirs of the promised blessings along with all the saints. And then we will have no regrets—neither that we triumphed, nor that we were exhausted by our ascetic struggles, nor that we fasted, or deprived ourselves of sleep, or endured cold and frost, or in any other way denied ourselves the fulfillment of our desires. On the contrary, we will bless and praise that day and hour when God was pleased to allow us to flee from the world and take the monastic habit. There, each of us will be rewarded a hundredfold for every suffering endured here, and instead of sorrow, we will find there joy that is all-encompassing and everlasting. Let none of us refuse to endure what we are facing; for in return we will receive inexpressible and eternal joy. May none of us ever hear: “Remember that you received your good things in your womb”; and: “A great chasm has been fixed between us and you” (Luke 18:26). This is a dreadful voice, separating the sinner from the righteous—dreadful even when one thinks of it. How much more dreadful it will be to hear it!

3. As far as the heavens are from the earth, so far will those who live in sin be from our Lord God. But His friends and true servants will enter into His presence, into His heavenly kingdom, into the heavenly Jerusalem, the great city, where there are unfathomable treasures, boundless glory, and eternal joy. There we will see one another and recognize one another; and I believe that if we always do God's will, we will be there together in unending joy. If this is so, shall we not labor, shall we not willingly endure suffering? Shall we not drink in with joy the mockery and insults, as if they were milk? Shall we not desire to be in the last place and rank, or even to be trampled upon more than all others? Shall we not choose to die every day of our own free will, like the gentle lambs of Christ? Yes, my brothers! Yes, my fathers! It was with such a disposition that the saints pleased God.

4. Let us not seek here a life of complete contentment, free from all trouble and hardship. Rather, let us rejoice when we suffer and be glad when we find ourselves in difficult circumstances, when we are wronged, oppressed, or lack the necessities of life—in housing, food and drink, footwear and clothing, or in any other needs. This is our testimony, and for this the monk is blessed, as one who is constantly engaged in struggle and ascetic endeavor. If, however, you are not such, then it is clear that you do not stand on the monastic path, even though you are falsely, pretentiously, and hypocritically called by that name. However, I know of you that you sincerely submit to the monastic rule, skillfully walk its path, and live an angelic life, having the right hand of God supporting you, the comfort of the Holy Spirit strengthening you, and the holy angels and all the God-blessed martyrs and saints helping you.

5. “Ascend the mountain of God and into His holy house,” as the most eloquent Prophet Isaiah says (Ps. 2:3). Let no one fall behind, let no one sit idly by; help one another, abide in strong love for one another, encourage one another, compete with one another, and imitate one another. – Let there be among you neither indecent laughter, nor distracting and indulgent entertainment, nor long, idle conversations; and let discord and disobedience not even be mentioned among you. It is desirable that you speak with dignity and honesty, show a warm disposition toward one another, and address one another gently and cordially. “Test everything; hold fast to what is good; abstain from every form of evil” (1 Thess. 5:21–22). May the Lord of peace grant strength and fortitude to your souls, and may He Himself shepherd you and “lead you by the still waters” (Ps. 22: 2), bringing you back to the path of righteousness, protecting you from the wiles of the malicious serpent, cheering you up, delighting you, comforting you, and making you worthy of His heavenly kingdom.

11. The enemy stirs up passions; but resist him, and you will overcome; the Lord is your helper

11. 1) The enemy stirs up passions; but resist him, and you will overcome; the Lord is your helper. – 2) Perform your duties, both in your work and in worship, blamelessly; do not neglect them. – 3) Let us labor and prepare ourselves, so that we may not encounter terrors at the hour of death and afterward—but may see only joy. [1, 12]

6. Come, let us all embrace with renewed readiness and zeal the desire to serve God and please Him again and again. And let nothing hinder us from this or hold us back; but let us renounce the world more completely, conquer the flesh, withdraw from kinship, despise pleasures, choose labor, and perform all other acts of virtue—and continue to do so—so that, having proven blameless in our calling, we may inherit the kingdom of heaven. The dreadful serpent, the all-malicious devil, creeps about relentlessly, desiring our ruin; he sneaks in secretly, enters our hearts, and sows the seeds of evil in each of us: in some, the sweetness of sin, so that for this pleasure and momentary delight he may deprive them of the taste of eternal blessings and cast them into the unquenchable fire; into some, a passion of envy equal to murder, caused by a brother's good reputation, which (envy) clouds his mind and, like one walking in the darkness of night, prevents him from seeing the glory of God, so as to reveal in him a new, ruinous Cain; who is led astray by gluttony, so that, by conquering him with carnal pleasures, he may be drawn away from God; upon whom despondency is cast; in whom he breeds aversion to his vocation, or to his fellow monks, or to the monastery; whom he compels to find psalm-singing, reading, and solitude burdensome—while against another he stirs up an unimaginable whirlwind of passionate thoughts and impulses, to lead him astray from the right path and destroy him. But “Be strong, and let your heart take courage” (Ps. 30: 25): for we place our hope in the Lord, who has crushed the power of death and “given us authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy” (Luke 10: 19). We see an example of this in St. Anthony the Great, who so crushed and destroyed the enemy's power that the enemy could not even bear the shadow of his holiness. Indeed, all the God-bearing Fathers conquered him, and all who, in this present age, work wholeheartedly for God, conquer him.

7. I see that you are working diligently, offering your labors as a sacrifice to God. But may your labors be blameless in every respect and worthy of reward. – How so? – Work quietly and silently; let no untimely words come from your lips; avoid boasting; abhor insolence; clothe yourselves in humility; discipline yourselves in every act of obedience. Take care not to bring death upon yourselves through any sin, and do not draw near to one another during the time of passion; do not dare to be alone together, for there is the fire of sin; do not touch any of your limbs, whatever they may be, especially one in particular, for there is wrath, fire, and death. Pay attention to the reading; sing the psalms with vigor; do not doze off while standing before God, and you will receive a gift from Him, for He always bestows gifts upon those who are alert. It is a pitiable sight when, in the presence of the King, some depart having received gifts, while others are sent away empty-handed. Although both groups were engaged in the same work, some labored lazily and sleepily, while others worked sincerely and with all their zeal; thus their fates turned out to be so different.

8. Hurry, strive, run, and reach the goal, lest the door be shut to us, lest the time of our life be cut short, lest we descend into the grave unprepared, lest we be separated from our union with the body as sinners, lest at the hour of the soul's departure we gaze upon the holy angels without boldness, lest that Ethiopian, as tall as the heavens, who was shown to Anthony the Great, seize us for our sins; lest we be swallowed up by chaos, the underworld, Tartarus, the ceaseless roaring fire, or other places of torment where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. But may we find there a peaceful and blissful long life; may we cling to Christ, our Lord and God, and behold that immeasurable beauty, that inaccessible glory of His face, dancing in a circle with the Holy Angels and all the saints, rejoicing there, where "sickness, sorrow, and sighing have fled" (Isa. 35: 10).

12. Let us depart from here... that is, from the realm of the passions, through abstinence of the belly, the eyes, the tongue, the ears, the hands, and the feet

12. 1) Let us depart from here... that is, from the realm of the passions, through abstinence of the belly, the eyes, the tongue, the ears, the hands, and the feet. – 2) Instructions for the steward, the foreman, the cellarer, the vegetable gardener and the gardener, the stablemaster, and the miller. [1, 13]

9. I declare to you, just as the Lord once said to His disciples: "Rise up; let us go from here" (John 14:31). I say this not in the sense of tearing ourselves away from the body before God—who has bound us to it to test our virtue—calls us, but so that, even while in the body, we may meditate on what is above the body and, as the Divine Paul wrote of himself (Gal. 6:14), —to crucify ourselves to the world; for, as he himself declared, "Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires" (Gal. 5: 24). Therefore, bear all that is difficult and sorrowful with courage, and be temperate in all things. For if our forefather had been obedient in this regard to the divine commandment, he would not have tasted death instead of life through intemperance. Fast, then, and do not partake of the bitter tree of sin—if possible, not even in thought—but guard yourselves against it in every way through your actions. Do not cast lustful glances with greedy eyes, nor allow yourselves to be ensnared by temptation. Close your ears to foolish talk and useless chatter. Train your lips to speak only what is pleasing to God, and do not be idle talkers. Let your hands, feet, and all your members be protected from all that is passionate.

10. You, who have been entrusted with the task of "stewardship," strive to walk blamelessly and without fault among your brothers, managing all things with humble wisdom. You, who have been entrusted with overseeing "the fieldwork," attend to this task with the wisdom and steadfastness characteristic of you, faithfully carrying out all that is proper to it and keeping everything in order. Be patient and compassionate toward those who are weary, especially the novices. "Let your speech always be seasoned with salt, so that you may know how to give grace to those who hear" (Col. 4:6; Eph. 4:29). Be honorable, eloquent, comforting, instructive, virtuous, and a guide in your work. You are the steward (apparently the chamberlain or disburser); trust in God and "be strengthened with power according to His might" (Eph. 1:19). Take the lead in caring for the brethren. By providing for them, you provide for God: for you are not feeding people, but—if you will—the Apostles of God. Prepare and give them food and drink—the best of what you have; but let there be no seasonings, no sweets, and nothing with which those who live for their bellies fill it. This is not fitting for the godly. But vegetables, bread, and water—these are all that is prescribed for them. In this, our Fathers found great comfort. And you, my child, "good cook," take care of the brotherhood by preparing food for them as a comfort, so that you may shine in the kingdom of heaven like the sun. You—"gardeners and orchard keepers"—work, and strive to satisfy the brothers by providing them with all kinds of vegetables; and by pleasing them, you will please God and be deemed worthy to enjoy eternal rest. You who “serve in the storeroom,” devote your strength to your work with all diligence and good will, even to the point of shedding blood, and treat the head steward well, for you depend on him. You who manage the affairs of the “stable yard,” you perform a service pleasing to God and to us, and you serve the brotherhood twice as much as others; therefore, you will be adorned with two crowns. Each of you who cares more for others, works for them, and labors on their behalf will undoubtedly receive a greater reward. Come to me, too, you who are assigned to the “mills”; and I tell you, you must take great care in your work; but do not allow anything superfluous beyond what is prescribed, whether in food, drink, or anything else. As for having to miss the rule, psalm singing, and other services—though we do not wish for this to be the case—we have no choice but to proceed this way due to extreme necessity. However, do not lose heart; we will make up for what you lack in this regard, even though we ourselves are sinners. Just be vigilant and mindful of yourselves, fear God, and avoid worldly conversations.

13. Rising; Matins; the First Hour; Work

13. 1) Rising; Matins; the first hour; work. – 2) Topics of conversation; competition; aversion to rest; warmth toward God and endurance in labor. – 3) Let us be patient, as the Lord is... and we shall receive His mercy. – 4) Pursuing self-serving interests and a lack of love for one’s brothers. – 5) One who is content with the abbot’s directives is honorable; one should not criticize these directives; may the Lord set the disorderly in order. [1, 14]

11. Let us live according to the rules and order established for us, compelling ourselves to be diligent in everything, both great and small. As soon as the bell rings, hasten cheerfully to gather in the church, as if summoned by an angel, to converse with God and serve Him through song, and in return to receive not that which is fleeting or temporary, but life-giving gifts from God. Upon entering the church, raise your voices in unison to praise the Lord God, and then listen attentively to the psalm singing and follow the readings with alertness, so that, enlightened by both, you may remain fruitfully in joy during the Divine Service and put the devil to shame. But at the same time, do not forget to pray inwardly with a sober mind, so that, having been seen as pure and even more enlightened, rather than darkened, you may leave the church. The service has ended; depart quietly and peacefully from the house of prayer. Then, each of you should turn to your studies, taking care not to squander the treasure gathered from the psalm singing through idle talk, but rather to add to that good what you will now learn. Another, if he wishes and has a need, may rest by lying down on his bed; but even then, having made the sign of the cross and lying down properly, let him mentally recite some psalm with reflection, so as not to fall into temptation from the enemy, the tempter. For the demons love to disturb our souls with evil impulses after the Divine Liturgy, to take revenge for the defeat inflicted upon them by our attentive and reverent presence in the church, and to cause us to squander what we have so well gathered from the church hymns and readings. To this end, they darken our thoughts, make the body unruly—due to its weariness from psalm-singing—and give rise to unseemly emotions and fantasies. But, of course, the one who refrains from sleep and engages either in deep reflection on the psalms or in some other activity—rather than rushing immediately to bed, unless sleep irresistibly draws him there—acts better; for in such a case, he remains free from temptation. Having spent this time in this way, we must all be prompt and keep up with one another, hastening to the first hour of the day: for why should we forfeit our reward and burden our conscience? After this, praying to God, “May the work of our hands be established” (Ps. 89:17), and may the whole day be spent in good works, set about your tasks as assigned—whether each person individually to their own, or all together to one task, when the need arises. Let your labor and work be accompanied by psalm-singing, prayer, and good thoughts, whether it be work in the field, in the vineyard, in the kitchen, or any other task performed according to the usual order at set times;—and let all this be carried out conscientiously with psalm-singing.

12. Let your speech always be about fitting subjects, whether it concerns bodily life or spiritual life—such as a troparion or some other activity. – Compete with one another in doing good. Each of you has your own good qualities, but what one lacks, another possesses: let him borrow it from the other, like a good bee diligently gathering honey from the flowers. – Let a love of ease be far from us, and let sloth be banished. – Let us be warm toward God and steadfast in our spiritual struggles; and let nothing stand as a barrier between us and our love for God: neither fasting, nor vigil, nor cold, nor heat, nor reproach, nor lack of necessities; but, regarding all else as secondary, let us give preference to our salvation above all else.

13. Let us bear all things cheerfully, remembering what terrible sufferings the Lord endured—for our sake. – What comparison can there be between a servant and his Master? – Indeed, whatever we may suffer is nothing. But the Lord, in His goodness, accepts even our small acts of goodwill; He is near to those who endure for His sake, as it is written (Ps. 144:18), and He is found by those who seek Him; if He opens the heavens to us—if we persevere, He will accept us and lead us into His heavenly joy and into the unmade-by-hands bridal chamber of the Kingdom of Heaven.

14. I cry out to you, calling heaven, earth, and the Holy Angels to witness: do not neglect your salvation; do not despise even a single commandment; do not walk in the darkness of unrevealed thoughts; avoid secret feasting, do not indulge in delicacies, do not pierce your souls with swords—that is, do not kindle in them the fire of insolence, even toward your own members, remembering that they belong to Christ and are therefore honorable, do not slander or become inflamed with anger toward one another; do not harbor envy within yourselves; do not repay evil with evil; do not seek leadership; do not covet clerical ranks prematurely, nor take delight in them in your thoughts; but by willingly revealing everything (to your spiritual fathers), be healed thereby, remain in good health through this, and be obedient in all things from the heart. This is the priesthood, the sacred ministry, and the worship of God!

15. He who, with a pure heart, reveals everything about himself before my humility, who holds a humble view of himself, who considers himself the lowest of all living creatures, and who seeks nothing higher than what he has received from my humility—behold, in my opinion, a noble and honorable person! But to scrutinize my decisions and discuss them in your own way, or to speculate on why I granted one person such a task and another a different one—why I admitted one to the clergy and assigned another to a different post—is neither beneficial to you nor proper. – May our Lord and God, who separates the worthy from the unworthy and “lifts the poor out of the dunghill” (Ps. 112: 7), who grants grace and understanding to the humble and girdles the feeble with strength (Ps. 17: 33), may He set you aright, calm you, accept you into His fold, grant you a good life, and strengthen you in all things for the perfect work, for the fulfillment of the commandments, for pleasing God, and for imitating the angels so that you may inherit the kingdom of heaven.

14. Turn to God, and regard nothing else as important

14. 1) Strive toward God, and regard nothing else as important. – 2) Whoever labors diligently in the monastery walks well toward the heavenly city to partake of its blessings. – 3) Your outward appearance is good; but see to it that there are no Judas, Hyesius, or the like among you in your inner order. – 4) Do not say, “I will do this or that, and I will achieve such-and-such”; but work, entrusting all that follows to the Lord. [1:16]

16. Come, my children, listen to me; pay attention to my words and take my humble teachings to heart! I cry out to all; I proclaim to everyone: Lift yourselves up to God; renounce your passions. Thus the prophetic word cries out to you: “Come, let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob” (Isa. 2:3)—to the house of dispassion—and let us behold with our spiritual eyes the joy prepared for us, the promises of heavenly blessings. Take up zeal, spread your fiery wings like doves and fly, and soar from here to where virtue reigns; embrace joy and the spiritual love of God’s desire; taste His sweetest love, and in it regard all else as secondary—cast aside vain glory, carnal lust, and savage anger; and nothing that seems comforting here will be able to captivate you; but, as those who are well-girded, we will be light, sharp-sighted, and swift as we journey along the path leading to the kingdom of heaven.

17. It is inevitable for travelers to endure hardship and suffering, and so it is with us. For, as you see, our work demands toil, effort, and weariness: you labor, you grow weary, you sweat, you endure hunger and thirst—some in the fields, some in the vineyard, some at the olive presses, some in the kitchen, some on construction sites, some in the cellar, and simply everyone at the task to which they are assigned. All these are walking in the way of God, drawing near to the great city, and through death will be led into the joy of partaking of the blessings reserved for those who love God.

18. In this: when we clearly see those who walk in righteousness, we are comforted; but when we see those who act disorderly, we are indignant and grieve, and we correct them as much as possible; but what is hidden in your hearts is known only to you and to God. – But let there be no one among you who secretly, as if in darkness, does anything unseemly; for nothing escapes the all-seeing eye, even though it may escape ours. I always think the best of you. But who knows—is there not among you, among the Twelve, a Judas? Is there not, alongside the good teacher Giezius, a wicked one who carries eternal leprosy in his soul? Might there not be among you yourselves those like the sons of the priest Elijah, who secretly eat and provoke God to anger, whose most pitiful end will be a calamity for me as well, even more so than for the sinful Elijah?—May we not suffer anything either—have mercy, O Lord! – Anything like Ananias and Sapphira, who, having dared to lie to the Apostles, suffered a bitter downfall: for it may well be that among you, too, there are those who, harboring falsehood in their hearts, do not speak the truth when answering a question or in casual conversation. I also fear the downfall of Simon the sorcerer, who, for the sake of human honor and glory, sought to associate with St. Peter, the chief of the Apostles, even though outwardly he pretended to be his disciple. Let none of you look back, and let none of you fall away from your original purpose!

19. Let no one say, “I will do this or that, and by such-and-such a time I will have achieved this or that.” You who say this, yet do not know whether you will live through this very day—do you not think you might hear: “Fool! This very night your soul will be taken from you, and the things you have prepared will belong to whom?” (Luke 12:20). Let us imitate the unbreakable unity of the Apostles with their Teacher and the God of all, and, as we are always in the sight of the Lord, let us hasten our journey toward our salvation, entrusting all that follows into God’s hands, willingly enduring a little suffering here and sorrow, so that we may rejoice eternally. God calls us to this; the Holy Spirit assists us in this; and the Lord Jesus Christ strengthens us in this. Do not be afraid! The devil has been cast down; Christ is risen, and death no longer reigns.

15. You have fled from the world; but you have not fled from the turmoil of the passions stirred up by your enemies: you must be vigilant and resist

15. 1) You have fled from the world; but you have not fled from the stirrings of the passions, stirred up by your enemies: you must be vigilant and resist. – 2) Examples of those who, through faith, performed miracles of obedience: Dosipheus, Ananias, Zacharias, and others. – 3) Walk in the way of the commandments, bear obedience without complaint, and you will be saved. [1, 17]

20. Although we have fled from all worldly things and, as if entering a harbor, have taken on our sacred monastic habit, we still remain in this world as if at sea, not knowing when a stormy, devilish wind will rise against us, attempting to plunge the vessel of our soul into the depths, —where and how we will encounter the pirates of the mind—what hidden reefs of passion we will run aground on unnoticed, and how, throughout our entire lives, we will complete our voyage from earth to heaven without shipwreck. Therefore, my children, you must pay attention, be on guard, stay alert, and watch out, discerning the deceptions of the devil’s cunning, so that you do not find yourselves unprepared to resist the promptings of passion, repel its attacks, and continue your voyage safely, holding fast to the helm of our faith.

21. Those learning the ascetic life are enlightened by the good examples of the fathers—and through unshakable faith they are strengthened in their labors. – By faith, St. Dosipheus completed his course of obedience, without questioning, faithfully carrying out every command of his mentor and meekly enduring, at times, blows to the cheek and, at other times, ridicule. By faith, the blessed Abba Kir endured beatings, mockery, and persecution for fifteen years with courage and youthful resolve, as if he did not feel the weight of his troubles; and not only did he not complain, but he strongly defended and justified his attackers before the holy father when he questioned him. By faith, Theodore the Sanctified, for having entertained the thought of becoming primate, endured three years of excommunication from the Great Pachomius without resistance or complaint. By faith, he reaped the ripe fruit of obedience, having patiently and zealously tended his father’s staff for three years. By faith, Akakios, the ever-living, sometimes had bruises under his eyes, sometimes marks of blows on his cheeks, and sometimes one limb or another injured; he humbly endured it all without complaint, and for this he was deemed worthy of immortality. By faith, the ever-memorable Zacharias, though filled with the Divine Spirit, cheerfully endured his wounds, yet never strayed from his father. By faith, a certain marvelous man crossed a river carried by a crocodile. And each of the venerable fathers and perfect men, armed with the weapon of faith, passed through the fire and water of the devil’s temptations and entered the realm of eternal rest.

22. If you wish to be saved, there is no obstacle or barrier to it. You have before your eyes the true examples of those who have been saved and are being saved. Do not look to me, but listen to my words: for though I am a sinner, I speak the truth to you and show you the straight path. Strive, then, my children, having set aside disobedience and cast aside unbelief. Walk with reverence along the path of the Lord’s commandments. “Seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you” (Matt. 7:7). I know this to be true, and I am fully convinced of it. Bear your duties without complaint. Work diligently at what has been commanded of you without laziness. Do not be disobedient, quick to contradict or seek revenge, or reckless in bringing ruin and destruction upon your souls. Do not seek glory, and you will find it not only in the age to come, but also here and now, in a most brilliant way. Do not quarrel among yourselves, and do not provoke one another with sharp and insulting words over the assignment of duties—some more honorable, others less so—and you will be recognized as the first and will receive the foremost place in the eternal divine abodes. But if we act contrary to this, we will find the opposite—and wrath, anger, and disgrace (Rom. 2:8–9) will come upon every soul that does evil, both now and in the future. May this not befall you!

16. Seeing your progress, I rejoice; but fearing that you might stop, I beg you, do not hinder the flow, turning away from all that is unbecoming and zealously pursuing all that is proper

16. 1) Seeing your progress, I rejoice; but fearing that you might come to a standstill, I beg you: do not hinder the flow, turning away from all that is unbecoming and zealously pursuing all that is proper. – 2) Seeing death before us, let us set our hearts aright; it is difficult for us to undertake great physical feats; but if we preserve a good disposition in our hearts, then even with moderate self-restraint in all things, according to the rule and guidance, we will not fall behind the great men. – 3) The communal brotherhood is wondrous both in its composition and in its miracles: for every victory over passion is the expulsion of a demon. [1, 18]

23. My humble soul yearns and is consumed with a fervent desire for your salvation, as you walk the true path and press forward each day toward progress. Seeing your renunciation of all things and your selfless withdrawal from the world, your irrevocable estrangement from your own people, the dissipation of all your possessions, and the crucifixion of your very will—and the fact that you all, with one voice and one mind, strive toward the same goal—I take comfort in this. But I am also overcome by fear that one of you might in some way be deprived of the blessings you hope for. Therefore, I ask and implore you: do not halt your progress, but strive ever more zealously to do good for your own edification and the edification of your neighbor, presenting yourselves every day before God and the brotherhood as blameless and without fault, and yielding neither to envious zeal, nor to destructive grumbling, nor to godless pride, nor to slavish partiality, but acting obediently, quietly, and peacefully, —without vanity or ambition, wisely and conscientiously, for the sake of goodness itself, for the sake of our holy community, for the sake of God’s commandment and our abbot’s command, and, in short, for the sake of our own salvation, seeking day by day that one thing pleasing to God and striving for it alone, until the end of this present life comes.

24. The final hour has not yet come, but it is fast approaching, and for some it is already at the door. Why, as if standing right before our eyes and at our feet, does it terrify us, humble us, purify us, and turn us away from guilt for any evil or any straying from the right path, teaching us to live in community, in reverence, serenity, and harmonious unity of mind, as well as in the study of the divine Scriptures, in pure prayer, and in labor according to our ability. And fasting is a tool for the spiritual life, though it is bodily in nature—provided, that is, that it is guided by holy humility. It is beyond our power—and indeed unwise—to attempt the great feats of the holy fathers. But let us observe what has been said above (i.e., remembrance of the Lord’s Supper, reverence, serenity, unity of mind, instruction in Scripture, pure prayer, labor, and fasting to the best of our ability), and in our subordinate state choose what is fitting for us, strictly adhering to the communal rules as prescribed by law—in food and drink, —partaking not only of bread and vegetables, but also of wine and oil, and occasionally of fish and cheese, with proper moderation, not according to our own judgment: for that is inappropriate, but as we have established—and acting wisely and sensibly in all other matters, – whether we sleep, rest, walk, sit, gather together and converse, or celebrate—as well as when we plant, sow, build, or do carpentry—we will conduct ourselves in this way, and I assure you, we will in no way fall short of the greatness of those fathers.

25. One of the great spectacles and wonders is our gathering and union, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, of men from different countries and lineages, of different ages and ways of life, into a single body—harmonious and directed toward united action and united service—so that, though many in spirit, with many hearts and many minds, remains of one mind and one heart—not for any evil purpose, but to please God and to work for the glory of the Most Holy Trinity. Thus, our assembly (brotherhood) is in and of itself great and honorable, on a par with great miracles; but miracles are also actually performed within it, if we live as we ought. For are not demons cast out here as well?—They are cast out, and not on this or that day, but every day and even every hour—they are cast out and scorched. Each of us, by overcoming a passion, scorches and casts out the demon of that passion: he who overcomes fornication casts out the demon of fornication; he who overcomes sloth casts out the demon of sloth; he who overcomes anger and rancor casts out the demon of anger and rancor; he who overcomes judgmentalism and grumbling casts out the demon of judgmentalism and grumbling. So it is with the overcoming of other passions. Are you not, then, miracle-workers, if you so desire?—And the Lord accepts your way of life as the feats of the desert fathers and the pillar-standers who performed such wondrous miracles.

17. Why did you leave the world? To be purified; and blessed is the one who lives in the spirit of this life, especially in faith in the abbot

17. 1) Why did you leave the world? To be purified; and blessed is the one who lives in the spirit of this life, especially in steadfast faith. – 2) People come to our monastery to be saved: set before them, then, an example of the monastic life and monastic discipline. [1, 19]

26. Let us be mindful of ourselves, remain sober, stay alert, and lift up our thoughts to God. Let us frequently recall to ourselves that ever-memorable exhortation of the Great Arsenius: “Arsenius, why did you come here?” For we, too, have left the world. – Why, then? – Not for the repose of the flesh, not to indulge in pleasures, nor merely to learn to read and write or calligraphy, or to acquire knowledge, or to become good readers; nor to indulge in self-serving activities, to seek glory, to boast, to exalt ourselves above others, or to be domineering, – not for any of these things or anything like them; but for what? – To be cleansed of sins, to clothe oneself in the fear of God, to humble oneself even unto death, a death of the cross, that is, to the point of renouncing one’s own desires and putting to death the lusts of the flesh, to wage war against one’s adversary, the devil, and to fight “against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world” (Eph. 6:12), so as not to succumb to the manifold temptations of the flesh, and finally, to acquire strong faith in the intercession of your spiritual father, the abbot, by which we may truly quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one (Eph. 6:16). Now tell me, how are things with you?—examine, consider, and investigate. And blessed is the one among you and within you who keeps the commandments, who has not surrendered himself as prey to the merchants of sin, who is precise in obedience, who is enlightened by perfect confession, who is illuminated by God-given humility and by golden, Christ-like obedience, and who, as if clothed in a purple mantle, is wrapped in unshakable faith in his spiritual father, the abbot, not wavering in the tasks he has assigned, not prejudging anything before his decisions, and not regarding anything on earth as more salvific for himself than what the abbot regards as such for him. I should note that I do not mean myself here, but those who strictly observe God’s commandments.

27. Souls come to us, truly sent by God, to be saved in our monastery. That is why our observance of the commandments must be the most complete and strict. They have come to be enlightened, not to be darkened. Shine, then, my brothers, even though I am dark; season yourselves with grace-filled virtues, even though I am filled with corruption. – In what should your praise consist? In yielding to your brother in speech, in never contradicting him, in not grumbling about anything, in being lambs without malice, not prickly, but meek before our Chief Shepherd, Christ; to avoid indecent laughter and shameful conversations; to be watchful in psalm-singing and sober in prayer. Strive, then, my children, more and more to purify yourselves, to live in chastity, to perfect yourselves and be sanctified, to become like gods—though this word may seem bold—as the Savior promised through the Psalmist, saying: “You are gods, and sons of the Most High” (Ps. 81: 6; John 10: 34).

18. Community life is most praiseworthy; and blessed is the one who lives in the Spirit

18. 1) Community life is most praiseworthy; and blessed is the one who lives in its spirit. – 2) One must strive ever more to excel, not wasting one’s days in vain. – 3) Glory to the fathers! They, heeding the word of truth, lived exemplary monastic lives: imitate them. [1:20]

28. I urge you earnestly—do not be negligent in striving for the salvation of your noble souls. For I do not think there is anything else that could be more beneficial to you than a reminder of our virtuous way of life. And do not be bored that I speak of the same thing over and over again. “What else, then, should we discuss? Have we changed the way of life we have begun, so that we might turn to another subject in our conversation? No; we must not cease to say the same thing over and over again, and to speak of the same thing time and again; and we will never cease to praise what is good and rebuke what is evil—proclaiming how good and blessed is complete withdrawal from the world and the harmonious fellowship of the brethren; and affirming that there truly is a “world” that “descends upon the beard, the beard of Aaron” (Ps. 132: 2), if anyone, having entered this community, has clothed himself in humility, wrapped himself in obedience, and sought to cut off his own will, has embraced the depths of love for God, rises in spirit from strength to strength, loves all things and patiently fulfills all that is required by the community’s rule, without deceit in anything, and without harboring suspicious thoughts or designs that separate the humble novice from God and the abbot. Let us, then, brothers, lovingly embrace all that exists and occurs in the community as holy and salvific, even if some things seem unpleasant: for through this our rough edges are smoothed away, and we are rounded out so that we may roll more easily toward our goal.

29. Strive to be of benefit to one another and do not seek your own interests, but rather what is beneficial to the community in every way; and as you grow ever stronger and more refined in your souls, keep yourselves in unceasing obedience, renewing yourselves daily and, as the days, months, and years pass, progressing ever toward the better and better, while there is still time to prosper and grow rich. Do not be lazy; do not give in to sleep and carelessness; and do not waste the days of this life in vain. When the time of reckoning comes, we will clearly see the fruits of our labors and the barrenness of our negligence; we will see that, by paying attention to ourselves and our work, we have borne fruit, and that, by neglecting this, we have ruined ourselves.

30. Glory to the blessed souls of our holy and venerable fathers, truly wise and discerning! They did not listen to the word of truth in vain; they did not cast it aside, nor did they trample it underfoot: but they labored sincerely with the sweat of their brow, humbled themselves, subdued their own will, loved to be last, loved simplicity in all things and poverty, and shunned conflict, and bore everything cheerfully with patience; they willingly submitted to their fathers’ commands; they burned with faith; they loved silence; they bore the infirmities of the weak, ready even to shed their own blood for them, like martyrs. And what more is there to say? You yourselves know your predecessors and leaders; imitate them, follow in their footsteps, and may you be deemed worthy to share in their glory.

19. Let each one excel more and more in his or her own virtue: the obedient in obedience; the humble in humility; the diligent in labor

19. 1) Let each one excel more and more in his own virtue: the obedient in obedience; the humble in humility; the diligent in labor. – 2) Whatever duty of obedience you are assigned, be diligent in it. – 3) If you act in this way, the Lord will comfort you both here and in the age to come. [1, 21]

31. Continue as you began, and not only do not cease from doing good deeds, but practice them more and more; let your spirit burn ever more brightly, and hasten toward the heights of the heavenly life. “Obeying One,” be ever more obedient, so that you may reap the fruit of obedience, submitting not only to those in authority but also to ordinary people, without fuss or resistance, whatever they may command. “Humble One,” humble yourself more and more, yielding in all things and agreeing with everything, in a humble view of yourself, with a plain outward appearance, a gentle voice, and few words, not dwelling on the thought that perhaps you were once of noble birth, or that you have long dwelt in the monastic habit, or that you hold some high rank and carry out many assignments, —I will add to this—without raising your eyes or adopting a stern gaze or a certain air of superiority simply because you are intelligent, stately, have a pleasant manner of speech, are capable of anything, or possess some other praiseworthy quality. “Diligent” and zealous in fulfilling the obedience entrusted to him, working as if for the Lord and not for men, he increasingly proves himself to be a worker without shame, taking on the most difficult tasks and rejoicing in exhausting himself for the sake of his neighbor, convinced that through this a great reward is being stored up for him in heaven.

32. Let us all—whether cellarer, hospital attendant, calligrapher, vineyard keeper, gardener, shoemaker, cook, steward, teacher, watchman, wake-up caller, rule-keeper, candle-lighter, baker, carpenter, or anyone assigned to any task, whether great or small—let us, in an unceasing flow toward the future, with an unquenchable longing for eternal blessings, courageously carry out our labors, endure all things willingly, do everything pleasing to God, bring benefit to ourselves, and sacrifice ourselves for one another to such an extent that each one would be ready to lay down even his own soul for his brother.

33. If you act in this way, the Only-Begotten Son of God will comfort you—He who, for the sake of obedience to God the Father, humbled Himself to the utmost degree of humility, so that He became a servant, though He is the Lord of all, and tasted death—the death of the cross— —there will be joy and inexpressible gladness both for me, a sinner, and for you, the keepers of the commandments, not only here, where you are glorified by all who see your deeds, your struggles against the enemy and your repelling of his attacks and stratagems, but also in the age to come, when you will rejoice in the presence of the glory of Christ God together with the angelic choirs, there where “the dwelling place of all who rejoice.”

20. I rejoice in your successes... in some, humility; in others,

1) I rejoice in your successes... in some, humility; in others... (lists monastic virtues). – 2) In the same vein—pushing the thought further and further away: “We still have a long life ahead of us... we’ll have time.” – 3) Do not boast of either natural gifts or acquired possessions, for God will give more; on the contrary, there will be loss. [1, 22]

1. A farmer rejoices in a fruitful field; but abbots are even more delighted by the spiritual fruitfulness of the souls entrusted to their care. You, too, bring me joy, my children, my planting, and God’s harvest (1 Cor. 3:6). I rejoice when I see your diligence, zeal, and eagerness for all that is necessary for salvation. I am gladdened by those who show meekness, tireless diligence, modesty and reverence, the repulsion and overcoming of the enemy’s temptations, uncomplaining obedience in fulfilling the duties entrusted to them, peacefulness and quietness of spirit, simplicity of character, in whom there is faith in my humility rather than in my dignity, in whom there is dispassion and a non-peace-loving disposition—I rejoice in all of you for your spiritual progress and perfection and your loving unity as one body, brought about by God’s guidance from above and by the prayer of my Father and yours. I rejoice in this, and I marvel, for this is truly worthy of all wonder.

2. I fear that, because of my inattention and my deep sorrow over my sins, the Lord might withdraw His providential right hand extended over us—and that something might enter among us that is not only unfit to speak of but even to think of: the sloth and disruption of any soul, or even a fall, whether hidden or obvious. Take heed, then, to yourselves; do not stray from the course you have set, but, remaining steadfast, be transformed from glory to glory and from holiness to holiness. Be steadfast, and do not stray from the circle of deeds you promised before God and the Angels, and before my humility; but rather, add labor to labor. Take care that the thought of a long life does not unsettle you, and that it does not weaken the firmness of your resolve to live in self-denial and self-discipline. This thought is false: for what is our life? A dream and a shadow. This thought is false, yet deceptive: for instead of adding humility to humility and obedience to obedience, it leads one to grant oneself one concession after another, which often leads to the complete disruption of a God-pleasing life.

3. Be on your guard, lest what appears to you as perfection become a thorn of sin, —neither your ability to learn quickly, nor your knowledge, nor some experience in the spiritual life, nor occasional good conscience, nor diligence, nor skill in handicrafts, nor harmonious singing, nor a pleasant voice, nor dignity, nor anything else of this sort. All these are gifts from God, which should serve to increase your fear and humility before God, the Giver. By adopting this attitude, we will make Him even more merciful toward us and even more generous—and we will be enriched with every good thing and become a holy temple to God, adorned with gift upon gift. If, on the other hand, we lift up our heads before God and become proud before our brothers—raising our eyebrows, shrugging our shoulders, adopting a haughty gait, and questioning why this or that is done, why it is done this way and not another, or why I have not been entrusted with overseeing such-and-such a task, and why that person is in charge of such-and-such a task, or that the very same task is completely unnecessary, with labor and time merely wasted on it—if we act this way, we will turn a time of fruitfulness into a time of barrenness, a time of profit into a time of loss, a time of good work into harmful inaction and wickedness—and instead of ascending the mountain of virtue, we will descend deeper and deeper into the abyss of sin.

21. Be good—and do not let the enemy into your heart, lest he cry out: “Everyone has become evil.”

21. Be good—and do not let the enemy into your heart, lest he cry out: “Everyone has become evil.” [1, 28] Keep the path of the commandments pure before the eyes of your soul, humbly recognizing and correcting every stumbling block—whether it be some form of disobedience worthy of condemnation or a contradiction that brings shame; walk in the right path, and you will find peace for your souls. Our enemy uses every pretext to force his way into our brotherhood and stir it up. Do not accept him; shield yourselves with the shield of faith and repel him with the sword of God’s Word—and this destroyer will never find a place within you nor boast that he has led you into a fall. Show yourselves to be a contingent of God's army, impregnable to him, and let him, instead of boasting, complain as St. Macarius once did: "All the wicked have turned against me." You have Christ the Lord as your commander, and the angels as your helpers and protectors. "Do not let your feet be shaken—for He who keeps Israel will neither slumber nor sleep" (Ps. 120:3).

22. Everything comes from God; nevertheless, our own effort is also required to persevere and press forward

22. 1) Everything comes from God; yet our own effort is also required to preserve and press forward. – 2) Thus far the Lord has preserved you well—and you have prospered; continue in the same way—in prayer, silence, and so on. – 3) Endure hardship and sorrow; all of life is but a single day, yet through it one may attain eternal bliss. [1, 24]

4. Give thanks to the Lord for all our successes; for from His bountiful goodness comes all that is good in people: "for from Him and through Him and to Him are all things" (Rom. 11:36). And if anyone were to presume to boast that he is something, he will hear the words of the Apostle: "What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?" (1 Cor. 4:7). – Nevertheless, all this requires effort, a strenuous course of action, and unceasing diligence coupled with humility, which affirms, safeguards, and focuses our mind in a godly, devout life, so that we may not stray from our good beginning, nor bring shame upon our previous labors through subsequent sloth, and not to turn back from a virtuous life to a wicked one, but by being transformed for the better, to be purified, enlightened, and to ascend the mountains day by day, becoming brighter than the bright, transforming from stars into suns, and clothing ourselves with the most valiant strength. Cast aside, I beg you, all carnal reasoning and the greatest obstacle to virtue—worldly glory—and with the spiritual sword cut off every passion and every lust of the flesh, clinging to God and ascending to Him along the spiritual ladder, daily laying the godly foundations and deepening the spiritual foundations, while casting aside carnal audacities by cutting off desires, quenching the flames of passion with the outpouring of tears, and driving away the tormenting cravings for food and drink—or any other vanity—through contemplation of future blessings.

5. Until now, through the prayers of my father and yours, the Lord has kept you safe; you have prospered, walking the royal path of virtue, adorned with the beauty of dispassion, and have seen that there is nothing so good and pleasing as to rid yourselves of passions and, rising above them, to reign royally over all things earthly and, as it were, to reign with God. Do not forget this, and do not grow complacent, having abandoned the way of life entrusted to you and which you have walked so well; rather, "enter his gates with thanksgiving and his courts with praise" (Ps. 99:4) more and more; be enriched by the fruits of your obedience and, in them, drink the wine of contrition that gladdens your holy hearts; do not cease from your other godly deeds; keep your lips silent; do not wound your brother's conscience with the pretense of a false and self-imposed abstinence from any food; do not put on a stern face; do not speak excessively or idly; do not prefer your own peace to the good of your neighbor; be of one mind, one heart, and one will in Christ Jesus our Lord, having Him as your head.

6. "Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might" (Eph. 6:10), and courageously endure all that is unpleasant, sorrowful, and difficult, keeping the mystery of our death before the eyes of your mind and regarding the entire duration of our life as brief. And according to St. Gregory the Theologian, the whole of life is but a single day for those who are earnestly engaged in their primary task of salvation. But on this day, in this fleeting time that passes like a dream, we can attain the Kingdom of Heaven, the kingdom of endless joy and gladness.

23. Resist the enemy who stirs up passions

23. 1) Resist the enemy who stirs up passions. – 2) Let the elders help the younger ones. – 3) How many times has it happened... that a passion arises, but resist it with prayer, and everything will subside. – 4) Do not lose heart: the Lord is near. [1:25]

7. Strive, my beloved children, strive, my lords and masters, strive against the devil's wiles, against his daily attacks directed at you, against the fire of lust, against the darkness of despondency, against the calamitous wandering from place to place, against the serpent of envy, against the unrestrained tendency toward untimely speech and mockery, against every passion that opposes and fights against you.

8. The first among the last, the strong among the weak, those who have been tempted among those who are tempted, those enriched with spiritual fruits among the poor in them, the successful among the beginners, the long-standing among the new—help them, extend a hand, instruct them with words, point out what is best, inspire them toward what is beneficial, so that we may all be saved.

9. Recall how many years of your spiritual struggle have passed, and how many and what kinds of temptations you have faced up to now! Let each one recall how many times he was overcome by temptation, grew weary, and lost heart; then suddenly found strength, good cheer, fortitude, a life-giving spirit, and inspiration—whether through a word of admonition or a brother's prayer; then again the struggle—and again strengthening by God's mighty power. So it will be in the days to come of your ascetic life, and even more so—"we will pass through fire and water and enter into the rest" of dispassion (Ps. 65:12).

10. Therefore, let no one lose heart, let no one lose courage! Let us help one another, comfort one another, and inspire one another to love, patience, and zeal for the fulfillment of God's commandments. And may our Lord Jesus Christ, our true God, the hope of the hopeless, the support of the falling, the healer of the sick, the ready companion of those who journey and the reliever of their toil—and, in short, the hope of all the ends of the earth and those far out at sea—may He prepare and smooth your path, and may He grant you success in every deed and movement, in your straight path toward perfect salvation and the attainment of the city of His dwelling.

24. Against the inflaming of the passions: the Word of God, guarding the senses—especially the eyes—and denying rest to the flesh: be on your guard; you fell after baptism; do not fall again after taking the vows of the schema

24. Against the inflaming of the passions: the Word of God, vigilance over the senses—especially the eyes—and denying the flesh its rest: be on your guard; you fell after baptism; do not fall again after taking the vows of the schema. [1, 27] The climate here is hot and scorching—not by natural fire, I mean, but by a certain invisible fire that burns the soul, which emanates from the embers of sin, ignited by the sparks of passion cast into our hearts by the enemy spirits. But you have, from the divine lips, the outpourings of the Spirit (the Word of God) flowing like a river, to extinguish it, and, like the three youths in the fiery furnace, to remain unburned and untouched by (this) fire. In this, you must guard your senses, especially your sight, through which—when used imprudently—our enemy most often casts the fire of passion into the soul. We must also guard ourselves against other temptations arising from the flesh, which are provoked by a lack of moderation in food, drink, sleep, and every other form of bodily rest. For just as comprehensive self-restraint gives rise to the strength to persevere in virtue, so does negligence in this regard give rise to every form of the tyranny of sin. Take heed, then, and do not return to this slavery, having been freed from it by entering your present calling with the appropriate vows, and do not bring upon your own heads a double torment—for falling after baptism and after taking the schema.

25. To those who conquer their passions—crowns; to those who yield to them—torments; if you are in the first group, well and good; if in the second, hasten to correct yourselves

25. 1) To those who conquer their passions—crowns; to those who succumb to them—torment; if you are in the first group, that is good; if in the second, hasten to correct yourselves. 2) Strive to keep the commandments; let no one be lazy, double-minded, or self-righteous. – 3) Let each one contribute his or her share through obedience; the Lord will accept it, no matter how small it may be. – 4) Do not stop in the face of difficulties; keep going, helping one another. 5) External and internal hardships are fleeting; be patient, and relief will come. – 6) Who has ever been crowned without toil? – But death is at hand, and toil will end; you will join the ranks of the saints. [1:28]

11. Behold the arena of competition! Behold the struggle!—He who fights vigorously, runs well, and keeps his mind detached from all that is sensual and passionate achieves true victory, is crowned with the wreath of immortal glory, is proclaimed a son of God, and becomes an heir to eternal blessings even while still here. But whoever is carried away by the delights of sin and casts himself into the devil's snares suffers true defeat, is covered with shame because of his sins, becomes a son of the devil, and an heir to the fire of Gehenna and various other eternal torments. Take a good look within yourselves, test your faith, and discern what and where your standing and your path are. And if you are on the right path and are walking the royal way, well and very well!—But if you have sinned along the way and fallen into the rapids of sin, hurry to return before this seventh age comes to an end and the eighth age begins, bringing with it judgment and retribution.

12. Strive to keep God's commandments; sow the seeds of virtue in your hearts, so that, in due time, you may reap the fruits of righteousness. Let no one be idle, lest he hear from the Source: "Go to the ant, you sluggard, or go to the industrious bee" (Prov. 6:6, 8). Let no one be deceitful or double-minded, having one thing in their heart and saying another, lest they be struck down by the terrible judgment of the psalmist David, who says: "The Lord will destroy all flattering lips and the tongue that speaks deceitfully" (Ps. 11:4). Let no one remain idle or be lazy, lest he fall under the condemnation of St. Paul, who says: "If anyone is unwilling to work, let him not eat" (2 Thess. 3:10). Let no one be overly wise, lest he experience what St. James warns against, saying: "The Lord opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble" (James 4:6).

13. Let us all walk cheerfully in the Lord and keep His commandments, each of us bringing into the fellowship of our life what is within our power and at our disposal—some as stewards, some in the ministry, some caring for the sick, some in singing, some in reading, some in other ways—as if into our treasury (Mark 12, 43)—whatever is within their power and at their disposal: some through stewardship, some through ministry, some through caring for the sick, some through singing, some through reading, some through gardening, some through calligraphy—and in general, let no one be one who contributes nothing, nor let anyone appear before the Lord empty-handed. The Lord accepts not only great offerings but also the smallest ones; He even accepts the one who recites a verse in remembrance of death, if perhaps he is unable to do anything else, just as He accepted the widow's two mites. God determines the value of deeds, looking upon the will of the one who does them. Since we have a God who is good and most merciful, and who desires our salvation even more than we do ourselves, let us walk in His righteous ways, and we will find peace for our souls.

14. Let none of the chance difficulties on our Gospel path hinder anyone's progress; but even if the path is arduous and difficult, let us press on, let us be of good cheer, let us be courageous, and let us pass from hill to hill, from hillock to hillock, until we ascend the Lord's mountain and stand in His holy place of serenity. Those who walk together make the journey easier for one another. "Bear one another's burdens," as the Apostle says, "and so fulfill the law of Christ" (Gal. 6:2).

15. It is always the case that today there is timidity, and tomorrow courage; now a melancholy disposition, and suddenly inspiration; at this moment a rebellion of passions, and in the next, God's help and their suppression; You will not be the same tomorrow as you were yesterday, nor will you remain the same forever, my beloved; but God's grace will come to you, and the Lord will triumph through you. You will then say, "Where have You been until now, Lord?" And He will answer you, "I was watching you struggle, and I was waiting." Let us therefore be patient and show a little magnanimity; let us restrain ourselves and subdue our bodies, enslaving them and casting our passions far from us.

16. Who is crowned without having striven? Who finds rest without having suffered? Who reaps the fruits of life without having planted and nurtured virtues in his soul? Plant, graft, labor, and sweat, my children, workers of God, imitators of the angels, competitors with the incorporeal ones! Do you not see the end of these struggles? Do our brothers not die often? Do we not sing funeral hymns for the departed every single day? Why, then, do you torment yourself with grief—you who are faint of heart? Death will come to you as well. Not today—you will die tomorrow. With what immense joy will you depart from this world and ascend to heaven, to God, into the inaccessible light, into unspeakable joy, into inconceivable glory, into the dwellings of the angels, into the courts of the Lord, into the church of the firstborn, into the bosom of Abraham? And whom will you behold there? The Lord God, our Savior; the Mother of God, the Queen of the World; the incorporeal powers; the Cherubim and Seraphim; and all the ranks of the Holy Apostles, Prophets, Hierarchs, Martyrs, Venerable Ones, and all the Saints, whose number is beyond count. Does this not fill you with wonder, inspire you, and lift you above every toil, every sorrow, and every hardship?

26. Looking down upon the world from the heights of the monastic life, you see a sea of vanity surging; rejoice, then, that you have been delivered from this

26. 1) Looking down upon the world from the heights of the monastic life, you see a sea of vanity surging; rejoice, then, that you have been freed from this. – 2) Then, turning your gaze inward, you see the same things (parents, relatives, possessions, and so on), but in a divine and blissful light; so run well, that you may attain it. – 3) A list of the virtues that lead upward and the vices that lead downward. – 4) A lament over monastic shortcomings. [1, 29]

17. I will now begin my instruction to you with the Apostolic proclamation: “Rejoice in the Lord always” (Phil. 4:4). And how can you not rejoice and walk in joy when, by the foreknowing and predestined calling of God, who in all His wisdom ordains all things, you have been deemed worthy to be accepted into this Gospel way of life and now sit on a lofty vantage point of a high dwelling, you look down upon the insignificant and lowly vanities of human life, which are tossed about like the sea and carried hither and thither by the fickle movement of things. As you can see, there is nothing solid there; nothing remains in one position; kings change, princes fall, and the rulers of the earth, like all people, die; those who marry soon part ways, leaving and being left behind; beauty fades, youth flies by swiftly, pleasure soon passes, all possessions vanish like a shadow and a dream; weeping and beating one’s breast at parting with the dead, despondency and despair at separation from loved ones, unbearable torment when one fails in the pursuit of one’s desires—be it marriage, rank, wealth, or pleasures and delights—the anguish of envy and jealousy, of accidental humiliations and disgrace—and so on and so forth.

18. But to what are you called, and, having ascended the Lord’s mountain, what do you see?—This lies before you: instead of the earth, heaven; instead of parents, God, the true and supreme Father; instead of relatives, companions and brothers of like mind; instead of friends, incorporeal and godlike angels; instead of treasures—the wealth of virtues; instead of high offices—the ineffably great and endless kingdom of heaven; instead of the pleasures of fornication—sweet and insatiable dispassion; instead of all worldly satisfaction—inconceivable and ineffable blessings. Knowing this, fear the one living God; fortify yourselves spiritually; clothe yourselves in the armor and full equipment of the commandments; take up the spiritual sword, which is the word of God; and cast down the rulers of the darkness of this age and the spirits of wickedness, so that you may cry out with the divine Paul: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that Day” (2 Tim. 4:7).

19. “They ascend to the heavens and descend to the abyss,” sings St. David. Taking this spiritually, we learn the following lesson: whoever, little by little, corrects what is right in the proper way ascends to the highest degrees of virtue; but whoever gives in to negligence descends into the abyss of ruin. Now let us consider what lifts us up and what brings us down. The following lift us up: Christ-like obedience, humility united with God, detachment from self-exaltation, from all pretensions, from the love of primacy, from the desire to show off, from cunning, from schadenfreude, from ambition, from mockery and ridicule, from boasting and pride in anything from one’s past life (as happens when someone says: “I used to be such-and-such, I had this and that, I did such-and-such deeds.”—Oh, what a shame! What ought to be concealed, he uses to boast, having forgotten his God-like calling). I will add: composure, sociability with the brotherhood, readiness to apologize, bowing of the head and eyes, lowering the eyes and eyelids to the ground, modest posture of hands and feet, not worrying about what or how one is dressed, and above all—frank confession of every movement of the soul—and, so as not to prolong this further, —every other good feeling, disposition, and deed equivalent to those mentioned. —But the following lead to degradation: the fear of God; where there is no fear of God, there is every kind of sorrow, anger, and blasphemy (Eph. 4:31), according to the Apostle, and their consequences: haughty reasoning, a haughty countenance, a twisted gaze (or a raised gaze), flared nostrils, narrowed eyelids, and bristling hair.

20. Because of my sins, I see some within the brotherhood who have gone astray and forgotten their covenants with God and their solemn promises—and the fact that in the future we are to stand before the dreadful judgment seat. O foolish and slow of heart (Luke 24:25), let us keep in mind what we agreed upon and resolved at the beginning! Did we not vow to thirst, to hunger, to prepare ourselves, to endure ridicule, abuse, wounds, and even death? But where are such people among us now, when the slightest unpleasantness befalls anyone, and he becomes utterly disheartened?—Let us all, then, reflect on ourselves and take the fear of God to heart. Let none of us dare to return to what we have renounced. Let us not allow ourselves, out of pity for the laity because of their waywardness, to be bitterly mourned by them—both in this life and in the age to come—because of our own sinfulness. What good is it when they call you “Holy Father”?! What good is it that people ask for our blessing when we ourselves remain unblessed and unrestrained, like wild beasts?!—May God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve those who walk in His way, and may He lead those who have slipped back onto the path of His commandments!

27. The daily church services, meager provisions, observance of community rules, fines, and penances require much toil and patience; but since this leads to salvation—and crowns await for it—take heart

27. 1) Daily church services, meager provisions, adherence to communal rules, fines, and penances require much toil and patience; but since these lead to salvation and bring crowns, take heart. – 2) Strive to be wise in what is good and innocent in what is evil; above all, let your speech be well-ordered. [1:31]

21. Pray and ask the Lord to grant me the words to speak through my humble lips for the comfort and encouragement of your souls; for I see, my brothers, what great toil you endure daily—in keeping vigil and observing the rule of prayer, rising for this purpose at midnight and before midnight, and then at set hours, seven times a day coming to confess to the Lord concerning the ways of His righteousness, with kneeling and many prostrations, while warding off evil thoughts and revealing them to your fathers, enduring the shame that comes from this, and performing penance for it—through which the fiery arrows of the Evil One are repelled; I will add to this the overcoming of drowsiness, abstinence by cutting off the desire for food and drink, rest, and walks—which the flesh so eagerly craves—interaction with the brethren, and the humble wearing of clothing, sometimes unclean, unkempt, shabby, and full of holes; and furthermore: do not speak of this, do not look at that, do not touch that, do not go there, restrain yourself in this, do not lose heart in that, be always ready for that, do not turn away from that... all this and the like is difficult, burdensome, and bitter. But since all of this is directed toward the salvation of our souls, it ought to be sweet, easy, and comfortable for us, so that we may say of ourselves, along with the Apostle: “In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us,” the Lord and God (Rom. 8:37). The heavenly crown prepared for us is the crown of martyrdom, along with unspeakable joy and the delight of eternal blessings. “Be of good courage, then, and let your hearts be strengthened, all you who hope in the Lord” (Ps. 30: 35).

22. Continue to practice your ascetic and blessed life, so that by abiding in it for a long time you may acquire the riches of virtue and, as you grow in the body, may also advance in spiritual maturity, becoming wise and skilled in humility, obedience, and the subduing of your own will, but unwise and foolish in pride, contention, and deceit: “For the deceitful will be cut off, but those who wait for the Lord will inherit the earth” (Ps. 36: 9). Do not allow yourselves to become a stumbling block to one another through self-willed acts of service, but strive in every way to choose and do what is harmless to your neighbor. “Let your speech,” my children, “always be seasoned with grace, like salt” (Col. 4:5)—not ostentatious, not rude, not haughty, not burdensome, not hurtful, not breathing with the passion of malice or vanity, not shameful, not contradictory, not contentious, not verbose, not ridiculous, not careless, and not idle; but respectful, gentle, gracious, sincere, peaceful, accommodating, full of contrite and humble reflection, submissive, quiet, measured, and orderly, so that through it we may serve one another’s salvation and mutual edification. – Suppress the outbursts of devilish lusts, and drive away the hordes of hostile thoughts; for from this come our spiritual health and well-being, our success and the good course of our lives, and our readiness and fitness for every good deed.

28. You are like good soil, bearing the fruit of virtue, whether this or that

28. 1) You are like fertile soil; some of you bear the fruit of virtue, while others do not. – I take comfort in that; but I marvel at how some of you, after a life of plenty and prominence, have come to terms with our meager and obscure existence, and also at how all of you have renounced the tyranny of familial attachments and other passions: truly, this is martyrdom. – 2) The reward is great; for its sake, the pain of our life—which is akin to the shedding of blood—becomes bearable. [1, 32]

23. You, like fertile and good soil, receiving the word of my humility, always bear and produce good fruit, like a paradise adorned with the various beauties of virtue. For I see and recognize what is taking place within you and what you are zealous for, and I am comforted by the meekness of one’s character, the warmth of another’s zeal, the silence of one, the poetry of another, the diligence of yet another, and the vigilance of yet another, and still others by other qualities; but all of you by an invincible, unwavering, and unyielding steadfastness in observing the rules of our communal life—and I marvel at how those of you who once lived happily and in comfort, having begun to live for the Lord, have gradually forgotten all that, and having become entirely different people, courageously endure the present hardships and deprivations, thereby balancing and atoning for their former sins. But truly, the love of Christ can do all things, inclining and drawing the proud to humility, those accustomed to abundance to be content with little, and the greedy to become poor and meager. And I am amazed not only by these, but by all who have left everything for the sake of the Lord’s

Gospel: parents, brothers, wives, relatives, their homeland, homes, and customs. Everyone has left behind something dear to them; and not infrequently, the one who, on the surface, has sacrificed little—and cannot be compared to some of the great ones—turns out to have endured the greatest and heaviest hardship; for if nothing else, the very fact that he has broken free from the dominion of familial ties or from arbitrary passions is sufficient to attribute martyrdom to him and to grant him the boldness, like the foremost of the Apostles, to cry out to Christ the Lord: “We have left everything and followed You; what then will be ours?” and to be deemed worthy of the honor of hearing in reply: “In the resurrection... you also will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Matt. 19:27–28).

24. When such and such great rewards are prepared for us, how can we not all compel ourselves more and more to do and accomplish what is godly? How can we not endure all that is sorrowful and burdensome in life for the Lord’s sake? The labors of self-denial, vigil, self-reproach, obedience, instruction, confession, and everything else, because of which the prophetic word applies to us: “For Your sake we are being put to death all day long; we are regarded as sheep for the slaughter” (Ps. 43: 23). And truly, you are not far from this. For are you not also being slain by the cutting off of your desires, by the wounds of rebuke, and by your mutual obedience to one another in your way of life? And does not blood—though not physically, but spiritually—flow from your hearts in such cases? But rejoice; for you do not suffer in vain, but are thereby preparing for yourselves “an unfading crown of glory,” as the Apostle says (1 Peter 5:4). May the light of true knowledge shine within you, along with love for God that detaches you from the world, and a longing for eternal life that puts to death the desires of the flesh. May God guide you and raise you all to the highest degree, to the goal of our piety, in strength of heart and unwavering firmness of mind.

29. Very soon, and we will depart from here; but may our departure be with a good send-off

29. 1) Very soon, and we will depart from here; but may our departure be accompanied by a good send-off. – 2) You spend the whole day in the labors of obedience and in prayer, but do not grow weary, for in this lies your salvation. – 3) Live patiently in the monastery amid privations, in the mortification of your will and desires, in humiliation and other painful afflictions... this is martyrdom. – 4) You must endure to the end, hoping to share in the joy of all the saints and to behold the Mother of God and the Lord Himself. [1, 33]

25. Neither am I, I believe, laboring in vain by proclaiming to you the word of my humility, nor are you wasting your time in vain by listening to it. – But not everything is here; for the time of complete silence will surely come. We will not live forever, but in a short while—as God has determined—either I or you will depart from this life. But our aim is that our departure from here may be with good farewells, with the fulfillment of the commandments, and with pleasing our Lord Jesus Christ.

26. I see how diligent you always are in fulfilling your duties: some in preparing and baking bread, others in tending the vineyards, some on errands, others at their handicrafts—sewing, writing, washing, baking, cooking, preparing meals, in the smithy, in the storeroom, in the infirmary, —and yet you never fail to attend all the church services: the Hours—First, Third, Sixth, and Ninth—Vespers and Compline, and when you gather, you stand reverently, sing, and pray—and all this without laziness or neglect. I always keep all your toil, your hardship, and your burden in mind; but do not give in to despondency: for “in all these things we are more than conquerors,” says the Apostle, “through Him who loved us” (Rom. 8:37): so that, although this labor is very great, since through it eternal salvation and immeasurable joy shine forth for us, we ought to rejoice and be glad in it, and devote ourselves to even greater feats, and stand firm in the struggle of our martyr-like life according to the communal rule, not faltering under any burden, not turning back, and not retreating from anything sorrowful or difficult.

27. I urge you: persevere, strive for every good deed and every virtue, and, according to the Lord’s word, save your souls through your patience. As you look toward the hour of death, renew yourselves daily, and, regarding all else as secondary, keep yourselves in order, in wisdom, and in spiritual love, and in every way shun pernicious insolence, so that you may be obedient to one another, without grumbling, without rivalry, without envy, without arrogance, regarding the good of every neighbor as your own, sometimes bearing with a brother’s inattention toward you on some occasion, accepting with wisdom the reproaches and insults that come your way as spiritual remedies, and doing everything meekly and sincerely, openly, without guile or confusion, in the presence of our ever-living Lord. This is our martyrdom!—And this is why some zealots often seek to suffer for Christ at the hands of external tormentors. – Endure courageously and lawfully here (i.e., in the Kinovia) the torments, feats, and confessions, without bowing your knees before Baal, without sacrificing your soul to passions, without renouncing what you have promised, without stepping off the path you are running on until the very end, nor from the place where you stand: and you will be equal in stature to those who shed their blood in martyrdom, as the holy fathers bear resounding witness.

28. Do not think that anyone who has endured something just once, or a few times, is already saved; but whoever bears everything that happens with equanimity and will continue to do so until the end—that person will be saved. But if anyone grows weak in the middle or toward the end and renounces blessed obedience, that person will suffer a most wretched downfall, accompanied by sorrow and weeping—not only because he will thereby destroy all his previous labors, but especially because he will inevitably fall under condemnation on the day of God’s righteous judgment. Therefore, keep yourselves pure and blameless in all things and throughout all the days of your life, for the glory of God, for the salvation of your souls, and for a blessed inheritance with our fathers in heaven; so that we may be deemed worthy to rejoice and be glad there, where Anthony the Great, that radiant light, shone; where Euthymius the God-bearer and Pachomius the Christ-bearer are; where Savvas the Much-Praised, Theodosius the All-Blessed, and Dorotheus the God-Enlightened are; where Dometian the Equal-to-the-Angels, the All-Holy Akakios, and Dosipheios the God-Pleasing, where Basil the Ever-Living—I mean the obedient one⁸³—Zacharias, clothed in the Spirit, and Afre, the servant of God; and what is there to say about the others?—where are Peter and Paul, the foremost of the Twelve Apostles, where are the dwellings of the hierarchs, priests, and holy martyrs? For even if we do not attain to stand alongside them, we will by no means be deprived of their vision, their conversation, and their intercession. We hope, then, to behold the presence of the Lady Herself, our All-Ruler and Sovereign, the Mother of God, and to fall at her feet. But we also hope to behold the Lord Himself, the Ruler of all and our Lord, though this may seem presumptuous. For the divine Paul said that after our death, when we are caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord, we will always be with Him (1 Thess. 4:17). So, when such glories, such joys, and such lives lie before us, who would not rejoice, who would not be filled with zeal, who would not be set ablaze and inspired by love for God, and who would not be motivated to do all that is fitting, no matter the cost?

30. To avoid fickleness, we must submit to the community rule, which excludes all isolation within the brotherhood, keeps everyone on an equal footing in their duties, and thereby protects us from falling

1) To avoid inconsistency, submit to the community rule, which excludes all isolation within the brotherhood, keeps everyone on an equal footing in their duties, and thereby protects them from falling. – 2) There have been temptations with you before, but the Lord helped you: you overcame them; do not give in now either, and they will pass. – 3) Standing as if on trial before the Lord, conduct yourselves in monastic virtues, and excel in them more and more. [1, 341]

1. Seeing your progress, I glorify God and rejoice in the Lord; but I fear the fickleness and inconsistency of human resolve, caused by weakness of will and thoughtlessness. For it is not only the one who begins a good work who is blessed, but the one who has perfected it, having become accustomed to it and attained perfection in it. But how difficult it is to remain always in the same state of mind and not fall prey to the caprices of the all-malicious sin; therefore I ask and implore that we walk in the true way of God, the royal way—the middle way—without veering to the right or to the left, but according to the rules, commandments, and law of communal life, always doing what is required of us at every moment of life. Community life, however, requires that everyone view everything in the same way and that everyone desire everything in the same way: there are no private desires or individual aspirations within it; no self-importance or selective favoritism; no secret schemes or duplicity; no prying curiosity or prying into everything; no infatuation with many things or striving toward many goals, leading to exhaustion and the depletion of strength; It loves self-restraint, prayer, contrition, sleeping on the bare ground, and other such practices, but in everything it adheres to a single rule of blessed obedience, embracing all things through it and being guided by it in everything, as the Fathers command.

2. I implore you, stand firm on the rock of faith and walk blamelessly along the path of virtue; and may my eyes never see any of you fall prey to the devil because of some sin—whether due to the lust of the flesh, the sickness of self-will, the arrogance of pride, vanity, or any other passion. You have labored and gathered a wealth of virtues into the treasuries of your souls. Each of you remembers the nature and number of the temptations you have faced since entering monastic life, how you grew weary, lost heart, and despaired of remaining alive, beset and wounded by satanic thoughts or by the difficulties and hardships of communal life; and how our gracious God, through a series of trials rushing one after another, carried you through all of this, delivered you from the ruin that threatened you, and granted you the reward befitting your patience. Looking upon these feats—and upon all that has been endured and attained—let us not forget to turn our eyes also to what lies before us in the present and what is hoped for in the future—and may no sorrowful misfortune, whether from people or from cunning demons, turn us away from our good intentions.

3. I implore you: always look to God and imagine yourselves at the moment of your last breath, seeing the host of angels, giving an account to the Most Righteous Judge, and receiving the due reward for good and evil; strive to do good, overcome temptations, remove every stumbling block and obstacle from your path, and cheerfully ascend the mountain of heavenly life until the long-awaited day arrives. Strive for sincerity, humility, mutual respect, unity of mind, and zeal for service, for manual labor, for psalm-singing, for vigils, and for all good and pious deeds. You already possess these things, but I speak of them so that you may strive ever more earnestly to be enriched by them; you have already acquired them, but I remind you of this so that you may strive for ever greater acquisition, in Christ Jesus our Lord.

31. Whatever we endure here will be rewarded beyond measure there; let us therefore not grow weary on our difficult path, following in the footsteps of the saints who have gone before us, who were people just like us

31. 1) Whatever we endure here, there will be an indescribable reward; let us therefore not be slothful as we walk our difficult path, following in the footsteps of the saints who have gone before us, who were people just like us. – 2) He lists in detail all those who perform various duties in the monastery and gives them all this command: Do your work as if before God, as if it were God's work, for the glory of God. [1, 35]

4. Since you listen so earnestly and attentively to my humble words, I, too, am filled with zeal to instruct you, and I am, as it were, insatiable as I sow the sacred words of my humble lips into your souls. At present, we are both undertaking this labor—I by speaking, you by listening—and putting it into practice and carrying out what is spoken and heard; but when the time comes for the harvest and the gathering of the fruits, then, with joy and gladness, we will rejoice in that for which we toiled, sighed, suffered hardship, grew weary, were sorrowful, knew no rest, hung our heads, lost heart—not knowing, as I shall add, —we hungered, thirsted, left our parents, friends, brothers, relatives, homeland, and every earthly blessing of this world—we will rejoice, receiving our rewards from the righteous Rewarder—God—forever and ever. —And what rewards?! – Glory and honor that never fade and are eternal, joy and gladness and life that are inexpressible and unquenchable, satisfaction that can never be sated, and delight upon delight in these blessings—unseen, unheard, and unspeakable—the Kingdom of Heaven, the sonship and inheritance of our Lord Jesus Christ, the true God and King of the ages. Looking to this, let us not grow slothful or lose heart, no matter what sorrows may befall us (here) in our pursuits and labors, when we are compelled to do one thing or another, and when, in obedience and submission, we must endure thorns in our hearts; but, following the Apostle's word, "forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what lies ahead," let us "press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God" (Phil. 3:13), and compete in divine love with those saints who have been perfected either through martyrdom or through a pure life. What then? Were they not people just like us, sharing the same passions as we do? But since they desired and loved God with all their hearts, it is possible for us, too, if we so desire, to draw near to God and live a noble life.

5. I urge you to pay close attention to your duties and to labor diligently in them: the scribe, in writing neatly and consistently, with love and patience; the steward in managing the storehouse, in tirelessly providing for bodily needs, in giving and receiving without fuss, with due peacefulness, propriety, and apologies when required; the digger, in tilling the vineyard; and whatever else anyone may do—whether in farming, carrying heavy loads, or the like—without grumbling, not forgetting to recite verses (repeating a verse from the Psalter), keeping silence, and avoiding idle talk. The gardener and vegetable gardener shall labor in tending the garden and vegetable patch, and in providing the brotherhood with an ample supply of vegetables and fruits; the cook in preparing meals, enduring the heat of the fire and all the toil of his work without complaint; the infirmarium attendant—in devoting every effort to the comfort of the infirm brothers, providing some with more suitable food and others with words of comfort and peace, to heal both spiritual and physical ailments; the cantor—in organizing and maintaining orderly and proper singing and clear recitation. In the same way, the lamp-lighter, the parchment-maker, the baker, the knife-maker, the refectory attendant, the goldsmith, the coppersmith, the roofer, the tailor, as well as the gatekeepers, the wake-up callers, the watchmen, the trustees, the teachers—and finally, the steward and the steward’s assistant—and all of you: perform your duties as before God, as God’s work, for the glory of God.

32. The royal path is to do everything according to the rule; whoever deviates strays either into excess or into deficiency; deviation is permissible, but only with the abbot’s knowledge, without which it does not end well

32. 1) The royal path is to do everything according to the rule; whoever deviates strays either into excess or into deficiency; deviation is permissible, but only with the abbot’s knowledge, without which it does not end well. – 2) The feat of the novice is to wean oneself from the things of the soul and the flesh and to become accustomed to the spiritual; but when he tastes spiritual sweetness, other difficulties arise from the demons, the most grievous of all; whoever submits himself to the abbot’s guidance is safe here as well. [1, 36]

6. Just as on any journey, at first the unfamiliarity with such labor makes the journey arduous and difficult; but as it continues, when the muscles become limber and the body grows supple, it becomes less difficult and arduous, and more swift: so it is when we walk in the way of the Lord. God has already granted us, through trials and temptations, to know and see which path is straight and which is astray, and how to gradually reach its end. Let us therefore walk the royal path, measuring its versts as the Fathers have said, and avoiding the pitfalls on both sides, that is, both deficiencies and excesses, which occur when one begins to act contrary to the established rule or the prescribed commandment—in eating, drinking, vigil, chanting, reciting from memory (psalms and prayers), prayer, silence, and the secret workings of the heart. Deviations from the usual order in all these matters are permissible, but they must be done with counsel and with my knowledge. And I will tell you this: although I am a sinner, everything done with my knowledge and everything revealed to me is light; but he who hides from me walks in darkness and does not see how he is rushing toward the rapids of destruction, and, thinking to please God, angers Him, becoming a stumbling block to others as well. Therefore, my children, follow that path which the law of obedience calls you to keep; do not attempt to understand what is difficult for you to grasp, and do not question matters of obedience or my various abbatial directives that are beyond the reach of scrutiny.

7. The feat for the novice is to cast aside worldly customs and habits and to abandon the desires of the heart that were formed earlier; and, as if fleeing from a storm and turmoil, from fickle cares and passionate pursuits, to enter the harbor of carefreeness and love of God. But there is no lesser, or rather, a far greater and more difficult feat: after tasting peace by fleeing worldly turmoil, to keep oneself unscathed; for here certain thoughts rise up within us, while others attack us like pirates on the sea of this life—demons seeking to sink the vessel of our soul along with all the good it carries. But if we diligently make use of the favorable winds of humility and do not diminish the dignity of our helmsman through willful consent (to steer our boat in a different direction), then we will undoubtedly reach the harbor of the Kingdom of Heaven. Let us therefore, my children, be “wise as serpents and innocent as doves” (Matt. 10:16), doing good and pious deeds and each of us diligently applying ourselves to our own work. Blessed are those who endure and humble themselves, rather than those who wander aimlessly like clouds, idly passing hour after hour and day after day—for such are pleasing neither to us nor to the Lord.

33. When seeking guidance from the Word of God on how to live, we must recall the lives of the saints, who put this into practice—beginning with the fear of God and ending with deep humility

33. 1) When seeking guidance from the Word of God on how to live, we must recall the lives of the saints, who put this into practice—beginning with the fear of God and ending with deep humility. – 2) One should not boast of natural gifts—such as one’s voice, singing, and the like—but should adorn oneself with all humility, from which all good things flow, and for the sake of which all gifts of grace are given. – 3) By practicing humility, excel in all virtues; especially in the struggle against lust, repelling the first temptations and guarding yourself even against them. [1, 37]

8. My words to you, spoken in humility, are neither legislative nor authoritative nor empty, as I believe, but exhortative and comforting, reminding you of the teaching and life of our divine fathers. Divine grace has already revealed to us what is pious, righteous, and godly; and you know exactly where and how to direct your journey in order to attain the Kingdom of Heaven. Therefore, recall and remember day by day what God's salvation consists of, and what the divine deeds of the holy fathers were like; and, following their example, vividly painting your souls with the colors of piety, envision within yourselves an imitation of their lives. The beginning and end of their asceticism was a deep, heartfelt fear of the Lord. From this shone forth in them a humility that is exalted before God, by the power of which they not only regarded all Satan's snares as nothing, but, having bound the weaver of these snares himself, they placed him at their feet, to be trampled underfoot and mocked, according to the word of the Gospel (Luke 10:19). Of the many saints, I will give you as an example the one about whom yesterday's morning reading was. The reading was about the Venerable Silvanus, and your ears listened attentively to these words. You know how wonderfully he proved himself after his initial vows, and how he struck down the devil with the weapon of humility and drowned him in a sea of tears; and, having ascended to the heights of our most blessed abode, he alone embodied the perfect image of our great father Pachomius. That is why, even though he did not live long, he was held in high esteem by the sanctified Theodore, the thrice-blessed Petronius, the much-praised Orsisius, and the entire holy brotherhood, for he was taken from here to heaven amid the singing of the angels.

9. So great is the divine gift of humility! And there is no saint who has pleased God without this virtue. Clothe yourselves in it as well; and, turning your attention away from beautiful singing, melodies, pleasant reading, and other natural gifts and abilities, let us direct all our efforts toward achieving this goal. I do not mean to say that we should completely abandon these good qualities, but that we should regard them as secondary and place them in such a way that they follow in the wake of the lady of virtues. For if, because of these good qualities, we boast before those with poor voices, or take pride before the uneducated, or exalt ourselves before those who read poorly or without education, or raise our eyebrows at the voiceless and those who sing poorly; then all our labor is in vain; we do not aim our arrows at the target, but against ourselves, and through such carelessness, we make ourselves the prey of the beast from the abyss, the devil. Not so, my children, not so; but let us speak with humility, work with humility, read with humility, sing with humility, walk with humility, eat with humility, answer with humility—and everything—with humility; and we shall see how sweet, how delightful, how radiant is the fruit of this virtue, which makes us imitators of God, Who says: "Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls" (Matt. 11:29). For in it—truly—rest dwells; for its sake, waves of grace rise up in our souls; through it, purity of heart shines forth; from it comes an abundant outpouring of tears, from it, contrition gushes forth like a spring; in it are wisdom, understanding, reverence, self-control, silence, and every other good—it is found, seen, and glorified.

10. Such is my word on the venerable virtue of humility. You, children of God and children of my humility, having received it as a seed, bear fruit like good soil—some thirtyfold, some sixtyfold, some a hundredfold—in good deeds commensurate with God's gifts, and guard yourselves against every evil and wicked deed, fleeing insolence, seeking brotherly love, turning away from evil schemes, loving simplicity; for it is said: "I have clung to integrity and righteousness" (Ps. 24:21). Let no one love one person more than others; let the beardless not treat the beardless with boldness; let them not remain in hidden, unseen places. But let all of you stand invincible against the devil's wiles, quenching the fire of lusts with divine prayers and supplications. That passions arise is a common occurrence; but it is our duty to repel them the moment they appear. The enemy has come, struck, and fled. Keep the eyes of your soul open when the tempter brings some unseemly fantasy. Cast aside the hook of sweetness when the bitter hunter of sin casts his bait into your heart. Plug your ears when the one who whispered death into Eve's ears begins to extend flattering words toward you. "Do not touch, nor taste, nor partake" (Col. 2:21), when the preparer and server of sinful delights approaches you, whether you are sitting or walking (whether you are at home or on the road). Do not accept it; shut yourself off on all sides; be a fortified city; be a wall of bronze and an unshakable rock, so that no matter how fiercely the winds may rage against you, you may remain unshaken. Bravely repel the demons, that you may prove yourself a good soldier of the Lord, a bearer of Christ's wounds, a martyr of grace, and may you have the boldness to say with the Apostle: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness" (2 Tim. 4:8).

34. To prevent disturbances against the rules, one must inform the superior as soon as anyone notices plots or strikes

34. 1) To prevent disturbances against the rules, one must inform the abbot as soon as anyone notices any plots or strikes. – 2) Otherwise, let everyone go about their own business, enduring and struggling against passions and desires. [1:38]

11. Let us remain in the tasks assigned to us; let us not devise anything that exceeds our measure, and if such a thing should happen, let us not persist in it. My child! If you see frequent gatherings and factions, turn away from them; and if anyone approaches you with such a proposal, turn away from him, and do not even agree to listen to him. Flee as from a fire when you hear any words that might shake your faith in your spiritual father and weaken your love for him. For the harm from this, gradually entering the heart, will reach the very foundations of salvation. Have no confidant or secret advisor other than me, if you wish to be my true disciples, and do not despise evil words as insignificant, saying, “Is this or that so great that it is worth concerning oneself with it?” No, my children, no; but when someone strays into unbelief to the common harm, come to me and tell me everything. Perhaps someone will object ignorantly and foolishly: “But then the brothers will condemn me and hate me!”—But this is not so: for if they are not my true children, what does their praise matter to you? But the true ones will certainly follow you and praise you. In short, I implore you and remind you—rely on me completely and in everything; and let no one have anything hidden or undisclosed from me: otherwise, it will turn into a cruel wound.

12. Continuing in your former good works, strive together and with one mind complete your course in the Lord, and bear all things valiantly—reproaches, labors, afflictions, the stirrings of the flesh, the darkening of thoughts, and the onslaught of laziness and despondency, and everything else that commonly befalls us, having in all things a single source of help: unashamed hope in God and strict observance of the Lord’s commandments, while keeping the memory of death ever present and cutting off our own desires. Thus you will be deemed worthy of the martyr’s crown and will rejoice with the angels in the Kingdom of Heaven.

35. The manifestations of the workings within us of the Spirit of God and the spirit of deceit, pointed out so that, knowing this, we may zealously pursue the former and turn away from the latter

35. The manifestations of the workings within us of the Spirit of God and the spirit of temptation, pointed out so that, knowing this, we may zealously pursue the former and turn away from the latter. [1, 39] The enemy always rushes against us with fury; but he is always turned back by divine powers and the prayers of my Father and your Father; and he finds his prey only when someone gives him a foothold, driving away the Spirit of God and allowing a foreign spirit to enter, which teaches him to do and say whatever it pleases. To help us learn to discern these two influences, I will point out to you the distinguishing features of each. One who has the Holy Spirit manifests joy, peace, patience, and love—and speaks words sweeter than honey and honeycomb; for, as the Lord said, they flow from the abundance of the heart, bringing enlightenment and comfort to those who receive them. One constantly hears them say: “Forgive me, or bless me, Father; I am foolish, a mere sinner, unworthy to be counted among the brethren, lower than any creature.” To speak and feel this way is a sign that we have the Holy Spirit. Do you wish to hear what the signs of the evil spirit are? Here they are: whoever possesses it, his heart spews forth fury, anger, condemnation, slander, unbelief, loathing, hatred, insolence, disobedience, contradiction, and stubbornness. From such a soul, light, holiness, and piety have fled; humility, contrition, and patience have withdrawn; tears, weeping, and heartache have dried up; heavenly contemplation, the remembrance of death and of the angels who are to accompany one after death; and hidden in the darkness of oblivion are thoughts of the universal standing before the dreadful judgment seat of Christ, of the terrible judgment, and of one’s accountability for everything thought, spoken, and done—from the very moment of birth, and not merely from the time of entering monastic life. I am setting all this before you so that you may see what you ought to hold fast to and what you ought to avoid. For I have but one desire and one prayer: that all of you may become sons of light and of the day, heirs of God, co-heirs with Christ, vessels chosen and sanctified, united as one by the one Spirit, so that you may know through your deeds and experience in your hearts what St. David said: “Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brothers to dwell together in unity!” (Ps. 132:1).

36. Good deeds are necessary; but since every deed has its own reward, they do not prevent the wise from prospering

36. 1) Feats of valor are necessary; but since every deed has its own reward, they do not prevent the wise from prospering. – 2) Along with my guidance, apply your own understanding of what is good and encourage one another—for we have a common cause. – 3) Remain in what is good; maintain your zeal; guard your tongue; take care of your tools and belongings, and pray. [1:40]

13. We need labor, spiritual sweat, godly deeds, righteous zeal, and spiritual striving so that, having entered the arena of competition, we may reach its end well and, after a godly death, be crowned with the crowns of victory. You yourselves know that labor brings rest, sorrows are rewarded with joys, groans are soothed by spiritual consolations, and constrictions yield spaciousness; fasting and abstinence cultivate immortal rejoicing, and thirst and the drying up of the throat pour forth that “water” “flowing into life,” of which the Lord spoke (John 4: 14)—and that, in general, “those who sow in tears will reap with joy” (Ps. 125: 5), as the Psalmist St. David assures us. “You know these things,” but “blessed are you if you do them,” as it is written (John 3: 17). “A foolish man does not know them, nor does a man of little understanding comprehend them” (Ps. 91: 7). But you are wise, kind-hearted, prudent, attentive, and discerning. Why have you attained some virtues and are attaining others?—and I will add that you will continue to attain them: for the commandment knows no bounds; but the more one comes to know God, the more one realizes how far one is from the commandment.

14. I give you laws and guide you, restraining you in one thing, affirming you in another, and showing you where to direct your path. You trust me in everything, and, like iron in the hands of a blacksmith, you obey whatever I command of you. — Because of this, your journey is carefree and your life is secure. But you yourselves, too, should discern among yourselves what is good and beneficial, do it, and remind one another of it. For we all have one thing in mind: what is beneficial to all, as if we were on a ship sailing the sea, where both the helmsman and the crew are engaged in a common task. In this regard, this is the relationship between us—you and me. My task is to hold the helm in my hands and steer the ship with vigor, keeping my eyes fixed on the heavens, watching for the stars of truth, and guiding our course by them. But you, too, must stay alert, perform your respective duties, and look around in all directions so as not to run aground on anything that might wreck the ship—such as a shoal or a submerged rock—and keep the rigging in order, tightening where necessary and loosening where needed, and do whatever is necessary so that our ship may safely reach the harbor of salvation for our souls. For this reason, we have left the world, its customs, and all fleshly pleasures and delights.

15. Let us persevere, brothers, in our spiritual struggles, patiently practicing what is right; and I am confident that we will receive our crowns, become citizens of heaven, and find bliss there, where “all sickness, sorrow, and sighing will flee away” (Isa. 35: 10). Be steadfast, take courage—and may the lamp of your zeal burn with the oil of constant diligence, so that it may not go out, and we may not suffer the unwanted fate of the foolish virgins. Acquire, most honorable fathers, silence; I do not mean that you should say nothing at all, for that is incompatible with our way of life, but that you should not speak of unseemly things or provoke laughter: for “from much talk you cannot escape sin,” as wisdom assures us: “He who restrains his lips is wise” (Prov. 10:19). Be careful in carrying out your duties, and do not, through carelessness, damage necessary items—such as a cart, a plow, an axe, bowls and dishes, or anything else—which would cause a delay and result in time that could be spent on spiritual pursuits being wasted on trivial matters. Pray also always, that help may be sent to you from above against invisible and visible enemies, in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

37. With faith and love for me, be diligent; those in charge of the work, manage it wisely, and those under you, carry it out faithfully

37. 1) Be diligent in your faith and love for me; those in charge of the work, manage it wisely, and those under your authority, carry it out faithfully. – 2) Avoid mockery and mutual grievances; be kind and respectful toward one another, and flee from everything that is reprehensible and seductive. [1, 41]

16. I pray to God that your faith may not grow weak and that your spiritual love for me, a humble one, may not grow cold; but may we all be strengthened in the same understanding (1 Cor. 1:10) and in the same zeal for fulfilling the commandments of our Lord Jesus Christ. I know that you suffer hardships, endure privations, take on heavy labors, and pour out your sweat. But do not grow weary, I beg you, for the Lord’s sake, and continue to strive patiently in good works, so that you may be crowned with joy in heaven. I, too, would like to labor alongside you, were it not for the ailment in my legs; I, too, would like to go out with you to work and humble my body through labor. For it is blessed to labor alongside the brethren to the best of one's ability, and it is pious to participate in their fieldwork. Through such labors you sanctify your bodies and make your souls most dispassionate, as true workers of the Lord—provided that you observe what has been commanded with proper discernment; that is, if the superiors and administrators make their decisions with the fear of God and compassion for the brethren, and the subordinates maintain submission and obedience toward their superiors. – Take heed, then, you administrators: do not impose labor upon labor, and do not govern without compassion or carelessly, but righteously, kindly, with brotherly love, and judiciously; for not all the brethren are equal in temperament, age, and strength. It is on this condition alone that you have received authority over the brethren. And blessed are you if you act in this way; for great gifts and blessings will be yours in eternity. Take heed, you who are subject: humbly accept the directives of your superiors and act submissively from the heart.

17. Let there be no mockery among you that grieves the Lord; let there be no idle talk that grieves the Holy Spirit; let there be no bitterness among you that causes hostility toward one another. For the Apostle said: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, and every form of malice be put away from you” (Eph. 4:31); and again: “Let no corrupting talk come out of your mouths, but only such as is good for building up, as fits the occasion, that it may impart grace to those who hear” (Eph. 4:29). “Be kind to one another” (Eph. 4:32), gentle, loving toward one another, “bearing with one another in love” (Eph. 4:2), “bearing one another's burdens” (Gal. 6:2), being forbearing, forgiving, honoring one another, and yielding to one another, in reverence and fear of God. If you walk in this way, and if you lead such a life, then you are my saints, and even more so, God's own—you are His angels on earth, worshippers of His power and ministers of His glory, heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven, fellow-inhabitants of the saints and dwellers of paradise, to whom it is given to enjoy the unfathomable blessings reserved for them. That is why I pray, ask, and implore, that your steps may always be guided by God, that you may be strengthened by His power, that there may be no temptation or stumbling block among you, no deadly disobedience, no calamitous grumbling, no deadly insolence, no reproachable desire for evil, nor anything else that is forbidden and criminal. May the light of God's wisdom precede you in every movement and deed, may a peaceful disposition guide you, and may the tranquility of brotherly love reign within you. – May the Lord God assign to you the Angel of Peace, a faithful guide and guardian of your souls and bodies, to drive away evil demons from you day and night, and to lead you in a virtuous life!

38. The way of life in obedience is above all others: the Lord Himself has chosen it

38. 1) The life of obedience is above all others: the Lord Himself has chosen it. – 2) Therefore, walk this path well, enduring and never growing weary; for behold, death is coming, and all things will come to an end; yet do not forget other virtues, especially love. [1, 42]
