Preface	756
A Sketch of the Life of St. Theodore the Studite	758
1. How exalted is the monastic life	764
2. Do not think highly of yourself	764
3. Stay alert: for the enemy does not slumber—as a comfort to the shepherd	765
4. Remember death and the day of reckoning, and be zealous for your vows	766
5. Compete with one another in what is good, but not in what is evil.....	766
6. Against lust; for by this fire the eternal fire is kindled; and death may overtake one in the act.....	767
7. A high calling; give thanks by keeping your vows	768
8. Do not grow weary: the labor is small; the reward is immeasurable	769
9. To cultivate, sow, and irrigate the field of the soul so that it may bear spiritual fruit	769
10. The Lord is coming—be patient; and what will sustain you?.....	770
11. The enemy stirs up passions; but resist him, and you will overcome; the Lord is your helper.....	771
12. Let us depart from here... that is, from the realm of the passions, through abstinence of the belly, the eyes, the tongue, the ears, the hands, and the feet	772
13. Rising; Matins; the First Hour; Work.....	773
14. Turn to God, and regard nothing else as important.....	774
15. You have fled from the world; but you have not fled from the turmoil of the passions stirred up by your enemies: you must be vigilant and resist	775
16. Seeing your progress, I rejoice; but fearing that you might stop, I beg you, do not hinder the flow, turning away from all that is unbecoming and zealously pursuing all that is proper.....	776
17. Why did you leave the world? To be purified; and blessed is the one who lives in the spirit of this life, especially in faith in the abbot	777
18. Community life is most praiseworthy; and blessed is the one who lives in the Spirit.....	777
19. Let each one excel more and more in his or her own virtue: the obedient in obedience; the humble in humility; the diligent in labor	778
20. I rejoice in your successes... in some, humility; in others,.....	779
21. Be good—and do not let the enemy into your heart, lest he cry out: "Everyone has become evil."	779
22. Everything comes from God; nevertheless, our own effort is also required to persevere and press forward	780
23. Resist the enemy who stirs up passions	780
24. Against the inflaming of the passions: the Word of God, guarding the senses—especially the eyes—and denying rest to the flesh: be on your guard; you fell after baptism; do not fall again after taking the vows of the schema.....	781
25. To those who conquer their passions—crowns; to those who yield to them—torments; if you are in the first group, well and good; if in the second, hasten to correct yourselves	781
26. Looking down upon the world from the heights of the monastic life, you see a sea of vanity surging; rejoice, then, that you have been delivered from this.....	782
27. The daily church services, meager provisions, observance of community rules, fines, and penances require much toil and patience; but since this leads to salvation—and crowns await for it—take heart	784
28. You are like good soil, bearing the fruit of virtue, whether this or that.....	784
29. Very soon, and we will depart from here; but may our departure be with a good send-off	785
30. To avoid fickleness, we must submit to the community rule, which excludes all isolation within the brotherhood, keeps everyone on an equal footing in their duties, and thereby protects us from falling	786
31. Whatever we endure here will be rewarded beyond measure there; let us therefore not grow weary on our difficult path, following in the footsteps of the saints who have gone before us, who were people just like us.....	787

32. The royal path is to do everything according to the rule; whoever deviates strays either into excess or into deficiency; deviation is permissible, but only with the abbot's knowledge, without which it does not end well	788
33. When seeking guidance from the Word of God on how to live, we must recall the lives of the saints, who put this into practice—beginning with the fear of God and ending with deep humility	788
34. To prevent disturbances against the rules, one must inform the superior as soon as anyone notices plots or strikes	790
35. The manifestations of the workings within us of the Spirit of God and the spirit of deceit, pointed out so that, knowing this, we may zealously pursue the former and turn away from the latter	790
36. Good deeds are necessary; but since every deed has its own reward, they do not prevent the wise from prospering	791
37. With faith and love for me, be diligent; those in charge of the work, manage it wisely, and those under you, carry it out faithfully	791
38. The way of life in obedience is above all others: the Lord Himself has chosen it	792
39. Keep the Lord before your eyes, lest you be led into anything evil; strive for what is good, remembering the Last Judgment, and even more so the dreadful judgment and its verdict	793
40. The fear of God wards off the swords of our enemy	793
41. By treating the steward as an independent authority, you introduce dual authority and division; but where authority is divided, the kingdom cannot stand	794
42. Lent requires not only bodily abstinence but also spiritual abstinence	794
43. Blessed are those who labor in community: rejoice!	795
44. Fear for Oneself Regarding the Abbot's Insistence	796
45. Demons entice by stirring up passions, and they destroy: one must fight	797
46. We are called to a noble life: but do we live as we ourselves have resolved, and as others expect? ..	799
47. Be steadfast in the life you have chosen, and do not deprive yourself of the joys that lie before you ..	799
48. Death is at hand: prepare yourselves by purifying yourselves of passions	801
49. The scene of our Savior's sufferings for our sake: glory and thanks be to Him!	802
50. A Lesson from Seeing the Deceased: Do Not Worry About the Body, but About Heaven	803
51. Everyone in the monastery works, contributing their share to the common good; why everything produced by the monastery is considered the property of each individual	803
52. Let brotherly love endure; may you all be saved by purifying yourselves; avoid idle talk and laughter; it pains me to hear when something is amiss among you	804
53. I am departing, but I leave my soul with you; continue as you were with me, even without me	806
54. Please God; care for one another, not seeking to please yourselves; do not be wise in your own eyes; be of one mind	806
55. He expresses his favor toward zealous workers and asks them to be zealous both in spiritual endeavors and in monastic duties	807
56. Beginners face strong temptations due to the remnants of sinful inclinations and habits	809
57. We are in battle: I, as your commander, urge you with these words: Stand firm	810
58. I remember death and all that happens at that time, and I pray that I may be granted purification and not have to endure the fire; but you, rejoice, looking forward to the reward, even though your present circumstances are sorrowful	810
59. Having been amidst the vanity of the world, I gave thanks to God that we have fled from there	811
60. Arise and seek healing from the Lord, the Healer of all	812
61. The midpoint of Great Lent; we have labored, and we see the fruits: God's mercy; having given thanks, let us press on	813
62. Your order is well established: maintain it	813
63. Having celebrated the Passover, let us continue in the spirit of Lent, so that we may not squander what we have gained during this time, but rather multiply it	814
64. We have been granted a lofty calling; let us rejoice, give thanks, and act, undertaking every labor for its sake and enduring all things	815
65. Reflecting on what the Prophets, Apostles, and other Saints endured for the sake of the Kingdom of Heaven, let us be filled with zeal	816
66. You have been entrusted to me by God; that is why I am zealous to teach you	817
67. Because I love you, I rejoice when you prosper, and I grieve when I see what kind of spirit you are in	817
68. Peace in vain and trivial pursuits; but our goals are lofty, and our labors are fruitful	818
69. We must endure all the unpleasant things we encounter; and let us be worthy to join the ranks of the passion-bearers	819
70. What does God require of you? Renunciation of your own will and submission to the single will of your spiritual father; therefore, do not presume to set yourselves apart from others in anything, not even in doing good	820
71. The causes of sin are pride and disobedience; and from them comes every kind of sorrow; on the contrary, from humility and obedience	820

72. How are penances and other corrective measures salvific? They are the path to paradise	821
73. The path is arduous and sorrowful; but in return, immeasurable consolations await us: let us persevere	821
74. When the king summons guests to a feast, everyone hurries. The King of Heaven has called us; how can we not hurry, enduring all things? Let us not lose heart, but fight courageously against everything....	822
75. Seeing the fruits of a good life, according to our rule, hold fast to it more strictly: and you will become a dwelling place of the Triune God	823
76. For those who live a holy life, every day is a feast. Do you desire this? Be zealous to please God, and endure everything for His sake.....	824
77. Life is full of turmoil; but first, pray that your helmsman may be alert and wise; then take comfort in the hope of reaching a good end.....	824
78. Just as we take every precaution when the Arabs approach so as not to fall into their hands, so let us guard against our mental enemies, putting on the armor of God	825
79. Time is running out: you must be vigilant, as you are doing, taking special care to cultivate humility and meekness, imitating Christ	826
80. I commend your obedience: continue in this way; and both those who assign duties and those who carry them out—act with reverence toward God	827
81. Let us beware of the uprising of passion, which is more terrible than the sword, by shielding ourselves with the commandments and arming ourselves with aversion	828
82. The brother has left. Why? He did not heed himself and succumbed to deceptive thoughts; if he had heeded himself, the psalms' counsel would have set him straight; and his will was not firm.....	828
83. Let nothing separate us from the love of God; but let us persevere in our labors and virtues until we attain the measure of Christ	829
84. Who are such wicked people? All who live wickedly; especially those dissatisfied with the meager monastic provisions, contrary to their vows.....	830
85. It is bitter that two more have left	831
86. I take comfort in your steadfastness and perseverance; continue to excel and strive even more—and God's blessing will be upon you; but those who are not like this are not of God	832
87. Having renounced the world, yet looking back at it—you are acting both foolishly and destructively: come to your senses, I beg you	833
88. I rejoice that you have settled well; but this is not my doing, but a gift from God; I rejoice because we are one with you: May the Lord keep you and help you to prosper.....	833
89. Having heeded God's calling, like Abraham, you have left everything behind: do not grieve, but, inspired by hope, endure all things—for crowns await you.....	834
90. Just as it is my duty to always encourage you to fight, so it is your duty to always stand fully armed spiritually and fight.....	835
91. Spring has arrived: be on your guard; I advise you to abstain from wine, not to eat to excess, and to be cautious when going into town, and not to bring worldly things back to the monastery from there.....	836
92. The Suppression of One's Own Will Is Our Foremost Virtue	836
93. You are striving in every good work; the labor is great, but the reward is greater; so press on more and more	837
94. You know why we came to the monastery: do not allow anything contrary to that	838
95. We are the army of Christ: see to it that your full armor is ready; for the enemy does not slumber—and fight.....	840
96. Let us remember what we were before, how we were called, and what we are now—and let us give thanks to God both in word and, even more so, through the righteousness of our lives.....	840
97. You will undoubtedly inherit eternal bliss for your renunciation of the world, your martyr-like obedience, and your struggle against passions and invisible enemies: stand firm, then.....	841
98. We are poor; but God provides for us; thanks be to Him; yet we must not be idle; but let each one work according to his calling: then God will multiply our little	842
99. Teachings are not useless: they awaken those who are asleep, and they strengthen and guide those who are awake	843
100. It is hard to lead; but for the Lord's sake—for our sake, He who suffered even unto death on the cross—I endure; you also must endure.....	844
101. We are called to be purified from sin through toil, deprivation, and afflictions	844
102. I bless you for your sincere and successful commitment to the practices of communal life	845
103. Thoughts and feelings, words and deeds in that world are completely different from ours: we experience all of this as if we were in paradise	846
104. It is my duty to speak; it is yours to listen	846
105. The season is now seductive (spring); keep your body under control	849
106. Let us endure all things in the hope of eternal bliss, according to the word and example of St. Paul.....	849
107. It is now Lent: let each one prepare himself as it requires	850
108. Let us not allow ourselves to become slothful, remembering that we work for God, who will reward us according to our diligence and zeal.....	850

109. Seek what is not of this world with zeal and all your might: God will bless you	851
110. Through your fellowship, the good of each one extends to all, and the good of all to each one	852
111. Sermons are preached so that, by listening to them, you may be set aright, yet you all remain just the same: so stop being so inattentive and inactive	853
112. We are in a spiritual race: who are the spectators? What should the runners focus on? Who runs in an exemplary manner?	853
113. You have set a good intention; but that does not spare you from the enemy's temptations, which you are now experiencing	854
114. Let us cultivate our souls, doing in a spiritual sense everything that a farmer does when cultivating his field	855
115. Having cast aside all lust and anger, let us cling to the Lord, serving Him faithfully in the duties of our monastic vocation	856
116. On the occasion of some people's flight: stand firm and grow in holiness, taking great care not to act according to your own will, even in doing good	856
117. Those Who Have Fled Again. – How can one avoid such a fall?	857
118. The struggles are brief, but the rewards for them are eternal; the pleasures of sin are fleeting, but the torments for them are endless: the careless cannot escape them	858
119. We have come out of the world: is it any wonder that we suffer in the world? But this is not a hindrance to us, but a help	859
120. In our spiritual life, let us reflect the characteristics of the Lord's life on earth in the flesh	859
121. Let no one set himself apart, and do not lose faith in your father; but do not listen to the enemy, the cunning inventor of evil	859
122. Travelers, looking toward the end of their journey, willingly endure all the hardships they encounter along the way; just as we must endure everything for the sake of the kingdom of heaven	860
123. In what matters should we compete with one another, in what should we strive to surpass one another, and in what should we agree with one another	861
124. Be blameless in all things, both inwardly and outwardly	861

Introduction

In offering to lovers of spiritual reading the well-known Philokalia in Russian translation, with additions to it, we consider it our duty to say a few words about what the Philokalia actually is.

This word is a translation of its Greek title—Philokalia—which means “love of what is beautiful, sublime, and good.” In the closest sense, it embodies “an interpretation of the life hidden in the Lord Jesus Christ.”

The truly Christian life, hidden in our Lord Jesus Christ, begins, unfolds, and ascends to perfection—each according to his or her own measure—by the good pleasure of God the Father, through the action of the grace of the Holy Spirit inherent in Christians, and under the guidance of Christ the Lord Himself, who promised to be with us always. God’s grace calls everyone to such a life; and for everyone, it is not only possible but also obligatory, for in it lies the very essence of Christianity. However, not all who are called partake of it, and not all who do partake of it do so to the same degree. The elect enter deeply into it and ascend high through its various stages. Its manifestations, as well as the riches of the realm in which it unfolds, are no less abundant and varied than the phenomena of ordinary life.

And if everything that takes place there could be clearly understood and comprehensibly depicted—enemy attacks and temptations, struggles and triumphs, falls and risings, the emergence and strengthening of various manifestations of spiritual life, the degrees of overall progress and the state of mind and heart characteristic of each, the interplay of freedom and grace in all things, the sensations of God’s nearness and distance, the sense of providential omnipotence and the surrender of oneself—final and irrevocable—into the right hand of the Lord, with the relinquishment of all one’s own modes of action, amidst ceaseless, intense activity—if all this, and much else that is inseparable from a true life in the Lord, could be clearly and easily understood, it would present a picture as attractive as it is instructive—a picture resembling a journey around the world.

Travelers write travelogues about everything they encounter along their way that is worthy of attention. God’s chosen ones, too, who have traced all the paths of the spiritual life in various directions, have written their own notes about everything they encountered and experienced on this arduous journey. But the fate and purpose of these two kinds of notes are not the same. Those who lack the means to travel can, without moving from their place, form fairly accurate concepts and ideas about foreign lands by reading the travel notes of other travelers, because the forms of life of all creatures resemble one another to a greater or lesser extent, no matter in which countries they manifest themselves.

This is not the case with regard to the experiences of the spiritual life. Only those journeying along this path can understand them. For those who have not embarked upon it, this is a completely unknown science; yet even among those who have embarked upon it, not all can understand it at once. Their concepts and ideas become clearer as they journey onward and delve deeper into the realm of the spirit. As one’s own experiences of spiritual life multiply, the insights drawn from the experiences noted by the Holy Fathers in their writings become clear and understandable.

Nevertheless, the description of the various manifestations of the spiritual life contained in the writings of the Holy Fathers is not a gift in vain for all Christians in general. It helps everyone understand that if they have not yet experienced what is described here, it means that the way of life they have established for themselves—even though their Christian conscience is at peace with it—is not the ultimate perfection, beyond which there is nothing better to desire and nowhere higher to go. By making this clear, it cannot help but stir up a zeal for progress; it cannot help but beckon one forward, pointing to something better than what one already possesses.

For those who have set out on the path toward what is better and more perfect, it provides necessary guidance in cases of doubt and confusion, when there is no readily available, experienced guidance, and when even that guidance encounters insoluble problems that prevent definitive decisions from being made—decisions that would eliminate all hesitation in the one who is journeying. It is very important to know how and where to set one's foot in a given situation so as not to make a mistake. And here, some fatherly saying dispels the darkness, shining like a bolt of lightning in the night.

In general, this is a spiritual greenhouse into which the believer, reading instructions on the phenomena of spiritual life, enters with mind and heart; and, being subjected there to the tangible influences of inspired contemplations, feels that in these moments he is soaring in a different atmosphere, one that is luminous and life-giving. These are moments of joy—and it is in the course of these moments that various shoots on the tree of spiritual life usually take root and mature. And so it is no wonder that those who have experienced this, as soon as they find a free moment, rush to seek out descriptions of spiritual life, just as one who loves profit rushes to places that promise profit, and one who loves pleasure rushes to places of delight. In doing so, they often long to breathe in the invigorating and uplifting air of the spirit.

And yet this is not mere idle curiosity. No, it is a matter of vital necessity for the progress and well-being of our spirit. That is why there has always been—and still is—a need among true Christians to have the writings of the Church Fathers on the spiritual life at their fingertips. But as commendable as this need is, it is equally essential that it be met by those who have both the duty and the ability to do so. It has always been met, both through the publication of these writings in their entirety—for example, those of Saints Macarius, Isaac, and Ephrem the Syrian, the Author of The Ladder, and many others—and through anthologies drawn from them.

Among such anthologies is the well-known Dobrotolyubie, which is considered the finest of them all. It is now clear what Dobrotolyubie is. It provides us with the words and principles of holy sobriety—that is, both complete treatises and brief sayings on the inner spiritual life, along with all its characteristic manifestations and practices. This is a book compiled to satisfy the spiritual needs of those zealous for spiritual progress. Those who read it know what treasures of spiritual wisdom are hidden in Dobrotolyubie: they read it and take delight in it.

But while taking delight and edification from reading it, they do not hide their sorrowful regret that much of the book remains incomprehensible—not because of the height or depth of its content, but because of the outdated nature of the translation. The need for a new translation of this book is therefore evident. This need has long been recognized and has been met to a certain extent by translations published in Christian Reading from its earliest years, as well as by the publication of individual articles included in Dobrotolyubie, such as those by St. Maximus (on love; this is found in the Greek edition of Dobrotolyubie), Hesychius, and Peter of Damascus.

The compiler of this collection initially intended only to verify what had already been translated, to complete the translation of what remained untranslated, and to provide readers with Dobrotolyubie in Russian translation—complete, in the same composition as it appears in Greek. But then he came to the conclusion that it is necessary for us to expand Agape beyond the scope it has in Greek. For although the Greek Dobrotolyubie is more complete than the Slavonic version, it still does not contain everything that the Holy Fathers have given us as a guide to the spiritual life—and which we would wish to provide for the benefit and comfort of those who love such reading. Hence, the collection we offer is the same Dobrotolyubie, only expanded.

Our new collection follows in the footsteps of the earlier Dobrotolyubie. However, when it is noted that a particular Father, whose article is included in it, has written other articles as well, the collection turns to those as well; and if it finds them consistent with its character, it incorporates them as well. Likewise, upon noting that among the Fathers from whom articles were drawn, there were other Fathers who left us writings on the spiritual life, it enriches itself with their works as well. Thus, from St. Anthony, the previous Dobrotolyubie included only his instructions in 170 chapters; the new collection incorporates St. Anthony's other writings as well. St. Macarius is omitted there (from him, Metaphrastus's paraphrases of the instructions in 150 chapters were included: our "7 Sayings"). Here, his instructions are presented in a somewhat systematic order, in his own words. From Isaiah the Hermit, only 27 chapters—brief sayings—are included there. Here, all 29 of his known sayings are included in a new translation from the Greek. The same has been done with regard to Evagrius and St. Mark the Ascetic. This will also be the case in the subsequent collection of articles.

Such is the method of compiling the new Dobrotolyubie. It will follow the example of the previous edition, supplemented so as not to deprive lovers of this reading of anything that may prove useful in guiding them to a life according to God. Regarding the method of including articles, we feel it is our duty to state that not all writings will be included in their entirety. Much is far more conveniently presented in excerpt form. This will sometimes be done in a systematic order, and sometimes without one, in the form of individual sayings. But the teachings of the Fathers themselves will always be presented in their own words. We present to readers the first volume of Dobrotolyubie, in its new edition. It includes:

1) The Writings of St. Anthony; 2) Excerpts from the Discourses of St. Macarius; 3) The Words of Isaiah the Hermit; 4) The Instructions of St. Mark the Ascetic; 5) The Writings of Evagrius the Monk. The articles follow this same order in the Greek edition of Dobrotolyubie. In our edition, St. Cassian, who appears there between Evagrius and St. Mark, is deferred to the next volume. We present this collection with the sincere hope that lovers of spiritual reading will find in it what the compiler intended to convey to them.

Saint Anthony the Great

A Few Words on the Life and Writings of St. Anthony the Great

St. Anthony the Great, who pioneered the ascetic life of solitude in the desert, embodies through his life the ideal of this kind of service to God, and at the same time the path that every soul, if it so desires, must follow to attain the perfection possible for us on earth, as taught by Christianity. The life of St. Anthony is described by St. Athanasius the Great (see his works, vol. 3) and is included, almost without abridgment, in our Chety Minei under January 17. Those who wish to know the details should consult that source. Here, only the general features of his life are outlined. God's calling of St. Anthony to the work he accomplished was evident in him even in childhood. His quiet, warm-hearted disposition, inclined toward solitude, kept him away from the boisterous play and pranks of his peers and kept him at home under the watchful eyes of his parents, who guarded him as the apple of their eye. Thus he grew up in this seclusion from others, leaving the house only to go to church. With such a disposition and way of life, the grace of God received at baptism worked unhindered to build up his spirit, without any particular effort on his part. It was only natural that he came to experience the sweetness of a life lived according to God at an early age and was inflamed with a divine desire, as St. Athanasius says. Finding no obstacles to such a life at home—for his parents were of the same spirit—St. Anthony showed no desire to leave it while his parents were alive, and relieved him of the inevitable cares of daily life. But when they passed away to God, he, having become the eldest, had to take upon himself the responsibility of managing the household and providing for his sister. This immediately made him feel the great difference between a life in God and a life full of worldly cares, and laid a firm foundation for his desire to leave everything behind and live only for God. The words of the Lord he heard in church while in this frame of mind—"If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven" (Matt. 19: 21)—and then another: "Do not worry about tomorrow" (Matt. 6:34)—sealed this desire with the divine seal; for in those words he heard God's answer to the questions of his conscience, and at the same time God's command and blessing for the fulfillment of the secret desires and aspirations of his heart. – He made up his mind with unwavering resolve, and, having given away all his possessions, began to live for God alone. St. Anthony spent the first years of his ascetic life in the same way as other ascetics known at that time, learning everything from them. It is well known that the ascetic life of renunciation—in which, having renounced all worldly cares, one is concerned solely with "how to please the Lord" (1 Cor. 7:32), has been established in the Church of God from its very foundation as an essential necessity in its structure, and received its first fundamental laws from the Holy Apostles. But at first, the ascetics—as those who devoted themselves to this way of life were called, having renounced the world and worldly cares—remained in their homes, merely withdrawing to some secluded corner, where they devoted themselves to prayer, contemplation of God, fasting, vigils, and all manner of spiritual struggles. As time went on, however, as Christianity expanded in both scope and number of believers, many ascetics began to leave their families and, retreating beyond the city or village, lived a solitary life in the wilderness—in some natural cave, a deserted tomb, or a small cell purposefully constructed for that purpose. By the time of St. Anthony, the most zealous ascetics lived primarily in this manner. St. Anthony the Great also sought to imitate them. The beginning of the ascetic life is the period of novitiate. St. Anthony underwent this period in imitation of and obedience to those ascetics. – The essence of the novitiate lies in establishing Christian virtues in the heart and in mastering the practices of the ascetic life under the guidance of the most experienced. St. Anthony had acquired Christian virtues through his upbringing; now he had only to learn what deeds were necessary for those who aspired to live in God, and how to perform them. To this end, he visited the ascetics renowned at the time, inquired how to do various things, learned them, and returned with this knowledge—as if it were a prize—to his hermitage. Thus, as St. Athanasius observes, he, like a wise bee, gathered spiritual honey from everywhere, storing it in his heart as in a beehive. From one, he learned the strictness of abstinence in food, sleeping on the bare ground, and prolonged vigil; from another he learned tireless prayer, attentiveness to his thoughts, and contemplation of God; from a third he took the example of diligence, fidelity to the rules, and patience; and from all of them he drew the same spirit of firm faith in Christ the Lord and brotherly love for all, striving to combine within himself all that particularly distinguished each of the fathers he had encountered. Without measuring his own life against the lives of others and without outside guidance, no one attained the highest degrees of the ascetic life. St. Anthony entrusted his life to these elders, and under their guidance he was led along the unwavering path to perfection. He spent fifteen years in this novice training, living in a tomb outside the village—at first not too far away, and later farther still—where a villager who was sincere toward him would come to bring him bread—St. Anthony’s sole food— —and collecting handicrafts: for St. Anthony lived by the labor of his own hands. He divided all his time between this handicraft work, prayer, and meditation on the divine truths of Scripture—activities in which the Angel of God, who appeared to him, had confirmed him when his spirit was once overcome by despondency. As for how his life unfolded during this time, we cite the testimony of Sozomen (Church History, Book 1, Chapter 13), who writes about St. Anthony: “Having learned that a virtuous life becomes pleasant through habit, though it may be difficult at first, he devised increasingly rigorous ascetic practices, becoming more abstinent with each passing day; and as if always just beginning anew, he infused fresh vigor into his zeal; he curbed bodily pleasures with labor and armed himself against the passions of the soul with a godly hatred for them. His food was bread and salt, his drink was water, and his mealtime was sunset; not infrequently, however, he went without food for two days or more; he stayed awake, one might say, all night long and greeted the day in prayer, and if he did sleep at all, it was for but a single minute; he lay mostly on the bare ground, and had only the earth as his bed. He did not allow himself to anoint himself with oil, wash, or enjoy other comforts, since these would make the body soft and weak. He could not tolerate idleness, and work never left his hands for almost an entire day.” St. Anthony walked this arduous path. But, as is well known, such a life does not pass without struggle, just as there is no light without shadow. If there were no sin in us, and if we had no enemy, goodness alone would unfold within us and grow unhindered. But since both exist and both lay claim to us, no one has been able to avoid struggling against them. – We must weaken them and defeat them in order to move forward freely. Without this, they will all hinder the progress of anyone who wishes to walk the right path, whoever they may be. This is why God’s grace, which worked within the spirit of St. Anthony, led him into battle—to test him, like gold in a crucible, to strengthen his moral fortitude and give free rein to its power. The enemy was granted access, while the ascetic was sustained by hidden help. St. Athanasius describes this struggle at length. The enemy’s arrows, he said, were very potent; but the courageous warrior repelled them without the slightest hesitation. At first, the enemy attempted to shake his resolve by making him regret having left the world, reminding him, on the one hand, of his noble lineage—seemingly despised despite his wealth—his considerable riches—seemingly squandered in vain—and all the comforts of life—seemingly rejected for no good reason— —and especially his sister, left with nothing in the hands of strangers, without his own support, care, and comfort—and on the other, the hardship and cruelty of the bleak life he had begun, the unaccustomed nature and fragility of his body, which seemed unable to withstand such privations, and the length of this life, —so that there seemed to be no end in sight—far from people, without any consolation, in ceaseless self-mortification. With these suggestions, the enemy stirred up a violent storm of thoughts; but he was not only repelled by the steadfastness of St. Anthony, who stood unshakable in his intention and resolve, but also overthrown by his great faith that all that he had forsaken and endured was nothing compared to the endless blessings prepared by God for those who renounce the world, for whom it is easier to please Him when free from all worldly and material bonds—and was even cast into the dust by his ceaseless prayers, which drew the sweetest spiritual consolations into his heart. Defeated on this front, the enemy attacks the young warrior from another—one from which he was already accustomed to bringing down the young—and begins to wrestle with him through carnal lust, troubling him at night and disturbing him by day. The struggle was so fierce and protracted that it did not go unnoticed even by outsiders. The enemy instilled impure thoughts, but St. Anthony repelled them with prayer; the enemy inflamed his limbs, but he cooled them with fasting, vigil, and every kind of self-exhaustion; the former took on the form of women at night, devising every means to arouse seductive desires, while the latter delighted in sorrow and, through contemplation of the beauties of the hereafter, as well as through the keenest awareness of the nobility to which our nature is made worthy in the Lord Jesus Christ, dispelled the deceptive allure; The accursed one evoked a sense of sweetness from pleasure, while the blessed one set against it the terrible bitterness of torment in the eternal fire and from the ceaseless worms—and remained unharmed. The persistence and ugliness of the attacks finally instilled in the one who was struggling a loathing for all impure impulses and anger toward them, accompanied by intense irritation, which deprived the enemy of any opportunity to approach him or even to tempt or disturb him from afar in this regard. For the feelings of revulsion and hatred toward passionate impulses are fiery arrows that scorch the enemy. Thus was the all-cunning one defeated even in this instance by the youth, who bore a passionate flesh, and he retreated in disgrace, because the Lord Himself assisted the servant of God, having taken on flesh for our sake and crushed all the enemy's power within it, as every true ascetic confesses, speaking with the Apostle: "It is not I, but the grace that is with me" (1 Cor. 15:10). But the enemy of mankind had not yet exhausted all his arrows. Seeing God's protection over the young fighter, and knowing that it covers only the humble, the enemy devises a plan to deprive him of this protection by stirring up pride and conceit within him. To this end, he appears in the form of a small boy—a black one—and speaks to St. Anthony with feigned humility: "You have defeated me"—believing that, having claimed victory for himself, he would become conceited and thereby provoke the wrath of God, who was helping him. But St. Anthony asked him, "Who are you?" He replied, "I am the spirit of fornication, whose task is to stir up lust and lead people into carnal sin." I have seduced many who had vowed chastity; I have led many who had long mortified their flesh to fall; but through you, all my snares have been torn apart, my arrows broken—and I have been cast down." Then St. Anthony, giving thanks to God, his Savior, cried out: "The Lord is my helper—I will look upon my enemies" (Ps. 117:7), and then, looking fearlessly at the enemy, he said: "My God has allowed you to appear to me in black form to reveal the darkness of your evil intentions—and as a youth to expose your powerlessness. Therefore, you are worthy of every contempt. At these words, that spirit, as if burned by fire, fled and never again approached the blessed Anthony. Victory over the passions brings one closer to dispassion; and to the extent that dispassion is established, it brings with it peace of mind: and inner peace, with the sweet sensations bestowed by prayer and contemplation of God, stirs up spiritual warmth in the heart, which, gathering to itself all the powers of the spirit, soul, and body, leads a person inward, where, having settled there, he feels an irresistible need to be alone with the one God. This irresistible drawing inward toward God is the second stage of spiritual growth; and it is to this stage that St. Anthony has now arrived. Until then, he had spent most of his time alone; but his sincere friend from the village would often visit him, and he himself would go, sometimes to the elders, sometimes to the village church for worship, especially the Liturgy. All of this was accompanied by a certain kind of distraction, however much one might try to cut it off. St. Anthony's spirit, having grown weary within, began to demand complete seclusion, so that he might see and hear nothing. As noted, the soul arrives at this state of its own accord, through the direct path of asceticism; but certain strong impulses of self-denial accelerate this turning point and give it a decisive push. An opportunity for such an impulse presented itself to St. Anthony in the form of a clear attack by demons. Having lost the ability to act through thoughts upon a purified soul, the demons begin to act from the outside; they appear visibly and present the ascetic with whatever they hope will harm him or shake his good intentions. — Yet God's grace permits this for the sake of the ascetic's spiritual growth, thereby opening for him the path to a higher degree and at the same time granting him a certain right to subsequently exercise authority over the tempting spirits themselves. This is precisely what happened to St. Anthony. The most important moment in this circumstance is when St. Anthony, having regained consciousness in the narthex of the village church and barely still breathing, said to his friend: “Carry me back to my hermitage.” For by this he expressed his surrender to death for the sake of the life which he knew, in his own person, to be the only one pleasing to God. This meant the same thing as actually dying for the Lord’s sake: for his readiness for it was complete. Readiness to die for the Lord and to please Him is an all-conquering weapon: for by what else can one who possesses it be tempted or intimidated? It is considered the starting point of asceticism and a source of strength throughout its entire course. The Lord and Savior—our Model of Asceticism—saw death before Him throughout all the days of His earthly life, but in the Garden of Gethsemane, during His prayerful struggle, He finally conquered it through His humanity; His sufferings and death on the cross fulfilled what was spoken there. This was followed by three days of rest, preceding the glorious Resurrection. All souls who follow in the footsteps of the Lord walk this path. The first step in this is self-denial; but no matter how small its beginnings may be, it always contains a measure of readiness for death. Then self-denial grows—and so does this readiness, or rather, this readiness is the very essence of self-denial. Whoever reaches the degree of readiness that the Savior possessed in the garden will immediately ascend in spirit to the cross, and then experience a spiritual Sabbath, followed by a spiritual resurrection in the glory of the Lord Jesus. – This is precisely what has now been accomplished in the spirit of St. Anthony. By telling his friend not to take him back to the very place where he had been so tormented, he showed that his spirit was the same as that of the Savior when, after praying in the garden, He said to His disciples: “Let us go; behold, the one who betrays Me is at hand!” – This was immediately followed by his retreat into the remote wilderness and his twenty-year sojourn there in silence—just as his crucifixion and observance of the Sabbath—in spirit. As soon as St. Anthony had recovered from the torments inflicted by the demons, he set out for the desert, two or three days’ journey from inhabited areas—and there he shut himself away in an old, abandoned temple, which had a well with water, while a friend of his brought him bread every six months. No one saw what hardships and feats he endured there, nor what happened to him. But judging by the state in which he emerged from his seclusion, one must conclude that this was a time when his spirit was being formed by the Holy Spirit. What happened here was similar to what happens to a caterpillar when it wraps itself into a chrysalis. No one sees what happens to it during this time: it seems as if it has frozen in place. But meanwhile, the life-giving power of nature is at work within it—and in due time, a beautiful, multicolored butterfly emerges from the chrysalis. So it was with St. Anthony. No one saw what was happening to him; but the Spirit of God—invisible to all, unknown for the most part even to Anthony himself—was creating within him a new man, in the image of the One who created him. When the time of creation was complete, he was commanded to go out and minister to the faithful. And he went out, clothed with the manifold gracious gifts of the Holy Spirit. Just as Christ rose from the dead in the glory of the Father, so St. Anthony now emerged into a life renewed by the Spirit. This marked the completion of St. Anthony’s spiritual formation. His entire life thereafter was nothing other than the bearing of fruit from what had been sown during the first two periods of his life. This was the third period—the time of his ministry for the good of the Church—as if it were his apostolate. Just how fruitful and far-reaching this ministry was, anyone can see from St. Athanasius’s account of his life. He served with all the gifts of grace. And what gifts did he not possess? —There was the gift of working miracles, the gift of authority over demons, over the forces of nature, and over animals; the gift of discerning thoughts; the gift of seeing what was happening at a distance; the gift of revelations and visions. But of all these gifts, the most fruitful and far-reaching in its application was the gift of the word. —And it was with this gift that he served his younger brothers more than with any of the other gifts. St. Athanasius writes that God gave St. Anthony a powerful word that penetrated to the depths of the heart. And he knew how to speak with such power for the benefit of everyone that many noblemen—both military and civilian, men of great wealth—cast off the burdens of worldly life and became monks. And who, coming to him in sorrow, ever returned without finding comfort? Who, coming to him in tears over the dead, did not immediately cease weeping? Who, coming in anger, did not transform that anger into meekness? What monk, having fallen into sloth, did not, after visiting him, become zealous and steadfast in his spiritual struggles once more? What young man, upon seeing St. Anthony and listening to him, did not renounce worldly pleasures and begin to love chastity? How many maidens, already betrothed, upon merely catching a glimpse of St. Anthony from afar, joined the ranks of Christ’s brides? From this testimony, it is clear that St. Anthony did not withhold the source of his God-given wisdom. Indeed, people came to him primarily to listen, to receive the word of truth, and to find proper guidance. And he taught, rebuked, and exhorted everyone, following the example of the Apostle. Sometimes his words flowed in a torrential stream, such as those preserved by St. Athanasius in his biography; sometimes he spoke in less lengthy discourses, such as his 20 brief sayings; but more often he confined himself to concise aphorisms, full of meaning and power. These brief sayings, in countless numbers, were then passed down by word of mouth, forming, as it were, a living code of asceticism, and were finally included in collections of the Fathers' memorable sayings. At times, St. Anthony also wrote letters to his spiritual children, the monks of various monasteries, in which he would either describe the general features of life in Christ Jesus or remedy the specific weaknesses of the brethren. Everything that came from the lips of St. Anthony and was committed to writing, as well as everything he wrote, provides rich nourishment for the soul seeking edification. In addition to the lengthy discourse included in his biography, 20 letters to monks have come down to us, 20 brief discourses on virtues and vices, 170 chapters on moral conduct, his Rule for Monks with two appendices, and a multitude of his sayings and stories about him—always edifying and instructive—scattered throughout various patristic works. His epistles and sayings, translated into Russian, were published in the early years of Christian Reading—the chapters are included in Dobrotolyubie, while the sayings and accounts make up the first section of Memorable Tales. In the original, all of this can be found and read in Patrologiae graecae, vol. 40—Migne, from which everything included in this collection has been translated. Here, we present the following to the attention of those who enjoy such reading:

1. Excerpts from Epistles and Sayings. Sections 1–15 are taken from St. Athanasius's Life of St. Anthony. Instructions 16–68 are taken from the Holy Father's letters. Instructions 69–82 are taken from his 20 Sayings to Monks.

2. 170 chapters on good morality.

3. The Rule of the Hermit's Life. In volume 40 of Migne's Patrologiae graecae, on page 1065, the Praecepta Antonii are presented in 80 points. Following these are his own Spiritualia documenta regulae adjuncta and Admonitiones et documenta varia, both of which are evidently supplements to the preceding rule. Since all the sayings contained under these headings are of the same nature, both in content and in style, they are gathered together here and arranged under specific headings, following the natural course of the hermit's life, under the title "The Rule of the Hermit's Life."

4. Sayings of St. Anthony the Great and accounts about him. A large number of such sayings and accounts are included in the Dostoyapam. Tales; but in addition to these, there are others cited in the same 40th volume of the Patr. graec. and in our Alphabetical Paterikon; still others are cited by Cassian; and there are several found in various sections of patristic collections. Rather than presenting them haphazardly as they were found, they are arranged here in a certain order, similar to the preceding rules. The section begins with sayings concerning the withdrawal from the world, which marks the beginning of the ascetic life, followed by all the other sayings and stories in the order of the hermit's life.

5. Questions from the disciples and the elder's answers regarding some sayings of St. Anthony the Great.

The Instructions of St. Anthony the Great.

1. Instructions on Life in Christ, drawn from his words in the hagiography of St. Athanasius, from his 20 epistles, and from his 20 sayings

1. Let it be the common concern of all, above all else, that once we have begun, we do not grow weak or lose heart in our labors, nor say: "We have already been engaged in this struggle for a long time"; but rather, as if beginning anew each day, let us increase our zeal. A whole human life is very short compared to the ages to come, and all that we have is nothing compared to eternal life; so, whereas in this world every thing is sold for its value, and everyone exchanges like for like, the promise of eternal life is purchased for a mere trifle. For it is written: "The days of our years are seventy years; or, if by reason of strength, eighty years; yet their span is but labor and sickness" (Ps. 89:10). Thus, even if we persevere in our struggle for eighty or even a hundred years, we will not reign for a time equal to a hundred years, but instead of a hundred years, we will reign forever and ever; moreover, having striven on earth, we have the promise that our inheritance will not be on earth but in heaven; and furthermore—having laid aside this mortal body—we will receive an immortal one. Let us not lose heart, then, nor think that we have endured for a long time (in our struggle) or accomplished something great; “for the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed in us” (Rom. 8:18).

2. Likewise, when we look at the world, let us not think that we have renounced anything great, for this entire earth is very small compared to the whole of heaven. Therefore, even if we were lords over the whole earth and renounced the whole earth, even in this there would still be nothing comparable to the kingdom of heaven. For just as one who casts aside a single copper drachma to acquire a hundred drachmas of gold, so too does one who, being lord of the whole earth, renounces it—leaving behind very little, yet receiving a hundredfold in return. But if the whole earth is not equal to heaven, then one who leaves behind a few tithes leaves behind, as it were, nothing at all. Even if he were to leave behind a house and much gold as well, he should neither boast nor lose heart. On the other hand, we must consider that if we did not leave behind what we have for the sake of virtue, we would in every way, upon dying, leave it behind just as we often do—even to those to whom we would not wish to leave it, as Ecclesiastes also mentioned (Eccl. 4:8). Why, then, should we not give up these things for the sake of virtue, so that we may inherit the kingdom (of heaven) in return?

3. For this very reason, none of us should harbor a desire to acquire possessions. For what benefit is there in acquiring what we cannot take with us? Why is it better for us to acquire what we can take with us, such as: prudence, justice, chastity, courage, discernment, love, charity toward the poor, faith in Christ, patience, and hospitality? Having acquired these (virtues), we will find them awaiting us there, preparing for us a dwelling place on earth for the meek.

4. Let everyone convince himself with such thoughts not to be faint-hearted, especially if he considers that he is a servant of the Lord and is obligated to work for his Master. Just as a servant would not dare to say, “Since I worked yesterday, I will not work today”—and, reckoning the time that has passed (in labor), does not cease (to labor) in the days that follow, but every day, as it is written in the Gospel, shows the same zeal to please his master and avoid trouble—so too shall we persevere in our labors each day with patience, knowing that if we spend even one day in idleness, the Lord will not forgive us for the sake of our past labor, but will be angry with us for this idleness. Likewise, we have heard in Ezekiel (Ezek. 18:26): “When a righteous person turns away from his righteousness and commits sin and dies—he will die because of the sin he has committed.” Likewise, Judas destroyed in a single night the labor of all the time that had passed.

5. Therefore, let us set about our labors and not lose heart. For in this we have the Lord as our helper, as it is written: “God works all things together for good for those who love God” (Rom. 8:28). For this very reason—that is, so that we may not lose heart—it is good to keep in mind the following saying of the Apostle: “I die every day” (1 Cor. 15:31). For if we live as though we were dying every day, we will not sin. This saying means the following: that each day when we wake up, we should think that we will not live to see the evening, and again, as we prepare to go to sleep, we should think that we will not wake up; for just as the limit of our life is unknown by nature, so too is it unknown what measure Providence assigns to it each day. Adopting this attitude and living this way every day, we will neither sin nor lust after anything, nor be inflamed with anger toward anyone, nor store up treasures for ourselves on earth; but, as those who expect death every day, we will be unworldly and forgive everyone everything; as for the lust for a wife, or any other impure pleasure, we will not harbor it within ourselves for even a moment—but we will immediately turn away from it, as from something fleeting, remaining always in a sort of “ ” (pre-death) struggle and looking forward to the Day of Judgment. For intense fear and dread of torment destroy the pleasantness of pleasure and restore the soul that is inclined to fall.

6. Therefore, having begun (the work of salvation) and having already set out on the path of virtue, let us press on toward the goal, so that we may attain it (Phil. 3: 14), and let no one look back, like Lot’s wife, especially since the Lord said: “No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of heaven” (Luke 9:62). To look back, however, means nothing other than to regret (having left the world) and to begin once again to act according to worldly wisdom.

7. Do not be daunted when you hear of virtue, and do not be puzzled by this name. For this matter is not far from us, nor outside of us, but within us; and it is within our reach, if only we so desire. The Greeks travel to foreign lands and cross the sea to study the sciences; but we have no need to travel to foreign lands for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, nor to cross the sea for the sake of virtue: for the Lord has made this clear, saying, “The kingdom of heaven is within you” (Luke 17:21). Therefore, the only thing required for virtue is that we desire it, since it is within us and arises from us. For as soon as the rational soul is in its natural state, virtue is present within us at the same time. (The soul) is in its natural state when it remains as it was created; and it was created to be very good and righteous. This is why Joshua, when giving the commandments, said to the people, “Set your hearts right before the Lord, the God of Israel” (Josh. 24:23); and John said, “Make straight paths for the Lord” (Matt. 3:3). The soul is righteous when its reason is in its natural order. But when it strays from this and distorts the order required by nature, this is called evil in the soul. Therefore, this is not a difficult task (virtue); for if we remain as we were created, we are in a virtuous state; but if we harbor evil intentions, we are rightly called evil. If we had to acquire this virtue from outside ourselves, it would certainly be difficult; but if it is within us, then we need only guard ourselves against evil thoughts and keep our soul to the Lord, as a pledge received from Him, so that He may recognize it as His creation, seeing that it is as He created it.

8. Let us struggle (against ourselves) so that anger does not tyrannize us and lust does not rule over us; for it is written: “The anger of a man of God’s righteousness does not produce righteousness.” And: “Lust, when it has conceived, gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is fully grown, gives birth to death” (James 1:20, 15). But as we lead such a life, let us remain firmly sober, and, as it is written: “Guard your heart with all diligence” (Prov. 4:23).—For we have terrible and all-cunning enemies, the evil demons.

9. And it is against them that we wage our battle, as the Holy Apostle said: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12). There is a great multitude of them in the air surrounding us, and they are not far from us. There is also great diversity among them. But to speak of their nature and differences would take a very long time, and moreover, it is more fitting for those above us to speak of this than for us. For us, however, there is an urgent need—one that brooks no delay—to know only their schemes against us.

10. First, then, we know that demons were not created in the state that gives them their name. For God created nothing evil. They, too, were created good; but having fallen from heavenly wisdom and now circling the earth, they have deceived the Greeks with apparitions, and, envying us Christians, they set everything in motion in their desire to hinder our ascent to heaven, so that we might not ascend to the place from which they fell. Therefore, it is necessary to pray much and to strive, so that, having received from the Spirit the gift of “discernment of spirits” (1 Cor. 12:10), we may come to know concerning them which are less evil and which are more so, what task each of them is concerned with, and how each of them can be overthrown and cast out. For they have many schemes, and their slander is full of subtleties. – The Blessed Apostle and his followers knew this, saying: – “For we do not understand his thoughts” (2 Cor. 2:11). – We, too, must warn one another about the very things in which we have been tempted by them. – And so I, having myself experienced (their schemes) to some extent, speak to you about this as to children.

11. As soon as they see any Christian—and all the more so a monk—who is diligent in his labors and making progress, they first of all attempt to place temptations in his path: and their temptations are evil thoughts. – But we must not fear these suggestions of theirs; for through prayer, fasting, and faith in the Lord, the enemies are immediately cast down. However, even when cast down, they do not rest, but immediately attack again with deceit and cunning. When they are unable to deceive the heart with openly impure desires, they attack in another way, namely: they conjure up various apparitions to instill fear; for this purpose, they take on various forms and assume the likenesses of women, beasts, reptiles, giants, and multitudes of warriors. But one must not fear even such apparitions; for they are nothing—and vanish immediately as soon as one protects oneself with faith and the sign of the cross. – Nevertheless, they are bold and utterly shameless. – Why, even if they are defeated in this way, they attack in yet another manner: – they take on the appearance of soothsayers and predict what will happen in a few days; they also present themselves as exalted, so that they might not deceive anyone with their thoughts, or ensnare them even through such apparitions. But let us not listen to the demons as if they were strangers to us; let us not obey them, even if they urge us to pray, even if they speak of fasting; but let us look more closely at the goal of our asceticism—and let us not be deceived by them, who do everything with cunning. – We must not fear them, even if they seem to be attacking us, even if they threaten us with death; for they are powerless and can do nothing more than threaten.

12. We must devote all our care more to the soul than to the body, and give the body only a little time as necessary, while devoting all the rest above all to the soul and seeking its benefit, so that it may not be carried away by bodily pleasures, but rather subjugate the body to itself. This is what the Savior meant when He said: “Do not worry about your life, what you will eat, or about your body, what you will wear” (Matt.

6:25).—“And do not seek what you will eat or what you will drink; nor be proud. For all these things the Gentiles of this world seek; but your Father knows that you need them. But seek” first of all “His kingdom, and all these things will be added to you” (Luke 12:29–31).

13. Believe in the Lord and love Him; guard yourself against impure thoughts and carnal pleasures, and as it is written in Proverbs—“Do not be enticed by the fullness of the belly” (Prov. 24:15); flee vanity, praying unceasingly; sing psalms before and after sleep; study the commandments given to you in Scripture; keep the deeds of the saints in mind, so that your soul, mindful of the commandments, may take the zeal of the saints as its model. Make a special effort to follow the Apostle’s instruction: “Do not let the sun go down on your anger” (Eph. 4: 26)—and consider that this is said generally regarding every commandment, so that the sun may not set not only on our anger but also on any other sin of ours. For it is good and necessary that we not be condemned—neither by the sun for a daytime transgression, nor by the moon for a nighttime sin, nor even for an evil thought.

14. To guard oneself against this, it is good to heed and keep the Apostle’s word: “Examine yourselves” (2 Cor. 13:5). Therefore, let each person daily take stock of his or her actions, both by day and by night. And if one has sinned, let him cease from sinning; if he has not sinned, let him not boast of it, but let him continue in what is good and not give in to negligence—neither condemning his neighbor nor considering himself righteous—“until the Lord comes” (1 Cor. 4:5), who examines what is hidden. – It is not uncommon for even we ourselves to be unaware of what we do. But even though we do not know this, the Lord sees everything. – Therefore, leaving judgment to the Lord, let us be compassionate toward one another, let us “bear one another’s burdens” (Gal. 6:2), and not be too hard on ourselves; and where we fall short, let us strive to make up for it.

15. To guard ourselves against sin, let us also observe the following. Let each of you observe and record your actions and inner thoughts as if with the intention of sharing them with one another; and be assured that, out of shame at being known, we will certainly cease to sin and even to harbor anything evil in our thoughts. For who, when sinning, wants others to see it? Or who, having sinned, would not rather lie just to conceal the sin? Just as we refrain from committing adultery when we watch over one another, so too, if we write down our thoughts with the intention of sharing them with one another, we will more easily guard ourselves against impure thoughts, out of shame at being exposed. – Let writing, then, serve as the eyes of our fellow believers, so that, feeling the same shame while writing as we do when others are watching us, we will not harbor any evil thoughts. If we discipline ourselves in this way, we will be able to subdue our bodies, please the Lord, and trample the enemy’s schemes underfoot.

16. I believe that the grace of God’s Spirit fills those who wholeheartedly embark on this struggle and resolve from the very beginning to stand firm and under no circumstances yield ground to the enemy in any battle until they have defeated him. However, the Holy Spirit, who has called them, first makes everything easy for them, so as to make their entry into the struggle of repentance pleasant, and then shows them the path in all its truth (with all its difficulties). – Helping them in everything, He impresses upon them the nature of the labors of repentance and sets for them boundaries and a pattern, both in regard to the body and in regard to the soul, until He brings them to a perfect conversion to God, their Creator. – To this end, He constantly urges them to discipline both their bodies and their souls, so that, having been equally sanctified, both may become equally worthy of the inheritance of eternal life: (to discipline) the body—through constant fasting, labor, and frequent vigils; and the soul—through spiritual exercises and diligence in all acts of service (and obedience), performed through the body. We must strive to do this—that is, to do nothing carelessly, but everything with diligence and the fear of God—in every physical task we perform, if we wish for it to bear fruit.

17. Guiding the penitent on his journey, the Spirit of God, who called him to repentance, grants him His consolations and teaches him not to turn back nor to cling to anything of this world. – To this end, He opens the eyes of the soul and enables it to behold the beauty of purity attained through the labors of repentance, and thereby kindles within it a zeal for the complete purification of itself along with the body, so that both may become one in purity. – For this is the purpose of the Holy Spirit’s instructive guidance: to purify them completely and restore them to that original state in which they were before the Fall, eradicating from them everything tainted by the devil’s envy, so that nothing hostile remains within them. – Then the body will in every way submit to the commands of the mind, which will authoritatively direct it in eating and drinking, in sleep, and in every other action, constantly learning from the Holy Spirit, following the example of St. Paul the Apostle, “to put to death the body and bring it into subjection” (1 Cor. 9:27).

18. It is well known that there are three kinds of carnal movements in the body. – The first is a natural movement, inherent in the body, which, however, produces nothing (sinful, weighing on the conscience)—without the soul’s consent—but merely makes one feel that it is present in the body, – Another movement in the body arises from an excess of food and drink, when the heat of the blood generated by this stirs up strife within the body against the soul and inclines it toward impure desires. – That is why the Apostle says: “Do not get drunk with wine, for in it there is debauchery.” Likewise, the Lord commands His disciples in the Gospel: “Take heed, lest at any time your hearts be weighed down with gluttony and drunkenness” (Luke 21:34). Those who have set their hearts on attaining the full measure of holiness and purity in the monastic life, in particular, must always conduct themselves in such a way that they may say with the Apostle: “I discipline my body and bring it into subjection” (1 Cor. 9:27). The third temptation comes from evil spirits, who, out of envy, tempt people in this way and attempt to weaken those who have sought purity (monks, that is), or to lead astray those who wish to enter the gate of purity (that is, those who are only just beginning their monastic life).

19. However, if a person arms himself with patience and unwavering fidelity to the commandments that come from God, then the Holy Spirit will teach his mind how to purify his soul and body from such impulses. But if he becomes lax in his feelings and allows himself to be negligent toward the commandments and instructions he has heard, then evil spirits will begin to overcome him, will take hold of his entire body, and will defile him with that impulse to the point that his tormented soul will not know where to turn, unable, in its despair, to see from where any help might come; and only after it has come to its senses, returned to the side of the commandments, and—having accepted their yoke (or recognized the power of the obligation)—surrendered itself to the Spirit of God, is it once again filled with a saving disposition. It is then that it realizes that it must seek peace solely in God, and that only in this way is peace possible for it.

20. It is necessary to bear the labors of repentance equally and in harmony, both in soul and body, striving for perfect purity. And when the mind is granted such grace as to enter into the struggle against the passions without self-pity or leniency, then it is endowed with the promptings, guidance, and strengthening of the Spirit, through which it successfully begins to repel from the soul all impure inclinations arising from the lusts of the heart. This Spirit, uniting with the mind (or the human spirit) for the sake of the resolve to strictly fulfill the commandments that have been learned, guides it to drive away from the soul all passions—both those mingling with it from the body and those that are its own, existing within it independently of the body. It teaches him to keep his body in order—everything from head to toe: his eyes, so that they may look with purity; his ears, so that they may listen to what is peaceful and not take delight in slander, gossip, and insults;—the tongue, so that it speaks only what is good, weighing every word, and not allowing anything impure or passionate to enter into speech; the hands, so that they are moved first and foremost only for the purpose of prayer and acts of mercy and generosity; a stomach that is kept within proper limits in the consumption of food and drink, taking only what is necessary to sustain the body, and not allowing lust or gluttony to lead one beyond this measure; feet that walk upright and follow God’s will, directed toward the service of good deeds. In this way, the body becomes accustomed to every kind of good and is transformed, submitting to the power of the Holy Spirit, so that it ultimately partakes, to some extent, of those qualities of the spiritual body that it is to receive at the resurrection of the righteous.

21. The soul, as has been pointed out, has its own passions, which are: pride, hatred, envy, anger, despondency, and others like them. When the soul surrenders itself to God with all its strength, then the All-Merciful God grants it the spirit of true repentance and purifies it from all these passions, teaching it not to follow them and giving it the strength to overcome them and to triumph over the enemies who ceaselessly place obstacles in its path, striving through temptations to snatch it back to themselves. And if she remains steadfast in her conversion and in her willing obedience to the Holy Spirit, who teaches her repentance, then the merciful Creator will have compassion on her, for the sake of her labors—endured with every hardship and need—in long fasts, frequent vigils, and instruction in the Word of God, in unceasing prayer, in renunciation of all worldly pleasures, in serving all with a pure heart, in humility and poverty of spirit—if she remains steadfast in all this, the All-Generous One, looking upon her with a merciful eye, will deliver her from all temptations and rescue her from the hands of her enemies by His mercy.

22. God the Father, in His goodness, “did not spare” (Rom. 8:32) His only-begotten Son, but delivered Him up to save us from our sins and iniquities. And the Son of God, having humbled Himself for our sake, healed us of our spiritual infirmities and provided for our salvation from our sins, I therefore urge you, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to know and always keep in mind this great work of God—namely, that God the Word, for our sake, became like us in every way except sin. It is fitting, then, for those who are endowed with reason to understand this wisely, striving earnestly to become truly free (from sin) through the power of the Lord’s coming to us. Those who have made proper use of this arrangement are His servants. But this title is not yet perfection. Perfection leads to sonship—and is sanctification, which comes in its own time. Thus, when our Lord Jesus Christ, seeing that His disciples had already attained sonship and had come to know Him Himself, having been taught by the Holy Spirit, said to them: “I no longer call you servants, but friends and brothers, for I have told you everything I heard from the Father” (John 15:15). And those who realized what they had become in Christ Jesus raised their voices, saying: “We have not received a spirit of slavery to fall back into fear, but the Spirit of adoption, by whom we cry out, ‘Abba, Father’” (Romans 8:15). Whoever does not show complete and earnest readiness to rise up (from sin) should know that the coming of the Lord and Savior will be a judgment against him. For even at the beginning, Simeon sang: “Behold, this Child is set for the fall and rising of many in Israel, and for a sign that will be spoken against” (Luke 2:34). And later the Apostles proclaimed: “For to one we are the smell of death leading to death, and to another the smell of life leading to life” (2 Cor. 2:16).

23. It is no secret to you that the enemies of the truth are constantly striving to destroy the truth. But God has always visited His creation, from the very beginning of the world, and has taught those who approached their Creator with all their hearts how to honor Him. But when, due to the passions of the flesh and the malice of the enemies who fight against us, the good aspirations of the soul lost their strength, and people could not even comprehend what is proper to them by their very nature and purpose—let alone rid themselves of sins in order to restore themselves to their original state— then God showed them mercy and taught them true worship of God through the written law. When even this did not help, God, seeing that the wound was spreading and required decisive healing, determined to send His Only-Begotten Son, Who is our sole Healer.

24. Overcome by love for Jesus Christ, as I look upon our times, I experience at times joy, at times lamentation and weeping. Very many among our people have clothed themselves in the garment of piety (the monastic habit). But only some of them did so with all their heart and were deemed worthy to receive the salvation brought by the coming of the Lord Jesus. And these are the ones for whom I rejoice. Others, however, having despised the power of their vow, act according to the will of the flesh and the inclinations of their hearts—whereby the coming of the Lord has become a condemnation to them. And these are the ones for whom I lament. Still others, finally, thinking of the length of time required for their struggle, have lost heart; therefore, they have cast off the garment of godliness and have become, as it were, speechless. And these are the ones for whom I weep, since the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ has become a condemnation to them.

25. I pray earnestly to God for you, that He may kindle in your hearts the fire that our Lord Jesus Christ came to bring to the earth (Luke 12:49), so that you may rightly govern your intentions and feelings and distinguish good from evil.

26. When the wind blows steadily, any sailor may think highly of himself and boast; but it is only when the winds suddenly change that the skill of experienced helmsmen becomes apparent.

27. Whoever fears the Lord and keeps His commandments is a servant of God. But this servitude, in which we too find ourselves, is not slavery, but righteousness that leads to sonship. Our Lord chose the Apostles and entrusted them with the Gospel message. The commandments they gave us have established for us a glorious servitude, so that we may rule over all our passions and perform the glorious service of virtue. But when we draw nearer to grace, our Lord Jesus Christ will say to us as He said to His Apostles: “I no longer call you servants, but My friends and brothers; for everything that I have heard from My Father, I have told you” (John 15:15). Those who have drawn near to grace come to know through experience the movements of the Holy Spirit and come to understand their own spiritual constitution; and having understood and come to know this, they cry out, saying: “We have not received a spirit of slavery to fall back into fear, but a spirit of adoption as sons, by which we cry out, ‘Abba, Father!’” (Rom. 8:15).

28. God guides everyone through the workings of His grace. Therefore, do not be slothful or lose heart, but cry out to God day and night, imploring the goodness of God the Father to send you help from above so that you may know how to act. Do not let “your eyes sleep nor your eyelids slumber” (Ps. 131: 4), but be zealous to offer yourselves as a pure sacrifice to God, so that you may see Him; for without purity no one can see God (Heb. 12: 14), as the Apostle says.

29. All the saints, when they see that we are lazy and negligent, grieve, weep, and lament; but when they see that we are becoming upright and growing in perfection, they rejoice, and in joy and gladness many of them ceaselessly pour out prayers for us to the Creator. And the Lord is then comforted by our good deeds, as well as by the testimonies and prayers of the saints—and He bestows upon us all manner of gifts.

30. Whoever does not wholeheartedly hate what is characteristic of material and earthly flesh, along with all its movements and actions—and whose mind is not stirred by sorrow toward the Father of all—cannot attain salvation. But whoever does this, our Lord will have mercy on his labors and grant him an invisible and incorporeal fire, which will consume all the passions within him and completely purify his mind. Then the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ will dwell within him and remain with him, teaching him to worship the Father as is fitting. But as long as we indulge in our material flesh, we remain enemies of God, His angels, and all the saints. I therefore implore you in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: do not be careless about your life and your salvation, and do not allow this fleeting moment to rob you of eternity, which has no end, nor this fleshly body to deprive you of the kingdom of the lights, which is boundless and beyond words. Truly, my soul is troubled and my spirit is numb because, although we have been given the freedom to choose and to do the works of the saints, we, intoxicated by passions as if drunk with wine, do not wish to lift our minds on high to seek the higher glory; we do not wish to imitate the deeds of the saints or follow in their footsteps, so that, having become heirs to their deeds, we might receive with them the eternal inheritance.

31. You have been granted great blessings, having received the grace that dwells within you. You must, however, strive diligently for the sake of the One who is “the Dawn from on high” who has “visited” you (Luke 1:78), so that you may become a holy and blameless sacrifice to Him. We know how our nature fell from its heights into the depths of humiliation and poverty, and how the merciful God visited it with His laws through the hands of Moses and the other prophets; but in recent times He has done so through His Only-Begotten Son, Who is the supreme Head of our high priests and our true Physician, the One alone who is powerful enough to heal our infirmities, and Who took on our flesh and gave Himself up for us and for our sins; by His death we are saved. Therefore, ponder and carefully examine the decrees of our Creator and His visitations to us, both in our outer and inner selves, after we—though we were once rational—became irrational because of our inclination toward the will of the enemy, the evildoer, the father of lies.

32. How many myriads of evil demons there are, and how innumerable are the kinds of their wiles! Even after seeing that we, having come to recognize our passions and our shame, are already striving to avoid the evil deeds to which they lead us, and do not incline our ears to the evil counsel they instill in us—they have not desisted, but have set to work with desperate effort, knowing that their fate has already been definitively sealed and that their inheritance is hell, because of their extreme malice and aversion (to God). May the Lord open the eyes of your hearts, so that you may see how numerous are the schemes of the demons and how much evil they cause us every day—and may He grant you a vigilant heart and a spirit of discernment, so that you may offer yourselves as a living and blameless sacrifice to God, guarding against the envy of the demons at all times and their evil counsel, their hidden schemes and veiled malice, their deceptive lies and blasphemous thoughts, their subtle suggestions which they plant in our hearts every day, the anger and slander to which they incite us, so that we may slander one another while justifying only ourselves, while condemning others so that they may slander one another, or, speaking with a sweet tongue, hide bitterness in our hearts, so that they may condemn the outward appearance of their neighbor while harboring a predator within themselves, so that they may quarrel among themselves and go against one another, in the desire to have their own way and appear the most righteous. Every person who delights in sinful thoughts falls of his own accord when he takes pleasure in (sympathizes with) what is instilled in him by his enemies, and when he seeks to justify himself only by outward deeds, while inwardly serving as a dwelling place for an evil spirit that teaches him every kind of evil. The body of such a person will be filled with shameful disgrace—for whoever is like this is overcome by demonic passions, which he does not drive away from himself. Demons are not visible bodies; but we become bodies for them when our souls accept dark thoughts from them; for, having accepted these thoughts, we accept the demons themselves, and make them manifest in the body.

33. The rational and immortal nature is hidden within our mortal body so that it may reveal its workings in and through it. Therefore, having made this body an altar of incense, offer upon it all your thoughts and your evil counsels, and, placing them before the face of the Lord, lift yourselves up to Him with heart and mind, imploring Him to send down upon you from on high His incorporeal fire, which will consume all that lies upon this altar and purify it. And your enemies, the priests of Baal, will tremble and perish by your hands, just as they did by the hands of the Prophet Elijah (1 Kings 18:25 ff.). Then you will see a man emerging from the Divine waters, who will cause a spiritual rain to fall upon you—that is, the sprinkling of the Spirit of the Comforter.

34. The devil, who fell from his heavenly rank because of pride, ceaselessly strives to lead into ruin all those who wholeheartedly desire to draw near to the Lord—by the very same path by which he himself fell, that is, through pride and love of vain glory. It is with these things that the demons fight against us; it is through these and other similar means that they seek to distance us from God. Moreover, knowing that whoever loves his brother also loves God, they instill hatred toward one another in our hearts—to the point that some cannot even bear to look at their brother or speak a word to him. Many truly great people have undertaken the labor of virtue, but through their own lack of understanding have ruined themselves. It would not be surprising for this to happen among you as well, if, for example, having grown cold toward good works, you come to think that you possess virtue within yourselves. For you have already fallen into this devilish disease (conceit), thinking that you are close to God and dwell in the light, when in reality you are in darkness. What prompted our Lord Jesus Christ to lay aside His garments, gird His loins with a towel, and, having poured water into a basin (John 13:4 ff.), wash the feet of those beneath Him, if not to teach us humility? Yes—He illustrated this to us by the example of what He did then. And indeed, all who wish to be accepted into the first rank can achieve this only through humility; for in the beginning, it was pride that cast him out of heaven. Therefore, unless a person possesses the utmost humility—humility with all his heart, all his mind, all his spirit, all his soul, and all his body—he will not inherit the Kingdom of God.

35. If we sincerely desire to draw near to our Creator, we must strive to free our souls from passions, in accordance with the spiritual law. For because of our evil deeds, our indulgence in passions, and the multitude of devilish temptations, our intellectual power has weakened, and the good impulses of our souls have ceased; we can no longer perceive the beauty (and demands) of our spiritual nature because of the passions into which we fall; and there is no salvation for us from anyone except our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Apostle Paul wrote: “Just as in Adam all die, so in Christ all will be made alive” (1 Cor. 15:22). Our Lord Jesus Christ is the life of all rational creatures, created in His image.

36. We are called by the names of the saints and clothed in their garments, of which we boast before the unbelievers; yet we lack the zeal to imitate their deeds. I fear that the words of the Apostle might apply to us: “Having a form of godliness, but denying its power” (2 Tim. 3:5). May the Lord grant you to understand what the life you have embraced truly is, so that by acting in its spirit, you may become worthy to receive the invisible inheritance; to do, to the best of our ability, our deeds in accordance with the Lord’s will—this is what we must do! For this is proper to our nature, and nothing more should be demanded of our virtue. —Whoever serves God and seeks Him with all his heart acts in accordance with his nature; but whoever commits any sin is worthy of rebuke and punishment, because this is foreign to his nature.

37. Ever since my Lord, by His grace, awakened my mind from its mortal slumber, my weeping has been excessive and my sighing inconsolable. I ask myself: What can we give the Lord in return for all that He has done for us? He has commanded His angels to serve us, the prophets to prophesy— —and the apostles to proclaim the Gospel. But above all this, He sent His Only-Begotten Son for our salvation. Therefore, stir up your hearts to the fear of God. Know that John the Baptist and Forerunner baptized with water for repentance, in preparation for the baptism of our Lord Jesus Christ, who baptizes with the Holy Spirit and with fire—which is the fire of zeal for good deeds. Let us, then, show eager readiness to purify ourselves in body and spirit, and, having received the baptism of our Lord Jesus Christ, let us be zealous for good deeds, so that we may offer ourselves to Him as a pleasing sacrifice. The Spirit of the Comforter, received in baptism, gives us the strength to act in a holy manner, so that He may restore us to our former glorious state and make us worthy to receive an everlasting inheritance. Know that those who are baptized into Christ are clothed with Christ, as the Apostle says (Gal. 3: 27, 28)—receiving the grace of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, whether slave or free, man or woman, as soon as they receive this grace, these bodily distinctions immediately cease to have any power over them. And the Holy Spirit, at the very moment He becomes for them the pledge of their inheritance in the eternal kingdom of heaven, teaches them how to worship the Father in spirit and truth (John 4:23).

38. I have prayed for you, that you too may receive that great Spirit of fire which I have received. If you wish to receive Him so that He may dwell within you, first offer up bodily labors and humility of heart, and, lifting your thoughts to heaven day and night, seek this fiery Spirit with a righteous heart—and He will be given to you. In this way, Elijah the Tishbite and Elisha, along with the other prophets, received Him. Whoever cultivates himself through this cultivation (the feats described) will be given this Spirit forever and ever. Remain in prayer with fervent seeking from the depths of your hearts—and it will be given to you. For that Spirit dwells in righteous hearts. And when He is received, He will reveal to you the highest mysteries; He will drive away from you the fear of people and beasts—and you will have heavenly joy day and night; and you will be in this body like those who are already in the kingdom (of heaven).

39. If a person desires to attain God's love, he must have the fear of God; and fear gives birth to weeping, and weeping gives birth to courage. When all this matures in the soul, it will begin to bear fruit in everything. And God, beholding these beautiful fruits in the soul, draws it to Himself, as the fragrance of chosen incense; He rejoices over it with the Angels at all times, filling it with joy, and guards it on all its paths, so that it may safely reach its place of rest. Then the devil does not attack her, seeing the Most High Guardian surrounding her; indeed, he is afraid even to approach her at all, because of this great power. Acquire this power for yourselves, so that the demons may fear you, so that the labors you undertake may be made easier for you, and so that the Divine may be sweet to you. This sweetness of divine love is far sweeter than a honeycomb. Many of the monks and virgins living in communities, having not tasted this sweetness of divine love in the least, and having not received divine strength, thought they already possessed it; but since they made no effort to acquire it, God did not grant it to them. Whoever strives to acquire it will surely attain it by God's grace; for with God there is no partiality. When a person, desiring to have within himself the light of God and His strength, despises the reproaches of this world as well as its honors, hates all that is worldly and the repose of the body, and purifies his heart of all evil thoughts, ceaselessly offering to God fasting and tears day and night, as well as pure prayers, then God bestows that strength upon him. Strive to acquire such strength—and you will accomplish all your deeds calmly and easily, gain great boldness before God, and He will grant all your requests.

40. God hears those who love Him and seek Him with all their hearts, and He grants them all their requests. But He does not hear the requests of those who do not approach Him with all their heart, but are double-minded, and who, whatever they do, do so to gain human glory and praise—rather, He is angry with them; for their deeds are done for show. And the words of the Psalm are fulfilled in them, which say: "God has scattered the bones of those who seek to please men" (Ps. 52:6). For this reason, the power of God does not work in them—since they are not steadfast in heart in all the deeds they undertake. And they do not know divine sweetness, its gentleness and joy. There are many among us who have not received that power which brings sweetness to the soul, fills it day by day with ever-increasing joy and gladness, and kindles divine warmth within it. They are deceived by the evil spirit because they perform their deeds for show before others. But you, bringing the fruits of your labors before the Lord, strive to turn away from the spirit of vanity, and wage unceasing battle against it, so that the Lord may accept the fruits you bring before Him and bestow upon you the strength given to His chosen ones. Do not cease to resist this evil spirit; for when a person sets out to perform good deeds and undertake noble endeavors, this spirit rushes in to share in his efforts—or to divert him entirely from such undertakings. It cannot bear to see anyone act righteously and opposes all who desire to be faithful to the Lord. He prevents many from attaining virtue altogether, while with others he interferes with their deeds and destroys their fruits, teaching them to practice virtue and perform acts of mercy while mixing vanity into them. People think such individuals are enriched by these fruits, whereas they possess none at all—and they resemble a fig tree that, when viewed from afar, was thought to bear many sweet fruits; but upon drawing nearer, nothing was found on it. God withers them because He finds no good fruit on them, and not merely because He deprives them of the incomparable sweetness of His Divinity. But you, having embarked on this spiritual struggle, strive to resist the spirit of vanity—oppose it and overcome it. The power of God will come, bring you help, and remain with you, and at all times will bestow upon you zeal and warmth, which are more precious than anything else. If any of you find that you are not endowed with this warmth, let him strive to seek it—and it will come to the one who seeks it. It is like a fire that people, when they wish to boil a little oil on it, fan until it blazes; and once it blazes, it draws on its natural power and boils, rising upward and burning. Likewise, when you see that your souls are growing cold due to neglect and laziness, hasten to rekindle them by shedding tears over them. Without a doubt, that fire will come and unite with your souls—and those who have acquired it will boil over with good deeds. Take David, for example—when he noticed that his soul had grown heavy and cold, he said: “I recall the days of old; I meditate on all Your works; I ponder the works of Your hand. I lift up my hands to You, and my soul, like a parched land, longs for You” (Ps. 142: 5, 6). You see—when David’s heart grew heavy, he was deeply troubled by it until the fire in his heart was kindled anew, to the point that he cried out: “My heart is ready, O God; my heart is ready” (Ps. 107: 2). And he was restored to his former state through this constant care and concern. Do the same, and may you be of one mind in preparing your hearts, with the help of divine light and fire.

41. Pray—may God grant you the grace to see and understand everything clearly, so that you may faithfully discern what is good and what is evil. It is written in the Epistle of the Apostle Paul that “solid food is for the mature” (Heb. 5:14). These are the ones who, through long and diligent effort, have trained their senses and intentions regarding good and evil, have become sons of the kingdom, and have been adopted as children of God. And God has granted them wisdom and discernment in all their deeds, so that neither man nor the devil may deceive them. You must know that the enemy tempts the faithful with the appearance of good, and succeeds in deceiving many because they lack discernment and wisdom. Therefore, when the blessed Paul came to know these riches of the mind—which are destined for the faithful and whose greatness knows no bounds—he wrote to the Ephesians: “May God grant you a spirit of wisdom and revelation, enlightening the eyes of your heart, so that you may know what is the hope to which He has called you, what are the riches of the glory of His inheritance, and what is the immeasurable greatness of His glory toward the saints” (Eph. 1:17–18). He did this out of his boundless love for them, knowing that if they attained this, nothing would be difficult for them, and they would fear nothing; rather, the joy of the Lord would comfort them day and night, and their labors would be sweet to them at all times. Many of the monks and virgins living in monastic communities do not attain this level. And you, if you wish to attain this level—which is the pinnacle of perfection—turn away from all those who bear such titles, that is, monasticism and virginity, yet lack clear insight and discernment; for if you associate with them, they will not allow you to prosper, but will even extinguish your zeal, because there is no zeal in them, only coldness, since they follow their own desires. Therefore, if they come to you and engage you in worldly conversation, in accordance with their own desires, do not consent to it. For it is written by the Apostle Paul: “Do not quench the Spirit; do not despise prophecies” (1 Thess. 5:19–20). Know that nothing quenches the Spirit as much as idle chatter.

42. In every rational creature—whether man or woman—there is an organ of love, by which they are able to embrace both the divine and the human. Those who are of God (spiritual) love the divine; those who are carnal love the carnal. Those who love the divine purify their hearts of all impurities and the deeds of this passing world; they hate the world and their own souls, and, bearing their cross, follow the Lord, acting in all things according to His will. That is why God dwells within them and grants them sweetness and joy, which nourish, satisfy, and renew their souls. Just as trees cannot grow unless they are watered with natural water, so too the soul cannot grow unless it receives heavenly sweetness. Only those souls that have received the Spirit and are filled with heavenly sweetness grow.

43. Confess that you are sinners, and mourn over all the wrongs you have committed through your negligence. For this, the Lord’s favor will be with you and will work within you; for He is good and forgives the sins of all who turn to Him, whoever they may be, so that He will no longer remember them. However, He wants those (who have been forgiven) to remember the forgiveness of their sins committed thus far, so that, by not forgetting this, they may avoid doing anything in their conduct that would compel them to give an account even for those sins that have already been forgiven,—as happened to the servant whose master had forgiven him the entire debt he owed. For when, having forgotten this mercy, he treated his fellow servant unjustly, his master demanded from him the entire debt that had been forgiven him,—because he had not shown mercy to his fellow servant and had not forgiven him the hundred denarii—a sum that was insignificant compared to the one that had been forgiven him (Matt. 18:23, etc.). Let us consider the Prophet David. When, after he had sinned with Uriah’s wife, the Prophet Nathan rebuked him for this and for what he had done to her husband—he, having heard the rebuke, immediately repented and humbled himself. Why did the prophet Nathan tell him, “God has already forgiven your sins” (2 Sam. 12:13)? But David, having received forgiveness of his sins, did not forget them, and he passed down the memory of them to future generations. This was done as a memorial for all generations, from generation to generation. “I will teach the wicked Your ways” (Ps. 50:15), he says, so that all sinners might learn from his example, repent of their sins as he did, and, once forgiven, not forget them but always remember them. God Himself said something similar through the prophet Isaiah: "I am the one who blots out your sins, and I will not remember them. But you, remember them" (Isaiah 43:25–26). He also said through the prophet Jeremiah, "Turn to Me, O house of Israel, ... and I will not set My face against you, for I am merciful, and I will not be angry with you forever. But consider your iniquity, for you have transgressed against the Lord your God and have perverted your ways" (Jer. 3:12–13). Thus, when the Lord forgives our sins, we must not forgive them ourselves, but always remember them by renewing our repentance for them.

44. Spiritual asceticism is glorious, but it has many enemies. Whoever wishes to be perfect in it must not be enslaved to anything evil. Whoever is enslaved to anything evil is far from the goal of perfection.

45. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in His unfathomable humility, veiled His Divinity with His humanity, so that all regarded Him as a man, whereas He was not merely a man, but God incarnate, as it is written: "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us" (John 1:14). However, the Lord did not cease to be God through His incarnation, which was necessary for Him to bring about our salvation.

46. Many, in their foolishness, say: "We, too, have seen the Lord Jesus Christ, just as the Apostles did"; yet they are deluded and deceived, and they do not have eyes to see the Lord as the Apostles saw Him. The Apostle Paul saw the Lord just as the Apostles saw Him—those who were with Him and who believed in Him at the time when He walked the earth, surrounded by crowds who regarded Him as merely a man. When the woman with the issue of blood, seeing Him with the eyes of her heart, believed that He was God and touched the hem of His garment in faith—she was immediately healed. He asked, "Who touched Me?"—not because He did not know, but because He wanted to reveal her faith. Although the Apostle Peter said, "The crowd is pressing against You, and yet You ask, 'Who touched Me?'" she herself came forward and confessed how she had been healed. Then the Lord said to her, "Go—your faith has saved you" (Luke 8:45–48). Pilate, Annas, and Caiaphas also saw the Lord, but like the rest of the crowd, they looked at Him without faith—unlike the way the Apostles looked at Him—which is why they derived no benefit from seeing Him. But the Apostle Paul saw Him with the eyes of his heart and through his most steadfast faith, just as the woman with the issue of blood saw Him—she touched Him in faith and was healed.

47. When the kingdom of sin ceases within a person, then God appears to the soul and purifies it along with the body. But if the kingdom of sin dwells in the body, a person cannot see God, for his soul is within the body, and there is no room in it for the light that is the vision of God. David says: "In Your light we see light" (Ps. 35: 10). What, then, is this light in which a person sees the light? It is the light mentioned by our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel—that is, that the whole person may be full of light, and that there be no part of him that is dark (Luke 11: 36). The Lord also said: "No one knows the Father except the Son, and whoever the Son chooses to reveal Him to" (Matt. 11:27). But the Son does not reveal His Father to the sons of darkness, but to those who abide in the light and are sons of light, whose eyes of the heart He has enlightened with the knowledge of His commandments.

48. It is written in the Psalm: "I will go to the place of the wonderful dwelling, even to the house of God" (Ps. 41: 5). This "I will go" signifies further progress and points to the soul's perfect maturity; for here it has already drawn near to God, whereas before its path was still very far from God. Let us not be surprised that our path is very distant, for we are still in spiritual infancy. We see that even the great Prophet Elijah was told: "Arise, eat, drink, and be strengthened; for your journey is still long" (1 Kings 19:7), (and he was on his way to the vision of God). David also spoke of this very same length of the journey: "Who will give me wings like the depths, that I may fly away and rest?" (Ps. 54:7). That is why this path must be traveled not with carelessness, laxity, or laziness, but with attention and zeal. Paul, the teacher of the universe, advises us, "Run in such a way that you may win"—and he adds: "I discipline my body and bring it into subjection" (1 Cor. 9:27). Let us therefore run while we still have time in this body, so that we may attain perfection, just as St. Paul himself did, who says: "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith; now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness" (2 Tim. 4:7–8).

49. Just as the body, while the soul dwells within it, passes through three stages—namely, youth, maturity, and old age—so too does the soul, hidden within the body, pass through three stages: the beginning of faith, growth in faith, and perfection. In the first stage, when the soul begins to believe, it is born again in Christ, as is stated in the Gospel. St. John the Apostle gave us the signs of this new birth, as well as of the middle stage and of perfection, when he said: "I wrote to you, young men; I wrote to you, children; I have written to you, fathers" (1 John 2:12–14). He wrote this not to his earthly friends, but to believers, describing the three stages that those striving toward the spiritual realm go through in order to attain perfection and be made worthy of full grace.

50. He who loves the spiritual life must imitate Joseph's purity and self-control; he must begin to discipline himself through contemplation and arm himself against all evil desires, which are strengthened by the support of the cunning enemy, speaking of him in the words of Job: "For his strength is in his loins, and his power is in the belly of his womb" (Ch. 40:11). Therefore, everyone who strives and arms himself against these carnal desires—which are usually aroused by excessive food and drink—must gird his loins with strict self-restraint in order to stand firm in purity. It is written that the Angel who wrestled with Jacob gripped the sinew of his thigh tightly, causing his flesh to wither and weaken, and he was named Israel, that is, "he who sees God" (Gen. 32:25, 32). In the same way, we too must cause our bodies to wither in order to put to death and extinguish lust. For the withering of the flesh enables us to attain perfection in the virtue of purity. The soul is strong when the body is exhausted. Therefore, let us refine our bodies so that we may have the strength to keep ourselves in order; for if we subdue the body and subject it to the soul, then carnal thoughts—the love of which is enmity against God—will be put to death through the mortification of the flesh. Then the soul will be enlightened and become a temple to God. Whoever strives to be pure in all his members is a truly spiritual ascetic. And he is the one who has trained all his senses, not allowing them to rule over him, but restraining them and subjecting them to the yoke of the Lord through great purity. He does not allow his eyes to see anything evil, or to gaze with lust upon women; he does not allow his ears to hear gossip, or the devil's counsel, or the thoughts instilled by the devil; he seals his lips and does not give his tongue free rein to speak idle words; he extends his hands to perform noble deeds of mercy and assistance; his feet are swift to fulfill the Lord's words: "If anyone forces you to go one mile, go with him two" (Matt. 5:41); he keeps his belly and chest in check so that he does not fall because of them or begin to crawl on the ground, like a serpent crawling on its belly and chest. Such, brothers, is the way of life of an ascetic.

51. Anyone who desires to be a truly spiritual ascetic must strive to keep himself aloof from the noisy crowd and not draw near to it, so that he may remain—in body, heart, and mind—free from the turmoil and turmoil of the world; for where there are people, there is turmoil. Our Lord showed us an example of withdrawal from people and solitude when He went up alone to the mountain to pray. In the wilderness, too, He defeated the devil, who dared to engage Him in battle. Of course, He was not powerless to defeat him even in the midst of a crowd; but He did so to teach us that in solitude and silence we can more easily defeat the enemy and attain perfection. Likewise, the Lord did not reveal His glory to His disciples in the midst of people, but led them up the mountain, and there He revealed His glory to them. John the Baptist, too, was in the wilderness until the day of his appearance before Israel. In the world, it is easier for the enemy to oppress us with his weapons, both external and internal; there, by drawing certain people to himself as accomplices and henchmen who are obedient to him, he wages war against the faithful through them: some shameless woman can be a very powerful weapon for him, spreading her deceptive nets far and wide. When Ezekiel saw the four living creatures, each with four faces, all revealing the glory of God, he was not in a city or a village, but outside—in the field; for God had said to him, "Go out into the field, and you will see My glory" (Ezek. 3:22). In general, visions and revelations of this kind were revealed to the saints only on mountains and in deserts. The prophet Jeremiah, too, knowing how much God values solitude, said: "It is good for a man to take the yoke upon himself in his youth, to sit alone and be silent" (Lamentations 3:27–28). He, too, knowing full well how much harm human gossip brings to those who wish to please God, could not help but say: "Who will give me a final refuge in the wilderness, that I may leave my people and depart from them?" (Jer. 9:2). Likewise, the prophet Elijah was granted food by angels; and this did not happen amid a crowd of people, nor in a city or village, but in the wilderness. All these and similar events that happened to the saints are recorded to persuade us to imitate those who loved solitude, because it can lead us to the Lord as well. Therefore, strive to establish yourselves in it as you ought, so that it may lead you to the vision of God, which is the most spiritual contemplation.

52. I also want to tell you what a soul into which the fire of God has entered is like. It is like a two-winged bird soaring high through the heavenly air. Of all creatures, only birds possess wings as their distinctive feature; and the wings of the soul that obeys God are the impetus of God's fire, by which it can soar upward toward heaven. But if it is deprived of these wings, it will be unable to rise upward, as it is unpartaking of that fire that lifts it up, and will become like a bird deprived of its wings, which can no longer fly. Furthermore, the human soul resembles a bird in that warmth is the cause of a bird's coming into being:

for if a bird does not warm (incubate) its eggs, living chicks will not hatch from them, because they cannot be brought to life except through warmth. In the same way, God, embracing and warming the souls that are submissive to Him, stirs them to spiritual life. Having thus understood that the soul, clinging to God and submissive to Him, is like a bird whose source of existence is warmth—do not allow yourselves to be deprived of the power of this fire. Know that because of this fire, which God has given you, the devil has prepared many trials for you in order to deprive you of it; for he knows full well that as long as this fire burns within you, he cannot overcome you.

53. Resist the devil and strive to discern his wiles. He usually hides his bitterness under the guise of sweetness so as not to be exposed, and devises various illusions that appear attractive—but which, in reality, are quite the opposite—in order to seduce your hearts with a cunning imitation of the truth, which is truly appealing: all his craft is directed toward this: to oppose with all his might every soul that serves God faithfully. He instills many and varied passions into the soul to extinguish within it the divine fire, in which all strength lies; in particular, he seizes upon the repose of the body and all that is connected with it. But when he finally sees that they guard against all such things and accept nothing from him, and give him no hope that they will ever listen to him—he withdraws from them in shame. Then the Spirit of God takes up residence in them. And when the Spirit of God dwells within them, He grants them peace—or allows them to experience peace in all their deeds—and makes the bearing of God’s yoke sweet to them, as it is written in the Gospel: “You will find rest for your souls” (Matt. 11:29), even though they have taken upon themselves and bear His yoke. Then they become tireless, both in the practice of virtue and in the fulfillment of obedience and in night vigils; they do not become angry at human slander, and they fear no one—neither man, nor beast, nor spirit—because the joy of the Lord abides with them day and night, enlivening their minds and nourishing them. Through this joy, the soul grows and becomes fit for all things, or perfect, and through it ascends to heaven.

54. We see that a child grows, first by receiving its mother’s milk, then some other kind of food, and finally all the kinds of food that people usually eat. Thus it becomes strong, matures, and its heart boldly faces enemies if they seek to attack it. But if some illness seizes it in childhood, its nourishment and strengthening are not successful; it grows up weak, and every enemy overpowers and defeats it. In order for it to become healthy and gain the strength to overcome enemies, it must seek the help and care of an experienced physician. So too is the human soul: if it lacks the joy of God, it becomes weak and sustains many wounds. If it strives to find a person—a servant of God skilled in spiritual healing—and clings to him, he will first heal it of its passions, then revive it and teach it how, with God’s help, to obtain that joy which is its nourishment. Only then will she resist her enemies—who are evil spirits—and overcome them, trample their counsel underfoot, and rejoice with even greater joy.

55. Beware of the counsel of the evil devil when he comes in the guise of one who speaks the truth, to deceive you and lead you astray. Even if he were to come to you in the form of a bright angel, do not believe him or listen to him; for he usually enchants the faithful with the alluring appearance of the Truth. The imperfect do not know these wiles of the devil, nor what he constantly instills in them; but the perfect know, as the Apostle says: “But solid food is for the perfect, those whose senses have been trained by long instruction to discern good and evil” (Heb. 5:14). The enemy cannot deceive these; but the faithful, who pay little attention to themselves, he easily entices with his seemingly sweet bait, and catches them, just as a fisherman catches a fish by covering the hook with bait. The fish does not know that the hook is concealed by this bait; therefore, it swims up, swallows the bait, and is immediately caught. If the fish knew that it would be caught by this bait, it would undoubtedly not approach it but would flee from it. In the same way, as we have said, imperfect believers are caught by the enemy for reasons that are entirely similar, as Solomon says: “There is a way that seems right to a man, but its end leads to the depths of hell” (Prov. 16:25); it is also written in the Prophet Amos: “What do you see, Amos?” He replied: “A birdcatcher’s snare” (8:2). Fearing capture on the ground, the bird flies through the air and builds its nest—for rest and sleep—in the highest places: there it sleeps carefree, knowing that no one can reach or catch it. But we know how the birdcatcher manages to deceive it: he comes to that spot, spreads out his nets, and scatters seeds in plain sight; with this food he lures the bird down from that height, and it flies down and falls into the trap. The devil acts in a similar way, ensnaring imperfect Christians with his wiles and casting them down from their heights. This is how he acted when he disguised himself as a serpent and said to Eve: “You will not surely die... but on the very day you eat of it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God” (Gen. 3:4, 5). Upon hearing these words, Eve was drawn to him in her heart and thought there was truth in them, because she did not judge the matter properly.

But when she tasted it herself and gave some to Adam, then that great misfortune befell them: they both fell from their exalted state. In the same way, the devil acts toward imperfect Christians when, not knowing how to distinguish good from evil, they follow their inclinations, content with their own judgment and opinion; when they do not consult their perfect spiritual fathers, who know how to distinguish good from evil with certainty, but instead follow the desires of their own hearts, thinking that they themselves have already attained perfection and received the blessing of their fathers. Such people are like birds that built their nests high up but flew down to the ground, fell into the birdcatcher's net, and were caught. Something similar happens to them because, in their self-confidence, they always act according to the promptings of their hearts and fulfill their desires, without listening to their fathers or consulting with them. Therefore, the devil arranges visions and apparitions for them and inflates their hearts with pride; sometimes he gives them dreams at night, which he fulfills for them during the day, so as to plunge them deeper into delusion. Not content with this, he sometimes shows them light at night, so that the place where they are becomes bright; and he does many things of this kind, even as if they were signs. He does all this so that they may remain at ease regarding him, thinking that he is an angel, and accept him. As soon as they accept him in this sense, he casts them down from their heights because of the spirit of pride that takes hold of them. He strives to keep them convinced that they have become great and glorious in spirit, surpassing many others, and have no need to turn to their fathers or listen to them. Yet, according to Scripture, they are indeed brilliant clusters of grapes, but unripe and tart. The fathers' instruction is burdensome to them, for they are convinced that they already know everything themselves.

56. Know for certain that you cannot prosper, grow, or become perfect, nor will you be able to distinguish rightly between good and evil, unless you obey your fathers. Our fathers themselves acted in this way: they obeyed their fathers and listened to their instruction; and because of this, they prospered, matured, and became teachers themselves, as it is written in the Wisdom of Sirach: "Do not depart from the teaching of the elders, for they have learned it from their fathers; for from them you will learn wisdom, and in due time you will be able to give an answer" (Sir. 8:11–12). Therefore, you must imitate those who were obedient to their fathers and obeyed them in everything, and whom their fathers, with God's help, taught everything they themselves had learned from their own fathers and passed on to their obedient sons. Thus, Isaac obeyed Abraham; Jacob—Isaac; Joseph obeyed Jacob; Elisha obeyed Elijah; Paul obeyed Ananias; Timothy obeyed Paul. All these and others like them obeyed their fathers, carried out their will, and followed their counsel; and thus they came to know the truth, learned righteousness, and were finally deemed worthy of the Holy Spirit—and in this way became heralds of the truth in all things, as it is written in the Prophet Ezekiel: "I have made you a watchman for the house of Israel, that you may hear the word from My mouth and warn them on My behalf" (3:17). Therefore, if you wish to prosper and grow more fully, to become unshakable in your hearts and not be mocked by the devil in anything, obey your fathers and listen to them in everything—and you will never fall.

57. I will show you the one thing that makes a person steadfast in goodness and keeps him that way from beginning to end, namely: love God with all your soul, with all your heart, and with all your mind, and serve Him alone. Then God will give you great strength and joy, and all of God's works will be as sweet to you as honey; all physical labor, intellectual pursuits, and vigils—indeed, the entire yoke of God—will be light and sweet to you. Out of His love for people, however, the Lord sometimes sends trials their way, so that they may not become proud but may persevere in their struggle; and instead of courage, they experience heaviness and lethargy; instead of joy, sorrow; instead of peace and stillness, agitation; instead of sweetness, bitterness; many other such things happen to those who love the Lord. But by struggling against this and overcoming it, they grow stronger and stronger. And when they have finally overcome all of this completely, then the Holy Spirit will be with them in everything, and they will no longer fear anything evil.

58. The Holy Spirit constantly exudes a fragrance that is most pleasant, sweetest, and indescribable to the human tongue. But who knows this pleasantness of the Spirit and His sweetness, except those who have been deemed worthy of His indwelling? The Holy Spirit dwells in the souls of the repentant only after much toil. We see much of the same in this world: precious stones, for example, are obtained only with great effort. Having sought this Spirit, the saints found Him; and He is the true pearl of great price mentioned in the Holy Gospel (Matt. 13, 45–46), in the parable of the merchant seeking fine pearls, who, having found one pearl of great value, went and sold all he had and bought it. He is, of course, also the subject of another parable about a treasure hidden in a field, which a man found and hid; and in his joy, he went and sold all he had and bought that field (Matt. 13:44). Temptations assail no one as much as those who have received the Holy Spirit. And our Lord, when the Holy Spirit descended upon Him in the form of a dove at His baptism, was led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil, who tested Him with all his temptations, but found no way to prevail against Him, as it is written in the Gospel of Luke: “And when the devil had finished every temptation, he departed from Him for a time” (Luke 4:13). The Lord Jesus, then, returned to Galilee in the power of the Spirit. Likewise, the Holy Spirit strengthens all who receive the Spirit—those who struggle and overcome—and gives them the power to overcome every temptation.

59. The seraphim seen by the prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. 1:4, 9) is a symbol of faithful souls who strive to attain perfection. He had six wings full of eyes; he also had four faces looking in four directions: one face like that of a man, another like that of a calf, a third like that of a lion, and a fourth like that of an eagle. The first face of the seraphim, which is the human face, signifies the faithful who, while living in the world, fulfill the commandments incumbent upon them. If any of them enters monastic life, he becomes like the face of a calf, because he bears heavy labors in fulfilling the monastic rules and performs more physical feats. Whoever, having perfected himself in the rules of communal life, withdraws into solitude and enters into battle with invisible demons, becomes like the face of a lion, the king of wild beasts. When he defeats these invisible enemies, overcomes his passions, and subjugates them, he will be filled with the Holy Spirit and behold divine visions; then he will resemble the face of an eagle: his mind will then perceive everything that may befall him from all six directions, likened to those six wings full of eyes. Thus he will become a true spiritual seraphim and inherit eternal bliss.

60. Purity, unceasing and unchanging peace, perfect mercy, and other noble virtues, which are crowned with blessing—these are the essence of God’s commandments. Strive to fulfill these commands of the Spirit, through which your souls will be enlivened and by means of which you will receive the Lord into yourselves: they are the safe path. Without purity of body and heart, no one can be perfect before God; that is why it is said in the Holy Gospel: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8). Perfection is born of purity of heart. In the heart there is natural goodness and unnatural evil. From evil arise the passions of the soul, such as condemnation, hatred, pride, and others like them. Goodness, however—the natural goodness of the heart—gives rise to the knowledge of God (the fear of God) and holiness, or the purity of the soul from all passions (conscience). If a person resolves to reform and begins to avoid all evil, arming himself against it with spiritual struggles—weeping, contrition, sighs, fasting, vigils, poverty, and many prayers to God—then the Lord, by His grace, will help him and, through, deliver him from all the passions of the soul. Many, having lived for a long time in monasticism and chastity, have not learned this science of purity, because, having disregarded the instructions of their fathers, they followed the desires of their own hearts; for this reason, evil spirits—the destroyers of souls—have gained the upper hand over them, striking them with hidden arrows night and day and giving them no rest anywhere, so that their hearts are occupied now by pride, now by vanity, now by ungodly envy, now by condemnation, now by anger and fury, now by quarrels, and by many other passions. – Such ones will share the fate of the five foolish virgins because they spend all their time unwisely—they do not restrain their tongues, do not keep their eyes and bodies pure from lust, nor their hearts pure from impurity, and other things worthy of weeping, because they are impure, – content with a single linen garment, which is merely a symbol of virginity: therefore they are deprived of the heavenly oil to light their lamps; and the Bridegroom will never open the doors of His palace to them, and will say to them, as He said in the parable to the foolish virgins: “Truly I tell you, I do not know you” (Matt. 25). I write this out of a desire for your salvation, so that you may become free and faithful—and a pure bride for Christ, Who is the Bridegroom of all souls, as the Apostle Paul says: “I have betrothed you to one husband, a pure virgin, to present you to Christ” (2 Cor. 11:2).

61. Gold is purified many times by fire so that, through the most intense purification, it may become better. In the same way, our Lord, in His goodness, purifies a person through many trials, tests him, and makes him experienced in waging the battles of the heart, so that he no longer returns in thought or memory to the injustices and humiliations to which people subjected him; but humbles himself before God and places all his hope in Him, always being ready for every good work before God, as the Prophet David said: “My heart is ready, O God; my heart is ready; I will sing and make music to my glory” (Ps. 107:2). Keep in mind that you may be tested by some brothers through slander and injustice, or that you may be subjected to humiliation by your coworkers. Therefore, when something like this happens to you, stand firm; do not be afraid, do not lose heart; but give thanks to the Lord for all of this, because without Him nothing like this happens, and He allows it for the reason that it is necessary for God's servants to be tested: for whoever is not tested by God's goodness through trials, labors, sorrows, and calamities—until he learns to stand firm in goodness with patience in all circumstances—will not receive honor from Him.

62. Bear with patience the misfortunes and sorrows that befall you; and give thanks to the Lord for them with great humility, so that you may taste joy from your labors, —like the blessed Susanna, valiant in battle, who overcame the lustful advances of those two lawless old men and endured many misfortunes and sorrows from their false slander, but whom God, for her patience and steadfastness, exalted at the end of her struggle and humbled her enemies, like Thecla, even more courageous in spirit, who feared neither the wounds inflicted upon her by her parents, nor fire, nor the tearing of her flesh, nor wild beasts, and to whom God finally granted joy of heart and the reward of her labors when her courageous faith extinguished the blazing fire, shut the mouths of bloodthirsty lions, and put all her enemies to shame; and like Joseph—humble before God and man—whom, when his brothers, driven by envy and hatred because of the preference their father had shown him, sought to shed his blood, divine help preserved from death. Overcome by envy, they sold him into slavery, where the wife of the master whom he served caused him great suffering and brought it to the point that he was cast into prison; but God did not forsake him. For he was self-controlled, meek, pure, and blameless in soul and body, and, by God's favor toward him, he did not succumb under the weight of all those misfortunes, but endured them patiently, placing his hope in the Lord. And God finally exalted him, making him ruler over Egypt and all its provinces; and He subdued all his brothers, who had hated him, under his feet. These individuals and others like them did not receive honor from God at the very beginning of their struggles and trials, but only after He had tested them, purified them through calamities and sorrows, and taught them how to stand firm in the midst of battle. And only then, when He saw that they were courageously enduring misfortunes and sorrows and placing all their hope in the Lord, did He bestow honor upon them through His divine help, while He put their enemies to shame and subjected them to them.

63. Remain steadfast and do not let your hearts grow slack during your trials, but give thanks for them, so that you may receive your reward from the Lord. May there be among you all—peace, truth, love for God, and mutual goodwill—and may there be among you no strife, no slander, no discord, no malicious envy, no disobedience, no pride, no resentment toward anyone, no mockery, no vanity, no hatred, and no mutual hostility. Wherever such actions occur in a monastery, the wrath of God descends upon it. Moreover, know that our life in this world is very short; therefore, cherish it and do not squander it in idleness, lest the hour of your departure from this life find you angry with one another, and consequently be counted among murderers, according to Scripture: "Whoever hates his brother is a murderer" (1 John 3:15). Be merciful to one another, that the Lord may have mercy on you. For He Himself inspires this when He says, "Forgive, and you will be forgiven" (Luke 6:37). If any of you suffers slander, let him accept it with joy and entrust everything to the Lord, who is the righteous Judge and Rewarder... And whoever slanders his neighbor, let him hasten to humble himself before the Lord and ask forgiveness from his neighbor, so that the Lord may have mercy on him. Do not let the sun go down on your anger, as Scripture teaches us (Eph. 4: 26); but root out from your hearts the evil thoughts that torment you—those you harbor toward one another—so that you may thus nip in the bud every seed of hostility, the root of which is hatred and envy. These two passions are the most evil, detestable to both God and people; and it is utterly unbecoming for them to be found in any believer or servant of God. Therefore, let none of us, in our utter folly, boast and say, "I have gained the upper hand over my brother, and there will be no mercy for him." Let the one who speaks and thinks such things know that he has delivered his soul into the hands of death, and his inheritance will be a place of weeping and gnashing of teeth, of the worm that never dies and the fire that is not quenched.

64. Let us awaken from our slumber while we are still in this body; let us lament over ourselves and mourn with all our hearts, day and night, so that we may be delivered from that terrible torment, groaning, weeping, and anguish that will have no end; let us be careful not to enter through the wide gate and walk the broad path that leads to destruction, even though very many take it, but let us enter through the narrow gate and walk the narrow path that leads to life, even though very few take it. Those who walk this latter path are the true workers, who will receive the reward of their labors with joy and inherit the kingdom. As for those who are not yet fully ready to enter there—I implore them not to be negligent until the time has passed, lest they find themselves without oil at the appointed hour, and with no one willing to sell it to them. For this is what happened to those five foolish virgins, who found no one from whom to buy it. Then they cried out, weeping, "Lord, Lord, open to us!" But he answered and said to them, "Truly, truly, I say to you, I do not know you” (Matt. 25:11–12). And this happened to them for no other reason than their laziness. Later, though they did wake up and begin to make a fuss, it was already too late, because the master of the house had risen and shut the door, as it is written. I will give you another example similar to this one. When Noah entered the ark, alone with his sons and their wives, and with everything else that was with him, and shut the door of the ark because of the floodwaters sent down upon those who did evil, he did not open the door of the ark again, nor did he allow his sons to see that terrible spectacle, which was the punishment of the wicked; Moreover, once the door was shut, these wicked people could not enter to be with the righteous, but they all perished in the floodwaters because of their laziness and disobedience. For Noah, throughout those one hundred years during which he built the ark, ceaselessly called them to a better life, but they paid him no heed and did not obey him; therefore, they perished.

65. Keep the brotherhood united in one place and organize it in peace, unity of mind, humility, the fear of God, and prayer. Then the blessings of God’s house will be fully manifested in you, and you will enjoy them with joy and gladness. May faith, hope, love, humility, reverence, discernment, piety, peace, and love for your brothers and sisters adorn you even more. For whoever possesses all these things is clothed in wedding garments and walks in the commandments of the Spirit. Remain in all humility and patience, so that your passions may depart from you.

66. Whoever walks according to the will of God—which is sweeter than honey and filled with every joy—will be helped and strengthened by it, and it will enable his soul to perform wondrous deeds and prepare before him all the paths pleasing to the Lord; and then no enemy will be able to stand against him, because he walks according to the will of God. But whoever walks according to his own will, God will not help him in anything, but will leave him to the demons, who will hover in his heart day and night, and will not allow him to find any peace in anything, and will make him powerless and feeble in all matters, both external and internal, and they will bring upon him many other things that are ruinous and harmful. The devil sometimes instills joy and merriment in them; but there can be no joy in this, only sorrow and grief. Even if something resembling joy occurs, there is no truth in it, but only a phantom, for it is not from God. True joy comes from God and is given only to those who constantly strive to reject their own will and to fulfill God’s will in all things. The will that acts in the human heart is of three kinds: the first is from the devil; the second is from man; the third—from God; God does not favor the first two, but (favors) only that which comes from Him. Examine yourselves, then, and, having rejected all that is foreign, love God’s will alone. For it is of great importance for a person to constantly discern God’s will in all things. I assure you that if a person does not surrender the entire will of his heart, and does not deny himself in everything, and does not cast aside all his wealth and possessions, and does not submit to the Lord through obedience to his spiritual fathers—then he will neither be able to know God’s will nor fulfill it, and he will be deprived of the final blessing.

67. The Lord did not tell us that there would be a reward here; but that here there would be temptations, hardships, needs, and sorrows, and there a reward. This life is a path of struggles and temptations.

68. If you are patient, obedient, and submissive to your fathers, the Lord will reward you richly; and this is the work that will be remembered before the Lord. Whoever obeys his fathers obeys the Lord, and whoever obeys the Lord also obeys his fathers.

69. Above all, let us believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, let us worship Him and submit to Him, and let us do His will at all times and in every moment.

70. Let us walk in the fear of the Lord, as we are commanded—to work out our salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2:12). The fear of the Lord roots out all deceit and sin from the soul. Whoever does not fear God falls into many evils. The fear of the Lord protects and guards a person until he casts off this body, as it is written: “For your fear we conceived in the womb, and we labored and gave birth to the Spirit of salvation” (Isaiah 26:18).

71. Whoever is free from malice is perfect and godlike. He is filled with joy and is the resting place of the Spirit of God. Just as fire consumes vast forests when neglected, so malice, if you allow it into your heart, will destroy your soul, defile your body, and bring you many unrighteous thoughts; it will stir up strife, discord, slander, envy, hatred, and similar evil passions that weigh down the very body and cause it illness. Hasten to acquire the gentleness and simplicity of heart of the saints, so that our Lord Jesus Christ may receive you into His presence, and each of you may joyfully say: “You have received me because of my gentleness, and You have established me before You forever” (Ps. 40:13).

72. God says through the Prophet: “Whom shall I look upon? Only the meek and quiet, who tremble at My words” (Isaiah 66:2). And our Lord says in the Gospel: “Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matthew 11:29). Therefore, acquire humility for yourselves and do not walk with pride of heart, which is characteristic of the devil. Whoever walks with pride of heart is a partner of the devil. A haughty person is hated by all, because his deeds are boastful; and from this he falls into many sins. All sins are abominable before God, but pride of heart is the most abominable of all. Whoever admonishes or gives counsel to the proud is like one pouring water into a leaky vessel, or like one speaking to a passing bird. People who are proud of heart are despised before God; but God will not humiliate hearts that are humble and contrite. God’s own love, having come down to us from on high, became humble to the utmost degree. Let us therefore love humility, so that we may cry out: “Behold my humility and my toil, and forgive all my sins” (Ps. 24:18).

73. Do not follow the lusts of your eyes, and do not let your heart grow lax. For evil lust corrupts the heart and clouds the mind. Turn away from it, lest the Spirit of God dwelling within you be angered against you. Let us strive for purity even unto death and guard ourselves in every way against impure desires: to this end, let us be careful not to gaze upon the beauty of women. Let us not be slaves to impure passions and shameful desires, which God hates. Write the name of God before the eyes of your hearts, so that within you there may be a constant cry: “You are the living temple of God” (2 Cor. 6:16) and “a dwelling place of the Holy Spirit.” Whoever is carried away by impure desires is, before God, like beasts devoid of all reason, according to the words of the Psalmist, St. David the Prophet (Ps. 48:13). Therefore, let us hate that impure eye with all our hearts and seek purity, for it is the glory of God’s angels. But if, led astray by the devil, we fall, let us rise again through repentance and turn to Him who came to seek the sheep that had gone astray in sin (Luke 15:4).

74. Whoever cannot guard his lips and tongue should at least take care “not to be too talkative” (Job 11:3). Be careful, man; take control of your tongue, and do not multiply your words, lest you multiply your sins. Place your finger on your lips and a bridle on your tongue, for a talkative person leaves no room within himself for the Holy Spirit. If anyone, still a novice, asks you something that is salvific for his soul while conversing with you, answer him; but if he asks about something that is of no benefit to him, be like a deaf person who does not hear, and like a mute who does not speak.

75. Let us force ourselves to keep a strict guard over our lips, so that we do not say anything bad about anyone, for evil speech is worse than any poison. All wounds heal, but a wound from the tongue has no cure. The tongue of a thoughtless slanderer, driven by the devil, is more poisonous than a serpent’s tongue, for it stirs up strife and bitter enmity among brothers, sows discord and wickedness among the peaceful, and scatters large gatherings. Therefore, avoid condemning others, and cling to silence. He who loves silence abides close to God and His angels, and his place is in the heights. The Lord says that He will then preserve your ways—when you yourself guard your lips (Prov. 13:3).

76. Holy Scripture attests that there are two kinds of shame: one from which sin is born, and the other from which glory and grace arise (Sirach 4:23–25). The shame of committing sin is true and salvific shame; but the shame from which sin is born is the shame that hinders the fulfillment of God’s commandments. Do not be ashamed to do anything that is in accordance with God’s will, and do not hide the truth; do not be afraid to proclaim the Lord’s teaching or words of wisdom, and do not be ashamed to confess your sins to your spiritual father.

77. Our Lord, moved by compassion for our souls, says in the Holy Gospel: “Woe to you when people speak well of you and praise you, yet you do not seek the glory of God” (Luke 6:26; John 5:44). Therefore, let us strive even unto death, resisting vanity and cutting off its most evil offshoots, so that we may not be led to destruction. Flee from pride; for many have perished because of it. It drives a person to many labors—fasts, prayers, frequent all-night vigils, alms given in public, and many similar things; but through all this, he will achieve nothing but shame and reproach. Let us not strive to display anything in ourselves—especially anything great—lest we perish because of it and become entangled in the many branches of vanity, for the demons of vanity are exceedingly numerous. Let us instead strive more zealously to attain the glory of the saints, as well as their poverty, so that we may receive that sweet praise from God: “Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:3).

78. Our Lord Jesus Christ said in His Gospel: “By your endurance you will save your souls” (Luke 21:19). Also: “Whoever endures to the end will be saved” (Matt. 10:22; 24:13). With what zeal, then, must we truly labor and endure in order to attain what is prepared for us in heaven? However, before we reach the point of shedding blood, let us not boast; for no artist boasts of his work before it is finished. He who has won the victory through patience should be called blessed. In due time, he will be glorified in the heavens, like Lazarus.

79. The psalmist David said: “Your words are sweeter to my throat than honey to my mouth” (Ps. 118:103). Also: “The Lord’s ways are more desirable than many precious stones” (Ps. 18:10–11). Truly blessed is the one who remains vigilant and fulfills the commandments of our Lord Jesus Christ until he attains true knowledge of Him, so that he may say: “Your mind marvels at Me” (Ps. 138:6). Fear being unfaithful, lest the One who created us be angered against you. Whoever preaches the truth to an unbeliever, rebukes him, or instructs him is like a man who casts the most precious pearls into the depths of the sea. On the contrary, just as water flows down a sloping surface and rushes there swiftly, so the word of the Lord flows into the soul of the believer.

80. Let us remain vigilant and constantly kindle holy zeal in the temple of our mind, lest we be called negligent and lazy. Passions will never gain the upper hand over one who is zealous and vigilant. And if he should ever fall, through the wiles of the tempter, that zeal and vigilance will immediately restore him. But the negligent and careless person, who lacks zeal for pleasing God, if he falls to the devil’s temptations, does not even notice the sin he has committed, because his heart is hard as a stone, and he is like a subdued and bridled mule, upon which anyone can mount without any resistance on his part. In such people, the devil carries out all his lusts and his utter corruption, leading each of them wherever he pleases until his iniquities are fulfilled, and he dies amid groans and weeping. The careless person is like a house that has fallen into ruin and been abandoned by its inhabitants—a house that is of no value to anyone, but is loathed by all, as if cursed, like a dwelling place for vipers, scorpions, and wild beasts; no one cares for it, as it lies in ruins and desolation. Such is the condition of the careless person! Take care to maintain zeal and never set it aside, lest you fall under the enemy’s power. When a person possesses this beautiful zeal and care, it restores him from all falls and harms and warns him, so that such a person becomes a place of rest for the Holy Spirit and, having happily completed his journey, is deemed worthy in this world to enter into the rest of the saints.

81. We have heard that the blessed Paul, when he came to discuss virginity, said of it: “I have no command from the Lord” (1 Cor. 7:25). He had no command because not everyone can bear this heavy yoke; therefore, it is left to the free choice of those who are able to bear it. Let no one who is celibate boast of his or her celibacy, for it is a grace from God Himself. Celibacy drives away feminine sentiments, carnal thoughts, pride of heart, and love for all that is of the devil; it also drives far from oneself impatient grumbling, hatred of people, and worldly glory; it devotes itself to divine worship, restrains the tongue, and disciplines the stomach through fasting. When it is adorned with all these things, it becomes a sacrifice without blemish or defilement. If you, O virgin soul, concern yourself with many delicacies and walk in self-admiration (preoccupied with yourself), you will be put to shame in all your deeds. If you do not guard your tongue, you will be empty throughout your entire life, and you will have undertaken great labors in vain.

82. Let us walk righteously along the path trodden by the saints, of whom it is written: “Blessed are those whose way is blameless, who walk in the law of the Lord” (Ps. 118:1). That is, in purity of body, purity of speech, purity of eyes, purity of hands, purity of ears, purity of feet, in righteous thoughts before God, and in a pure heart toward one another, as we say in our prayers: “Create in me a pure heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me” (Ps. 50: 12).

2. On Good Morals and a Holy Life, in 170 chapters

1. People are usually called wise, though this word is used incorrectly. It is not those who have studied the sayings and writings of the ancient sages who are wise, but those whose souls are wise—those who can discern what is good and what is evil; who flee from what is evil and harmful to the soul, and who wisely seek out what is good and beneficial to the soul, doing so with great thanksgiving to God. These alone should truly be called wise people.

2. A truly wise person has but one concern: to obey and please God wholeheartedly in every way. Therefore, and for this reason alone, he instructs his soul on how to please God, giving thanks to Him for His providential care, no matter what circumstances he may face in life. For it is inappropriate not to thank doctors—even when they prescribe bitter and unpleasant remedies—for the healing of the body, yet to remain ungrateful toward God because of what seems to us to be a cause for sorrow, failing to understand that everything happens according to His providence and for our benefit. In such understanding and in such faith in God lie the salvation and peace of the soul.

3. Self-control, kindness, chastity, steadfastness, patience, and other such great virtues are, as it were, (battle) strengths we have received from God, so that they may resist and withstand the afflictions we encounter and help us during them: so that if we exercise these strengths and keep them ever at the ready, nothing that befalls us will be burdensome, painful, ruinous, or unbearable, for all such things will be overcome by the virtues that dwell within us. Those whose souls lack wisdom do not consider this, for they do not believe that everything happens for our benefit, so that our virtues may shine forth and we may be rewarded by God for them.

4. If, recognizing that wealth and the full enjoyment of it are but a fleeting, illusory vanity, and knowing that a virtuous and God-pleasing life is better than wealth, and you stand firm in this conviction and keep it in mind, then you will neither sigh nor lament nor grumble against anyone, but you will thank God for everything when you see that those worse than you are praised for their eloquence, learning, or wealth. An insatiable desire for wealth and pleasure, a love of fame, and vanity—all born of ignorance of the truth—are the most evil passions of the soul.

5. A wise person, upon examining himself, comes to know what is right and beneficial for him to do, what is natural to his soul and salvific, and what is foreign to it and destructive. And in this way, he avoids what harms the soul, as it is foreign to it.

6. The more moderately one lives, the more at peace one is, because one does not worry about many things—such as servants, farmhands (wage laborers), and the acquisition of livestock. But when we become attached to these things, we are subjected to the misfortunes that arise from them, to the point where we even grumble against God. Thus, our own uncontrolled desire (for many things) fills us with confusion, and we wander in the darkness of a sinful life, unaware of ourselves.

7. One should not say that it is impossible for a person to lead a virtuous life, but rather that it is not easy. And certainly, this is not easily attainable for everyone without distinction; but only those people who are pious and have a God-loving mind partake of the virtuous life. The common (ordinary) mind is worldly and fickle; it gives rise to both good and evil thoughts, is changeable, and is inclined toward material things; but the God-loving mind is the executioner of the evil that arises in people from their willful carelessness.

8. The uneducated and the simple-minded regard the sciences as a ridiculous pursuit and refuse to listen to them, because they expose their ignorance—and they want everyone to be like them; likewise, those who are intemperate in their lives and morals earnestly desire that everyone be worse than they are, thinking to exonerate themselves by the fact that there are many who are evil. The soul perishes and is corrupted by the evil of sin, which is multifaceted and encompasses fornication, pride, greed, anger, insolence, rage, murder, grumbling, envy, extortion, predation, impatience, lies, sensuality, sloth, sorrow, timidity, hatred, condemnation, indolence, delusion, ignorance, seduction, and godlessness. The poor soul, turning away from God, is tormented by these and similar things.

9. Whether someone truly leads a virtuous and praiseworthy life as an ascetic should not be judged by a character feigned for appearances' sake, nor by the false appearance of their way of life; but by whether one, like skilled painters and sculptors, demonstrates one's virtuous and God-pleasing life through one's very deeds, turning away from all pleasures as from snares.

10. A man who is wealthy and of noble birth but lacks spiritual cultivation and a virtuous life is unhappy in the eyes of sensible people; on the contrary, a poor man or a slave by status is happy if he is adorned with education and virtue. Just as travelers lose their way on the roads (and perish), so do those who do not care for a virtuous life, being carried away by their desires.

11. One who succeeds in softening the character of the uneducated and inspires them to love learning and education should be called a "maker of men." Likewise, those who lead people living dissolute lives to a virtuous and God-pleasing life should also be considered "makers of men," for they are, as it were, recreating human beings. Meekness and self-restraint are happiness and a blessed hope for human souls.

12. Truly, people must properly order their lives and morals. When this is corrected, then God is easily known. Those who honor God with all their heart and with all their faith providentially receive from Him help to subdue anger and lust. For lust and anger are the cause of all evils.

13. A person should be called either one who is wise (according to the first point) or one who has set out to reform himself. One who is incorrigible should not be called a person; for this (i.e., incorrigibility) is not a human trait. One should flee from such people. Those who live in harmony with evil will never be numbered among the immortal (i.e., those blessed with immortality).

14. It is only by virtue of the wisdom that dwells within us (as stated in the first point) that we are worthy of being called human beings; without such wisdom, we differ from animals only in the arrangement of our limbs and the gift of speech. Therefore, let the rational person know that he is immortal; and let him abhor every shameful lust, which is the cause of death for people.

15. Just as every artisan demonstrates his art by shaping the appropriate material he has chosen into beautiful forms—such as one with wood, another with bronze, and yet another with gold and silver—so too must we demonstrate that we are human not by the way our bodies are constituted, but by the fact that we are truly intelligent in our souls, —by submitting to the law of virtuous living, that is, a life of virtue and devotion to God. A truly wise and God-loving soul knows everything that ought to be in life, lovingly appeases God, and thanks Him sincerely, turning to Him with all its desire and all its thoughts.

16. Just as helmsmen carefully steer a ship forward so as not to run aground on a submerged rock or some other obstacle, so too should those who are zealous for a virtuous life carefully consider what they ought to do and what they ought to avoid, regarding as beneficial for themselves only what the true and divine laws inspire, and cutting off wicked thoughts from their souls.

17. Just as helmsmen and coachmen, through prudence and diligence, succeed in performing their duties well, so too must those who are zealous for a righteous and virtuous life carefully consider and take care to live a life that is worthy and pleasing to God: for whoever desires this and is convinced of his ability to attain what he desires attains, through faith, an imperishable (of a pure life).

18. Do not regard as free those who are free by status, but those who are free in their way of life and character. For example, the noble and the wealthy should not be called truly free when they are wicked and intemperate, because such people are slaves to their sensual passions. True purity and contempt for the transitory constitute the freedom and bliss of the soul.

19. Remind yourself that you must constantly show yourself to be wise, but do so through a virtuous life and your very actions. In the same way, the sick find and recognize doctors as saviors and benefactors—not by their words, but by their deeds.

20. A soul that is truly wise and virtuous reveals itself in its gaze, demeanor, voice, smile, conversations, and manner of address. Everything in it has been transformed and taken on the most noble form; its God-loving mind, like an alert gatekeeper, bars the entrance to evil and shameful thoughts.

21. Observe your surroundings and know that rulers and authorities have power only over the body, not over the soul—and always keep this in mind. For when they command, for example, to kill or to do something else that is inappropriate, unjust, and harmful to the soul, you must not obey them, even if they torment the body. God created the soul free and self-governing, and it is free to act as it wishes—for good or for evil.

22. A wise soul strives to rid itself of debauchery, arrogance, pride, delusion, envy, theft, and the like, for such deeds are the work of demons and evil will. Yet, through diligent effort and careful reflection, a person whose desires are not directed toward base pleasures is able to accomplish this.

23. Those who spend their lives engaged in small and humble deeds avoid danger and have no need for special precautions. By overcoming all their desires, they easily find the path that leads to God.

24. Wise people need not listen to every kind of conversation, but only to those that are beneficial, those that lead to the knowledge of God's will; for it is the path by which people return to life and eternal light.

25. Those who strive to live virtuously and with love for God must turn away from conceit and all empty and false glory, and strive for the proper reform of their lives and hearts. A God-loving and steadfast mind is the guide and the path to God.

26. There is no benefit in studying the sciences if the soul does not lead a good and God-pleasing life. The cause of all evils is delusion, deception, and ignorance of God.

27. Deep reflection on the good life and care for the soul produce good and God-loving men. He who seeks God finds Him, overcoming every desire through unceasing prayer to Him. Such a person fears no demons.

28. Those who are deluded by earthly goods and know in detail exactly what one must do to lead a good life are like those who have acquired medicines and medical instruments but do not know how to use them and do not even care to do so. Therefore, for the sins we have committed, let us blame neither our birth nor anyone else, but only ourselves; for if the soul willingly gives in to sloth, it cannot help but be overcome.

29. It is not fitting for one who cannot distinguish between good and evil to judge which people are good and which are evil. A person who knows God is good; and when he is not good, it means he does not know (God) and will never be known (by Him): for the only way to know God is through goodness.

30. Good and God-loving men rebuke people for any wrongdoing when they are present, but they not only refrain from rebuking those who are absent themselves, but also do not allow others who attempt to speak ill of them to do so.

31. There should be no rudeness in conversation; for intelligent people are usually adorned by modesty and chastity more than virgins. A God-loving mind is a light that illuminates the soul, just as the sun illuminates the body.

32. Whenever any of the passions of the soul rise up against you, remember that those who are truly wise and desire to establish their own destiny on a proper and lasting foundation find their delight not in the acquisition of perishable wealth, but in true glory (in heaven). This is what makes them blessed. Wealth is both stolen and taken away by the strongest, but spiritual virtue alone is a secure and unstealable possession—and one that saves its possessors after death. Those who reason thus are not enticed by the illusory glitter of wealth and other pleasures.

33. The fickle and the untrained should not put wise men to the test. Wise is the one who pleases God and remains mostly silent; or, if he speaks, he speaks sparingly—and only what is necessary and pleasing to God.

34. Those who strive for a virtuous and God-loving life are zealous for the virtues of the soul, regarding them as a possession that constitutes their inalienable property and eternal consolation. As for temporal things, they enjoy them only as much as is necessary and as God provides and wills, using them with joy and all thanksgiving, even if they are very modest. For a rich table nourishes the body, as do material things, but the knowledge of God, self-control, kindness, charity, piety, and meekness—these ennoble the soul.

35. Rulers who compel people to do inappropriate and soul-damaging deeds do not rule over the soul, which is created self-governing. They bind the body, but not the will, over which the wise person reigns by the gift of his Creator—a will stronger than any authority, compulsion, or power.

36. Those who regard the loss of money, or children, or slaves, or other property as a misfortune should know that, first of all, one must be content with what God provides, and then, when it is necessary to give it back, one should do so willingly and cheerfully, without tormenting oneself with grief over the loss of it—or, better yet, its return—just as those who, having made use of what is not theirs, return it again.

37. It is the duty of a person of good character not to sell his freedom for the sake of acquiring wealth, even if what he stands to gain were very substantial. For worldly goods are like a dream, and wealth has only an illusory luster—unreliable and fleeting.

38. People of truly human virtue (as defined above) should strive so earnestly for a God-loving and virtuous life that their virtuous life may shine among others, just as a small piece of purple cloth draped over white garments to adorn them stands out and is noticeable to all. For in this way, their zeal for spiritual virtues will be more reliable.

39. Prudent people should assess their strength (army) and keep the virtues within their souls in good order, so that they may always be ready to resist attacking passions with the strength (army of virtues) inherent in their souls, naturally bestowed upon them by God. These are as follows: against beauty and every soul-corrupting lust—self-restraint; against need and poverty—patience; against vexation and anger—goodness of heart and the like.

40. One cannot suddenly become a good and wise person; but this is achieved through careful reflection, practice, experience, sustained effort, and (most importantly) a strong desire to do good. A good and God-loving person, who has truly come to know God, gives himself no rest, doing everything without exception that is pleasing to God. But such men are rarely found.

41. People who lack a natural inclination toward goodness should not, in despair over themselves, give up and neglect a God-loving and virtuous life, no matter how inaccessible and unattainable it may seem to them; rather, they too must reflect and do their best to take care of themselves. For although they may not be able to reach the heights of virtue and perfection, by reflecting on themselves and taking care of themselves in every way, they will either become better or, at the very least, will not become worse—and this is no small benefit for the soul.

42. Man, in his mind, comes into contact with the ineffable Divine power, while in his body he is akin to animals. But few are those who, as true and intelligent human beings, strive to turn their thoughts toward God and the Savior and to be united with Him, and who demonstrate this through their deeds and virtuous lives. The majority of people, however, whose souls are foolish, having abandoned that divine and immortal adoption, incline toward a dead, poor, and fleeting kinship with bodies; and, like the speechless, preoccupied only with carnal matters and inflamed by lust, they cut themselves off from God and cast their souls down from heaven into the abyss of carnal torments.

43. A wise man, meditating on his coexistence and communion with the Divine, will never cling to anything earthly or base, but directs his mind toward the heavenly and eternal, knowing that God's will—the source of all good and the fountain of eternal blessings for humanity—is that man may be saved.

44. When you encounter a person who, out of a love of argument, engages you in a struggle against truth and the obvious, then, having ended the dispute, turn away from him, for his mind has become completely hardened. For just as bad water renders even the finest wines unfit for anything, so too do evil conversations corrupt people who are virtuous in life and character.

45. If we use every effort and every means to avoid physical death, then all the more should we strive to avoid spiritual death: for whoever wishes to be saved faces no obstacle to it—except perhaps the indifference and sloth of the soul.

46. Of those who do not wish to learn what is good for them and what should be regarded as good, it can be said that they are not in good health; as for those who, having come to know the truth, shamelessly argue against it, their reason has been deadened: their nature has become bestial; they do not know God, and their souls are not illuminated by the light.

47. God created various kinds of animals by His word for our benefit: some for food, others for service. But God created man to be an observer and a grateful interpreter of His works. This is what people must strive for, lest they die without having seen or understood God and His works, like speechless animals. Man must know that God can do all things. No one can resist Him who can do all things. Just as He created everything He willed by His word, so (even now) He creates all things for the salvation of mankind.

48. Heavenly beings are immortal by virtue of the goodness inherent in them; but earthly beings have become mortal because of the spontaneous evil within them, which in the unwise is multiplied by their indolence and ignorance of God.

49. Death, for those who understand it, is immortality; but for the simple-minded, who do not understand it, it is death. And this death is not to be feared, but one must fear the ruin of the soul, which is ignorance of God. That is what is truly dreadful for the soul!

50. Sin has found a foothold in the material world, and the body has become its seat. But the intelligent soul, having understood this, casts off the burden of the material world; and, rising from beneath this burden, comes to know the God of all and watches over the body attentively, as an enemy and adversary, trusting it not. And in this way, the soul, having conquered evil passions and the material world, is crowned by God.

51. When sin is understood by the soul, it is hated by it as the most foul-smelling beast; but when it is not understood, it is loved by those who do not understand it, and, enslaving its lover, it holds him captive. But the wretched and poor soul does not see what is salvific for it, nor does it even think about it; rather, believing that sin adorns it, it rejoices in it.

52. A pure soul, being good-natured, is sanctified and illuminated by God, and then the mind contemplates what is good and gives rise to God-loving intentions and deeds. But when the soul is defiled by sin, then God turns away from it—or rather, the soul itself separates itself from God—and the wicked demons, having entered the mind, instill in the soul unseemly deeds: adultery, murder, theft, and similar demonic evil acts.

53. Those who know God are filled with all manner of good thoughts and, longing for the heavenly, despise worldly things. But such people are not liked by many; so for this reason they are not only hated but also subjected to ridicule by many of the foolish. They are prepared to endure extreme poverty, knowing that what appears to many as evil is, in fact, good for them. Whoever contemplates the heavenly realm believes in God and knows that all creation is the work of His will; but whoever does not contemplate this will never believe that the world is God's work and was created for the salvation of humankind.

54. Those who are full of sin and revel in ignorance do not know God, for their souls are not sober; God, however, is spiritual (that is, He can be known only through a sober mind). Although He is invisible, He is very clearly present in the visible, just as the soul is in the body. Just as the body cannot live without the soul, so all that is visible and exists cannot stand without God.

55. For what purpose was man created? So that, by coming to know God's creations, he might behold God Himself and glorify the One who created them for man; the mind, united to God by love (a lover of God and pleasing to God), is an invisible blessing, bestowed by God upon the worthy as a reward for a good life.

56. Free is the one who is not enslaved by sensual pleasures but rules over the body through reason and self-control, and with complete gratitude is content with what God provides, even if it is very modest. When the God-loving mind and soul are in harmony with one another, then the body is subdued and at peace, for then the soul, through the action of the mind, extinguishes every carnal impulse.

57. Those who are not content with what they have to sustain their lives, but who covet more, enslave themselves to passions that agitate the soul and instill in it thoughts and dreams that grow worse and worse—that everything is unsatisfactory and that, consequently, they must acquire something new and better. Just as excessively long garments hinder travelers from walking, so too does an excessive desire for possessions prevent the soul from striving and being saved.

58. Whatever situation one finds oneself in against one's will and unwillingly is a prison and a punishment. Therefore, be content with what you have; otherwise, by enduring your circumstances without gratitude—with discontent and reluctance—you will be a tyrant to yourself without even realizing it. But there is only one path to this: contempt for worldly goods.

59. Just as we have received sight from God to discern what is visible—what is white and what is black—so too has God granted us reason to distinguish what is beneficial (and what is harmful) to the soul. — Desire, when it turns away from reason, gives rise to a passion for sensual pleasures, and this prevents the soul from being saved or entering into communion with God.

60. It is not a sin to act in accordance with the law of nature, but it is a sin to do evil of one's own free will. Eating food is not a sin, but it is a sin to eat it without giving thanks, irreverently, and without self-control; it is not a sin simply to look, but it is a sin to look with envy, pride, or insatiability; it is not a sin to listen peacefully, but it is a sin to listen with anger; it is not a sin to compel the tongue to give thanks and pray, but it is a sin to allow it to slander and condemn; it is not a sin to labor with one's hands in charity—by giving alms—but it is a sin to allow theft and murder. Thus, every member sins when, by our free will, it does evil instead of good, contrary to God's will.

61. If you doubt that every deed of yours is seen by God, then consider this: you yourself—a human being and dust—can, at a single moment, mentally survey all the places known to you and reflect upon them; does not God, who gives life to all and sustains all according to His will, see everything all the more clearly, as clearly as a mustard seed?

62. When you close the door of your dwelling and are left alone, know that you are accompanied by the Angel appointed by God to every person, whom the Greeks call the household spirit. He never slumbers; always being with you, He sees all things. He cannot be deceived, and darkness does not hide anything from Him. Along with him, be mindful that God is present everywhere. For there is no place or substance of any kind where God is not present—He who is greater than all and holds all in His hand.

63. If soldiers remain loyal to their king because he provides them with food, how much more should we strive, giving thanks to God with unceasing lips, to please Him continually—He who created everything for humankind?

64. Gratitude toward God and a good life are the fruits of a person that are pleasing to God. But just as earthly fruits do not ripen in a single hour but require time, rain, and care, so too do human fruits require effort, reflection, a time of waiting, self-restraint, and patience before they appear in all their splendor. However, even if, for their sake, you sometimes appear to someone as a godly man, do not trust yourself while you are still in this body, and do not consider anything of your own to be entirely pleasing to God. For know that it is difficult for a person to remain sinless to the very end.

65. There is nothing more honorable among people than the word. The word is so important that it is through words and thanksgiving that we honor God. By using indecent or dishonorable words, we expose the depravity of our own souls. It is characteristic of a foolish person to blame his birth or something else for his sins when he spontaneously utters a bad word or does a wicked deed.

66. If we strive to heal various physical illnesses so that those with whom we happen to be will not laugh at us, it is far more necessary for us to take every care to heal the illnesses of the soul, lest we be found dishonorable and worthy of ridicule—before God, in whose presence we are to stand for judgment. For, having self-control, we can, if we wish, refrain from doing evil deeds even when we desire them; it is also within our power to live in a way pleasing to God, and no one will ever force us to do anything evil if we do not want to. By striving in this way, we will be people worthy of God, living like the angels in heaven.

67. If you wish, you can be a slave to your passions, and if you wish, you can remain free, not submitting to the yoke of your passions; for God created you self-ruling. He who overcomes carnal passions is crowned with incorruption. If there were no passions, there would be no virtues, nor the crowns bestowed by God upon worthy people.

68. Those who do not see what is beneficial for them and do not know what is good are spiritually blind, and their reason is clouded. We must not look upon them, lest we too, by necessity, be subjected to the same fate unexpectedly, like the blind.

69. We must not be angry with sinners, even if their transgressions deserve punishment. For the sake of truth itself, the guilty must be guided (back to the true path) and punished, if necessary, either by us personally or through others; but we must not be angry with them or hold a grudge, because anger acts solely out of passion, not out of judgment and truth. One should not approve of those who are overly merciful, but one must also punish the wicked for the sake of goodness and justice themselves, and not for the sake of one's own passion of anger.

70. Only one kind of spiritual acquisition is safe and free from theft: namely, a virtuous and God-pleasing life, the pursuit and performance of good deeds. Wealth is a blind guide and a foolish counselor. Whoever misuses wealth, using it solely for his own pleasure, destroys his own deluded soul.

71. People should either refrain entirely from acquiring anything superfluous, or, if they do possess such things, be firmly convinced that all worldly things are by nature transitory—they can be taken away, lost, or destroyed—and that, therefore, when misfortune strikes, they must not lose heart.

72. Know that physical illnesses are naturally inherent in the body, as it is perishable and material. Therefore, in the event of such illnesses, a soul trained in virtue should show courage and patience with gratitude, and not reproach God for having created the body.

73. Those who compete in the Olympic Games are crowned not when they defeat one, or another, or a third, but when they defeat all who compete against them. Likewise, anyone who desires to be crowned by God must train his soul to be chaste—not only with regard to bodily passions, but also when tempted by greed, the desire to steal what belongs to others, envy, sensuality, vanity, reproaches, the dangers of death, and the like.

74. Let us strive for a good and God-loving life, not for the sake of human praise, but let us choose a virtuous life for the sake of the soul's salvation, for death is seen daily before our eyes, and all that is human is unreliable.

75. It is within our power to live chastely, but it is not within our power to become rich. So what, then? Should we not condemn our souls for desiring the fleeting and illusory splendor of wealth, which we have no power to acquire? Oh, how foolish we are to desire all this wealth! Do we not know that above all virtues is humility, just as the greatest of all passions is gluttony and the insatiable desire for worldly goods?

76. People of sound judgment must constantly remember that by undertaking small and temporary labors in this life, after death we will receive the greatest consolation and eternal bliss. – He who struggles against his passions and desires to be crowned by God, if he falls, let him not lose heart or remain in that fall, despairing of himself, but let him rise and struggle again, striving to obtain the crown, rising from his occasional falls until his last breath. Physical labor is an instrument of virtue and salvific for the soul.

77. The deprivation of worldly comforts makes courageous people and those who struggle worthy of crowns from God. Therefore, in this life one must put to death one's members with regard to all worldly things; for the dead will no longer concern themselves with anything worldly.

78. A wise and striving soul must not immediately lose heart or be terrified when something sorrowful happens, lest it be mocked for its timidity. A soul carried away by worldly splendor strays from its proper course. The virtues of the soul make us worthy of eternal blessings, while spontaneous human sins are the cause of eternal torments.

79. A wise person is often overcome by the passions of the soul through the (bodily) senses, which are common to rational beings. There are five bodily senses: sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch. Through these five senses, succumbing to its four inherent passions, the poor soul is taken captive. These four passions of the soul are: vanity, the lust for pleasure, anger, and fear. But when a person, with wisdom and reason, having fought the good fight, overcomes and conquers these passions, then he is no longer overcome, but finds peace in his soul and is crowned by God as a victor.

80. Among those who stay at inns, some are given beds, while others, having no bed, lie down on the floor and sleep just as soundly as those who sleep on beds. When the night is over, in the morning both groups leave their beds and all depart from the inn alike, carrying with them only their own belongings. In the same way, all who journey along the path of this life—both those who lived modestly and those who lived in glory and wealth—depart from this life as from an inn, taking with them none of life's pleasures or riches, but only their own deeds, those they have performed in this life, —whether good or evil.

81. Even if you hold great power, do not immediately threaten anyone with death, knowing that by nature you too are subject to death, and that every soul casts off its body as if it were a final garment. Understanding this clearly, strive to be meek, do good, and always give thanks to God. Whoever is unmerciful has no virtue within himself.

82. Death cannot be avoided, and there is no way to escape it. Knowing this, truly wise people—who are well-versed in virtue and God-loving thought—face death without lamentation, fear, or weeping, keeping in mind that, on the one hand, it is inevitable, and on the other, it delivers us from the evils to which we are subjected in this life.

83. Those who have forgotten a good and God-pleasing life and who do not act in accordance with righteous and God-loving doctrines should not be hated, but rather pitied, as those who are lacking in reason and blind in heart and mind; for, mistaking evil for good, they perish through ignorance. And they, who are impious and foolish in spirit, do not know God.

84. Do not speak with just anyone about piety and the good life. I say this not out of envy, but because, I think, you will appear ridiculous to the most unwise. Like minds sympathize with one another, and there are few listeners for such conversations—or rather, they are very rare. It is therefore better not to speak of these things, for this is not what God desires for the salvation of man.

85. The soul sympathizes with the body, but the body does not sympathize with the soul. Thus, when the body is cut apart, the soul suffers with it, and when the body is strong and healthy, the soul's faculties share in that well-being. – But when the soul reflects (repents), the body does not reflect (repent) along with it, but remains on its own, lagging behind (unmoved): for reflection (repentance) is a painful sensation of the soul; just as ignorance, pride, unbelief, greed, hatred, envy, anger, cowardice, vanity, ambition, discord, insensitivity to goodness, and the like—are all produced by the soul.

86. When thinking of God, be pious, free from envy, kind, chaste, meek, generous according to your means, sociable, non-contentious, and the like: for in all these things, pleasing God is the imperishable wealth of the soul; likewise, do not condemn anyone, nor say of anyone that he is bad or has sinned, but rather seek out your own evil deeds and examine your own life within yourself—whether it is pleasing to God. What business is it of ours if someone else is bad?

87. A true person strives to be godly. Godly is the one who desires nothing foreign to him; and all creation is foreign to man. Therefore, despise all things, for you are the image of God. A person becomes the image of God when he lives righteously and in a manner pleasing to God, and this is impossible unless he turns away from all that is passionate. Whoever has a God-loving mind is skilled in all that is salvific for the soul and in every form of piety required of him. A God-loving man does not reproach anyone else, because he knows that he himself sins, and this is a sign of a soul that is being saved.

88. Those who strive with all their might to acquire temporary wealth, and, having forgotten about death and the perdition of their own souls, love the desire for evil deeds, yet do not care about what is salvific for them—these poor souls do not even imagine what suffering people endure from evil after death.

89. God is not the cause of evil. He has granted man reason, the ability to distinguish between good and evil, and self-control; but evil passions arise from human negligence and carelessness. God is by no means to blame for them. By their own free will, demons became evil, just as did the majority of people.

90. A person who lives a godly life does not allow evil to enter the soul. And when there is no evil in the soul, then it is safe and unharmed. Neither a malicious demon nor chance has power over such people;

God delivers them from evil, and they live safely protected, as if they were godlike. If someone praises such a person, he inwardly laughs at those who praise him; if someone defames him, he does not defend himself against those who slander him, nor does he take offense at what they say about him.

91. Evil clings to nature as rust clings to copper and filth to the body. But just as it is not the coppersmith who produced the rust, nor the parents who produced the filth, so God did not produce evil. He endowed man with a conscience and reason, so that he might avoid evil, knowing that it is harmful to him and brings him torment. So look carefully: when you see some fortunate person in power and wealth, do not flatter him under any pretext, lest you be beguiled by a demon. But let death be ever before your eyes; and you will never desire anything evil or worldly.

92. Our God has granted immortality to those in heaven, while He created those on earth to be subject to change; He has granted life and movement to all else—and all for the sake of man. Therefore, do not let the allurements of this world carry you away when the devil instills evil thoughts into your soul; but immediately remember the heavenly blessings and say to yourself: if I wish, it is within my power to overcome even this rebellion of the passions; but I will not overcome it if I choose to satisfy my desire. Strive in this way with a struggle capable of saving your soul.

93. Life is the union and combination of the mind (spirit), soul, and body; and death is not the destruction of these combined parts, but the dissolution of their union; God preserves all of this even after the dissolution.

94. The mind is not the soul, but a gift from God that saves the soul. A God-pleasing mind leads the way before the soul and counsels it to despise what is temporary, material, and perishable, and to love what is eternal, imperishable, and immaterial, so that a person, while living in the body, may with the mind imagine and contemplate what is heavenly and divine. Thus, the God-loving mind is the benefactor and savior of the human soul.

95. The soul, by indulging the body, is clouded by pleasure and perishes. The God-loving mind acts contrary to this: it causes sorrow to the body and saves the soul, like a physician who cuts into and cauterizes the body.

96. Those souls that are not restrained by reason and are not governed by the mind—which would temper, restrain, and direct (where appropriate) their passions, that is, sorrow and pleasure—such souls perish like irrational animals, because their reason is carried away by passions, just as a coachman is carried away by horses that have broken free from his control.

97. The greatest illness of the soul, its ultimate misfortune and ruin, is not to know God, who created everything for man and endowed him with reason and speech, through which, by ascending on high, he may enter into communion with God, contemplating and glorifying Him.

98. The soul is in the body; in the soul is the mind; in the mind is speech—through which God, when contemplated and glorified, grants the soul immortality, bestowing upon it incorruptibility and eternal bliss. For God has granted existence to all that is through His sole goodness.

99. God, having created man as a being with free will—as one who is not envious (all-merciful) and good—has given him the opportunity, if he so desires, to please God. It is pleasing to God that there be no evil in man. For if people praise the good deeds and virtues of a holy and God-loving soul, and condemn shameful and evil deeds, does not God, who desires man's salvation, do so all the more?

100. A person receives good from God, as a source of good; but a person is subjected to evil by his own hand, from the evil within him, from lust and insensitivity.

101. The reckless soul, by nature immortal and mistress of the body, becomes a slave to the body because of sensual pleasures, not realizing that the gratification of the body is ruin to the soul. But falling into insensitivity and becoming depraved, it diligently seeks this gratification of the body.

102. God is good, but man is evil. There is no evil in heaven, and there is no true good on earth. But a wise person chooses the better path: he comes to know the God of all, gives thanks to Him, and sings His praises; yet he despises the body even before death and does not allow its evil inclinations (demands, desires) to be fulfilled, knowing their destructiveness and harmful effects.

103. A sin-loving person loves the accumulation of wealth but cares little for righteousness, giving no thought to the unreliability, transience, and fleeting nature of life, and forgetting the inevitability and inescapability of death. If, even in old age, anyone is so shameful and foolish, then he, like a rotten tree, is unfit for any purpose.

104. We feel pleasure and joy only after we have experienced sorrow: for one who has not been tormented by thirst does not find drink sweet; one who has not been hungry does not find food sweet; one who has not been overcome by drowsiness does not find sleep sweet; and one who has not previously been in sorrow does not feel joy deeply: —and so we will not enjoy eternal blessings unless we despise the fleeting ones.

105. The word is the servant of the mind. Whatever the mind desires, the word expresses.

106. The mind sees everything, even what is in heaven, and nothing clouds it except sin. For the pure, however, nothing is incomprehensible, just as nothing is for its word—the ineffable.

107. In body, man is mortal; in mind and word, he is immortal. In silence you reason, and as you reason, you speak within yourself: for in silence the mind gives birth to the word. And the word of thanksgiving, offered to God, is salvation for man.

108. He who speaks thoughtlessly lacks reason, for he speaks without thinking. But consider what is beneficial for you to do for the salvation of your soul.

109. A wise and soul-nourishing word is a gift from God; on the contrary, a vain and empty word, which seeks to determine the measure and distance of heaven and earth, and the size of the sun and the stars, is the invention of a man who toils in vain, who, out of empty conceit, seeks that which brings him no benefit whatsoever, as if desiring to scoop up water with a sieve, for it is impossible for people to find such things.

110. No one sees heaven, and no one can know what is in it, except a person who is zealous for a virtuous life, who knows and glorifies the One who created it (heaven) for the salvation and life of humankind. Such a God-loving man knows without a doubt that without God there is nothing, but that He is everywhere and in everything, as God, unlimited by anything.

111. Just as a person emerges from the mother's womb, so the soul emerges from the body naked; some are pure and radiant, some are stained by their downfalls, and others are blackened by many transgressions. That is why a wise and God-loving soul, remembering and reflecting on the misfortunes and extremes of the afterlife, lives piously so as not to be condemned or subjected to them. But the unbelievers, being foolish in spirit, are unaware and sin, despising what is to come.

112. Just as, having come forth from the womb, you do not remember what was in the womb, so, having come forth from the body, you will not remember what was in the body.

113. Just as, having emerged from the womb, you became better and larger in body, so, having emerged from the body pure and unblemished, you will be better and imperishable, dwelling in heaven.

114. Just as the body, when fully developed in the womb, must be born, so the soul, when it reaches the limit of its life in the body as ordained by God, must leave the body.

115. Just as you treat the soul while it is in the body, so will it treat you after it has left the body. He who has served his body well here, providing it with every kind of pleasure, has done himself a disservice after death (as is known from the parable of the rich man and Lazarus), for he has brought condemnation upon his soul, like a fool.

116. Just as a body that emerges from the womb imperfect cannot live, so too a soul that departs the body without having attained the vision of God through a good life cannot be saved or be in communion with God.

117. The body, uniting with the soul, emerges into the light from the darkness of the womb; but the soul, uniting with the body, is confined to the darkness of the body. Therefore, one must not indulge but rather restrain the body, as an enemy and adversary of the soul; for an abundance of food and delicacies stirs up evil passions in people, whereas a temperate stomach pacifies the passions and saves the soul.

118. The organ of physical sight is the eye, and the organ of spiritual sight is the mind. Just as a body without eyes is blind, cannot see the sun that illuminates the entire earth and sea, and cannot enjoy its light, so too is the soul without a sound mind and a good life blind: it neither knows nor glorifies God, the Creator and Benefactor of all (creatures), and cannot enter into the enjoyment of His incorruptibility and eternal blessings.

119. Ignorance of God stems from the soul's insensitivity and folly: from this ignorance evil is born, while from the knowledge of God, good comes to people and saves the soul. Therefore, if, while remaining sober and mindful of God, you strive not to fulfill your desires, then your mind is turned toward virtue; but if, intoxicated by ignorance of God, you strive to fulfill your evil desires for your own pleasure, then you will perish like the speechless, unaware of the misfortunes that await you after death.

120. It is also part of divine providence that things occur according to an unchanging order established by God for the world—such as the sun rising and setting every day and the earth bearing fruit. Yet all things were created for the sake of man.

121. What God creates, as the Good One, He creates for humankind; but what a person does, he does for himself—whether good or evil. Lest you be perplexed by the prosperity of wicked people, know that just as cities employ executioners not to praise their most wicked whims, but to punish those who deserve it through them, so God allows the wicked to prevail in this life in order to punish the ungodly through them. But He will eventually bring them to judgment, because, instead of serving God, they slavishly indulged their own malice and caused harm to others.

122. If those who worship idols knew and saw with their hearts what they are worshiping, they would not have strayed from the path of piety, wretched as they are; but by contemplating the beauty, order, and providence in all that is created and comes from God, they would have come to know the One who created all these things for man.

123. Man, being evil and unrighteous, can kill, but God ceaselessly grants life even to the unworthy. Being generous (toward all) and good by nature, He willed that there be peace, and it came to be and continues to be for man and for his salvation.

124. A (true) human being is one who has understood what the body is—namely, that it is mortal and fleeting. Such a person also understands the soul (as one ought to)—namely, that it is divine and immortal, and, being a breath of God, is united with the body for the purpose of trial and ascension to the likeness of God. But one who has understood the soul as he ought lives righteously and in a manner pleasing to God, neither trusting nor indulging the body. Contemplating God with his mind, he perceives with wisdom the eternal blessings bestowed by God upon the soul.

125. God, being good and generous, has granted man freedom with regard to good and evil, endowing him with reason so that, by contemplating the world and all that is in it, he might come to know the One who created all things for man. But an unrighteous person may desire this yet fail to understand it; he may, to his own misfortune, disbelieve and think contrary to the truth. Such is the freedom man possesses with regard to good and evil!

126. It is God's design that, as the body matures, the soul be filled with reason—so that a person may choose from good and evil that which is pleasing to reason (i.e., good); but a soul that does not choose good lacks reason. This is why, although all bodies have a soul, it cannot be said that every soul possesses reason. A God-loving mind is found in the chaste, the pious, the righteous, the pure and good, the merciful, and the devout. The presence of reason is helpful to a person in his relationship with God.

127. There is only one thing impossible for a person—to be immortal (to escape death). He can enter into communion with God if he understands how this is possible. For through desire and understanding (of the matter) for the sake of faith and love, attested to by a good life, a person becomes a conversational partner with God.

128. The eye sees what is visible, but the mind comprehends what is invisible. A God-loving mind is the light of the soul. Whoever has a God-loving mind is enlightened in heart and beholds God with his mind.

129. No one who is good is shameful. Whoever is not good is, of course, evil and self-indulgent. The primary virtue of a person is contempt for the flesh. Renouncing temporary, perishable, and material goods—by choice, not out of poverty—makes us heirs to eternal and imperishable blessings.

130. Whoever has understanding knows about himself exactly what he is—namely, that he is a mortal human being. And whoever has come to know himself also knows that everything is God's creation and was created for the salvation of humankind. It is within a person's power to understand all this and to believe rightly. Such a man knows for certain that those who despise worldly goods have very little toil, and receive eternal comfort and peace from God after death.

131. Just as a body without a soul is dead, so a soul without reason is inactive (barren) and cannot have God as its possession.

132. God listens to one person; God appears to one person; for God is a lover of mankind, and wherever a person is, there God is as well; one person is a worshiper worthy of God; God transforms Himself for the sake of man.

133. God created the heavens, adorned with stars, for man; He created the earth for man, and people cultivate it for themselves. Those who do not perceive such divine providence are senseless in spirit.

134. Good is invisible, just as what exists in heaven is invisible, while evil is visible, just as what exists on earth is visible. Good is something beyond comparison, but a person of understanding chooses what is best. Only a person is capable of knowing God and His creations.

135. The mind acts in the soul, and nature acts in the body. The mind ennoble the soul, while nature corrupts the body. Nature acts in every body, but not every soul possesses a mind; that is why not every soul is saved.

136. The soul exists in the world as something born, while the mind is above the world as something unborn. The soul that understands what the world is and desires to be saved has an urgent duty to reflect within itself every hour that here and now is the (mortal) struggle and the torment (of deeds) that one cannot bear the Judge's gaze, and that it is as if the soul were already perishing. Thinking thus, it guards itself against trivial and shameful pleasures.

137. On earth, God has ordained birth and death, while in heaven there is the fullness of all things and immutability. Yet all things were created for man and for his salvation. Though in need of no good things Himself, God arranged heaven, earth, and the elements for man, providing him through them with every delight in good things.

138. The mortal is subject to the immortal and serves it—that is, the elements serve man—by virtue of the Creator God's love for humanity and His essential goodness.

139. The poor, who lack the power to harm, are not counted among the actively pious. But whoever is capable of causing harm yet does not use their power for evil, but spares the lowly, is, by piety before God, a partaker of good rewards even after death.

140. Through the love of God who created us, there are many paths to salvation that turn souls toward Him and lift them up to heaven. Human souls receive rewards for virtue and punishments for sins.

141. The Son is in the Father, the Spirit is in the Son, and the Father is in both. Through faith, a person comes to know all that is invisible and beyond the reach of the mind. Faith, however, is the soul's free conviction in what is revealed by God.

142. Just as those who, compelled by some need or circumstance, are forced to cross large rivers—if they are sober, they preserve their lives; for even if the current is strong, even if water is scooped up by the boat, they are saved by clinging to whatever is usually found near the banks; but if they are drunk, even if they attempt to reach the shore countless times, overcome by wine, they are swept away by the waves and perish: in the same way, if the soul, having fallen into the waves and the whirlpool of the current of life, does not rise above carnal desire and come to know itself—namely, that it, being divine and immortal, is united with a material body, which is faithless, passionate, and mortal only as a test—and allows itself to be carried away by carnal passions to its own ruin; then, as one who despises herself, intoxicated by ignorance and heedless of her own welfare, she perishes and remains outside the circle of the saved. For the body, like a river, often draws us toward unseemly pleasures.

143. The wise soul, standing unshakable in its good intention, reins in anger and lust—these most unwise of its passions—like a horse; and because it struggles against them, taming and overcoming them, is crowned and deemed worthy to dwell in heaven, receiving this as a reward for its sowing and labors from the God who created it.

144. A truly wise soul, looking upon the happiness of the wicked and the prosperity of the unworthy, is not disturbed by thoughts of their pleasures in this life, as happens with foolish people; for such a soul clearly knows both the transience of happiness and the uncertainty of one's stay here, and the brevity of this life, and the impartiality of judgment; and it believes that God does not neglect what is necessary for its sustenance.

145. A carnal life and the enjoyment of great wealth and power in this life are death to the soul; on the contrary, toil, patience, poverty accompanied by gratitude, and the mortification of the body are the life of the soul and the path to eternal consolation.

146. A wise soul, despising material gain and this fleeting life, chooses heavenly consolation and eternal life, which it will receive from God for living a good life.

147. Those who wear soiled clothing defile the garments of those who touch them. In the same way, people who are wicked in character and corrupt in conduct, when they associate with the simple and speak inappropriate words to them, defile their souls through the sense of hearing, as if with filth.

148. The beginning of sin is lust, through which the rational soul perishes. Love, however, is the beginning of salvation and the kingdom of heaven for the soul.

149. Just as copper, cast aside in neglect and left without proper care, is damaged by rust that forms on it from lying in bundles for a long time and not being put to use, and thereby becomes defective and unfit for use, so too the soul, remaining idle and neglecting a good life and turning to God, deprives itself of God's protection through its evil deeds, is consumed by the evil that springs from such neglect within the body, and thereby becomes defective and unfit for salvation.

150. God is good, impassive, and unchanging. If anyone, while acknowledging as blessed and true that God does not change, nevertheless wonders how He (being such) rejoices in the good, turns away from the wicked, is angry with sinners, and when they repent, shows mercy toward them—then it must be said that God neither rejoices nor becomes angry, for joy and anger are passions. It is absurd to think that the Divine Nature could experience good or evil because of human deeds. God is good and does only good; He harms no one, remaining always the same; but when we are good, we enter into communion with God, by our likeness to Him, and when we become evil, we separate ourselves from God, by our dissimilarity to Him. By living virtuously, we belong to God, but by becoming evil, we are cast out from Him; this does not mean that He is angry with us, but rather that our sins prevent God from shining within us and instead bind us to the tormenting demons. If, then, through prayers and acts of charity we obtain forgiveness for our sins, this does not mean that we have appeased God or changed Him, but that through such actions and our turning to God, having healed the evil within us, we once again become capable of partaking in God's goodness; so that to say, "God turns away from the wicked," is the same as saying, "The sun hides from the blind."

151. A godly soul knows God in every respect: for to be godly is nothing other than to fulfill God's will, and this means to know God—that is, when one strives to be free from envy, chaste, meek, generous according to one's means, sociable, not partial, and to do whatever pleases God's will.

152. The knowledge of God and the fear of God are the remedy against the passions of the flesh. For when there is ignorance of God in the soul, the passions, remaining unhealed, corrupt the soul. It is then corrupted by the evil dwelling within it, as by a long-standing affliction. But God is not to blame for this, because He has granted people knowledge and reason.

153. God endowed man with knowledge and reason, striving to purify him of passions and spontaneous evil, and, in His goodness, desiring to transform what is mortal into immortality.

154. The mind dwelling in a pure and God-loving soul truly beholds God—the Unborn, the Invisible, the Ineffable—the One who is Pure for pure hearts.

155. The crown of incorruption, virtue, and human salvation lies in bearing misfortune with gratitude. The restraint of anger, the tongue, the belly, and sensual desire is a most great help to the soul.

156. That by which the world is sustained is God's providence, and there is not a single place that this providence does not touch. Providence is the self-fulfilling Word of God, the creator of the matter that constitutes this world, the Organizer and Artist of all that comes to be. It is utterly impossible for matter to attain a perfect order without the discerning power of the Word, which is the image, mind, wisdom, and providence of God.

157. Lust aroused by memory is the root of passions akin to darkness. While caught up in this lustful memory, the soul is unaware that it is a breath of God and rushes headlong into sin, without giving thought to the utter misery in which it will find itself after death, in its madness.

158. The greatest and most incurable disease of the soul, and its ruin, is forgetfulness of God and vanity. The desire for evil is the deprivation of good; our good, however, consists in willingly doing every good deed that is pleasing to the God of all.

159. Only one being is capable of receiving God. For it is with this one living creature that God converses—at night through dreams, and by day through the mind—and in every way He foretells and signifies future blessings to those who are worthy of Him.

160. It is not at all difficult for the believer and the one who desires to know God. If you wish to behold Him, look at the order of all things and the providence over everything that has been and is by His word. And all this is for the sake of humankind.

161. A saint is one who is pure of evil and sin. For the greatest perfection of the soul and the deed most pleasing to God is when there is no evil in a person.

162. A name is a designation of one among many (a common noun). But it is unreasonable to think that God, Who is One and the Only One, has any namesakes: for the word “God” signifies the One without beginning, Who created all things for humankind.

163. If you are aware of evil deeds within yourself, cut them off from your soul in the hope of good things; for God is righteous and loving toward humanity.

164. The person who strives to remain ever inseparable from God knows God and is known by God; and the person who remains inseparable from God is one who is good in all things and abstains from every sensual pleasure—not because of a lack of means to indulge in them, but by his own will and out of free self-restraint.

165. Give thanks to the one who wrongs you, and you will have God as your friend. Do not speak ill of your enemy to anyone. Strive in love, chastity, patience, self-restraint, and the like, for this is the knowledge of God—to follow God through humility and similar virtues. But such deeds are not characteristic of everyone, but only of the wise soul.

166. I have written this chapter for the benefit of the simplest of people, against those who dare to say that plants and grasses have a soul. Plants have physical life, but they do not have a soul. Man is called a rational animal because he possesses reason and is capable of acquiring knowledge. Other animals—both terrestrial and aerial—that have a voice, breath, and a soul. Everything that grows and decays can be called alive because it lives and grows, but it cannot be said that all such things possess a soul. There are four distinct kinds of living beings: some are immortal and animated, such as the angels; others possess a mind, a soul, and breath, such as humans; still others possess breath and a soul, such as animals; and still others possess only life, such as plants. Life in plants persists without a soul, without breath, without a mind, and without immortality, but everything else cannot exist without life. Every human soul is perpetually in motion.

167. When you conceive a desire for some sensual pleasure, be careful not to be immediately carried away by it, but, setting it aside for a moment, remember death and consider how much better it is to realize that you have thereby conquered this allure of sensuality.

168. God has most fittingly set a barrier against evil in people by endowing them with intellect, knowledge, reason, and the ability to distinguish between good and evil, so that by recognizing evil—and knowing that it harms us—we may flee from it. But a foolish person pursues evil and even takes pride in it; and, as if caught in a net, he struggles, entangled by it from within, lacking the strength to ever rise above it to see and know God, who created all things for the salvation and deification of humankind.

169. Mortals must take care of themselves, knowing in advance that death awaits them. For blessed immortality is the lot of a virtuous soul when it is good, and eternal death meets it when it is evil.

170. When you lie down on your bed, recall within yourself, with gratitude, God’s blessings and providence. Then, filled with this good thought, your spirit will rejoice fully, and the sleep of your body will be a sobering of the soul; the closing of your eyes—a true vision of God; and your silence, being filled with a sense of goodness, will offer from all your heart and strength an ascending hymn—a heartfelt praise to God, the Lord of all. For when there is no evil in a person, then thanksgiving alone—more than any precious sacrifice—is pleasing to God. To Him be glory forever and ever. Amen.

3. The Rule of the Hermit’s Life

1. I give these rules, as the Lord shall speak them through my lips, for those who wish to take upon themselves the heavy yoke of the hermit’s life. One must obey these commandments, and whoever breaks even one of them “will be called small in the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:19).

a) The outward course and external order of such a life

a) Withdrawal from the world and from living among people.

1. Whoever wishes to be saved (through a life of renunciation) must not remain in his own home or live in the city where he once sinned; nor must he visit his parents or his flesh-and-blood relatives: for this causes harm to the soul and destroys the fruits of life.

2. Do not return to the city where you once sinned before God.

3. Do not go to see how your relatives live, and do not allow them to come and see how you live; indeed, do not see them at all.

b) The Choice of the Desert Life.

4. Our spiritual fathers affirm that the desert is the most suitable place for meditating on death and a sure refuge from the allure of worldly things that soothe the flesh.

5. Whoever lives in the desert and remains silent is spared three kinds of strife: strife through hearing, strife through speech, and strife through seeing what might wound his heart.

6. Be careful that a thought does not deceive you by suggesting that the desert is a place of coolness.

c) Solitude in the Cell

7. Withdraw from the clamor of daily life, seek solitude, and you will be a pilgrim. Sitting in your cell will be for you the same as setting out for a foreign land.

8. When you go out somewhere, do everything you can to return as quickly as possible to your place of solitude so that you may devote yourself to your prayers.

9. When you go out to harvest, do not linger there, but return quickly to your place of solitude.

10. When you visit a brother, do not linger too long in his cell.

d) Cell Activities and Routines.

11. While in your cell, engage in the following three activities: handicrafts, reading the Psalms, and prayer.

12. While in your cell, occupy yourself with the following: reading the Scriptures, praying to God, and manual labor.

13. Fast every day until the ninth hour, except on Saturdays and the Lord's Day. When the ninth hour comes, go to your inner cell (¹), and say your prayer before eating. After eating, alternate between reading and praying.

d) Prayer and kneeling.

14. Perform your prayers at the appointed times, without missing a single one, so that you will not be held accountable for it.

15. Offer your prayer at night before you go to church².

16. (And always) before you go to church, pray in your cell.

17. (In general) before and after communal prayer with the brothers, always pray in your cell as well; and never be lazy about doing so.

18. Kneel often, and do not be lazy about it, lest you die a wicked death.

19. When you pray, do not allow yourself to be lazy; for the prayer of the lazy is empty words.

20. When you pray and remember God, be like a bird, soaring lightly and high, in keeping with your monastic vow and the significance of your garments.

e) Reading and Contemplation of God

21. Devote yourself to reading the Scriptures, and they will deliver you from impurity (or: they will drive away impure thoughts).

22. If you constantly and diligently read the Scriptures and keep the commandments, God's mercy will be with you.

23. Meditate on the works of God and do not be lazy in prayer.

24. A monk who sits in his cell with his lips sealed and does not remember God is like a ruined house outside the city, which is always full of all kinds of filth; for whoever thinks to remove the filth from his house only brings it there. (That is to say: he is silent with his lips, but his mind wanders, he indulges his thoughts, and his heart is carried away—all of which is sinful dross cast into the soul by demons.)

g) Handicrafts and labor in general.

25. The body must be subjugated and wearied by long labor.

26. Set for yourself some moderate work as a cell activity—and your heart will be humble.

27. Compel yourself to engage in manual labor, and the fear of God will take root within you.

28. Be diligent in manual labor, and the fear of God will come upon you.

29. As you sit in your cell, devote yourself to manual labor, but do not let the name of the Lord depart from you; instead, keep Him constantly in your mind, meditate on Him in your heart, and praise Him with your tongue, saying: "My Lord, Jesus Christ, have mercy on me"; or: "Lord Jesus Christ, send me Your help"; or: "I praise You, my Lord, Jesus Christ."

¹ Until then, work was done under a canopy or in the vestibule, which was sometimes called the outer cell.

² At the Monastery of St. Savva, an hour before Matins, the bell rings, and everyone in their cells performs the prescribed 1,500 waist bows and 150 prostrations with the Jesus Prayer.

g) Food.

30. Set aside a specific time (always the same) for your meals, and eat to sustain your body, not for pleasure.

31. Eat the simplest and cheapest food.

32. Eat your bread in silence and with moderation, and see to it that your seating arrangement (at the table) is modest.

33. Do not eat until you are full.

34. Do not be greedy or gluttonous, lest your former sins be revived within you.

35. Do not break your fast on Wednesdays and Fridays.

36. Do not eat meat at all.

37. Do not go near a place where wine is being poured.

38. Do not rush to gatherings or communal meals.

39. If you come to a place where a communal meal is being held³, taste the food and give thanks to God.

40. Do not add a fourth cup of wine to the three, unless it is due to some serious illness⁴.

41. Do not immediately reach for what is offered to you.

42. If you are young, do not reach out your hand before others, for this is not modest.

i) Sleep.

43. Sleep little and in moderation, and the angels will visit you.

44. When you are healthy, do not remove your belt.

45. When you go to bed, do not put your hands inside (perhaps in your bosom), lest you sin without realizing it.

i) Clothing.

46. Day and night, wear your tunic, your cloak, and all your clothing, as if you were a prisoner or a convict.

47. Do not wear clothing with which you might boast or take pride.

48. Take care of your clothes, lest you find yourself naked among the multitude of others on the Day of Judgment⁵.

k) All content whose main feature is poverty.

49. Do not save anything beyond what you need.

50. Poverty is nothing other than moderation in all things, or a state in which one is content with little.

51. Love reproach more than honor, physical toil more than rest, and a lack of (necessary) things more than abundance.

l) Church Worship⁶.

52. The affairs of the church (the care of the church and worship) should be entrusted to a faithful and God-fearing man.

53. As soon as the bell rings, do not delay in going to church.

54. Do not neglect worship, lest it become a stumbling block or a snare to you.

55. Do not speak at all in church.

56. Do not behave in church as you would in a place where many people gather (i.e., let there be no noise or commotion of scattered thoughts in your heart).

57. Do not bury your dead in church (i.e., do not concern yourself with managing your worldly affairs).

m) Relationships:

aa) First and foremost, turn to the abbot, your spiritual father, the elders, and, in general, those who have succeeded in the spiritual life.

³ That is, when someone would gather all the hermits and treat them to a meal at the church.

⁴ This does not take place in the cell, but at communal meals. The wine is usually grape wine, homemade, and of low alcohol content.

⁵ This instills in them the idea of living in a manner befitting their attire.

58. Do not undertake any task, whatever it may be, without first consulting the abbot of the monastery⁷.
59. Do not speak at length before your abbot or those of higher rank than yourself.
60. Always hold fast in your heart the resolve to obey your father, and the fear of God will take root in you.
61. The perfection of your spiritual struggle lies in obedience; and it is good for a person to bear the yoke of the Lord from youth—to serve and obey.
62. Do not be disobedient, or you will become an instrument and vessel of all evils and injustices.
63. With humility and tears, ask your father to instruct you in what you do not yet know, so that you will not be put to shame.
64. Always remember the one who instructs you with sound teaching, and strive to learn from him the life-giving commandments—and you will lead a successful life according to the will of the Lord, as it is written by the blessed Apostle Paul: “Study these things; give yourself over to them, so that your progress may be evident to all” (1 Tim. 4:15).
65. If you have sincerely submitted yourself to the yoke of obedience, listen attentively to what is said to you, and then carry it out conscientiously with all the strength required by the commandment.
66. Do not hide from your father any sin you have committed.
67. Learn good manners daily from your elders.
68. Love your spiritual fathers more than your earthly parents, for they care for you for God’s sake.
69. Live in such a way that the fathers of the monastery, who gave you spiritual birth, may rejoice in your glory among the host of saints.
70. Do everything in your power to ensure that the blessing of the monastery’s elders rests upon you.
71. Do not reveal your thoughts to everyone, but only to those who can heal your soul.
72. Do not reveal your thoughts to everyone, lest you become a stumbling block to your brother.
73. Be friendly toward everyone, but do not take everyone as a counselor.
- bb) Mutual—everyone toward everyone.
74. Strive to ensure that all people bless you.
75. Show concern for your brother and demonstrate your goodwill toward him.
76. If a brother earnestly asks you to help him, work with him all day long.
77. Test your friends first, and do not make everyone close to you; do not trust everyone, for the world is full of deceit. But choose for yourself one brother who fears the Lord, and be friends with him as a brother to a brother. And best of all, cling to God as a son to a father, for all people have fallen into deceit, with the exception of a few. The earth is full of vanity, misfortune, and sorrow.
- bb) Elders toward others.
78. If you have ceased to serve sin, then speak in the name of the Lord and instruct those for whose sake the name of the Lord is blasphemed: and since they are dead and cut off from the living Lord, strive to ensure that they turn away from their dead works, be revived, and become worthy to receive glory.
79. Rebuke (and correct) your (spiritual) children without mercy, for you will be held accountable for their condemnation (that is, if they prove worthy of condemnation at the Last Judgment).
80. Rebuke without mercy, but with the fear of God. Show no partiality to anyone, whoever they may be, and rebuke them with the words of truth.
81. If a brother comes to you and confides his thoughts to you, take care not to repeat them to anyone, but pray for yourself and for him, that the Lord may save you both.
82. Do not reject anyone who is seeking faith in Christ.
83. To those who do not accept your counsel, do not offer it to them.
84. Do not propose anything to anyone as a rule before you yourself have put it into practice.
85. The greatest of all misdeeds is to command another to do what you yourself do not do, for we derive no benefit from the deeds of others.
- gg) To the Sick.
86. When you get up every morning, take care of the sick among you.
87. Go to the sick and fill their vessels with water.

⁷ The hermits lived separately from one another, but their entire scattered community was a single entity and had one leader, as was the case, for example, with both Macarius, Ammon, in the skete, in the cells, and in Nitria.

88. Give whatever you can—all that is surplus—to the sick in the monastery.

89. If your abbot assigns you to serve the sick, serve them with all your heart, so that you may receive a double reward from God—that is, for obedience performed with love.

dd) To the travelers.

90. If a brother comes to you, even at an inopportune time, welcome him with joy, so that he may give thanks to God and not grieve over you.

91. If any brother comes to you, humble yourself in everything before him, show him kindness for the Lord's sake, and be careful not to become proud.

92. Your countenance should always be somber, except when wandering brothers come to you; then put on a joyful expression.

n) Mutual Conduct.

93. Be humble in all your actions.

94. In all your conduct and interactions with others, adopt the manner of a poor beggar: do not act haughtily, neither when you are conversing nor when you are singing a hymn or a song of praise to God. And when you gather with the brothers, let your words be unpretentious.

95. Do not engage in conversation with a boy or a young man, much less form friendships with them, and do not take such people into your household, lest you give the devil a foothold.

96. Do not speak at all with a boy, for otherwise he will be a stumbling block to you.

97. Do not take the hand of a brother standing next to you, and do not touch his cheek, whether he is older or younger than you.

98. Do your utmost to keep away from people who lack reason and sound judgment.

99. If you love a peaceful life, do not enter the circle of those whose sole concern is vanity; and if you happen to find yourself among them, act as if you were not there.

o) Conversation and the Use of Speech in General.

100. Do not raise your voice (remain silent in your cell), except for the prayers prescribed by the rule.

101. Avoid harsh speech (keep your tongue in check).

102. Do not be verbose, lest the Spirit of God depart from you.

103. It is a glorious thing to keep silence, imitating the Lord, who remained silent despite Herod's authority.

104. When you gather with fellow believers like yourself, choose rather to listen and understand what others will say, and be ready to carry out what is salvific. This will be far better than speaking yourself.

105. When you come to someone, let the fear of God be in your heart, and guard your lips, so that you may return to your cell in peace.

106. A wise man knows well how to conduct himself; therefore, he does not rush to speak, but weighs when to speak and when to listen; on the contrary, a man who has not been disciplined does not keep this secret of self-control and restraint of the tongue.

107. When you sit among your brothers, do not speak too much, and if you ask them about something, say it briefly and with humility.

108. Let your words be gentle and edifying. Remember that both glory and humiliation come from words.

109. Do not speak in anger, but let your words be spoken with wisdom and reason, just as your silence is. Imitate our most wise fathers, whose words were always full of wisdom and reason, just as their silence was.

110. Let your tongue always follow reason, for words devoid of reason are like sharp thorns and needles.

111. Flee from lies, or else they will drive the fear of God away from you.

112. Your lips must always speak the truth.

113. Let the blessings of the Most High God be the subject of your conversations; by doing so, you will make yourself worthy to receive even greater blessings from Him.

114. Do not inquire about evil deeds, but keep your attention far from them.

115. Do not engage in idle talk, and do not lend an ear to those who do, lest your soul draw evil from it.

116. Detest idle talk about everything that belongs to this world.

117. Refrain as much as possible from jokes and amusing remarks.

118. Do not shout or speak loudly or quickly, for it is written: “Whoever multiplies words is not safe from sin” (Compare Ecclesiastes 10:14).

119. Do not be stubborn, and do not insist on your own words, lest evil (anger, wrath) enter into you.

120. Do not be afraid at all—neither in matters that are certain nor, all the more so, in matters that are uncertain.

p) In case of absences.

121. If necessity compels you to go into town, do not go alone.

122. When you go to fetch water or are traveling, recite (Psalms from memory) and reflect.

123. When traveling with your brothers, keep a little distance from them so that you may maintain silence.

124. As you walk along the road, do not look to the right or to the left, but carefully reread your psalms and pray to God with your mind. Then, wherever you may find yourself, do not fraternize with the locals.

125. Do not mingle with crowds of worldly people, but do not imitate the Pharisee, who did everything for show.

126. Do not allow a woman to come near you, and do not permit her to enter your dwelling (room), for a storm of thoughts follows in her wake.

127. Do not eat together with a woman, and never form a partnership with a young man.

128. When you have to spend the night somewhere, be careful not to share the same blanket with anyone else.

129. Do not lie down on the same mat with someone younger than you.

130. Do not sleep together on the same mat, unless absolutely necessary. Even if it is your father or brother, do so only with great caution.

131. Do not linger in monastic guesthouses.

b) The Structure of the Inner Life

a) The fundamental principle of life is zeal.

1. Be zealous in acquiring virtues, lest you otherwise invite negligence upon yourself.

2. Fear the cooling of divine love.

3. Do not turn back from the good deeds you have begun.

4. Do not turn back from the path of your solitude.

5. Do not abandon the labors you undertake for the sake of virtue—lest you become lazy and negligent, and sin in your final hour; but love the Lord to the very end, and you will receive mercy.

6. Just as the ruins outside the city serve as a dumping ground for foul refuse, so the soul of one who lives a life of solitude lazily and listlessly becomes a receptacle for all passions and sinful impurities.

b) The rule of life is God’s will as expressed in the commandments.

7. If you have surrendered yourself to God, keep all His commandments, and whatever is commanded of you, do it diligently, omitting nothing; for if you intend to omit anything, your past sins will not be forgiven; but if you firmly resolve to fulfill everything (even to the point of self-denial), then be assured that your past sins are already forgiven.

8. Your thoughts must be constantly occupied with God’s commandments, which you must strive to fulfill with all your strength, leaving none out, lest your soul become a receptacle for all impurities.

9. If you set out to do something and do not see God’s will in it, do not do it under any circumstances.

c) The goal is the glory of God.

10. Do everything in your power to ensure that your Father in heaven is glorified (through you) (Matt. 5:16).

d) Remembrances—they stir up and sustain zeal.

aa) Regarding your vow and your initial zeal.

11. Do not turn away from God for the sake of fleeting things, but remember what you promised when the fervor of your desire to please God burned within you.

12. Strive not to forget the significance of the garment with which you were clothed at the beginning; remember also the tears of your repentance that you shed then—and quickly turn away from the (evil) thoughts that creep up secretly, lest you be led by them into overt deeds.

13. Offer constant and sincere repentance—and do not give in to carelessness or laziness even for a single moment.

bb) On exemplary zealots.

14. Do not follow the example of those who are weaker than you, but of those who are more perfect than you.

15. Let those who have loved the Lord with all their hearts and who constantly devote themselves to good deeds be your model and example; do not be ashamed to ask them for lessons in life, for they are perfect in virtue.

16. Do not imitate those who seek worldly pleasures; otherwise, you will succeed in nothing. Instead, compete with those who, for the Lord's sake, wandered (and still wander) in the mountains and deserts (Heb. 11:38), so that strength from above may come upon you.

bb) On the promised blessings.

17. If you fulfill all that is commanded, you will receive an inheritance that no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and no human heart has conceived (1 Cor. 2:9).

18. Use the light of knowledge to become worthy of being counted among the righteous, while there is still time.

gg) On Death and Judgment.

19. Remember that your youth has passed (your strength has waned), your frailties have increased, and the time of your departure is already near, when you must give an account of all your deeds; and know that there neither a brother will redeem a brother, nor a father deliver his son.

20. Always keep in mind your departure from this body and never let the thought of eternal condemnation slip from your mind; if you do this, you will never sin.

21. Reflect within yourself and say: "I will not remain in this world beyond this very day"—and you will never sin before God.

22. Every day, tell yourself that this is the only day left to you in this world—and you will keep yourself from sin.

23. Turn your cell into a prison by keeping in mind that everything is already over for you and that the hour of your separation from this world is about to strike.

24. Guard yourself lest you be cast out in the age to come. Woe to the careless, for their end is near, and they have neither helper nor hope of salvation.

d) The sources of success are God's gracious help and one's own efforts and deeds.

aa) Help from above, drawn down through prayer.

25. May our Lord Jesus Christ grant us the strength to do everything for His pleasure.

26. Above all, pour out unceasing prayer, and always offer thanksgiving to God for whatever happens to you.

27. Strive unceasingly to pour out prayers with tears, so that God may have mercy on you and strip away the old self from you.

28. Do not cease to shed (prayerful) tears—and God will have mercy on you and ease all your afflictions (everything that pains your soul).

29. If you wish to please God, surrender yourself to the Lord Jesus Christ, and He will deliver you and protect you.

bb) Your deeds and efforts in general.

30. Strive to practice the following virtues that I propose to you: hard work, poverty, wandering, deprivation (having nothing), and silence. They will make you humble, and humility will bring you the forgiveness of sins. Humility consists in a person considering himself a sinner and believing that he does nothing good before God; in being devoted to silence and regarding himself as nothing; in not being stubborn before anyone, not insisting on his own words; in setting aside his own will, keeping his eyes downcast, keeping death before his eyes, guarding against lies, not utter empty words, not contradict the abbot, patiently endure insults, and force oneself to bear all manner of hardships and sorrows with good grace. Strive, brother, to observe these rules, so that your life may not be fruitless.

31. Let us set aside everything that brings comfort to our flesh; let us value this life little, so that we may live in God, Who on the Day of Judgment will ask of us whether we were hungry for His sake, whether we were thirsty, whether we endured nakedness, whether we were contrite, whether we groaned from the depths of our hearts, and whether we tested ourselves to see if we are worthy of God. Therefore, let us devote ourselves to contrition and lamentation over our sins, so that we may find God; let us despise the flesh, so that we may save our souls.

32. Choose for yourself labor, and it, together with fasting, prayer, and vigils, will deliver you from all defilement, for physical labor brings purity of heart, and purity of heart causes the soul to bear fruit.

33. Love mercy; clothe yourself in faith; do not allow your heart to devise evil, but compel it to repay evil with good; seek goodness and peace, and be zealous for all noble deeds.

e) The dispositions of the soul that determine success.

aa) Abiding in God with reverence, alert attention, and aversion to sin and the world.

34. Let your soul be with the Lord at all times, while your body remains on earth like a statue or an idol.

35. Stand always before the face of the Lord with righteousness.

36. The fear of God must always be before our eyes, as well as the remembrance of death and a hostile aversion to the world and all worldly things.

37. Die every day in order to live, for whoever fears God will live forever.

38. Be vigilant at all times, lest you fall into laziness and indifference.

39. Detest all worldly things and cast them away from yourself; otherwise, they themselves will separate you from God.

40. Hate everything that is harmful to your soul.

bb) Patience.

41. Whatever you do, do it with patience, and God will help you in all your deeds and in whatever may happen to you.

42. Be careful not to lose heart.

43. Be content in everything you do according to God's will.

44. Do not be disheartened by the thoughts that assail you in your cell, knowing that the Lord will not let any of your labors (for His sake) go unremembered: this will lead to your success, and God's grace will help you.

45. Courage is nothing other than steadfastness in the truth and resistance to enemies: when you do not yield to them, they will retreat and will not appear again at all.

bb) Contrition and weeping.

46. Day and night, grieve over your sins.

47. Light your lamp with the oil of your tears.

48. Weep ceaselessly over your sins, as if you had a dead person in your cell⁸.

49. Your face must always be sorrowful, so that the fear of God may dwell within you.

50. Do not consider yourself to be anything, but give yourself over to weeping over your sins.

gg) Humility.

51. Love humility, and it will cover all your sins.

52. Be humble all the days of your life and devote yourself to all that is good.

53. Consider one who is weaker than you in virtue to be your equal; but regard one who is your equal in virtue as far surpassing you in perfection.

54. Do not envy those who rise above you, but consider yourself superior to all people, so that God Himself may be with you.

55. Do not walk with the proud, but walk with the humble (this concerns imitation and fellowship).

56. Be humble in everything—in your posture, in your clothing, when sitting, when standing, in your gait, in bed, in your cell, and in all its furnishings.

57. If people begin to praise you for your deeds, do not rejoice in it or take pleasure in it: conceal them as much as you can, do not allow yourself to speak of them to anyone, and do everything in your power to ensure that people do not praise you.

58. Be careful not to become known for any of your deeds.

59. If anyone accuses you unjustly of a sin, humble yourself, and you will receive a crown.

60. Train your tongue to say, "Forgive me," and humility will come to you.

⁸ In another instance: how one weeps when there is a dead person in the house.

61. Train yourself so that your tongue, in all circumstances, at all times, and to every brother, says, “Forgive me.” For if you always say, “Forgive me,” you will soon attain humility.

62. Be ready, whenever you hear a word of rebuke, to say, “Forgive me,” for such humility thwarts all the enemy’s schemes.

63. Know that humility is nothing other than regarding all people as better than yourself. Keep firmly in mind that you are guilty of many sins—keep your head bowed low, and let your tongue be ready to say to the one who offends you: “Forgive me, my lord!” Let death be the constant object of your thoughts.

64. Love hard work, submit yourself to everyone, keep your lips sealed—and you will attain humility; and humility will bring about the forgiveness of all your sins.

65. Above all, do not consider yourself to be anything, and this will give rise to humility within you; humility will give rise to wisdom (experience and sound judgment); wisdom will give rise to faith; faith will give rise to hope; hope will give rise to love; love will give rise to obedience; and obedience will give rise to unwavering constancy (steadfastness in goodness).

g) The struggles against sin.

aa) First and foremost, with thoughts.

66. Cast away evil thoughts from yourself by entrusting yourself to God, and He will shield you with His right hand.

67. Do not follow every thought that comes to mind.

68. Do not act on your own thoughts and desires.

69. Be careful not to let your mind dwell on memories of past sins, lest they be renewed within you.

70. Do not dwell in your mind on sins you once committed, lest they be renewed. Be assured that they were forgiven you at the time you surrendered yourself to God and to repentance, and do not doubt this in the least.

71. Do not recall the pleasures and comforts to which you gave yourself over during your time of negligence, nor speak of them, saying, “I did this” or “I broke that rule,” for this may serve as a stumbling block to you.

72. Do not mention at all the passions you indulged in while in the world, lest you stir up those desires again, and this become a temptation to you.

bb) With various wicked desires.

73. The Apostle John summarizes all human lusts in three things, saying: “Everything in the world is the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life” (1 John 2:16). The lust of the flesh is the satiation of the stomach with a multitude of different foods, followed by the impurity of fornication. The lust of the eyes has as its object material goods; when one possesses them, the eye either becomes exalted or implants impure images in the heart. Pride is worldly love of vain glory (a high opinion of oneself, self-praise, and a thirst for praise from others), which takes root in our minds because of some vain and fleeting external merits.

74. Flee from self-indulgence and disobedience, and above all from gluttony, lest you become entangled in the nets of your own lusts; for they drive the fear of God from the heart and shame from the face, deliver their lover into lowly and shameful deeds, and alienate him from God.

75. Cast off anger and clothe yourself in meekness; cast aside the corrupt eye and take for yourself a simple (childlike, pure) eye.

76. Stay far from anger and guard yourself against lust, as well as against all sinful desires.

bb) In particular, from sensuality.

77. A pleasure-seeker (one who seeks only what is pleasant) is unfit for any task.

78. Do not be a lover of pleasure, for God does not listen to those who love pleasure.

79. Hate the body and its pleasures, for they are full of evil.

80. Exhaust your body so that it resembles a body lying on a sickbed.

gg) With anger and its offspring.

81. If anger assails you, drive it away from yourself as quickly as possible, and you will rejoice all the days of your life.

82. Do not be angry with anyone, and forgive everyone.

83. If anyone unjustly reproaches you, do not lose your temper.

84. Be wise, and silence the mouths of those who speak ill of you.

- 85. Do not be surprised if someone speaks ill of you, for this is one of the tricks of our worst enemies, which they use to prevent people from learning the truth.
- 86. Do not be quick to anger, and do not hold a grudge against the one who provoked you.
- 87. If you are insulted, do not harbor ill will toward the one who insulted you, but say: “I am worthy of being despised by all my brothers.”
- 88. Do not grumble, and do not insult anyone.
- 89. Do not repay evil with evil, nor insult with insult, for in this way the Lord Himself humbles you, seeing that you do not humble yourself.
- 90. Let both the young and the old pray, that they may not be allowed to fall prey to the tyranny of anger.
- 91. Whoever turns the other cheek to the one who strikes him on one is glad in his humiliation. Our Lord Jesus Christ will never forsake him, for He is good and helps souls who suffer for His sake and seek Him, granting them strength and fortitude until they are established in peace (from the passions). So rejoice when sorrows and trials come, for sweet fruits follow them.
- 92. Do not fear reproach from people.
- dd) Among other sinful inclinations of the heart that undermine success: condemnation.
- 93. If you see that a brother has sinned, do not despise him, do not turn away from him, and do not condemn him; for otherwise you yourself will fall into the hands of your enemies.
- 94. Do no harm to anyone, and do not condemn anyone.
- 95. Do not lend your ear to hear evil (about others), but be forgiving and merciful toward people, and you will live.
- 96. Do not condemn anyone, for in this lies your downfall.
- 97. Do not rebuke your brother, even if you see him breaking all the commandments; otherwise, you yourself will fall into the hands of your enemies.
- 98. Do not condemn any mortal, lest God be disgusted by your prayers.
- 99. Do not point out anyone’s faults to anyone else, for any reason whatsoever.
- 100. Do not reproach anyone for their weaknesses.
- e) Vanity and conceit.
- 101. When you give alms, do not make a show of it.
- 102. If you engage in spiritual disciplines, do not boast about them.
- 103. Do not tell anyone in advance about a good deed you intend to do; just do it.
- 104. When you perform acts of virtue, do not act as if you are wiser than others, and do not say to yourself, “I did such-and-such,” because if you act this way, you will not be wise.
- 105. Do not be glory-seeking, and do not harbor self-praise in your heart, saying, “I did such-and-such; I succeeded in this and that.” Such thoughts are filled with vanity, and whoever is filled with them has become a dwelling place for unclean spirits.
- zz) By people-pleasing and hypocrisy.
- 106. Do not set aside God’s will in order to fulfill the will of men.
- 107. Do not break God’s commandments out of respect for human friendship.
- 108. Do not be a hypocrite or a pretender, much less a liar.
- 109. Do not merely appear righteous before others; rather, be wise, gentle, good-natured, patient, zealous, and compassionate within yourself.
- zz) Pride.
- 110. Do not boast about your deeds, whatever they may be.
- 111. Do not be proud or boastful.
- 112. Cast pride far from yourself, but regard your neighbor and all people as better than yourself.
- 113. There is no greater wickedness than causing sorrow to someone and exalting yourself above others.
- 114. Do not consider yourself wise, or else your soul will be lifted up by pride, and you will fall into the hands of your enemies.
- 115. Do not consider yourself all-knowing and wise (that is, do not say, “I know this myself; I can do this myself”), or your labor will be lost, and your ship will have sailed in vain until now.

Conclusion

1. Whoever fails to fulfill all that is prescribed will provoke God's wrath. I, Anthony, speak the truth to you. Therefore, incline your ear to my words and treasure them in your heart, and know that by these commandments I entrust you to the Creator. If you keep them, you will rejoice with all the angels, and you will strike all evil spirits with sorrow. Walk, then, in these commandments, and God will be with you, and His angels will descend upon you; and your soul will be filled with the fragrance of the saints, and your face will shine with the light of the blessed, and you will become a sanctuary to God, just as all the saints are, and you will finally meet the Lord with joy and gladness, and you will hear His voice saying: "Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, I will set you over many things; enter into the joy of your Lord" (Matt. 25:21).

2. Do not stray from any of these instructions, and our Lord Jesus Christ will grant you peace and bring to completion in peace the work you have begun. Our perfect fathers, and those who imitated them, became perfect through their obedience.

3. If you wish to add any good deeds to what has been said, do so, and offer unceasing thanksgiving to our Lord Jesus Christ.

4. Every night, let your tears wash over your bed and wet your pillow, and humble yourself before Christ the Lord, that He may blot out your sins and renew you anew, that He may grant you help in doing good deeds, and bestow upon you His eternal kingdom as an inheritance. To Him be praise, honor, glory, and worship, together with the all-good Father and the Holy Spirit, now and ever and to the ages of ages. Amen.

4. Sayings of St. Anthony the Great and Stories About Him

On Renouncing the World

1. Whoever wishes to successfully undertake the monastic life must completely break with the world, forsake all its goods, withdraw from it in deed, and cut off every attachment to its things. St. Anthony impressively impressed this truth upon a certain brother who, having renounced the world and given everything he had to the poor, had kept a small amount for himself in case of need, and came to St. Anthony. The elder, looking at him, saw what was in his heart and said to him: "If you want to be a monk, go to such-and-such a village, buy some meat, cut it into thin slices, take off your robe, drape the meat over your shoulders and arms—and come back here like that." The brother did as the elder had instructed, and immediately dogs, birds, and hornets surrounded him and covered his entire body with wounds. When he returned to the elder, the latter asked him if he had done as he was told; the brother, complaining, showed him his wounds. Then St. Anthony said to him: "This is what happens to anyone who, upon leaving the world, retains even the slightest portion of his possessions for himself: the demons will cover him with wounds, and, torn apart, he will fall in the midst of strife" (Dost. Skaz. 20; Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1099).

2. The following account, preserved by Cassian (Coll. 24, ch. 11. 10), also concerns the same subject. A brother came to St. Anthony, believing that there was no need to leave the world, and began to say: "One who labors in a city or village, doing all that is required to attain spiritual perfection, is of greater value." St. Anthony asked him, "Where and how do you live?" The man replied, "I live in my parents' house, and they provide me with everything I need." This frees me from all worries and cares, and I am constantly occupied only with reading and prayer, without any distraction of the mind by anything else." St. Anthony asked him again: "Tell me, my son, do you grieve with them in their sorrows, and do you rejoice in their joys?" He admitted that he experienced both. Then the elder said to him: "Know, then, that in the age to come you will share the fate of those with whom you share joy and sorrow in this life." And the way of life you have chosen is harmful to you not only because, due to the almost daily changes in the vicissitudes of life, it plunges your mind into ceaseless thoughts about earthly things, but also because it deprives you of the fruit you would have received had you, by the labor of your own hands, earned your own livelihood, following the example of the Apostle Paul, who, even amid the labors of preaching the Gospel, provided for himself and those with him by the work of his own hands—as he said to the Ephesians: "You yourselves know that these hands of mine have provided for my needs and for those who were with me" (Acts 20:34). He did this for our edification, to set an example for us, as he wrote to the Thessalonians: "We did not act disorderly among you, nor did we eat anyone's bread for free, but with labor and toil, working night and day, so that we would not be a burden to any of you—not that we have no right to do so, but to set an example for you to follow" (2 Thess. 3:8–9). That is why we, too, although we have the opportunity to rely on support from our relatives, prefer to earn our own living by the sweat of our brow rather than have it provided by our relatives. We would gladly choose the latter if we could consider it more beneficial. Moreover, know that if, while healthy, you live at the expense of others, you are consuming the livelihood of the poor and the infirm.

General Answers to the Question: What Should One Do?

One who has left the world enters a completely new realm of life, which, although certainly not entirely unfamiliar to him, nevertheless presents many aspects that inevitably raise the question: What should one do, and how should one live? St. Anthony was asked this question more than once, and here are his answers:

1. Abba Pamvo asked him about this, and he replied: “Do not trust in your own righteousness; truly repent of your past sins; and keep your tongue, your heart, and your stomach in check” (Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1093. Dostoyevsky, note 6).

2. This is what he said on the same subject to Abba Pimen: “The most glorious of all deeds a person can perform is to confess one’s sins before God and one’s elders, to condemn oneself, and to be ready to face every temptation until one’s last breath” (Patr. ib. 1084: Dostoevsky, vol. 4).

3. Someone else asked him: “What must I do to please God?” St. Anthony replied: “Wherever you go, always keep God before your eyes; whatever you do, let it be supported by Scripture; and wherever you live, do not leave that place too soon.” Keep these three commandments, and you will be saved (Dost. sk., 3; Patr. ib. 1083).

4. To another disciple he advised: “Develop an aversion to your belly, to the demands of this age, to evil lusts, and to human honor; live as if you did not exist in this world, and you will find peace” (Patr. Lat. vol. 73, p. 1049).

5. This is what, as St. Athanasius writes, Abba Anthony said to the brothers who came to him: “Always keep fear before your eyes; remember Him who kills and gives life” (1 Sam. 2:6). Hate the world and all that is in it; hate every carnal comfort; renounce this life so that you may live for God; remember what you have promised to God: for He will demand this of you on the Day of Judgment. Be hungry, be thirsty, go naked, keep vigil, weep, wail, sigh in your hearts, examine yourselves to see if you are worthy of God, despise the flesh, so that you may save your souls (Dost. sk. 33 and in the Life).

6. St. Cassian provides a similar detailed instruction on what a monk ought to do. “From time immemorial,” he says, “there has been a wonderful teaching of the blessed Anthony has long been in circulation, stating that a monk, striving for the highest perfection, should not limit himself to imitating any one of the successful fathers, because in no one can all kinds of virtues be found in perfection. But one is distinguished by knowledge, another by sound judgment, a third by unshakable patience; another is distinguished by humility, another by self-restraint, another by the grace-filled simplicity of heart; one surpasses others in generosity, another in mercy, one in vigilance, and another in silence or diligence. Therefore, a monk who wishes to build spiritual honeycombs must, like a wise bee, draw every virtue from the one most skilled in it and store it in the vessel of his heart, paying no attention to what others lack, but observing that virtue and zealously striving to make it his own, whatever it is that distinguishes each person (Inst. c. V. 1. 4).

The Force That Drives One to Feats and Sustains One in Them

If we were to list all that has been mentioned, it would reveal a rather broad field for feats of virtue. The question arises: what force drives the laborer toward them and sustains him in his labors? This force is zeal for salvation, for the glory of God’s name, ready for anything. When this zeal is present, all the monk’s feats of virtue proceed smoothly. Without it, everything comes to a standstill.

1. Why, when a brother who lacked this zeal once came to St. Anthony and asked him to pray for him, did the great elder reply: “Neither I nor God will have mercy on you if you do not take care of yourself and pray to God” (The Life of St. Anthony, ch. 16)?

2. For this very reason, he advised maintaining constant attention to God and vigilance, praising as a great virtue the one who, throughout his entire life, works tirelessly for the Lord and, until his last breath, stands guard against the wiles of the tempter (Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1083).

3. Therefore, he urged people not to slacken in anything, but to patiently maintain the same spirit of zeal at all times, saying: A monk who strives for a few days, then slacks off, then strives again, and then slacks off once more—such a monk is as good as doing nothing, and he will never attain the perfection of the monastic life, due to a lack of constancy in zeal and patience (Patr. Lat. vol. 73, p. 1049).

4. He called those who sought ease “those who do not understand their calling and their goals,” and attributed all the monks’ failures to a lack of zeal for hard work. “We do not succeed,” he said, “because we do not know our calling and do not understand what the task we undertake requires, but we want to attain virtue without effort.” That is why, as soon as we encounter temptation in our place, we move to another, thinking that there is some place where the devil is not present. But whoever has come to know that there is a battle does not allow himself to slacken, but constantly wages war, with God’s help (Patr. Gr. vol. 40, p. 1093).

5. St. Anthony’s words on this subject to those who neither want one thing nor can do another are remarkable. Once, some brothers came to St. Anthony and said to him, “Give us instruction on how to be saved.” The elder replied to them, “Have you heard the Scriptures?” And that is quite enough for you.” But they said, “We also want to hear something from you, Father.” Then the elder said to them, “It is written in the Gospel: ‘If anyone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also’ (Matt. 5:39).” They said to him, “We cannot do that.” The elder said, “If you cannot offer the other cheek, at least endure the blows on one cheek.” “We cannot do even that,” they replied. “If you cannot do even that,” said the elder, “at least do not repay a blow with a blow.” The brothers said, “We cannot do even that.” Then St. Anthony said to his disciple, “Prepare a little food for them; they are sick.” If you cannot do one thing and are unwilling to do the other, what can I do for you? You must pray (either yourselves or have others pray for you) so that the spirit of zeal—moral energy—may be awakened in you (Dost. sk. 19).

Guides of Zeal

But zeal in and of itself is sometimes blind and can take directions inconsistent with the goals of the life one has begun. That is why it must be guided by leaders. Who, then, are these leaders? St. Anthony points to two: one’s own reason and the counsel of the experienced.

a) My own reasoning.

1. Once, the fathers gathered at St. Anthony’s to discuss which virtue was the most perfect of all and which could protect a monk from all the snares of the enemy. Each of them spoke what seemed right to him. Some praised fasting and vigil, since they bring order to one’s thoughts, refine the mind, and make it easier for a person to draw near to God; others favored poverty and contempt for earthly things, because through this the mind becomes calmer, purer, and freer from worldly cares, and thus one’s approach to God becomes easier; some wished to give charity precedence over all other virtues, because the Lord will say to the merciful: “Come, you who are blessed by My Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world” (Matt. 25:34), while others held a different view. And St. Anthony said: All the virtues you have mentioned are very salvific and extremely necessary for those who seek God and who burn with a strong desire to draw near to Him. But we have seen that many exhausted their bodies through excessive self-mortification, vigils, and retreats into the desert; they also zealously devoted themselves to labors, loved poverty, and despised worldly comforts to the point that they did not keep for themselves even what was necessary for a single day, but gave everything they had to the poor; and yet it happened that, after all this, they were led astray and fell, and, having lost the fruit of all those virtues, became worthy of condemnation. The reason for this is none other than that they lacked the virtue of discernment and prudence, and could not make use of its guidance. For it is this very virtue that teaches and guides a person to walk the straight path, without straying at the crossroads. If we walk the royal path, we will never be led astray by our detractors—neither to the right, toward excessive abstinence, nor to the left, toward indifference, carelessness, and idleness. Discernment is the eye of the soul and its lamp, just as the eye is the lamp of the body: so if this eye is clear, then the whole body (of our deeds) will be clear; but if this eye is dark, then the whole body will be dark, as the Lord said in the Holy Gospel (Matt. 6:22–23). Through discernment, a person examines his desires, words, and deeds, and turns away from all those that lead him away from God. Through discernment, he thwarts and destroys all the enemy’s schemes directed against him, faithfully distinguishing between what is good and what is evil. (Patr. Gr., vol. 40, p. 1096; Dostoevsky, p. 8).

2. The following saying also points to this same subject: a blacksmith, taking a piece of iron, considers in advance what to make of it—a sickle, a sword, or an axe. So too must we consider in advance which virtue to pursue, so as not to labor in vain (Dost. sk. 35). Of course, it would be best to be guided by one’s own judgment, if only it were always sufficient for everything and for everyone. But since this cannot be said to be the case, there is a more reliable and safer guide:

b) The advice of those with experience.

3. In this sense, St. Anthony says: I know monks who, after much toil, fell into madness because they relied on their own efforts and disregarded the commandment of the One who said, “Ask your Father, and He will tell you” (Deut. 32: 7). (The Life of St. Anthony, ch. 37).

4. And furthermore: Holy Scripture says, “Those who lack guidance fall like leaves” (Prov. 11:14), and commands that nothing be done without counsel, so much so that it does not even permit the spiritual drink that gladdens the human heart to be consumed without counsel, when it says, “Do nothing without counsel” (Sirach 32:21), and: “Drink wine with counsel.”—A person who goes about his business without counsel is like an unfortified city, into which anyone who wishes may enter and plunder its treasures (Patr. Gr. vol. 40, p. 1098).

5. St. Anthony considered asking others for advice such a salvific act that even the teacher of all turned to his own disciple—who had, however, already achieved success—with a question, and acted exactly as the disciple advised. For it is said that when Abba Anthony received a written invitation from Emperor Constantius to come to Constantinople, he turned to Paul the Simple with the question: “Should I go?” And when the latter replied, “If you go, you will be Anthony; if you do not go, you will be Abba Anthony”—thus implying that such a journey was not approved—he calmly remained where he was (The Life of St. Anthony, 32).

6. He advised everyone else to do the same, saying: “A monk, if possible, should consult the elders about every step he takes in his cell and every drop of water he drinks.” I know of some monks who fell because they thought, on their own, that they could please God (Patr. Gr., vol. 40, p. 1082; The True Tales, 38).

7. Thus, St. Anthony did not approve of relying on one’s own judgment. Is this not why he spoke so highly of Abba Joseph, who, when asked a question from Scripture, replied, “I do not know”—for in this, besides humility, he also expressed distrust of his own mind? It happened as follows: some elders came to St. Anthony, and Abba Joseph was with them. The elder, wishing to test them, presented them with a passage from Scripture and began asking each one, starting with the youngest, what this passage meant. Each spoke to the best of his ability, but the elder replied to each: “No, you have not understood it.” After they had all spoken, he said to Abba Joseph: “What do you say about this passage?” “I do not know,” Joseph replied. Abba Anthony said: “Abba Joseph was on the right path when he said, ‘I do not know’” (Orth. Sayings 17).

8. However, he advised trusting others only with certain limitations. One must first ascertain the elder’s soundness of mind and experience—and only then trust his word and accept his counsel without question. The sign by which this can be recognized is the harmony of his words with the Word of God. One must look, he said, at what is commanded. If anyone instructs you in anything that is in accordance with the commandments of our Lord, accept it with humility and strive to observe it, so that the words of the Apostle may be fulfilled in us as well: “Obey one another out of reverence for God” (Gal. 5: 13; Eph. 5:21). On the other hand, if anyone instructs you in something contrary to the divine commandments, then say to the one giving the instruction: “Is it right to obey you rather than God?” (Acts 4:19). “We must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). Let us also remember the Lord’s words: “My sheep hear My voice, and they do not follow a stranger, for they do not know the voice of strangers” (John 10:5). Likewise, the blessed Paul exhorts us, saying: “But even if we or an angel from heaven should preach a gospel other than the one we preached to you, let him be accursed” (Gal. 1:8). (Patr. gr. vol. 40, p. 1083). The reason for this restriction was likely provided by the Arians, who attracted others to themselves with a veneer of piety and then poisoned them with their false teachings. Or perhaps it was also due to the fact that some undertook to guide others without having gained much experience themselves. In this regard, he was in the habit of saying: The ancient Fathers went into the desert, and there, having healed their own souls through their many labors, they came to understand how to heal others as well. That is why, upon returning from there, they became healing physicians for others. But if any of us should happen to go out into the desert, before we have healed ourselves, we take on the care of others, which causes our former weakness to return to us, and our final condition becomes worse than our initial one. For this reason, the saying applies to us: “Physician, heal yourself first” (Luke 4:23). (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 1053).

How can jealousy be stoked?

Nothing in a person remains constant; some things grow stronger, others grow weaker. So too does zeal—sometimes it blazes, sometimes it fades. In the latter case, it must be stoked so that it does not die out completely. How, then, and with what? First, by the memory of death. St. Anthony repeatedly urged everyone to imprint upon their minds and hearts that the day we are living is our last.

1. Second, by bringing to mind what will happen after death. To impress this thought upon the souls of his disciples, he told them what had been revealed to him personally, as Athanasius the Great recounts in his biography. Once, before a meal, around nine o'clock, having risen to pray, St. Anthony felt his mind being lifted, and—most astonishingly—he saw himself as if from the outside, and as if someone were lifting him up through the air, while in the air stood some gloomy and terrifying figures who attempted to block his path upward. Anthony's guides resisted them, but the figures pressed forward as if they had the right to do so, demanding an account of whether Anthony was subject to their authority in any way. They had to yield, and they prepared to take stock. But when they wanted to take stock from the very birth of St. Anthony, his guides objected, saying: "What was from birth, the Lord has wiped away when he took his monastic vows; take stock from the time he became a monk and made his vows to God; but in this regard, his accusers could find no fault with him; therefore, they backed down—and the path to Anthony's ascetic life became free and unhindered. After this, St. Anthony began to feel that he was regaining his composure, and soon he was once again his former self. But he had already forgotten about food, and he spent the rest of that day and the entire night in sighs and prayers, marveling at how many enemies we must fight and with what difficulties a person must journey through the air. Then the words of the Apostle Paul about "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2: 2) came to his mind. For the enemy has power in the air to engage in battle with those passing through it, striving to block their path. That is why the Apostle especially advised: "Take up the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand firm on the day of evil" (Eph. 6:13) and that the enemy may be put to shame, "having nothing bad to say about us" (Titus 2:8).

2. This is how St. Athanasius recounts it, and although there is no subsequent mention anywhere that St. Anthony told others about it, there is no reason to doubt this, because knowing what he had seen was necessary not so much for himself as for others. Regarding another vision on the same subject, it is noted that he did tell others about it. St. Athanasius writes: St. Anthony was once conversing with the brothers who had come to him about the state of the soul after death and about where it would dwell. The following night, someone called to him from above, saying, "Arise, go out, and look." Anthony went out (for he knew who had commanded him) and, lifting his gaze, saw a giant, hideous and terrifying, whose head touched the clouds, and from the ground, some birds were rising; the giant blocked the path of some, while others flew over him, and having passed him, soared safely upward. He gnashed his teeth at the latter, but rejoiced over the former. An invisible voice then said: "Anthony, understand what you have seen!" Then his mind was opened, and he understood that this was the passage of souls from the earth, and that this giant was our ancient enemy, who holds back the negligent and those who have yielded to his suggestions, forbidding them to go further, but cannot hold back the zealous and those who have not listened to him, and they pass above him. St. Anthony took this vision as a reminder to himself, so to speak, and began to apply even greater effort to succeed in the struggle against all that is hostile. For the same purpose—that is, to inspire greater zeal for a pure life—he recounted this vision to others as well. Abba Cronius says that once St. Anthony recounted this vision before a large gathering. He added that, prior to this vision, St. Anthony had prayed for an entire year that it might be revealed to him what happens to the souls of the righteous and the sinful after death; that the giant's arms were outstretched toward the sky, and beneath him lay a lake as vast as the sea, into which birds fell as he struck them with his hand (Lavsaiik, ch. 24). In the Latin Patristic Collection, the account of this event suggests that the birds were struck by the giant and fell into the lake only when they paused in the air below his hands, lacking the strength to rise above them; but those that were strong enough to rise above his hands and head, at those he merely gnashed his teeth, watching as they soared toward the heavens and were received by the Angels (Patr. Lat. vol. 73, p. 1044).

3. What a stirring fear filled the souls upon hearing of this! But here is a comforting vision, one that strongly revives zeal through "hope" for a glorious state. This vision concerns St. Ammon, not so much a disciple as a friend and companion of St. Anthony. St. Athanasius writes that St. Anthony, sitting once on a mountain, looked up at the sky and saw someone ascending through the air toward heaven in a streak of fire, while from above a host of rejoicing angelic beings descended to meet him. Amazed by this, he began to pray that the Lord would deign to reveal to him what this meant. And a voice spoke to him, saying that it was the soul of Ammon, a monk from Nitria. This Ammon had lived a life of strict asceticism until old age. He used to visit St. Anthony, and St. Anthony used to visit him. The distance from the Nitrian Mountains to Mount St. Anthony is a 13-day journey (650 versts). When the brothers who were with him asked him why he was so amazed, he said that he had seen and heard about Ammon. When, thirty days later, the brothers from Nitria arrived, they asked about Ammon— —and learned that he had indeed passed away on that very day and at that very hour when the elder had seen his soul ascending to heaven.

4. The following vision, recounted by St. Anthony himself, is no less effective in dispelling sloth and stirring up energy. “I prayed to God,” he says, “to show me what kind of protection surrounds and guards a monk!” And I saw a monk surrounded by fiery lamps, and a multitude of angels guarding him as the apple of their eye, shielding him with their swords. Then I sighed and said, “This is what is given to a monk!” And yet, despite this, the devil overcomes him, and he falls. And a voice came to me from the merciful Lord, saying: “No one can be brought down by the devil; he has no power whatsoever after I, having taken on human nature, crushed his authority. But man falls of his own accord when he gives in to negligence and indulges his lusts and passions.” I asked, “Is such protection granted to every monk?” And I was shown a multitude of monks shielded by such protection. Then I exclaimed, “Blessed is the human race, and especially the host of monks, who have a Lord so merciful and so loving toward humanity!” Let us, then, be zealous for our salvation and, having cast aside all negligence, diligently carry out our labors, so that we may be made worthy of the kingdom of heaven, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1083).

5. On another occasion, St. Anthony revealed to his disciples how a decline in zeal causes monastic life to weaken and its glory to fade. Some of his disciples, seeing the countless multitude of monks in the desert, adorned with such virtues and zealously striving with such fervor to excel in the holy life of a hermit, asked Abba Anthony: “Father, how long will this zeal and this love for solitude, poverty, humility, abstinence, and all the other virtues—to which this great multitude of monks is now so earnestly devoted—endure?” The man of God replied to them with a sigh and tears: “The time will come, my beloved children, when monks will leave the deserts and flock instead to wealthy cities, where, in place of these desert caves and cramped cells, they will erect proud buildings capable of rivaling the palaces of kings; instead of poverty, the love of accumulating wealth will grow; humility will be replaced by pride; many will take pride in knowledge, but knowledge that is bare and devoid of good deeds befitting that knowledge; love will grow cold; instead of self-restraint, gluttony will multiply; and very many of them will be concerned with sumptuous feasts, no less than the laity themselves, from whom the monks will differ in nothing but their robes and headdresses; and even though they will live among the world, they will call themselves hermits (a monk is, in fact, a hermit). Moreover, they will boast, saying, ‘I am of Paul, I am of Apollos’ (1 Cor. 1:12), as if the entire strength of their monasticism lay in the dignity of their predecessors: they will boast of their fathers, just as the Jews boast of their father Abraham. But there will also be those at that time who will prove to be far better and more perfect than we are, for “blessed is the one who could have sinned but did not—and could have done evil but did not” (Sir. 31:11)—rather than the one who was drawn to goodness by the multitude of zealots striving for it. Why are Noah, Abraham, and Lot—who led zealous lives among wicked people—so rightly praised in Scripture (Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1095)?

6. Both of these reminders—that is, of death and of what comes after death—stir up the “fear of God,” which is the third stimulus to zeal. St. Anthony called for the fear of God, as we have already seen, in a profound saying: “Always have the fear of God; fear Him who gives death and gives life” (see point 7 above). In another brief saying, he points to the fear of God as the source of readiness and fitness for all virtues. The fear of God, he says, is the beginning of all virtues and the beginning of wisdom. Just as light, entering a dark house, dispels its darkness and illuminates it, so the fear of God, when it enters the human heart, drives out darkness and kindles within it a zeal for all virtues (Patr. gr. t. 40, p. 1084).

7. Therefore, he warned against losing this fear in every possible way. “Do not leave your cell,” he said, “or you will lose the fear of God.” For just as a fish taken out of the water dies, so the fear of God dies in the monk’s heart if he leaves his cell to wander outside (ibid.).

8. But all these supports for zeal act coercively, drawing from without, even though they are established within. One must acquire internal motivators for zeal, so that it springs forth from the heart of its own accord, like a spring of water. The heart is brought to this state by: 1) “the sensation of the sweetness” of life in God. Until this sensation is formed, our zeal remains unreliable. Why, when one brother asked St. Anthony: “Why is it that, although God, throughout all Scripture, promises the soul the highest blessings, the soul is not constantly steadfast in seeking them, but strays toward the transitory, the perishable, and the impure?” —he replied: “Whoever has not yet tasted the sweetness of heavenly blessings has not yet clung to God with all his heart; that is why he returns to what is perishable.” But until one attains such perfection, one must serve God out of submission to His holy will, so that one may say with the Prophet: “I was like a beast before You” (Ps. 72:23), that is, “I served You like a yoked animal” (Patr. lat. t. 73, p. 1056).

9. Hence, 2) “love” for God is an even stronger stimulus to zeal. St. Anthony himself knew that love is stronger than fear, and he said: “I no longer fear God, but I love Him” (i.e., I am not motivated by fear in how I conduct myself, but by love); for “love drives out fear” (1 John 4:18). (Dost. sk. 32).

10. He also urged others to cultivate above all else a love for God within themselves, as an indestructible and enduring strength. Thus, when his brothers once asked him, “How can one best please God?” he replied, “The deed most pleasing to God is the deed of love.” It is performed by one who ceaselessly praises God in his pure thoughts, stirred by the remembrance of God, the remembrance of the promised blessings, and all that He has been pleased to accomplish for us. From the remembrance of all this, perfect love is born, as prescribed: “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your strength” (Deut. 6:5)—and as it is written: “As the deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for You, O God” (Ps. 41:2). This is the work by which we must please God, so that the words of the Apostle may be fulfilled in us as well: “Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword?” Nothing at all (Rom. 8:35, 38). (Patr. gr. vol. 40, p. 1094).

11. From this, or together with it, comes 3) the “joy” of doing good and abiding in God’s ways, which in turn becomes a source of zeal. The following saying of St. Anthony pertains to this. He was asked: What is joy in the Lord? He replied: “To fulfill any commandment with joy, for the glory of God—that is what joy in the Lord is. For when we fulfill His commandments, we ought to rejoice; conversely, when we do not fulfill them, we ought to grieve. Therefore, let us strive to fulfill the commandments with joy in our hearts, so that we may comfort one another in the Lord; but in doing so, let us be careful in every way not to let our joy lead to pride, but to place all our hope in the Lord (Patr. gr. vol. 40, p. 1095. A similar thought is found in Basil the Great’s Brief Rules, question 193).

Virtues and good deeds, in particular

Thus, zeal guided and kindled in this way is directed toward ascetic practices—both physical and spiritual—and toward every good deed.

1. St. Anthony indicated the extent to which one must “exhaust the flesh” in his general instruction on ascetic feats (see § 7) and in his enumeration of the causes of lustful impulses (see excerpt § 18), among which is the ample nourishment of the flesh—he points to the exhaustion of the body through fasting (Dost. sk. 22) as a remedy against such stirrings. St. Anthony commanded us to be very strict with the body (see point 7 above) and condemned any indulgence. That is why he did not look favorably upon those who go to the bathhouse. “Our fathers,” he said, “never even washed their faces—yet we go to worldly bathhouses” (Alphab. Pater., Art. 4).

2. After subduing the flesh, he attached great importance to “restraining the tongue.” He placed this feat on a par with wandering, saying: “Our wandering consists in keeping our mouths shut” (ibid., p. 4).

3. Those who speak whatever comes to mind are like a courtyard without a gate, into which anyone who wishes may enter, approach the manger, and untie the donkey. Although this thought was not expressed by St. Anthony himself, it was voiced in his presence and was certainly approved by him (Dost. sk. 18).

4. He also attached great importance to “sitting in the cell.” Just as fish, he says, die when left on dry land for too long, so too do monks, when they remain outside their cells for too long or spend time with laypeople, lose their love for silence. Therefore, just as a fish longs for the sea, so must we hasten to our cell, lest, while remaining outside it, we forget about inner vigilance (Dost. sk. 10).

5. In general, he advised maintaining such strict discipline within the cell that the cell would be for the monk like the Furnace of Babylon, burning away all impurity within him (Patr. gr. t. 40, 1086).

6. He did, however, allow for some relaxation in the rigor of their ascetic practices, as is evident from his reply to the hunter. It is said that a certain man, while hunting wild animals in the desert, saw Abba Anthony joking with the brothers and was led astray. The elder, wishing to assure him that it is sometimes necessary to give the brothers some leeway, said to him: "Place an arrow on your bow and draw it back." He did so. The elder said to him: "Draw it back further." The man drew it back further. Again he said: "Draw it back further." The hunter replied: "If I draw the bow beyond its limit, it will break." Then the elder said to him: "So it is in the work of God: if we strain the brothers' strength beyond measure, they will soon become disheartened. Therefore, it is necessary to give the brothers at least some respite from time to time."—Upon hearing this, the hunter was deeply moved and departed from the elder, having been edified. And the brothers, strengthened by this, returned to their place (Dost. sk. 13). Moreover, there have been preserved such sayings and stories that point to spiritual feats or dispositions of the heart that determine success. These are:

7. Patience. It is so essential to the ascetic that, if he lacks it, he himself is of no value. Thus, the brethren praised a certain monk to St. Anthony. When this monk arrived, St. Anthony wished to test him to see if he could endure an insult, and seeing that he could not, he said to him: "You are like a village that is beautiful from the front but has been plundered by robbers from behind" (Dost., ch. 15).

8. Patience is necessary because we need temptations. And St. Anthony said: "No one can enter the Kingdom of Heaven without temptations; were it not for temptations, no one would be saved" (Acts of St. Anthony, ch. 5).

9. Prayer. He taught this by example, for everyone knew how long he prayed. "We know," his disciples said, "that the blessed elder would sometimes become so absorbed in prayer that he would remain in it all night long, and when the rising sun interrupted his fervent prayer, in which his mind was filled with rapture, we heard him say: 'Why do you disturb me, O sun? It is as if you rise just to distract me from the divine light of the mind'" (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 848).

10. Tears. Thus, when a brother asked St. Anthony, "What should I do about my sins?" he replied, "Whoever wishes to be freed from sins will be freed from them through weeping and groaning; and whoever wishes to be attuned to virtue will be attuned to it through tearful weeping." Psalm singing itself is weeping. Remember the example of Hezekiah, king of Judah, who, as written in the Book of Isaiah (ch. 38), not only received healing from his illness through his weeping but was also granted an extension of life by 15 years; and when an enemy army of 185,000 men found him, the power of God struck them dead because of the tears he had shed. St. Peter the Apostle received forgiveness through his weeping for having sinned against Christ by denying Him. Mary, for having washed the Savior's feet with her tears, was granted to hear that this would be proclaimed everywhere along with the preaching of the Gospel (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 1055).

11. St. Anthony found no place for laughter in the life of a monk, and when his disciples asked him, "May we ever laugh?" he replied, "Our Lord condemns those who laugh when He says, 'Woe to you who laugh now, for you will weep and mourn'" (Luke 6:25). Therefore, a faithful monk must not laugh; rather, we must weep for those who blaspheme the name of God, because they transgress His law and spend their entire lives wallowing in sin. Let us weep and mourn, ceaselessly imploring God that He may not allow them to harden their hearts in sin and that death may not overtake them before they repent (Patr. gr. t. 40, p. 1096. A similar teaching is found in Basil the Great's Brief Rules, 31).

12. Humility, which draws down protection from above and safeguards one from all falls. "I saw," said St. Anthony, "all the enemy's nets spread out across the earth, and with a sigh I said, 'Who then will escape them?' But I heard a voice saying to me, 'Humility'" (Dost. sk. 7).

13. Why did he then teach: if we undertake a good deed, we must humble ourselves greatly before the Lord, so that He, who knows our weakness, may cover us with His right hand and protect us; for if we become proud, He will remove His protection from us, and we will perish (Patr. gr. t. 40, p. 1090).

14. On another occasion he said: just as pride and the exaltation of the mind cast the devil down from the heights of heaven into the abyss, so humility and meekness lift a person up from the earth to heaven (Ibid., p. 1081).

15. To ensure that a spiritual practice—such as silence—does not lead to pride, he advised giving it a self-deprecating meaning. If anyone, he said, undertakes the practice of silence, let him not think that he is practicing some virtue, but let him keep in his heart that he remains silent because he is unworthy to speak (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 1051).

16. St. Anthony also taught that the Lord Himself guides us inwardly in such a way that He hides our good deeds from us in order to keep us humble. He used to say: if a miller does not blindfold the animal turning the wheel, his work will not go smoothly. The animal's head would spin, and it would fall, unable to work. "So too, by God's providence, we are granted a veil so that we may not see our own good deeds, lest, by taking pleasure in them, we become proud and lose the fruit of all our labors! This happens when we allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by impure thoughts, in which we cannot help but condemn ourselves and our own thoughts. And in such a state, reflection on our goodness cannot take place; consequently, our small acts of goodness are concealed and remain unseen because of these impure thoughts (Paraphrase, ibid., p. 1037).

17. How destructive is pride—this was strikingly illustrated by the downfall of a young ascetic after he had performed a miracle. Passing by the place where this young man was practicing asceticism, some elders were on their way to St. Anthony and had become extremely weary. He called some wild donkeys and commanded them to carry these elders on their backs to St. Anthony. When the elders told St. Anthony about this, he replied: “This monk, it seems to me, is a ship fully laden, but I do not know if he will reach the harbor.”—And indeed, having become conceited, he fell a short time later. Realizing this, St. Anthony said to his disciples: “At this very hour, that young ascetic has fallen.” Go and see.” They went and found him sitting on a mat, weeping over the sin he had committed (Deeds of the Saints, 94).

18. But just as much as pride is destructive, so too is humility salvific. This is illustrated by the example of the shoemaker, about whom St. Anthony received a revelation from above. St. Anthony was praying in his cell when he heard a voice saying to him, “Anthony, you have not yet reached the level of a certain shoemaker in Alexandria!” St. Anthony went to Alexandria, found this shoemaker, and persuaded him to reveal what was special about his life. He said: “I do not know of ever having done any good deed, yet why, when I rise from bed in the morning, before I sit down to work, do I say: ‘Everyone in this city, young and old alike, will enter the Kingdom of God because of their good deeds, but I alone, because of my sins, will be condemned to eternal torment’?” I repeat this very same thing with all the sincerity of my heart in the evening as well, before I go to sleep.” Upon hearing this, St. Anthony realized that he certainly had not yet reached that level (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 785).

19. Was this not the reason why he later often repeated this admonition: we must always reproach and blame ourselves in everything, and do so sincerely, for whoever reproaches himself is justified and glorified by God (Ibid.).

20. Mutual service and assistance. The brothers asked St. Anthony: “If someone were to say, ‘I will take nothing from my brothers, nor will I give them anything myself—what I have is enough for me,’ is that right?” St. Anthony replied: “My children! Such a person is hard-hearted, and his soul is the soul of a lion. He must be considered estranged from the community of all good people” (Patr. Graec. vol. 40, p. 1095).

21. On another occasion, he was asked: “How should one serve the brothers?” He replied: “Brothers who wish to serve the brothers should serve them as servants serve their masters, and as the Lord served Peter, to whom He rendered the final service, even though He was his Creator.” By this, the Lord showed that if those who reject the service offered to them are not blameless, then all the more so are those worthy of condemnation who consider it beneath them to serve their brothers. If the former will have no part with the Lord, as the Lord said to Peter, what then can be said of the latter? (Ibid.)

22. And in general, he used to say: “Life and death come from our neighbor.” For if we win over a brother, we win over God, but if we lead a brother astray, we sin against Christ (Dost. sk. 9).

23. Compassion and forbearance toward those who fall. At the monastery of Abba Elias, a certain brother faced a temptation. He was expelled from there, and he went up to the Mountain to Abba Anthony. Abba Anthony, after keeping him with him for some time, sent him back to the monastery from which he had come. But the brothers drove him away again. He returned to Abba Anthony and said to him, “The brothers would not accept me, Father!” Then the elder sent him away with these words: “A storm caught a ship at sea; it lost its cargo and barely managed to save itself, yet you wish to sink even what has been saved near the shore.” When the brothers heard that Abba Anthony had sent the brother to them, they immediately accepted him (Dost. sk. 21).

24. In one monastery, a brother was falsely accused of fornication, and he came to Abba Anthony. Brothers from the monastery also came to counsel him and take him back. They began to reproach him, asking why he had done such a thing, but the brother defended himself, saying that he had done nothing of the sort. Abba Paphnutius Kefalos happened to be there as well. He told them this parable: “On the bank of a river, I saw a man who was stuck knee-deep in mud. Some people came to help him, and they pulled him in up to his neck.” Abba Anthony said afterward: “Behold, this is truly the kind of person who can heal and save souls!” — The brethren, moved by the elders’ words, bowed before their brother, and, following the fathers’ advice, accepted him back into their midst (Deeds of the Saints, ch. 29).

25. St. Anthony's thought on who can possess true brotherly love is remarkable. He said: A person can never be truly good, no matter how much he may desire it, unless God dwells within him, for no one is good except God alone (Patr. lat. vol. 73, p. 785).

The Ultimate Goal of All Things and the Summit of Perfection

1. This indwelling of God—or life in God—is the ultimate goal of all ascetic labors and the summit of perfection. God Himself revealed this to St. Anthony when he was granted such a revelation in the desert: “There is someone in the city like you, a physician by trade, who gives his surplus to the needy and sings the Trisagion with the Angels every day” (i.e., through the perfection of love for one's neighbor, he lives in God and walks before God). (Life of St. Anthony, ch. 24).

The Perfection of St. Anthony and His Glory in Heaven

1. It was said of Abba Anthony that he was a seer, but, shunning worldly gossip, he did not wish to make this known; both present and future events of the world were revealed to him (Acts of the Saints 30).

2. An elder asked God to let him see the fathers (in glory), and he saw them all except Abba Anthony. He asked the one who was showing him: “Where, then, is Abba Anthony?” The one replied: “Anthony is where God is!” (Life of St. Anthony, ch. 28).

5. An explanation of some of the sayings of St. Anthony the Great, given after his death by an elder

1. The monks' question: How should we understand the words of St. Abba Anthony, which he spoke to his disciple Paul when the latter, having left the world, asked to live with him: “If you want to be a monk, go to a monastery where there are many brothers who can support your weakness”?

The Elder's Answer. From this we learn that we must accept into the monastery the frail, the sick, the blind, and the paralyzed—and love them when they devote themselves with joy and zeal to the pursuit of virtue, even though, due to their infirmities, they cannot undertake all the labors. Therefore, those abbots who do not accept frail elderly men—even though it is known that they are of very good character—but willingly accept strong young men to perform various duties in the monastery and to run errands, even though they are insolent and shameless, deserve no small amount of reproach. The blessed interpreter⁹ severely rebukes such abbots in his book on “the perfection of governance” (of monasteries), saying: they allow their disciples to remain negligent in matters of virtue, while strongly urging them toward physical and worldly affairs. To those who have taken monastic vows to devote themselves to virtue, they grant no rest or respite from worldly affairs, constantly forcing them to perform such tasks, and they rebuke them, reprimand, ridicule, and condemn them if they do not perform the tasks assigned to them with particular haste—whether due to weakness or, at times, a waning of zeal—even if they are very diligent and zealous in spiritual matters; on the contrary, they lavish great praise on those who devote all their labor and care to worldly affairs, even though they are indolent in the pursuit of virtues. And this diligence on their part does not stem from the virtue of obedience, but from the fact that they love to engage in worldly matters. But worst of all—whether they are lazy or diligent—they are treated as slaves. Abba Pimen, however, said: if, among three cenobites, one observes silence perfectly, another is sick but gives thanks to God, and the third willingly fulfills his obedience, then all three are united in the same spiritual struggle. With these words, this saint showed that in a monastery where many cenobites are gathered, there must be not only those who are physically strong—necessary for carrying out various tasks—but also the infirm brothers who devote themselves to unceasing silence; otherwise, all their labor is in vain.

2. Question. Why did Abba Anthony tell Paul, his disciple, “Go and sit in solitude to learn about the battles waged by demons”?

Answer. (Desiring his perfection.) For the perfection of a monk consists in his ability to govern his entire being with his spirit. But such spiritual self-governance comes together with purity of heart; and purity of heart occurs when the mind governs the heart, and the mind is governed by unceasing prayer. The battle against demons, however, takes the form of thoughts and visions, which are more strongly stirred up in solitude and silence.

⁹ True, sayings or rules in general... The book in question has not come down to us.

Note: The Power of Response. Solitude provides constant opportunities for battle against the subtlest thoughts instilled by demons. This battle is waged by the mind in prayer to God, who is present and attentive to the heart, and who governs it. The continuity of this spiritual struggle, amid the variety of experiences in battle, teaches spiritual self-control and cultivates the habit of it; in this lies all the spiritual perfection of the monk and of every Christian.

3. Question: What does Abba Anthony mean when he says, “Just as fish taken out of the water die, so it is with a monk who lingers too long outside his cell”? In what way does a monk die like a fish?

Answer. The life of the soul consists in ceaseless, loving contemplation of God, which is rightly called the life of the soul, embracing and uniting within itself both the mind and the heart. Thus, if a monk wanders about the cities, distracted by sights and conversations, he is deprived of spiritual life and dies, because he turns away from God and forgets Him, and drives from his heart the love for Christ that he had cultivated within himself through much toil while keeping silence in his cell. Moreover, his love for privations and hardships wanes, and he gives himself over to the repose of the flesh and to pleasures—and the purity of his heart is disturbed by the restless movement of images that enter and exit through the senses—sight, hearing, touch, taste, and smell—and through speech; all of which then lead him into fornication and other passions, which are the true death and ruin of a monk. Thus, Blessed Anthony spoke well: just as fish die when pulled onto dry land, so does a monk who, having left his cell, spends his time in cities and villages.

4. Question. Abba Anthony says: “Whoever lives in solitude is free from the three battles—that is, the battles of the tongue, sight, and hearing; does only the battle of the heart remain for him?” Please explain these words of the blessed one to us.

Answer. He did not say this to imply that the strife experienced in silence and solitude is less than the strife that arises in communities, where the mind is distracted by sight, hearing, and speech; rather, he shows with these words that those living in solitude are free from the strife caused by the senses—by which others are tormented more than by the strife of the heart stirred up within them by demons. Our fathers withdrew into silence for this very reason—so that the struggles of the heart would not be intensified by the struggles arising from sight, speech, and hearing. For how easily do the brothers (who live in community) fall—those who go out and come in, leaving the monastery and returning to it—because the turmoil of the senses is added to the turmoil of the heart, and so easily do monks who live in silence fall, being troubled only by the strife of the heart, even if strife from the bodily senses should come upon them as well. This is quite fully justified by those brothers (hermits) to whom, while they were living in seclusion, women came for some reason, and for whom, as a result, the struggle of the heart was compounded by the sight of the body and the beauty of the face: they were immediately overcome by the intensifying struggle of the heart and fell. That the battle waged by the emotions of the soul is indeed stronger and more fierce for those who live in solitude than the battle waged by the bodily senses—this can also be seen from the words of Blessed Evagrius, who says that with those monks who live in solitude, the demons wage battle directly on their own, without any intermediary; whereas against those who live in monasteries and are zealous for progress in virtue, they incite and stir up dissolute monks, who are more cruel, more vexing, and more treacherous than anyone else.

5. Question. What is the meaning of the following saying by St. Abba Anthony: “The monk’s cell is the furnace of Babylon, the place of the three youths, among whom was the Son of God, and it is the pillar of fire from which God spoke to Moses”?

Answer. Just as fire has two properties—one being a painfully scorching heat, and the other a joyful light—so too does patient dwelling in the cell have two effects: one burdens and troubles novices in silence, sometimes through extreme exhaustion, sometimes through rebuke, and the other brings joy through success, bringing peace to those who, having overcome their passions, are perfected in purity and are granted luminous visions. The meaning of what was said to them about the three youths—that they saw the Son of God—is as follows: just as Ananias, Azariah, and Misael, when cast into the fiery furnace in Babylon, were not burned or even scorched, because the Angel of God was sent to them to remove their bonds and deliver them from the destructive power of the fire—so too for the brothers living in solitude, the struggle against the passions, stirred up against them by demons, is at first very difficult; yet they are never forsaken by the gracious help of our Lord, the Son of God, who visibly visits them and dwells with them, so that, when with this help they overcome their passions and enemies, He may grant them the grace of perfect love and His radiant glory.

6. Question. What is the meaning of the following saying of Abba Anthony: “One must not repay evil with evil, and if a monk has not yet attained this level, let him keep silence and stillness”? How can one attain this (lack of anger) through silence?

Answer. If a weak brother, who insults his brother with his tongue and harbors hatred for him in his heart, confines himself to his cell and refrains from speaking with people, while at the same time suppressing evil thoughts and constantly devoting himself to prayer and the reading of Scripture, then the grace of peace will come upon him, —his heart will be enlightened, and his spirit will rejoice in God, having been freed from passion. For this man, gazing upon the Cross of the Lord, will be set ablaze with love for Him, and, kissing it, will begin to reflect on how God, according to Scripture, so loved the world that He gave up His only-begotten Son to death for it (John 3: 16), so that, of course, God demonstrated His love for us by the fact that “while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rom. 5: 8). — If God did not spare His own Son but delivered Him up to death for us—and to such a shameful death on the cross—“how will He not also graciously give us all things with Him?” (Romans 8:32)—or what else will He withhold from us? Christ’s great mercy and love toward us urge us not only to realize that we should by no means live for our own desires, but for the One who died for us (2 Cor. 5: 14, 15), but also to look to Jesus—who bore the death of the cross for us and, having endured such humiliation, has again taken His seat at the right hand of God on high—as the source and model of endurance. Therefore, if we suffer with Him, we will also be glorified with Him (Rom. 8:17), and if we endure with Him, we will also reign with Him (2 Tim. 2:12). Why does the Apostle Paul exhort us, saying, “Let us fix our eyes, brothers, on the cross of our Lord” (Heb. 12:2)? Look at how much He endured for sinners who were enemies of their own souls! Do not lose heart, then, or let your spirits grow weak simply because you must endure hardship, insults, abuse, and death—which are your due for your love of Him. Ask in your prayers for forgiveness for those who cause you distress, just as the Lord prayed for His crucifiers, saying: “Father, forgive them” (Luke 23:34), and just as the blessed Stephen asked our Lord to forgive those who were stoning him, saying, “Lord, do not hold this sin against them” (Acts 7:60). If a monk, sitting alone in his cell, reflects in this way, he will be strengthened in spirit, he will master all his passions in the Lord, and not only will he refrain from offending anyone, or being angry with anyone, or repaying evil for evil, but he will rejoice greatly and count it an honor if he happens to suffer insult and injury. This is the level of moral strength a monk attains in his cell through silence, self-examination, and the patient observance of Christ’s commandments—namely, fasting, prayer, contemplation of God, and other virtues practiced in silence. Thus, the blessed Abba Anthony spoke very well: if a monk cannot restrain his tongue from insults, grumbling, and loquacity, and is not strong enough to keep his heart from such lapses, let him at least, as much as he can, devote himself to silence and stillness.

7. Question. Once, some brothers came to Abba Anthony and said to him, “Give us a commandment that we might keep.” He said to them, “It is written in the Gospel: ‘If anyone strikes you on one cheek, turn the other to him’ (Matt. 5:39).” They replied to him, “We cannot possibly fulfill this.” The elder said to them, “If you cannot turn the other cheek, bear the blow to one cheek patiently.” They said, “We cannot do even that.” He said to them again, “If you cannot do even that, at least do not strike back at the one who strikes you.” They said, “We cannot do even that.” Then the great elder said to his disciple, “Prepare a little food for these brothers, for they are sick.” What do these words of the holy father mean?

Answer. He meant to say that there is nothing to be done with such people except to feed them and send them on their way. But since the elder concluded by saying, “You need prayer,” we may infer that by “food” he meant the prayers of the elders, as if to say: “If you can do neither this nor that, then you need prayer for yourselves.” For just as the sick need special food because of the weakness of their stomachs, which cannot tolerate all kinds of food, so too do you, whose minds are so feeble that they cannot fulfill even a small part of our Lord’s commandments, need healing and restoration of your souls—namely, the prayers of the fathers, who could intercede for you.

8. Question. St. Abba Anthony said: “I saw the devil’s nets spread out across the whole earth; I groaned at this and said, ‘Woe to the human race! Who can escape them?’ And they said to me, ‘Humility saves one from them, for they cannot ensnare him.’ Did the saint see these nets—sensually or mentally?” And who were those who told him, “Humility saves one from them, for they cannot ensnare him”?

Answer: Abba Macarius the Great of Egypt, a disciple of Abba Anthony, also saw all the enemy’s wiles in the innermost part of the Scetian Desert, at the same time that Abba Anthony saw them, though in a different form. Saint Macarius saw demons in the form of two men, one of whom was dressed in tattered clothes with patches of various colors; while the other's body was entirely covered with worn-out clothing, over which was draped a kind of net hung with little bubbles; another figure approached them, covered with wings like a cloak. Abba Macarius saw these with his physical eyes, while St. Abba Anthony saw with the eye of the mind—as one sees a vision—all those snares of the devil that he constantly sets for monks, with which he tries to entangle them, capture them, and prevent them from safely completing their journey along the path of virtue, as it is written: “The snare of the proud is spread against me, and the snare of the wicked is set against my feet” (Ps. 139: 5). Thus, he saw that the devil's snares are laid out on the earth in the same way that hunters set theirs. Seeing this, he was astonished and horrified by the multitude of snares and nets; if any beast were to be caught in them, it could not free itself, due to the multitude of different snares and bonds. In this way, the visions of all the bodily and spiritual passions with which the demons battle the monks were revealed to Abba Anthony. And he saw the holy angels, who pointed out to him by name the net of each passion—namely: the net of gluttony or overindulgence, the net of greed, the net of fornication, vanity, pride, and other passions. Moreover, they showed him all the arts and wiles by which the enemy sets his snares and ambushes to hinder the brothers, entangle them, and halt their progress along the great path of God's love. When, struck with horror at the sight of the snares, he groaned and said, “Woe to us, the monks!” “How can we free ourselves and be saved from these snares, so as not to become entangled in them?” The angels said to him, “Humility saves one from all of them, and whoever possesses it will never become entangled in them or fall.” But they did not say that passions and demons are overcome by humility alone: other deeds and feats are also required alongside humility. Humility alone, by itself, will bring no benefit, just as deeds without humility mean nothing: for without it, they are like meat seasoned with earth rather than salt, which spoils easily and perishes. Thus, physical labor, the inner struggle of the mind, silence, and unceasing prayer, combined with perfect humility, overcome all passions and demons, so that the latter are powerless to harm the monk who possesses these virtues, as the angels told Abba Anthony.

9. Question. Abba Anthony said: If we engage in good deeds, we must fear God deeply and humble ourselves greatly before Him, so that He, who knows our weakness, may cover us with His right hand and protect us; for if we become proud, He will remove His protection from us, and we will perish. What is the meaning of this saying of the blessed one?

Answer: We must always be humble, both in times of hardship, sorrow, and strife, and in times of peace and rest from strife. We need humility at all times, for during times of strife it brings us help and gives us the strength to bear the burden of suffering, and during times of peace and rest from strife it protects us from pride and keeps us from falling. Likewise, because of our sloth and the godlessness that ensnares us, we must humble ourselves, for our obvious weakness in this regard will naturally lead to humility and compel us to cast aside all pride. God does not want us to be constantly in danger and distress, but, in His goodness and love for humanity, He shields us and puts an end to the battles of the passions and the ferocity of the demons. Therefore, if during times of struggle and trial we resort to humility because of danger and hardship, but in times of peace and safety from strife we forget God and become puffed up with pride, then He will undoubtedly remove His protection from us, and we will perish in ruin and despair. For there is no time when we do not need humility, since in every place and in all our actions we certainly have a need for it.

10. Question. One of the elders prayed to God to show him all the fathers, and he was granted a vision of them all except St. Abba Anthony. The one who showed them to him said, “Where God is, there is Abba Anthony.” How did he see all the fathers, and why did he not see Abba Anthony?

Answer. Either the elder's mind was raptured into paradise, where he saw the Fathers, or the Fathers themselves came to him, or an angel showed them to him through a vision. Abba Anthony, however, was not visible to him for two reasons: to demonstrate the greatness of St. Abba Anthony's glory, and to humble the elder so that he would not become puffed up with pride at having seen all the Fathers. For in granting his request, God, through this vision of the fathers, obliged him to imitate them; and the fact that he was not deemed worthy to see St. Anthony was meant to suggest—that the elder did not possess sufficient strength to imitate him, thereby providing him with an incentive to suppress his pride and humble himself.

11. Question. Once Abba Ammon the Virgin came to Abba Anthony and said to him, “I see that I have more work to do than you; how is it, then, that your name is more renowned among people than mine?” Saint Anthony replied to him, “It is because I love God more than you do.” With what intention was this said?

Answer. Neither Abba Ammon was boasting of his deeds, nor Abba Anthony of his love, but the intent of their words was this: Since these saints were the first founders of the monastic order and the pioneers of the desert life, they intended, by mutual agreement, to affirm and show to all monks that the inner order of the mind is superior to physical feats. For this inner order of the mind directs and inspires the monk's soul toward the most perfect love of God, making him worthy of visions and revelations of God's glory. Physical feats free the monk from bodily passions, strengthen him in virtue, give him the power to drive away lusts, and bring purity to the body. And the spiritual struggle arms the soul against demons and the thoughts they instill, and brings purity to the heart, which gains strength from love and becomes worthy of being governed by the Spirit. Not everyone who excels in virtue and loves the Lord needs to be celebrated among people: for behold, Abba Paul, the forefather of the desert fathers and the firstborn among the monks (whom Abba Anthony sometimes called the Prophet Elijah, sometimes John the Baptist, and sometimes the Apostle Paul), was not at all known among people while he was alive. But, as I have already said, those two fathers wished to mutually affirm and teach us which form of asceticism is superior to the other—the physical or the spiritual, consisting in the inner, secret struggle of the mind, in unceasing prayer and contemplation of God, which, when perfected, elevate the monk's mind to a spiritual state consisting of spiritual prayer, wonder at God, contemplation of Him, and the manifestation of the glory of our Lord and God, to whom be praise forever and ever. Amen.

12. Question. St. Abba Anthony said that God does not allow the devil to wage fierce battles against this race, because it is weak. — How so?

Answer. God has compassion on this generation and does not allow it to be too severely oppressed by the devil, since we lack sufficient fervor in our love for God and zeal for good deeds. Therefore, the devil attacks us more weakly because of our weakness and sloth.

13. Question. What do the following words of Abba Anthony mean: "If the mule did not cover the mule's eyes, he would gain nothing; for the mule would fall from dizziness, and the work would cease." In the same way, we too are veiled by divine providence. For we, too, initially do good without seeing it, so that we might not consider ourselves blessed and thus cause our labors to be lost; which is why we sometimes fall into shameful thoughts, so that, upon seeing them, we may reproach ourselves. It is precisely these shameful thoughts that serve as a covering for the small good we do, since a person who reproaches himself will not lose his reward. — Explain to us what is useful in this saying?

Answer. Not all saints are granted visions; they do not even see the good they do or the promises prepared for them, even though they are filled with good deeds and virtues. This is not because God does not rejoice in their virtues or take comfort in their good deeds. That the All-Good One should diminish anything from the reward prepared for the righteous—far be it from Him! But He does this so that virtuous people may not become puffed up with pride, and so that the value of their virtue may not be entirely lost as a result, lest they be deprived of the blessings prepared for them and become estranged from God's grace. Why, then, even though they are doers of good and devoted to virtue—and God protects them—does He nevertheless sometimes allow demons to mock them, to sow shameful thoughts within them, or to instill fear, or to inflict wounds, so that they may recognize their own weakness and always remain cautious and vigilant: for as long as they remain in this world, their life is changeable and fickle. But just as the thought of the good that is prepared for them because of their good deeds sustains in them a zeal for constant good works in order to obtain it, so the awareness of their shortcomings and their weakness turns them away from pride and makes them ready for every kind of humility, and they take every precaution lest they lose their virtue at the very time when they are to receive abundant joy from our Lord Jesus Christ in the eternal kingdom of heaven.

14. Question. When Abba Hellenius of Syria came to Abba Anthony, Abba Anthony, upon seeing him, said, "Welcome, dawn rising in the morning." And Abba Hellenius replied to him, "Greetings to you as well, O radiant pillar who has adorned the universe." — Who is this Hellenius? And why did the blessed one call him that?

Answer. This Hellenius lived during the time of Abba Anthony and was his equal in both spiritual perfection and deeds. Emperor Constantine the Victor praised him, saying: "I thank the Lord Jesus Christ that in my days there are three divine luminaries—the blessed Abba Anthony, Abba Hellenius, and Abba Euchinus." He said this because they far surpassed all the monks who lived and were known at that time. Abba Anthony called him the Morning Star because, just as the Morning Star surpasses all other stars in size and brightness, so Abba Hellenius surpassed all the other monks of his time with the light of grace. And for his part, wishing to show Abba Anthony that he was well aware of the height of his perfection and the greatness of the light of grace bestowed upon him, he called him a luminous pillar that adorned the universe.

15. Question. Abba Anthony said: “We do not succeed because we do not know our own rank and station, and we do not understand what the task we are undertaking requires, yet we wish to attain virtue without effort.” Why, as soon as we encounter temptation where we live, do we move to another place, thinking that there is somewhere where the devil is not present? But whoever has come to realize that there is a battle wages war constantly (everywhere) with God’s help, for our Lord said, “The kingdom of God is within you” (Luke 17:21).—What is He pointing out with these words?

Answer. The meaning of His words is this: People move from one place to another, hoping to find a place where the devil is not present, but when they encounter temptations even where they have moved, they flee to yet another place. But whoever knows that there is a battle fights with God’s help right where he lives and does not seek another place. The meaning of what our Lord said—“The Kingdom of God is within you”—is that we, monks who have left the world, taken up our cross according to the commandment of our Lord, and followed Him, must remain in one place and, concerned solely with the salvation of our souls, endure every kind of struggle we encounter there. Out of love for God and for the sake of fulfilling His will—which consists in keeping His commandments—we must, wherever we may be, patiently endure all trials and temptations, whether they come from passions, from demons, or from people. But these people, unskilled in the struggle and unaccustomed to enduring any hardship, rush off to other places, hoping to find rest from the struggle and refuge from their thoughts, moving from one place to another and from one country to another. Why, then, should we remain where we are? And if strife or temptation assails us, let us fast, pray, kneel, and beat our breasts before the cross of our Lord, with tears and a sorrowful heart, asking Him for help and salvation—for He is always with us and dwells within us, as it is written: “The Lord is near to the brokenhearted, and He will save those who are humble in spirit” (Ps. 33: 19), and as the Lord Himself said: “The Kingdom of God is within you” (Luke 17: 21), that is, I dwell within you. For the Kingdom of God is Christ, Who always dwells within us. Blessed Paul also says: “Do you not know that Christ dwells in you?” (1 Cor. 3:16). And not only does He dwell in us, but we also abide in Him, as He Himself says: “Abide in Me, and I in you” (John 15:4). Therefore, if we dwell in God and are ourselves His dwelling place, let us not forsake our Lord during times of temptation, misfortune, and strife; and when we move to other places, let us not seek help or refuge from foreign lands or places, but let us remain in our own places, imploring the Lord who dwells within us to grant us help and deliver us. At the same time, let us open our hearts to our spiritual fathers and ask for their prayers to help us. Enduring in our places, let us always take refuge in the protection of our Savior, and He will undoubtedly make us victorious in all our battles.

Saint Macarius the Great

Information on the Life and Writings of St. Macarius

The closest successor to St. Anthony’s teaching gift was St. Macarius of Egypt. The accounts preserve only two instances of St. Macarius visiting St. Anthony, but we must assume that these were not the only occasions. It is likely that St. Macarius often had the opportunity to listen to the lengthy discourses of St. Anthony, who, emerging from his solitude, would sometimes speak all night long to the brothers gathered to be edified by him and awaiting him in the monastery, as Cronius attests (Lives, ch. 23). That is why certain instructions of St. Anthony can be heard almost word for word in St. Macarius’s discourses. Anyone reading both in succession will notice this immediately. And one cannot help but acknowledge that this lamp—St. Macarius—was kindled by that great luminary—St. Anthony. The accounts of St. Macarius’s life have not come down to us in their entirety. Everything that could be learned about him is gathered in his biography, included in the edition of his conversations. The most remarkable episode in it is the slander he endured while he was still living not far from the village. What humility, what self-denial, what devotion to God’s will! These traits later characterized the entire life of St. Macarius. Even Satan openly admitted that he was ultimately defeated by St. Macarius’s humility. It also served as a ladder to those lofty degrees of spiritual perfection and gifts of grace that we ultimately see in St. Macarius. From the writings of St. Macarius, we have 50 discourses and an epistle. They have long been published in Russian translation, and there is no need to include them in our collection as they are. We will make a selection from them that would present, in a certain order, the teachings of St. Macarius. For they form a coherent whole and are remarkable in that they explain in detail the central task of Christianity—the sanctification of the fallen soul through the action of the grace of the Holy Spirit. This is the main point toward which nearly all of his lessons are directed. This is also the approach taken by Greek Philanthropy. From St. Macarius, it includes not his discourses but 150 chapters extracted by Simeon Metaphrastes from his discourses, which in our collection comprise seven volumes. But what Metaphrastes did, anyone can do. That is what we are doing as well. St. Macarius does not address the specifics of asceticism. Those to whom he addressed his discourses were already zealous laborers. Therefore, he was primarily concerned only with giving proper direction to these labors, pointing out to them the ultimate goal toward which they should strive, thereby elevating such labors and efforts. This, as already mentioned, is the sanctification of the soul by the grace of the Holy Spirit. Spiritualization is the very essence of the soul. Without it, there is no life. It is the pledge of a future state of light. St. Macarius deals with the fallen soul and teaches it how to emerge from this state of darkness, corruption, and lifelessness into the light, to be healed, and to come alive. Therefore, his teachings are important not only for ascetics but for all Christians in general: for Christianity consists precisely in rising from the fall. This is why the Lord came, and all His salvific institutions in the Church are directed toward the same end. Although he consistently makes a life of renunciation a prerequisite for success in this endeavor, a certain kind of renunciation is also obligatory for the laity. For the desires of the world are enmity toward God. And under such circumstances, what salvation is there? In selecting these teachings, we will follow the order that naturally forms in our minds as we read the discourses of St. Macarius. St. Macarius often traces our thoughts back to our very beginning and depicts the luminous state in which the first man found himself; he does this so that the already gloomy image of the fallen man—which he portrays in the most unattractive terms—may appear all the more bleak. He does both of these things so that God’s boundless mercy—revealed to us in our salvation through the Incarnation of God’s Only-Begotten Son—and the grace of the Most Holy Spirit may appear all the more evident. Yet he presents these three subjects with the aim of stirring in everyone the desire to work out their own salvation and inspiring them with the courage to patiently walk and complete the entire path. This path begins with the formation of a firm, resolute determination—as firm as one’s own life—to follow the Lord; it proceeds through the toil of self-discipline and self-denial; but having thereby attained the tangible working of grace—or, as he says, to the point where the grace of the Holy Spirit is finally revealed in the heart with power and efficacy, it leads to the perfection possible on earth in Christ Jesus our Lord and culminates in a twofold state of the soul in the life to come. Thus, we will gather all the thoughts of St. Macarius the Great under the following headings:

1. The luminous state of the first man.
2. The dark state of the fallen man.
3. Our only salvation—the Lord Jesus Christ.
4. Forming a firm resolve to follow the Lord.
5. The state of spiritual struggle.
6. The state of those who have received a sense of grace.
7. The possibility of Christian perfection on earth.
8. The future state after death and resurrection.

Throughout, the words of St. Macarius are quoted verbatim. The compiler adds only the titles. In the quotations, the first number indicates the discourse, and the second indicates the chapter or paragraph of the discourse. It should be noted that there are paragraphs containing more than one idea, which is why they are sometimes quoted more than once.

The Teachings of Saint Macarius the Great on the Christian Life, Selected from His Discourses

1. The Luminous Primordial State

a) The ultimate goal and supreme good of man lies in communion with God. God is pleased to dwell within him, and man finds rest nowhere else but in God. Such is the kinship between man and God according to the original purpose of creation.

1. There is no other such closeness and mutuality as that which exists between the soul and God and between God and the soul. God created various creatures; He created the heavens and the earth, the sun, the moon, water, fruit-bearing trees, and all kinds of animals. But the Lord does not rest in any of these creatures. Every creature is under His authority; yet He has not established a throne within them, nor has He established communion with them. Instead, He took a special delight in a single human being, entered into communion with him, and dwells within him. Do you see in this the kinship between God and man, and between man and God? (45, 5).

2. Just as God created heaven and earth for man to dwell in, so He created man's body and soul as a dwelling place for Himself, so that He might dwell and find rest in his body as in His own house, having as His beautiful bride the beloved soul, created in His image. Why does the Apostle say, "We are His house" (Heb. 3:6)? (49, 5).

3. The High Dignity of Man. Consider the heavens, the earth, the sun, and the moon: the Lord did not choose to rest in any of them, but only in man. Therefore, man is more precious than all creatures—dare I say, not only the visible ones, but also the invisible ones, that is, the ministering spirits. For God did not say of the archangels Michael and Gabriel, "Let us make them in our image and likeness" (Gen. 1: 26), but He said this of the rational human essence—that is, the immortal soul. It is written: "Angelic hosts surround those who fear Him" (Ps. 33: 8). (15, 20, 41).

4. Therefore, the sensible and prudent soul, having surveyed all creation, finds rest nowhere except in the One Lord. And the Lord favors no one except a single human being (45:5).

5. Just as a wealthy maiden betrothed to marriage, no matter what gifts she receives before the wedding, finds no peace until the marriage union is consummated, so too the soul finds no peace in anything until it attains perfect communion with the Lord. Or just as a hungry infant pays no heed to pearls or expensive garments, but focuses all its attention on the nourishing breasts to taste the milk, so too should you consider the soul (that is, that, setting everything else aside, it seeks to taste God—and only then does it find peace) (45:7).

b) Having such a purpose, man was adapted to it from the very moment of creation. In creation, he was placed at the goal.

6. The soul is a great and wondrous thing. When God created it, He fashioned it in such a way that no vice was implanted in its nature; on the contrary, He created it in the image of the Spirit's virtue, imbuing it with the laws of virtue, discernment, knowledge, prudence, faith, love, and other virtues, in the image of the Spirit (46, 5).

7. He endowed it with understanding, will, and a sovereign mind; He established within it another great refinement; He made it agile, light of foot, and tireless; He granted it the ability to come and go in an instant and to serve Him in thought whenever the Spirit wills. In short, He created her so that she might become His bride and partner, so that He might be united with her, and she with Him in one spirit, as it is said: "Whoever is joined to the Lord is one spirit with the Lord" (1 Cor. 6:17) (46:6).

8. Just as a husband carefully gathers all kinds of good things into his home, so the Lord gathers and stores up the heavenly riches of the Spirit in His home—the soul and the body (49:4).

c) As a result, the first-created were in God and possessed great advantages and blessings.

9. Before the fall, they were clothed in God's glory... As long as Adam kept the commandment, he was God's friend—and dwelt with God in paradise (12:8).

10. The Word dwelt in Adam, and he had the Spirit of God within him (12:6).

11. The mind, originally pure and abiding in its proper order, contemplated its Lord; and Adam, abiding in purity, reigned over his thoughts and was blessed, enveloped in divine glory (45:1, 15, 23, 1.2, 6).

12. The Word, dwelling within him, was everything to him: knowledge, the sensation of bliss, inheritance, and teaching. And from without, glory rested upon the first-created, so that they did not see their own nakedness (12:7, 10).

13. Man was in honor and purity; he was the ruler of all things, beginning with the heavens; he was able to discern passions; he was alien to demons; he was pure from sin or vice—he was in the image of God (26:1).

d) But this abundance of grace was in no way coercive. Man was free to remain with God and grace or to separate himself from them. He separated himself and fell, just as the spirits had fallen.

14. The Creator fashioned all rational beings—that is, angels, souls, and demons—pure and exceedingly simple. And the fact that some of them turned to evil happened of their own accord: for of their own free will they strayed from right thought (16:1).

15. Visible creatures are bound by a certain immutable nature; they cannot depart from the state in which they were created, and they have no will. But you were created in the image and likeness of God. Just as God is free and creates whatever He wills, so too are you free. By nature, you are easily changeable (15:20, 21).

16. Our nature is receptive both to good and to evil, to God's grace and to the opposing power. It cannot be compelled (15:23).

17. So too did Adam, of his own free will, transgress the commandment and listen to the deceiver (12:8).

18. Great wealth and a great inheritance were prepared for him. But as soon as he harbored evil thoughts and intentions, he was lost to God (12:1).

2. The Bleak Condition of the Fallen

a) By heeding the deceiver, Adam sold himself to him, and the deceiver, having taken possession of him, filled him with every kind of evil.

1. Adam, having transgressed God's commandment and heeded the wicked serpent, sold and surrendered himself into the devil's possession, and the wicked one took possession of his soul—that beautiful creature. The soul is called the body of deceitful darkness as long as spiritual darkness dwells within it, for it lives and is held there throughout the evil age of darkness, just as the Apostle, speaking of the body of sin and the body of death, says: "Let the body of sin be put to death" (Rom. 6:6), and again: "Who will deliver me from this body of death?" (Rom. 7:24). The soul is neither of God's nature nor of the nature of wicked darkness, but is a rational creature, filled with beauty, great and wondrous, a perfect likeness and image of God; and the wickedness of dark passions entered into it as a result of sin (1:7).

2. The Evil Prince—the kingdom of darkness—first captivated man, then encircled and clothed the soul with the power of darkness, just as one would clothe a man to make him a king and give him all the royal garments, so that from head to toe he might wear everything royal. Thus the Evil Prince clothed the soul in sin, defiled its entire nature and all of it, enslaved it entirely to his kingdom, leaving not a single part of it free from his power—neither its thoughts, nor its mind, nor its body—but clothed it in the purple of darkness. Just as in the body (when sick) it is not just one part that suffers, but the whole body is entirely subject to suffering, so too has the entire soul suffered from the infirmities of vice and sin. The Evil One has clothed the whole soul—this essential part of man, this essential member of his being—in his malice, that is, in sin; and in this way the body has become suffering and mortal (2:1).

3. When the Apostle says, "Put off the old man" (Col. 3:9), he refers to the perfect man, in whom the eyes correspond to the eyes, the head to the head, the ears to the ears, the hands to the hands, and the feet to the feet. For the evil one has defiled and drawn to himself the entire old man—defiled, unclean, godless, and disobedient to God's law—into sin itself, so that he would no longer see as is proper for a human being, but would see with deceit, and hear with deceit, and his feet would hasten to do evil, and his hands would commit lawlessness, and his heart would devise deceit (2:2).

4. The old man has cast off the perfect man and wears the garments of the kingdom of darkness—garments of blasphemy, unbelief, fearlessness, vanity, pride, greed, lust, and other garments of the kingdom of darkness, unclean and vile rags (2:4).

5. This is precisely what the enemy sought to achieve: to wound and darken the inner man—the ruling mind that beholds God—through Adam's transgression. And when heavenly blessings became inaccessible to him, his eyes were opened to vices and passions (20:4).

6. The spirits of malice bind the (fallen) soul with the chains of darkness; therefore, it cannot love the Lord as much as it desires, nor believe as much as it desires, nor pray as much as it desires, because ever since the first man's transgression, opposition—both open and hidden—has taken hold of us in everything (21:2).

b) Seeing this ruinous state, God and the angels took pity on the fallen one.

7. On the day Adam fell, God came and, walking in Paradise and seeing Adam, took pity on him, so to speak, and said: "With such blessings, what evil have you chosen! After such glory, what shame do you now bear! Why are you now so darkened, so disfigured, so frail? After such light, what darkness has covered you!" When Adam fell and died to God, the Creator had compassion on him; the angels, all the powers, heaven, earth, and all creatures mourned his death and fall. For the creatures saw that the one set over them as king had become a slave to the hostile and deceitful darkness. Thus, he clothed his soul in darkness—bitter and deceitful darkness—because the prince of darkness had taken dominion over him. He (Adam) was the one who was wounded by robbers and left half-dead as he traveled from Jerusalem to Jericho (30:7).

c) Yet the truth subjected him to righteous punishment, and he was left like a desolate house.

8. Adam, having transgressed the commandment, was cast out of paradise and brought God's wrath upon himself. Just as God, having once been angered at the Jews, delivered Jerusalem to the shame of its enemies, and those who hated them came to rule over them, and there was no longer any feast or offering there, so, having been angered at the soul for transgressing the commandment, He delivered it to its enemies, the demons and the passions, and they, having deceived it, utterly humiliated it, and there was no longer any feast, incense, or offering presented by the soul to God, because the paths leading to what is noble within it were filled with wild beasts, and reptiles—the deceitful spirits—made their nests there. And just as a house, if its master does not dwell in it, is shrouded in darkness, disgrace, and desecration, and is filled with filth and pus, so too the soul, if its Lord does not rejoice in it with the Angels, is filled with sinful darkness, shameful passions, and all manner of disgrace (12:10, 28:1).

9. Since man, in his disobedience, accepted one oath after another: "The ground will yield thorns and thistles for you" (Gen. 3:18), and furthermore: "You shall till the ground, and it will not yield its fruit to you," thorns and thistles have sprung up and grown in the ground of his heart. His enemies have deceitfully stolen his glory and clothed him in shame. His light has been stolen, and he is clothed in darkness. They have slain his soul, scattered and divided his thoughts, and brought his mind down from on high; and the man of Israel has become a slave to the true Pharaoh, who has set over him overseers and inspectors—those who are deceitful in spirit—who compel him, willingly or unwillingly, to do his wicked deeds, to produce rubbish and debris. Having turned man away from the heavenly way of thinking, they brought him down to wicked deeds—material, earthly, and fleeting—and to words, thoughts, and vain reasoning—for the soul, having fallen from its height, encountered a misanthropic kingdom and cruel princes who compel it to build for them sinful cities of vice (47:6).

d) As a result of the Fall, all creation and the entire human race have been subjected to the tyranny of the enemy and the passions.

10. Imagine a king who possesses wealth, and whose servants are ready to serve him, and it so happened that his enemies captured him and took him into captivity. As soon as he is captured and led away, his servants and officials must necessarily follow him. So too was Adam created pure by God to serve Him, and these creatures were given to Adam for his service, because he was appointed lord and king over all creatures. But as soon as the deceitful word found its way to him and spoke to him, Adam first received it with his outward hearing; then it penetrated his heart and took hold of his entire being. And thus, through his captivity, the creatures that served and obeyed him were also taken captive along with him, for through him death reigned over every soul, and as a result of his disobedience, the entire image of Adam was so obliterated that people changed and came to worship demons. For even the fruits of the earth, beautifully created by God, are offered to demons. Bread, wine, oil, and animals are laid upon their altars. They even sacrificed their own sons and daughters to the demons (11:5).

11. Since the time of Adam's transgression, the thoughts of the soul, having turned away from God's love, have scattered throughout this age and become mingled with material and earthly thoughts. But just as Adam, having transgressed the commandment, took into himself the leaven of evil passions, so too those born of him and the entire line of Adam, by inheritance, became partakers of this leaven, and as they gradually matured and grew, sinful passions multiplied in people to such an extent that they extended to adultery, debauchery, idolatry, murder, and other absurd deeds, until all of humanity was corrupted by vices. Evil had grown so much in people that they came to think there was no God; they began to worship lifeless stones and could not even form a concept of God in their minds. To such an extent did the leaven of malicious passions leaven the race of the old Adam (24:2).

12. After man strayed from the commandment and was subjected to the judgment of wrath, sin took him into its dominion and, like a certain abyss of bitterness—both subtle and deep—entered within and took possession of the pastures of the soul down to its deepest recesses. Thus, both the soul and the sin mingled with it are likened to a great tree with many branches and roots in the depths of the earth. Likewise, the sin that entered the soul took hold of its innermost recesses, turned into habit and prejudice, and from infancy onward grows within each person, nurturing and teaching them evil (41:1).

13. Lazarus, whom the Lord raised from the dead—this Lazarus, who was so filled with a terrible stench that no one could approach his coffin—was a likeness of Adam, who had taken into his soul a terrible stench and was filled with darkness and gloom. But when you hear about Adam, about the man wounded by robbers, and about Lazarus, do not let your mind wander as if over the mountains, but turn inward to your own soul, for you, too, bear the same wounds, the same stench, the same darkness. We are all sons of this tainted race; we all share in that same stench. Whatever infirmity befell Adam has also befallen all of us who are descended from Adam's seed. For, as Isaiah says, the same infirmity has befallen us: "No scab, no sore, no burning wound—there is no bandage to apply, no ointment, no dressing to make" (Isa. 1:6). We are afflicted by such an incurable sore (30:8).

14. Just as in Egypt, during the three days of darkness, a son did not see his father, a brother did not see his brother, nor a friend his true friend, because darkness covered them, so too, after Adam transgressed the commandment, he fell from his former glory and submitted to the spirit of the world, and the veil of darkness descended upon his soul, from him until the last Adam, the Lord, man did not see the true Heavenly Father, the merciful and kind Mother—the grace of the Spirit—the sweetest and most longed-for Brother—the Lord—nor his friends and his faithful holy angels, with whom he once rejoiced and celebrated. And not only until the last Adam, but even now, for those upon whom the sun of righteousness—Christ—has not shone, and whose spiritual eyes have not been opened by the true light, —all such are shrouded in the same darkness of sin, are subject to the same influence of sensuality, are liable to the same punishment, and have no eyes with which to see the Father (28:4).

d) The most palpable consequence of the Fall is the confusion that reigns throughout the world.

15. The children of this age are likened to wheat poured into the sieve of this earth, and they are sifted amid the fickle thoughts of this world, amid the ceaseless turmoil of earthly affairs, desires, and the intricate web of material concepts. Satan shakes the souls, and with the sieve—that is, earthly affairs—he sifts the entire sinful human race. Ever since the Fall, when Adam transgressed the commandment and submitted to the crafty prince who took dominion over him, Satan has been sifting all the children of this age with ceaseless, seductive, and turbulent thoughts, bringing them into conflict within the sieve of the earth (5:1).

16. Just as wheat in a winnowing basket is tossed about by the winnower and, being constantly thrown up, is tossed about within it, so the prince of deceit occupies all people with earthly affairs, wavers them, leads them into confusion and anxiety, compels them to indulge in vain thoughts, vile desires, and earthly and worldly ties, ceaselessly ensnaring, bewildering, and capturing the entire sinful race of Adam. And the Lord foretold to the Apostles the future rebellion of the wicked one against them: "Satan has asked to sift you like wheat, but I have prayed to My Father that your faith may not fail" (Luke 22:31–32). For this word and declaration, spoken plainly by the Creator to Cain: "You will be restless and trembling," in distress, "on the earth" (Gen. 4:12), secretly serves as a model and likeness for all sinners, because the race of Adam, having transgressed the commandment and become sinful, secretly took upon itself this likeness. People are tossed about by the fickle thoughts of fear, dread, and all manner of confusion, as well as by desires and a multitude of pleasures of every kind. The prince of this world stirs up every soul not born of God, and, like wheat constantly swirling in a winnowing basket, he stirs up human thoughts in various ways, causing everyone to waver and ensnaring them with worldly deceptions, carnal pleasures, fears, and confusion (5:2).

17. And the Lord, showing that those who follow the deceptions and desires of the evil one bear the likeness of Cain's wickedness, and exposing them, said: "You wish to carry out the desires of your father; he was a murderer from the beginning and does not stand in the truth" (John 8:44). Therefore, the entire sinful race of Adam secretly bears this condemnation: groaning and trembling, you will be tormented in the sieve of the earth by Satan, who sows you there. Just as the entire human race spread across the earth from one Adam, so too has a single passionate corruption permeated the entire sinful human race, and the prince of malice alone is capable of sowing in all of us fickle, materialistic, vain, and rebellious thoughts. And just as a single wind can set all plants and seeds in motion and make them sway, and just as the darkness of night spreads over the entire universe, so the prince of deceit—being a kind of mental darkness of sin and death—storms and whirls the entire human race on earth with a secret and cruel wind, capturing human hearts with fickle thoughts and worldly desires, and filling every soul—not born from above and not having migrated in thought and mind to another age—with the darkness of ignorance, blindness, and forgetfulness, as it is said: "Our citizenship is in heaven" (Phil. 3: 20). (5: 3).

e) Everyone has experienced this, but no one knew what this evil was or where it came from, regarding such a state as natural.

18. The visible world, from kings down to beggars, is entirely in turmoil, in disorder, and in strife, and none of them know the reason for this—that is, this manifest evil that arose as a result of Adam's transgression, this sting of death—because sin, having come as a certain rational power and the very essence of Satan, has sown every kind of evil: it secretly acts upon the inner person and the mind and battles against it with thoughts, yet people do not know that they are being driven by some foreign force; on the contrary, they think that this is natural and that they are acting according to their own reasoning. But those who have the peace of Christ and the illumination of Christ in their very minds know where all this originates (15:47).

19. How many kings from the line of Adam have appeared, who ruled over the whole earth and thought much about their royal dominion! And not one of them, in the midst of such prosperity, was able to recognize the damage that the first man's sin had wrought in the soul and had darkened it; therefore, the soul does not recognize the change that has taken place within it—namely, that the mind is now clothed in shame because of its fall, and, because the eyes of the heart have been blinded, it does not see the glory that our father Adam saw before the fall (45:1).

20. There were idle sages in the world: some of them demonstrated their superiority in philosophy, others amazed with their skill in sophistry, still others displayed their power in rhetoric, and still others were grammarians and poets who wrote histories according to established rules. There were also various artists who practiced the secular arts... And all of these, possessed by the serpent that had taken up residence within them and unaware of the sin dwelling within them, became captives and slaves to the deceitful power and derived no benefit whatsoever from their knowledge and art (45:2).

g) No matter how great the evil resulting from the Fall, it did not completely kill man. Manifestations of spiritual life remained within him.

21. We do not say that man has been entirely lost, destroyed, or dead: he is dead to God, yet lives by his own nature (12:2).

22. Man perished because of his transgression; he became corrupt, and Satan clouded his mind. And in one sense, man is truly dead, but in another, he lives, reasons, and possesses a will (26:1).

23. And after the sin, knowledge remains. (This is clearly evident in the workings of the conscience.) When a robber is brought to court and the trial begins, the prince asks him: "When you committed evil, did you not know that you would be caught and put to death?" And the robber does not dare to say that he did not know, because he was aware of it. Does the adulterer not know that he is doing wrong? Does the thief not know that he is sinning? — So do people, even without Scripture, by their natural understanding, not know that God exists? On that day, it will be impossible for them to say, "We did not know that God exists." For through the thunder and lightning from heaven, it is proclaimed to them: "Do you not know that God exists, who governs all creation?" (12:8–9).

24. It is unjust for some, led astray by false teaching, to claim that man is utterly dead and incapable of doing any good at all (46:3).

25. Man still possesses the freedom that God gave him in the beginning. Just as the perfect are not bound to good by any necessity, so too are those who are mired in sin and have made themselves vessels of the devil not bound to evil (15:38).

26. You are free, and if you wish to perish, your nature is easily changeable. Whoever wishes to do so submits to God, walks the path of righteousness, and masters his desires, for the mind is an adversary and, with a firm resolve, can overcome vicious inclinations and vile desires (15:21).

27. It is in vain, however, to think that one can use one's own freedom to remove the causes of sin from oneself. The freedom available to a person extends to resisting temptation, not to necessarily having power over one's passions when that opportunity arises. For it is said: "Unless the Lord builds the house and guards the city, the watchman stays awake in vain," and the builder labors in vain (Ps. 126:1). (25:1).

28. Evil acts within us with all its strength and intensity, instilling all manner of impure desires; yet it is not mingled with us in the way that others speak of mixing wine with water, but rather as wheat and tares grow side by side in the same field, or as a robber and the master of the house dwell together in the same house (16:1).

29. When the sun shines and the wind blows, the sun has its own body and its own nature, and the wind has its own nature and its own body. So too has sin mingled with the soul, yet both sin and the soul have their own distinct nature (2:2).

30. A spring pours out clear water, but at its bottom lies silt. If someone stirs up the silt, the entire spring becomes murky. So too, when the soul is disturbed, it merges with vice. And Satan becomes one with the soul; during fornication or murder, the two spirits form a single entity. That is why "Do not be joined together with an idolatrous body” (1 Cor. 6:16). At other times, however, the independent soul acts on its own and repents of its deeds, weeps, prays, and recalls God. And if the soul were always mired in evil, how could it do this? Because Satan, being hard-hearted, does not want people to turn to repentance (16:2).

3. The Lord, the Architect of Salvation

a) The Lord is the only salvation for the fallen. The Lord had mercy and came in the flesh for our salvation. With His blood He washed away our sins; through the grace of the Holy Spirit He renewed our decayed nature and thus made us fit for His heavenly kingdom.

1. The world is likened to a rich man who owns magnificent and vast houses, abounds in silver and gold, various possessions, and all manner of servants, but is suddenly stricken with sickness and infirmity; all his relatives stand before him, and, despite all his wealth, cannot deliver him from his illness. So no worldly prudence, no wealth, nor anything else can deliver a soul steeped in sin from sin; only the coming of Christ can purify the soul and the body (45:3).

2. Since the human race, conceived in lawlessness and born in sin, was estranged from the mother’s womb and remained in error from the mother’s womb after sin began to reign through Adam, the Lamb of God came in His mercy to take away the sins of the world by His own power, first binding the strong one and then plundering the vessels he had gathered as spoils, as it is said: “You have taken captives captive” (Ps. 67:19). (Epistle, p. 433).

3. From the time of the transgression of the commandment, Satan and the princes of darkness took up residence in Adam’s heart, mind, and body, as if on their own throne. Why did the Lord finally come and take upon Himself a body from the Virgin? Because if it had pleased Him to come as uncreated Divinity, who could have endured this? Instead, through this instrument—the body—He turned to humanity. And finally, the Lord deposed the evil spirits dwelling in the body from their thrones—that is, from the concepts and thoughts through which they ruled—and purified the conscience, making the mind, the thoughts, and the body a throne for Himself (6:5).

4. God commanded Moses to make a bronze serpent, to raise it up, and to fasten it to the top of a tree; and all who had been bitten by serpents were healed by looking at the bronze serpent. The dead serpent overcame the living serpents, for it was a symbol of the Lord’s body. For the Lord took His body, which He had received from Mary, and lifted it up on the cross, stretched it out on the tree, and nailed it there; and the dead body conquered and put to death the serpent that lives and crawls within the heart. Here is a great miracle (11:8–9).

5. No one—neither among the righteous, nor among the fathers, nor among the prophets, nor among the patriarchs—could heal the soul, which was initially afflicted with the incurable wound of harmful passions. Moses came, but he could not provide complete healing. There were priests, offerings, tithes, observance of the Sabbath, new moons, ablutions, sacrifices, burnt offerings, and every other act of righteousness performed according to the law; yet the soul could not be healed or cleansed of the impure flow of evil thoughts, and all its righteousness was powerless to heal man until the Savior came, the true Physician, who heals instantly and gives Himself as the ransom for the human race. He alone accomplished the great and saving redemption and healing of the soul; He freed it from bondage and brought it out of darkness (20:5–6).

6. Human remedies derived from the earth—that is, one’s own righteous deeds alone—could not heal the soul from such an invisible affliction; only through the power of the heavenly and divine nature, the gift of the Holy Spirit—by this one remedy alone—could a person be healed and attain life through the purification of the heart by the Holy Spirit (20:7).

7. Just as a farmer, when he goes out to till the land, must take the tools and clothing suitable for cultivation, so too did Christ, the Heavenly King and true Worker, when He came to humanity, which had been laid waste by vices, clothed Himself in a body and, carrying the cross instead of a tool, cultivated the desolate soul, removed the thorns and thistles from it, uprooted the weeds of sin, and burned all the remnants of its sins with fire. And in this way, having cultivated it with the tree of the cross, He planted within it the most beautiful spiritual garden, which bears every kind of sweet and desirable fruit for God, the Lord (28:3).

8. Christ the Lord renewed the New Covenant, shattering the gates of hell and sin through the cross and His death, delivering the faithful souls, imparting the Comforter within them, and bringing them into His kingdom (38:3).

9. The Law prescribed that a priest take two doves: to slaughter one, and to sprinkle the living one with its blood and let it fly free. This act was a symbol and foreshadowing of the truth. For Christ was slain, and His blood, having sprinkled us, has set us free, because it has given us the wings of the Holy Spirit to soar unhindered in the air of the Godhead (47:2).

10. Our Lord Jesus Christ came precisely to transform, renew, and restore our nature, and to recreate this soul—which had been brought low by passions as a result of sin—by dissolving it anew with the Divine Spirit. He came to make those who believe in Him a new mind, a new soul, new eyes, new ears, a new spiritual tongue—in a word, new people (44:1).

11. Just as the enemy, having taken a person who had submitted to him, made that person new for himself by burdening him with harmful passions, anointing him with the spirit of sin, and pouring into him the wine of every lawlessness, so too the Lord, having delivered man from sin, made him new by anointing him with the Holy Spirit (44:2).

12. Just as in the visible world no one can by himself swim across or cross the sea unless he has a light and maneuverable ship—one made of wood that can glide over the waters—for whoever sets out across the sea will drown and perish, so too it is impossible for the soul by itself to cross, overcome, and swim across the bitter sea of sin, the impassable abyss of wicked forces and dark passions, unless it receives into itself the agile, heavenly, and light-winged Holy Spirit, who tramples upon and overcomes all wickedness (44, 6).

b) Having provided salvation, the Lord desires that those who wish to be saved may be saved, but He compels no one.

13. Our Lord Jesus Christ, having taken upon Himself the care for the salvation of mankind, accomplished the entire plan of salvation and from the very beginning provided for it through the Fathers, the Patriarchs, the Law, and the Prophets; and finally, having come Himself and disregarding the shame of the cross, He endured death. And all His labor, all His care, was so that from Himself, from His own nature, He might beget children by the Spirit, deeming it good that they might be born from above through His Divinity. And just as earthly fathers grieve if they do not have children, so too the Lord, having loved the human race as His own image, desired to beget them from His divine seed. And if some do not wish to accept such a birth and be born of the loins of the Spirit of God, then this is a great sorrow to Christ, who suffered and endured for them in order to save them (30:2).

14. The Lord desires that all people be made worthy of this birth, for He died for all and called all to life. And life is birth from God from above. For without this birth, it is impossible for the soul to live, as the Lord says: “Unless one is born from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God” (John 3:3). Therefore, all those who have believed in the Lord and, having come forward, have been granted this birth, bring joy and great gladness in heaven to the parents who gave them birth, and all the angels and holy powers rejoice over the soul born of the Spirit and made spirit (30:3).

15. A farmer sows seeds everywhere and desires that they all bear fruit; but then he comes with his sickle and grieves if he finds no fruit. So too does the Lord desire that His word be sown in human hearts. But just as a farmer grieves over a barren field, so the Lord grieves over a heart that is barren and bears no fruit (32:11).

16. Just as if a king, finding a poor and sickly man, were not ashamed of him, but began to heal his wounds with medicinal ointments, brought him into his palace, clothed him in purple and a diadem, and made him a companion at his table—so too the heavenly King, Christ, having come to the sickly man, healed him and admitted him to His royal table; moreover, without coercing his will but acting upon him through persuasion, He raised him to such honor (15:28).

17. It is written in the Gospel that the Lord sent servants to summon those who were willing and to announce to them: “My supper is ready” (Matt. 22: 4), but those who were invited refused and said: one—“I have bought a yoke of oxen,” another—“I have married a wife” (Luke 14: 19–20). You see—the one who invited them was ready, but those invited turned away, and, of course, they were to blame for themselves. You see, the Lord has prepared a kingdom for them; He calls them to enter, but they do not want to (15:29).

18. The Lord ceaselessly knocks at the doors of our hearts, so that we may open them to Him, and He may enter and rest in our souls, and make His dwelling within us. For He says: “Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if anyone hears My voice and opens the door, I will come in to him” (Rev. 3:20). For this reason, He was pleased to suffer greatly, delivering His body to death and redeeming us from bondage, so that, having come to our soul, He might make His dwelling there. For His food, drink, clothing, shelter, and rest are all found in our souls. Therefore, He constantly knocks at the door, desiring to enter us. Let us, then, receive Him and bring Him into our innermost being, for to us, too, He is food, drink, and eternal life. And every soul that has not received Him into itself and has not given Him rest within itself now—or rather, has not found rest in Him—has no inheritance with the saints in the kingdom of heaven and cannot enter the heavenly city. You Yourself, Lord Jesus Christ, bring us into it! (30:9).

4. Forming a Firm Resolution to Be Saved in the Lord

The soul's journey toward salvation begins with the formation of a desire for salvation and a firm resolve to achieve it in the Lord. The Lord has accomplished our salvation, has prepared everything for it, and desires that everyone be saved. All that is required is for a person to take the first step and begin the process of salvation.

a) Our desire is required as a necessary condition.

1. Human beings are by nature endowed with a purpose, and it is this that God seeks. And so He commands that a person first understand, and upon understanding, love and choose by their own will. But to put a thought into action, to undertake a task, or to accomplish a deed—this is the grace of the Lord, given to those who desire it and believe. Therefore, the human will is, as it were, an essential condition. If there is no will, God Himself does nothing, even though He is able to do so by His own freedom. Therefore, the accomplishment of a deed by the Spirit depends on the will of man. Again, if we give our full will, then the God who is wondrous in all things and utterly incomprehensible attributes the entire deed to us (37, 10).

2. Just as the woman with the issue of blood, though she could not be healed and remained afflicted, nevertheless had legs to come to the Lord and, having come, receive healing—so too the blind man, though he could not come and approach the Lord because he could not see, nevertheless sent out a cry that traveled faster than messengers: "Son of David, have mercy on me" (Mark 10:47)—and in this way, having believed, he received healing when the Lord came to him and gave him sight. So too, the soul, though scarred by the sores of shameful passions, though blinded by the darkness of sin, nevertheless has the will to cry out to Jesus and call upon Him, that He may come and grant the soul eternal salvation (20:7).

3. Just as the blind man, had he not cried out, and the woman with the issue of blood, had she not come to the Lord, would not have been healed, so too, if anyone does not approach the Lord of his own free will and with all his heart, and does not implore Him with the certainty of faith, he will not receive healing. For why were they healed immediately, while we have not yet been healed of our hidden passions? Because of our unbelief, because of our wavering, because we do not love Him with all our hearts and do not believe in Him sincerely, we have not yet received spiritual healing and salvation. Therefore, let us believe in Him and truly draw near to Him, so that He may soon bring about true healing within us. For He has promised to give "the Holy Spirit to those who ask Him" (Luke 11:13), to open the door to those who knock, and to be found by those who seek Him (Matthew 7:7). And "He who promised" is not a liar (Titus 1:2). (20:8, cf. 45:2).

4. Although an infant is powerless to do anything or cannot walk on its own to its mother, it nevertheless moves, cries out, and weeps as it seeks its mother. And the mother takes pity on it; she is glad that the child is seeking her with effort and cries. And since the infant cannot go to her, the mother herself—overcome by love for the infant after its long search—approaches it and, with great tenderness, takes it up, caresses it, and feeds it. The same does the philanthropic God with the soul that comes and seeks Him. But driven even more by His inherent love and His own goodness, He draws near to the rational soul and, according to the words of the Apostle, becomes "one spirit" with it (1 Cor. 6:17). (46, 3).

5. The Lord is merciful and long-suffering, awaiting our conversion; and if we sin, He bears with it in the hope of our repentance; and if we fall, He is not ashamed to receive us again, as the Prophet said: "Does not one who falls rise again? Or does not one who turns away return?" (Jer. 8:4). As soon as we come to our senses and acquire a good disposition, let us turn to Him quickly and in the right way to seek His help; and He is ready to save us, for He awaits the fervent striving of our will toward Him—to the best of our ability—a striving born of the free choice of faith and zeal, while He Himself brings about all progress within us. Therefore, having cast off all prejudice, indifference, and laziness, let us strive to become courageous and ready to follow in His footsteps; let us not put this off day after day, led astray by vice, for we do not know when our departure from this life will come (4:17).

b) How desire is formed.

aa) Awakening from God. The Lord instructs the soul invisibly, sometimes through misfortunes, sometimes through His direct influence, as with the Apostle Paul; but the universal herald of conversion is the Word of God.

6. (A person who is in sin) God is pleased to bring back to life, and He exhorts him to weep and repent. And if a person continues to do this (to mourn over himself), then God persuades the one who repents of his past transgressions to weep again and offer repentance (so that he may mourn over his entire life in detail). (15:15).

7. When, for the sake of God's building, you find yourself in sorrows, sufferings, and afflictions, then what you consider unpleasant for yourself actually serves the good of your soul. If misfortunes befall you, you begin to reason with yourself: "I am unhappy in the world; I will renounce the world and serve God." It may happen that, having reached this thought, you hear the command: "Sell your possessions" (Matt. 19:21), hate worldly fellowship, and serve God. Then you begin to give thanks for your misfortune in the world, for the fact that, because of this, you find yourself obeying Christ's command. Finally, if you have changed your mind to some extent regarding the visible world and have withdrawn from the world and from carnal fellowship, then you must also change in your mind, transforming carnal wisdom into heavenly wisdom. Then you begin to reflect on that very commandment you have heard, and you still find no rest, but take upon yourself only the care and labor of acquiring what you have heard (32:7).

8. How was St. Paul captured by God? Just as a rebel, having taken someone captive, leads them away to himself, and is then himself captured by the true King, so too did Paul, when the rebellious spirit of sin was at work within him, persecute and plunder the Church; but since he did this out of ignorance, not out of opposition to God, but as if striving for the truth, the Lord did not spurn him but caught him. The heavenly and true King, having graced him in an ineffable way, enabled him to hear His voice and, striking him on the face as a servant, granted him freedom. Behold the Lord's goodness and how, in the blink of an eye, He can transform souls that are attached to vice and hardened, and bestow upon them His goodness and peace (18:8).

9. Just as a king, having written letters to those to whom he wishes to grant his decrees and gifts, makes it known to all: "Hurry to come to me and receive my royal gifts"—and if they do not come and do not receive them, then reading the letters will be of no benefit to them, but rather they will become liable to death for not having wished to come and receive honor from the king's hands; so too, God the King has offered the Divine Scriptures to people as letters, proclaiming to them that those who call upon God and believe may ask for and receive the heavenly gift from the Hypostasis of His Divinity. For it is written: "that we may become partakers of the divine nature" (2 Peter 1:4). But if a person does not come, does not ask, and does not accept, then he will derive no benefit from reading the Scriptures; on the contrary, he will become liable to death for refusing to accept from the Heavenly King the gift of life, without which it is impossible to obtain immortal life (39).

bb) The struggle within oneself to incline the will toward the call.

10. A person does not immediately become worthy of this blessed honor the moment he hears the word of God. By asserting the opposite, you deprive a person of his free will and deny the existence of a countervailing force that opposes the mind. We, however, say that the one who hears the word is brought to contrition, and then begins to train and learn the art of battle; he struggles and strives against Satan, and after a long contest and struggle, he emerges victorious and becomes a Christian (that is, he resolves to be a strict follower of Christ). (27, 20).

bb) Ideas and convictions that influence the inclination of the will. In this struggle with oneself, the mind gathers various motivating and compelling ideas of truth and convictions—capable of stirring and inspiring. St. Macarius places foremost here the ideas of what God has done for our salvation and the promises with which He has surrounded this work. He returns to this very often in various turns of phrase.

11. Delve into the rational essence of the soul, and do so with all your heart. The immortal soul is a precious vessel. Behold how vast are heaven and earth, yet God does not favor them, but only you. Behold your nobility and dignity, for He did not send angels, but the Lord Himself came as your advocate to call back the lost and wounded, and to restore to you the original image of the pure Adam. God Himself came to intercede for you and deliver you from death. So stand firm, and imagine what providence God has in store for you (26, 115. 28).

12. Imagine that a king, having found some poor young girl dressed in rags, was not ashamed, but removed her filthy clothes, washed away her darkness, adorned her with bright robes, and made her a companion and participant in the king's banquet and feast. So too did the Lord find a soul that was wounded and crushed; He healed her, stripped her of her blackened garments and the shame of vice, clothed her in royal, heavenly robes—divine, radiant, and glorious garments, placed a crown upon her, and admitted her to the royal banquet for joy and gladness (27:3).

13. Therefore, Christianity is not something trivial; it is a great mystery. Recognize, then, your nobility—namely, that you are called to royal dignity, that you are “a chosen race and a holy nation” (1 Peter 2:9). The mystery of Christianity is extraordinary to this world. The visible glory and wealth of a king are earthly, perishable, and transient, but that kingdom and that wealth are divine, heavenly, glorious, never passing away, and never ceasing. For in the heavenly Church, we reign with the heavenly King, and just as He Himself is the firstborn from the dead (Col. 1:18), so too are those who reign with Him firstborn (27:4).

14. The promises made to Christians are great and inexpressible, and so great that all the glory and splendor of heaven and earth, along with their other adornments, diversity, riches, beauty, and the delights of the visible world, cannot even compare to the faith and riches of a single soul. So, with so many incentives and promises from the Lord, how can we not desire to devote ourselves entirely to the Lord, to consecrate ourselves to Him, having renounced all else according to the Gospel, and to love Him alone with our whole soul, loving nothing else besides? All this has been granted to us—what a glory indeed! How many times has the Lord looked upon us since the days of the Fathers and the Prophets! How many promises have been proclaimed! How many exhortations! How gracious the Lord has been toward us from the very beginning! Finally, at His coming, He demonstrated His ineffable goodness toward us through the Cross, so that He might lead us who have turned to Him into life. Yet we still cling to our own desires, to our love for the world, to our evil inclinations and habits, and through this we prove ourselves to be of little faith or even faithless! Yet even with all this, the Lord remains merciful toward us, invisibly protecting and comforting us; He does not abandon us to the vices and deceptions of the world because of our sins, and through His great goodness and long-suffering, He does not allow us to perish, still hoping that we will turn to Him someday (4:17–18).

15. What do the words mean: “Eye has not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered the human heart what God has prepared for those who love Him” (1 Cor. 2:9)? At that time, the great righteous ones, kings, and prophets knew that the Savior would come, but they did not know, nor had they heard, nor had it ever occurred to them that He would suffer and be crucified, that blood would be shed on the cross, that there would be baptism by fire and the Holy Spirit, that bread and wine would be offered in the church, a symbol of His flesh and blood, that those partaking of the visible bread would spiritually partake of the Lord's flesh, that the Apostles and Christians would receive the Comforter and be clothed with power from on high, and be made partakers of unity with the Holy Spirit. The prophets and kings did not know this, nor did it ever occur to them (27, 17).

16. Since such blessings have been prepared for us, such promises have been given, and such has been the Lord's favor toward us, let us not delay or falter in hastening toward eternal life, and let us devote ourselves entirely to pleasing the Lord (49:5).

17. Hearing about the dignity of the soul and how precious this rational being is, do you understand that heaven and earth are passing away, but you are called to sonship, to brotherhood, and to be the bride of Christ? In the visible world, everything that belongs to the bridegroom also belongs to the bride; so everything that belongs to the Lord is entrusted to you. For He Himself came to intercede for you, to call you. But you have no conception of yourself and do not understand your nobility; therefore, a spiritual man rightly laments your fall, saying: “Man, though exalted, does not understand; he is like senseless cattle and becomes like them” (Ps. 48:21). (16:13). Following this, he offers other exhortations: that our goal is to be with our kindred, that is, with the Lord; and especially, that we are well only when we follow the Lord, and that there is no worse state than when we do not follow Him.

18. If you lift your eyes to the sun, you will find that the sun's disk is in the heavens, while its light and rays descend upon the earth, and all the power of its light and splendor is directed toward the earth. So too, the Lord sits at the right hand of the Father, above every principal and authority, yet His eye is fixed on the hearts of people dwelling on earth, so that He may lift up those who await His help to the place where He Himself dwells. For He says, “Where I am, there shall My servant be also” (John 12:26). But speechless animals are far wiser than we are, for each of them associates with its own kind: wild animals with wild animals, and sheep likewise with their own kind. Yet you do not return to your heavenly kinship—that is, to the Lord—but in your thoughts you agree with and incline toward evil thoughts, becoming an accomplice to sin, waging war alongside it against yourself and thus delivering yourself as prey to the enemy, just as a bird caught by an eagle is devoured, or a sheep by a wolf, or as a child dies after reaching out its hand to a snake and being bitten by it (45, 6).

19. The soul belongs to the one with whom it is in communion and unity through its desires. Therefore, either—having within itself the light of God, living in it, and adorning itself with every virtue—it partakes of the light of rest, or—having within itself the darkness of sin—it is subject to condemnation. A soul that desires to live with God in eternal rest and light must die to its former deceitful darkness and pass into another life for divine formation. Hearing this, examine yourself to see if this has taken place within you. And if not, then you must grieve, weep, and be in anguish unceasingly. As one who is still dead to the kingdom, cry out to the Lord and ask with faith that you may be made worthy of true life. God, having created this body—not from His own nature, nor from the body itself—did not grant it the ability to derive life, food, drink, clothing, or shoes; on the contrary, having created the body naked in and of itself, He arranged for it to draw everything necessary for life from the outside, and it is impossible for the body to live without what exists outside of it—that is, without food, without drink, without clothing. But if it were limited to what is inherent in its nature, without deriving anything from the outside, it would be destroyed and perish. In the same way, the soul, which does not possess the light of God within itself, though created in the image of God (for God so ordained and willed that it might have eternal life), receives spiritual food and spiritual drink not from its own nature, but from His Divinity, from His own Spirit, from His own light, and heavenly garments, which constitute the true life of the soul (1:8, 10).

20. Just as in the body, as stated earlier, life does not come from the body itself but from that which is outside it—that is, from the earth—and without what exists outside it, the body cannot live; so too, if the soul is not yet reborn into that land of the living, and you do not there receive spiritual nourishment and grow spiritually, flourishing before the Lord, and do not clothe its Divinity in the ineffable robes of heavenly beauty, then without that nourishment it is impossible for it to live by itself in delight and rest. For the nature of God possesses the bread of life, He who said, “I am the living bread” (John 6:35), “and living water” (John 4:10), “and wine that gladdens the heart of man” (Ps. 103:15), and “the oil of joy” (Ps. 44:8), and the manifold nourishment of the heavenly Spirit, and the light-bearing heavenly garments bestowed by God. This is what constitutes the heavenly life of the soul. Woe to the body when it remains confined to its natural state, for it decays and dies. Woe also to the soul if it remains confined to its natural state alone, without communion with the Divine Spirit, for it dies, having failed to partake of eternal divine life. Just as people despair over the sick when their bodies can no longer take in food, and all their loved ones—friends, relatives, and those dear to them—weep for them, so too do God and the holy angels regard as worthy of tears those souls who do not partake of the heavenly food of the Spirit and do not live in incorruption (1:11).

21. Therefore, if your inner self has experienced and unquestionably come to know all this, then you are truly living eternal life, and your soul even now rests with the Lord; you have indeed acquired and received this from the Lord so that you may live the true life. But if you do not recognize any of this within yourself, then weep, mourn, and lament, for to this day you have not yet acquired eternal and spiritual riches; to this day you have not yet received true life. Therefore, be contrite over your poverty, imploring the Lord day and night, for you are in a terrible state of sinful destitution. Oh, if only someone would acquire even this sorrow over their poverty! Oh, if only we did not spend our time in carelessness, as though we were already sated! Whoever grieves and seeks, and persistently asks the Lord, will more quickly receive deliverance and heavenly riches, as the Lord said, concluding His parable about the unjust judge and the widow: “How much more will God bring about justice for those who cry out to Him day and night? I tell you, He will bring about justice for them speedily” (Luke 18:7–8). (1:12).

22. The entire coming of the Lord was for the sake of a person lying dead in the tomb of darkness, sin, an unclean spirit, and evil powers, so that the Lord might now, in this age, raise this person from the dead and give him life, cleanse him of all darkness, enlighten him with His light, and clothe him in His heavenly garments of Divinity. At the resurrection of the bodies—whose souls have already been raised and glorified—these bodies too will be glorified; they will be enlightened by the soul, which is already enlightened and glorified, and will be clothed in a heavenly dwelling not made by human hands, in the glory of the Divine light. See how inexpressible and incomprehensible are the glories of God! It is impossible to express or describe the immeasurable, boundless, and incomprehensible riches of Christians. Therefore, one must approach the Christian life with the utmost care and accept that wealth, for the inheritance and portion of Christians is God Himself. For it is said: "The Lord is my portion and my cup" (Ps. 15:5). (34, 2. 3).

23. Just as meat without salt rots, becomes filled with a terrible stench, and because of the unbearable stench everyone turns away from it, and worms crawl in the rotten meat, finding food there, devouring it, and nesting in it, but as soon as salt is sprinkled on it—the worms that fed on the meat are exterminated and perish, and the foul odor ceases, because it is the nature of salt to exterminate worms and destroy foul odors; in the same way, every soul that is not salted by the Holy Spirit, that has no part in the heavenly salt, that is, God's power, rots and becomes filled with the great stench of wicked thoughts; therefore, the face of God turns away from the terrible stench of vain thoughts, darkness, and passions dwelling in such a soul, and evil and dreadful worms—that is, wicked spirits and dark forces; they feed, nest, and crawl there, devouring and corrupting it. For it is said: "My wounds have become foul and festering" (Ps. 37:6). But as soon as the soul turns to God, believes, and asks for the salt of life—the good and benevolent Spirit—the heavenly salt that has descended exterminates the dreadful worms within it, destroys the harmful stench, and purifies the soul through the power of its action. And thus, when the true salt has made it healthy and unharmed, it is once again put to use and service for the heavenly Lord. That is why, in the Law, to signify this, God commanded that every offering be seasoned with salt (Lev. 2:13) (1:5).

24. Just as in the visible world, whoever is naked suffers great shame and disgrace, and friends turn away from friends, and relatives from their own, if they are naked, and children, upon seeing their father naked, averted their eyes so as not to look at their father's naked body, approached, "looking backward," and covered him, averting their eyes (Gen. 9:23); so too does God turn away from souls who are not clothed with full assurance in the robe of the Spirit, who have not clothed themselves in the Lord Jesus Christ in power and truth (20:1).

25. The very first man, seeing himself naked, was ashamed. Such dishonor lies in nakedness! If even physical nakedness brings such shame, how much more is the soul—which is stripped of divine power and does not wear, nor is it clothed in all truth, the ineffable, imperishable, and spiritual garment of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself—covered with shame and dishonor by the passions. And everyone who is stripped of that divine glory must be just as ashamed of himself and aware of his dishonor as Adam was when he was physically naked: and although he made himself a garment of fig leaves, he nevertheless bore shame, aware of his poverty and nakedness. Therefore, let such a soul ask of Christ, who gives the garment and clothes it with glory in unspeakable light, and let it not make for itself a garment out of vain thoughts, nor, deluding itself with its own righteousness, think that it possesses the garment of salvation (20:2).

26. Just as a house in which the master himself is present is filled with every kind of adornment, beauty, and splendor, so too is the soul that has its Lord within it—and in which He dwells—filled with every kind of beauty and splendor, for the Lord, with His spiritual treasures, is its inhabitant and ruler. But woe to that house whose master is absent and in which there is no lord, for as it falls into ruin and becomes desolate, it is filled with all manner of impurity and disorder; there, according to the word of the Prophet, "syrini and demons" will take up residence (Isa. 13: 21), for in a deserted house wild cats, dogs, and all manner of filth find a place for themselves. Woe to the soul that does not rise from its grievous fall and harbors within itself those who persuade and compel it to remain at enmity with its Bridegroom, intending to corrupt its thoughts and turn it away from Christ (33:3).

gg) Through these suggestions, the soul is ready to yield to the call to follow the Lord, but thoughts arise that we still have time to do so, and they undermine the desire. Saint Macarius wards them off with powerful warnings of the danger of postponing the work of salvation. God's long-suffering may run out—and then destruction is inevitable.

27. I fear that for us, who live neglecting everything and are led by prejudices, the Apostolic saying may eventually come true, namely: "Or do you despise the riches of His goodness, forbearance, and patience, not realizing that God's goodness leads you to repentance" (Rom. 2: 4)? But if, in the face of His long-suffering, kindness, and gentleness, we multiply our sins and, through our negligence and disregard, bring upon ourselves the most severe condemnation, then the words of the Apostle will be fulfilled in us: "But because of your hardness and unrepentant heart, you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God" (Rom. 2:5). For God's goodness is great and unfathomable, and His long-suffering toward the human race is inexpressible—provided only that we wish to come to our senses and strive to turn wholly to God, so that we may attain salvation (4:19).

28. And if you wish to know God's long-suffering and His great goodness, we can learn this from the divinely inspired Scriptures. Look at the Israelites, from whom came the fathers to whom the promises were made—"from whom Christ came according to the flesh, and the law and the covenant" (Rom. 9:4-5)—how often did they sin? How many times did they stray? And God did not abandon them forever, but for a short time, for their own good, He subjected them to punishment, desiring to soften their hard-heartedness through suffering; He turned them back, urged them on, sent prophets to them, and how long was He patient with them when they sinned and offended Him? He welcomed those who repented with joy, and when they fell away again, He did not abandon them, but through the prophets called them to repentance; and although they repeatedly turned away from Him and returned to Him, He welcomed them graciously each time, receiving them with love, until they finally fell into a great sin, laying hands on their own Lord, whom, according to the tradition of the fathers and the holy Prophets, they had been expecting as their Redeemer, Savior, King, and Prophet. For when He came, they did not accept Him, but rather subjected Him to great humiliation and ultimately condemned Him to death on the cross. And by this great insult and egregious crime, their sins, having multiplied, reached their fullness; therefore, they have been utterly forsaken, with the Holy Spirit having withdrawn from them when the temple curtain was torn. Therefore, their temple, handed over to the pagans, was destroyed and laid waste, according to the Lord's decree: "Not one stone will be left upon another that will not be thrown down" (Matt. 24:2). And thus, they were decisively handed over to the Gentiles and scattered throughout the earth by the kings who had taken them captive at that time, and they were commanded never to return to their own land (4:20).

29. So too today, God—who is merciful and good toward each of us—shows His long-suffering, even though He sees repeated offenses from each of us; yet He remains silent, waiting to see if a person will come to their senses in time and change their ways so as no longer to offend Him, and with great love and joy He receives those who turn away from sin. For He says: "There is joy over one sinner who repents" (Luke 15:10), and also: "It is not the will of My Father that even one of these little ones should perish" (Matthew 18:14)—the very least among them. But if anyone, in the face of God's great mercy and long-suffering—when God does not subject him to punishment for every sinful transgression, whether secret or open, but seeing it remains silent, as if awaiting repentance—has himself fallen into great negligence, begins to add sin upon sin, adding carelessness to carelessness, building one transgression upon another, and filling up the measure of sins, then he finally falls into such a sin from which he cannot escape, but is crushed and, having surrendered to the evil one, perishes completely (4:21).

30. This was the case with the people of Sodom. Having sinned greatly and refusing to repent, they finally, through their evil intent against the angels, fell into such a sin that there was no longer any room for repentance; rather, they were utterly rejected, because they had filled and even exceeded the measure of sin. And so, by God's judgment, they were consumed by fire. So it was in the time of Noah as well; having fallen into sin repeatedly and failing to repent, they went so far as to corrupt the entire earth. Likewise, toward the Egyptians, who greatly offended God and sinned against His people, God was still merciful; He did not inflict such punishments upon them as to utterly destroy them, but only as a lesson to prompt them to conversion and repentance, He dealt them light blows, revealing His long-suffering and awaiting their repentance. But they, having sinned greatly against God's people—sometimes turning back, sometimes repenting of that, and then becoming entrenched in their ancient unbelief born of wicked willfulness, and having burdened God's people with hard labor—finally, when God, through Moses and by means of many miracles, led the people out of Egypt, committed a great sin by pursuing God's people. Therefore, divine judgment finally destroyed and annihilated them, drowning them in the waters, having deemed them unworthy of visible life (4:22).

31. We have expounded on this, beloved, confirming it with thoughts drawn from Scripture, that we must turn to the Lord as soon as possible and hasten to Him, Who is merciful toward us and waits for us to completely turn away from all deceit and evil prejudice; and He receives those who turn to Him with great joy—we have expounded on this, I speak of this all the more so that our neglect may not increase day by day, nor our sins multiply within us, and through this we may not bring God's wrath upon ourselves. Therefore, let us strive, turning to Him with a sincere heart, to draw near to God; and since despair is a suggestion of malice and deceit, let us not despair of salvation when recalling past sins—for it is precisely these that lead a person to despair, inaction, carelessness, and complacency—so that, having turned and come to the Lord, he might not receive salvation through the Lord's great mercy toward the human race (4:24).

dd) Meanwhile, just as the soul is thus approaching the resolve to begin the work of salvation, the enemy hurls at it his final, fiery arrows of despair and hopelessness.

32. It happens that Satan speaks to you in your heart: “Look at all the evil you have done; look at the madness that fills your soul; you are so burdened with sins that you can no longer be saved.” He does this to plunge you into despair, because your repentance is displeasing to him. For as soon as sin entered through transgression, it converses with the soul at every moment, just as one person speaks to another. Answer him, too: “You have the testimony in the Lord’s Scripture: ‘I do not desire the death of the sinner, but that he should repent, turn from the way of the wicked, and live’ (Ezek. 33:11). For this is why He came down—to save the sinful, to raise the dead, to give life to those who were dead in their sins, and to enlighten those who are in darkness.” And indeed, having come, He called us to sonship, to the holy and peaceful city, to life that never ends, to imperishable glory—provided only that we bring our beginning to a good end, abide in poverty, wandering, and suffering, and never cease to ask God, persistently knocking at the door. Just as the body is close to the soul, so too is the Lord near and ready to come and open the locked doors of the heart, and to grant us heavenly riches. He is good and loving toward mankind, and His promises are not false, provided only that we seek Him with patience until the end (11:15). 99.

33. Imagine the Persian camp and the Roman camp, and behold, two young men, both equally strong and filled with courage, have come forth from them and are engaged in battle. So the opposing forces of strength and reason are equally matched and possess equal power: just as Satan tempts and entices the soul into his will through flattery, so too does the soul resist and disobey him in everything, because both forces can only incline, not compel, toward evil or good. It is to such a will that God’s help is given, and through this struggle it can obtain weapons from heaven, with which it will defeat and eradicate sin; for the soul can resist sin, but cannot defeat or eradicate evil without God. But those who claim that sin is like a mighty giant, while the soul is like a youth, speak wrongly. For if such a disparity existed—if sin were likened to a giant and the soul to a youth—then the Lawgiver would be unjust, He who gave man the law to wage war against Satan (27:22).

34. If, however, it seems to us as though it were impractical and impossible to turn away from the multitude of sins that have overcome us—(and such a thought, as we have already said, is a suggestion of malice and serves as an obstacle to our salvation)—then let us remind ourselves and not overlook the fact that how the Lord, having come to us in His goodness, gave sight to the blind, healed the paralyzed, cured every disease, raised the dead—whose bodies had already begun to decay and disintegrate—restored hearing to the deaf, cast out a legion of demons from a single man, and restored sanity to one who had fallen into such demonic possession. All the more so will He transform the soul that turns to Him, seeks His mercy, and asks for His help; He will lead it to the chastity of dispassion, the cultivation of every virtue, and the renewal of the mind, granting it health, spiritual insight, and peace of mind—freeing it from the blindness, deafness, and the deadness of unbelief, ignorance, and fearlessness—and will raise it up to chastity, virtue, and purity of heart. For He who created the body also created the soul. And just as, while on earth, through His goodness, He—as the good and only Physician—generously provided whatever anyone needed to all who came to Him seeking help and healing, so He is generous in spiritual matters as well (4:25).

35. And through all this, He urged us to ask Him for His gracious intercession unceasingly, ceaselessly, and tirelessly, because He came for the sake of sinners, so that they might turn to Him, and to heal those who believe in Him. If we only turn away from evil prejudices to the best of our ability, hate our wicked pursuits and worldly deceptions, and turn away from deceitful and vain thoughts, then we will always, to the best of our ability, cling to Him—and He is ready to grant us His help, for He is most merciful, gives life, heals incurable passions, and grants deliverance to those who call upon Him, turn to Him, and of their own free will and without compulsion withdraw, to the best of their ability, from all worldly love, turn their minds away from the earth, and are directed toward Him by their desire and seeking (4:27).

e) When all contrary thoughts are removed, the inner struggle to incline the will comes to an end, and a resolve is formed to serve the Lord for the sake of one’s own salvation—a resolve as firm as death. Its expression is: “I would rather die than indulge in sin any longer.”

36. Saint Macarius speaks of the soul that possesses true resolve: no matter what is inflicted upon it, amid a thousand temptations, enduring it all, it says, “Even if I die, I will not forsake Him” (that is, the Lord, for the sake of sin and the enemy) (26:8).

(zz) But more often he expresses this resolve through the sacrifice of the soul, just as animals were slaughtered as offerings: for this resolve is indeed self-sacrifice to the Lord as a whole burnt offering.

37. If a carnal person resolves to set out to transform himself, he first dies and becomes barren of that former deceitful life (46:2).

38. (Regarding sacrifices, it was prescribed) that the priest first slaughter the animal so that it would die, and then, after it was cut into pieces, it would be salted and, finally, placed on the fire. For if the priest does not first subject the sheep to slaughter and death, it is not salted nor offered in full to the Lord. So too our soul, approaching the true High Priest, Christ, must be slain by Him and die to its own wisdom and to the wicked life it has lived—that is, to sin—and just as life leaves the sacrifice behind, so must it leave behind the deceitfulness of the passions. Just as the body, when the soul departs from it, dies and no longer lives the life it once lived—it no longer hears or walks—so too, when the heavenly High Priest, Christ, by the grace of His power, delivers the soul to slaughter and puts to death within it the life devoted to the world, the soul dies to the deceitful life it once lived, and no longer hears, speaks, or lives in sinful darkness, because the deceitfulness of the passions, like its soul, departs from it by grace. And the Apostle exclaims, saying, “The world has been crucified to me, and I to the world” (Gal. 6:14). (1:6).

zz) To impress this truth more deeply upon the mind, St. Macarius explains at length that all failures in the spiritual life, all falls and backslidings, and all moral dispositions stem from a lack of self-sacrificing resolve to serve the Lord with detachment from all things.

39. Very few are those who have combined a good beginning with a good end, who have reached their goal without stumbling, who have a single love for the One God, and who have renounced everything. Many are moved to devotion, many become partakers of heavenly grace, and are touched by heavenly love; but, unable to endure the various struggles, trials, toils, and temptations from the evil one—since everyone has a desire to love something in this world and cannot entirely renounce their love—they return to various worldly desires. Whether out of weakness and inactivity, or out of fear of their own will, or out of love for something earthly, they remain in the world and sink into its depths. But those who are truly intent on living a good life to the very end must, in the presence of that heavenly love, neither voluntarily take upon themselves nor mix in any other love or attachment, lest they thereby create obstacles to their spiritual progress, turn back, and, ultimately, lose their lives. Just as God’s promises are great, inexpressible, and unfathomable, so too do we need faith and hope, as well as toil, great feats, and long-term trials. The blessings that a person who longs for the heavenly kingdom hopes to receive are by no means insignificant. Since he desires to reign with Christ for all eternity, will he not resolve, with zeal, to endure struggles, labors, and temptations throughout the brief span of this life, right up until his death? The Lord calls out: “If anyone wishes to follow Me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow Me, rejoicing daily” (Matt. 16:24). And again: “If anyone does not hate his father, mother, wife, children, brothers, and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:26). But very many people, although they intend to obtain the kingdom and desire to inherit eternal life, nevertheless do not renounce living according to their own desires and following these desires—or rather, following the one who sows vanity within them—and, without denying themselves, they wish to inherit eternal life, which is impossible (5:7).

40. Truly, the word of the Lord is true. Those who walk blamelessly are those who, according to the Lord’s commandment, have completely renounced themselves, have abhorred all worldly desires, ties, entertainments, pleasures, and pursuits, keep the One Lord before their eyes, and long to fulfill His commandments. Therefore, everyone is led astray by their own will if they have not truly chosen to renounce themselves and, even while loving Him, still love something else, take pleasure in any of the pleasures or desires of this age, and do not have complete love for the Lord, as far as this is possible for the free will and desire (5, 8).

41. Sometimes undertakings that appear to be good come to nothing for the sake of glory and human praise, and this is, before God, equivalent to unrighteousness, theft, and other sins. For it is said: “God scatters the bones of those who please men” (Ps. 52:6). And even in deeds that appear to be good, the evil one sees an opportunity to serve his own ends; he is extremely versatile and deceptive in worldly desires. For any earthly and carnal love to which a person binds himself of his own free will, sin seizes him, becoming for him chains, bonds, and a heavy burden that drowns and oppresses him in this deceitful age, preventing him from gathering his strength and returning to God. Whatever a person loves in the world burdens his mind, takes possession of it, and prevents him from gathering his strength. On this depend both balance and inclination, as well as the prevalence of vice; by this the entire human race is tested, as are all Christians living in cities, or in the mountains, or in monasteries, or in the fields, or in desert places—because when a person, ensnared by his own will, begins to love something, his love becomes bound to something and is no longer wholly directed toward God. For example, one has come to love wealth, another gold and silver, yet another the worldly wisdom of the learned for the sake of human glory; one has come to love authority, another glory; one loves frivolous gatherings, some spend the whole day in distraction and pleasures, some are deluded by idle thoughts, some, for the sake of human glory, love to act as if they were teachers of the law, some take delight in idleness and neglect, others are attached to clothing, some give themselves over to earthly cares, and others love sleep, or jokes, or foul language. Whatever a person is attached to in this world—whether small or great—that is what holds him back and prevents him from gathering his strength. Whatever passion a person does not courageously fight against, that is what he loves; and it takes hold of him and burdens him, becoming for him a set of chains and an obstacle preventing his mind from turning to God, pleasing Him, and—having served Him alone—becoming fit for the kingdom and attaining eternal life (5:9).

42. But the soul that truly strives toward the Lord extends its love wholly and entirely to Him and, with all its strength, binds itself by its own will to Him alone; in this it receives the help of grace, denies itself, and does not follow the desires of its own mind, for because of the evil that is ever present with us and deceives us, the mind walks craftily. Thus, as soon as the soul has come to love the Lord, it is delivered from its own snares through its faith and great diligence, and, together with help from above, becomes worthy of the eternal kingdom; and, having truly come to love it, by its own will and with the Lord's help, it will no longer be deprived of eternal life (5, 10).

43. To demonstrate more clearly to us through a concrete example how many perish of their own free will—drowning at sea or being taken captive—imagine that a house is on fire: one person, determined to save himself, runs out as soon as he learns of the fire, leaving everything behind and resolving to care only for his own soul, and thus saves himself; another, intending to take some household goods or other items with him, entered the house to retrieve them, and while he was gathering them, the fire gained the upper hand over the house and trapped him inside, burning him to death. Do you see that this man perished in the fire of his own free will out of love—specifically, by loving something other than himself for a time? Similarly, others are sailing across the sea and, caught in a violent storm, one, having stripped naked, throws himself into the water with the intention of saving only himself; and so, driven by the waves and bound by nothing but concern for his own soul, floating on top of the waves, he found a way to escape the bitter sea, while another, intending to save some of his clothes, thought that even with them—if he took them along—he could swim and escape the sea; but the clothes he took weighed him down and drowned him in the depths of the sea, and so, for the sake of a small gain and without caring for his own soul, he perished. Do you see how, of his own free will, he became a victim of death? Imagine, too, that a rumor spread about foreigners; one man, as soon as he heard it, immediately took to his heels, without the slightest delay, and set out with nothing; another, however, either not believing that enemies were coming or wishing to take some of his belongings with him and having decided to do so, delayed his flight, and so the enemies arrived, captured him, took him captive to a foreign land, and forced him to live there in slavery. Do you see that this man, too, by his own will, because of his inaction, his lack of courage, and his attachment to certain possessions, was taken captive (5:11).

44. Similar to them are those who do not follow the Lord's commandments, have not renounced themselves, and have not loved the one Lord, but have willingly bound themselves with earthly ties. If you wish to learn the righteousness of perfect love for the Lord from the holy, God-inspired Scriptures, then consider how Job was stripped, so to speak, of everything he possessed—his children, his property, his livestock, his servants, and all his other possessions. He was regarded as having acquired much, but when the Lord tested him, it turned out that Job had acquired nothing except the one God. Likewise, when the Lord commanded Abraham, "Leave your native land, your relatives, and your father's house" (Gen. 12:1), he immediately, so to speak, gave up everything—his homeland, his land, his relatives, and his parents—and obeyed the Lord's word. Later, amid the many trials and temptations he faced—whether when his wife was taken from him or when he lived and endured hardship in a foreign land—in all these instances he proved that he loved the One God above all else. Finally, when, according to the promise, after many years had passed, he already had his only-begotten son, so dearly desired, and God demanded that he willingly offer this son as a sacrifice, Abraham renounced everything and truly denied himself. For by this offering of his only son, he proved that he loved nothing else but God. And if he gave up his son with such readiness, how much more so, had he been commanded to give up the rest of his possessions, or to distribute them all at once to the poor, would he have done so with complete readiness and utmost zeal. Do you now see the righteousness of perfect and voluntary love for the Lord? (5:12).

45. Likewise, those who wish to become co-heirs with these righteous ones must love nothing but God, so that when they are put to the test, they may prove themselves worthy and skilled, perfectly preserving their love for the Lord. Only those who have always loved the One God of their own free will and renounced all worldly love will be able to persevere to the end. But very few people are found who would embrace such love, turn away from all worldly pleasures and desires, and magnanimously endure the rebellion and temptation of the evil one. A great many people wish to attain the kingdom without toil, without feats of virtue, without the sweat of their brow, but this is impossible (5:13).

46. Just as in the world some people go to a wealthy man to work for him during the harvest or on other tasks, in order to obtain what they need for their sustenance, and some of them are lazy and idle, do not labor like the others, and do not work as they should, yet without toiling or exhausting themselves in the rich man's household, they wish—as if they had already done all the work—to receive the same wages as those who labor patiently, diligently, and with all their strength. In the same way, when we read the Scriptures—whether about a righteous person, how he pleased God, how he became a friend and companion of God, or about all the fathers—how they became friends and heirs of God, how much sorrow they endured, how much they suffered for God's sake, how many valiant deeds and feats they accomplished—then we praise them and wish to be deemed worthy of gifts and honors equal to theirs, we eagerly desire to receive those glorious gifts, setting aside only their labors, feats, sorrows, and sufferings, and we fervently desire to obtain the honors and dignities they received from God, yet we do not accept their hardships, labors, and feats upon ourselves. But I tell you that every person desires and craves all of this: even fornicators, tax collectors, and the unrighteous would like to obtain the kingdom so easily, without toil or feats of valor. That is why temptations, many trials, sorrows, struggles, and the shedding of sweat lie in the path—so that those may be revealed who truly loved the One Lord with all their will and all their strength, even unto death, and who, with such love for Him, no longer desired anything else for themselves. That is why, in truth, they enter the Kingdom of Heaven, having renounced themselves, according to the Lord's word, and having loved the One Lord even more than their own breath; therefore, for their great love, they will be rewarded with great heavenly gifts (5:14).

5. The State of Labor

a) Resolve is the starting point. One must set a goal for it, so that its labors may not be fruitless. What, then, is the goal? It is to achieve the renewal of one's nature through the grace of the Holy Spirit. One who has resolved to do so must direct all one's efforts toward this end, so that the Holy Spirit may overshadow one with power and efficacy and, like fire, begin to burn away all that is impure. When this is accomplished, it is as if the soul enters into the soul; the person comes alive spiritually—or, rather, only then does he truly become a human being. This is the central idea of St. Macarius, around which all others are grouped.

1. Whoever comes to God and truly desires to be a follower of Christ must come with the aim of being transformed, of presenting himself as a better and new person, having retained nothing within himself that is characteristic of the old man. For it is said: "If anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation" (2 Cor. 5:17). (44. 1).

2. A soul that truly believes in Christ must pass from its present corrupt state to a different, good state, and transform its present debased nature into a different, divine nature, becoming a new nature through the assisting power of the Holy Spirit; only then can it become fit for the kingdom of heaven. But this is possible only for us who believe, truly love Him, and fulfill all His holy commandments. If, in the case of Elisha, a tree—which by nature is light on water—when thrown into the water, carried iron, which is heavy by nature, then all the more will the Lord send here His light, agile, good, and heavenly Spirit, and through Him He will lighten the soul mired in the waters of deceit, give it wings, lift it up to heavenly heights, transform it, and restore its true nature (44, 5).

3. Just as a body without a soul is dead and cannot do anything, so too, without a heavenly soul—without the Spirit of God—the soul is dead to the kingdom and, without the Spirit, cannot do what is of God (30:3).

4. Therefore, whoever strives to believe and come to the Lord ought to pray that the Spirit of God may be given to him even here, for He is the life of the soul, and the purpose of the Lord's coming was to give life to the soul—the Holy Spirit—even here (30:6).

5. God has shown you such favor that He descended from the holy heavens and took upon Himself your rational nature and earthly flesh, infusing it with His Divine Spirit, so that you, a mortal, might receive a heavenly soul within yourself. And when your soul is in communion with the Spirit, and the heavenly soul enters your soul, then you will be a perfect human being in God—an heir and a son (32:6).

6. Therefore, we must love the Lord, strive in every way to excel in all virtues, and ask tirelessly and unceasingly that we may receive the promise of His Spirit wholly and completely, so that our souls may be enlivened while we are still in the flesh. For if the soul does not receive within itself the sanctity of the Spirit in this present age through abundant faith and prayer, and does not become a partaker of the divine nature by being transformed by grace—through whose assistance you can fulfill every commandment blamelessly and purely—then it is unfit for the heavenly kingdom (44:9). 119.

7. As a result of the first man's disobedience, we have taken into ourselves what is foreign to our nature—harmful passions—and through habit and long-term assimilation, we have, as it were, turned them into our very nature; and once again, by the extraordinary gift of the Spirit, this foreign element must be driven out of us, and we must be restored to our original purity. And if now, with much supplication, entreaty, faith, prayer, and detachment from the world, we do not receive within ourselves that heavenly love of the Spirit, and our nature, defiled by vice, does not cling to love—that is, to the Lord—and is not sanctified by that love of the Spirit, and we do not remain blameless to the end, living in complete accordance with the Lord's commandments, then we will not be able to enter the Kingdom of Heaven (4:8).

b) Whoever has turned to the Lord in repentance already possesses grace upon receiving the sacrament. But it does not manifest itself equally in everyone. It immediately descends upon some, while others are subjected to long trials, and only then does it reveal its efficacy.

8. God's boundless and incomprehensible wisdom, in an unfathomable and inscrutable way, bestows grace upon the human race in many different ways to test free will, so that those who love God with all their hearts and endure every danger and every hardship for His sake may be revealed. For some, as soon as they approach Him with faith and prayer—while they are still living in the world, without having endured toil, sweat, or exhaustion—receive the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit in advance. Yet God grants grace not without reason, not untimely, and not by chance, but according to some ineffable and incomprehensible wisdom, so that the volition and free will of those who quickly receive God's grace may be shown to be well-directed, namely, in that they feel the beneficence, the mercy shown to them, and the sweetness of God in proportion to the grace communicated to them without their own labor; having been deemed worthy of this grace, they are obliged to demonstrate diligence, diligence, perseverance, and the fruit of love—all of their own free will and volition—and to repay these gifts, that is, to surrender themselves entirely, consecrating themselves to the Lord's love and fulfilling only the Lord's will, while completely turning away from every carnal desire (29:1).

9. But to others, even though they have withdrawn from the world, renounced this age according to the Gospel, and with great patience excel in prayer, fasting, diligence, and other virtues, God does not readily grant grace, rest, or spiritual gifts, but delays and withholds the gift. And this is not without reason, not untimely, and not by chance, but according to some ineffable wisdom, to test free will—to see whether they truly and faithfully honor God, who has promised to give to those who ask and to open the door of life to those who knock on it; to see whether they have truly believed in His word, whether they will persevere to the end in unshakable faith and will seek and ask with all diligence, whether they will turn away from God in suffering and fear, whether they will succumb to sloth, falling into unbelief and despair, and fail to endure to the end, due to the delay of time and the testing of their will and free choice (29:2).

10. For whoever is not quick to accept, when God delays and postpones, becomes even more ardent and desires heavenly blessings all the more, and daily applies greater desire, diligence, tirelessness, effort, and the sum of all virtues, hunger and thirst, just to obtain that blessing—and does not grow weak from the sinful thoughts dwelling in the soul, will not fall into sloth, impatience, and despair, nor, under the pretext of delay, give in to laxity, led by such a thought: "When will I receive God's grace?"—and thereby being cunningly led into indifference. On the contrary, to whatever extent the Lord Himself delays and postpones, testing the faith and love of his will, to that same extent must he, all the more earnestly and diligently, without slackening and without growing weary, seek God's gift, having once believed and become convinced that God is true and not false, who has promised to bestow His grace upon those who ask for it with faith and with all patience to the end (29:3).

11. Faithful souls revere God as faithful and true, and, based on the true word, have come to the conviction that "He is true" (John 3:33). And in accordance with this, based on the above-mentioned concept of faith, they examine themselves to see where, as far as they are concerned, they fall short—whether in labor, in effort, in diligence, in faith, in love, or in other virtues—and having examined themselves with the utmost precision, to the best of their ability, they compel and urge themselves to please the Lord, having once believed that God, being true, will not deprive them of the spiritual gift if they remain before Him in service and patience to the very end with all diligence, and that while still in the flesh, they will be made worthy of heavenly grace and attain eternal life (29:4).

12. Thus, they direct all their love toward the Lord, having renounced everything, awaiting Him alone with intense longing, hunger, and thirst, always hoping for the rest and comfort of grace, yet finding no comfort or rest in anything in this world, voluntarily binding themselves, while ceaselessly resisting worldly thoughts, they await only God's help and God's intercession; they await the moment when, in such souls who have embraced self-discipline, diligence, and patience, the Lord Himself will already be secretly present, helping them, guarding them, and sustaining within them every fruit of virtue. For there are limits, a measure, and a weight to free will and free love, and to a disposition, according to one's ability, toward all His holy commandments. And in this way, souls who fulfill the measure of their love and duty become worthy of the kingdom and eternal life (29:5).

c) Saint Macarius explains—using many examples from Sacred Scripture and drawing lessons from them regarding what this requires of every believer—that the general law of grace is not to force oneself suddenly.

13. The spiritual work of God's grace in the soul is accomplished through great long-suffering, wisdom, and the mysterious insight of the mind, as a person strives with great patience over time and throughout the years. And the work of grace is then found to be complete within him when his free will, after repeated testing, proves pleasing to the Spirit and, over time, demonstrates experience and patience. We will present clear examples of this order from the divinely inspired Scriptures (9:1).

14. What I am asserting is similar to what happened to Joseph. How much time and how many years passed before God's will concerning him was fulfilled, and the visions were realized! And before that, through how many labors, sorrows, and hardships was Joseph tested! And when he had endured all this with courage, proving himself in every way to be a skillful and faithful servant of God, only then did he become king of Egypt and sustain his family; and the prophecies concerning the unseen were fulfilled, as was God's will, which had long ago been foretold through divine revelation (9:2).

15. Something similar happened to David. God anointed him as king through the prophet Samuel. And when he was anointed, he was persecuted by Saul and had to flee for his life. Where, then, was God's anointing? Where was the prompt fulfillment of the promise? For as soon as he was anointed, he began to endure severe tribulations, retreating into the wilderness, lacking even daily bread, and fleeing to the Gentiles to escape Saul's malicious plots against him. And the one whom God had anointed as king endured such tribulations! Later, after being tested and tempted for many years, enduring tribulations and bearing them with magnanimity, he entrusted himself resolutely to God and affirmed to himself: "What God has done for me through the prophetic anointing, and what He has spoken, must undoubtedly be fulfilled," —then, at last, after much long-suffering, God's will was fulfilled, and after many trials, David reigned; and God's word became evident, and the anointing performed by the Prophet proved to be firm and true (9:3). Something similar happened with Moses, Abraham, and Noah (9:4, 5, 6).

16. We have cited these examples from Scripture to demonstrate that the work of God's grace is revealed in a person, and that he receives the gift of the Holy Spirit—a gift to which a faithful soul is made worthy only after a long struggle, after trials of great patience and magnanimity, after temptations and trials, when free will has been tested by all manner of afflictions. When it offends the Spirit in no way, but by grace is in all things in accordance with the commandments, then it is deemed worthy to attain freedom from the passions, to receive the fullness of spiritual adoption proclaimed in the sacrament, as well as spiritual riches and a understanding that is not of this world, and of which only true Christians become partakers. This is why such people differ in every way from all those who are prudent, knowledgeable, and wise, yet possess within themselves the spirit of the world (9:7).

17. Therefore, let us prepare ourselves, of our own free will and with all eagerness, to go to the Lord and become Christ's followers, to fulfill Christ's will and to remember and keep all of Christ's commandments, having completely turned away from the love of the world; let us entrust our souls to Christ alone, and let us keep in mind to concern ourselves with Him alone, to care for Him alone, and to seek Him alone. But if, because of the flesh, we fail to apply the proper diligence to fulfilling the commandments and obeying God, then at least let our mind not turn away from love for the Lord, from seeking Him and striving toward Him. And as we strive with such a mind, with a right disposition of thought, walking in the way of righteousness and always remaining mindful of ourselves, may we attain the promise of His Spirit, and by grace be delivered from destruction in the darkness of the passions that afflict the soul; and through this, may we become worthy of the eternal kingdom and be granted to rejoice with Christ for all eternity, glorifying the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit forever and ever. Amen (9, 13).

d) Consequently, anyone who resolves to serve the Lord must first endure a period of struggle—a state in which, by the power of his rational will alone, he compels himself to every good deed and restrains himself from everything disapproved by his conscience, even though his heart does not sympathize with this. So, have you made up your mind? Begin to compel yourself to do every good deed and to resist yourself in every evil deed.

18. Whoever wishes to draw near to the Lord, to be made worthy of eternal life, to become a dwelling place of Christ, to be filled with the Holy Spirit so as to bear the fruits of the Spirit, and to keep Christ's commandments purely and blamelessly, must begin by first and foremost believing firmly in the Lord, and to devote himself entirely to the teachings of His commandments, renouncing the world in every respect, so that his whole mind may not be occupied with anything visible. And he must remain constantly in prayer, with faith, in expectation of the Lord, always awaiting His visitation and help, keeping this alone as the goal of his mind at every moment. Then, because of the sin that dwells within him, he must compel himself to every good deed, to the fulfillment of all the Lord's commandments. For example: he must compel himself to humility before every person, considering himself lower and worse than everyone else, seeking from no one honor, praise, or glory, as it is written in the Gospel, but always keeping before his eyes the One Lord and His commandments, desiring to please Him alone with a meek heart, as the Lord says: "Learn from Me, for I am meek and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls" (Matt. 11:29). (19:1).

19. In the same way, let him train himself, as much as possible, to be gracious, kind, merciful, and good, as the Lord says: "Be kind and good, just as your heavenly Father is merciful" (Luke 6:36). Above all, let him keep in unforgettable memory, as a model, let him keep in mind the Lord's humility and His life, His meekness, and His dealings with people; let him abide in prayer, always believing and asking that the Lord may come and dwell within him, perfecting and strengthening him in the fulfillment of all His commandments, and that the Lord Himself may become the dwelling place of his soul. And in this way, what he now does under compulsion—against the will of his heart—he will one day do of his own free will, constantly training himself in goodness, always remembering the Lord, and ceaselessly awaiting Him with great love. Then the Lord, seeing his willingness and good resolve, seeing how he compels himself to remember the Lord, and how his heart—even against his will—is constantly led toward goodness, toward humility, toward meekness, toward love, and is led, as much as he is able, with all his strength—then, I say, the Lord bestows His mercy upon him, delivers him from his enemies and from the sin dwelling within him, and fills him with the Holy Spirit. Then, without effort or toil, he fulfills all the Lord's commandments in all truth; or rather, the Lord Himself fulfills His commandments in him, and he then bears the fruits of the Spirit in purity (19:2).

20. But one who draws near to the Lord must, therefore, compel himself to every good deed, compel himself to love—if he lacks love—compel himself to meekness—if he lacks meekness—compel himself to be merciful and to have a merciful heart, compel himself to endure contempt, and when disregarded, to be magnanimous; when humiliated or dishonored, not to become indignant, as it is said: "Do not take revenge, beloved" (Rom. 12:19); one must compel oneself to pray if one lacks spiritual prayer. In such a case, God, seeing that a person strives so hard and, against the will of his heart, restrains himself with effort, grants him true spiritual prayer, true love, true meekness, "a heart full of generosity," true kindness, and, in a word, fills him with spiritual fruit (19:3).

21. But if anyone, lacking prayer, compels himself to pray alone in order to receive the grace of prayer, yet does not compel himself to meekness, to humility, to love, or to the fulfillment of the Lord's other commandments—and does not care, nor apply labor or effort to succeed in them—then, to the extent of his own will and free choice, in accordance with his request, he is sometimes granted a measure of the grace of prayer; yet in character he remains the same as he was before. He lacks meekness because he did not make the effort or prepare himself to become meek; he lacks humility because he did not ask for it or compel himself toward it; he lacks love for all because, while asking for prayer, he did not concern himself with this or show any effort (19:4).

22. But whoever lacks these virtues, and has not trained or prepared himself for them, even if he receives the grace of prayer, loses it upon receiving it and falls into pride, or does not prosper or grow in the grace granted to him, because he does not surrender himself entirely to the fulfillment of the Lord's commandments. For humility, love, meekness, and the other commandments of the Lord serve as a dwelling place and rest for the Spirit (19:6).

23. Therefore, whoever wishes to truly please God, to receive from Him the heavenly grace of the Spirit, and to grow and be perfected by the Holy Spirit, must compel himself to fulfill all of God's commandments and subdue his heart, even against his will, as it is said: "For this reason I have set my face toward all Your commandments; I have hated every path of unrighteousness" (Ps. 118:128). (19:7).

e) Compelling oneself to do good is one aspect of spiritual struggle. The other is resisting oneself in evil. This latter is spiritual warfare. St. Macarius teaches about it as follows.

24. Whoever wishes to truly please God and genuinely hate the opposing side of wickedness must wage war in two kinds of struggles and battles, namely: in the visible affairs of this world, to turn away from earthly pleasures, from the love of worldly ties, and from sinful habits; and in the hidden affairs of the heart, to fight against the very spirits of wickedness, of which the Apostle said: "For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12). (21:1).

25. Having transgressed the commandment and been expelled from paradise, man is bound in two ways and by two kinds of bonds: in the world—by worldly affairs, by love for the world, that is, for carnal pleasures and passions, for wealth and glory, for possessions, for a wife, for children, for relatives, for one's homeland, for one's dwelling and clothing; in a word, for all that is visible, from which the Word of God commands us to renounce of our own free will (for everyone becomes attached to all that is visible of their own free will), so that, having renounced and freed himself from all this, he might become a perfect fulfiller of the commandment; yet, in secret, the spirits of malice entangle, entrench, and fortify the soul, binding it with the chains of darkness (21:2).

26. Therefore, when someone, having heard the word of God, embarks on this struggle, casts aside the affairs of daily life and worldly ties, renounces all carnal pleasures and detaches himself from them, then, with steadfastness directing his thoughts toward the Lord, he may come to realize that there is another struggle within his heart, a different secret resistance, a different battle of thoughts waged by deceitful spirits, and that a different struggle lies ahead for him. And thus, with unshakable faith and great patience, ceaselessly calling upon the Lord and awaiting His help, one may still attain inner liberation here from the bonds, snares, obstacles, and darkness of the evil spirits—that is, from the influence of hidden passions (21:3).

27. This struggle, however, can be brought to an end by God's grace and power, for man is not able by himself to free himself from opposition, from the wandering of his thoughts, from invisible passions, and from the wiles of the evil one. But if anyone is attached to visible things in this world, entangles himself in many different earthly bonds, and is carried away by harmful passions, he will not realize that within him there is another struggle, another battle, and another war. And, oh, if only a person, after striving to free himself from these visible worldly bonds, material cares, and carnal pleasures, and beginning to cling constantly to the Lord while withdrawing from this world, might then come to recognize the struggle of passions taking root within him, the inner battle, and the deceitful thoughts! But if, as we said before, he does not renounce the world with effort, does not turn away from earthly desires with all his heart, and does not desire to cling wholly to the Lord, then he will not recognize the deception of the hidden spirits of malice and the secret, pernicious passions, but remains alien to himself, because his own wounds are unknown to him, and, though he harbors secret passions within himself, he is unaware of them, but still willingly clings to the visible and attaches himself to worldly cares (21:4).

28. But whoever has truly renounced the world, strives in the struggle, has cast off the earthly burden, has freed himself from vain desires, from carnal pleasures, from glory, authority, and human honors, and with all his heart turns away from these, when the Lord secretly assists him in this manifest struggle, in proportion to the renunciation of his will from the world, and when he himself is wholly—that is, in body and soul—established and constantly abides in the service of the Lord, he finds within himself resistance, hidden passions, invisible bonds, a secret battle, a secret struggle, and a secret struggle. And thus, having asked the Lord and received from heaven the spiritual weapons enumerated by the blessed Apostle—the breastplate of righteousness, the helmet of salvation, the shield of faith, and the spiritual sword (Eph. 6:14–17)—and having armed himself with them, he will be able to resist the devil’s secret wiles in the deceptions he devises, having acquired these weapons through prayer, patience, supplication, fasting, and above all by faith—he will be able to wage war against the principalities, powers, and rulers of this world; and thus, having defeated the opposing forces with the help of the Spirit and through his own diligence in all virtues, he will become worthy of eternal life, glorifying the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. To Him be glory and power forever! Amen (21:5).

29. Some say that the Lord demands only visible fruits from people, while God Himself accomplishes what is hidden. But this is not the case; on the contrary, to the extent that one guards oneself in the outward life, to that same extent one must struggle and wage war against one’s thoughts, because the Lord requires of you that you be angry with yourself, wage war against your own mind, refuse to consent to wicked thoughts, and not take pleasure in them (3:3).

30. The soul must resist, oppose, and repel. Your will, by opposing, enduring toil and sorrow, finally begins to gain the upper hand; it falls and rises again; sin once more overthrows it; in ten or twenty struggles, it triumphs and overthrows the soul, but the soul, in time, triumphs over sin in some way. And again, if the soul stands firm and does not falter in anything, it begins to gain the upper hand, settle the matter, and win victories over sin. This is how people overcome sin and become its victors (3, 4, 5).

31. A horse, as long as it grazes in the forests with wild animals, remains untamed by humans. But once it is captured, a heavy bridle is placed on it to tame it, until it learns to walk properly and in a straight line. Then an experienced rider trains it to make it fit for battle. At that point, they equip it with armor—that is, a breastplate and a visor—and hang the old bridle before its eyes, shaking it slightly so that the horse becomes accustomed to it and is not frightened. And a horse trained in this way by a rider, if it does not become accustomed to it, cannot be used in war; but as soon as it becomes accustomed and grows used to battle, as soon as it senses and hears the sounds of battle, it willingly charges at the enemies on its own, and by its very neighing strikes fear into the hearts of the foes (23:2).

32. In the same way, the soul, having become wild and rebellious since the time of the fall, draws near to the beasts—the deceitful spirits—in the wilderness of the world, continuing to serve sin. But when it hears the word of God and believes, then, restrained by the Spirit, it casts aside its wild nature and carnal reasoning, guided by Christ the Rider. Then she enters into sorrow, humility, and hardship—all necessary for her testing—so that the Spirit may gradually tame her, as sin within her is progressively diminished and eradicated. And in this way, the soul, clothed in the armor of righteousness, the helmet of salvation, and the shield of faith, and having taken up the spiritual sword, learns to wage war against its enemies; and, armed with the Spirit of the Lord, it fights against the spirits of wickedness and extinguishes the fiery arrows of the evil one. But without spiritual weapons, it does not join the ranks; as soon as it possesses the Lord’s weapons, the moment it hears and senses fierce battles, it goes forth “leaping and neighing,” as it is said in Job (Job 39:25), because its enemies fall at the very sound of its prayer. Having accomplished such a feat and, with the help of the Spirit, won the battle, she will receive her victory crowns with great boldness and will rest together with the Heavenly King (23:3).

33. As soon as you withdraw from the world and begin to seek God and reflect on Him, you will already have to struggle against your own nature, your former habits, and the habits that are second nature to you. And while struggling against this habit, you will encounter thoughts that oppose you and battle your mind, and these thoughts will draw you in and cause you to circle back to the very things from which you fled. It is then that you will begin the struggle and the battle, setting thoughts against thoughts, mind against mind, soul against soul, and spirit against spirit (32:9).

34. For a certain hidden and subtle power of darkness, dwelling in the heart, is revealed. And the Lord is near your soul and body; as He watches your struggle, He instills in you hidden, heavenly thoughts and secretly begins to bring you rest. But for now, He still leaves you under training, and even in the midst of your sorrows, He provides grace for you. And when you come to rest, He will let you know Himself, and show you that it was for your own good that He allowed you to be in the struggle. Just as the son of a rich man, who has a tutor, finds the tutor's discipline—the instruction, the wounds, and the blows—to be harsh while he is being disciplined; and this continues until he becomes a man, at which point he begins to thank his tutor: so too does grace providentially instruct you until you reach full maturity (33. 10).

e) Since such labor is required of one who has resolved to work for the Lord, in addition to a resolute determination to undertake any toil without pity for oneself, one must also possess prudence, attentiveness, and caution.

35. Whoever wishes to lead the Christian life with great precision and in perfection is obliged, with all his strength, to care first and foremost for the meaning and reason of the soul, so that, having acquired the ability to distinguish precisely between good and evil, and recognizing in every case what is foreign to our pure nature, we may live correctly and without stumbling, and so that, using reason as an eye, we may be able to refuse to associate with or yield to the promptings of vice, and thereby, having received the divine gift, become worthy of the Lord (4:1).

36. The body has the eye as its guide; it sees and leads the whole body along the proper path. Imagine, then, that someone is walking through wooded areas, overgrown with thorns and muddy, where fire blocks the path and swords are thrust into the ground, and where there are also rapids and abundant waters. If the traveler is resourceful, cautious, and fearless, then, with the eye as his guide, he passes through these difficult places with great care, using his hands and feet in every way to hold back his tunic so that it is not torn among the trees and thorns, soiled by the mud, or cut by the swords, and the eye, serving as a light for the whole body, shows him the way so that he may not be crushed on the rapids, or drown in the waters, or suffer harm in any difficult place. Thus, a resourceful and shrewd traveler, having carefully gathered up his tunic, walks straight ahead as guided by his eyes, keeping himself unharmed and preserving his tunic from being burned or torn. But if a careless, lazy, reckless, clumsy, or inactive person passes through such places, his tunic, fluttering this way and that, because the traveler lacks the resolve to adjust his garment in every way, will be torn by twigs and thorns, or set ablaze by fire, or slashed by drawn swords, or soiled in the mud; in short, his beautiful and new tunic will soon be ruined by his inattention, inactivity, and laziness. And if the traveler does not pay full and due attention to the guidance of the eye, he himself will fall into a ditch or drown in the waters (4:2).

37. In the same way, the soul, clothed as it were in a beautiful tunic—the garment of the body—and possessing reason, which guides the entire soul and body as it travels along the wooded and thorny paths of life, amid mud, fire, and rapids—that is, desires and pleasures and other follies of this age—must restrain and protect itself everywhere with sobriety, courage, prudence, and attentiveness. And so that the bodily tunic, on the wooded and thorny paths of this world, may not be torn anywhere by cares, distractions, and earthly amusements, nor be consumed by the fire of desire, the soul clothed in it turns away its eyes so as not to see deceit, and likewise turns away its ears so as not to hear slander, restrains the tongue from idle talk, and the hands and feet from evil deeds; for the soul has been given the will to turn away the members of the body and keep them from evil sights, from hearing anything deceitful or shameful, from indecent words, and from worldly and deceitful pursuits (4:3).

38. As soon as the Lord sees that someone is courageously turning away from worldly pleasures, from material amusements and cares, from earthly bonds, and from the whirlwind of vain thoughts, He grants that person His gracious help and unfailingly protects that soul, which beautifully carries out its course in this present evil age. And in this way, the soul receives heavenly praise from God and the angels for having beautifully preserved both itself and the garment of its body, as much as was possible for it, by turning away from every worldly desire, and, aided by God, having beautifully completed its course on the field of this world (4, 4).

39. But if anyone, through idleness and carelessness, walks in this life without heed, and of his own free will does not turn away from every worldly desire, nor seeks the One Lord with all his heart, then the garment of his body is torn by the thorns and thistles of this world, scorched by the fire of desire, and defiled by the mire of pleasures, and therefore, on the Day of Judgment, the soul finds itself lacking boldness, because it was unable to keep its garment unstained, but defiled it amid the deceptions of this age. For this, it is cast out of the kingdom. For what will God do with one who, of his own free will, surrenders himself to the world, is beguiled by its pleasures, or wanders, spinning in the material realm? He extends His help to the one who turns away from material pleasures and former habits, who with effort always directs his thoughts toward the Lord, renounces himself, and seeks the One Lord. God also protects those who, in the wilderness of this world, guard against snares and traps at every turn; those who, with fear and trembling, work out their own salvation (Phil. 2: 12), carefully avoids the snares, traps, and lusts of this age, seeks the Lord's help, and, by the Lord's mercy, hopes to be saved by grace (4: 5).

g) The laborer must draw inspiration for his labors from the hope and unshakable confidence that the Lord will see how diligent the labor is, will be convinced of the soul's faithfulness, and will grant it the Holy Spirit and unite Himself with it. St. Macarius frequently addresses this subject, and he bases nearly every lesson on labor on instilling this hope.

40. Every visible endeavor in the world is undertaken in the hope of reaping the benefits of one's labor. And if anyone is not fully confident that he will enjoy the fruits of his labor, then his labor is of no benefit to him. A farmer sows in the hope of reaping a harvest and, in anticipation of it, endures the toil; it is said, "The one who plows must do so in hope" (1 Cor. 9:10). And whoever takes a wife does so in the hope of having heirs, and a merchant sets sail for the sake of profit, exposing himself to certain death. So too in the kingdom of heaven, a person, in the hope that the eyes of his heart will be enlightened, devotes himself to withdrawing from worldly affairs, spending his time in prayer and supplication, awaiting the Lord when He will come and reveal Himself to him, and purify him from the sin that dwells within him (14:1).

41. A Christian must have hope, joy, and anticipation of the coming kingdom and deliverance, and say, "If I am not delivered today, I will be delivered by morning." One who plants a vineyard, before setting to work, has joy and hope within himself; and even when there is no wine yet, he vividly imagines the winepress in his mind, calculates the profits, and with such thoughts sets to work; hope and expectation compel him to labor diligently, and for the time being he incurs great expenses in his household. In the same way, a builder and a farmer first spend much of their property in the hope of future profit. So it is here: if a person does not have joy and hope before his eyes—that he will receive deliverance and life—he will not be able to endure sorrows, take up the burden, or walk the narrow path. But the hope and joy that accompany him enable him to labor, to endure sorrows, to take up the burden, and to walk the narrow path (26:11).

42. A believer must pray to God for himself, that his will may be transformed by the renewal of his heart. You must lift your mind and thoughts to Him, and hold nothing else in your thoughts but the hope of beholding Him. And so, like a mother gathering her lively children, let the soul gather and calm the thoughts scattered by sin; let it bring them into the house of its body, ceaselessly fasting and lovingly awaiting the Lord, when He will come and truly gather it together. Since the future is unknown, let it hope all the more, placing its hope firmly in the Helmsman. It is said, "Do not fear, for I will go before you; I will , and level the mountains; I will shatter the gates of bronze and break down the bars of iron" (Isa. 45:2). And it is also said, "Take heed to yourself, lest there be a word of lawlessness hidden in your heart" (Deut. 15:9); do not say in your heart, "This language is numerous and powerful" (Deut. 2:21). (31:1, 2).

43. If we do not grow slothful and do not allow unruly, wicked thoughts to take root within us, but instead draw our mind toward Him by our own will, compelling our thoughts to turn toward the Lord, then, without a doubt, the Lord will come to us by His own will and will truly gather us to Himself, for all pleasing service depends on our thoughts. Therefore, strive to please the Lord, always awaiting Him inwardly, seeking Him in your thoughts, and urging and compelling your will and your desire to turn toward Him unceasingly. For to the extent that you direct your mind toward seeking Him, to that extent—and even more so—He is moved by His own benevolence and goodness to come to you and give you rest. He stands and observes your mind, your thoughts, and the movements of your thoughts; He watches to see how you seek Him—with all your heart, or perhaps with laziness or neglect (31:3).

44. And when He sees your diligence in seeking Him, then He will appear and reveal Himself to you, offer you His help, and prepare victory for you, delivering you from your enemies. Therefore, let us lift up this body, build an altar, lay upon it all our thoughts, and implore the Lord to send down from heaven an invisible and mighty fire, that it may consume both the altar and all that is upon it. And all the priests of Baal—that is, the opposing forces—will fall, and then we will see heavenly rain, like a human footprint (3 Kings 18:44), descending into the soul; thus God's promise will be fulfilled upon us, as it is said through the Prophet: 'I will raise up and rebuild the fallen tabernacle of David, and I will repair its breaches' (Amos 9:11). (31:4–5).

g) Saint Macarius does not go into the details of ascetic practices, because they were all already in practice among those to whom he addressed his discourses. On occasion, he merely lists them, such as: fasting, vigil, solitude, physical labor, obedience, mutual assistance, and patience. He speaks in greater detail only about prayer, because it is the center of all virtues and ascetic practices, and especially because it is the channel through which the Holy Spirit is received.

45. Regarding outward asceticism and which way of life is the highest and foremost, know this, beloved: all virtues are interconnected, like the links of a spiritual chain; they depend on one another: prayer on love, love on joy, joy on meekness, meekness on humility, humility on service, service on hope, hope on faith, faith on obedience, and obedience on simplicity. Likewise, on the opposite side, evil deeds depend on one another: hatred on irritability, irritability on pride, pride on vanity, vanity on unbelief, unbelief on cruelty, cruelty on negligence, negligence on laziness, laziness from despondency, despondency from impatience, impatience from sensuality; the other parts of vice are likewise interconnected, just as, on the side of virtue, the virtues are interconnected and depend on one another (40, 1).

46. The chief element in every good endeavor and the crown of merit is diligent perseverance in prayer. Through it, by asking God, we can acquire the other virtues daily. Hence, in those who are deemed worthy, there arises communion in God's holiness, in spiritual efficacy, and a union of the mind, as it were, in ineffable love for the Lord. For whoever compels himself daily to remain in prayer is kindled by spiritual love for God to divine devotion and ardent desire, and receives the grace of spiritual, sanctifying perfection (40, 2).

47. We must not pray out of physical habit or the custom of crying out, remaining silent, or bowing our knees, but, listening soberly with our minds, we must wait for God to come and visit the soul in all its paths and ways and in all its senses. Thus, sometimes it is necessary to be silent, and at other times it is necessary to cry out and pray with a cry, so long as the mind is fixed on God. For just as the body, when engaged in some task, is wholly absorbed in it, and all its members help one another, so too should the soul devote itself entirely to prayer and the love of the Lord, without being distracted or wandering in its thoughts, but placing all its hope in Christ. And in that case, the Lord Himself will enlighten it, teaching it true supplication, granting it a pure, spiritual prayer worthy of God, and worship in spirit and truth (33:1–2).

48. Those who approach the Lord must offer their prayers in silence, peace, and deep tranquility, and listen to the Lord—not with unseemly and confused cries, but with a contrite heart and sober thoughts. It behooves the servant of God to abide not in disorder, but in all meekness and wisdom, as the Prophet said, "Whom shall I look upon? Only the meek and quiet, who tremble at My words" (Isa. 66:2). We also find that in the time of Moses and Elijah, when God appeared to them, trumpets and mighty forces served in great numbers before the Lord's majesty ; but the Lord's coming was distinguished and revealed by what is described above—that is, by peace, silence, and stillness. For it is said, "Behold, a still, small voice, and there the Lord" (1 Kings 19:12). And this shows that the Lord's rest consists in peace and tranquility (6:1–2).

49. The true foundation of prayer is this: to be attentive to one's thoughts and to pray in profound silence and peace. A person who prays must direct all his effort toward his thoughts, cutting off whatever serves as food for wicked thoughts, directing his mind toward God, and not fulfilling the desires of his thoughts, but gathering his wandering thoughts from all directions into one, distinguishing natural thoughts from wicked ones. Under the power of sin, the soul is likened to a great forest on a mountain, or reeds by a river, or some thicket of thorns and trees; therefore, those intending to pass through such a place must stretch out their hands and, with effort and difficulty, push the branches aside before them. Likewise, the soul is surrounded by a whole forest of thoughts instilled by the opposing force; therefore, great care and attentiveness are required for a person to distinguish foreign thoughts instilled by the opposing force. Those who are attentive to their thoughts perform the entire work of prayer inwardly. Such people, through their understanding and discernment, can succeed, repel rising thoughts, and walk in the will of the Lord (6:3–4).

i) Among the precautions a spiritual warrior must take, St. Macarius emphasizes above all that one must not stop at mere outward discipline. The purpose of spiritual labor, from an external standpoint, is to accustom oneself to all spiritual struggles and all virtues, but not in order to stop there; rather, this very process should be directed toward the development of the inner life and the acquisition of the Spirit's power. But others stop at this alone, achieving only proper conduct, while paying no attention to the heart and seeking not the Spirit of grace. Consequently, they labor but bear no fruit. St. Macarius urges us to guard against this above all else.

50. Many, strictly observing outward conduct, practicing the disciplines, and striving for a righteous life, think that such a person is perfect, without delving into the heart or noticing the vices there that hold the soul captive. Meanwhile, within the body lies the root of vice, commensurate with the inner corrupt thought, and a robber lurks within the house—that is, a force that is opposed, and therefore antagonistic and at the same time mental. And if anyone does not fight against sin, then inner vice, spreading gradually and multiplying, draws a person into obvious sins and leads them to commit them in deed, because evil, like the opening of a spring, always pours forth a stream from within itself. Therefore, strive to stem the flow of vice, lest you fall into a thousand evils (15:46).

51. The world suffers from the disease of vice and does not realize it. There is an impure fire that inflames the heart, runs through all the limbs, and drives people to debauchery and to thousands of evil deeds. And those who get angry and indulge in pleasure commit adultery inwardly, in their hearts; and when evil thus finds its nourishment, they fall into open adultery as well. Understand the same regarding greed, vanity, pride, jealousy, and irritability. Just as when someone is invited to a meal and offered a variety of dishes, so too does sin tempt one to taste everything, and then the soul that indulges becomes burdened (15:48).

52. Can anyone say, “I fast, I lead a life of pilgrimage, I give away my possessions—therefore, I am already holy”? For abstaining from evil is not yet perfection in itself, unless you have already entered into a humble mind and slain the serpent that lurks beneath the very mind, in the depths of your thoughts, where it nests and kills you in the so-called hiding places and storehouses of the soul, because the heart is an abyss; so have you put it to death and cast out from yourself every impurity that was within you? All the wise, the Law, the Apostles, and the coming of Christ have purification as their goal. Every person, whether Jew or Greek, loves purity but cannot become pure on their own. Therefore, we must seek to discover how and by what means purity of heart can be attained. This is possible only through the One who was crucified for us. He is the way, the life, the truth, the door, the pearl, the living and heavenly bread. Without this truth, it is impossible for anyone to know the truth and be saved. Therefore, just as—in regard to the outward man and visible things—you have renounced everything and distributed your possessions, so too, if you possess knowledge and the power of the word and, in worldly wisdom, must cast everything aside, and regard everything as nothing, only then will you be able to edify yourself in the fervor of preaching, which is true wisdom, consisting not in the beauty of words but in the power that works through the holy cross (17:15).

53. The most important weapon for the warrior and ascetic is this: having entered the heart, he must wage war against Satan, hate himself, renounce his own soul, be angry with it, rebuke it, resist his habitual desires, contend with his thoughts, and struggle against himself (26:12).

54. And if you outwardly guard your body against corruption and fornication, but inwardly you have committed adultery and committed fornication in your thoughts, then you are an adulterer before God, and your chaste body will be of no benefit to you. Just as a young man who, by cunning, seduces a maiden and defiles her becomes abhorrent to his bride because of his fornication, so too does the incorporeal soul, entering into communion with the serpent dwelling within—the deceitful spirit—commit fornication before God. And it is written, “Anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Matt. 5:28). For there is fornication committed in the flesh, and there is fornication of the soul, which enters into communion with Satan. The same soul can be either a partner and sister of demons or of God and the angels; and by committing adultery with the devil, it becomes unfit for the heavenly Bridegroom (26:13).

55. We have repeatedly cited the parable of the farmer who, after laboring and sowing seeds in the ground, must still wait for rain from above. But if no clouds appear and no winds blow, the farmer’s labor will be of no benefit to him, and the seed will lie barren. Apply this to the spiritual realm as well. If a person limits himself to his own efforts alone and does not accept what is extraordinary for his nature, he cannot bear worthy fruit for the Lord. What, then, is a person’s own work? It is to renounce the world, withdraw from it, abide in prayer and vigil, love God and his brothers—to abide in all of this is his own work. But if he limits himself to his own work and does not hope to receive something else, and the winds of the Holy Spirit do not blow upon his soul, and the heavenly cloud does not appear, and rain does not fall from heaven to water his soul, then a person cannot bear worthy fruit for the Lord (26:19).

i) Among those who appear outwardly upright, Saint Macarius singles out the scribes, who have learned from books and conversations what the matter is and expound upon it, but do not undertake the work itself; therefore, they lag behind even the ignorant in spiritual knowledge, and their very exposition is frivolous.

56. Whoever speaks of spiritual matters without having tasted them himself is like a man who, when the heat of the day sets in, walks through an empty field and, tormented by thirst, describes a spring water gushing forth, pretending to drink, even though his lips and tongue are parched by the thirst that scorches them; or to a man who says that honey is sweet but has not tasted it himself and does not know the power of its sweetness. Thus, if those who have not experienced their effectiveness or found confirmation of them within themselves speak of perfection, joy, or dispassion, then in reality things do not turn out as they say. For when such a person is eventually able, even in part, to put these things into practice, he will reflect to himself: “It turned out differently than I had supposed. I reasoned one way, but the Spirit acts another” (17:12).

57. It is one thing to speak about bread and a meal, and quite another to eat and take in the nourishment of the bread and be strengthened in every limb. It is one thing to speak in words about the sweetest drink, and quite another to go and draw from the very source and be satisfied by tasting the sweet drink. It is one thing to speak of war, of valiant fighters and warriors, and quite another for a person to join the ranks of the army and engage in battle with enemies, to advance and retreat, to receive and deliver blows, and to achieve victory. So it is in spiritual matters: it is one thing to explain what has been said to oneself through knowledge and reason alone, and quite another to possess—in reality, without a doubt, within one’s inner self and mind—the treasure, grace, inspiration, and working of the Holy Spirit. Those who utter mere words are deluding themselves and puffing themselves up with their own intellect (27:12).

58. Just as in the world, when war is declared, the wise and the nobles do not go to the battlefield but, fearing death, remain at home; instead, the newly emerged, the poor and the common people, are called to war; and it happens that they win victory over the enemies, drive them from the borders, and for this receive rewards and crowns from the king, attain honors and dignities, while those great men remain behind them—so it is in the spiritual realm as well. The uninitiated, hearing the word for the first time, carry it out in deed with a truthful intention and receive spiritual grace from God; but the wise, who delve deeply into the subtleties of the word, avoid battle and do not succeed, but remain behind those who took part in the battle and were victorious (43:8).

k) Therefore, one must strive in every way to acquire the Spirit of grace. For if He is not within you, all your sacrifices and labors are nothing, and at the hour of departure, the demons will seize you and drag you into their abyss. But whoever has the Spirit will burn them up.

59. If anyone, for the Lord’s sake, leaves his own, renounces this world, forsakes worldly pleasures, possessions, father, and mother, crucifies himself, and becomes a wanderer, a beggar, and one who possesses nothing—yet fails to find divine rest within himself instead of worldly peace, fails to feel spiritual delight in his soul, fails to clothe himself in the robe of divine light instead of perishable garments, according to the inner man; instead of his former, carnal communion, he will not know with certainty in his soul communion with the heavenly; instead of the visible joy of this world, he will not have within himself the joy of the spirit and the consolation of heavenly grace, nor will he receive into his soul, as it is written, divine satisfaction, “when the glory of the Lord is revealed to him” (Ps. 16: 15). In short, instead of this temporary pleasure, he will not yet acquire in his soul the longed-for, imperishable delight; thus, he has become salt that has lost its flavor; he is more pitiful than all people, deprived of the things of this world and having not enjoyed the divine; he has not come to know, through the working of the Spirit in his inner man, the divine mysteries (49:1).

60. And whatever the soul does, seemingly of its own accord—whatever it undertakes and strives to accomplish, relying solely on its own strength and thinking that it can bring the matter to perfection on its own, without the assistance of the Spirit—in that it errs greatly, for it is unfit for the heavenly abodes, a soul that thinks it can succeed in perfect purity by itself and by its own strength alone, without the Spirit, is unfit for the kingdom. If a person, under the influence of passions, does not draw near to God by renouncing the world, and does not believe with hope and patience that he will receive a blessing extraordinary to his own nature—that is, the power of the Holy Spirit—and does not receive divine life from the Lord above into his soul, then he will not experience true life, will not awaken from material intoxication; the illumination of the Spirit will not shine in the darkened soul; the holy day will not dawn within it; and it will not awaken from the deepest sleep of ignorance to truly know God through God’s power and the working of grace (24:5),

61. Therefore, whoever strives to believe and come to the Lord ought to pray that he may receive the Spirit of God even here, for He is the life of the soul, and the purpose of the Lord’s coming was to give life—the Holy Spirit—to the soul even here. For it is said, “While you have the light, believe in the light” (John 12:36), “The night is coming, when you will no longer be able to work” (John 9:4). Therefore, if anyone here has not sought and received life for the soul—that is, the divine light of the Spirit—then at the time of departure from the body, he is cast away into the realm of darkness, without entering the Kingdom of Heaven, and will meet his end in Gehenna with the devil and his angels. Or, just as gold or silver, when cast into the fire, becomes purer and more refined, and nothing—neither wood nor grass can alter it, for it itself becomes like fire and consumes everything that approaches it; so too, the soul, abiding in the spiritual fire and in the Divine light, will not endure any evil from any of the wicked spirits, and if anything should approach it, it is consumed by the heavenly fire of the Spirit. Or, just as a bird, when flying high, has no cares, fears neither hunters nor cunning beasts, and, soaring high above all, laughs, so too the soul, having taken on the wings of the Spirit and soaring to the highest heavenly heights, laughs at everything (30:6).

62. But if anyone does not yet have God's grace planted and established within them, then day and night, as if it were something natural, let their soul cling to that which, from time to time, guides them, moves them, and directs them toward the good. Let there be within him, at the very least, as something natural and unchanging, care, fear, concern, and a contrite heart that is always firmly established within him (16:6).

6. The State of Those Who Have Received the Power of the Spirit

a) For those who conscientiously and without self-pity pursue the labors of asceticism, the power and efficacy of grace are ultimately revealed. It manifests itself as a special spiritual warmth in the heart, the stilling of thoughts, the loss of desire for all created things, and the diminishing of the value of everything considered precious on earth. This is the very seed of the spiritual life. From here begins the spiritualization of the soul, its purification from passions, and the healing of the wounds caused by those passions.

1. Imitate Mary, thinking of nothing else but gazing only upon Him who said, "I have come to bring fire upon the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!" (Luke 12:49)? For the burning of the Spirit revives the heart. The incorporeal and divine fire sanctifies souls and refines them, just as pure gold is refined in the crucible, while vice is scorched away like thorns and straw, for "our God is a consuming fire" (Heb. 12:29). Seeking the power of this fire, blessed David said, "Test me, O Lord, and try me; examine my kidneys and my heart" (Ps. 25: 2). (25: 9).

2. This fire warmed the hearts of Cleopas and his companion when the Savior spoke to them after His resurrection. And the angels and ministering spirits partake of the radiance of this fire, as it is said: "He makes His angels spirits, and His servants a burning fire" (Heb. 1: 7). This fire, by burning away the chaff from the inner ocean, purifies the mind so that, having regained its natural clarity, it may ceaselessly behold the wonders of God, like one who says, "Open my eyes, and I will understand the wonders of Your law" (Ps. 118: 18). Therefore, this fire drives out demons and destroys sin (25: 10).

3. Just as iron, or lead, or gold, or silver, when placed in fire, lose their hardness, transforming into soft substances, and while they remain in the fire, by the power of the fire's heat, they melt and lose their natural hardness—so too the soul, having renounced the world and loved the One Lord, with great longing of the heart, through labor and ascetic endeavor, ceaselessly awaits Him with hope and faith; and having received within itself that heavenly fire of the Godhead and the love of the Spirit, it truly renounces all worldly love, frees itself from every harm of the passions, casts everything aside, transforms its natural disposition and its sinful hardness, and regards everything as superfluous in the one heavenly Bridegroom whom it has received into itself, finding rest in fervent and ineffable love for Him (4:14).

4. I tell you, however, that even the most beloved brothers whom she has before her eyes—if they hinder her in that love—the soul, so to speak, turns away from them, because her life and peace lie in the mysterious and ineffable communion with the heavenly King. For even love for carnal communion separates one from one's father, mother, and brothers, and everything pertaining to them becomes foreign to the mind. And if a man loves them, he loves them as an outsider, yet he still has affection for his wife. For it is said, "For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and the two will become one flesh" (Eph. 5:31). Therefore, if carnal love thus detaches one from all other love, how much more will those who have truly been deemed worthy to enter into communion with the heavenly and longed-for Holy Spirit detach themselves from all love for the world, and everything will seem superfluous to them, because they are overcome by heavenly desire and are in close dependence upon it—there their desires, there their thoughts are, there they live, there their thoughts wander, there their mind always dwells, overcome by Divine and heavenly love and spiritual desire (4, 15).

5. People upon whom the dew of the Spirit of divine life has fallen, piercing their hearts with divine love for Christ, the heavenly King, are drawn to that beauty, to that indescribable glory, to that imperishable splendor, to the inconceivable riches of Christ, the true and eternal King. They surrender themselves to longing and love, turning wholly toward Christ, and yearn to obtain those indescribable blessings which they contemplate in spirit; and for this reason, they regard as nothing all earthly beauty, glory, splendor, and honor, and the wealth of kings and princes, for they have been captivated by divine beauty, and the life of heavenly immortality has entered their souls. Therefore, they desire the one love of the heavenly King, keeping Him alone before their eyes with great longing; for His sake, they renounce all worldly love and withdraw from all earthly bonds, so that they may always keep this one desire in their hearts and mix nothing else with it (5, 6).

6. Those Christians who have truly tasted grace are the only ones who can understand that the entire earthly world—royal treasures, wealth, glory, and words of wisdom—is all but an illusion, something without a firm foundation but fleeting; and if there is anything under heaven, it is, in their eyes, worthy of utter contempt. Why is this so? Because what is above the heavens is wondrous and marvelous—something found neither in royal treasures, nor in words of wisdom, nor in worldly glory. And the dignity, or wealth, that they have acquired—having the Lord and Creator of all things within their innermost being—is an acquisition that is not fleeting, but abides forever (15:40, 41).

7. Through communion with and participation in the Holy Spirit, the minds and understanding of Christians attain steadfastness, steadfastness, serenity, and peace; they are no longer scattered or agitated by fickle and vain thoughts, but abide in the peace of Christ and in the love of the Spirit, just as the Lord, speaking of such people, said that they have passed “from death to life” (John 5:24). Through the renewal of the mind, the mortification of thoughts, love, and heavenly devotion to the Lord, the new creation—the Christian—is distinguished from all people in the world. For this very purpose did the Lord come, so that those who truly believe in Him might be made worthy of these spiritual blessings (5:4–5).

8. Just as the woman with the issue of blood, having truly believed and touched the hem of the Lord’s garment, was immediately healed, and the flow of the impure source of blood dried up, so every soul, having an incurable wound of sin—a source of impure and wicked thoughts—if it comes to Christ and, truly believing, asks, will receive saving healing from the flow of passions, and by the power of Jesus alone that source, which pours forth impure thoughts, will dry up and cease; but no one else can heal this wound (20:4).

9. Just as when the sun rises over the earth, all its rays are upon the earth, and when it sets in the west, as it returns to its home, it gathers all its rays back to itself, so too the soul, not reborn from above by the Spirit, is wholly on the earth with its thoughts, and its thoughts extend to the ends of the earth; but as soon as it is deemed worthy to receive heavenly birth and communion from the Spirit, having gathered all its thoughts together and keeping them within itself, it enters into the presence of the Lord, into the heavenly dwelling not made by human hands, and all its thoughts, entering the divine atmosphere, become heavenly, pure and holy, for the soul, having been freed from the bondage of the evil prince—the spirit of the world—attains pure and divine thoughts, since God was pleased to make man a partaker of the divine nature (49:3).

b) This becomes evident from the very first moments of grace’s influence, but it is very dangerous to think that there is already some kind of perfection here. This is only the beginning. Grace, having made itself felt, gradually takes hold of the heart until it fills everything and transforms the entire inner being.

10. When the action of Divine grace descends upon the soul in proportion to each person’s faith, and the soul accepts help from above, then grace descends upon it only in part. And do not think that anyone’s entire soul is illuminated; within it there still remains a vast expanse of vice, and a person requires great labor and effort, in harmony with the grace acting within him. That is why Divine grace—which in a single moment can purify a person and make them perfect—begins to visit the soul gradually, in order to test human free will: whether it preserves wholehearted love for God, making no compromise with the evil one, but surrendering itself entirely to grace. Thus, the soul, which over time and many years proves to be well-disposed, causing no grief or offense to grace, finds help for itself through this very gradual process. And grace itself takes possession of the pasture within the soul, and as the soul remains well-disposed and in harmony with grace for many years, it takes root down to the soul’s deepest faculties and thoughts, until the whole soul is embraced by heavenly grace, which already reigns within this vessel (41, 2).

11. Thus, many were led astray by the very workings of grace within them; they thought they had attained perfection and said, “We have had enough; we lack nothing.” But the Lord is infinite and incomprehensible. And Christians dare not say that they have comprehended Him, but humble themselves day and night. The soul has many parts, and its depth is great; and the sin that has crept into it has taken hold of all its pastures and the faculties of the heart. Then, when a person seeks grace, it comes to him and takes hold of perhaps two faculties of the soul. But the inexperienced person, comforted by grace, thinks that the grace that has come has taken hold of all the faculties of the soul, and that sin has been eradicated. Yet the greater part of the soul remains in the power of sin, while only one part is under grace. And the person is deceived and does not realize this (26, 17, 50, 5).

12. Even in one who is afflicted with an illness, some members may be healthy—for example, the organ of sight, the eye, or some other member—while the rest are impaired. The same is true in spiritual matters. A person may have three spiritual members in good health, but this does not yet make him perfect. You see how many spiritual degrees and measures there are, and how evil is purified and expelled gradually, part by part, rather than all at once (15, 7).

13. Just as a fetus in the womb does not instantly become a human being, but gradually takes on human form and is born—albeit as a human still of an imperfect age—and first grows for many years before becoming a man, so too do the seeds of barley or wheat not take root immediately upon being sown in the ground, but only after the cold and the winds have passed do they produce stalks in due time; and whoever plants a pear tree does not immediately harvest its fruit. So too in spiritual matters, where there is so much wisdom and subtlety, a person grows gradually and comes “to the measure of the full man, according to the measure of his stature” (Eph. 4:13), and not, as others claim, as if this were the same as undressing and dressing (15:39).

14. But just as a bee secretly builds its honeycomb in the hive, so too does grace secretly produce its love in our hearts, transforming bitterness into sweetness and hard-heartedness into compassion. And just as a silversmith and engraver, carving a design on a platter piece by piece, covers the various animals he is carving on it, and when he finishes his work, he reveals the platter in all its splendor, so too does the true Artist (Christ) the Lord adorn our hearts with His carvings and renews them mysteriously until we depart from this body, and then the beauty of the soul will become visible (16:7).

c) Therefore, those who have tasted grace constantly long more and more to taste it.

15. Souls who love righteousness and goodness, who with great hope and faith desire to be completely clothed in Christ, do not so much need reminders from others nor do they tolerate even the slightest diminishing of their heavenly desire and love for the Lord within themselves; rather, having nailed themselves entirely to the cross of Christ, they daily experience within themselves a sense of spiritual growth in their attachment to the spiritual Bridegroom; and, being pierced by heavenly desire and thirsting for the truth of the virtues, they strongly and insatiably desire spiritual enlightenment. And if, by virtue of their faith, they are deemed worthy to receive knowledge of the divine mysteries, or become partakers of the joy of heavenly grace, they do not rely on themselves or consider themselves to be anything special; rather, to the extent that they are deemed worthy of spiritual gifts, to that same extent—due to the insatiability of their heavenly desire—they seek them with even greater intensity; the more they sense spiritual progress within themselves, the more they hunger and thirst for the communion and multiplication of grace; the more they are enriched spiritually, the more they seem to become impoverished in their own estimation of themselves, because of the insatiability of the spiritual desire to strive toward the heavenly Bridegroom, as Scripture says, “Those who eat of Me will still hunger, and those who drink of Me will still thirst” (Sir. 24:23). (10:1).

16. A soul that truly loves God and Christ, even if it has performed thousands of righteous deeds, because of its insatiable longing for the Lord, considers itself as though it had done nothing yet; even if it has exhausted its body through fasting and vigils, it remains with the feeling that it has not yet begun to labor for virtue; even if it has been deemed worthy to attain various spiritual gifts, revelations, and heavenly mysteries, because of her boundless and insatiable love for the Lord, she finds within herself that she has not yet acquired anything; on the contrary, hungering and thirsting daily, abiding in prayer with faith and love, she cannot be sated by the grace-filled mysteries and the cultivation of herself in every virtue. Pierced by the love of the heavenly Spirit, with the help of grace she ceaselessly stirs within herself a fervent longing for the heavenly Bridegroom; she desires to be made wholly worthy of the mysterious and ineffable communion with Him in the sanctuary of the Spirit; with the unveiled face of her soul, she beholds the heavenly Bridegroom face to face, in spiritual and ineffable light, enters into union with Him with complete certainty, conforms to His death, and with great longing ceaselessly awaits death for Christ’s sake; she believes without a doubt that through the Spirit she will receive complete deliverance from sin and the darkness of the passions, and, having been purified by the Spirit and sanctified in soul and body, will be deemed worthy to become a pure vessel for receiving the heavenly kingdom within itself and a dwelling place for Christ, the heavenly and true King. And it is then that it becomes worthy of heavenly life, having already become here a pure dwelling place of the Holy Spirit (10:4).

17. But it is not possible for the soul to reach such a state suddenly or without trials. On the contrary, through many labors and struggles, over time, with diligence, after trials and various temptations, it attains spiritual growth and progress even to the perfect state of dispassion, and then, having willingly and courageously withstood “every temptation of sin,” it will be deemed worthy of great honors, spiritual gifts, and heavenly riches, and in this way will become an heir to the heavenly kingdom of Christ Jesus, our Lord (10:5).

18. Christianity is food and drink. And the more one tastes of it, the more the mind is stirred by its sweetness, becoming uncontrollable and insatiable, demanding and partaking more and more. Or, just as when someone is thirsty and is given a sweet drink, upon tasting it, their thirst is kindled even more intensely, and they draw closer to the drink—so too does the tasting of the Spirit produce an almost unquenchable thirst, which is rightly likened to the thirst of such a person. And these are not mere words, but the work of the Holy Spirit, mysteriously assisting the mind (17:13).

19. Imagine a spring, and suppose some thirsty person begins to drink from it; then, while he is drinking, someone distracts him and prevents him from drinking as much as he wants; then, having tasted the water, his thirst is kindled even more, and he seeks the drink with greater intensity. So it is in spiritual matters as well: one has already begun to taste and partake of the heavenly food, and suddenly, at that very moment, he is stopped, and no one allows him to be satisfied (27:7).

20. The Lord knows human weakness—that a person quickly becomes arrogant—and so He stops him and allows him to remain in constant discipline and agitation. For if, even when you receive only a little, you become unbearable to everyone and grow haughty, how much more will you become intolerable if you are allowed to be satisfied even once. But God, knowing your weakness, sends you trials according to His will, so that you may become humble and seek God more earnestly (27:8).

d) Longing more and more for the Lord, such people feel poor and lacking in everything; therefore, humility is a deeply rooted feeling within them. It is also the prerequisite for all further progress.

21. How can a person be poor in spirit, especially when he feels within himself that he has changed, made progress, and attained knowledge and understanding that he did not have before? Until a person has acquired this and made progress, he is not yet poor in spirit, but thinks highly of himself. But when this understanding and progress come, then grace itself teaches him to be poor in spirit; and although he is righteous and God’s chosen one, he must not regard himself as anything, but must acknowledge his soul as worthless and humbled, as if he knew and possessed nothing, even though he does know and possess. And such a thought becomes, as it were, innate and deeply rooted in the human mind. Do you not see that our forefather Abraham, being God’s chosen one, called himself dust and ashes (Gen. 18:27)? And David, anointed as king, had God before him, and what does he say? “I am a worm and not a man, scorned by men and despised by the people” (Ps. 21:7). Therefore, those who desire to be their co-heirs, fellow citizens in the heavenly city, and to be glorified with them, must possess the same humility and not think of themselves as anything special, but have a contrite heart (12:3–4).

22. One who has received grace considers himself more lowly than all sinners, and such a thought is instilled in him as something natural; the deeper he enters into the knowledge of God, the more he considers himself ignorant; the more he learns, the more he acknowledges that he knows nothing. This is what grace working within produces in the soul as something natural (16:12).

23. Those who are skilled in the ways of God acknowledge themselves to be very small and utterly unskilled, and it has become natural and indispensable for them to regard themselves as lowly, or even as nothing. Do such people not know that they have been given what they did not have, and have acquired something extraordinary for their nature? I tell you that they do not consider themselves virtuous or successful; they do not realize that they have acquired what they did not have. But the grace that descends upon such people teaches them that, even as they prosper, they should not regard their souls as precious, but should naturally consider themselves worthless. And though they are precious in the sight of God, they do not see themselves that way; even as they flourish and are guided by God, they consider themselves, as it were, to know nothing, and though they are rich in the sight of God, they seem poor in their own eyes (27:4–5).

24. But if you see someone boasting and taking pride in being a partaker of grace—even if he were to perform miracles and raise the dead—yet if he does not acknowledge his soul to be dishonorable and humbled, and himself to be poor in spirit and wretched, he is consumed by malice without even realizing it. Even if he performs miracles, he should not be believed, for the mark of Christianity—even for one who is pleasing to God—is to strive to hide this from people; and even if he possesses all the king’s treasures, he should conceal them and always say: “This treasure is not mine; another has entrusted it to me, and I am a beggar; when the one who entrusted it wishes, he will take it from me.” But if anyone says, “I am rich; I have enough of what I have acquired; I need nothing more”—such a person is not a Christian, but a vessel of delusion and of the devil. For the delight in God is insatiable, and to the extent that one tastes and partakes of Him, one becomes all the more eager. Such people possess fervor and an unquenchable love for God; the more they strive to succeed and acquire, the more they acknowledge themselves to be beggars, lacking in everything and having acquired nothing. They say, “I am unworthy that this sun should shine upon me.” This is a sign of Christianity; this is humility (15:35).

25. If anyone fails to observe great humility, he surrenders himself to Satan and is stripped of the divine grace given to him; then his pride is revealed, for he is naked and poor. Therefore, one who is enriched by God’s grace must abide in great humility and heartfelt contrition, consider himself a beggar and one who possesses nothing, and think: “Everything I have is not my own; another has given it to me, and when he wills, he will take it from me.” Whoever humbles himself in this way before God and people can preserve the grace given to him, as it is said, “Whoever humbles himself will be exalted” (Matt. 23:12). Being God’s chosen one, let him condemn himself; and being faithful, let him consider himself unworthy. Such souls please God and are brought to life by Christ (41:3).

e) Nevertheless, they are warned above all to guard against conceit, pride, and judgmentalism, for grace departs because of these, and without grace comes immediate downfall.

26. If a king entrusts his treasure to a beggar, the one who has received it for safekeeping does not consider this treasure his own property, but acknowledges his poverty everywhere, not daring to squander another’s treasure, because he always reasons with himself: “This treasure is not only someone else’s, but it has also been entrusted to me by a mighty king, and he will take it from me whenever he wishes.” And those who possess God’s grace must think the same of themselves, be humble in wisdom, and acknowledge their poverty. If a beggar, having received from the king the treasure entrusted to him and relying on this treasure that belongs to another, begins to boast of it as his own wealth, and his heart is filled with pride, then the king takes his treasure back, and the one who had it in his care remains just as poor as he was before. So, if even those who possess grace become boastful, and their hearts grow proud, then the Lord will take His grace away from them, and they will remain just as they were before receiving grace from the Lord (15:25).

27. For, having received the grace of the Spirit and finding for themselves gracious comfort in rest, desire, and spiritual sweetness, and having relied on this, they become proud, give themselves over to carelessness, without contrition of heart, without humility of mind, and without having attained the perfect measure of dispassion, having failed to be completely filled with grace through all diligence and faith, they are satisfied with this and rest, and come to rest with a small measure of grace-filled consolation; such souls, having prospered more in pride than in humility, even if they were granted some gift, are deprived of it because of their careless negligence and the vain boastfulness of their conceit (10:3).

28. I tell you, however, that I have seen people who possessed all gifts and became partakers of the Spirit, yet, having failed to attain perfect love, they fell. A certain noble man, having renounced the world, sold his estate, set his slaves free, and, as a prudent and sensible man, had already become renowned for his virtuous life; yet, having succumbed to conceit and arrogance, he ultimately fell into debauchery and a thousand evils (27:14).

29. Another, during the persecution, sacrificed his body, and, having been a confessor, was later, upon the restoration of peace, set free and held in high esteem; his eyelids were damaged from having been tormented in thick smoke. And he, though glorified, when called to prayer, took some bread and gave it to his servant, and his mind was in such a state as if he had never heard the word of God (27:15).

30. Another, a certain ascetic who lived with me in the same house and prayed together with me, was so rich in grace that, while praying beside me, he would be moved to deep emotion, for grace was overflowing within him. He had been given the gift of healing and not only cast out demons but also healed those bound hand and foot who suffered from severe illnesses by the laying on of hands. Then, having become conceited, glorified by the world, and taking pleasure in himself, he grew proud and fell into the very depths of sin. Behold, even he who possessed the gift of healing fell. Do you see how those who have not attained the measure of love fall? But whoever has attained love, bound and enraptured by it, is immersed and led away as a captive into another world, as if no longer feeling his own nature (27:16).

31. A faithful and truly loving soul, beholding the eternal blessings prepared for the righteous and the ineffable beneficence of God's grace about to descend, acknowledges that it—along with its own care, labor, and deeds—is unworthy of the ineffable promises of the Spirit. Such is the poor in spirit whom the Lord blesses. Such is the one who hungers and thirsts for righteousness. Such is the one who is broken in heart. Those who have embraced such a disposition, such devotion, such labor, and such love for virtue—and who have remained so to the end—will truly be able to receive life and the eternal kingdom. Therefore, let none of the brothers exalt himself above his brother, and let no one, deceived by the evil one, become puffed up with pride, saying, "Behold, I already possess a spiritual gift." For it is unworthy of Christians to think this way. You do not know what tomorrow will bring for your brother; you do not know what your end or his will be. On the contrary, let everyone, being attentive to himself, constantly examine his conscience and test the work of his heart—with what care and effort his mind strives toward God—and, keeping in mind the perfect goal—freedom, dispassion, and spiritual peace—let it flow unceasingly and diligently, relying on no gift or justification whatsoever (29:7).

32. How do even those upon whom God's grace has worked fall? Even the purest thoughts by nature can become corrupt and fall. A person begins to boast, to condemn another, and to say, "You are a sinner"—while considering himself righteous. Do you not know what Paul says? "A thorn in the flesh was given to me, a messenger of Satan, to torment me, so that I might not become conceited" (2 Cor. 12:7). And even in a pure nature, there is the potential for pride (7:4).

33. Therefore, Christians themselves must make every effort not to condemn anyone at all—neither an obvious harlot, nor sinners, nor lawless people—but to look upon everyone with a simple-hearted disposition, with a pure eye, so that it may become, as it were, something natural and inevitable to a person—not to belittle anyone, not to condemn anyone, not to despise anyone, and not to make distinctions between people (15:8).

34. Can a person fall while possessing the gift of grace? If he becomes complacent, he falls, because the enemies never remain idle and wage war without succumbing to laziness. All the more reason, then, should you not cease your quest before God. For much harm will come to you if you give in to negligence, even if, outwardly, you appear to have been tested in the very mystery of grace (15:14).

35. The dignity of Christians is great; it is incomparable to anything else. But if anyone is led into distraction and robbed by malice, he becomes like a city without walls, into which robbers enter unhindered from wherever they please, and lay it waste and burn it. Thus, if you, too, are careless and inattentive to yourself, then evil spirits come, reduce your mind to nothing, and lay it waste, scattering your thoughts in this world (15:45).

e) Therefore, just as much as they rejoice, realizing what a treasure they have received, they are equally afraid of losing it, and they strive to perform their spiritual service in such a way as not to offend the Spirit of grace, lest He depart.

36. The laborer does not place his hope in his labors or in his life until he receives what he desires, until the Lord comes and dwells within him in every sensation and action of the Spirit. And when he tastes the Lord's grace and delights in the spiritual fruits, the veil of darkness will be lifted, and the light of Christ will shine forth and work with indescribable joy; then he will be assured of the great love of having the Lord with him. Like a merchant who has made a profit, he rejoices, yet at the same time he grieves and fears harm from robbers and deceitful spirits, lest, growing weak, he should in any way squander his labor before he is deemed worthy to enter the Kingdom of Heaven, the heavenly Jerusalem (14:2).

37. Just as merchants sailing the sea, even though they may find a favorable wind and calm waters, remain in constant fear—until they enter the harbor—that a contrary wind might suddenly arise, the sea might become rough, and the ship will be in danger; so too, Christians, though they feel within themselves the favorable breath of the Holy Spirit, still live in fear that a contrary wind might arise and blow, stirring up rebellion and turmoil in their souls. Therefore, great care is needed to enter the harbor of rest, into perfect peace, into eternal life and eternal joy, into the city of the saints—the heavenly Jerusalem, into the Church of the firstborn (Heb. 12:23). But for those who have not yet passed through these stages, there are many reasons to fear that the evil one might cause them to stumble in some way during this journey (43:4).

38. A certain wealthy man, a most illustrious king, will turn his favor toward a poor woman who has nothing but her own body; he will become her lover and resolve to take her into his home as a bride and companion. And if she finally shows her affection for her husband, then, while remaining faithful to him, this poor, destitute woman, who had nothing of her own, becomes the mistress of all her husband's possessions. But if she acts contrary to her duty and obligation and behaves improperly in her husband's house, she is then cast out in disgrace and humiliation, and she goes, placing both hands on her head, just as the Law of Moses prescribes for a wife who is disobedient and displeasing to her husband (Deut. 24:1), and then she suffers and weeps bitterly, reflecting on the wealth she has lost, the glory she has been deprived of, and the disgrace she has brought upon herself through her own folly (15:2).

39. Likewise, the soul whom Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom, betroths to Himself as a bride for a mystical and divine communion with Him—and who will partake of heavenly riches—must, with great care, sincerely please Christ, her betrothed, and fulfill the spiritual ministry entrusted to her in a proper and fitting manner, so as to please God in all things, not to offend the Spirit in any way, to preserve perfect chastity and love for Christ in the proper manner, to conduct herself well in the house of the heavenly King, with complete devotion to the grace bestowed upon her. And so, such a soul is set as mistress over all the Lord's blessings, and her very body receives glory from the Divinity of Christ. But if she sins in any way, and in her service acts contrary to her duty, fails to do what is pleasing to Christ, and does not follow His will, nor does she cooperate with the grace of the Spirit inherent in her, then she is subjected to shameful disgrace and is cut off from life, having become unfit and incapable of communion with the Heavenly King. And regarding this soul, there is already sorrow, grief, and weeping among all the holy and wise spirits; the Angels, the Powers, the Apostles, the Prophets, and the Martyrs lament over her (15:2).

40. Therefore, we must strive and conduct ourselves with all prudence and caution, so that, as it is written, we may work out our own salvation with fear (Phil. 2:12). Therefore, all of you who have become partakers of the Spirit of Christ, in nothing—whether small or great—act with contempt or offend the grace of the Spirit, lest you lose the life of which you have already become partakers (15:4),

41. And I present the same idea in another context. If a servant enters the royal chambers and serves the king by presenting what has been entrusted to him, he takes it from the royal treasury; and though he enters with nothing of his own, he serves the king using royal vessels. But here great prudence and discernment are required, so that while serving he does not do anything improper, does not serve one dish instead of another at the king's table, but presents all the dishes, from the first to the last, in the proper order. And if, through ignorance and lack of judgment, he serves the king improperly, he will be exposed to danger and death (15:5).

42. Likewise, the soul, having dedicated itself to the service of God by grace and by the Spirit, needs great discernment and guidance so as not to err in any way regarding God's vessels—that is, regarding spiritual service—by acting according to its own will, which is at odds with grace. For the soul can serve the Lord through spiritual service, which is performed in secret by the inner man, and through its own vessels—that is, the spirit of the inner man—but without His vessels—that is, without grace—no one can serve God, that is, please Him by fulfilling God's will in all things (15:5).

43. And when the soul receives grace, it then requires much prudence and discernment. Yet God Himself grants all this to the soul that asks of Him, so that it may serve Him acceptably by the Spirit He bestows, not being overcome by vice in anything nor sinning by straying from the path through ignorance, carelessness, and negligence, and by transgressing the Lord's will against one's duty; for such a soul will be punished with death and weeping, as the Divine Apostle also says, "Lest, while I am preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified" (1 Cor. 9:27). Do you see what fear he had, being God's Apostle? Therefore, let us pray to God that all of us who have received God's grace may, above all, carry out our spiritual ministry in accordance with His will, and not become accustomed to a mindset that disregards everything, but rather, by living a life pleasing to God and, in accordance with His will, serving Him through spiritual ministry, inherit eternal life (15:6).

44. Just as the komiti, or provincial governors, who enter the King's palace are filled with great fear about how to answer Him and avoid reproach and punishment for giving the wrong answer, while the villagers and common people, who have never seen the prince, behave carefree—so too the entire world under heaven, everyone, from kings down to beggars, not knowing the glory of Christ, is preoccupied with the affairs of this life, and few ever remember the Day of Judgment; but those who enter in spirit into the judgment seat of Christ, where the throne of Christ stands, and always standing before Christ, remain in constant fear and trembling, lest they sin in any way against His holy commandments (15, 17).

45. Just as a servant, when he is near his master, lives in fear the entire time he is near him and does nothing without him, so too must we lay bare and reveal our thoughts before Christ, the Lord and the Knower of Hearts, and place our hope and trust in Him, for He is my glory, He is my Father, He is my wealth. Therefore, you must always have care and reverence in your conscience (16:6).

46. Just as those entrusted with the chief administration of a province or the royal treasury are constantly concerned not to offend the king in any way, so too are those entrusted with spiritual matters always concerned; and even when they have peace, it is as if they do not have it, because they are still driving out of their souls the kingdom of darkness, which has invaded the city—that is, the soul—and the barbarians who have taken possession of its pastures (16:12).

g) For this very purpose, they strive in every way not to let their minds stray from the Lord, and to keep their inner selves in such order as a helmsman keeps his ship's crew, or a charioteer his horses.

47. God is indescribable and incomprehensible; He reveals Himself everywhere—in the mountains, in the sea, and in the depths of the abyss—without moving from one place to another; just as the angels descend from heaven to earth, so He is in heaven, and He is here. If you seek the Lord in the depths, you will find that He performs miracles there. If you seek Him in the den, you will find that there, between two lions, He protects the righteous Daniel. If you seek Him in the fire, you will find that there He helps His servants. If you seek Him on the mountain, you will find that He is there—with Elijah and Moses. The Lord is everywhere—beneath the earth, above the heavens, within us, and everywhere (16:5, 12).

48. A Christian is obligated to always keep God in mind, for it is written, “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart” (Deut. 6:5)—that is, love the Lord not only when you enter a house of prayer, but also while traveling, conversing, and eating; keep God in mind, and maintain love and devotion to Him. For He says, “Where your treasure is, there your heart will be also” (Matt. 6:21). Whatever a person's heart is attached to, and whatever his desires draw him toward, that becomes his god. If the heart always seeks God, then God is the Lord of his heart. Just as twigs thrown into the fire cannot resist the power of the fire but are immediately consumed, so too, when demons seek to attack a person who has been graced with the gifts of the Spirit, they are scorched and destroyed by the divine fiery power—provided that the person himself remains constantly attached to the Lord and places his trust and hope in Him. And even if demons are as strong as solid mountains, they are set ablaze by prayer, just as wax is by fire (43:3).

49. And it happens that the saints of the Lord sit in the theater of the world and watch its deceptions, but in their inner being they converse with God, while outwardly they appear to be gazing at what is happening in the world. Worldly people are subject to a different influence—the spirit of flattery—by which they seek earthly wisdom; but Christians have a different will and a different mind; they are people of a different age and a different city, because the Spirit of God dwells in communion with their souls (15:8–9).

50. The Apostle says, “I want men to pray without anger or selfish motives” (1 Tim. 2:8), because, according to the Gospel, thoughts come from the heart (Matt. 15:19). Therefore, when you begin to pray, pay attention to your heart and your mind; desire that a pure prayer may flow from you to God; and above all, see if there is anything hindering your prayer, whether your prayer is pure, whether your mind is occupied with the Lord just as a farmer's is with farming, a husband's with his wife, and a merchant's with trade; and when you kneel down to pray, do other thoughts distract you (15:12).

51. It is written, “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart” (Deut. 6:5). And you say, “I love Him, and I have the Holy Spirit.” But do you truly have remembrance of the Lord, love for Him, and fervor toward Him? Are you devoted to the Lord day and night? If you have such love, then you are pure. But if you do not, then when earthly cares and wicked and deceitful thoughts arise, examine whether you are truly steadfast in this, whether your soul is always drawn to God's love and devoted to God. For worldly thoughts distract the mind with earthly and transitory things, preventing one from loving God or remembering the Lord. Often even an uneducated person begins to pray, bends the knee, and his mind enters into peace; and to the extent that he undermines the opposing wall of malice and burrows beneath it, so is it destroyed, and the person attains to a vision and wisdom that the strong, the wise, or the eloquent cannot reach, and they cannot comprehend or fathom the subtlety of his mind, for he is absorbed in the divine mysteries (15:13).

52. When there is a fire outside a copper vessel, and you then begin to add firewood, the vessel heats up, and whatever is inside it boils and bubbles from the fire kindled outside the vessel. But if someone is lazy and does not add firewood, the heat will begin to diminish and, as it were, die out. So too, grace is a heavenly fire within you. If you pray and surrender your thoughts to love for Christ, it is as if you have added firewood, and your thoughts will become a fire and be immersed in God's love. Although the Spirit withdraws and seems to be outside of you, He nevertheless abides within you and manifests Himself outside of you. But if anyone becomes distracted, even slightly, by worldly affairs or distraction, sin returns, takes hold of the soul, and begins to oppress the person. The soul recalls its former peace and begins to grieve and suffer more frequently (40, 7).

53. Once again the mind turns to God; once again the former peace begins to draw near; once again it begins to seek God more earnestly, saying, "I beseech You, O Lord!" Gradually, a fire grows that both inflames and soothes the soul, just as a hook gradually draws a fish from the depths. And if this were not so, and the soul had not tasted bitterness and death, how could it distinguish the bitter from the sweet, death from life, and give thanks to the Life-giving Father, Son, and Holy Spirit forever! (40, 8).

54. Just as on a ship—if it is fully equipped—the helmsman directs and controls everything, rebuking some and instructing others what to do, so too does the heart have a helmsman—the mind—as well as a conscience that convicts, and thoughts that condemn and justify; for the Apostle says: "They are convicted or acquitted by their own thoughts" (Rom. 2:15). (15, 31).

55. If the chariot, the reins, the animals, and everything else needed for it are in the hands of a single charioteer, then whenever he wishes, he races along in the chariot at full speed, and whenever he wishes, he restrains the chariot; and again, wherever he wishes to turn it, there it goes—the entire chariot is under the charioteer's control. Likewise, the heart has many natural thoughts that are closely connected to it, while the mind and conscience provide guidance and direction to the heart and quell the natural thoughts that arise within it, for the soul has many components, even though it is one (15:32).

56. People, having harnessed their horses, steer their chariots and rush against one another, each striving to overthrow and defeat his opponent. So the heart of the ascetic presents a spectacle: there, evil spirits struggle against the soul, while God and the angels gaze upon the struggle. Moreover, every hour many new thoughts are produced by the soul, and malice also instills them. For the soul has many hidden thoughts, and at this very moment it produces and gives birth to them; and malice has many thoughts and designs, and every hour it generates new thoughts against the soul, because the mind is a charioteer, who harnesses the chariot of the soul, holding the reins of thoughts, and rushes against the satanic chariot, just as Satan has prepared it against the soul (40:5).

g) From this it is clear that the battle against sin and the enemy does not cease here either; hence the unceasing struggle against the thoughts and movements of the heart. Here it is more subtle.

57. Many, though grace is inherent in them, do not realize that they have been robbed by sin. Just as if a young woman and a young man were living in a house, and the woman, seduced by the man, finally consents to him, commits adultery, and becomes despised, so too does the dreadful serpent of sin dwell with the soul, tempting and persuading it; and if she consents, the incorporeal soul enters into communion with the incorporeal malice of the spirit—that is, spirit enters into communion with spirit—and the one who accepts the thought of the wicked one into himself and consents to it commits adultery in his heart. Therefore, the measure of your spiritual struggle lies in not committing adultery in your thoughts, but in resisting with your mind and waging an inner battle, fighting against vice and disobeying it, and not taking pleasure in it in your thoughts. And if the Lord finds this readiness in you, He will receive you into His Kingdom on the last day (15:26).

58. It is human nature that even one who is deep in vice and engaged in sin can turn to good, and even one who is bound by the Holy Spirit and enraptured by heavenly things has the power to turn to evil. And even those who have tasted God's grace and have already become partakers of the Spirit, if they are not careful, grow cold and become worse than they were when they lived in the world. And this happens not because God is changeable or powerless, or because the Spirit fades away, but because people themselves are not in harmony with grace, which is why they are led astray and fall into countless evils (15:34).

59. Others, having already tasted the sweetness of God, are still subject to the enemy's influence within them, and, out of inexperience, are surprised that even after God's visitation, their thoughts continue to exert their influence even during the Christian sacraments. But those who have grown accustomed to this state are not surprised by it, just as experienced farmers, through long-standing practice, do not remain completely carefree when there is a bountiful harvest, but anticipate both famine and scarcity; and conversely, when famine or scarcity befalls them, they do not lose all hope, knowing that times change. So it is in the spiritual realm: when the soul is subjected to various temptations, it is neither surprised nor despondent, for it knows that, by God's permission, the evil one is allowed to test and punish it; and conversely, in the midst of its great wealth and peace, it does not become complacent, but anticipates change (16:3).

60. When a person is deeply immersed in grace and enriched by it, there is still a seed of vice within him, but he also has an intercessor who helps him. If a spring flows, the surrounding areas remain damp and moist. But as soon as the heat sets in, both the spring and the surrounding areas dry up. So it is with the servants of God, in whom grace abounds: it dries up both the desires stirred up by the evil one and their natural desires, because now God's people have risen above the first Adam (16:4).

61. Some find such rest in God's grace that they become stronger than the vice dwelling within them; and though they possess prayer and great peace before God, at times they fall prey to the influence of wicked thoughts and are ensnared by sin, even while they still abide in God's grace. But frivolous and ignorant people, when grace is at work in them to some extent, think that there is no longer any sin in them, whereas those who are discerning and prudent do not presume to deny that, even while possessing God's grace, they are not subject to the influence of shameful and impure thoughts (17:5).

62. We often find among the brothers that some, having attained great joy and grace, would say of themselves for five or six years: "Lust has withered away in us"—and afterward, when they considered themselves completely freed from lust, the vice lurking within them was set in motion, and they were inflamed with lust, at which they marveled within themselves and said, "How is it that, after such a long time, such a vice has arisen in us?" Therefore, no one of sound mind would dare to say, "Since grace dwells in me, I am completely free from sin." On the contrary, two forces are at work in the mind. Those inexperienced in this matter, as soon as grace has had even the slightest effect on them, think that they are already victorious and have become perfect Christians. But in my view, it is like this: when the sun shines in the clear sky, and clouds come and cover it, thickening the air, the sun, though hidden behind the clouds, suffers no loss either in its light or in its very essence. So it is with those who have not yet attained perfect purity. While abiding in God's grace, yet still possessed by sin in the depths of their souls, they possess within themselves natural impulses and thoughts that strengthen them in their striving toward God, even though they are not entirely established in goodness (17:6).

63. Conversely, even those who, in the depths of their souls, cling to the good—that is, are dominated by grace—remain slaves and captives of wicked thoughts and find themselves on the side of vice. Therefore, great discernment is required for a person to know by experience how things stand within us. I tell you, however, that even the Apostles, though they had the Comforter within them, were not entirely carefree. Along with joy and gladness, they also experienced fear and trembling—not because of vice, but because of the very workings of grace itself; grace itself warned them lest they stray, even in the smallest matter. Just as someone who throws a stone fragment at a wall does not damage it in the least, nor does he move the wall from its place, or, just as one who shoots an arrow at a man wearing armor does no harm to either the iron or the body—because the armor deflects the arrow—so too, even if a portion of evil drew near the Apostles, it did them no harm, for they were clothed in the perfect power of Christ, and they themselves, being perfect, had the freedom to perform righteous deeds. Since some claim that, with grace, the soul has nothing left to worry about, God requires even the perfect to exercise their free will in service to the Spirit, so that they may act in accordance with grace. For the Apostle says, "Do not quench the Spirit" (1 Thess. 5:19). (17, 7–8).

64. In the visible world, the earth of its own accord most often produces thorns; the farmer plows the ground, cultivates it diligently, and sows seeds, yet thorns and weeds still grow and multiply, because Adam, after his transgression, was told: "The ground will yield thorns and thistles for you" (Gen. 3: 18). The farmer labors again, pulling up the thorns, yet they multiply even more. Understand this spiritually: because of sin, the earth brings forth thorns and thistles from the heart; man cultivates the earth and labors, yet the thorns of the evil spirits still spring up. Then the Holy Spirit Himself comes to the aid of human weakness, and the Lord sows heavenly seed into this soil of the heart and cultivates it. And when the Lord's seed falls, thorns and thistles still spring up. The Lord Himself and man once again cultivate the soil of the soul, and the seven evil spirits and thorns still appear and multiply there, until summer comes, grace abounds, and the thorns wither in the heat of the sun (26:21).

65. Although vice dwells in nature itself, it prevails only where it finds fertile ground. The tender stalks of wheat can be choked by weeds. But when summer comes and the plants wither, the weeds do no harm whatsoever to the wheat. Suppose there are thirty measures of pure wheat, but there is an admixture of chaff in it—for example, a few handfuls—the chaff will be imperceptible amid the abundance of wheat. So it is with grace: when God’s gift and grace increase within a person, and he grows rich in the Lord, then vice—though it remains in him to some extent—cannot harm him and has no power over him, nor any share within him. For this is the purpose of the Lord’s coming and providence: to free us—who are enslaved, guilty, and subject to vice—and to make us victors over death and sin (26:22).

66. Could the apostles have sinned if they had wanted to, or was grace stronger even than their own will? They could not have sinned, because, dwelling in the light and possessing such grace, they did not become proud. However, we do not say that grace was weak in them; rather, we affirm that grace allows even perfect spiritual men to have their own free will and the ability to do as they please, and to incline toward whatever they wish. And human nature itself, being weak, has the capacity to turn away from the good that dwells within it. Just as those clothed in full armor—with armor and other weapons—are already secure within, and enemies do not attack them, or even if they do, it is up to them to use their weapons, resist the enemies, engage them in battle, and win the victory, or, while possessing weapons, not to wage war against their enemies but to rejoice with them and live in peace—so too Christians, being clothed in perfect power and possessing heavenly weapons, if they so desire, can revel together with Satan and live in peace with him rather than wage war, because human nature is easily changeable, and man, by virtue of the free will he retains, may, if he so chooses, become a son of God, or likewise a son of perdition (27:11).

67. Do the perfect face sorrow or strife? Or are they entirely carefree? There is no person whom the enemy has ceased to attack. Satan is merciless and misanthropic; therefore, he does not hesitate to attack every person, though apparently he does not attack everyone with equal intensity. Some endure severe trials and torment from sin, yet they are strengthened and grow wiser through these trials, disregarding the opposing force, and face no danger in this regard, for they are unshakable and confident in their salvation, having often practiced and gained experience in the battle against evil, and God Himself is with them. They are guided by God and find rest. Others, however, not yet having practiced this, if they fall into sorrow alone and a battle arises against them, are immediately plunged into trouble and destruction (15, 16, 17).

68. Some, having fortified themselves and under the powerful influence of God’s grace within them, found their members so sanctified that they concluded that in Christianity there was no longer any place for lust, but that a chaste and pure mind was acquired, and that the inner person was already soaring in the divine and heavenly. Therefore, such a person thinks that he has undoubtedly attained perfection, and just when he considers himself to have entered a safe harbor—waves rise up against him, and once again he finds himself in the midst of the sea, swept away to a place where there is only water and sky, and certain death. Thus, the sin that has entered us produces every kind of evil lust. But when such a person is once again granted a certain grace—as if, so to speak, having received a tiny drop from the very depths of the sea—he finds in this very thing a miracle taking place every hour and every day; and, having been subjected to such an extraordinary, new, and divine action, he marvels and is astonished at how he had been deceived. Finally, grace, being divine and heavenly, enlightens, guides, and pacifies him, arranging all things for the good (38:4).

69. Practice righteousness within your inner being, where Christ’s altar stands together with the undefiled sanctuary, so that the testimony of your conscience may boast in the cross of Christ, which purifies your conscience from dead works, and you may serve God with your spirit, knowing Whom you worship, as it is written: “We worship the One we know” (John 4:22). Entrust yourself to God, who guides you; may your soul enter into communion with God, as a bride with her bridegroom. For it is said: “This mystery is a great one, but I speak in reference to Christ” (Eph. 5:32) and “into a blameless soul” (38:5).

70. Imagine a garden with fruit-bearing trees and other fragrant plants; the entire garden is beautifully arranged and adorned, and for protection—instead of a fence—it is surrounded by a low wall, and a swift river happens to flow through it. If the water strikes the wall, even slightly, it will damage its foundation, find a way through, gradually erode the foundation completely, and, once it enters the garden, break and uproot all the plants, destroy all the labor, and render the garden barren. So it is with the human heart. There are beautiful thoughts within it, but the torrents of sin are constantly drawing near to the heart, ready to overthrow it and draw it to their side. And if the mind, though somewhat frivolous, gives in to impure thoughts, then the spirits of flattery have already found a pasture there; they have burst in and overthrown all beauty, reduced good thoughts to nothing, and brought the soul into desolation (43:6).

i) In addition to this battle, another—an external one—arises. As God’s grace begins to manifest itself in the heart of the laborer, hostile attacks against him from other people begin. The enemy, driven out from within, arms himself from without. This has become an inevitable condition for a Christian’s spiritual perfection.

71. God’s people must prepare themselves for struggle and heroic deeds. Just as a courageous young man endures the struggle and responds to the blows struck against him with blows of his own, so too must Christians endure afflictions and both external and internal struggles, so that by bearing the blows, they may triumph through patience. Such is the path of Christianity. Where the Holy Spirit is, persecution and strife follow like a shadow. Do you see how the Prophets, though the Spirit worked within them, were always persecuted by their own people? Do you see how the Lord, who is the Way and the Truth, was persecuted not by a foreign people, but by His own? His own people—the Israelites—both persecuted and crucified Him. And something similar happened to the Apostles, because from the time of the Cross the Spirit, the Comforter, came and dwelt in the Christians; none of the Jews were persecuted anymore, but only the Christians were martyred. Therefore, they should not be surprised by this, for the truth must be persecuted (15:11).

72. Nor is it simple what is written about Job, whom Satan asked to be given to him, for Satan could do nothing on his own without permission. What, then, does the devil say to the Lord? “Deliver him into my hands, ‘unless he blesses You to Your face’” (Job 1:11)? So it is even now: Job is the same, God is the same, and the devil is the same. At the very moment when Job saw God’s help, was zealous and fervent in grace, Satan asked for him and said to the Lord: “Since You help him and protect him, he serves You. Abandon him and hand him over to me, ‘lest he bless You to Your face’?” Finally, as if precisely because the soul is comforted, grace withdraws from it, and the soul is given over to temptations. Therefore, the devil comes, inflicting upon it a thousand calamities, along with hopelessness, despair, and wicked thoughts, and crushes the soul in order to weaken it and turn it away from hope in God. But the prudent soul, even in misfortune and sorrow, does not lose hope; rather, it holds fast to what it possessed, and no matter what may be inflicted upon it—amidst a thousand temptations, enduring it all—it says: “Even if I die, I will not forsake Him” (26:7–8).

73. Yet all the righteous, walking the narrow and difficult path, pleased God to the very end. Abraham was rich in God, yet in relation to the world he called himself dust and ashes (Gen. 18:27), and David says of himself: “The scorn of men and the contempt of people, a worm and not a man” (Ps. 21:7). Likewise, all the Apostles and Prophets suffered afflictions and were rebuked. The Lord Himself, Who is the Way and God, having come not for Himself but for your sake, to become for you the image of all that is good—behold in what humiliation He came: God, the Son of God, King and Son of Kings, took on the form of a servant, He offers healing remedies and heals the afflicted, yet outwardly He appears, as it were, to be one of the afflicted (26:25).

74. But do not disregard God’s majesty when you see Him outwardly humbled and, as it were, like one of us: He appeared this way for our sake, not for His own. Consider: was He not most humbled of all at that hour when they cried out, “Crucify Him, crucify Him!”—and the crowd surged forward! Just as in the world, when a prince pronounces a sentence on some villain, the whole people despise him and humiliate him, so too the Lord, at the time of the crucifixion, as a man condemned to death, was deemed worthless by the Pharisees. And when they spat in His face, placed a crown of thorns upon Him, and struck Him on the cheeks, did this not exceed the measure of all humiliation? For it is written: “I offered My back to those who struck Me, and My face to those who pulled out My beard; I did not hide My face from insults and My cheeks from being struck” (Isa. 50:6). If God endured so much mockery, suffering, and humiliation, then no matter how much you humble yourself—being by nature frail and mortal—you will never do anything comparable to your Lord. God humbled Himself for your sake, yet you do not humble yourself even for your own sake, but instead exalt yourself and boast. He came to take upon Himself sorrows and hardships, and to give you His peace, yet you are unwilling to endure toil and suffering so that your wounds might be healed through them. Glory to His suffering and long-suffering forever (26:26).

75. If God walked this path on earth, then you too must follow His example. This is how the Apostles and the Prophets walked. And we, if we wish to be built upon the foundation of the Lord and the Apostles, must follow their example. For the Apostle says by the Holy Spirit: “Be imitators of me, just as I am of Christ” (1 Cor. 4:16). But if you love human glory, desire to be worshiped, and seek ease for yourself, then you have strayed from the path. You must be crucified with the Crucified One, suffer with the Suffering One, so that afterward you may be glorified with the Glorified One (Rom. 8:17). For the bride must suffer with the Bridegroom and, through this, become a partner and co-heir with Christ. And no one is permitted to enter the city of the saints—without suffering, not by a smooth, broad, or wide path—to rest and reign with the King for all eternity (12:5).

76. Is Satan permitted to attack us only to a certain extent, or as much as he wishes? His aim is not only at Christians, but also at idolaters and the whole world. Therefore, if he were allowed to attack as much as he wished, he would destroy everyone. Why is that? Because this is his work and such is his will. But just as a potter, when placing vessels in the fire, stokes the kiln in moderation—not too much, lest the vessels, fired longer than necessary, crack, and not too little, lest they remain unburned and they are not wasted, and likewise the one who crafts silver and gold objects applies the fire in moderation; for if he intensifies the fire, the gold and silver melt, become liquid, and are lost, and just as the human mind is able to match loads to the type of pack animal—whether a camel or some other animal—and determine exactly what weight it can bear, so much more does God, Who knows the strength of human vessels, allow opposing forces to act in varying degrees (26:3).

i) By enduring all this patiently and yielding nothing to the enemy, the soul becomes increasingly purified and opens itself to the most powerful influences of the Holy Spirit's grace, which is ultimately manifested in flashes of insight, in special states of moral joy, in visions, and in divine guidance. It becomes evident that the soul is approaching perfection.

77. If anyone loves God, then God also bestows His love upon him; to whoever has once believed in God, He grants heavenly faith, and the person becomes truly spiritual. Therefore, just as you offer Him a gift from your own members, so too will He, in the same way, bestow upon your soul from His own members, so that you may do all things, love, and pray with purity (15:20).

78. Mary left everything, sat at the Lord's feet, and blessed God all day long. Do you see how sitting at His feet surpasses love? But so that God's word may shine more clearly, listen further. If anyone loves Jesus and listens to Him as they should—and not merely listens, but abides in love—then God already desires to reward that soul in some way for this love, even though the person does not know what they will receive or to what extent God will bestow upon the soul. For even to Mary, who loved Him and sat at His feet, He did not merely give a reward, but from His very essence He bestowed a certain hidden power. The very words that God spoke to Mary were spirit and a certain power. These words entered her heart, became a soul within her soul, a spirit within her spirit, and divine power filled her heart; for wherever that power takes root, it necessarily remains there as an inalienable possession. That is why the Lord, knowing what He had bestowed upon her, said, "Mary has chosen the better part" (Luke 10:42). But in time, even what Martha did out of a desire to serve led her to the same gift, for she, too, received the divine power into her soul (12:16).

79. And what is so surprising about those who came to the Lord and were physically united with Him receiving power? Sometimes the Apostles spoke a word, and the Holy Spirit came upon the believers (Acts 10:44). Cornelius received power from the word he heard. All the more so when the Lord spoke to Mary, or to Zacchaeus, or to the sinful woman who, with her hair loose, wiped the Lord's feet, or to the Samaritan woman, or to the thief—then power was manifested, and the Holy Spirit entered into union with their souls. And now, those who love the Lord, having left everything behind and abiding constantly in prayer, are secretly learning what they did not know before. Truth Itself, according to their will, reveals Itself to them and teaches them: "I am the Truth" (John 14: 6). The Apostles themselves, having remained with the Lord until the cross, witnessed great miracles—such as lepers being cleansed and the dead being raised—but they did not know how the Divine power dwells and acts within the heart; they did not know that they themselves would be spiritually reborn, enter into union with the heavenly soul, and become a new creation. They loved the Lord for the miracles He performed. Finally, the Lord said to them: "Why are you amazed at the miracles? I give you a great inheritance, the like of which the whole world does not possess" (12:17).

80. The Lord's words were still strange to them until He rose from the dead and, for our sake, ascended bodily into heaven. And then the Spirit of the Comforter descended upon them and entered into union with their souls. Truth Itself reveals Itself in the souls of the faithful, and the heavenly man comes to your man, and there is a single communion between them. Therefore, for those who remain in service and do everything diligently out of zeal for the faith and love for God, this eventually leads to the knowledge of the Truth itself, because the Lord reveals Himself to their souls and teaches them to dwell in the Holy Spirit (12:18).

81. It is said: “Taste and see that the Lord is good” (Ps. 33: 9), and this tasting is undoubtedly the active power of the Spirit, performing its ministry in the heart. For those who are sons of light and ministers of the New Covenant in the Holy Spirit learn nothing from people, but are taught by God. Grace itself inscribes the laws of the Spirit upon their hearts. Therefore, they must find confirmation not only in the Scriptures, written in ink, but also on the tablets of the heart, where God’s grace inscribes the laws of the Spirit and the heavenly mysteries, for the heart reigns sovereignly and royally over the entire bodily constitution. And when grace takes possession of the innermost recesses of the heart, then it reigns over all the members and thoughts, for there lie the mind, all thoughts, and the soul’s hope. This is why grace permeates all the members of the body (15:18).

82. Such a one, as it is written (1 Cor. 2:14), discerns every person. He knows about each one—from what source they draw their words, where they have stopped, and at what stage they are—yet no one among those who have the spirit of the world within them can know or judge him. Only those who have within themselves this heavenly Spirit of God know those like themselves, as the Apostle says: “The spiritual judge the spiritual” (9:8).

83. Those who have been deemed worthy to become children of God and to be born from above by the Holy Spirit, having within themselves Christ who enlightens and comforts them, are guided by the Spirit in many and varied ways, and grace works invisibly in their hearts during spiritual repose. But let us draw on images from the visible pleasures of this world to illustrate, in part, how grace works in the souls of such people. At times they are joyful, as if at a royal banquet, and rejoice with indescribable joy and gladness. At other times, they are like a bride, comforted by divine peace in communion with her bridegroom. And at times, like incorporeal angels, even while still in the body, they feel within themselves the same lightness and soaring spirit. At other times, they are as if in the ecstasy of a feast, cheered and enraptured by the Spirit, in the ecstasy of divine spiritual mysteries (18:7).

84. But at other times they seem to weep and lament over the human race, and, praying for Adam as a whole, they shed tears and weep, inflamed by spiritual love for humanity. At times, the Spirit kindles them with such joy and love that, if it were possible, they would embrace every person in their hearts, making no distinction between the wicked and the righteous. At times, in the humility of the Spirit, they humble themselves so much before every person that they consider themselves the very last and least of all. At times, the Spirit constantly keeps them in indescribable joy. At times they are like a mighty warrior who, having donned the king’s full armor, goes out to battle against enemies and fights valiantly to defeat them. For in the same way, the spiritual person puts on the heavenly armor of the Spirit, advances against enemies, and wages war against them to subdue them under his feet (18:8).

85. At times, the soul finds rest in a kind of great stillness, silence, and peace, dwelling in pure spiritual delight, in inexpressible repose and bliss. At times, by grace, it is enabled to comprehend something, to attain inexpressible wisdom, and to know the unfathomable Spirit—things that cannot be expressed by tongue or lips. At times, a person becomes like any ordinary person. Thus, grace acts in diverse ways among people and guides the soul in many ways, bringing it to rest according to God’s will, and trains it in various ways so that it may be presented to the heavenly Father as perfect, blameless, and pure (18:9).

86. These very works of the Spirit that we have listed reach a greater degree in those who are close to perfection. For the various forms of the soul’s repose through grace are expressed in different ways through the word and are continually accomplished in people, so that one work follows another. When the soul ascends to the perfection of the Spirit, having been completely purified of all passions, and, in ineffable communion, having come into unity and union with the Spirit, the Comforter—and, being united with the Spirit, having herself become spirit—then she becomes entirely light, all eye, all spirit, all joy, all peace, all gladness, all love, all mercy, all goodness and kindness. Just as a stone in the depths of the sea is surrounded on all sides by water, so too are these people, being united in every way with the Holy Spirit, made like Christ, possessing within themselves the virtues of spiritual strength, and remaining inwardly blameless, spotless, and pure. For how can those renewed by the Spirit produce the fruit of vice outwardly? On the contrary, the fruits of the Spirit always and in everything shine forth in them (18:10).

87. Another enters to bow the knee—and his heart is filled with divine power; his soul rejoices with the Lord, like a bride with her bridegroom, according to the words of the Prophet Isaiah, who says: “As the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall the Lord rejoice over you” (Isa. 62:5). And sometimes, after being occupied with something all day, he devotes a single hour to prayer—and his inner self, with great delight, is carried away into a state of prayer, into the infinite depth of that age, so that his mind, soaring and enraptured, is wholly absorbed there. During this time, earthly concerns fade from his thoughts, for his thoughts are saturated and captivated by the Divine, the heavenly, the boundless, the incomprehensible, and something wondrous that human lips cannot utter. At this hour, a person prays and says, “Oh, if only my soul would depart along with my prayer” (8:1).

88. Does a person always enter this state? It is true that grace abides ceaselessly, takes root, and acts like leaven within a person from a young age, and this abiding grace becomes, as it were, something natural and inseparable, as if one essence with the person; yet, as it pleases, it varies its actions within the person for his benefit. Sometimes this fire flares up and burns more intensely, and sometimes it seems weaker and quieter; at other times this light shines more brightly, while at times it dims and fades; and this lamp, always burning and shining, sometimes becomes clearer, blazing more brightly from the rapture of God’s love, while at other times it emits its radiance sparingly, and the light inherent in a person becomes weaker (8:2).

89. Furthermore, to some, the sign of the cross appeared in the light and was imprinted upon the inner person. Sometimes, too, during prayer, a person would fall into a kind of ecstasy; it seemed as though he were standing in a church before the altar, and three loaves of bread—as if leavened with oil—were offered to him; and to the extent that he tasted them, the loaves grew and rose. At times, a certain luminous garment would also appear—one unlike any found on earth in this age and one that human hands could not make. For just as the Lord, having ascended the mountain with John and Peter, transformed His garments and made them gleam like lightning, so it was with this garment, and the person clothed in it was filled with wonder and amazement. At other times, however, this light, appearing in the heart, unveiled the innermost, deepest, and most hidden light; therefore, a person, wholly absorbed by such sweetness and such contemplation, no longer had control over himself, but was, as it were, a wild man and a barbarian to this world, because of the abundance of love and sweetness and because of the hidden mysteries, so that a person, having received freedom at that time, attains the perfect measure, becoming pure and free from sin. But after that, grace diminished and a veil of opposing power descended, while grace remained visible, as it were, only in part, and at some lower degree of perfection (8, 3).

90. A person must, so to speak, pass through twelve steps and then attain perfection. At other times, he does indeed reach this measure and attain perfection. Then grace begins to act more weakly again, and a person descends one step and stands on the eleventh. But another, rich in grace, always stands day and night at the highest measure, being free and pure, always rapt and exalted. And now, a person to whom these wonders have been revealed and who has experienced them firsthand—if this were always the case with him—would no longer be able to take upon himself the stewardship of the Word, or any other burden; he would refuse to listen or to care, as is customary, for himself and for the coming day, but would simply sit in a corner, in awe and ecstasy. That is why the perfect measure is not given to him so that he might be able to care for the brethren and serve the Word, unless the middle wall of separation has already been torn down and death has been conquered (8:4).

91. In reality, however, it is like this: like thickened air, a kind of gloomy force lies upon a person and slightly veils him. The lamp burns and shines unceasingly; yet a veil, as it were, lies over the light, and therefore a person acknowledges that he is still imperfect and not entirely free from sin; thus, it can be said that the dividing wall has already been torn down and shattered, yet in some other respect it has not been torn down entirely or forever. For there are times when grace more strongly inflames, comforts, and soothes a person, and there are times when it diminishes and fades, as grace itself arranges this for the person’s benefit. Who, then, has ever, even for a time, attained perfect measure, tasted, and experienced that state? To this day, I know of not a single Christian who is perfect or free. On the contrary, even if someone finds rest in grace, attains the mysteries and revelations, and experiences the great sweetness of grace, sin still dwells within him. Such people, because of the abundance of grace and light within them, consider themselves free and perfect, but they are mistaken in this, being led astray by their inexperience by the very grace that is at work in them. But I have not yet seen a single free person, and since at other times I myself have partly reached that level, I have come to understand and know why there is no perfect person (8:5).

92. Tell us, at what stage are you?—Now, after the sign of the cross, grace works in such a way and pacifies all the members and the heart that the soul, out of great joy, becomes like a harmless infant, and a person no longer condemns either a Greek, or a Jew, or a sinner, or a layperson, but the inner man looks upon all with a pure eye and rejoices over the whole world, and desires in every way to honor and love both Greeks and Jews. At another time, he, the son of kings, trusts so firmly in the Son of God as in a father. Doors open before him, and he enters many dwellings; and as he enters, doors open before him again in equal number—for example, from one hundred dwellings into another hundred—and he is enriched; and to the extent that he is enriched, new wonders are revealed to him. To him, as a son and heir, is entrusted that which cannot be expressed by human nature, nor uttered by lips or tongue (8:6).

7. The Highest Degree of Christian Perfection

1. The prophet Ezekiel recounted that divine and glorious apparition and vision which he beheld, and described it as an apparition filled with inexpressible mysteries. For he saw in the field a cherubic chariot, drawn by four spiritual creatures. Each living creature had four faces: one was the face of a lion, another the face of an eagle, another the face of a calf, and another the face of a human. And each face had wings, so that it was impossible to distinguish which side was front or back. “Their sides were full” of “eyes,” and their chests were also full of eyes; there was no place that was not filled with eyes. Beside each face were three wheels, as if a wheel within a wheel, and there was a spirit within the wheels. And the Prophet saw what appeared to be the likeness of a man, and his feet were like sapphires. This chariot (that is, the cherubim and the living creatures) carried the Lord seated upon it. Wherever He wished to go, the living creatures turned their faces in that direction. And the Prophet saw, beneath the wings of the cherubim, what appeared to be a “human hand” that supported and carried them (Ezek. 1:5–28 and ch. 10). (1:1).

2. What the Prophet saw in his vision was true and beyond doubt, but it pointed to something else; it foreshadowed something mysterious and divine—a mystery truly hidden from the ages but revealed in the last days, at the coming of Christ. The prophet contemplated the mystery of the soul destined to receive its Lord and become the throne of His glory. For the soul, which the Spirit—having prepared it as His seat and dwelling place—has made worthy to partake of His light and has illuminated with the beauty of His ineffable glory, becomes entirely light, entirely a face, entirely an eye; there is not a single part of it that is not filled with the light of spiritual eyes—that is, there is nothing in it that is darkened, but it is entirely made of light and spirit, wholly filled with eyes, and has no back or reverse side; rather, it appears as a face from every angle, because the ineffable beauty of the glory of the Light of Christ has descended upon it and dwells within it. And just as the sun is everywhere alike, having no final or deficient part, but, consisting of identical parts, shines entirely with light, and is all light—or like fire, that is, the very light of fire, entirely like itself and having within itself neither a first nor a last, nor a greater nor a lesser part—so too the soul, completely illuminated by the ineffable beauty of the glory of the light from the face of Christ, and having fully entered into communion with the Holy Spirit and been deemed worthy to become the dwelling place and throne of God, becomes entirely an eye, entirely light, all a face, all glory, all spirit, just as Christ has prepared, arranged, and adorned her with spiritual beauty—He who bears her, guides her, sustains her, and lifts her up. For it is said that “the hand of a man” was beneath the cherubim (Ezek. 1:8). Christ Himself both bears the soul and guides it (1:2).

3. The four living creatures bearing the chariot represented the sovereign mental powers of the soul. Just as the eagle reigns over the birds, the lion over the wild beasts, the ox over the gentle animals, and man over all creatures, so too in the soul there are more regal mental powers—namely, the will, the conscience, the intellect, and the power of love. The chariot of the soul is governed by them, and God dwells within them. According to another interpretation, of course, this refers to the heavenly Church of the Saints. And just as the Prophet speaks there of the animals, saying that their height was immeasurable, that they were full of eyes, and that no one could count the number of their eyes or measure their height—because knowledge of this has not been given—just as every person is given to see the stars in the sky and marvel at them, yet no one can know their number, in the same way, it is granted to all who desire to strive to enter the heavenly Church of the Saints and find joy in it, but to know and comprehend the number of the Saints—this belongs to the One God. He who sits upon the chariot and upon the throne of the aforementioned living creatures—or within every soul that has become His throne and seat, that has become His eye and light—marches and moves about, seated upon it, governing with the reins of the Spirit and directing it as He Himself knows. Just as the spiritual beasts did not march where they themselves wished to go, but where the One seated upon them and guiding them knew and willed, so here too He Himself rules and leads, pointing the way through His Spirit. Thus, souls do not ascend to heaven of their own will, whenever they please, but God directs the soul—having cast off the body—to strive in thought toward heaven; and again, whenever it pleases Him, it walks in the flesh and in its thoughts, and by His very will passes to the ends of the earth, and He reveals to it the mysteries. O truly excellent, good, one, and true Ruler! Thus, if the soul is now glorified and has entered into union with the Spirit, then the bodies will also share in the resurrection (1:3).

4. And concerning the fact that the souls of the righteous become heavenly light, the Lord Himself said to the Apostles: "You are the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). Having made them light Himself, He commanded that the world be enlightened through them, and He says: "No one lights a lamp and puts it under a basket, but on a stand, so that it gives light to all who are in the house (). In the same way, let your light shine before others" (Matt. 5:15–16). This means: do not hide the gift you have received from Me, but share it with all who desire it. And again: "The eye is the lamp of the body. If your eye is clear, your whole body will be full of light; but if your eye is bad, your whole body will be full of darkness. If then the light within you is darkness, how great is that darkness!" (Matt. 6:22–23). Just as the eyes are the light of the body—and when they are healthy, the whole body is illuminated, but when something enters the eyes and they are clouded, then the whole body is in darkness—so the Apostles are appointed as the eyes and the light for the whole world. Therefore, the Lord, commanding them, said: "If you, being the light of the world, stand firm and do not fall away, then the whole body of the world will be enlightened. But if you, the light of the world, are darkened, then what is darkness—that is, the world?" Thus, the Apostles, having become light, served as light for those who believed, enlightening their hearts with that heavenly light of the Spirit by which they themselves had been enlightened (1:4).

5. Those who cast off the old, earthly man—and from whom Jesus stripped away the garments of the kingdom of darkness—put on the new, heavenly man, Jesus Christ. And the Lord clothed them in the garments of the kingdom of ineffable light—the garments of faith, hope, love, joy, peace, mercy, and kindness—and likewise in all the other divine, life-giving garments of light, life, and inexpressible rest, so that, just as God is love, joy, peace, goodness, and mercy, so too the new man might become such by grace (2:4–5).

6. Perfect Christians, who have been deemed worthy to enter into the measure of perfection and to become those who draw near to the King, always consecrate themselves as a gift to the cross of Christ. Just as in the time of the Prophets the anointing was most honorable—for kings and prophets were anointed—so now spiritual people, anointed with the heavenly anointing, become Christians by grace, so that they may be kings and prophets of the heavenly mysteries. They are both sons and lords and gods—bound, taken captive, cast down, crucified, and offered as a gift. If the anointing with oil—such as that derived from an earthly plant, from a visible tree—had such power that the anointed unquestionably received their office (for it was acknowledged by all that they were set up as kings, and the anointed David immediately faced persecution and tribulation, but after seven years became king), how much more so do those whose minds and inner beings are anointed with the heavenly and spiritual oil of joy—which enlightens and brings gladness—receive the seal of that imperishable kingdom and eternal power, the pledge of the Spirit, —the Holy Spirit Himself and the Comforter (understand, then, that the Comforter both comforts and fills with joy those who are in sorrow). (17:1).

7. Those anointed with the oil of the heavenly planting, the tree of life—Jesus Christ—are deemed worthy to enter into the measure of perfection, that is, the kingdom and sonship; for while still in this world, they already share in the mysteries of the heavenly King, have boldness before the Almighty, and enter His palace, where the angels and the spirits of the saints dwell. For even though they have not yet received the full inheritance prepared for them in the age to come, by the pledge they have now received, they have secured themselves as though already crowned and reigning; and, through the abundance and boldness of the Spirit, they do not find it surprising that they will reign with Christ. Why is that? Because, while still in the flesh, they already possessed within themselves that sense of sweetness and that working of power (17:2).

8. Just as at the end of the world, when this firmament ceases to exist, the righteous will already be living in the kingdom, in light and glory, seeing nothing else but Christ abiding forever in glory at the right hand of the Father, so too do these, who are now already raptured and taken captive into that age, contemplate all the beauties and wonders there. For while we are still on earth, we have a dwelling in heaven, as inhabitants and citizens of that world in our minds and in our inner selves. Just as the visible eye, when pure, always sees the sun clearly, so too the mind, having been completely purified, always beholds the glory of Christ's light and abides with the Lord day and night, just as the Lord's body, having been united with the Godhead, always abides with the Holy Spirit. But people do not attain this state all at once, and even then only through toil, sorrow, and great effort (17:4).

9. Just as the Lord, having laid aside all dominion and authority, clothed Himself in the body, so too do Christians clothe themselves with the Holy Spirit and abide in peace. Even if conflict arises from without, and Satan inflicts wounds, they are inwardly protected by the Lord's power and remain unperturbed by Satan's attacks. When Satan tempted the Lord in the wilderness for forty days, did he harm Him in any way by attacking His body from the outside? God was in that body. So too, Christians, even if tempted from the outside, are inwardly filled with the power of the Godhead and suffer no harm. But if anyone has reached this level, he has attained perfect love for Christ and the fulfillment of the Divine. And whoever is not like this still wages a battle within. At one moment he finds rest in prayer, and at another he is in sorrow and in battle. For it is the Lord's will—since man is still an infant—that the Lord guide him through these battles. And within, as it were, two aspects appear: light and darkness, peace and sorrow; at one moment they pray in peace, and at another they are in turmoil (26:15).

10. Don't you hear what Paul is saying? "If I have all gifts, and if I give my body to be burned, and if I speak with the tongues of angels, but have not love, I am nothing" (1 Cor. 13:1–3). For these gifts lead only to perfection, and those who have attained them, though they are in the light, are still infants. Many of the brethren ascended to this level and possessed the gifts of healing, revelation, and prophecy; but since they had not yet attained to perfect love, in which lies "the bond of perfection" (Col. 3:14), strife arose within them, and they, having become disheartened, fell. But whoever attains perfect love becomes a prisoner and captive of grace. And whoever gradually approaches the perfect measure of love but has not yet reached the point of becoming a prisoner of love is still under fear; strife and falling threaten him, and if he does not protect himself, Satan will cast him down (26:16).

11. Everyone must know that there are eyes that are within these eyes, and there is hearing that is within this hearing. And just as these eyes see with the senses and recognize the face of a friend or a beloved, so the eyes of a worthy and faithful soul, enlightened by the Divine light, spiritually see and recognize the true friend, the sweetest and most longed-for Bridegroom of the Lord, as soon as the soul is illuminated by the Spirit worthy of worship. And in this way, the soul, mentally contemplating the longed-for and unique, ineffable beauty, is pierced by divine love, is attuned to all spiritual virtues, and as a result acquires boundless and inexhaustible love for the Lord whom it longs for (28, 5).

12. Under the shadow of the law given through Moses, God commanded that on the Sabbath everyone should rest and do no work. And this was a foreshadowing and a shadow of the true Sabbath granted to the soul by the Lord. For the soul that has been deemed worthy to be freed from shameful and impure thoughts observes the true Sabbath and rests in true rest, remaining idle and free from all dark deeds. For in that prototypical Sabbath, although they rested physically, their souls were bound by deceit and vices; but this true Sabbath is the true repose of the soul, which remains idle and purified of satanic thoughts, resting in the Lord's eternal peace and joy (35:1).

13. For the Lord calls man to rest, saying, "Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). And those souls who submit and come to Him, He gives rest from these heavy, burdensome, and impure thoughts; they become free from all lawlessness, observe the true, pleasant, and holy Sabbath, celebrate a spiritual feast of inexpressible joy and gladness, and perform, from a pure heart, a service that is pure and pleasing to God. And this is the true and radiant Sabbath. Therefore, let us also implore God that we too may enter into this rest, be freed from shameful, deceitful, and vain thoughts, and thus be enabled to serve God with a pure heart and celebrate the feast of the Holy Spirit. And blessed is the one who enters this rest (35:1, 3).

14. When the soul clings to the Lord, and the Lord, in His mercy and love, comes and clings to her, and her mind abides ceaselessly in the Lord's grace, then the soul and the Lord become one spirit, one union, one mind. The body of the soul remains cast down upon the earth, while its mind dwells entirely in the heavenly Jerusalem, ascending to the third heaven, cleaving to the Lord, and serving Him there (46:3).

15. And He Himself, who sits in the heavenly city upon the throne of majesty on high, abides entirely with the soul in her body, for He has placed her image on high in the heavenly city of the Saints—Jerusalem—and has placed the very Image of the ineffable light of His Divinity within her body; He serves her in the city of the body, and she serves Him in the heavenly city. The soul has become His inheritance in heaven, and He has accepted her as His inheritance on earth. For the Lord becomes the soul's inheritance, and the soul becomes the Lord's inheritance. Even the thoughts and minds of darkened sinners can be very far from the body; they have the power to traverse great distances in the blink of an eye, to journey to distant lands, and it is not uncommon for the body to be cast down to the earth while the mind remains in another realm with a beloved—whether male or female—and sees itself, as it were, living there. And if the soul of a sinner is so subtle and swift-winged, and nothing hinders its mind from being in distant places, how much more so the soul from which the veil of darkness has been removed by the power of the Holy Spirit, when its discerning eyes are enlightened by heavenly light, and is completely freed from the passions of wickedness, having become pure by grace—it serves the Lord wholly in heaven with the spirit, and serves Him wholly with the body, and its thoughts expand so much that it is everywhere and, wherever and whenever it wishes, serves Christ (46, 4).

16. This is what the Apostle says: “That you may be able to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge, that you may be filled with all the fullness of God” (Ephesians 3:18–19). Contemplate the ineffable mysteries of the soul, from which the Lord removes the darkness that lies upon it, reveals it, and reveals Himself to it. See how He expands and extends the thoughts of its mind—in breadth, in length, in depth, and in height—throughout all visible and invisible creation (46:5).

8. The Life to Come

1. When the human soul departs from the body, a great mystery is then accomplished. For if it is guilty of sins, multitudes of demons and evil angels come, and the dark powers seize that soul and take it into their own realm. And no one should be surprised by this, for if the soul, in this life and in this age, was subject to them, obeyed them, and was their slave, then all the more will it be held by them and remain under their power when it departs from the world. As for the good part, you must imagine that the matter is as follows. Angels still dwell with the holy servants of God, and holy spirits surround and guard them. And when they depart from the body, the angels receive their souls into their own realm, into the pure age, and in this way bring them to the Lord (22).

2. True death is within—in the heart—and it is hidden; it is through this that the inner person dies. Therefore, if anyone has passed from death to the hidden life, he truly lives forever and does not die. Even if the bodies of such people are temporarily destroyed, they will be raised again in glory, because they have been sanctified. That is why we call the death of Christians “sleep” and “departure” (15, 37).

3. Just as a merchant, returning from afar after having multiplied his profits many times over, sends word to his household to purchase for him a home, gardens, and necessary clothing, and when he arrives in his homeland, he brings great wealth with him, and his household and relatives welcome him with great joy—so it is in spiritual matters. When others acquire heavenly riches for themselves, their fellow citizens—that is, the spirits of the holy angels—learn of this and marvel, saying, “Our brothers on earth have acquired great riches.” Such people, upon their departure, having the Lord with them, ascend to the heavens with great joy, and those who dwell with the Lord receive them, having prepared for them there dwellings, gardens, and garments that are radiant and of great value (16:8).

4. If a person, while still in the midst of the struggle—when both sin and grace are at work in his soul—departs from this world, where does this person, who is possessed by both, go? He goes to the place where his mind has its goal and its favorite abode. If sorrow or spiritual struggle overtakes you, you must simply resist and hate them. For it is not your business to bring about the struggle, but it is your business to hate it. And then the Lord, seeing your mind—because you strive and love the Lord with all your soul—will in a single hour remove death from your soul (this is not difficult for Him) and receive you into His bosom and into the light; in a single moment He will snatch you from the jaws of darkness and immediately bring you into His kingdom. It is easy for God to accomplish everything in a single moment, provided only that you have love for Him. God requires a person’s deeds, because the soul is deemed worthy to be in communion with the Divine (26:18).

5. A pregnant woman carries her child within her in darkness, so to speak, and in an unclean place. And when the baby finally emerges from the womb at the proper time, she sees a new creature under the sky, on the earth, and in the sunlight—one she has never seen before—and immediately friends and relatives, with joyful faces, take the baby into their arms. But if, due to some complication, the baby should die in the womb, then it becomes necessary for doctors specially trained for this to resort to sharp instruments, and then the baby passes from death to death, from darkness to darkness. The same applies to the spiritual realm. Those who have received the seed of the Divine within themselves possess it invisibly, and because of the sin dwelling within them, they hide it in dark and dreadful places. Therefore, if they protect themselves and preserve the seed, they will bring it forth openly at the proper time; and finally, with their bodies, the angels and all the heavenly hosts will receive them with joyful faces. But if one who has taken up the armor of Christ to fight valiantly grows lax, he will soon be delivered into the hands of his enemies and, upon parting from his body, will pass from the darkness that now holds him into another, even more dreadful darkness and into perdition (43, 5).

6. Just as tax collectors, sitting in narrow passageways, stop and torment those passing by, so too do demons watch over and detain souls; and if the souls have not been completely purified, then upon their departure from the body they do not receive permission to enter the heavenly abodes and appear before their Lord, but are carried away downward by aerial demons. But those who remain in the flesh, through toil and great effort, can still obtain grace from above from the Lord, and they, together with those who have attained rest through a virtuous life, will depart to the Lord, as He Himself promised: “Where I am, there also will My servant be” (John 12:26)—and for all eternity they will reign with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, now and always, and forever and ever! (43:9).

7. Everyone must strive and endeavor, by progressing in all virtues, to acquire this temple and believe that it is acquired here. For if our earthly temple is destroyed, we have no other temple in which our soul might dwell, “for,” as it is said, “even if we are clothed, we will not be found naked” (2 Cor. 5:3)—that is, we will not be deprived of communion and unity with the Holy Spirit, in whom alone a faithful soul can find rest. Therefore, those who are Christians in every reality and in full strength firmly hope and rejoice, as they depart from this flesh, that they possess that “temple not made with hands”; and this temple is the power of the Spirit dwelling within them. And if the earthly temple is destroyed, they do not fear it, because they have a heavenly, spiritual temple and that imperishable glory which, on the day of the resurrection, will restore and glorify the temple of the body as well; as the Apostle says: “He who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to our mortal bodies through His Spirit who dwells in us,” and again: “so that the life of Jesus may be revealed in our mortal flesh” (2 Cor. 4:11), and, “let our mortal body be consumed,” as it is said (2 Cor. 5:4). (15, 16).

8. Therefore, let us strive through faith and a virtuous life here on earth to acquire for ourselves such a garment, so that we, clothed in the body, may not be found naked, and so that on that day nothing will glorify our flesh. For to the extent that each person has been deemed worthy, through faith and diligence, to become a partaker of the Holy Spirit, to that same extent his body will be glorified on that day. What the soul has now gathered into its inner treasury will then be revealed and manifested outside the body, just as trees, when, after the passing of winter, they are warmed by the invisible power of the sun and the winds, produce and shed leaves, flowers, and fruits; and just as at that time wildflowers emerge from the earth’s depths, covering and clothing the earth and the grass, like the lilies of which the Lord said, “Not even Solomon in all his glory was clothed like one of these” (Matt. 6:29). For all this serves as an example, a model, and a likeness of the Christian on the day of the Resurrection (5:17).

9. Thus, for all God-loving souls—that is, for true Christians—there is the first month of Xanthikos, also called April, and this is the day of the Resurrection. On that day, by the power of the Sun of Righteousness, the glory of the Holy Spirit will be revealed from within, covering and clothing the bodies of the saints—the very glory they had hidden within their souls. For what the soul now possesses within itself will then be revealed in the body. This month is the first of the summer months (Ex. 12:2); it brings joy to all creation; it, opening up the earth, clothes the bare trees; it brings joy to all animals; it spreads joy among all; for Christians, it is the first month of Xantikos, that is, the time of the Resurrection, in which their bodies will be glorified by an ineffable light, still hidden within them today—that is, by the power of the Spirit, Who will then be their garment, their food, their drink, their joy, their gladness, their peace, their attire, and their eternal life. For the Spirit of the Godhead, whom they have already been deemed worthy to receive within themselves (5:18), will then become for them the very essence of heavenly radiance and beauty.

10. Therefore, each of us must strive and labor, diligently practicing all virtues, believing and asking the Lord that the inner person may even now become a partaker of such glory, and that the soul may partake of such holiness of the Spirit, and that, having been cleansed of the defilement of vice, we may have, at the resurrection, something with which to clothe our resurrected naked bodies, something with which to cover their shame, something with which to give them life and grant them eternal rest in the heavenly kingdom; for, according to the Holy Scriptures, Christ will come from heaven and raise all the tribes of Adam, all who have slept since the beginning of time, and divide them into two parts; and those who bear His own sign—that is, the seal of the Spirit—He will place at His right hand, proclaiming them as His own. For He says: “My sheep hear My voice” (John 10: 27), “and I know My own, and My own know Me” (John 10: 14). Then their bodies will be clothed with divine glory because of their good deeds, and they themselves will be filled with that spiritual glory which they already possessed in their souls. And thus, glorified by the divine light and caught up into heaven “to meet the Lord in the air,” as it is written, “we will always be with the Lord” (1 Thess. 4:17), reigning with Him for all eternity! Let us therefore strive in advance to bear the Lord’s mark and seal, for at the time of judgment, when God will make the separation and all the tribes of the earth—the whole of Adam—will be gathered together, when the Shepherd calls His flock, then all who bear the mark will recognize their Shepherd, and the Shepherd will recognize those who bear His own seal and will gather them from all nations; His own will hear His voice and follow Him. The world will be divided into two parts: one part will be the dark flock, departing into eternal fire, and the other—the flock filled with light, being raised to the heavenly inheritance. What we have now acquired in our souls will shine forth and be revealed then, and will clothe our bodies in glory (5, 21, 12, 13).

11. Will all members be raised on the Day of Resurrection? Nothing is difficult for God. Such is His promise. To human weakness and human reason, this seems, as it were, impossible. Just as God, taking dust and earth, fashioned, as it were, a different kind of nature—namely, bodily nature, unlike the earth—and created many kinds of beings, such as: hair, skin, bones, and sinews—and just as a needle, when thrown into fire, changes color and is transformed into fire, while the nature of iron is not destroyed but remains the same, so too in the resurrection all members will be raised, and, as it is written, “not a hair will perish” (Luke 21:18), and everything will become luminous; everything will be immersed and transformed into light and fire, but it will not be destroyed or become fire itself, so that its former nature would cease to exist, as some claim. For Peter remains Peter, and Paul remains Paul, and Philip remains Philip; each, filled with the Spirit, abides in his own nature and being. But if you claim that their nature has been destroyed, then there is no longer a Peter or a Paul, but God is in all things and everywhere; and those who go to Gehenna do not feel punishment, while those who go to the kingdom experience blessings (15:10).

12. Imagine a garden containing all kinds of fruit-bearing trees—there were pear trees, apple trees, and grapevines with fruit and leaves—but the garden, all the trees, and all the leaves were transformed and took on a different nature, and everything that was before became luminous. So too will people be transformed at the Resurrection, and their members will become holy and radiant (15:11).

13. Just as the Lord’s body, when He ascended the mountain, was glorified and transformed into divine glory and infinite light, so too will the bodies of the saints be glorified and become radiant. For just as Christ’s inner glory was so fully manifested and shone forth upon Christ’s body, so too, in the same way, the power of Christ dwelling within the Saints will be poured out outwardly upon their bodies on that day—because even now they partake of Christ’s essence and nature through their minds. For it is written: “Both the one who sanctifies and those who are sanctified are of one origin” (Heb. 2:11), and: “The glory that you have given me I have given to them” (John 17:22). Just as many lamps are kindled by a single flame, so too must the bodies of the saints—these members of Christ—become one and the same with Christ Himself (15:36).

14. And even the perfect, while they remain in the flesh, are not free from cares because of their freedom and live under the fear of judgment; that is why temptations are allowed to come upon them. But when the soul enters that city of the saints, only then will it be able to dwell without sorrows or temptations, for there is no worry, sorrow, toil, old age, Satan, or strife there, but there is rest, joy, peace, and salvation. There, in their midst, is the Lord, who is called the Savior because He saves the captives, and is called the Physician because He bestows heavenly and divine healing and cures the passions of the soul, which to some extent rule over man. In short, Jesus is King and God, while Satan is a tormentor and an evil prince (26:23).

15. Since some sell their possessions, set slaves free, and keep the commandments, yet do not strive to receive the Spirit in this world, will they not, by living in this way, enter the Kingdom of Heaven? This is a subtle matter for discussion. For some assert that there is only one kingdom and only one Gehenna, but we say that there are many degrees, distinctions, and measures within the same kingdom and within the same Gehenna. Just as there is one soul in all the limbs—which acts in the brain above and sets the legs in motion below—so too does the Divinity encompass all creatures, both those in heaven and those below the abyss, and dwells wholly within all creation, even though, by virtue of its immeasurability and immensity, it also exists outside of creation. Therefore, the Divinity itself listens to people and governs all things with wisdom. And since some pray without knowing what they are asking for, others fast, and still others devote themselves to service, God, the righteous Judge, rewards each according to the measure of their faith. For whatever they do, they do out of fear of God, yet not all of them are sons, kings, or heirs (40:3).

16. Some in the world are murderers, others are adulterers, still others are plunderers, and some also distribute their wealth to the poor. The Lord looks upon both groups, and to those who do good He grants rest and reward; there are measures that overflow and there are small measures; even in light itself and in glory itself there is a difference. In Gehenna itself and in punishment there are poisoners, robbers, and others who have sinned in small ways. But those who claim that there is only one kingdom, only one Gehenna, and no degrees of punishment—they speak wrongly. How many worldly people are there today who are devoted to spectacles and other debauchery? And how many more are there who pray and fear God? God looks upon both groups, and as a righteous Judge, He prepares rest for some and punishment for others (40:4).

The Venerable Abba Isaiah

A Brief Account of Our Reverend Father Isaiah, Abba of Nitria, and His Writings

Our venerable father Isaiah the hermit lived in the second half of the fourth century A.D. (d. 370)—a contemporary of Abba Macarius the Great. The scene of his ascetic labors was Lower Egypt—specifically the Skethos Desert (Skethos), commonly known to us as Skete, not far from Alexandria, where monks led a contemplative life in profound silence (sige). It is unknown at what age he chose the monastic life; we know only that he was the son of poor and humble parents, as is evident from his lament and from the insults hurled at him by his disciple Elisha, who, during his own time of temptation, called him a man of lowly birth. The Venerable Isaiah enjoyed the esteem of the monks of his time, many of whom followed his counsel and willingly showed him complete obedience. He was also known to the Patriarch of Alexandria at that time, who, when his disciple Elisha slandered the venerable one, said: “Let the flattering lips be silenced, those who speak of the righteous as wicked, with pride and contempt” (Ps. 30: 19). The Venerable Isaiah was exceedingly humble and possessed the grace of deep weeping, as is evident from his meek response to his disciple Elisha during a time of temptation, when Elisha was reviling and slandering him, and from his “14 Words”—a practice of weeping, the careful reading of which can soften and bring even a heart of stone to contrition. Following the custom of the Fathers who lived in silence in the Skete, the Venerable Isaiah had two disciples—Peter and Elisha. For the former, he wrote an edifying discourse (No. 26), and regarding the latter, there is a soul-saving account in the *Gerondika*¹⁰. In addition to these two disciples, many other monks were guided by his counsel and instruction, with whom he conversed not only in person but also in writing. Studying the Divine Scriptures day and night, and drawing abundant streams of spiritual wisdom from these salvific sources, he became the author of many exquisite writings that cover various soul-saving topics and comprise an entire book. The Venerable Isaiah is called a hermit because of his love for deep solitude and his ascetic withdrawal from everyone, so that in the last years of his life not even his closest disciples lived with him, but only visited him from time to time, as is evident from the 27th Discourse. The Venerable One’s writings are mentioned by: Bishop Ammon in his epistle to Theophilus, Patriarch of Alexandria; Nikiforos the Monk in his discourse on the preservation of the heart; Barsanuphius the Great; John of Damascus; Gregory of Sinai; and others. The Orthodox Church commemorates our Venerable Father Isaiah on the Saturday of Cheese Week. The collection of Abba Isaiah’s sayings that has come down to us contains 29 of them, but it is very likely that not all of Abba Isaiah’s sayings are included here. For in excerpts from his sayings there are certain instructions that are not found in this collection. In addition to these sayings, there are also rules from this Abba for novice monks, preserved by Abba Benedict of Anian (early 9th century) in his collection of monastic rules, *¹¹ *. Regarding these rules, the aforementioned collection notes that they are excerpted from Abba Isaiah’s sayings. However, not all of them can be found in the sayings themselves. Therefore, we must assume that many of them were either taken from the Abba’s extant writings or were taught by him separately from his writings to various individuals at different times—and were then passed down by word of mouth and compiled by someone, not in the order of his train of thought, but exactly as they were heard, and thus included in the general collection. They are of the same spirit and content as the rules of St. Anthony the Great. Some are identical to them word for word. It must be assumed that Abba Isaiah was the closest successor to the teaching gift of Abba Anthony the Great, along with Abba Macarius the Great. The book Dobrotolyubie includes Abba Isaiah's treatise on the guarding of the mind, in 27 chapters. The preface there states that it is an excerpt from the words of this Abba, and * * contains a brief instruction on how to ward off the promptings of the mind, keep one's conscience unblemished, hold the secret teaching in one's heart, and wisely preserve the threefold nature of the soul in all tranquility. In volume 40 of Patrol. graec., following these words, a similar article is printed under the title: "On Asceticism and Silence," in 19 chapters with the Greek text. These chapters are also excerpts from his words, as indicated in the publication itself by citations specifying the source of each chapter. Some of them are word-for-word identical to those found in the article by Dobrotolyubiy. However, both among these 19 chapters and among the 27 chapters of Dobrotolyubie there are teachings that are not found in the Words. This, among other things, served as the motivation for including both of these articles in the present edition of Abba Isaiah's writings. So as not to omit anything that came from this Abba, we include here his sayings—in addition to those cited in the Memorable Sayings—that are contained in our Alphabetical Paterikon, translated, however, only from the Slavonic, for there is no such Paterikon in Greek. This is the work of our zealous ascetics. Everyone will see for themselves that even among these sayings there are quite a few that are not found in the text. Thus, the following are presented here:

1. The Words of Abba Isaiah. It should be noted that in the first edition, these words were presented in a translation from Latin, the only language in which they have been published. But later, when the elders of Mount Athos discovered the Greek text of these words on Mount Athos and sent a copy of it to Moscow, a new translation was made from that text, and it is in this translation that they are now presented to those who enjoy reading such books. – In preparing this translation, we took into account the translation of these words by the German elder Paissios, a translation for which the elders of the Optina Hermitage were greatly indebted. References to it are provided in footnotes where necessary.

2. His Rules for Novice Monks.

3. His sayings.

4. An article from Dobrotolyubie on guarding the mind, in 27 chapters.

5. Chapters on asceticism and silence.

1. The Commandments of Abba Isaiah to the Brothers Living with Him

1. If you wish to remain with me, listen for the sake of Jesus.

2. Let each of you sit in your cell in the fear of the Lord, and do not neglect your manual labor, as commanded by God.

3. Do not neglect your spiritual instruction and unceasing prayer, and guard your heart against foreign thoughts, so that you may think of nothing—neither of any person nor of anything in this world—but always examine where you stumble and strive to correct yourselves, imploring God with a contrite heart, tears, and suffering (the weariness of the flesh), that He may forgive you and preserve you from falling into the same sin again.

4. Keep death before your eyes every day and carefully reflect on how you are to depart from the body, pass by the powers of darkness that meet us in the air, and appear unhindered before God, fixing your gaze on the dreadful day of His final judgment and the recompense given to each person for their deeds, words, and thoughts. For "everything is naked and exposed before the eyes" of Him to whom we must give an account (Heb. 4:13).

5. Unless it is absolutely necessary, say nothing either at meals or in church, and do not correct anyone who is singing unless they ask you about it themselves.

6. Serve in the kitchen for one week with the fear of God, without neglecting your spiritual instruction.

7. Let no one enter his brother's cell, and do not seek to see one another before the appointed time.

8. Do not keep track of each other's work—whether a brother has worked more than you, or you more than him.

9. When you go out for your daily work, do not engage in idle talk or allow yourselves to be careless, but let each one, in the fear of God, pay attention to himself and his spirit, as well as to his instruction and prayer, in secret (in the innermost part of his heart).

10. When the church service is over, or when you rise from the meal, do not sit down to talk with one another—not even about the words of God—but let each of you go to your cell and weep over your sins.

11. If, however, you need to speak with someone, speak as little as possible, with humility and reverence, for God is always listening to you.

12. Do not argue with one another about anything, and do not speak harshly to anyone; do not judge anyone or belittle anyone—neither with your lips nor in your heart—and do not grumble against anyone at all, so that no falsehood may come from your lips, and do not desire to say or hear anything that is not beneficial to you.

13. Do not harbor in your heart any malice, hatred, or envy toward your neighbor, and let there not be one thing on your lips and another in your heart, for “God is not mocked” (Gal. 6:7), but He sees everything—both what is hidden and what is open.

14. Do not keep any thought, sorrow, desire, or suspicion hidden within yourselves; confide them freely to your abbot, and whatever you hear from him, strive to do it in faith.

15. Take care not to grow weary of keeping my commandments, for—forgive me—in that case I will not allow you to remain with me. If you keep them, I will intercede for you before God; but if you do not keep them, He will hold you accountable—both for your negligence and for my fruitlessness. Whoever keeps my commandments, both in secret and openly, the Lord God will preserve from all evil and protect in every coming temptation—whether secret or open.

16. I beg you, my brothers, remember why you left the world, and take care of your salvation, so that your renunciation of it may not be in vain, and so that you may not be put to shame before God and before the saints who have renounced the world for His sake and have striven well.

17. Disdain for worldly things, self-mortification (feats of self-denial and deprivation to the point of physical exhaustion), humility, and the practice of wisely subduing one’s will in all things—while not trusting in one’s own righteousness but always keeping one’s sins before one’s eyes—will bring forth virtues in you. Know this (everyone): that rest (of the flesh), broadness (platysmos—the broad path, not restricting oneself in any way, one’s own will), and vanity destroy every fruit of the monk.

2. On the Natural Law

1. I do not want you to be unaware, brothers, that in the beginning, when God created man, He placed him in Paradise, and he then possessed sound senses, standing in their natural order; but when he listened to the one who deceived him, all his senses were transformed into unnaturalness¹², and he was then cast out of his glory. But our Lord showed His mercy toward the human race, out of His great goodness, “the Word became flesh” (John 1:14)—that is, He became a perfect human being in every respect, except for sin, in order to transform our unnatural state into a natural one¹³ through His Holy Body. Having shown such mercy to man, He restores him once more to paradise, —by restoring the fallen through following in His footsteps and keeping His commandments, which He gave us so that we might overcome those who cast us out of our glory—and by showing us holy worship (latreia) and a pure law, so that man might stand in his natural order, in which God created him.

2. Therefore, whoever desires to return to his natural state must cut off all his carnal desires in order to place himself in the state of the mind by nature (the spiritual state). There is within us, by nature, a longing (for God)—and without this longing for God, there is no love either: for this reason, Daniel is called “a man of desires” (Dan. 9: 23), but the enemy has transformed it (this natural longing) into shameful lust, so that we may lust after every kind of impurity. In the mind, by nature, there is zeal for God—and without zeal for God there is no progress, as it is written in the Epistle: “Strive for the greater gifts” (1 Cor. 12:31); but this zeal for God has been transformed in us into an unnatural zeal—so that we may be jealous of one another, envy one another, and lie to one another. In the mind there is anger by nature—and without anger, a person cannot have purity unless he is angry at everything instilled in him by the enemy, just as Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, in his anger, killed a man and a woman, and the Lord’s anger ceased against His people (Num. 25: 7–9); but in us, such anger has been transformed into another kind, so that we become angry with our neighbor over all manner of things that are unnecessary and useless. There is a natural hatred in the mind, as follows: when it took hold of Elijah, he slew the wicked prophets (3 Kings 18: 40), and likewise Samuel acted upon it toward ¹² Eis ten parafysin—into the supernatural.

¹³ Ten ten hatafysin

Agag, king of Amalek (1 Kings 15:33)—and without hatred for one’s enemies, the honor (value and dignity) of the soul is not revealed; but this (natural) hatred has been transformed within us into an unnatural one, causing us to hate our neighbor and loathe him with disgust—and this very hatred drives all virtues out of us. — It is natural for the mind to be wise and noble in the face of its enemies, as follows: when this wisdom came upon Job, he rebuked his enemies, saying to them: “You are dishonorable and despicable, lacking in every good quality; I do not consider you worthy to be the dogs of my flocks” (Job 30:1, 4), but this haughtiness toward enemies has changed in us: we have humbled ourselves before our enemies and become haughty toward one another, wounding one another, and considering ourselves more righteous than our neighbors—and for such haughtiness, God becomes an enemy to men. This is what was created in man (implanted in him at creation), and what, when he tasted it through disobedience, was transformed within him into such terrible passions.

3. Let us therefore strive, beloved, to take care to cast them (these passions) aside, and to attain what our Lord Jesus Christ has shown us in His Holy Body: for He is “Holy and dwells among the saints.” Let us take care of ourselves, so that we may please God to the best of our ability, exercising our active powers and balancing (as on a scale) all our members until they are restored to their natural order, so that we may find mercy in the hour of temptation, “which is to come upon the whole world” (Luke 21:26),—imploring His goodness unceasingly, that His help may come forth with our humility for our salvation from our enemies, for His strength, and help, and power are forever and ever. Amen.

3. On the Condition of Novices and Cellites

1. First and foremost, we need humility, so that at every word we hear or every deed we perform, we may be ready to say, “Forgive me,” for humility thwarts all the enemy’s schemes.

2. Do not judge yourself in any of your deeds, so that you may be at peace in your thoughts.

3. Let your face bear the mark of sorrow and contrition (when you are alone), but with strangers, let it be cheerful and pleasant, so that the fear of God may dwell within you.

4. When you set out on a journey with your brothers, keep a little distance so that you may be silent; and as you walk, do not look this way and that, but reflect in your mind, or pray to God in your heart. Wherever you stop for the night, do not act freely, but be modest and humble in everything. When something is offered to you, extend your hand reluctantly, as if you were being forced to do so. As the youngest, do not dare to extend your hand to place¹⁴ (a piece of food) into another’s mouth. Wherever you happen to lie down for the night, do not share a blanket with another, but before you lie down, offer many prayers in your heart. If you are weary from the journey and wish to anoint yourself with a little oil to ease the fatigue of the journey, allow only your feet to be anointed—being ashamed to uncover them—and do not allow your entire body to be anointed with oil except in cases of extreme necessity or illness.

5. If, while you are sitting in your cell, a stranger comes to you, do the same for him—rub his feet and tell him: “Out of love, take a little oil and anoint the rest of your body.” If he is reluctant to accept it, do not press him; but if he is an active elder, urge him until you have anointed his entire body.

6. When you sit at the table with brothers who are younger than you, do not say to yourself, “¹⁵”: eat, but remember your sins, so that you do not eat with relish. Reach only for what is in front of you; do not reach for what is in front of others. Let your clothing cover your feet and your knees; let them be closely joined together. If there are travelers among those eating, offer them what they need with a welcoming gaze, and when they have finished eating, say to them two or three times: “Show love; eat a little more.” When you eat, do not lift your face toward the one next to you; do not look this way and that; do not speak idle words; do not reach out your hand for what you desire without first saying, “Bless this”; and when you drink water, do not let your throat make a gurgling sound, as ordinary laypeople do.

7. If, while sitting with your brothers, phlegm rises, do not spit it out in their presence, but stand up and spit it out outside; do not stretch your body in full view of others: if you feel a yawn coming on, do not open your mouth, and it will pass; do not open your mouth to laugh at all, for this is recklessness.

8. Do not covet anything belonging to a brother when you see it—whether clothing, a belt, or a headband—and do not act on your desire to make something similar for yourself.

¹⁵ In Paissius: “im.”

9. If you acquire a book, do not embellish its binding (or decoration), for this is a passion.

10. If you sin in any way, do not lie out of shame (to admit it), but bow down, saying, “Forgive me”—and your sin will pass.

11. If someone speaks harshly to you, do not let your heart rise up against him, but hasten to bow down to him before displeasure toward him (or a sense of offense) takes root in your heart, for anger quickly follows.

12. If you are unjustly accused by someone in any matter, do not take up arms against them, but bow down, saying, “Forgive me; I will not do this again,” whether you know the matter or not, for all such things are a stepping stone to a new beginning.

13. When you are¹⁶ working on your craft, do not be careless, but attend to it with the fear of God, so that you do not sin through ignorance.

14. When you are learning a craft, speak to your teacher, and do not be ashamed to ask him often: “Please be kind and check whether I am doing this well or not.”

15. If your brother calls you while you are engaged in your craft, hurry to find out what he wants, and attend to him, setting aside your work.

16. After the meal, go into your cell and say your prayers (lietorgias), and do not sit down to talk with those from whom you expect no benefit for yourself. But if they are elders speaking the word of God, ask your abbot: “Should I sit down to listen, or should I go to my cell?” And do whatever he tells you.

17. If he (the abbot) sends you out on some errand, ask him, “Where do you instruct me to stay?” And whatever you need, do exactly as he says—neither adding to it nor taking away from it.

18. If you hear any words outside, do not carry them with you, and when you return, do not repeat them to anyone else. If you guard your ears, your tongue will not sin.

19. When you desire something, but the one with whom you live does not desire it, give up your desire for his sake, so that no argument may arise and he may not be grieved.

20. When you move into a cell to live with a brother as a fellow resident, do not give him orders in any matter, and do not desire to be his superior.

21. If you live with other brothers, do not seek to be equal to them in their glory. If they ask you to do something you do not wish to do, overcome your own will and do it so as not to grieve them or violate the humility (modesty, the restraint required of you) and peaceful coexistence with them.

22. If you live with a brother and he says to you, “Cook something for me,” ask him, “What would you like me to prepare for you?” And if he leaves it up to you, saying, “Whatever you want,” prepare whatever is available, with the fear of God.

23. If you live together (in mutual support or in a communal setting) and there is a task to be done, do it yourself as well; join in with everyone else, and do not spare your own body, for the sake of everyone’s conscience.

24. Every day, in the morning when you get up, before you begin your work, study the Word of God; and if there is anything that needs to be put in order—whether a mat, a vessel, or something else—do it quickly without laziness.

25. When there is a task involving payment, let your brother join you in it—and do not show pride before him; but if there is a small task and one says to the other, “Go do your work, brother, and I will do this one myself,” obey him: whoever obeys is great.

26. If a traveling brother comes to you, greet him with a cheerful face, and carry whatever burden he is carrying yourself—and do the same again when he leaves you. Let your greeting to him be proper and with the fear of God, so that he may not suffer harm. Be careful not to ask him anything that is not beneficial to you, but ask him to pray. When he sits down, say to him, “How are you?” and leave it at that; then give him a book—and let him read and learn from it; but if he has come weary, let him rest, and wash his feet. If he uses inappropriate words in conversation with you, ask him lovingly, “Forgive me—I am weak, and I cannot bear this.” If he is infirm and his clothes are soiled, wash them. If he is simple and his ragged clothes are torn, mend them. If he is one of those who wander idly, and you have some faithful ones, do not bring him among them, but show him mercy in God’s love. But if he is a brother traveling for God’s sake and has come to rest with you, do not turn your face away from him, but welcome him joyfully along with the faithful who have come to you. If he is poor, do not send him away empty-handed, but give him from the blessings with which God has blessed you, knowing that what you have is not your own, but a gift from God.

27. If a brother leaves something with you, do not open it in his absence to see what is inside; but if what he has left with you is something of great value, say to him, “Give it to me in my own hands.”

28. If you go to someone’s house as a guest, and that person leaves you alone after going out, do not look up to see what is in the house, and do not open anything—neither a door, nor a vessel, nor a book—but say to him when he is leaving: ‘Give me something to do until you return’—and whatever he gives you, do it without hesitation.

29. Do not praise what you have not seen, and do not speak of what you have heard as if you had seen it.

30. Do not despise anyone because of their clothing (shema).

31. Whether you are standing to draw water or sitting out of necessity, do not be careless, but remember that God is watching you.

32. When you rise in your cell to offer your prayer, do not be careless or negligent; and instead of giving honor to God, do not provoke His wrath, but stand in the fear of God; do not lean against the wall, and do not spread your legs apart, standing on one and tucking the other in, as the foolish do; but keep your heart in check so that it does not wander in your desires, that God may accept your offering.

33. When several of you are singing together, let each one offer his own prayers (his portion, in turn); if there is a stranger among you, ask him also with love to offer a prayer. Tell him this two or three times, without quarreling.

34. At the hour of the offering (of the bloodless sacrifice), resist your thoughts, fixing your mind on the fear of God, so that you may be deemed worthy of the Holy Mysteries and the Lord may heal you.

35. See to it that you do not leave your body in filth and disarray, lest vanity deceive you; but let the novice allow himself to be in a state of disarray with regard to his body, for this is beneficial to him.

36. Let the novice never wear fine clothing until he has reached manhood: this is a remedy for him. As for wine, let him set for himself a rule: no more than three cups when necessary. When laughing, let him by no means bare his teeth; rather, let him bow his head downward in reverent modesty. When going to bed, let him remain girded with his belt, and in every way strive not to put his hands inside (under his clothes), for the body has many passions, with which the heart also becomes entangled. When he needs to go outside, let him put on his sandals; but while he is in his cell, let him strive not to wear sandals. When walking, let him tuck his hands into his belt (or hold them pressed against his belt), and not swing them about like laypeople.

37. When walking with those older than you, do not by any means go ahead of them. When an elder stops to speak with someone, do not be presumptuous or sit down, but stand until he gives you a sign as to what to do.

38. When you walk through a town or village, keep your eyes cast down so as not to invite reproach upon yourself (when you are) in your cell.

39. When traveling, do not spend the night in anyone’s house where your heart fears you might fall into sin.

40. When, having been invited to eat somewhere, you learn that a woman will also be eating there, do not sit down under any circumstances; it is better for you to disappoint the one who invited you than to sin secretly in your heart. If you can, do not even glance at women’s clothing. If, while traveling, a woman says to you, “Peace be with you,” answer her in your heart, but keep your eyes downcast.

41. When you set out on a journey with an elder, do not under any circumstances allow him to carry the bag you have with you; but if you are both novices, carry it in turns; yet let the one who is carrying it walk ahead.

4. On the journey of those living in cells, and on conscience¹⁷

1. When you are traveling on the road, and one of you is weak, let him walk ahead of you so that, if he wishes to sit down, he may do so.

¹⁷ Greek: “peri syneideseos”—it should, I think, be read as “peri synodeyseos”—as the context requires. The Latin version correctly reads it this way, with the title: Quid in itinere observandum est. But since toward the end there is also mention of conscience, this is added.

2. If you are beginners and are traveling together, establish for yourselves, once and for all, a set order of conduct—whether approaching the washbasin or sitting down at the table—so that when the time comes, you will not be at a loss; but if one goes first this time, let another go first the next time.

3. When you ask an elder about a thought, freely reveal that thought to him, if you know that the elder is trustworthy and will keep your word.

4. When you hear of your brother's sin, do not repeat it to anyone, for this is death to you.

5. When some people speak of the thoughts that trouble you, do not wish to listen to them, lest this become a cause of strife for you.

6. Compel yourself to pray often, for prayer is light for your soul.

7. Every day, reflect on where you have sinned, and if you pray about it, God will forgive you.

8. If a brother persistently begins to speak ill of another brother in your presence, do not be ashamed to stop him, and do not believe him, lest you sin before God; but say to him humbly: "Forgive me, brother; I am wretched—what you are saying is my own doing—and I cannot bear it."

9. If a brother does you wrong, and someone speaks ill of him to you, guard your heart so that malice does not arise in you again, but remember your own sins before God—and if you wish for Him to forgive you for them—do not repay your neighbor in kind.

10. If you go out with brothers whom you do not know, and it turns out that they are younger than you, give them the honor of precedence in everything. If you happen to visit a friend, let them go before you in everything—whether approaching the washbasin or sitting down at the table—and do not pretend that they are being welcomed for your sake, but give them this honor, saying, "It is for your sake that he has shown me kindness."

11. If you are traveling with a brother and stop to see a friend of yours to speak with him about a matter of need, telling your brother, "Wait here"—and your friend insists that you eat some bread—let nothing enter your mouth until you call your brother so that he, too, may be refreshed with you.

12. If you are traveling with many brothers and are ashamed to take them to your friend because there are so many of them, take care not to despise them; and do not secretly slip away to eat bread alone, leaving them behind, but consider with them what is proper—and whatever they tell you, listen to them with humility; and as you walk along the road with them, do not assume a higher rank for yourself, and do not shirk the duties of a novice.

13. If you go out and wish to visit a brother, but he does not wish to receive you, then when you see him later on the road, or if he comes to you unannounced, show him the greatest kindness.

14. If you hear that someone has spoken ill of you, then when you meet him somewhere, or if he comes to see you, show him a cheerful, welcoming, and friendly face to the best of your ability, without saying anything to him about what you heard: "Why did you say that?" For it is written in Proverbs: "Whoever remembers evil is a transgressor."

15. If you, brothers, visit a poor brother, do not burden him with any needs, but buy for yourselves whatever food you need to sustain yourselves, so that there will be plenty left over for him—the lodging you find there will be enough for you.

16. If you visit some elders whom you know, and there are others with you whom the elders do not know—do not show particular boldness toward the elders in their presence, but give the floor to those who have come with you to speak their minds.

17. When brothers live with you, watch over them strictly, provided they listen to you, knowing that you will give an account of them to God.

18. If you go somewhere as a pilgrim for God's sake, do not seek to associate with those in that place, and do not become entangled with them through your words, because (in such a case) it is more beneficial for you to be with your flesh-and-blood relatives.

19. If you go up the mountain to visit the brothers in the monasteries, stay with whoever you visit first, and do not move on to another without first asking this one: "Should I go or not?" If he is displeased by this, do not grieve him until you have left that place.

20. If (while traveling) you take a cell to live in, do not allow yourself to have many friends—one is enough for you in case of illness, and you will not undermine the power (significance, weight) of your pilgrimage.

- 21. When you do a good deed for a poor (brother), do not invite him to share in your provisions, lest you destroy the good deed you have done for him.
- 22. If you enter a monastery (hermitage) that you do not know, live wherever its inhabitant allows you to live, and do not enter another cell until he himself calls you.
- 23. If you are keeping silence in your cell and a brother asks you for something he needs, do not keep that thing for yourself, for otherwise you will violate the commandment concerning your brother. But if you have only what you need and nothing superfluous, do not squander it to your own ruin; for it is better to lose one of your limbs than for your whole body to be cast into Gehenna.
- 24. If you have separated yourself from your flesh-and-blood relatives to be a pilgrim for God's sake, do not allow a sweet attachment to them (the pleasant feeling of being with them) to take hold of you, and, sitting in your cell, do not be troubled by regret for your father or mother, or by memories of a brother or sister, or by compassion for your children, or by longing for your wife in your heart—for you have left all these behind—but remember your departure in the hour of death. Since none of them will help you then, why not leave them behind for the sake of virtue?
- 25. When, in silence in your cell, you remember someone who has wronged you, rise and pray to God with all your heart that He may forgive him—and the thought of revenge will depart from you.
- 26. When you go to partake of the Sacraments of the Offering, guard your thoughts in every way (or guard yourself against any extraneous thoughts), lest you partake to your own judgment.
- 27. If you are tempted by shameful dreams at night, guard your heart so that you do not dwell on the faces that appeared in your dream during the day, lest you defile yourself with their allure and bring down upon yourself fierce wrath; but cling to God with all your heart—and He will help you, for He is merciful toward human weakness.
- 28. If you practice strict asceticism, let not your heart rely on it, thinking to yourself that it is what preserves you; but tell yourself that, for the sake of the body's weariness, God hears my supplication (and preserves me).
- 29. If anyone reviles you, do not contradict him until he falls silent; then, if, upon examining yourself, you find within yourself what you heard from him, repent that you have sinned—and God's grace will receive you again.
- 30. When you travel with the brethren, and there is among them one for whom you have love for God's sake, do not show special closeness to him in front of the others; lest there be a weak one among them who might die of jealousy—and you will bear his sin, because you gave him cause to sin.
- 31. When you go to visit certain people, do not expect them to be overjoyed to see you, so that when they welcome you, you may give thanks to God.
- 32. If weakness overtakes you while you are in silence in your cell, do not lose heart, but give thanks to God; if you see that your soul is troubled by this, say to it: "Is not this weakness better for you than the hell into which you are destined to go?"—and it will be calmed within you.
- 33. If you go to the brothers, and one of them says to you, "I find no peace here, but I want to live with you," do not give him a place, so as not to cause others to stumble. But if he says to you, "My soul is dying because of some hidden matter," give him a way to flee, but do not allow him to live with you.
- 34. As you sit in silence in your cell, set for yourself a rule regarding food: to give your body only what it needs so that it may sustain you and enable you to perform your prayer services, and so that you will not be tempted to go to others; eat nothing for pleasure, to satisfy the cravings of the palate, whether the food is wholesome or not; if you need to visit—whether a brother or a monastery—do not give your body its fill of any sweet food you find there, so that it will long to return to your cell as soon as possible and not become a traitor to itself.
- 35. If demons begin to incline your heart toward feats beyond your strength, do not listen to them, for they usually incite a person to undertake any task for which he is not strong, so that he may fall into their hands and they may rejoice over him. Eat once a day and give your body only what it needs to get up when you still feel like (to eat). Perform your vigil devoutly, and do not deprive your body of what it needs, but offer your prayers with wisdom and moderation, lest your soul be clouded by too much vigil and stray from the path. Half the night is enough for your prayers, and half for the body's rest; before going to sleep, spend two hours in prayer and psalm-singing, then lie down to rest, and when the Lord awakens you, offer your prayers again with zeal. If you see, , that your body is slacking off, say to it: "Do you want rest for this brief time, only to be cast into utter darkness afterward?” And if you gradually discipline yourself in this way, strength (for alertness) will come to you.

36. Do not befriend people whom your conscience fears to see as different (from what they appear to be, and from what is desirable to you—or fears that through them you will come to know others), lest you cause a stumbling block in your spiritual life.

37. If you are in a monastery and, having a slave, keep him with you, you bring disgrace upon the monastic order; but if you give him to a brother, you sin before God. Either let him go, or set him free. If he wishes to become a monk, he will see for himself (or as he knows). Do not keep him with you, for this is not beneficial for your soul.

38. If, while living in a city, you mortify your body for God’s sake, and the people there, out of envy, begin to honor you for it, leave that place and settle elsewhere—so that your labor may not become fruitless; but if you have already conquered vanity, pay no heed to people, knowing that God, together with you, approves of what you are doing.

39. If you have renounced the world, keep absolutely nothing for yourself; and if you feel the desire to go out, then occupy your body more with manual labor, so that you may remain silent in your cell, peacefully eating your bread.

40. If you go into town to sell your handiwork, do not haggle over the price like laypeople, but sell it as it happens, so as not to undermine the power (significance) of your cell.

41. When you buy something you need, do not haggle, saying, “I will not pay more than so much for this,” but if you desire that item, force yourself a little to pay the asking price; if, however, you cannot afford it, leave it alone in silence. When thoughts later begin to torment you about where you will get the money, tell them: “I have now become like all the saints whom God tested with poverty until He knew that their will was true, and only then did He lead them to abundance.”

42. If a brother leaves something with you, and you come to need it, do not touch it without him, unless you have told him (about it beforehand).

43. If a brother, taking you aside, says to you, “Buy this or that from me,” then, if you can afford it, buy it from him. However, if you live with others, do not do this without their knowledge and consent; otherwise, you will offend those who live with you.

44. If you need to visit your village for any reason, be careful not to take too many liberties with your blood relatives, and do not interfere in their conversations.

45. If you borrow something from your brother for temporary use, do not be negligent, but make every effort to return it to him as soon as possible. If it is a tool, return it immediately after you finish your work. If it breaks while in your possession, repair it or make a new one; do not neglect this.

46. If you lend anything to a poor brother in need and see that he cannot repay you, do not pester him or pressure him, whether it be money or clothing—whatever you gave him according to your means.

47. If, upon coming to a certain place to live, you take a cell and, while furnishing it with everything necessary, spend money on it, and in time you leave it, and some brother comes to live there, and you later return there—do not drive him out, but find yourself another cell, so that you do not sin before God. But if he leaves of his own accord, you will be free from all blame. If you left any belongings in the cell and he used them up, do not demand them back from him.

48. When you leave your cell, be careful not to take with you the things needed there, but leave them for a poor brother, and God will provide for you wherever you go.

49. Do not be ashamed to confide any thought that troubles you to your superior, and you will be relieved of it; for the spirits find no greater foothold in anyone than in a person who conceals his thoughts, whether they be good or bad.

50. Be careful, when approaching Holy Communion, not to harbor ill will toward your brother, for in that case you are deceiving yourself.

51. If any figurative (allegorical) meaning is revealed to you in the words of Scripture, interpret them allegorically, but do not disregard the literal meaning, lest you trust your own reason more than Holy Scripture, for this is a sign of pride.

52. If your brother, deceived by the words of heretics, strays from the faith out of ignorance and then returns, do not despise him, for it was a matter of ignorance on his part.

53. Be careful when speaking with heretics, seeking to defend the faith, lest the poison of their wicked words wound you (yourself) in any way.

54. If you come across a book that is reputed to be heretical, do not seek to read it, lest you fill your heart with deadly poison, but hold fast to what you have been taught, adding nothing to it and taking nothing away from it.

55. Guard yourself against false wisdom that opposes sound doctrine, as the Apostle said (1 Tim. 6:20; 1:10).

56. If you are young and have not yet subdued the flesh, then, hearing of the lofty virtues of the fathers and aspiring to them, do not imagine that you will attain them by indulging in idleness: they will not come to you unless you labor diligently to cultivate them, but if you do, they will come to you of their own accord.

57. Guard yourself against despondency, for it destroys the fruit of the monk's labor.

58. When you are struggling against a passion, do not lose heart, but humble yourself before God, saying with all your heart: "I cannot overcome this; help me, a wretched one"—and you will find peace.

59. If shame takes root in your heart while you are sitting in your cell, be careful to resist your soul so that it does not get the better of you; hasten to remember God, that He is watching you closely, and that everything you think in your heart is open before His face, and say to your soul: if you fear sinners like yourself, lest they see your sins, how much more (should you fear) God, who watches over everyone? From such an exhortation, the fear of God will be revealed within your soul—and if you abide in it, you will remain unshaken by passions, as it is written: "Those who trust in the Lord are like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but abides forever in Jerusalem" (Ps. 124:1).

60. If, in battle, you stand against the enemy's forces and see that they have faltered before you in exhaustion and are fleeing backward—let not your heart rejoice at this, for the wicked scheme devised against you by these spirits lies behind them, and they are preparing for you a battle even more terrible than the first. They leave a special battle force in ambush—behind the city—and command it not to move. Then, when you march against them and oppose them, they will flee before you as if in exhaustion; but when your heart is lifted up because you have driven them away—and you leave the city—then some of them from behind will rise up against you, while others will stand against you from the front, trapping the poor soul in their midst, so that she will have no refuge left.—This city is to humble yourself with all your heart before God, who saves you from all the battles of your enemies.

61. If you pray to God about a battle, asking Him to take it away from you, and He does not hear you, do not lose heart, for He knows better than you what is good for you. But when you pray to God for any of your requests during battle, do not say, "Take this away from me and give me that," but pray, saying this: Lord Jesus Christ, help me, and do not let me sin against You, for I have gone astray; do not let me follow my own will; do not let me perish in my sins; have mercy on Your creation; do not despise me, for I am weak; do not forsake me, for I have taken refuge in You; heal my soul, for I have sinned against You; all who persecute me are before me—and I have no refuge except in You, O Lord; Lord, save me for the sake of Your mercy; may all who rise up against me be put to shame, those who seek my soul to destroy it; for You, O Lord, are mighty in all things, and through You be glory to God the Father and the Holy Spirit, forever and ever. Amen. – Then your conscience will secretly tell your heart the reason why God is not heeding you, and your duty will be not to disregard that, but to do whatever it tells you to do. It cannot be that God does not hear a person when that person does not heed God. He is not far from us, but our own desires prevent Him from hearing us. Let no one deceive you: just as the earth cannot bear fruit on its own, without sowing and watering, so it is impossible for a person to bear fruit (good deeds) without self-denial (self-mortification, self-sacrifice) and humility.

62. Let us therefore stand, beloved, in the fear of God, preserving and observing the practice of the virtues (to praktikon—"the practice"—"ton areton"), *without causing our conscience to stumble, but heeding ourselves in the fear of God, until it too is set free along with us, so that there may be unity between us and it. Then it will serve as a guardian for us, showing us everything from which we must cut off*¹⁸ (our will). But if we do not listen to it, it will turn away from us and abandon us, and we will fall into the hands of our enemies, from whom there will be no mercy for us, as our Lord taught us, saying: "Settle matters quickly with your adversary, while you are still on the way with him, lest your adversary hand you over to the judge, and the judge hand you over to the officer, and you be thrown into prison. Truly I tell you, you will not get out of there until you have paid the last penny” (Matt. 5:25–26). – They say that conscience is an adversary because it opposes a person when he desires to fulfill the will of his flesh, and if a person does not heed it, it delivers him over to his enemies. Why did Hosea, lamenting Ephraim, say: “Ephraim has overcome his adversary; he has trampled the law underfoot” (Hosea 5:11): He sought Egypt, and was taken captive to the Assyrians against his will (Hosea 7:11). Egypt signifies that the heart sought its own fleshly desires, and “was taken captive to the Assyrians against his will” means that, though reluctantly, he serves his enemies.

63. Let us therefore take care of ourselves, beloved, lest we fall into the hands of our own carnal will—and it deliver us against our will to the Assyrians. Let us heed this bitter word: The king of Assyria came into the land of Israel, and carried away Ephraim and Israel to Assyria, and settled them by the rivers of Huzan, in the lands of Elah and Amor, and they remain there to this day. Then the king of Assyria sent some of his people and commanded them to live in the land of Israel, and each of them made an idol for himself and worshiped it. And they remain there to this day (2 Kings 17:6, 24, 25, 29). This happened to Ephraim because he “overpowered his rival and trampled on justice.”

64. Do you now understand, brothers, the fate of those who follow their evil desires and trample on their conscience—what has befallen them?—Let us not envy them, beloved, but let us emulate the saints, who did not yield to sin even unto death, but obeyed their holy conscience and inherited the kingdom of heaven. Each of them died in righteousness according to their own generation, but their names have become indelible throughout all generations. – Let us take as an example the beloved Jacob, who obeyed his parents in everything according to God’s will; having received a blessing from them, he desired to go to Mesopotamia to acquire children there, for he did not wish to have them from the daughters of Canaan, who were disobedient to their parents. Then, taking his staff and a jar of oil, he came to the place called Bethel—which means “the house of God”—and rested there; and in a vision by night he saw a ladder reaching from heaven to earth, with the angels of God ascending and descending on it. – The Lord was standing upon it. This is a sign for those who are to serve God in the future—that although the face of virtue is revealed to them at the beginning, if they do not labor for its sake, they will not attain God. Jacob rose and made a covenant with God that he would be His servant—and God confirmed it, saying, “I will be with you and will keep you” (Gen. 28:1–15). So he went to Mesopotamia to take a wife there, and when he saw Rachel, the daughter of his mother’s brother, he fell in love with her and worked for her for seven years, but she was not given to him until he had first taken Leah. And Rachel remained barren until he had worked another seven years for her. This is the meaning of this saying.

65. That land is called Mesopotamia because it lies between two rivers: the first is called the Tigris, and the second, the Euphrates; the first flows opposite the Assyrians, while the second has no enemy (obstacle), but is said to flow across the open plain. The Tigris, it is interpreted, represents reason, and the Euphrates represents humility. Leah is taken as a symbol of physical labor, while Rachel represents true contemplation. This is fulfilled in a person living in Mesopotamia who, performing physical labor with reason, resists the hostility of the Assyrians, and through humility ascends to true contemplation. – But Rachel did not bear him any children until Leah had given birth to all her children, and he had worked another seven years for Rachel. This is what it means: that unless a person completes the entire course of active life, true contemplation does not find freedom (or free expression) within him. Although both wives were his, he loved Rachel more than Leah, because Leah “had weak eyes”—“but Rachel was very beautiful in appearance” (Gen. 29:17). This is what is meant by the statement that the first wife had weak eyes—that is, as long as a person remains engaged in physical labor, he does not yet see the glory of true contemplation, for the enemy, as is his custom, mingles the desire to please others with his work, but he should not heed this. – When Leah stopped bearing children for a time, she gave her husband Zilpah, her maidservant, and later gave birth again and named the child Assir, which means “wealth.” When Leah stopped bearing children, then God remembered Rachel (Gen. 30:22). This means that when physical labors purify the senses, and they are freed from passions, then true contemplation reveals its glories to the mind (or—reveals itself to the mind in full glory). – Although Leah’s sons were a help to Jacob, he loved Joseph more than all the rest. This means that although physical labor protects a person from the enemy, it is true contemplation that unites him with God. – Why, as soon as Jacob saw Joseph, did he immediately desire to return to his parents (Gen. 30: 25)? Because he saw that a King over his brothers had been born to him. When, furthermore, Jacob led his entire retinue (camp, caravan) across the stream of Yamoch (in Slavonic and Russian – Yavok), and remained alone on the other side, he then received the joy of God's blessing, who said to him: "Your name shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel" (Gen. 32: 28), He was called Jacob because he wrestled with the enemy—and was called by that name—until he was deemed worthy of such a blessing and rescued (from captivity) his senses, which had been in the enemy's grasp. When they were set free within him, he was then renamed Israel, that is, "the mind that beholds God." For when the mind attains the ability to behold the glory of the Godhead, then hostile animosity fears it. Why, although Esau comes out to meet him in bitterness, Jacob's humility extinguishes his malice, and it is no longer Jacob himself who overcomes him (Esau), but his own defeat before the face of God. Although the enemy may envy a person upon seeing the great glory he has attained, he cannot harm him, for God is his helper, as it is written: "Return to the land of your birth, and I will be with you" (Gen. 31: 3). — Finally, he came to Salem, bought a field there, and built an altar to the Lord, who had heard him on the day of his distress (Gen. 33:19–20). The name "Salim" means "peace," that is: when a person passes through a battle in which God protects him, he then attains a state of peace. And Jacob set up an altar of twelve stones and offered upon it, in the land of promise, a sacrifice to God from the fruits of the labor he had performed in Mesopotamia.

66. Such was also the beloved Moses, who, having led the people out of Egypt, saved them from the hand of Pharaoh, led them across the Red Sea, and witnessed the death of all his enemies; he sent Joshua to destroy Amalek, while he himself remained standing on the mountaintop (in prayer), and his hands were held up by Aaron and Hur so that they would not stray from the sign of the cross. When Joshua later returned joyfully after defeating Amalek, Moses built an altar at the foot of the mountain out of twelve stones and named that place "The Lord Is My Refuge" (Ex. 17:15), because God fights against Amalek with an invisible hand. — The name Amalek means despondency. For when a person begins to flee from his desires, forsakes his sins, and turns to God, then despondency—the first to arise—wars against him, seeking to draw him back to his sins. This despondency is driven away by diligent devotion to God; abstinence fosters this devotion; abstinence is maintained through physical labor; and it is through this labor that Israel is set free. Then a person gives thanks to God, saying: "I am weak, but You are my helper from generation to generation."

67. Such was also the great prophet Elijah. He could not destroy all the false prophets who opposed him until he had built an altar of twelve stones, laid logs of wood upon it, placed the holy sacrifice on them, and poured water over it all; and God became for him a fire that consumed the altar and everything on it. Only then, at that very moment, did he boldly confront his enemies (3 Kings 18:40 ff.).—And when he had destroyed them, so that not a single one remained, he gave thanks to God, saying: "You are in all this, for it is written that he placed his face between his knees" (3 Kings 18:42). Thus, if the mind carefully maintains control over its senses, it attains immortality (or eternal life), and immortality (eternal life) leads it to these words, which God reveals to it. When, then, Elijah's "young man" "looks" and sees none of the seven passions aroused, he beholds "a small cloud, like the footprint of a man, bringing up water from the sea": which is the rest (3 Kings 18:43, 44) of the Holy Comforter. — Immortality is this: to keep one's works sound (whole and intact), and not to return to that for which one prays for forgiveness. For when God accepts a person's works, and what he does remains whole, preserved from the enemy's power, then his enemies will not be able to stand against him; when they see that their will has no hold on him, they will vanish of their own accord, as it is written: "Call upon the names of your gods, and I will call upon the name of the Lord my God; and the God who answers by fire—that is the God" (1 Kings 18:24). ("They called... but there was no voice, nor any answer"—26). This is how it is with everything that is sown into a person by the enemy's power: the enemies cannot carry out their will in one who is unwilling; they exert all their strength (to win him over to their side), but the man of God does not listen to them, because his heart—which is in accordance with God's will—does not desire it, as it is written: "Call upon the name of your God, and I will call upon the name of the Lord my God," but since their will was not in Him, He did not hear them in anything.

68. All this happens to everyone who follows God's will and keeps His commandments. For the men of that time, these were types; but it is written for our edification, we who have resolved to walk in their footsteps, striving to attain the immortality that preserved them from all the enemy's arrows. They placed themselves under the shelter of God, praying for His help, because they did not rely on any of their own efforts, and God's protection was a wall of defense for them. They believed that without God's help they could do nothing, and in humility they spoke with the Psalmist: "Unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain; unless the Lord guards the city, the watchman stays awake in vain" (Ps. 126: 1). And when God sees that a person's mind has submitted to Him with all its strength, and has no help in anyone but Him, He fills that person with strength, saying: “Do not fear, O Jacob, O little one of Israel” (Isa. 41:14)—and again: “Do not fear, for I have delivered you; I have called you by name; you are Mine. And when you pass through the waters, I am with you, and the rivers will not overwhelm you; and when you walk through the fire, you will not be burned, and the flame will not consume you. For I am the Lord your God, the Holy One of Israel, who saves you” (Isa. 43:1–3). When the mind hears such an inspiring word, it boldly rises up against the enemy’s power, saying: “Who will contend with me? ... Let him come near to me. Behold, the Lord, the Lord, will help me; who will harm me? Behold, all of you will wear out like a garment, and like a rag you will be consumed” (Isa. 50: 8:9). But God is powerful enough to ensure that we, too, may be numbered among those who, through humility, were preserved by Him, for humility served as a helmet for them and protected them from all the enemy’s arrows—by the grace of God, to whom be power, glory, and dominion, forever and ever. Amen.

5. On the Commandments for the Faithful, and on the Conduct of Those Who Desire to Live Together in Peace

1. When you walk together along the road, be mindful in all things of the weakest among you, whether he needs to rest a little or to eat a little before the appointed time.

2. When you go out together to do some work, let each of you attend to himself, not to his brother: let him neither instruct him nor command him to do anything.

3. When you are dividing tasks in the cell, or setting something up—a hearth, for example, or something else—let the one doing the work proceed as he wishes. But if he says, “Show me love, teach me, because I don’t know how (to do this or that),” and there is someone among you who does know how (to do it), let him not be deceitful and say, “I don’t know how either”—such humility is not of God.

4. If your brother is doing something (not as he should) and you see it—do not say to him, “You’ve ruined it.” But if he says, “Show me love; teach me,” and you do not teach him but remain silent, then there is no love of God in you, because you harbor deceit in your heart.

5. If your brother cooks a meal and it does not turn out well, do not say to him, “You cooked it poorly,” for in this lies death for your soul. But rather, consider how sad you would be if you had to hear this yourself from another—and you will be comforted.

6. When you sing together, and someone makes a mistake with a word, do not point it out to him or embarrass him; if he misses a word, let it be (overlooked). But if he says in advance, “Show love,” and asks, “Tell me (if I make a mistake or miss a word),” then tell him.

7. When you are eating a meal, and any of you does not care for a particular dish, let him not say, “I cannot eat this,” but for God’s sake, even unto death, let him force himself—either to remain silent or to eat as the others do—and God will set his heart at ease.

8. When you are working together on a task, and any of you, out of cowardice, stops (working), do not rebuke him, but rather be kind to him or be lenient with him.

9. When brothers come to visit you, by no means question them about anything that might be harmful to you, so that you may not be left with a burden (embarrassment, a wound in your heart) from them in your cell. But if a visitor, unable to restrain himself, says something to one of you that, as noted, could be harmful to you, then the one who hears it must not repeat it to any of the brothers, but must remain silent—so that this distress (just as it came) may pass from him alone—and so that he does not fill their hearts with deadly poison.

10. When you go out for any necessity, do not ask anyone about anything unbecoming to you, so that you may return to your cell whole (unharmful). If, however, you happen to hear something unintentionally, do not repeat it to your brothers upon your return.

11. When you are out and about, do not allow yourselves any license, wherever you may go, so that those who witness the propriety of your conduct may benefit from you; especially (do not relax) in both secret and outward silence: for all those passions (failings in conduct arising from self-indulgence) manifest themselves in another weak (brother), due to the inactivity (or emptiness) of his heart—for he does not see his own sins. (Know that) God’s help, hope, gentleness, conscientiousness, the relinquishment of one’s own will, and self-discipline in all things—these dwell in the heart of the humble; whereas pride, contention, regarding oneself as more knowledgeable than one’s brother, trampling on one’s conscience, and indifference to the fact that your brother grieves over you—saying, “What does that have to do with me?”—are found in a hard heart.

12. When you are sitting at your work, and your brother enters your cell, do not wonder whether you have worked more than he has, or he more than you.

13. If you are working alongside someone who is weak, do not be proud in your heart, desiring to accomplish more than he has.

14. If your brother, while doing any work, messes it up, say nothing to him about it unless he himself says to you, “Show me love, brother; teach me.” And if you, knowing (how to do it), remain silent, then in this lies your death.

15. When you are doing your work, whatever it may be, make an effort not to keep track of how much you have accomplished compared to your brother, for this is a sign of inexperience.

16. When you go to work with your brothers, do not wish for them to know that you have accomplished more than they have. This is what God requires of a person: that every deed he does, he do in secret.

17. If your brother, out of weakness, responds to you with a word of discontent, bear with him joyfully; for if you examine what has happened by God’s judgment—which is righteous and impartial—you will find that you have sinned (and not your brother).

18. If you live with the brethren, and your thoughts prompt you to restrict yourself (more than usual) in your eating, say to your thoughts: “The weak brother who lives here is my master.” If you earnestly desire to increase your self-restraint, take a small, separate cell for yourself, and do not trouble your weak brother.

19. If a wandering brother comes to you—one about whom you have previously heard that he is a show-off (filoshematikos esti), loves to put on airs, and presents himself as knowledgeable, ascetic, and so on—do not question him about this verbally until this flaw of his reveals itself on its own; but (even afterward) be careful not to act on what you have learned, because if the brother realizes this, he will be offended.

20. If you wish to take something because you need it, do not grumble against your brother (saying to yourself), “Why didn’t he think to give it to me of his own accord?” but tell him boldly and simply: “Show me love; give me such-and-such, because I need it.” This is the holy purity (or straightforwardness) of the heart. But if you do not speak up, and instead grumble and reproach him in your heart, then you are in the wrong.

21. If a discussion arises among you regarding any passage of Scripture, let the one who knows and understands it, to the best of his ability, set his own will aside (or yield to his brother)—and bring his brother peace and joy. The word that must be sought above all else is this: to humble oneself before one’s brother.

22. Whoever keeps in mind the dreadful judgment before which he must appear will strive in every way to ensure that his mouth is not silenced, finding nothing to say in his defense at that dreadful hour.

23. Do not inquire into the affairs of this world, lest you become like those places where everyone goes to relieve themselves, and where, for that reason, there is a great stench. But rather be a pure altar to God, establishing within yourselves a (spiritual) priest who would always offer incense (on this altar). Never leave this altar without incense, but compel yourselves ceaselessly to stand before the face of the Lord with every prayer, that He may grant you simplicity and childlike innocence and take from you what is contrary to these—namely, all cunning, demonic wisdom, curiosity (wandering everywhere to see this and hear that), self-love, and malice; for all such things destroy the labors of those who act in this way. The conclusion of all this is this: if a person fears God with wisdom and listens with humility to his conscience as guided by God, then he will teach himself all that has been said in secret. But when there (within) is no master of the house (the fear of God), then the (inner) house of such a poor person is left to the mercy of others, and anyone who wishes may say whatever they want within it, because his heart is not under his own control, but under the control of his enemies.

24. If you are about to go out to do some small task, let no one look down on another, nor go out alone, leaving his brother to suffer pangs of conscience in the cell, but let him say to him with love: “Do you want to go? Let’s go.” – And if he sees that his brother has no peace (is not at peace in spirit) at that moment, or is physically weak, let him not argue, insisting on going at all costs, but let him postpone it for a while and return to his cell with compassionate love for his brother. Be careful not to oppose your brother in anything, lest you offend him.

25. Whoever lives with his father or brother should not consult with anyone outside the household about anything, but should discuss everything with the one who lives with him: in this lies peace and obedience.

26. If you live with your father or brother, be careful not to be found to have a secret friendship with anyone, or to write letters to anyone in secret, not wanting those who are with you to know about it: by doing this, you will ruin both yourself and them.

27. If you live with someone older than you, be careful not to perform any act of charity for the poor without first asking him—do not do this in secret.

28. When asking about your thoughts, do not ask after you have acted on them, but speak of what is troubling you at the present moment. Whether it concerns a change of residence, learning a craft, a change in one's craft, entering into a living arrangement with someone, or ending such an arrangement—ask freely about all these things, but do so before you take any action. Likewise, ask about spiritual weaknesses and bodily passions while these thoughts are still tempting you—and when you ask, do not say that you have not yet acted on these promptings, but ask about the wound, saying that you are already wounded, so that you may receive healing for the wound.

29. When you ask about your thoughts, do not be a hypocrite, and do not say one thing instead of another, or (do not use such a turn of phrase) as if someone else had acted in such and such a way, but speak the truth, and prepare yourself to do whatever you are told. If you act otherwise, you are mocking yourself, not the elders whom you are asking.

30. When you ask the elders about a quarrel, do not listen to those inner voices that tell you more than the elders do, but first pray to God, saying: "Have mercy on me, and whatever pleases You concerning me, inspire my fathers to tell me; and then, whatever the fathers tell you, do it with faith, and God will give you peace."

31. When you live with your brothers and find no peace for whatever reason—whether because of manual labor, or because of the constraints (and cramped conditions) of life, or because of the monotony of life, or because you cannot bear (the hardships you encounter), or because of despondency, or because you wish to withdraw into silence, or because you cannot bear the yoke (of submission), or because you are unable to do what you desire, or because you lack everything you need, or because you wish to subject yourself to great privations, or because you are weak and cannot bear the labor (they require), —or, in general, whatever the reason that prompts your heart to turn away from them—be careful not to agree to leave, do not cast off the yoke, and do not depart in sorrow—nor flee secretly out of a sense of offense (toward them), or at a time when within you (still) dwells reproach and condemnation of them, without remembering, because of the bitterness toward them that has overtaken you, your brotherhood with them—but rather seek peace at this time, so that your heart may be at rest wherever you go, and take their reproach upon yourself, without condemning in any way the brothers with whom you have lived; do not listen to your enemies (if they try to persuade you) to turn their (your brothers') good deeds into evil deeds, so as to avoid reproaching yourself and to use your brother's reproach to cover your own; for this, you will fall by the hand of your enemies, wherever you settle to live.

32. When you come to a place to settle, do not take a cell for yourself before you learn the customs of life there—whether there is some stumbling block for you there, whether because of excessive concern (that you will have many worries), or because you will see certain people (who are not for your benefit), or because of fame (for you or that place), or because of too much peace and comfort, or because of stumbling blocks from your friends. If you are wise, you will learn everything in a few days—whether it will mean death or life for you there.

33. If you give your cell to a brother so that he may stay there for a few days, do not treat him as if he were under your authority.

34. If you take a cell from someone to live in for a time, do not destroy anything, and do not make any changes to it without first asking the one who gave it to you whether he approves or disapproves; otherwise, it will not be in accordance with your conscience.

35. When you are living with someone or staying with them temporarily, and they give you a commandment, be careful for God's sake not to disregard it or to violate this commandment, whether openly or in secret.

36. If, while living alone in your cell, you resolve to eat at a certain hour, or to abstain from cooked food, or from something else, and then go out into the world, be careful not to say to anyone while sitting at a meal (anywhere), "Forgive me, I do not eat this," because through this all your labor will fall into the hands of your enemies in vain. Your Lord and Savior said: “Do your deeds in secret, so that your Father may reward you openly.” Whoever loves his labors guards them so that they are not lost in vain.

37. When you live with someone, no matter what work you do together—inside or outside the cell—when your brother calls you to it, be careful not to say, “Wait a moment; let me finish this little thing”—but obey him immediately.

38. When you work together with one another, if you are wise, whatever fault you may see in others, do not dwell on it, lest it slip from your tongue and you speak of it to the brothers (living with you), for in this lies the death of your soul.

39. If brothers live with you, and it happens that they sometimes labor all day, comfort them by letting them taste some food before the appointed hour. Do not think only of yourself, but be mindful of God’s judgment. Keep God before your eyes in every task, whatever you may be doing.

40. If you come to a place to live there—whether alone or with those who settled there before you—and you see something harmful to the soul or unmonastic, whether some craft or other activities, do not open your mouth to denounce it; but if you do not feel at ease staying there, go to another place, and guard your tongue so as not to denounce them; for in this lies your death.

41. If you are weak in the face of passions, be careful not to allow anyone to reveal their passionate thoughts to you as if to a confidant, for such a thing is ruin for your soul.

42. If a ridiculous remark slips out among you, be careful not to let your laughter rise to the point of being heard; for this is a sign of lack of discipline and fear of God, because there is no guard within you.

43. Since in our days the wrath of God has befallen the entire universe, do not be troubled by whatever you may hear, but say this in your hearts: What is this compared to that place (hell) into which we are destined to fall because of our sins?

44. Cultivate love for God’s sake; read what is written here so that you may also observe it, for it is no small matter for the faithful to regard this as a trivial (insignificant) matter. – If you observe this with simplicity and wisdom, you will enter into the rest of the Son of God with joy; but if you do not observe it, you will suffer hardship even here, and when you depart from the body, you will be led to hell according to the Scriptures. Our Lord Christ came for the reason stated above (that is, to grant rest to those who keep His commandments), but our hard-heartedness blinds us with the desires of our hearts, because we love them more than God, and we do not love Him as much as we love our passions.

45. Behold, I have compelled myself to write this to you as well, since what I wrote before was not enough for you. Therefore, cultivate love, and from now on take up the struggle; do not remain with an uncircumcised heart, but help yourselves (strive for your own salvation) in the few days you have left. If you observe these things—that is, humility, peace, patience, the subjugation of your own will, and love—you will live your life for your own good; but if you do not observe them, on the contrary, you will have: envy and zeal, strife and pride, grumbling and disobedience; then you will have wasted your time, and in truth you will go to hell when you depart from this body. Love your brothers with holy love, and guard your tongue so as not to utter an unseemly word that might wound a brother. For our Lord God is mighty to enable us to “do and keep” these things, so that through His grace we may obtain mercy, together with all the saints who have pleased Him. To Him be glory, honor, and worship, now and always, and forever and ever. Amen.

6. On Those Who Desire to Observe a Good Silence

Those who desire to observe a virtuous silence—let them be mindful to cast off the thieves who rob them, and not to waste their time in bondage and bitter labor, devoting their hearts to deeds unbecoming to them, and forgetting their own sins .

1. A love of scrutinizing Scripture gives rise to disputes and enmity, whereas lamenting one’s sins brings peace. It is a sin for a monk sitting in his cell to abandon his sins and give himself over to scrutinizing Scripture. Whoever devotes his heart (to scrutinizing) —why Scripture said this or that—before he has disciplined himself (gained self-awareness, or self-control, or freed himself from passions), has a restless heart and is in the utmost bondage; but whoever vigilantly guards against being enslaved by anything loves to humble himself before the face of God.

2. Whoever seeks to find a way to imitate God blasphemes against God, but whoever seeks how to honor Him (more perfectly) loves purity in the fear of God.

3. Whoever keeps God's words has come to know God (1 John 2:3)—and such a person fulfills them as one who is indebted (with a sense of urgent duty).

4. Do not seek God's highest (gifts) while you are praying to Him for help; may He come and save you from sin. God's grace comes of its own accord when a place that is unblemished and pure is prepared for it.

5. Whoever relies on his own reason and clings to his own will draws multitudes of demons to himself¹⁹ and cannot be of the Spirit (of God), who brings sorrow (or contrition) to the heart.

6. Whoever, seeing the words of Scripture, interprets them according to his own reason and relies on it, asserting that this is so (by relying on it, he assumes that this is how those words should be understood)—such a person does not know the glory of God or His riches; but whoever, upon seeing them, says, "I do not know—I am but a man," and gives glory to God—in such a person dwells the riches of God, according to his strength and his understanding.

7. Do not be eager to reveal your thoughts to everyone, but only to your spiritual fathers, lest you bring sorrow upon your own heart.

8. Guard your lips, so that your neighbor may be honorable in your sight (respect for your neighbor should keep your lips from condemning him).

9. Train your tongue to speak God's words wisely, and falsehood will flee from you.

10. The love of human glory gives rise to lies, but humbling yourself—with even greater humility—instills the fear of God in your heart.

11. Do not desire to be a friend of the glorious ones of this world, lest their glory (the sense of the harmfulness of their glory) be dulled within you.

12. If anyone speaks ill of his brother in your presence, belittles him, and shows malice (toward him), do not take his side, lest what you do not desire befall you.

13. Simplicity and humility (not thinking highly of oneself) purify the heart from deceit. Whoever acts deceitfully toward his brother (deals with him deceitfully) will not escape sorrow of heart. Whoever says one thing but harbors another in his heart through deceit—all his worship (leitorgia—prayers) is in vain. Do not associate with anyone like this, lest you be defiled by the poison of his defilement. Walk with the harmless, and you will share in their glory and purity.

14. Do not harbor malice toward anyone, lest you render your labors fruitless. Be sincere with everyone, and you will see the peace of God within yourself. Just as when someone is stung by a scorpion, its venom spreads throughout the body and damages the very heart, so too is malice toward one's neighbor in the heart: its venom wounds the soul, and the soul suffers from this evil. Therefore, whoever wishes to spare his labors, so that they are not wasted in vain, let him hasten to cast out this scorpion from within himself—that is, deceit and malice.

7. On Virtues

1. There are three virtues that the mind always prudently guards and of which it stands in need: its natural inclination, courage, and diligence.

2. There are three virtues which, if the mind perceives within itself, lead it to believe that it has attained immortality (renewal, or the perfection of the immortal heavenly beings): discernment that accurately distinguishes one thing from another, foresight of all things before they happen, and indifference to anything foreign.

3. There are three virtues that always shed light on the mind: not perceiving deceit in any person, doing good to those who do you harm, and enduring everything that befalls you without distress. These three virtues give rise to three others, greater than themselves: not seeing deceit in a person gives rise to love; doing good to those who do you harm brings peace; enduring whatever comes your way without disturbance brings meekness.

4. There are four virtues that purify the soul: silence, keeping the commandments, self-restraint (restricting oneself in all things so that the path may be narrow), and humility.

5. The mind always needs the following four virtues: to pray to God, clinging to Him unceasingly; to prostrate oneself before God; not to be troubled by any person (regarding who they are and what they do—which is the same as not questioning them), so as not to judge them; and to be deaf to what one's passions tell them.

¹⁹ ktatai ehthran. – In St. Isaiah, "ehthra" means the enemy's power—hordes of demons. To acquire them is to amass, to attract.

6. These four virtues surround the soul like a wall and allow it to breathe easily, free from the anxieties caused by its enemies: mercy, lack of anger, long-suffering, and the casting out of every seed of sin that takes root; and resistance to forgetfulness preserves them all.

7. Four virtues, according to God, help the young (the novice): constant instruction, diligence, vigilance, and humility (not considering oneself anything).

8. Four things defile the soul: wandering through the city without guarding one's eyes, friendship with a woman, friendship with the world's celebrities, and a fondness for conversations with blood relatives.

9. Four things increase lustful passion in the body: sleeping to one's heart's content, eating until one is full, frivolous idle talk, and adorning the body.

10. Four things darken the soul: hatred of one's neighbor, belittling him, envying him, and grumbling against him.

11. Four things make the soul empty (Esmpt): moving from place to place, a love of entertainment, materialism, and stinginess.

12. Anger is multiplied by four things: giving and receiving (transactions), insisting on one's own will, the desire to teach, and considering oneself wise (a wise person).

13. There are three things that are difficult for a person to acquire—and through them all virtues are preserved: contrition, weeping over one's sins, and keeping death before one's eyes.

14. There are three things that exert power over the soul until it reaches a high degree—and it is these that prevent virtues from dwelling with the mind: captivity (attachment to anything other than God), sloth, and forgetfulness. Forgetfulness wages war against a person until his last breath, plunging him into barrenness; it is stronger than all thoughts, and is the mother of all evil, and the destroyer of what a person builds within himself every hour.

15. These are the deeds of the new man and the deeds of the old man! He who loves his soul and does not wish to destroy it observes the deeds of the new man, but he who loves the comfort of the flesh in this brief time performs the deeds of the old man and destroys his soul. – And our Lord Jesus Christ, revealing the new man in His own body, said: "Whoever loves his soul will lose it" (John 12:25); "But whoever loses his soul for My sake will find it" (Matt. 10:39). He is the Lord of the world; through Him the dividing wall of hostility has been torn down (Eph. 2: 14). He also said: "I did not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Matt. 10: 34), and further: "I have come to bring fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled!" (Luke 12:49). That is to say, in those who followed His holy teachings, the fire of His Divinity was (tangibly present), and as a result, they possessed within themselves a spiritual sword with which they cut off all the desires of their flesh. And the Lord gave them joy, saying, "Peace I leave with you; My peace I give to you" (John 14:27).

16. Thus, those who took care to save their souls in this age and cut off their desires became His holy sheep, offered as a sacrifice to Him. And when He appears in the glory of His Divinity, He will call them to His right hand, saying: "Come, you who are blessed by My Father; inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. For I was hungry, and you gave Me food..." and so on (Matt. 25:34–35). This is how those who sacrifice their souls in this brief time will find them in times of need, receiving a reward far greater than they ever expected. But those who follow their own wills certainly preserve their souls in this sinful age; yet, since they, beguiled by the vanity of their wealth, do not keep God's commandments, hoping to remain in this age forever, the shame of their blindness will be revealed at the hour of judgment, they will appear as accursed goats and hear the terrible verdict of the Judge, Who will declare: "Depart from Me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. For you were hungry, and you did not give Me food..." and so on (41 and 42). Their mouths will be silenced—and they will find nothing to say, remembering their unkindness and their poverty (both past and present). True, they will then say: "Lord, when did we see You hungry... and did not serve You?" (44). But He will silence them, saying: "Whoever did good to one of these who believe in Me has done it to Me."

17. Let us test ourselves, beloved, to see whether each of us is keeping the Lord's commandments to the best of our ability, or not; for we all have a duty to keep them to the best of our ability—the small according to their smallness, the great according to their greatness. Those who cast their gifts into the treasury were rich, but the Lord was more pleased with the poor widow because of her two mites, for God looks upon our willingness. Let us not, then, give room in our hearts to discouragement (that we can do little), lest envy (of others) separate us from God, but let us perform our acts of service according to our poverty. For just as the Lord showed mercy to the daughter of the chief synagogue official, by raising her from the dead; just as He had mercy on the woman with the issue of blood, who had spent all she had on doctors before she came to know Christ; just as He healed the centurion's servant because the centurion believed—so He had mercy on the Canaanite woman, healing her daughter; and just as He raised Lazarus, His beloved, from the dead, so He raised the only son of the poor widow, for the sake of her tears; and just as He did not despise Mary, who anointed His feet with perfume, so He did not turn away the sinful woman who anointed His feet with perfume, weeping; and just as He called Peter and John from their boat, saying, “Follow Me” (Matt. 4:19), so He also called Matthew, who was sitting at the tax office; and just as He washed the feet of the other disciples, so He washed Judas's feet as well, making no distinction; and just as He sent the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, upon the Apostles, so He sent Him upon Cornelius with boldness; and just as He compelled Ananias in Damascus for Paul's sake, saying that he was “a chosen vessel of Mine” (Acts 9:15), so He moved Philip in Samaria for the sake of the Ethiopian eunuch. For with Him there is no partiality toward the small or the great, the rich or the poor, but He seeks a (good) will, faith in Him, the fulfillment of His commandments, and love for all. This is what will serve as the seal for the soul (its distinguishing mark) when it departs from the body, just as He commanded His disciples, saying: “By this everyone will know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another” (John 13:35).

18. Of whom is He speaking when He says that people will recognize you, if not of the powers of the right and the left? (And it will be that) when the adversaries see the sign of love accompanying the soul, they will retreat from it in fear, while the holy powers will rejoice with it. Let us therefore strive, beloved, to the best of our ability, to obtain such a seal that our enemies may not seize us. The Lord said: “A city set on a hill cannot be hidden” (Matt. 5:14). Of what mountain is He speaking, if not of His holy word? Let us therefore, beloved, apply ourselves with zeal and wisdom to fulfilling His word, which says: “Whoever loves Me will keep My commandments” (John 14:23), so that such labors may be for us an indestructible and fortified city, preserving us by the Word of the Lord from the hand of all our enemies until we meet Him (appear before His face). For if we find boldness, all our enemies will be scattered by the power of His Holy Word, which is that mountain from which a stone was cut out without hands and struck down the four-part image of gold—made of silver, bronze, iron, and clay—as the Apostle said: “Put on the full armor of God, so that you may be able to stand against the schemes of the devil; for our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this age, against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:11–12). These four principalities are that four-part image, which is enmity (the power of the enemy). The holy Word of God has destroyed them (the principalities), as it is written that the stone which struck the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth (Dan. 2:34–35).

19. Let us therefore take refuge, brothers, under His (the Lord's) shelter—may He be our refuge and save us from these four evil powers, so that we too may share in the joy (or taste, or hear His comforting word) with all His saints, when they gather before His face from the four corners of the earth, and each of them will hear his own blessing (the bestowal of blessing, or what blessing is bestowed specifically upon him) according to his deeds. — For His holy name is mighty—to abide with us and strengthen us—and not to allow our hearts to be deceived by the enemy's forgetfulness (induced by the enemy), but He will preserve us (and grant us) the strength to endure all that befalls us, for the sake of His Holy Name, so that we may find mercy along with all who have been deemed worthy to attain His bliss. To Him be glory, honor, and worship—to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit, now and ever, and unto ages of ages. Amen.

8. Sayings

1. Abba Isaiah said: I sometimes see myself as a horse wandering without an owner—one upon whom anyone who happens upon him mounts—and when one lets him go, another catches him and mounts him.

2. He said again: “I am like someone whom his enemies have seized, bound, and thrown into a muddy ditch; and if he cries out to his Lord, they beat him mercilessly to silence him.”

3. He said again: I am like a bird tied by the leg by a young boy: when the boy loosens the string, the bird immediately soars upward, thinking it has been set free, but when the boy pulls on the string, he drags it back down again. This is how I see myself, and this is what I wish to say: that no one should give in to carelessness, until their very last breath.

4. He said again: if, having lent something to someone, you forgive him, you will be imitating the nature of Jesus; but if you demand repayment, you will be imitating the nature of Adam; and if you take interest, that will not even be in accordance with Adam's nature (that is to say, it will be inferior to or contrary to it).

5. When someone accuses you of something you have done or failed to do, if you remain silent, this is in accordance with the nature of Jesus; if you reply, "What have I done?" this is not in accordance with His nature; but if you argue back word for word, this is contrary to His nature.

6. If, while performing your services (leitorgias—prayer services), you do so with humility, as one unworthy, they are pleasing to God; but if, while doing so, a thought arises in your heart and you recall how another is sleeping (at this very moment) or is neglectful (of this matter), then your labor is fruitless.

7. He spoke again of humility, saying that it has no tongue to say of anyone that he is negligent, or of another that he is contemptuous; nor does it have eyes to observe the faults of others; nor does it have ears to listen to what is unbeneficial to its soul, and it cares for nothing but its own sins; yet it is at peace with all people, according to God's commandment, and not out of any friendship. Whoever fasts for six days and subjects himself to great labors and ascetic practices (feats) apart from this path—all his labors are in vain.

8. He said again: If anyone acquires something for his own need, but cannot find it when he needs it, then he has acquired it in vain. Such is the one who says, "I fear God," but when placed in circumstances where this fear would be needed—when, for example, he finds himself in a situation where he must speak to someone, and at that moment feels either outbursts of anger and insolent lack of self-control, or the urge to teach another what he himself has not attained, or the impulse to seek the approval of others, or the desire to become famous among people, or the manifestation of other passions—if at that moment he does not find the fear of God within himself, then all his labors are in vain.

9. If our Lord Jesus Christ had not first healed all the infirmities of the man for whom He came to earth, He might not even have reached the cross. Before the Lord's coming in the flesh, man was blind, mute, paralyzed, deaf, leprous, lame, and deadened by all manner of unnatural conditions. But when He showed mercy and came to us, He raised the dead and made the lame walk, the blind see, the mute speak, and the deaf hear—and He created a new man, free from every infirmity. And then He ascended the cross. Two thieves were crucified with Him; the one on His right glorified Him and prayed to Him, saying, "Lord, remember me in Your kingdom" (Luke 23:42), while the one on His left reviled Him. – This is what it means. Before being roused from sloth, the mind is in league with the enemy's forces. But when our Lord Jesus Christ rouses it from its sloth and grants it sight to discern all things clearly—and it is thus able to ascend the cross—then the enemy's power begins to revile it with harsh words, in the hope that, perhaps, the mind, having been weakened by this, will turn away from its labors and return once more to its former idleness. Such is the significance of the two thieves, whom our Lord Jesus Christ separated from one another, and of whom one reviled Him, hoping that perhaps he might turn Him away from His hope, while the other did not cease to implore Him until he heard: "Today you will be with Me in Paradise" (Luke 23:43). This one proved to be the conqueror of Paradise and now partakes of the tree of life.

10. He spoke again about Holy Communion, saying that it is called union with God. But if we are overcome by passions—whether anger, envy, the desire to please others, vanity, hatred, or any other passion—then we are far from God. Where, then, is our union with God?

11. When you perform your services (prayer services) and, after completing them, any of these (mentioned passions) stirs up in your heart, then all your efforts are in vain: God does not accept them.

12. One of the elders said to him, "Why then do they not push (oy kroyoyisi), Father²⁰?" The elder replied, "When rain falls on sown ground, it produces a crop; but when the ground is unsown, how can it produce a crop?" If anyone takes the trouble to cast out from his heart what is unnatural (i.e., passions), then they will no longer stir within him. God wants man to be like Him in every way. For this reason, He came to earth and suffered—to transform our hardened nature, to cut off our desires, and to remove the false knowledge that has taken hold of our souls. Speechless animals have retained their nature, but man has altered his own. Now, just as livestock is subject to man, so every person must be subject to his neighbor for God's sake: for this is why the Lord came. See, then, how much the animals surpass you, who rely on your illusory knowledge. Therefore, if I wish to return to my natural state, just as animals have neither their own will nor knowledge, so must I act—not only toward those who are with me, but also toward those who oppose me: for such is the will of God. Whoever wishes to enter into the peace of the cell and not be devoured by enmity (by the enemy's power, not to become its prey) must withdraw from people in every way (freeing oneself from concern for them, not getting involved in their affairs), so as not to rebuke anyone, not to praise, not to justify, not to flatter, not to affirm their righteousness, not to grieve them in any way, not to pay attention to their shortcomings, not to harbor in one's heart a thorn of hostile thought against them, and not to waste one's knowledge on the unwise, nor one's will on the foolish. Then you will come to know yourself and understand what is harmful to you. One who trusts in his own righteousness and clings to his own will cannot escape enmity (the wiles of the enemy), nor find peace, nor see what he lacks. And when he departs from this body, it is difficult for him to find mercy. The end of it all, however, is to dwell with God (to meditate on Him, to cling to Him, and to seek to please Him) with all one's heart and all one's strength, to show mercy to all, to weep, and to beseech God for His help and mercy.

²⁰ They do not push—perhaps toward the door of God's mercy—so that prayer may bear fruit.

13. He spoke again regarding teaching one's neighbor God's commandments: How do I know that God has accepted me, so that I might tell another, "Do this or that," when I myself am in a state of repentance because of my sins? – For a person who has ever fallen is in a state of repentance. And you cannot have firm assurance (of your salvation) until you know that the forgiveness of your sins has been accomplished within you. The sign of this is that nothing of what you have sinned against stirs in your heart—or, if someone speaks to you about it and you do not even recognize that such a thing has happened, then it is clear that mercy has been granted to you. But if this still lives within you, suppress it and weep over it; for fear, trembling, and mortal anguish—to be unconcerned about this—will remain until you stand before the throne of God. – If someone asks you to teach him something, and you, risking your very life, tell him how he can be set free (from what oppresses him), yet he returns to you saying the same thing, having made no progress whatsoever in what you told him, then it is clear that he has not put it into practice. Therefore, turn away from him, for he is killing your soul. It is a great thing for a person to set aside his own truth—which he thinks is according to God—and to keep the word of the one who teaches him according to God. Here is a man of God, Abba Nisteros, who saw the glory of God—though his sister's sons lived with him, he gave them no commands whatsoever, but left each to his own will, not caring whether they were good or bad. They also spoke of Cain and Abel: Who taught them to do this or that, when there was yet neither Law nor Scripture? (God, of course), because if God does not teach a person, he labors in vain.

14. He said again: When someone begins to speak unwholesome words to you, do not listen to them, lest he destroy your soul. Do not be ashamed of his face, and, for fear of saddening him, do not tolerate such speech directed at you, thinking, "After all, I do not accept this in my heart." No, do not speak that way. You are no greater than the first man, whom God created with His own hand—and evil talk did him no good. So flee and do not listen. But take care: as you flee with your body, do not wish to know (or hold in your memory) what was said; for even if you heard only a little, the demons will not let what was said and what you heard go to waste, but will kill your soul with it. As you flee, flee to the very end.

15. He said again: From what I see, I conclude that profit, honor, and peace torment a person to the point of death.

16. He said again: To instruct one's neighbor is a fall of the soul (from its proper station)—and to desire to lead him to a good state is a great ruin of the soul. Why? Because every time you instruct your neighbor—'Do this or that'—think of yourself this way: that you, having taken a crowbar, are destroying your own house while seeking to build his.

17. He said again: "Woe to the soul that has sinned after holy baptism!" Such a person cannot be carefree about himself while under repentance—whether he has fallen in the flesh (into carnal sins), or stolen, or slipped into any other sin, or looked at someone's body with lust, or eaten something in secret, looking around to make sure no one saw, or when another placed his alms²¹, you were curious about what was inside it—for whoever acts this way dishonors Jesus.

18. Then someone asked him, "Is this matter really so important, Father?" And he said, "Just as one who breaks through a wall and takes money is deceived by the enemy, so too is this one (deceived by the same enemy): for whoever has overcome that one has also overcome this one—and whoever is overcome in small matters is overcome in great ones as well."

²¹ Melotarion—Milot—monastic clothing (a belt), according to the rule of St. Pachomius—made of goatskin.

19. If a person performs great miracles and healings, and acquires all knowledge—even if he raises the dead—yet as soon as he falls into sin, he cannot be carefree about himself, for he is under the obligation of repentance. Likewise, if he bears many (penitential) labors, but upon seeing someone in sin or abiding in negligence, he humiliates that person—all his repentance is in vain, since he has rejected a member of Christ by condemning him, rather than leaving the judgment to God the Judge.

20. He said again: We are all as if in a hospital—one suffers from an eye ailment, another from a hand ailment, yet another has a boil or some other infirmity. It happens that some wounds have already healed, but if one eats something harmful, they open up again. So it is with one who is in a state of repentance: when he condemns or humiliates someone, he once again destroys his own repentance. — Among those lying in a hospital with various illnesses, if one cries out because of his pain, would another say, “Why are you crying out?” Doesn’t everyone think about their own illness? So too, if the pain of my sins were before my eyes, I would not look upon another sinner—just as, among those lying in the doctor’s infirmary, each one is careful not to eat anything that might reopen his wound.

21. Woe to the soul that does not wish to avoid all sin²² ! It suffers much sorrow from (enemies) who envy it and oppose it. That is why it needs great patience and gratitude for everything. Thus, when the people (of Israel) were in Egypt, they all drank and ate to their fill, yet they worked for Pharaoh as slaves. But when the Lord sent them help—that is, Moses, to free them from Pharaoh, they were subjected to hard labor and grievous afflictions; and even amid all the plagues that God brought upon Pharaoh, Moses still did not dare to speak with confidence of their deliverance from destruction until the time came and God said to him: “I will bring one more plague upon Pharaoh, and you shall say to him, ‘Let the people go, or I will strike down your firstborn.’” Then at last Moses found the courage. And God said to him: “Tell the people to ask their neighbors—and every woman to ask her neighbor—for silver and gold vessels and clothing; and put them on your children—and plunder the Egyptians” (Ex. 11:1–2). Some of these items were later used in the construction of the Tabernacle.

22. (After this, Abba) said: “This is what the elders say about this.” The silver and gold vessels and the garments are the senses that serve the enemy: what is said means that if a person does not wrest them from the enemy so that they may bear fruit for God, the covering of God’s rest will not descend upon him; but if he wrests them from the enemy and offers them as fruit to God, then God’s covering will come upon him. And the cloud did not cover the tabernacle as long as it was lacking in any way, but when it was completely finished, then the cloud covered it. So it was with the temple that was built afterward: as long as anything was lacking in it, the cloud did not cover it; but when it was completely finished, and the blood and fat of the burnt offerings were brought into it, and God smelled their fragrance, then the cloud covered that house. That is to say, until a person loves God with all his strength and with all his mind, and clings to Him with all his heart, the covering of God’s rest will not come upon him.

23. He said again: if the mind, before the senses cease to be weak (to be at the mercy of the passions), wishes to take up the cross, then God’s wrath comes upon it for having undertaken a task beyond its capacity without first healing its senses.

24. If the miasmas (the stench of the passions) are at work within you, and you sympathize with them and contribute to what gives rise to them, yet do not grieve over this in the sickness of your heart, then this is beneath the nature of Adam.

25. If your heart has conquered sin and turned away from what gives rise to it, and you have set before yourself the torments of hell, and, desiring to have your (the one) Helper always by your side, you do not offend Him in any way, but weeping before Him, you say: “It is the work of Your mercy to deliver me, O Lord”—for I myself am powerless to escape from the hands of the enemy without Your help; and at the same time you heed your own heart, so as not to grieve the one who instructs you in the ways of God: for this is in accordance with the nature of Jesus—and He will preserve you from all evil. Amen.

9. Commandments for Those Who Have Renounced the World

1. If you have renounced the world and surrendered yourself to God in repentance, do not allow your thoughts to trouble you with sorrow over your past sins, as if they were not forgiven you in this, but do not neglect the Lord’s commandments either, for otherwise He will not forgive you your past sins.

²² Based on the context of the passage, it seems to mean: one who desires, intends, or sets out to do so. But according to Paissius: one who does not desire.

2. Here is what you must observe even unto death, and do not neglect this: do not eat together with a woman; do not befriend the very young; when you are young, do not lie down on the same mat with anyone except your brother and your abbot—and do so with reverence, not carelessly; do not let your eyes wander, and be mindful when you put on your clothes.

3. If necessary, drink up to three cups of wine, and do not break this commandment for the sake of friendship.

4. Do not live in the place where you have sinned against God, and do not neglect your devotions (prayers), lest you fall into the hands of your enemy.

5. Compel yourself to study the Psalms—and this will preserve you from being enslaved by the miasmas (passions). Love every affliction of the flesh—and your passions will be subdued.

6. Take care not to measure yourself in any matter whatsoever—and you will gain the freedom to weep over your sins.

7. Guard yourself against lies; otherwise, they will drive the fear of God away from you.

8. Do not reveal your thoughts to everyone, lest you cause your neighbor to stumble, but reveal your thoughts to your spiritual fathers, so that God's grace may cover you.

9. Apply yourself to your work—and the fear of God will dwell within you.

10. If you see your brother stumbling—but not to the point of death (1 John 5:16)—do not humiliate him, lest you fall into the hands of your enemies.

11. Guard yourself from being ensnared by the sins you have committed, lest they be renewed within you.

12. Love humility—and it will cover you from your sins.

13. Do not show favoritism, lest all deceit take root in you.

14. Surrender your heart to the guidance of your fathers, and God's grace will dwell within you.

15. Do not consider yourself wise, lest you fall into the hands of your enemies.

16. Train your tongue to say, "I forgive"—and humility will come upon you.

17. As you sit in your cell, always be mindful of these three things: manual labor, study (reading and contemplation of God), and prayer.

18. Reflect daily: "I have only this day to spend in this world"—and you will not sin before God.

19. Do not be gluttonous in your eating, lest your former sins be revived within you.

20. Do not lose heart (do not grow weary) in any labor, lest the enemy's influences take hold of you.

21. Compel yourself to study (reading and meditation on God), and God's peace will come to you soon: for just as a dilapidated house outside the city becomes a place of stench—so the soul of a lazy beginner becomes a receptacle of every dishonorable passion.

22. Compel yourself to pray often with tears: perhaps the Lord will have mercy on you and strip away from you the old sinful man.

23. Make these your companions: labor, poverty, wandering, mortification of the flesh, and silence; for from them humility is born, and humility brings forgiveness of every sin.

24. Our Good Lord and God is mighty to grant us the strength to know what is right and to do it, so that we may find mercy with the saints who have kept His commandments. Amen.

10. Another Word (to Those Who Have Renounced the Faith)

1. God showed Saint Peter the Apostle that no person should be considered unclean or impure (Acts 10:15). Since his heart was sanctified, every person became holy in his sight. But for those whose hearts are ruled by passions, no one is holy in their eyes; rather, based on the passions within their hearts, they think that every person is just like them. Even when someone tells them that a certain person is a good person, they immediately become angry about it in their hearts. Therefore, be careful not to belittle anyone—not only with your lips, but also in your heart.

2. As long as a person does not take care of himself, he continues to think in his heart that he is a friend of God. But when he is freed from passions, he is ashamed to lift his eyes to heaven before God, seeing himself as extremely far from God.

3. A certain man had two servants and sent them out to his field to reap wheat, ordering each of them to reap seven sheaves a day. One of them exerted all his strength to fulfill what his master had commanded him, but he did not manage to do so, because the task was beyond his strength; the other, having despaired of success, said to himself in despondency: “Who can do such a task in a single day?” And, disregarding his master’s command, he paid no heed to the task but went to sleep—now yawning, now sleeping, now tossing and turning from side to side, like a door pivoting on its hinge—and thus wasted the entire day in idleness. When evening came, they went to their master. And he, after considering both of them, commended the diligent servant’s work—even though he had not quite managed to complete what he had been ordered to do—but he drove the lazy, negligent one out of his house. So we, too, should not lose heart in any labor, nor in any sorrow, but should use our strength, working with all our heart. And I believe that God will accept us on a par with His saints.

4. Every person ought to offer many prayers to God, with great humility of heart and body, not to consider himself to have done anything good, not to trust in praise for any of his deeds, not to be offended by rebukes, to remember his sins, to keep his heart at peace with his enemies, and not to allow a bitter word to come from his lips to speak to them or rebuke them, even in the presence of his loved ones (friends).

5. In conclusion, a monk must shut all the doors of his soul and guard all his senses, lest he fall through them, and protect himself from those who bring worldly talk to him. Blessed is he who is content with his own sins (that is, with the awareness of them and lamenting them, without prying into the sins of others).

11. On the Mustard Seed

(There is) a mystery (in the words) about the mustard seed, as the Fathers have said, to (encourage us) to explore its meaning based on what is written (about it): “The kingdom of heaven is like a mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field—the smallest of all seeds—but when it grows, it is the largest of all herbs and becomes a tree, so that the birds of the air come and nest in its branches” (Matt. 13:31–32). Such is the mustard seed, and such are its good qualities! (And the Lord, by highlighting them) desires that man imitate it in all its aspects (in everything He said about it). By saying that it is “the smallest of all seeds,” He instills in us humility—that we may place ourselves below every person; (by saying) that it has grown to its full size, He reminds us of meekness and long-suffering; that it is fiery in color, —reminds us of purity, so that we may have no defilement in the flesh; that its interior is bitter—instills a hatred of the passions, for it is bitter to those who desire peace; that its pleasant taste is not revealed unless it is chewed and ground, this speaks of the suffering caused by adversity (the embitterment of the flesh through privations); when one grinds it, it stings the eyes—this reminds us of the sorrowfulness of deeds (or ascetic labors); it is used to anoint (with mustard made from it) dead limbs, so that they do not rot. Let us, then, understand its meaning and follow its properties—and let us anoint our damaged limbs with it, so that they do not rot or become infested with worms. For this is what it means to become like Christ, to embody the Lord Jesus within ourselves, so that we may strive, to the best of our ability, to prepare ourselves for Him in accordance with His nature (the nature of the mustard seed), testing ourselves to see whether we are of that seed or not, —whether we share its nature and its humility—whether we share its ground-up state (into powder), its bitterness, or its taste. —It is by God’s grace that we are empowered to do this, according to His will. To Him be glory—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit—forever and ever. Amen.

12. On Wine

1. The sacrament of wine. (It is a symbol) of human nature (or of man), desiring to meet God (to please God), and for that purpose keeping his work whole in purity, so that God may accept it (his work) with joy.

2. The vessel (for wine) is properly sealed with pitch. This is a symbol of the purity of the body, every member of which is sound (and pure) from shameful passions, for it is impossible for one who indulges in any of the (carnal) pleasures to serve God.

3. Just as it is impossible to pour wine into a vessel that is not completely sealed or that has a crack, so it is impossible for us to please God while harboring hatred and enmity within ourselves. Let us therefore examine ourselves (to see if these are present in us), for they hinder a person in the work of repentance.

4. Wine ferments at the beginning of its formation. This is a metaphor for the beginner, who is restless until he matures and settles down.

5. Wine does not become (true wine) unless gypsum is added to it, just as leaven must be added in the proper measure. Likewise, a beginner cannot succeed by relying on his own will unless he receives the leaven from his spiritual fathers according to God, and they show him the way (and lead him along it), until God Himself grants him the ability to see it.

6. (Wine) is left in the house (where it is made) until it settles. Likewise, without silence, suffering for the sake of God, and every kind of labor according to God, it is impossible for a novice to attain a state of (steadfast well-being).

7. If wine is left with grains or twigs in it, it will turn sour. Likewise, a novice, if he mingles with his fleshly relatives or with other people who do not share in the same work and asceticism as they do, loses the character he received from his spiritual fathers.

8. Earth is placed on top of wine so that it does not lose its aroma or spoil. Likewise, if a novice does not acquire humility in all things, all his labors are in vain.

9. If wine is tasted frequently, it loses its aroma and flavor. The same often happens to a person who flaunts his deeds, for in such a case, vanity ruins all his work.

10. If a vessel of wine is left open, hateful mosquitoes spoil the wine. So too do excessive talk, jokes, and idle chatter (spoil the good disposition of young monks).

11. If wine is left exposed to the wind, it spoils its appearance and taste. So pride spoils every fruit of a person's labor.

12. Wine is hidden in cellars and covered securely. So too, silence and humility in every endeavor (hide and protect) the servant of God. And it is impossible for a person to preserve the fruit of his labor without this silence and humility.

13. All this is done with wine until it proves pleasing to its maker—and he rejoices in his fruit. All this a person must do until his work proves pleasing before God.

14. Just as it is impossible to believe what a wine is like without opening it and tasting it, so it is impossible for a person to take courage in his heart and not fear for himself until he stands before God, and God acknowledges his work as perfect.

15. Just as when a vessel begins to leak, the wine will spill onto the ground before its owner even notices—if he is careless—so too does any small and insignificant (unworthy) deed destroy a person's fruit if he is careless.

16. Let us therefore use our strength, my brothers, to guard ourselves against everything harmful to us—and may the Lord's mercy and grace give us the courage on that day to say: "In our weakness, we made the effort to keep what our conscience dictated, but the strength (for that) is Yours—and Your mercy, and Your help, and Your protection, and Your forgiveness, and Your patience. For who am I? Until now I have been in the hands of the wicked, from whom You have saved me, and I have nothing to give You. I am a sinner and unworthy of Your gifts, but You have preserved me from the hands of my enemies. You are my Lord and my God. And Yours are the glory, the mercy, the protection, the help, and the power, forever and ever. Amen.

13. To those who have striven and accomplished their work well

1. These are the signs that the Lord Jesus performed before He was crucified. "Go," He says, "and tell John what you have seen and heard: the blind see, the lame walk, lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have the gospel preached to them; and blessed is the one who is not offended by Me" (Luke 7, 22–23)²³.

2. Thus, the Lord Jesus performed many signs. (But we must know that each of them, besides its literal meaning, has an allegorical meaning.) That "the blind see"—this is what it means: one who is attentive to the hope of this world is blind; but if he, having abandoned it, fixes his gaze on the hope that is to be revealed, then he has seen; likewise: "the lame walk"—this is what it means: one who desires God yet loves the carnal thoughts of the heart is lame; but if he abandons the latter and loves God with all his heart, then he will begin to walk upright. In the same way again: "the deaf hear"—this is what it means: one who is in a state of distraction (living in entertainment) is deaf, because his attention is captivated by external things and he has forgotten what is proper; but if he detaches himself from everything, he will begin to hear. And this: "the lepers are cleansed"—this is what it means: in the Law of Moses it is written, "Let no one who is unclean enter the house of the Lord," that is, one who harbors enmity toward his neighbor, or hatred, or envy, or condemnation; but if anyone abandons these things, he will become clean.

²³ John, who baptized the Lord Jesus, embodies what is described in this passage, for the one being baptized must confess (to the baptizer) what he is doing.

3. Thus, when the blind see, the lame walk, the deaf hear, and the lepers are cleansed, then the person who was dead because of this (the moral corruption signified by these conditions) during a time of neglect is restored and renewed, and then proclaims the good news through his own senses—which had been lacking in holy virtues—that he has received his sight, begun to walk and hear, and been cleansed. You must present this justification to the one who baptized you.

4. This is what baptism is: suffering for the sake of evil (the embitterment of the flesh) with humility and silence. For it is written of John—that his clothing was made of camel’s hair, and a leather belt was girded about his loins—and he was in the wilderness (Matt. 3:4). This is a sign of self-denial. It is the first thing that purifies a person, and if anyone strives for it, he attains it; and when he has attained it, he then opens the way for himself to ascend the cross (The cross is a sign of future immortality), having first silenced the Pharisees and Sadducees (the Sadducees represent unbelief, and the Pharisees—cunning, hypocrisy, and vanity), as it is written: “From that day on, no one dared to ask Him any more questions about that” (Matt. 22:46).

5. Finally, the Lord sent Peter and John to prepare the Passover. This is a symbol of how, when the mind sees that it possesses nothing, it prepares itself for immortality by gathering its faculties together and uniting them into a single body through nourishment by the Lord’s Communion.

6. Again, when Jesus prayed, saying, “If it is possible, let this cup pass from Me at this hour” (Matt. 26:39)—this is a word about us. For when the mind is moved to ascend the cross, it needs much prayer and many tears, and a complete surrender of itself to God, asking for help from His goodness, that it may be its strength and protector until He raises it up in holy and inexhaustible renewal, because there is great danger at the hour of the cross. And as he prays, he needs Peter, John, and James to be with him—who are: sound faith, a heart strengthened by hope, and love for God.

7. This is also the significance of what happened to the Lord Himself, our beloved Lord and God Jesus, for our sake—He who was for us an example in all things, as the Apostle said: “That I may know Him and the power of His resurrection, and may share in His sufferings, becoming conformed to His death, if by any means I may attain to the resurrection from the dead” (Phil. 3:10–11): – The gall that He tasted for us inspires us to root out every evil desire within ourselves (and to keep our mouths shut), and not to allow any of them to leave the body and be carried out in deed; “the vinegar” that He tasted for us inspires us to extinguish every self-will and every vain rebellion; the “spit” with which they spat upon Him for our sake inspires us to suppress all desire to please men and all desire for the glory of this world; the “crown of thorns,” which they wove and placed upon His head, inspires us to endure reproaches, even constant ones, and to bear all reproaches without confusion; the “reed” with which they struck His head for our sake inspires us, always wearing the helmet of humility, to quell all the enemy’s pride; the Lord Jesus’ delivery over to “scourging” before the crucifixion inspires us to regard all human reproach and shame as nothing; “the dividing of His garments” by casting lots, while He Himself remained unperturbed—inspires us to despise all worldly things before we ascend the cross, according to the words of the Apostle: “You joyfully accepted the plundering of your possessions, knowing that you yourselves possess a better inheritance in heaven” (Heb. 10:34).

8. A person must do all this in order to be able to ascend the cross. And if you do not do what He did, to the best of your ability as a human being, then you will not be able to ascend the cross. That it was the sixth hour when the hard-hearted crucified Him for our salvation is an example to us to arm ourselves with strength against all despondency and faintheartedness, until sin dies, as it is written, that He put to death the enmity through the cross. That when it was the ninth hour, Jesus cried out with a loud voice: “Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani” (Matt. 27:46)—this is an example for us that, after patiently enduring the painful struggles against our passions until they are extinguished, we may finally find the boldness, in humility, to cry out to God. That He gave up His spirit after the sun had set is an indication to us that if the mind is freed from all hope in this visible world, this serves as a sign that sin has died within you. That the temple curtain was torn in two from top to bottom is a symbol that, if the mind is freed (from passions), the partition between it and God is removed. That the rocks were split and the tombs opened—this is a symbol for us that when that death (to sin) is accomplished within us, when every burden and blindness, and everything opposed to the soul, is dissolved, and the senses—which were dead and bore the fruit of death—begin to thrive, rising up invincible. That He was wrapped in a pure shroud with spices—this is a symbol for us that after that death (to sin), holiness is wrapped and incorruptibility gives it rest. That He was laid in a new tomb, in which no one had yet been laid, and a great stone was set against its entrance—this is a symbol for us that when the mind is freed from all things and enters the Sabbath, it enters a new age, attains new wisdom, attends to that in which there is nothing corruptible, and meditates on the incorruptible. – Furthermore, “where the body” (the corpse) “is, there the vultures will gather” (Luke 17:37). – That He rose again in the glory of His Father, and that He ascended into heaven and sat “at the right hand of the Majesty on high” (Heb. 1: 3)—is an example to us, according to the words of the Apostle: “If, then, you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Set your minds on things above,” (a) “not on earthly things, for you will die” (Col. 3: 1 – 3).

9. May His holy Name, which works mercy and has been a model for the saints in all things, powerfully intercede for our weakness and, in view of our poverty, forgive us our sins, so that we too may find mercy along with all who are worthy of it. Amen.

14. Acts of Lamentation

1. Woe is me, woe is me—for I have not yet been freed from Gehenna! Those who drag me into it still bear their fruit within me, and all its works stir within my heart; those who plunge me into the fire still act within my flesh, desiring to bear its fruit; I have not yet known where I shall go from here; the right path has not yet been prepared for me; I have not yet been freed from the influences in the air (the forces of darkness) that seek to block my path, because of their evil deeds within me; I have not yet seen the Deliverer who has come to save me from them, because their malice still bears fruit within me; I have not yet seen bold intercession between me and the Judge; no testimony has yet been given on my behalf that I am not worthy of death; I have not yet separated myself from the evildoers.

2. The wicked man does not rejoice while imprisoned; bound in iron, he cannot do as he pleases; confined in a stocks, he cannot teach others; in his painful labors, he does not remember rest; bound by his own sins, he does not enjoy any pleasure; and he does not plot to do any further evil, for he has sinned in every possible way, but with a heart torn apart, he mourns all his evil deeds and all the torments that await him, saying of them: “Yes, I deserve them.”

3. He who constantly ponders what his final end will be, and who sees the torments (which he deserves) for his sins, needs no great effort to refrain from condemning anyone in his heart; the anguish over (the expected) torments consumes his heart; this bitterness—alas! is the constant subject of his inner meditation; he does not encourage others not to lose heart; concern for food is not among his cares; he acknowledges the kindness of those who show him kindness, but because of his sorrow he finds no pleasure in it, for he has sinned in every way²⁴; He does not respond angrily to those who revile him, and he patiently endures painful labors, saying, “I am worthy of them”; the mocking laughter (Sirach 19:27) has departed from him; He bows his head in lamentation, recalling the judgment seat before which he must appear; when he hears the words of others, he does not say, “Good,” or “Bad”; whether they are good or bad, his ears do not accept them; his eyelids pour forth streams of tears because of the afflictions that overwhelm him. If he is of noble birth, he grieves all the more, recalling the shame he will face before those who are to see him condemned at the judgment. Keeping in mind the judgment prepared for him, he pays no attention to people, whether they are good or bad. If there are others connected to him, he pays them no attention, nor does he discuss with them what lies ahead; for each bears his own burden, dragged toward death. His face is gloomy. No one dares to speak in his defense, for fear of torture. He himself confesses what he has done and that he deserves to be judged for his sins.

4. How long must I remain intoxicated without wine? How long must I be carefree, with such a fate ahead of me? The hardening of my heart has dried up my eyes—and the intoxication of vain anxiety has dried up my head, and the passions of my heart have led me into oblivion until I am clouded. Physical need has bound me, and despair torments me, urging me to abandon the path of life. I have not gained a friend who would speak on my behalf, nor do I have a gift to send to my fellow citizens. News of my misdeeds prevents them from acknowledging me. If I ask them, they pay no attention to me, for they see that I have not yet been freed from my (moral) infirmities, and I do not ask them with an open heart (2 Cor. 6:11).

5. The thorns of my sins have not yet begun to pierce my heart unceasingly (i.e., the painful contrition over my sins has not yet come). The burden of my sins has not yet weighed heavily upon me (it does not overwhelm me with its weight; I do not feel the weight of my sins). I have not yet fully come to know the power of the fire as I ought; otherwise, I would strive not to fall into it. A voice is heard in my ears that hell lies before me, for in truth I have not yet purified my heart. The wounds on my body have become dangerous, but they have not yet become gangrenous enough to seek medical treatment. I hide the arrow wounds from people, and I cannot bear for a doctor to touch them. He offered to apply poultices (or compresses) to the wounds, but I am not strong of heart enough to endure their bitterness. The doctor is kind and asks no payment from me, but my laziness prevents me from going to him. He comes to me himself to treat me, and finds me eating things that corrode my wounds. He begs me to stop from now on (from eating such foods), but the sweetness of their taste beguiles my heart. When I eat, I repent, but my repentance is not sincere. He sends me (the doctor's) food (saying), "Eat this to get well," but my bad habit prevents me from accepting it. "In the end," I do not know what to do.

6. Weep with me, all my brothers who know me, that help may come to me beyond my own strength and prevail over me, so that I may become worthy to be His (my Lord's) disciple: for His power endures forever and ever. Amen.

15. On Renouncing the World

1. Beloved! Let us take care of ourselves, "for the time has been shortened" (1 Cor. 7:29). One cannot care for the soul while at the same time caring for the body. Just as one cannot look at the sky with one eye and at the earth with the other, so too the mind cannot care for both the things of God and the things of the world. It is shameful to care about anything that will not be of help to you when you leave this body.

2. Keep in mind that God is watching you in every deed you do. Keep in mind that God sees you in every thought you have.

3. What you are ashamed to do in front of others, be ashamed to even think of in secret (in your heart). Just as a tree is known by its fruit, so the mind, by its contemplation (by what its eye is fixed upon), knows its own thoughts, and the rational soul, by its contemplation (by what the mind attentively considers), knows itself.

4. Do not consider yourself dispassionate as long as sin entices you. To whom freedom (from passions) has been granted, it no longer occurs to them to do what is contrary to their nature. Do not, then, consider yourself free as long as you offend your Lord, for freedom does not come until your heart no longer desires anything of this world.

5. Take care of your body as the temple of God—take care of it as one who is to rise again and give an account to God; fear God as one who must give Him an account of all that you have done; just as, when your body receives a wound, you take care to heal it, so take care that it may appear dispassionate at the resurrection.

6. Examine yourself daily to see which passion you have overcome before you offer your petitions to God.

7. Just as the earth cannot bear fruit without seed and water, so a person cannot repent without humility and physical labor.

8. When the weather is favorable, seeds blossom; so too does a person blossom through the commandments when his mind is set on keeping them. This is what faith in God and the fear of God are—so as not to offend one's conscience.

9. If lustful desires arise within you while you are sitting in your cell, be careful to resist your thoughts so that they do not carry you away. Strive to keep in mind that God is watching you, and that everything you think in your heart is open before Him. Say to your soul: if you are ashamed before sinners like yourself (and strive) so that they do not see you sinning, how much more (should you fear sinning) before God, who hears the secrets of your heart. Through such reflection in your mind, the fear of God will be restored in your soul—and if you follow the fear of God, you will be steadfast against your passions and will no longer be overcome by them, as it is written: "Those who trust in the Lord are like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but abides forever in Jerusalem" (Ps. 124:1).

10. One who believes that there is a judgment when he departs from the body cannot judge his neighbor in any matter, since he must give an account to God for all his deeds, as it is written that we must appear "before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive what he has done while in the body, whether good or evil" (2 Cor. 5:10).

11. A believer who knows that there is a kingdom for the saints takes care to keep himself blameless even in small and insignificant matters, so that he may be a chosen vessel; for it is written: "The kingdom of heaven is like a net cast into the sea, which gathered fish of every kind. When it is full, they drag it ashore, sit down, and sort the good into containers, but throw the bad away" (Matt. 13:47–48).

12. A believer who holds that his body is to rise in its natural state on the day of the resurrection must take care of it and purify it from every defilement; for it is written: "Who will transform the body of our humiliation to be like His glorious body, according to the power that enables Him to do so" (Phil. 3: 21).

13. In whom the love of God has taken root, nothing in this world can separate him from God, as it is written: "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword?" (Rom. 8:35).

14. God is powerful enough to ensure that we, too, may be numbered among those who have not allowed anything in this world to separate them from the love of Christ, so that together with them we may receive grace through the power of our Lord, Jesus Christ; for to Him be glory, with the Father without beginning and the life-giving Spirit, now and always, and forever and ever. Amen.

16. On the Joy Found in the Soul That Desires to Serve God

1. First of all, I greet you in the fear of God, and I implore you: be perfect, as is pleasing to God, so that your labor may not be fruitless, and so that God may accept it whole and in joy from you. A merchant, if he makes a profit, rejoices, regarding the labor he has expended as nothing, because he has seen (how useful it has proved to be); a man who has taken a wife, if she brings him peace and serves him well, rejoices in her with all his heart, relying on her in everything; one who has entered military service, if, having fought for the king with contempt for his own life, he receives a crown, (rejoices) that he has such success. Such are the affairs of this passing world, and those who do them rejoice when they succeed in them. What, then, do you think, will be the joy of the soul of one who, having begun to work for God, successfully completes this work of his? Upon his departure from this world, such a work will cause the angels to rejoice with him, seeing that he has been freed from the powers of darkness. For when the soul departs from the body, the angels descend to meet it; but all the powers of darkness come out to meet it, desiring to seize it and searching to see if there is anything of theirs within it. Then it is not the angels who fight against them, but the deeds performed by the soul shield it like a wall and guard it from them, so that they may not touch it. When its deeds prevail, the angels, walking ahead of it, sing until it stands before God in joy. At that moment, it forgets every matter of this world and all its toil.

2. Let us therefore use our strength to work well during this brief time, keeping our deeds pure from all evil, so that we may be saved from the hands of the princes of darkness who seek to confront us, for they are evil and merciless. Blessed is the one in whom nothing of theirs is found: there is no measure to that person's joy and gladness, rest, and crown. But all worldly things are fleeting, whether one is engaged in trade, or in marriage, or in anything else I have mentioned before. Beloved brother! Let us draw our strength from our tears before God; perhaps His goodness will have mercy on us and send us the power to overcome, through the good deeds we do, the rulers of wickedness who are set to confront us (upon our departure from the body).

3. Let us take care of ourselves with a strong heart (without self-pity) and cultivate a longing for God, which will save us from the hands of malice when it comes out to meet us. Let us love the poor, so that this may save us from the (spirit of) greed when it comes out to meet us. Let us love peace with everyone, both small and great, for it will preserve us from the (spirit of) hatred when it comes to meet us. Let us love everyone as our brothers, harboring no ill will in our hearts toward anyone, and repaying no one evil for evil; this will deliver us from envy when it comes upon us. Let us love humility in all things, bearing with our neighbor's words, whether he rebukes us or slanders us: this will protect us from pride when it comes upon us. Let us seek the honor of our neighbor, not allowing him to be belittled in our estimation when he is slandered, whoever he may be: this will protect us from slander when it comes our way. Let us despise the benefits of the world and its honor, so that we may be freed from envy when it comes our way. Let us train our tongues in God's teaching, truth, and prayer, so that this may protect us from lies when they come to meet us. Let us purify our hearts and bodies from lust, so that we may be rid of impurity when it comes to meet us. — All these things seek to seize the soul when it departs from the body, but virtues will aid it if it has acquired them.

4. Who among the wise would not be willing to give up his soul to death in order to be freed from all this? Therefore, let us do what we can, for the power of our Lord Jesus Christ is great to aid our humility. He knows that man is a poor creature, and has granted him repentance while he is still in the body, until his last breath. Let your one thought be toward God, that He may preserve you. Do not pay attention to the goods of this world, as if you could place your hope in them—so that you may be saved. You will leave behind everything that belongs to this world and depart; whatever you do for God, in that you will find a good hope in the hour of need.

5. Abhor the words of the world, that your heart may behold God. Love to pray often, that your heart may be enlightened. Do not love idleness, lest you regret it when you join the righteous in the resurrection. Guard your tongue, that your heart may be enlightened. Do not love idleness, and the fear of God will dwell within you. Give now to the needy with a generous eye, lest you be put to shame before the saints and their good deeds. Abhor the lust for food, lest Amalek block your path. Do not rush through your devotions (prayer rules), lest the beasts devour you. Do not love wine to the point of intoxication, lest you be deprived of God's joy. Love the faithful, that through them you may receive mercy. Love the saints, that their zeal may lift you up.

6. Remember the kingdom of heaven, so that the longing for it may gradually draw you in. Meditate on Gehenna, so that you may hate its deeds. When you wake up each morning, remember that you will give an account to God for every deed, and you will not sin before Him, and the fear of Him will take root in you. Prepare yourself to meet Him, and you will fulfill His will. Examine yourself here every day to see where you fall short, and you will not be at a loss in the hour of mortal need. Let your brothers see your deeds, and your zeal will lead them to repentance. Examine yourself every day to see which passion you have overcome—yet do not think too highly of yourself, for it is God's grace and power. – Do not consider yourself faithful until your very last breath. – Do not be presumptuous, as if you were good, for you cannot entrust yourself to your enemies. – Do not rely on yourself while you are in this life—and until you have passed beyond all the powers of darkness.

7. Be vigilant, brother, against the spirit that brings sorrow to a person, for it has many snares until it renders you powerless. Sorrow for God's sake is joyful when you see yourself standing in God's will. Who, then, tells you, "Where should you flee?" You have no repentance; he is from the enemy's side (and speaks thus) to persuade a person to abandon the intention of leading a life of abstinence. But sorrow for God does not weigh down a person (with an oppressive burden), but says to him: "Do not be afraid; come back (to God)," for He knows that a person is weak, and He gives him strength.

8. Have a discerning heart; when thoughts arise—they will be lightened for you. Those who fear them are weighed down by their heaviness. One who fears (the enemy's) influences reveals that he has no faith in God.

9. Humility and regarding oneself as ignorant reveal a person who does not indulge his passions to do their will, but does the will of God. But the one who desires to speak his mind in the presence of many reveals that the fear of God is not within him. The fear of God is a guardian and helper for the soul, a protector of the inner ruler (the mind), in the work of destroying all its enemies.

10. He who seeks God's honor strives to drive away impurity from himself. Prudent self-care cuts off the passions, for it is written: "Prudence will be found by the wise man" (Prov. 17:12). "Care falls upon the wise man, but fools devise evil." The sick person comes to appreciate the value of health. The one who is crowned is crowned because he has defeated the king's enemies. There are passions, and there are virtues. But if we are despondent (lazy), then it is clear that we are like traitors. Courage of heart is a help to the soul, after God; just as despondency (sloth) is a help to evil. The strength of those who desire to acquire virtues lies in this: that if they fall, they should not lose heart, but once again take up the care (of salvation). The instruments of virtue are bodily labors performed with reason. The outbursts of passions arise from negligence. Not condemning one's neighbor is a wall (a barrier) for those who wage battle wisely, while condemning him tears down this wall in folly. Care for one's speech makes it clear that a person is among the active, while unbridled speech signifies that he lacks virtue within himself. Almsgiving, when done with reason, gives rise to contempt for wealth and leads to love, while stinginess indicates that a person lacks virtue. Kindness gives rise to purity; indulgence (spending on entertainment and pleasures) gives rise to passions, and cruelty gives rise to anger. To hate frivolity is a spiritual feat, while frugality is a physical one. A love of frivolity is the downfall of the soul, while silence accompanied by reason is its restoration. Excessive sleep stirs up the passions in the body, while moderate wakefulness is the salvation of the heart. Excessive sleep dulls the heart, while moderation in wakefulness refines it. It is better to sleep in silence with reason than to stay awake in idle chatter. Weeping drives out all evils (kakias) without anxiety. Sparing (not harming, not wounding) the conscience of one's neighbor gives rise to humility. Human glory gradually gives rise to pride.

A love of spaciousness (not restricting oneself with privations) drives out knowledge, while abstinence from the belly subdues the passions. A craving for food stirs them up without effort. Adornment of the body is the ruin of the soul, but caring for it in the fear of God is good.

11. Attention to God's judgment gives rise to fear in the soul, while trampling on one's conscience uproots virtues from the heart. Love for God drives away indolence, while fearlessness stirs it up. Restraining one's speech directs the mind toward God, if one remains silent with wisdom, while loquacity breeds despondency (sloth) and madness (mania). Yielding one's will to one's neighbor signifies that the mind is focused on virtues, while insisting on one's own will (in dealings) with one's neighbor reveals ignorance. Instruction in the fear of God preserves the soul from passions, while speaking worldly words darkens the soul, turning it away from virtues. Love of possessions disturbs the mind and the soul, while renunciation of all things renews them. Silence—if you remain silent so as not to express your thoughts—shows that you seek the honor of the world and its shameful glory; but whoever boldly (without sparing himself) expresses his thoughts before his fathers drives them away from himself.

12. Just as a house without doors or windows, into which any creeping creature may enter freely, so is a man who labors but does not preserve the fruit of his labor. Just as rust corrodes iron, so does human honor corrode the heart if it gives in to it. Just as ivy, entwined with the vine, destroys its fruit, so does vanity destroy a monk's labor if he becomes carried away by it. Above all virtues stands humility, and above all passions stands gluttony. The end of virtues is love, and the end of passions is self-justification. Just as a worm, gnawing away at a tree, destroys it, so malice in the heart darkens the soul.

13. The soul's submission to God (surrendering oneself to God's will) gives rise to the unperturbed endurance of insults, and its tears are (then) preserved from all that is human. Failure to discipline oneself also results in an inability to endure (or subdue) anger. Mixing one's speech with that of laypeople (conversing with them in a worldly manner) disturbs the heart and shames it during prayer, for afterward it lacks boldness. Love for worldly gains darkens the soul, while contempt for them in all things brings knowledge. Love for labor is hatred of passions, while laziness gives rise to them without effort.

14. Do not associate with the city's inhabitants—and your thoughts will remain silent within you. Do not rely on your own strength—and God's help will come to you. Do not harbor enmity toward anyone, or your prayer will not be accepted. Be at peace with everyone, so that you may have boldness in prayer. Guard your eyes—and your heart will not see evil. He who looks at anyone with lust commits adultery. Do not desire to hear of the harm suffered by the one who has offended you, lest you repay him in your heart (evil for evil). Guard your ears, lest you gather insults through them. Labor at your craft, so that the poor may find bread (from you), for idleness is death and the downfall of the soul.

15. Diligent prayer frees one from bondage (addiction to anything), but neglect of it, even if slight, is the mother of forgetfulness. One who expects death soon does not sin much, but one who expects it many years from now will become entangled in many sins. Whoever prepares to give an account to God for all his deeds, God Himself takes care to purify his entire path from every sin; but whoever is negligent about this, saying, "I will get there someday," is a neighbor of the evil one. – Before doing anything, every day, remember where you are and where you must go once you have left your body—and do not neglect your soul for a single day. Reflect on the glory the saints have received, and emulating them will gradually draw you along in their footsteps; reflect also on the humiliations the sinners have endured—and this will always protect you from evil.

16. Always follow the counsel of your fathers, and you will spend your entire life in peace. Be mindful of yourself—and if a thought troubles you because your brother is grieving over you, do not despise that thought, but go and bow before your brother with a pleading voice, and do not withdraw until you have convinced him to be reconciled. Be careful not to be hard-hearted toward your brother, (remembering that) we are afflicted by the enemy. When you live with your brothers, do not order them alone to do anything, but work alongside them, so as not to forfeit your reward. When demons begin to trouble you regarding food, clothing, or widespread poverty (among all), suggesting to you how you are reviled for this, do not answer them in opposition to this, but entrust yourself to God with all your heart—and He will comfort you. Take care not to neglect the proper performance of your services (prayers), for they bring enlightenment to the soul.

17. If you have done something good, do not boast about it; (but on the other hand, if you have done much evil, let not your heart grieve over it beyond measure, but take control of your heart so that it no longer dwells on it)—and you will guard yourself against pride, if you are wise. If you suffer attacks of lust, keep your body constantly in sorrow and humility before God, not allowing your heart to be convinced that your sins have been forgiven—and you will find peace. If envy begins to crush you, remember that we are all members of Christ, and that the honor and disgrace of your neighbor are (the honor and disgrace) of all of us,—and you will find peace. If gluttony has waged war against you with a craving for food, then remember their foul odor—and you will find peace. If you are troubled by the urge to condemn your brother, remember that he will be grieved if he hears it—and you will be ashamed to meet him afterward—and you will find peace. If pride begins to overwhelm you, remember that it destroys all your labor, and that there is no repentance for those who have allied themselves with it—and you will find peace. If your heart is torn by the desire to humiliate your neighbor, remember that for this God will deliver you into the hands of your enemies—and you will find peace. If physical beauty entices your heart, remember its stench—and you will find peace. If the sweetness of women is the sweetest thing to you, remember those who have already died and where they have gone—and you will find peace.

18. By gathering and pondering all these things, reason destroys (strife). But you cannot attain reason unless you first cultivate silence (withdrawal from the noise of the world) as a foundation for it. Silence gives birth to asceticism; asceticism gives birth to weeping; weeping gives birth to the fear of God; the fear of God gives birth to humility; humility gives birth to insight; insight gives birth to love; love makes the soul free from pain and dispassion. Then a person comes to know how far he is from God.

19. After all this, let the one who desires to attain all these praiseworthy virtues be unconcerned about any person, and let him prepare himself for death. And it will be that in every prayer he will begin to understand what separates him from God, and he will begin to destroy it, hating every such way of life (i.e., one that separates him from God), and God's goodness will soon grant him these (specified virtues).

20. Know this, however: anyone who eats and drinks indiscriminately and loves anything of this world will not attain these virtues, nor will he achieve them, but will only deceive himself. I therefore implore every person who desires to repent before God to guard against gluttony, for it renews all passions and drives the fear of God from the soul. On the contrary, strive with all your might to implore God to send you His fear, so that, through your strong desire for God (communion with Him), He may destroy within you all the passions that oppose your poor soul and seek to separate it from God in order to make it their own. The enemies, too, exert every effort toward this end, opposing man.

21. Therefore, brother, do not pay attention to any respite (from the struggle) while you are in this body, and do not trust yourself if you find yourself temporarily free from passions, for they sometimes subside for a time with a deceitful hope that perhaps a person will let his heart grow lax, thinking that he has completely rid himself of them; and then suddenly pounce upon the poor soul and snatch it away like a little bird; and if they prove to be more powerful than it in every sin, they humble it without mercy, plunging it into sins more destructive than the previous ones, for the forgiveness of which it had already prayed.

22. Let us therefore stand in the fear of God and keep Him in mind as we go about our business, observing all the virtues that ward off the malice of our enemies. The labors and efforts of this brief time not only preserve us from all evil, but (they also) prepare crowns for the soul before it departs from the body.

23. Our Holy Teacher, the Lord Jesus, knowing the great cruelty of our enemies and having compassion on the human race, commanded us to be steadfast in heart, saying: "Be ready at all times, for you do not know at what hour the thief will come, so that when he comes suddenly, he may not find you sleeping" (Matt. 24, 43, 44). And on another occasion, teaching His disciples, He commanded them, saying: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be weighed down with gluttony, drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly" (Luke 21:34). Knowing, however, that the evil ones (spirits) far outnumber us, and showing His disciples that the power to resist them is His work—and that they therefore have nothing to fear—He said to them: "I am sending you out like sheep among wolves" (Matt. 10:16), but at the same time He commanded them not to take anything for the journey (Luke 9:3), for since they possessed nothing that belonged to those wolves, the wolves could not devour them. When they returned safe and sound, having kept His commandment, He rejoiced with them, giving thanks to God the Father for them, and, strengthening their hearts, He said to them: "I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven. I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions and over all the power of the enemy; nothing will harm you" (Luke 10:18–19). Thus, His message was one of fear and caution; but when they fulfilled His commandment, He gave them authority with power.

24. These words apply not only to them but also to all who keep the commandments. Loving them with perfect love, He said to them: “Do not be afraid, little flock, for it has pleased your Father to give you the kingdom. Sell your possessions and give alms; make for yourselves purses that do not wear out, a treasure in heaven that never fails” (Luke 12:32–33). And when they had fulfilled this word as well, He said to them: “Peace I leave with you; My peace I give to you” (John 14:27). Assuring them of this, He said: “If anyone loves Me, he will keep My word; and My Father will love him, and We will come to him and make Our home with him” (John 14:23). Encouraging them not to fear the world, He said to them: “In the world you will have tribulation, but take heart; I have overcome the world” (John 16:33). Strengthening them so they would not lose heart in their tribulations, He said to them, filling their hearts with joy: “You have stood by Me in My trials; and I bestow upon you, just as My Father has bestowed upon Me, a kingdom, so that you may eat and drink at My table in My kingdom” (Luke 22:28–30).

25. He said this—not to everyone, but to those who had endured His trials. But who are those who have endured Jesus’ trials, if not those who stand against their passions until they have cut them off? He said this to them as He was going to the cross. Therefore, whoever wishes to eat and drink at His table must follow Him to this cross: for the cross of Jesus is the subduing of every passion until they are all cut off. And the beloved Apostle, having cut them off, dared to say: “I have been crucified with Christ. I no longer live, but Christ lives in me” (Gal. 2: 19–20). Thus, Christ lives in those who have put the passions to death. Therefore, in teaching his children, this same Apostle said: “Those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires” (Gal. 5: 24). And writing to Timothy, his spiritual son, He said: “If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him; if we endure, we shall also reign with Him; if we deny Him, He also will deny us” (2 Tim. 2: 11–12).

26. Who, then, are these who reject Him, if not those who follow their carnal desires and thereby bring shame upon Holy Baptism? In His name, our sins are forgiven, but the enemy, out of envy, enslaves us again through sin. That is why our Lord Jesus Christ, knowing from the beginning how great the enemy’s malice is, has provided us with repentance until our very last breath. If there were no repentance, scarcely anyone would be saved. And the Apostle, knowing that there are those who sin even after baptism, said: “Let the thief no longer steal” (Eph. 4:28).

27. Therefore, having the seal of Holy Baptism upon us, let us strive to forsake our sins, that we may find mercy on that day. For the Lord is near and is coming, seated on the throne of His glory. And all the tribes will gather before Him. Then each one will be revealed (for what he is) by his own lamp, held in his hand. Whose lamp has no oil, his lamp will go out, and he will be cast into darkness; but whoever has a bright lamp will enter the kingdom together with the Lord.

28. Let us therefore strive, beloved, to fill our vessels with oil while we are still in the body, so that our lamp may shine and we may enter the kingdom of the Lord. The vessel is repentance; the oil within it is the practice of all virtues; and the shining lamp is the holy soul. Therefore, whatever soul becomes radiant through its deeds will enter the kingdom together with the Lord, but whatever soul is darkened by its own malice will go into darkness.

29. Strive, then, brothers, for our time is near. Blessed is the one who cares about this. The fruit is ripe, and the time of harvest has come. Blessed is the one who has preserved his fruit, for the angels will gather it into the eternal storehouse. But woe to those who are tares, for fire awaits them.

30. The inheritance of this world is gold and silver, houses and clothing. They only lead us into sin; when we depart from here, we leave them behind. But God’s inheritance is immeasurable—something no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and no human heart has conceived. And it is this that the Lord has granted to those who obey Him in this brief time, and to those who receive it in return for the bread, water, and clothing they provided to the needy—for their love of humanity and purity of body, for doing no harm to their neighbor, for a heart free from malice, and for keeping the other commandments.

31. Those who observe these things—and in this life have peace and are honored by people—will receive eternal joy when they depart from this body. But those who act on their sinful desires and do not repent, but instead satisfy their evil inclinations through sensual pleasures and self-deception—through loquacity and idle chatter, quarrelsomeness and contentiousness, unkindness toward the poor while fearing not God’s judgment, and other sins—such people will be filled with shame in this age, and people will despise them; and when they depart from the body, shame and disgrace will accompany them into Gehenna.

32. But God is able to enable us to succeed in His works, keeping us from every evil deed, so that we may be saved in the hour of trial that is to come upon the whole world. For our Lord Jesus will not delay, but will come, bringing with Him the reward, and He will send the wicked into eternal fire, and give His own their reward. And they will enter with Him into His kingdom—and rest in Him forever and ever. Amen.

17. On the Thoughts Accompanying Renunciation of the World and Pilgrimage

1. The first and foremost feat is wandering, especially when, having withdrawn into solitude, you leave behind your own (your home, family, homeland—Ed.) and go to another place, carrying perfect faith, hope, and a steadfast heart against your own desires. For then (enemies) will surround you on all sides, and they will begin to terrify you with temptations, severe poverty, and illnesses, suggesting that if you succumb to them, what will you do, having no one to care for you or even know you? This is God’s goodness testing you, so that your zeal and love for God may be revealed.

2. If you finally resolve to live in solitude in a cell, then (your enemies) will begin to instill in you even more distressing thoughts of fear, saying: “It is not mere wandering that saves a person, but the fulfillment of the commandments”; they will also remind you of certain relatives (by blood) and say: “Well then? Aren’t these people servants of God?” They will also plant in your heart thoughts about the poor air quality (in that place) and the physical hardships, until your heart grows weary from faintheartedness. But if love and hope remain inseparable in your heart, then the malice of those (who instill such thoughts) will do you no harm. Thus your devotion to God will be revealed, as well as the fact that you love Him more than the comfort of your own body.

3. For those who endure the sorrow of exile (life in a foreign land), sorrow leads to hope, and hope preserves them from those (temptations) that are of the flesh. For you have not merely gone into a foreign land, but to prepare yourself to take up the struggle against your enemies and to learn to repel each one in due time, until, having attained the peace of dispassion, you are freed (from them), having defeated each one in battle in due time.

4. I believe it is both a great and noble thing to overcome vanity and to succeed in the knowledge of God. He who falls into the shame of this deceitful passion of vanity becomes estranged from the world and hardens his heart toward the saints; and in the end, through his own evils, he will fall into wicked pride and into the habit of lying (in word, and even more so through hypocrisy). But you, faithful servant, keep your labors hidden, and with heartfelt sorrow as you restrain your tongue, take care that your tongue does not steal them away or betray them to your enemies. Whoever is a worker (a laborer in God’s work), having cast aside fleshly passions and all his sins through repentance, makes his soul pure before God, preparing it for Him as a spotless offering, so that he may be deemed worthy to be His temple. But whoever loves human glory cannot be dispassionate; rather, jealousy and envy dwell within him. Such a person has exposed his soul to many temptations, and his heart is hardened by demons, because he rarely finds an opportunity to satisfy his desires. His end, however, is ruin.

5. To those who have acquired humility, God reveals their sins so that they may acknowledge them (confess them and repent). If this is then accompanied by weeping, and both of these—the acknowledgment of sins and weeping—abide within him, they will drive the demons from his soul and nourish it with their own glory and their holy virtues (the virtues that are inherent in them and those born of them). Such a person has no concern for human reproach. His own sins, which he remembers (unceasingly), serve as a shield for him, protecting him from anger and vengeance, and he patiently endures whatever befalls him. For what reproach can touch him (and wound his heart) when he considers himself so shameful before God, holding his sins before his face?

6. If you cannot bear the words of your neighbor and take revenge on him, then strife will arise in your heart, causing pain to your heart because of what you have heard and forcing you to grieve over what you yourself have said. And you will be tormented by this captivity (to this passion), forcing you to seek solace in silence and solitude, and hardening your heart toward your neighbors as though they lacked love. But take up the task of cultivating long-suffering, and it will overcome anger; love will heal the insult, and prayer to God will preserve these virtues within you. Love and long-suffering destroy natural anger, and if they abide in you, then instead of being angry with your neighbor, you will be angry with the demons, and toward your neighbor you will be peaceful, possessing within yourself sorrow and humility.

7. He who is able to endure the harsh words of a rude and foolish person, for God's sake and for the sake of peace of mind—he shall be called a son of peace. Such a one is strong enough to always preserve the peace of soul, body, and spirit. In whom these three come into harmony with one another, in whom the thoughts that rise up against the law of the mind cease, and the bondage of the flesh is abolished—that person will be called a son of peace, and the Holy Spirit will dwell within him; for He has made him His own, and will not depart from him.

8. Blessed are those whose labors are wisely ordered, for in this way they have freed themselves from every burden and have avoided the cunning of the demons, especially the demons of fear, who set up obstacles for a person in every good deed he undertakes, plunging the mind into sloth when he devotes himself to unceasing attention to God, in order to somehow divert him from this path of labor. But I believe that if we possess love, patience, and self-restraint, they (the enemies) will not succeed in this in the least, especially if the mind, realizing that laziness corrupts everything, despises it.

9. If you have renounced all visible things, then guard yourself against the demon of sorrow, lest, because of scarcity (in all things) and the misery of life, you be deprived of the opportunity to excel in the great virtues, which are: self-effacement (regarding oneself as nothing), endurance of insults, and a refusal of fame in any worldly regard. If you strive to acquire such dispositions, they will prepare crowns for your soul. It is not only those beggars who, having renounced everything, have become destitute in the visible sense, but those who have become destitute of every evil and always hunger for the remembrance of God. And it is not those who endure visible suffering who attain dispassion, but those who care for the inner person and cut off their own desires: these will receive the crown of virtues.

10. Watch over your heart, paying attention to your feelings. And if the remembrance of God dwells peacefully within you, you will see the thieves who seek to rob it. By paying close attention to your thoughts, you will recognize those who wish to enter and defile it.

11. If you care for the commandments with a fervent heart, you will understand in what ways those who stir up rebellion (in your thoughts) disturb you, instilling a lack of courage to choose another place that offers nothing in itself (as to why it should be chosen), and (in case of a poor choice) suggesting: "If we repent, we will settle here again." They disturb the mind so that it wanders (flitting here and there like a meteor) and remains idle. But those who have recognized their malice remain unperturbed, giving thanks to the Lord for the place in which He has granted them to spend their days in patience. For patience, courage, and love are rewarded for toil and effort, while laziness, timidity, and a love of ease seek a place where they can be glorified. And it happens to them that, because of the glory they receive from many, their senses become weak; as a result, they are oppressed by the bondage of passions and lose the inner teaching due to a scattered mind and contentment with everything.

12. The saint also said: if the mind, before the senses have recovered from their weakness (from the sickness of the passions), desires to ascend the cross, then God's wrath will come upon it for having undertaken a task beyond its strength—without first healing its own senses.

13. If your heart is wandering, and you do not know how to tame it, then (know that) your conduct is such that, whether you want it or not, it draws your heart into wandering. This is the unnaturalness of Adam.

14. If your heart, with its whole being, has come to hate sin and has turned away from that which gives rise to it, and you, having set before yourself (eternal) torment with a clear mind, have turned away from everything that leads to it (sin), and pray with your mind to your Creator, that He may abide with you, grieving Him in no way, but weeping before Him and saying, "It is the work of Your mercy to deliver me, for without Your help I have no strength to escape from their hands (my enemies)," —and (at the same time) be mindful in your heart not to grieve even the one who instructs you in accordance with God; for this is in accordance with the nature of Jesus. For even if a person accomplishes everything, yet fails to attain obedience, humility, and patience, he strays into that which is contrary to nature. But commit your whole heart to obedience to God, praying to Him in truth and saying: "Lord! I stand before You; grant me (knowledge of) Your will, for I myself do not know what is good for me. Overcome (my enemies), for I do not understand their wicked schemes." And if you do what is in accordance with the nature of Jesus, He will not allow you to go astray in anything. But if you keep only one commandment without surrendering yourself entirely to Him in obedience, He will not care for you in the least.

15. Just as a field does not resist its cultivator when he clears it of weeds and sows true seeds in it, so should you be toward the Lord. And just as natural seeds cannot grow alongside unnatural ones, being choked by them—for the weeds are their shameless rivals—so if you do not purify yourself of carnal desires, you cannot keep yourself from sin.

16. (You cannot protect yourself from sin) unless you first protect yourself from that which gives rise to it. And this is what it is: cowardice is the evil mother of sin; despondency (sloth) gives birth to the will (one's own); one's own will and expansiveness (that which tolerates no restrictions or constraints, loves to expand) give birth to contempt (for all that is proper—"Well, I'll just do this"); a heart that desires to rule (having come to love expansiveness) gives rise to a love of worldly conversations, gives rise to the desire to seek what is unbecoming and unhelpful to you, gives rise to lending an ear to one who condemns (a brother), gives rise to the habit of listening to the words (one person) and passing them on to another; it gives rise to the pursuit of what belongs to this world; it gives rise to the desire to teach when not asked; it gives rise to the desire to sting one's neighbor; it gives rise to many other evils as well. Therefore, whoever has succeeded or desires to succeed should guard himself wisely against everything that gives rise to sins, and the sins themselves will subside.

17. The one who strives sees them (sins) and their bitterness, but the one who is careless (about salvation) prepares hell for himself. The one who fears the weariness of the body (from striving) will not attain the state that is natural, but if he clings to God in all his labor, then God is powerful enough to comfort him. If Gideon had not crushed the water carriers (Judg. 7: 19), he would not have seen the light of the lamps: so, if a person does not despise his own body, he will not see the light of the Divine. Likewise, Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, if she had not pulled out the tent peg, would not have crushed the pride of Sisera (Judg. 4:21).

18. When the mind gains strength and prepares itself to follow the love that extinguishes all passions of the flesh and the body (for it is patient, kind, hates envy and pride, conceives nothing in its heart that is beneath nature, and does not allow anything unnatural to take hold of the mind), then it uses this power to combat unnaturalness until it completely separates it from what is natural. When, in this way, the mind assumes dominion, it becomes the head of the soul, (and teaches it) not to accept anything that is unnatural, revealing to it all the injustices that the unnatural has inflicted upon it throughout the time it was mingled with the natural.

19. Our Lord Jesus, when He bestowed mercy upon His saints (and accomplished the building of salvation), separated the thieves on the cross. Two were crucified, and He was in the midst of them. The one on the left was indignant, seeing that his impure friendship with the one on the right would be severed. But the one on the right turned to Jesus and, with humility and fear, said, "Remember me when You come into Your kingdom" (Luke 23:42).

20. From this it is clear that they are no longer the same, and the one on the left cannot sway the one on the right to his side with his deceitful suggestions. But those who have not yet reached this stage of the path fall and rise again until God's mercy comes upon them, and they cannot be saved unless this mercy comes upon them. Therefore, one must strive with fear and humility to attain the state of mind of the one on the right. Humility will give one the strength to endure humiliation.

21. When someone separates himself from the evil one, then he will truly recognize all his sins, which he has committed before God; for he does not see his sins unless he separates himself from them with bitter separation (with a sorrowful heart). But those who have attained this measure have found weeping and prayer, and the ability to be ashamed before God, remembering their wicked association with the passions. God is powerful to strengthen those who labor in secret with humility. To Him be honor and glory, forever and ever. Amen.

18. On Forgiveness

1. The Most Holy Apostle commanded his children: "The Lord is near. Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God" (Phil. 4:5–6); "and let the peace of God rule in your hearts" (Col. 3: 15). And (the Lord) says to His disciples in the Gospel of Mark: "Forgive your debtors all their sins, so that your Father may also forgive your sins" (Mark 11: 25, Matt. 6: 14). This word of the Lord is awesome: (according to it) if you see that your heart is not pure toward everyone, then do not ask anything of God, because you bring offense to Him when, being sinful and harboring resentment toward a fellow human being, you say to the One who searches the hearts: "Forgive me my sins" (as I forgive). Such a person does not pray with the mind, but only with the lips, in ignorance. For whoever truly desires to pray to God with the mind, in the Holy Spirit, with a pure heart, examines his own heart before he begins to pray, to see whether it is free from worry toward every person or not. And if it is not (at peace), then he deceives himself (in prayer), for there is no one to hear him (praying). Then your mind is not praying, but the established hours are merely being observed out of habit.

2. Therefore, desiring to perform the act of prayer with purity, first examine your mind to see what is within it, so that when you say, “Have mercy on me,” you yourself may have mercy on the one who asks of you; when you say, “Forgive me,” you yourself, though poor, may forgive; —when you say, “Do not remember my transgressions,” and you yourself have not remembered the sins of your neighbor—when you say, “Do not remember the evils I have committed, willingly or unwillingly,” and you yourself have not remembered (them on the part of your neighbor). If this is what is required, then you must not even think ill of any person. If you have not reached the point of doing so, then your prayer is in vain: God will not hear you, according to all the Scriptures—forgive me.

3. The Lord also said in the Gospel of Matthew, in prayer: “And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors” (Matt. 6:12). And in the Gospel of Luke He said: “If you forgive others their sins, your heavenly Father will also forgive you (your sins)” (Matt. 6:14. In St. Luke’s Gospel it reads: “Forgive, and you will be forgiven”—Luke 6:37). (As it were): I have given you all my love so that whatever you desire for yourself from God, you may first do that yourself (for your neighbor), and then you will be freed (from sins) to the extent that you have succeeded in doing the same toward others. If you have purified your heart toward every (rational) creature of God, so as not to hold a grudge against anyone, then you must keep this: for God is truth, and not merely the words of the tongue. Thus, every person binds himself to Gehenna and frees himself from it. There is nothing more powerful than the will, whether it strives toward death or toward life.

4. Blessed are those who have loved eternal life, when they do not stumble. Therefore, you must strive with toil and sweat, secretly in your heart, against the thought that torments you (feelings of offense), so as not to allow its arrow to wound your heart. But it will be difficult for you to heal it if you do not always keep your sins before your eyes. When you hear that someone has done you some wrong, counter it with your own good intention—not to retaliate in your heart, not to revile him, not to condemn him, and not to make it public by putting it on everyone’s lips—and think afterward: there is nothing evil in me. If you have fear of Gehenna, it will overcome the evil (thoughts) within you that urge you to retaliate against your neighbor, telling you: “Wretched one! You pray for your sins, and God has borne with you until this day, not revealing them (to everyone); yet you, in your anger toward your neighbor, cast him into the mouths of all. Is it not clear that you are not repentant of your sins, when you have no forbearance (toward your neighbor) in your heart?”

5. Therefore, if your heart softens and you guard yourself against all malice (toward your brother), you will receive mercy from God. But if your heart remains deceitful and harsh toward your neighbor, then (know that) your remembrance has not yet come before the face of God (you do not remember God). Forgive me; I am poor and humbled by my sins, and as I write this, I cover my face with shame in my heart.

6. If a person does not attain the state of the Son of God by nature, all his labors are in vain. A farmer, sowing his seeds, hopes to reap them in far greater abundance, but if a destructive wind should arise, there is unceasing sorrow in his heart, for both the seeds and the labor of tilling the land have been lost in vain. St. Peter the Apostle, crucified in Rome, asked to be hung upside down, thereby symbolizing the unnaturalness that has taken hold of every human being. He (through this) said (as it were) that every baptized person is obligated to crucify the evil unnaturalness that befell Adam and cast him down from his glory into evil reproach and eternal shame. Therefore, the mind must strive courageously to hate everything visible to man (as unnatural to him) and to wage war against it with the bitterest hatred until the end.

7. These are the principal (passions, unnatural to man) that have taken hold of all the sons of Adam: gain, honor, peace, pride in what one leaves behind (in the end), the adornment of the body so that it may be clean and well-presented, and the pursuit of fine clothing.

8. All of this nourishes the lustful sweetness that the serpent placed in Eve’s mouth, from which we also know that we are the sons of Adam—from these evil thoughts that have made us enemies of God.

9. Therefore, blessed is he who has been crucified, died, been buried, and risen in renewal, when he sees himself as being of the nature of Jesus and following in His holy footsteps, by which He walked while He was a man (on earth), for the sake of His holy servants. His characteristics are: humility, poverty, destitution, non-covetousness, forgiveness, peace, endurance of insults, disregard for the body, and fearlessness in the face of slander from the malicious; but the greatest of all is the foreknowledge of all events and long-suffering toward people in meekness. Whoever has attained this and has cast out all that is unnatural within himself clearly shows that he is of Christ, the Son of God, and is a brother of Jesus, to whom be glory and worship forever and ever. Amen.

19. On Passions

1. It is fitting for me, too, to say with the Prophet Isaiah: "I have endured as a woman in labor" (until) "I dry them up and destroy them" (all of them) "together" (Isa. 42:14). If you realize that the fountain of the Holy Spirit is flowing within you, this is a sign that they have dried up and perished (who? the passions), just as our Savior said that "the kingdom of God is not here or there," but is "within you" (Luke 17:21). There are some who speak of the works of the kingdom but do not perform them; there are others who perform the works of the kingdom but not with vigilance (attention) and understanding; in whom, however, the Savior's word has been fulfilled—that it "is within you"—such people are few: they are rare and hard to find. Upon such people the Holy Spirit of God has descended, and the word of the Evangelist John has been fulfilled in them: "To those who believe in His name, He gave the right to become children of God—who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of a man, but of God" (John 1: 12–13). These have been delivered from the sorrow that befell Eve: "In pain you shall bring forth children" (Gen. 3:16). These have been delivered from the bitter judgment that fell upon Adam: "Cursed is the ground because of you" (Gen. 3:17). These are the ones who have received the joy that Mary received: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you" (Luke 1:35). Just as sorrow befell Eve and (befalls) all her offspring even to this day, so again joy has embraced Mary and (embraces) her offspring even to this day. And just as we were once children of Eve and experienced her curse as being upon us through our dishonorable thoughts, so again we must recognize that we are born of God through the thoughts of the Holy Spirit and through the sufferings of Christ, if indeed they are present in our bodies; for it is written in the Epistle: "Examine yourselves to see whether Christ is in you—unless, of course, you are unqualified" (2 Cor. 13:5).

2. Thus, when we bore the image of the earthly one, we knew that we were his sons, born of the dishonorable substance of his thoughts dwelling within us, which are the passions. But those who have clothed themselves with the image of the Heavenly One know that they are His sons through the Holy Spirit dwelling within them. Thus Isaiah cried out, saying: "For the sake of Your fear, O Lord, we conceived in the womb, and we labored, and we gave birth to the Spirit of salvation, by whom we are conceived on earth" (Isa. 26:1–8); and it is also written in Ecclesiastes: "Just as the bones are in the womb of the one who gives birth, so is the way of the Spirit" (Eccl. 11:5). For just as the Holy Virgin bore Him in the flesh, so those who have received the grace of the Holy Spirit bear Him in their hearts, according to the words of the Apostle, who says: "May the heavenly Father grant you to be strengthened by His Spirit in your inner being, to have Christ dwell in your hearts through faith, to be rooted and grounded in love, so that you may be able to present yourselves with all the saints" (Eph. 3: 16–18); and again: "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, so that the surpassing power may be of God and not from us" (2 Cor. 4:7),

3. Therefore, if you have reached the point described by the following words: "We are being transformed from glory to glory in the same way" (2 Cor. 3: 18), and the Apostle's words have been fulfilled in you, which say: "Let the peace of God rule in your hearts" (Col. 3: 15)—and: *"If Christ is in you"*²⁵, "the flesh is dead because of sin" (Rom. 8: 10); if you have reached the point where the following word also applies to you: "the light of the knowledge of God has shone in your hearts out of darkness" (2 Cor. 4:6)—and the word has been fulfilled in you: "Let your loins be girded and your lamps burning; and be like men who are waiting for their master to return from the wedding feast" (Luke 12:35–36), so that your mouth may not be silenced, having nothing to say in your own defense among the saints; if you know that there is oil in your vessel, as with the wise virgins, so that you may enter the wedding hall and not be left outside; if you have felt that your spirit, soul, and body have been united flawlessly, and will rise on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ unblemished; if you have become blameless and beyond reproach in conscience; if you have become a child, according to the word of the Savior, Who says: "Let the little children come to Me: 'for such is the kingdom of heaven'" (Matt. 19:14): then you have truly become His bride, and the Holy Spirit has brought you into your inheritance while you are still in the body. But if this is not so, then expect sorrow and bitter lamentation; shame and disgrace will precede you before the Saints.

²⁵ In Paissius's version: "in your mind."

4. Know this, too: just as a maiden, rising every morning, she attends to no other task before adorning herself for her bridegroom, frequently looking in the mirror—lest there be some blemish on her face that might displease her bridegroom—so great is the care of the Saints to examine their deeds and thoughts day and night, to know whether they are under the yoke of God and the Holy Spirit or not.

5. Therefore, strive earnestly, brother, in the afflictions of heart and body, with wisdom, to attain that eternal joy, for few are those who have been deemed worthy of it—those who have acquired the spiritual sword and freed their souls and senses from every defilement of the passions, as the Apostle said (2 Cor. 7:1; Eph. 6:17). God is powerful enough to help us in our weakness, so that we may be deemed worthy to be with His saints. Amen.

20. On Humility

What is humility? Humility is to think of yourself as a sinner who does nothing good before God. The works of humility are: silence, not measuring oneself in anything, not seeking favor, obedience, looking down at the ground, keeping death before one's eyes, guarding oneself against falsehood, refraining from idle talk in conversation, not contradicting one's superiors or insisting on one's own opinion, enduring one's circumstances, hating ease, compelling oneself to labor, and causing no grief to anyone. Take care, then, brother, to fulfill these things exactly, so that your soul may not become a dwelling place for every passion, and you may not end your life fruitlessly for all eternity. Amen.

21. On Repentance

1. They asked Abba Isaiah: What is repentance, or what is turning away from sin? And he answered, saying: There are two paths: one path leads to life, and the other path leads to death. Whoever walks on one does not tread on the other. But whoever treads both paths has not yet been counted among either—neither among those who are led to the kingdom nor among those who are led down to hell. However, if such a person dies, judgment is the matter of God, who is also merciful.

2. But whoever desires to enter the kingdom keeps His commandments: the kingdom is the eradication of all sin. The enemies certainly sow, but their thoughts do not take root. For if the mind attains to the contemplation of the sweetness of the Divine, their arrows no longer pierce it, since it is then clothed in the full armor of virtues, which protects it, cares for it diligently, and prevents it from being troubled (by thoughts or passions), but occupies it with its own contemplation, so that it may know and distinguish between the two paths, pursuing one and loving the other.

3. Thus, whoever has come to know the glory of God has come to know the bitterness of the enemy; whoever has come to know the kingdom has come to know Gehenna; whoever has come to know love has come to know what hatred is; whoever has come to know the longing for God has come to know the hatred that is directed toward the world; whoever has known what purity is has known the impurity of foul odors (of lustful passions); whoever has known the fruit of virtues has known what the fruit of evil is; whoever is rejoiced over by the angels in his deeds has known how the demons rejoiced over him when he did their deeds. For unless you flee²⁶ from them, you will not know their bitterness. How can anyone know what the love of money is unless he renounces everything and lives in great poverty for God's sake? How can one know the bitterness of envy unless he acquires meekness? How can one know the rebelliousness of anger unless one acquires long-suffering in all things? How can one know the shamelessness of pride unless one acquires the gentleness of humility? How can one know the stench of fornication unless one knows the sweet fragrance of the purest innocence? How can one know the shame of condemnation unless one knows one's own shortcomings? How can you recognize the ignorance of mockery unless you experience weeping over your sins? How can you recognize the confusion of despondency unless your senses are settled and you come to know the light of God?

4. All these (evil passions) have one head, which is called the malice of the enemy's power; but all virtues have one mother, which is called the fear of God, which, in those who have acquired it, gives birth to virtues in purity and cuts off the branches of evil, as I said before. Acquire it for yourself, my beloved, and you will spend your entire life in peace. For the fear of God is the mother of all virtues. As long as one has not attained this, he is not yet a son of the kingdom of heaven; but he must strive little by little until he has cut off each of the passions mentioned. If anyone wishes to know whether he is laboring at this or not, here is the sign: as long as the left side exerts its influence, sin has not yet died within him, and the virtues of the right side do not coexist with him. For it is written: “Do you not know that if you present yourselves as slaves to obedience, you are slaves of the one you obey—whether of sin, leading to death, or of obedience, leading to righteousness?” (Rom. 6:16). And again: “Or do you not know that Jesus Christ is in you; are you so lacking in understanding?” (2 Cor. 13:5)? And again, James says: “If anyone among you thinks he is righteous but does not bridle his tongue... his faith is worthless” (James 1:26).

5. The Holy Spirit teaches us all this, showing us how to turn away from unnaturalness and guard ourselves against it. For repentance consists in turning away from sin. But sin is not a single thing; rather, the entire old man is called sin. Why does the Apostle say: “Do you not know that in a race all the runners run, but only one receives the prize?” (1 Cor. 9:24)? Who is this, if not the one who stands firm and fights valiantly (against all)? For the same Apostle also said—that “the one who competes in all things will abstain” (ibid., v. 25). Let us therefore take care of ourselves, brothers. But what is this true care, if not to humble ourselves before the goodness of our Lord Jesus Christ (imploing Him for protection from our enemies)? And He is mighty against them, to thwart their evil designs against us, whereas man is but flesh and blood.

6. They asked him (this Abba) again: What does it mean to keep silence in the cell? And he answered, saying: To keep silence in the cell is to humble oneself before God and to exert all one’s strength to resist every wicked thought instilled by the enemy; for this is what it means to flee from the world. They asked him yet again: “And what is the world?” And he answered, saying: “The world is a realm of sin; the world is a workshop of unnatural things; the world is the fulfillment of one’s carnal desires; the world is the belief that one will always remain in this age; the world is caring more for the body than for the soul; the world is boasting that one will leave (eventually). I do not say this of my own accord, but the Apostle John says this: “Do not love the world or the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him; for all that is in the world—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life—is not from the Father but is from the world. And the world is passing away, and its desires; but whoever does the will of God abides forever” (1 John 2: 15–17). “Little children, let no one deceive you: whoever does what is right is righteous; whoever does what is sinful is of the devil, for the devil has been sinning from the beginning” (1 John 3:7–8). “The desire for the things of this world is enmity against God” (James 4:4). Again, the Apostle Peter, desiring to make his children strangers to the sins of the world, said: “I urge you, brothers, as sojourners and exiles, to abstain from the fleshly desires that wage war against the soul” (1 Peter 2:11). And our beloved Lord Jesus, knowing that the sinful world is a burdensome yoke until a person leaves it behind, encouraged His own, saying: “The ruler of this world is coming, and he has nothing in Me” (John 14: 30); and again: “The whole world lies in wickedness” (1 John 5: 19). He also said of His own that He had taken them out of the world (John 15: 19). From what world did He take them, if not from the widespread corruption of sin?

7. Therefore, whoever wishes to be a disciple of Jesus must flee from the passions. For if he does not cut them off, he cannot be a dwelling place for God. Nor will he see the sweetness of His Divinity unless he turns away from them, for He Himself said: “The eye is the lamp of the body. If your eye is clear, your whole body will be full of light; but if your eye is bad, your whole body will be full of darkness” (Matt. 6: 22–23). Therefore, take heed: if the mind is not free from evil, it cannot perceive the light of the Godhead, for evil then becomes a dark wall to the mind and renders the soul empty, as it is written in the Gospel: “No one, having lit a lamp, covers it with a vessel or puts it under a bed, but sets it on a lampstand, so that those who enter may see the light” (Luke 8:16). It is said that the bed here refers to the falsehood of the world. Thus, as long as our mind remains in a state of unnaturalness, the lamp of the Divine cannot dwell within it. But when the mind becomes a lofty lamp, then the light of the Divine shines upon it, and it discerns those who are in the house; those it must cast out, it casts out, and those with whom it must live in peace, it leaves. Why did the Lord teach those whose minds had been enlightened by His divine commandments, saying: “I say to you who hear: Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, bless those who curse you, and pray for those who mistreat you. If anyone strikes you on one cheek, turn to him the other also; and from the one who takes your cloak, do not withhold your tunic. And to everyone who asks of you, give; and from the one who wants to borrow from you, do not turn away; and do not refuse the one who takes from you” (Luke 6:27–30; cf. Matt. 5:42).

8. He said this to those who had fled from the world, since they had left everything and prepared themselves to follow Him, their Savior. Therefore, having loved them with perfect love, He said to them, “Arise, let us go from here” (John 14:31). Where, then, is He taking them when He says, “Get up, let us go from here”? He is turning their minds away from the affairs of this age and giving them rest in His kingdom. That is why, encouraging them, He said: “I am the vine; you are the branches. Abide in Me, and I in you. Just as a branch cannot bear fruit by itself unless it remains on the vine, so neither can you unless you remain in Me” (John 15:4–5). He says this to those who have left the world, because the Spirit is in them and dwells in their hearts. “I will not leave you as orphans,” He says, “I will come to you” (John 14:18). Therefore, whoever loves God and desires Him to dwell within him—and does not wish to remain an orphan—let him first take care to keep what Jesus has commanded him, and He will dwell within him, for He is not far from us, and there is nothing between us and Him except our passions.

9. If, my brother, you call yourself one who has renounced the world, yet you are found to be doing the works of the world, then you have not renounced it, but are deceiving yourself. The Lord gave this sign to those who have renounced the world, saying: “Whoever loves his life will lose it, and whoever loses his life for My sake will save it” (Matt. 10:39). How, then, does one lose one’s life, if not by cutting off all its fleshly desires? And again: “Whoever does not carry his own cross and follow Me cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:27). What kind of cross, does He say we are to carry, if not the one that requires the mind to remain ever vigilant and steadfast in virtue, so as not to fall from the cross? That is, abstaining from passions until they are cut off—and the mind finally rises up invincible. For to those who were stirred up, He gave a sign, saying: “Unless a grain of wheat falls into the earth and dies, it remains alone; but if it dies, it bears much fruit” (John 12:24). And as a consolation to those who have died like a grain of wheat, He said: “If anyone serves Me, My Father will honor him; and where I am, there My servant will be also” (John 12:26). How, then, do they serve Jesus, if not by hating the world of passions and fulfilling His commandments? Having kept them, they gained the boldness to say before Him: “We have left everything and followed You; what, then, will be ours?” (Matthew 19:27). And He showed them what would become of them, saying: “You who have followed Me—in the age to come, when the Son of Man sits on the throne of His glory, you also will sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And everyone who leaves a house, or brothers, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or fields, for My sake, will receive a hundredfold and inherit eternal life” (Matthew 19:28–29).

10. Our Lord, the sweetest Jesus, knowing that if a person does not attain freedom from all cares, his mind cannot ascend to the cross, commanded us to leave behind everything that, through habit and encounter, draws the mind down from the cross. Why, when someone approached Him and said, “I will follow You, Lord,” but first let me go and settle the affairs “that are in my house” (Luke 9:61)—did our beloved Jesus, knowing that if he saw those things, his heart would again be drawn toward them, and that various circumstances there would, as it were, rightfully hold him back, forbid him from going, saying: “No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of heaven” (Luke 9:62). (After the parable of the king’s son’s wedding, in which He recounted) how (the king) prepared a feast for his son and sent his servants to summon those who had been invited, but they, because of the love each one had for the world, could not come, He said with sorrow: “If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be My disciple” (Luke 14:16–26). He says this to teach us that whoever desires to enter His kingdom, unless he first resolves within himself to hate everything that draws the heart toward the world, cannot enter the kingdom he desires. And in urging us not to rely on faith alone without acting upon it, the Lord said that the king, upon entering “to see those reclining at the table, saw that one man was not dressed in wedding garments” and commanded that he be cast into outer darkness (Matthew 22:11–13). They enter by virtue of their Christian name, but are cast out for lack of (Christian) deeds. Likewise, the Apostle, knowing that no one can love both what belongs to God and what belongs to this world, wrote to Timothy, his son, saying: “No soldier in active service entangles himself in the affairs of this life, so that he may please his commander. But if anyone suffers, he is not crowned, unless he is persecuted unjustly” (2 Tim. 2:4–5). Encouraging him to hope that his labors would not be in vain, he said to him: “The laborer is worthy to receive his share of the harvest first” (2 Tim. 2:6). And writing to certain others, he said: “The unmarried man is concerned about the things of the Lord—how he may please the Lord—but the married man is concerned about the things of the world—how he may please his wife” (1 Cor. 7:32–33). Such a person will hear a terrible voice saying, “Cast him into outer darkness; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 22:13).

11. Let us therefore, brothers, use our strength to clothe ourselves in the garments of virtue, so that we may not be cast out, for there will be no partiality on that day. That is why the Apostle said to his children, “Those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God” (Gal. 5:21). Knowing, then, that those who have been deemed worthy to rise from dead passions no longer have an adversary, he showed them the fruit of the Spirit, which is—“love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control; against such things,” he says, “there is no law” (Gal. 5, 22–23). And our beloved Lord Jesus, showing us that on that day the fruit of our deeds will be revealed, said: “Many will seek to enter, but will not be able.” For the Master of the House, after He “rises and shuts the door,” will say to those who knock, “I do not know you” (Luke 13:24–25). Can we really say of God that He does not know something? By no means. But just as those who knock and say, “Lord, Lord, open to us,” did not know the virtues, so He says to them, “I do not know you.” And He also showed us concerning those who have faith but do not have works, saying, “I am the vine, and you are the branches; whoever abides in Me, and I in him, bears much fruit. But whoever does not abide in Me is cast out like a branch and withers; and they gather them and throw them into the fire, and they are burned” (John 15: 5, 6). (The branches), however, that bear good fruit, the Father prunes so that they “may bear much fruit” (John 15:2). Again, showing us that He does not love those who act according to their own carnal desires, He said in prayer: “I do not pray for the whole world, but for those whom You have given Me, for they are Yours” (John 17: 9). And I have taken them out of the world (John 15:19): for the world loves its own. Finally, He says: “Father, keep them from the evil one, for they are not of the world” (John 17:15–16).

12. Let us examine ourselves, brothers, to see whether we are of the world or not. If we are not of the world, then He protects us from evil, for He said: “I do not pray for these alone, but also for those who will believe in Me through their word, that they may all be one, just as We are one.” And again: “That where I am, there they also may be with Me” (John 17:20–24). See now, then, with what love He has loved us, since those who have striven in this world and hated their own fleshly desires will reign with Him for all eternity? And John the Apostle, beholding that great glory, said: “We know that when He appears, we shall be like Him” (1 John 3:2), if we keep His commandments and do what is pleasing to Him. And again he says: “Do not be surprised,” beloved, “if the world hates you. We know that we have passed from death to life because we love our brothers” (1 John 3:13–14). And further: “Whoever does not practice righteousness is not of God, nor is he who does not love his brother” (ibid., v. 11). Also: “Whoever practices righteousness has been born of God” (1 John 2:29), “but whoever commits sin is of the devil” (1 John 3:8). And again: “Whoever is born of God does not commit sin, for His seed remains in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God” (1 John 3:9).

13. Let us therefore do what we can, brothers, finding comfort in such testimonies. Perhaps the goodness of our Lord will have mercy on us, and He will send us the strength to cast off the burden of this impure world. For our enemy does not slumber, but constantly lies in wait for us, desiring to steal our souls. But our Lord Jesus is with us, and He restrains the enemy by the power of His holy words, if we keep them. For who can stand against the enemy, or who is strong against him, if not the words that God has spoken against him? They oppose him and crush him by their power, even when a person is unaware of it.

14. The Apostle Peter, teaching us and showing us that deeds save a person, said: “Add to your faith virtue; to virtue, knowledge; to knowledge, self-control; to self-control, perseverance; to perseverance, godliness; to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, love. For if these qualities are yours and are increasing, they will keep you from being ineffective or unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. But whoever lacks these qualities is blind and shortsighted, having forgotten the cleansing from his past sins” (2 Peter 1:5–9). Again, John the Baptist says: “Produce, then, fruits worthy of repentance. For the ax is already laid to the root of the trees; every tree, therefore, that does not produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire” (Luke 3:8–9). And our Lord Jesus says: “A tree is known by its fruit” (Matt. 12:33). “Do people gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles?” (Matt. 7:16). And again: “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter the kingdom of heaven, but the one who does the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 7:21). James also says: “Faith without works is dead. Even the demons believe—and tremble. For just as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead” (James 2:20, 19:26). Likewise, the Apostle Paul, affirming to his children that faith requires works, strictly commanded them, saying: “But sexual immorality and all impurity must not even be named among you, as is proper for saints—but rather thanksgiving. For this you must know: no fornicator, or impure person, or covetous person—that is, an idolater—has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God” (Eph. 5: 3–5). And again, further confirming this word, he said to them: “Let no one deceive you with empty words, for because of these things the wrath of God comes upon the disobedient. Do not, therefore, be partakers with them. For you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord. Walk as children of light, for the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, righteousness, and truth” (Eph. 5:6–9). And again: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice” (Eph. 4:31). “Be imitators of me,” he also said, “just as I am of Christ” (1 Cor. 11:1). “For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have clothed yourselves with Christ” (Gal. 3:27).

15. Let us therefore examine ourselves, brothers, to see whether we have put on Christ or not. Christ is recognized by purity, for He is pure and dwells among the pure. And how does one become pure? Only by ceasing to do the evil that one used to do. For such is the goodness of God that whenever a person turns from his sins, He receives him with joy, not counting his former sins against him, as is written in the Gospel about the younger son, who, having squandered his inheritance, ended up tending pigs and wishing to fill himself with pig food; but finally, repenting of what he had done, realized that there is no satisfaction in sin, but that the more one commits them, the more one is inflamed by them. So when repentance touched his heart (literally: knocked upon him), he did not delay, but (immediately) returned to his father with humility, leaving behind all his carnal desires. For he trusted his father to be merciful and not to hold his deeds against him. That is why his father immediately ordered that he be given the robe of purity and the token of sonship (a ring) (Luke 15:11–32). Our Lord Jesus Christ spoke these words (wishing to impress upon us) that if we turn to Him, we must first forsake the food of swine, and then He will accept us, having become pure. He said this so that the soul might not lose heart, saying, “When will God hear me?” For He knows the time when the one who asks is worthy of being heard, and then He will hear him quickly.

16. Let us therefore turn to Him with all our hearts and, as we implore Him, let us not “lose heart” (Luke 18: 1), and He will hear us soon. For He Himself said: “Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you” (Matt. 7:7). Therefore, brothers, if we ask, or seek, or knock, we will receive what we seek or what we ask of Him. Just as the man who came to his friend at midnight urged him, saying, “Give me three loaves of bread, for a friend of mine has come to me from a journey” (Luke 11:5)—and since he did not stop knocking, the friend gave him what he had asked for. Let us, then, brothers, cast aside our laziness and prepare ourselves for such perseverance; and God, seeing our patience, will grant us what we ask for. For He is merciful and desires that people turn to Him, as it is written: “Truly I tell you, there is joy in heaven over one sinner who repents” (Luke 15:7).

17. Therefore, brothers, having such mercy from Him and such a wealth of His bounties, let us strive before Him with all our hearts while we are still in this body; for the time of our life is fleeting. If we strive, we will inherit eternal and inexpressible joy; but if we turn back, we will be like the young man who asked the Lord Jesus how to be saved. He replied to him, “Sell everything you have, give it to the poor, and”—taking up his cross—“follow Me,” showing us that to deny one’s own will is to be saved. But when the young man heard this, he became very sad and went away (Luke 18: 22, 23). For he knew that giving his possessions to the poor was not as difficult as carrying the cross. Giving one’s possessions to the poor is but one virtue, and a person performs it in order to make it easier to carry the cross; but the cross is the eradication of every sin—and it gives birth to love; without love, there is no cross. Why did the Apostle, knowing that there are also false virtues in which there is no love, nor the perfection of virtues, say: “If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am like a clanging gong or a clanging cymbal. And even if I give away all my possessions, and even if I surrender my body to be burned, but have no love, I gain nothing. Love is patient, love is kind; love does not envy; love does not boast, is not proud, does not act unbecomingly, does not seek its own, is not provoked, thinks no evil” (1 Cor. 13:1–5).

18. Therefore, let anyone who wishes to embark on the path of love set aside all concern for all people, whether they are good or evil. Then, at last, a single desire—that for God—will remain in his heart, and this desire will give birth to a wrath proper to his nature; and this wrath will oppose everything instilled by the enemy. Then God’s “law” (²⁷) finds a place to dwell within him, and through fear, love is revealed in him. Then such a person speaks with boldness, like the Apostle: “I am not only willing to be bound, but I am also ready to die for the name of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 21: 13). Blessed is the soul that has attained such love, for it is then free from passion.

19. We have left the world, brothers; we know what station we occupy, and that the Lord Jesus is merciful, so that He may give rest to each of us according to our deeds, and to the small according to their smallness, as He said: "In My Father's house are many mansions" (John 14:2). For although there is one kingdom, each one finds his own place in it and his own task. Let us therefore strive, brothers, against sloth; let us cast off the veil of darkness—that is, forgetfulness—and behold the light of repentance. Let us take for ourselves Martha and Mary, who represent suffering and weeping—those who weep before the Savior, asking Him to raise Lazarus, that is, the mind bound by the many bandages of its own desires. Although He works mercy and stirs them to action, it is their task to untie him and let him (to go). When Lazarus is set free, then the diligence of Mary and Martha becomes evident. After this, here is what is seen: Lazarus reclines carefree with Jesus, Martha performs her service with zeal and joy, and Mary, having brought an alabaster jar of myrrh, anoints the Lord's feet.

20. Let us, then, brothers, strive to the best of our ability, and God will help us through His abundant mercy. If we have not kept our hearts pure, as our fathers did, let us at least strive to keep our bodies sinless, as God requires; and let us believe that during this famine that has befallen us, He will show us mercy, just as He has shown to all His saints. For although the glory of the sun is one thing, and the glory of the moon another, and one star differs from another in glory, yet they all dwell in the same firmament, and their glory and honor belong to Him, from now until eternity. Amen.

22. On the Conduct of the New Man

1. My beloved brothers! A Jew is recognized by three things: circumcision, the Passover, and the Sabbath. For it is written in the Book of Genesis: "Every male child among you, whether born in your household or bought with money, shall be circumcised on the eighth day. But the uncircumcised shall be cut off from his people, for he has not kept My covenant" (Gen. 17:12, 14). Abraham was the first to be circumcised, which is a sign that his "side" had died—that is, a foreshadowing in the ancient times of the new man whom the Lord Jesus revealed in His holy body, so that the ancient "corruption" covering the male sex might be cut off and separated. The Apostle also spoke of this: "In Him you were also circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands, by putting off the body of the sinful flesh, in the circumcision of Christ: having been buried with Him in baptism; in Him you were also raised up through faith in the working of God" (Col. 2: 11, 12). And again: "Put off, in regard to your former way of life, the old self, which is corrupted by deceitful desires; and be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and put on the new self, created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness" (Eph. 4:22–24). And again: "Die to sin, but live in righteousness" (1 Peter 2:24).—This (regarding the first duty of a Jew) refers to circumcision. Whoever does not have this is uncircumcised and not a Jew, because he has not kept the covenant that the Lord Jesus established with His holy blood.

2. Much remains to be said about the holy Passover. (First—circumcision; second—the Passover; third—the Sabbath.) For Moses says: "This is the law of the Passover: no foreigner shall eat of it. And every slave or one who has been bought—you shall circumcise him, and then he may eat of it. No uncircumcised person shall eat of it. It shall be eaten in one house" (Ex. 12:43, 46). "Your loins shall be girded, your sandals on your feet, and your staffs in your hands" (Ex. 12:11). The "Passover"—this bread baked in the fire—must be eaten only with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. He did not say, "Gird your loins," lest anyone say that he is speaking here of a belt, but rather, "Gird your loins," to show that he is speaking of purity, sound from every passion that arises from sexual union in impurity. "Sandals"—referring to readiness to speak and to flee from any wounding that harms the conscience and prevents the mind from seeing its own contemplation in purity. "Staff"—this is manly hope, to walk fearlessly along the path and enter the land of promise: these are the ones who have kept the Sabbath. "Blood" is a sign of the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the fact that when He comes in His own coming and brings the sons of Israel into His inheritance, then those who are prepared and anointed with His sign in their souls will be made manifest. To take a "bundle of hyssop" signifies suffering, for it is said: "Eat (the Passover) with bitter herbs." Examine yourself, then, brother: have you been circumcised? Have you anointed the doorposts of your house with the blood of the spotless Lamb? Have you emptied yourself of every earthly thought? Have you prepared yourself to walk without fear and enter the Promised Land?

3. And there is much to be said about the Sabbath—and this is the work of those who have been deemed worthy of true circumcision, who partake of the Holy Passover, who have been delivered from the Egyptians, who have seen them all drowned in the Red Sea, and who have observed the Sabbath after being freed from their bitter slavery. For (God) to Moses: “Six days you shall work, but on the seventh day it is a Sabbath to the Lord your God” (Ex. 20: 9, 10). “Whoever does any work on it, that soul shall be cut off” (Ex. 31: 14). Our Lord Jesus Himself observed the true Sabbath, and taught His own how to observe it, having ascended (to the cross) on Friday, after having made every preparation for it before His ascension, —that is, the insults to which He was subjected and which He endured for our sake, nailing Himself to the cross and refusing to allow Himself to be released or to slacken in any way while He still had breath. When He cried out, “I thirst,” they held out a sponge with vinegar to Him, and He, having tasted it, said: “It is finished,” and bowing His head, He gave up His spirit (John 19:28–30). Then they took Him down (from the cross) to the ground, where He lay motionless, truly resting. Thus, at last, the Lord Jesus rested on the seventh day and blessed it, for on that day He rested from all His works, by which He abolished human passions, as the Apostle also said: “Having entered His rest, He Himself also rested from His works, just as God did from His” (Heb. 4:10). This is the true Sabbath! Therefore, one who does not observe the Sabbath is not a Jew. Why did Jeremiah, weeping over his people, say to them: “Do not carry burdens on the Sabbath day, and do not go out through the gates of Jerusalem carrying burdens on the Sabbath day” (Jer. 17:21)?

4. Woe to me, a wretched man, who have transgressed such holy commandments and bear heavy burdens on the Sabbath, even though I have died with Him (Christ), been buried with Him, and observed the Sabbath! What, then, are these heavy burdens I carry? (They are the passions) that drive my actions: anger is a heavy burden, zeal, hatred, vanity, condemnation, hurt feelings and insults, pride, self-righteousness, bossiness, quarrelsomeness, self-love, and envy. These are the passions of the soul; as for those of the body—gluttony, sensuality, the passion for finery, hedonism, lust, and hardness of heart (perhaps heartlessness). The Lord Jesus abolished all these and similar passions in the bodies of the saints and put them to death in His holy body, according to the words of the Apostle, that He “put to death the enmity by the cross, and abolished the law of commandments contained in ordinances” (Eph. 2:16, 15)—which is the holy Sabbath. So, whoever bears these heavy burdens (of passions) and acts (according to them), indulging in them on the Sabbath, how can he say, “I am a true Jew”? Such a one deceives himself, for only the name rests upon him. For he will receive nothing from the Lord Jesus, since he denies Him by his deeds, having resurrected what the Lord had put to death and restored what He had buried. Clearly, such a one is not a true Jew but a false one—and he is neither circumcised nor has he observed the Sabbath. Therefore, when the Lord Jesus comes in His glory, He will bring into His eternal kingdom only the true sons of Israel—all those circumcised in Him—whom He has gathered from all nations, as the Apostle says: “A partial hardening has come upon Israel until the full number of the Gentiles has come in” (Rom. 11: 25)—and further: “If anyone lives by these rules, peace and mercy be upon them, and upon the Israel of God” (Gal. 6: 16). Do you see who the Israelites of God are?—They are those who have circumcision of the heart, and the observance of the Sabbath, and the putting away of sin. Again, the same Apostle says: “A Jew is not one who is merely visible, nor is circumcision merely physical; but a Jew is one in secret, and circumcision is that of the heart by the Spirit, not by the letter” (Rom. 2:28–29).

5. Let us therefore be mindful of ourselves, brothers! How long will we labor and then destroy our work through negligence, not knowing that within us is our enemy, who flatters us and ceaselessly distracts us (from what is right), preventing our eyes from beholding anything of the light of the Godhead? Examine yourself, poor one, who was baptized into Christ and into His death. What kind of death was it that He died? If you follow in His footsteps, then show me this through your conduct. He was sinless, and presenting Himself to you as a model in all things, He lived in poverty, yet you cannot endure poverty. He “had nowhere to lay His head” (Matt. 8:20), yet you cannot bear the life of a stranger (being a stranger everywhere) with joy. He endured every kind of insult, yet you cannot bear even a single insult. He did not repay evil with evil, yet you cannot bear to refrain from repaying evil. He did not grow angry while suffering, but you, even while being a burden to others, grow angry. He remained serene while being reviled, but you become agitated even when you are not being reviled. He was humble and called sinners to Himself, but you wound even those who love you with your words. He joyfully endured all that was inflicted upon Him, yet you become agitated at even the slightest insult. He was gentle toward those who had fallen into sin, yet you act haughtily even toward those far greater than yourself. He gave Himself up for those who had sinned before Him, to redeem them, yet you cannot even give yourself up for those who love you. This is what He gave you—but what have you given Him in return? Know Him by His deeds, and know yourself by your own deeds. If you have died with Him, then who is committing such sins (within you)?

6. Beloved! Let us truly heed His holy commandments, subdue our own will, and behold the light of the commandments. If we love only those who honor us, what are we doing that is any different from a pagan? If you pray for those who do you good, even the tax collector does the same. If you rejoice with those who praise you, even a Jew does the same. What, then, are you doing that is extra, you who have died to sin and come to life in Christ Jesus? If you love only those who obey you, what are you doing that is any better than a sinner? He does that too. If you hate those who cause you trouble, disobey you, and quarrel with you, then you are no better than a pagan. But you ought to pray for such a person, that he may be forgiven (for the wrong he has done to you). If you grieve over those who slander you, then even the tax collector does the same.

7. Consider yourself, then, you who have been baptized in the name of the Lord: Are your deeds such as those in which He revealed Himself? Or how will you appear on the day of His glory and be crowned, if you do not possess the crown of victory over the passions you have conquered—passions that your King has already conquered, setting an example for you in Himself? For when He, the King of kings and Lord of lords, appears in glory, He will appear visible to every nation in His great glory, bearing the mark of His suffering for us; but you must appear having none of His passions in your body, and He will say to you, “I do not know you.” There you will see all the saints who died for His name, bearing His mark, and you will be ashamed to stand before them. Consider the lives of all the saints, and you will find that they endured evil but did not retaliate: (only) the blood of all of them cried out (to God), “Vengeance for us from those living on earth.” As for me, who love peace, what shall I say on that day when I see there the Prophets, the Apostles, the martyrs, and the other saints, who, though persecuted, were long-suffering, not retaliating, and not even becoming angry, for they knew that it was not human will but the devil’s wickedness that compelled them to do this to them; whether they were put to death, stoned, burned, or drowned, they did not grow angry with their persecutors but prayed for them, that they might be forgiven, knowing who was compelling them to do this to them.

8. Consider, then, beloved brother, yourself—what you yourself are doing—and examine your own thoughts—what you have before the face of God. For at that hour you will be unable to hide anything; it will not be within a person’s will to say one thing (and not another), but when the resurrection takes place, then everyone will rise clothed in their deeds, as in a garment—whether sins or righteousness. These deeds will speak, and everyone will know for themselves where their place is. Blessed is the one who has striven and cast off that which would drag him into Gehenna, and clothed himself in that which would lead him into the Kingdom. The Apostle says: “We know that if our earthly tent, this body, is destroyed, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens” (2 Cor. 5:1). The time of our life is fleeting, and we deceive ourselves (by thinking otherwise) until our hour comes—and then we will grieve in eternal weeping.

9. Let us not, then, weaken our hearts, but let us do everything in our power, caring for it and guarding it, and imploring God’s goodness at every moment to help us. Let us not be angry with our neighbors for words spoken in folly, not of their own will but under influence from elsewhere; for, serving as instruments of the enemy, they are alienated from God until they are called to repentance and flee from this (evil) path. Take care, beloved, to be humble in all things; endure reproach and whatever else you must suffer, and constantly practice subduing your own will, for clinging to your own will destroys all virtues. Whoever has upright (benevolent) thoughts subdues his will with meekness, fearing strife as one would a serpent, for it corrupts the entire inner order of the soul and darkens the soul, so that it sees nothing of the light of the virtues. Take greater care, then, to guard against this accursed passion, which mingles with the virtues in order to destroy them. So too, our Lord Jesus Christ did not ascend the cross until He had cast Judas out from among His disciples. And every person, unless he cuts off this dishonorable passion, cannot prosper in God: for all evil follows in its wake—impatience comes from it, vanity comes from it; everything that God hates dwells in the soul of the self-indulgent and the haughty—and everything of which they convince their own hearts is divine is false according to all the Scriptures.

10. Condemning oneself first brings humility, and wisely setting aside one's own will for the sake of one's neighbor is humility. Purity is praying to God, "²⁸ ." Not condemning is love. Long-suffering is not harboring any ill thoughts toward one's neighbor. A God-loving heart is not repaying evil with evil. Silence is not prying into matters that do not concern you. Poverty is a heart free from malice. Mastering one's emotions is peace. To endure (all things) is meekness. Almsgiving is forgiveness. All this arises from the mortification of one's own will. It brings harmony among the virtues. It makes the ruling mind serene.

11. The conclusion of all this is: as I see in all the Scriptures, God desires nothing else from man but that he humble himself before his neighbor in all things, renounce his own will in regard to everything, pray to Him always for the gift of a helping hand to man, and for the preservation of his eyes from the sleep of forgetfulness and from the allure of captivity, for human nature is cunning and fickle. It is His (God's) work to preserve us. It is His power to grant us the strength to preserve ourselves. It is His protection to shield us from our poverty. It is His turning—to turn us toward Himself. It is His thanksgiving—to grant it to us. It is His grace—to grant us the grace to thank Him. It is His protection—to preserve us from the hand of our enemies. To Him be honor and glory forever and ever. Amen.

12. However, here is what gives rise to strife and what unmercifully corrupts the soul: verbosity, idle talk, twisting words (misinterpretation) to suit one's own purposes, lack of self-control, double-tonguedness, and insisting on one's own opinion. Whoever possesses these things has a soul barren of virtues. After all this, if the soul does not labor diligently at every virtue, it will not be able to attain the rest of the Son of God. Do not be careless about your life, brothers, and let not your mind devise all manner of excuses for wicked sloth, lest all your time be wasted before you attain the rest of the Son of God: that is, humility in all things, freedom from malice, hatred toward no one, attachment to nothing that is not of God, keeping one's sins before one's eyes, and putting to death every evil deed. And "God is not false" (Titus 1:2)—so that He may help our weaknesses through His bounty. Amen.

23. On Perfection

1. One of the Fathers said that unless a person acquires faith in God, an unceasing longing for God, a lack of malice, refraining from repaying evil with evil, suffering for the sake of God, humility, purity, love for humanity, renunciation of everything, meekness, long-suffering, and unceasing prayer to God with a sorrowful heart, true love—so as not to look back, not to regard anything that befalls him, not to rely on his own good deeds or service (prayerful labor—leitorgia), and to seek God's help against everything that befalls him daily—then he cannot be saved.

2. Your enemies, O man, do not slumber. Do not be negligent, do not neglect your conscience, and by no means believe yourself to have attained anything worthy of God while you still find yourself in the land of your enemies. Suffering for the sake of God (ascetic bodily privations), when undertaken with reason, makes up for previous negligence; the weeping of the soul heals the wounds inflicted by inner adversaries; perfect love for God, according to His will, stands against invisible warriors; and hidden purity, which conquers invisible enemies, prepares one for the rest of the Son of God, while visible purity preserves the virtues.

3. If knowledge is the parent (of all that has been said), then it is also the guardian (of it). The discovery (in the heart) of gratitude during temptation turns the temptations themselves back upon themselves. Doubting that your labor is pleasing to God prepares God's help to protect you. One who has devoted his heart to the godly pursuit of God in truth cannot think that he has pleased God. For as long as his conscience accuses him of anything unnatural, he remains alien to freedom. Because as long as there is an accuser, there is also a judge, and as long as there is judgment, there is no freedom. If, at last, during prayer, you see that absolutely no evil accuses you, then you are truly free, and you have entered into His holy rest, according to His will.

4. If you see that the good fruit has taken root within you, and the enemy's tares no longer choke it; if the adversaries—since you no longer struggle with your own passions—have retreated not of their own accord but through their own deceit; if a cloud has overshadowed your tabernacle, and neither the sun burns you by day nor the moon by night (Ps. 120: 6), if you have within you all the preparations (all the furnishings) of the tabernacle, so that you may set it up and preserve it according to God's will, then (know that) victory has been accomplished in you by God, and from now on He will already overshadow (your) tabernacle, because it is

His, He will go before it and prepare a place for it (rest, peace). For if He does not first come to rest in the place He desires, then it, as Scripture says, cannot come to rest (have peace) (Num. 9:16–23).

5. There is great danger as long as a person does not remember himself and does not see clearly that there is no longer anything within him from (the part of the enemies) who strive to disrupt the monastic life by teaching unnatural practices. We must therefore ensure that the fear of His goodness (God's, or of the Good God) reigns over us, that the remembrance (of death and judgment) constantly strikes us, and that holy humility reigns over our hearts at all times, by God's grace, (and for this we need) not to be negligent about what prepares and preserves all of this (those holy feelings and dispositions), but to remain in that state of mind even until the end—to see our sins unceasingly, and to trust ourselves in nothing, as long as we remain in the bondage of evil.

6. When someone condemns a neighbor, rebukes and humiliates a brother in his heart, reviles him at every opportunity, instructs him with anger, or slanders him before others, this alienates him from the grace that the saints receive and from virtuous qualities. For this destroys the labors a person undertakes, annihilating their good fruits. Whoever says, "I mourn my sins," yet does nothing of what is said, is foolish. Whoever says, "I weep over my sins," yet gains nothing from it, deceives himself.

7. One who seeks silence but does not strive to cut off the passions is blind in the pursuit of virtue. One who neglects his own sins and is concerned only with correcting others is alien to wholehearted prayer and to a reasonable supplication to God. This is true courage—when a person struggles against his past sins, for the forgiveness of which he asks, always imploring that he may not fall into them again, neither in his heart, nor in his actions, nor in his feelings.

8. Unless the memory of his sins constantly reigns over his heart and turns him away from all that is in the world—so that it does not overwhelm him—he cannot put an end to his sins; and, content merely to worry about them, he will remain subject to the condemnation of God's creation. Blessed is he who has been deemed worthy of this in truth, and not hypocritically or with deceit. However, this is the task of those who truly mourn: through this visible act, to focus their mind and emotions on not condemning their neighbor. For if you are content with concern for your own sins, this will alienate you from—or cause you to forget—the sins of your neighbor.

9. Retaliating for evil is far from true sorrow. Adapting to anything worldly out of vanity is also far from it, even in thought. Grieving that your opinion regarding this adaptation was not accepted—this, too, is far from it. Doing as one pleases is far from it. To say of someone that he is good or bad is a source of shame for him, because he knows full well that he himself is worse than that person. To desire to know about a matter that is not his own is a source of shame for him, as well as ignorance and an evil bondage that prevents him from seeing his own sins.

10. If someone slanders you and you are distressed by it, then in truth there is no weeping here. If you have any worldly dealings and, having suffered a loss, you grieve over it, then there is no fear of God here. If people say something about you that you do not even know about, and you become agitated, there is no (fear of God) here. If someone praises you, and you accept it, there is no (fear of God) here. If someone rebukes you, and you are hurt by it, there is no (fear of God) here. If you seek out the world's famous people, desiring their friendship, then there is no (fear of God) here. If someone, while speaking with you, argues with you, and you want to insist on your own words, then there is no (fear of God) here. If your words are despised and you grieve over it, then there is no (fear of God) here. All this reveals the old man, that he is still alive and exercising his power, because there is no one there (within) to oppose him—(there is no fear of God)—nor is there true lamentation.

11. One who acts according to God must have discerning eyes to know himself (and realize) that he becomes an enemy of God (when he indulges) his own will. If you, as a keeper of God's commandments and doing all your deeds wisely for God, keep in mind that you cannot please God in a manner befitting His glory, and set your sins before your eyes, you will find them resisting the evil one (the spirit) who seeks to bring you down with the notion of your own righteousness, —and they will preserve the structure that your weeping has built for you. Then you will realize that you have come to know yourself and where you dwell (in what state you find yourself), and you will not believe your own heart that you have won a victory. For until a person stands before the judgment seat, hears the (final) verdict concerning himself, and learns what his place is, he cannot believe this, since the fear remains as to whether he has pleased God. Sorrow for God, which gnaws at the heart, can restrain the emotions, and resistance (to thoughts), combined with sober-mindedness, preserves the faculties of the mind. But a person is dissatisfied with this and cannot believe that he must constantly be in toil as long as he remains in the body.

12. Blessed are those who do not boldly trust in their own deeds, as if they were pleasing to the Lord, and who are ashamed to meet God because of such a lack of confidence in their own deeds, who have come to understand His glory and strive first and foremost to do His will, according to His desire; who have recognized their own weakness and are content with sorrow for themselves, so as to mourn for themselves, without concern for the rest of God's creation, which He Himself is to judge. The victory of the one who labors (for God) will be revealed when, having united himself wholly with God, he passes away according to His will. He is to be inscribed in the Book of Life—when the heavenly angels bear witness that he has passed by the rulers of this world²⁹. From then on, his memory will be with the heavenly (inhabitants). But as long as the battle rages, a person lives in fear and trembling, victorious today and defeated tomorrow—or defeated today and victorious tomorrow.

13. Struggle constricts the heart, but dispassion is unyielding. It has already received its crown and is unconcerned about the fate of our three distinct parts, once they have attained peace with one another in God. These three parts are: the soul, the body, and the spirit, according to the Apostle, who speaks of them in a passage of his epistle (1 Thess. 5:23). Thus, when these three are made one by the action of the Holy Spirit, they can no longer be separated (from one another). So Christ, having died and risen, “no longer dies; death no longer has dominion over Him” (Rom. 6:9). His death was our salvation, for by His death He put sin to death, and His resurrection was life for all who firmly believe in Him. He healed (His own) from their passions so that they might live in God and bear the fruit of righteousness.

14. Do not consider yourself dead (to sin) as long as you endure the torments (of sinful temptations) from your enemies, whether while awake or asleep; for as long as a poor man remains on the racecourse, he has no boldness, and, looking from afar (at the finish line), he does not believe in his own efforts. Only the foolish, though he falls daily, thinks of himself as victorious, because there is no struggle on the field of battle.

15. That is why the Lord said to His disciples, when sending them out to preach: “Do not greet anyone along the way”; but greet those who are in the house. And “if there is a son of peace there,” “stay with him” (Luke 10:4 ff.). And there your peace will rest. Again, Elisha said to Gehazi as he sent him: “If you meet a man, do not greet him,” and do not accept a greeting from anyone (2 Kings 4:29). For he knew that the boy would not be revived, and that he did not have the power to raise him. When the man of God entered—and saw the boy lying on the bed, he closed the door behind him and, with every sense, performed the feat and the actions of ascending to the boy's bed, descending, and pacing back and forth seven times. When his senses were warmed, by the will of the Spirit of God, the boy's eyes were opened.

16. What, then, are we—poor souls who love the glory of this world, more so than the glory of God, who do not know how to wage battle, but are eager to enter into rest, and do not understand God's long-suffering—that He leaves the tares along with the good fruit, and until the good fruit has reached maturity and is fully formed, He does not send anyone to gather the tares? And Giezius completed his journey, but did not manage to raise the boy, because he loved human glory more than the glory of God.

17. Blessed are the eyes that, with wisdom, are ashamed to reach out to God, and that strive to heal their wounds with wisdom, acknowledging their sins and praying for their forgiveness. But woe to those who waste their time, thinking themselves sinless, who trample on their conscience, unwilling to be brought to repentance by it, and who do not acknowledge that it is no small thing to be the least.

18. Just as a farmer who has sown seeds, if they bear no fruit, considers them lost in vain and grieves over his labor because of this failure to bear fruit, so too a person, even if he knew all mysteries and possessed all kinds of knowledge, performed many miracles and healings, endured various sufferings, and went so far as to be stripped of his clothing, is still in danger, not trusting his conscience, and still surrounded by treacherous enemies and slanderers, until he hears these words: “Love never fails; but it believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things” (1 Cor. 13:8, 7).

19. Oh, how difficult is the way of God, as He said, “For narrow is the gate and difficult is the way which leads to life, and there are few who find it” (Matt. 7:14)! And we, who are idle and lustful, take comfort in the fact that we cannot (as it were) bear the yoke of which He spoke: “Take My yoke upon you, and learn from Me, for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For My yoke is easy, and

My burden is light” (Matt. 11:29–30). And who among those who are wise according to God and who fear Him does not strive with all his strength to bear suffering in every labor and separation (from the world), in silence, in guarding (the heart), and in caring (for salvation)? Yet even he will find himself unworthy to utter the name of God with his lips. Because of the passions at work within us, O Lord, Jesus Christ came (to us on earth) so that in us—who “walk not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit” (Rom. 8: 1–4)—He might put them to death, revealing to us the full will of the Father. Teaching His disciples, He said to them: “When you have done all that is commanded you, say, ‘We are unworthy servants; for we have done what we ought to have done’” (Luke 17:10–11). He said this to those who had undertaken the work and kept it up, because they knew there were thieves ready to steal their labor. Anyone who sees something poisonous flees from it in fear—whether it be a snake, a viper, a scorpion, or anything else possessing deadly venom. But our poor, shameless soul accepts everything that kills it; it does not flee from it, nor does it even retreat, but delights in it and becomes one with it in heart, which is why it wastes its time in vain, remaining barren and fruitless.

24. On Detachment

1. On the path of virtue there are stumbles, for there are enemies, there is deception, there is change, there is abundance, there is moderation, there is scarcity, there is sorrow, there is joy, there is heartache, there is grief, there is peace of heart, there is prosperity, there is need: for this is a journey to attain hope.

2. Detachment, however, is far removed from all this and lacks nothing: for it is in God, and God is in it. It has no enemies; it no longer experiences failure, nor unbelief, nor the toil of self-control, nor fear of passion, nor desire for any thing, nor anxiety about anything hostile.

3. Its glorious virtues are great and innumerable. As long as there is any fear of passion within a person, so long is he far from it (apathy); as long as condemnation springs from a person’s heart, so long is he alien to it (apathy).

4. This is the body that the Lord Jesus took upon Himself. It is love, which He taught His disciples to manifest in their deeds with joy.

5. Many ignorant people thought they had attained it while passions still dwelt in their souls and their bodies were not yet fully purified—and thus strayed from the right path. Forgive me, for God’s sake.

25. To Abba Peter, His disciple

1. You wrote to me: “I wish to repent before God for my sins; if the Lord delivers me from the bitter worldly cares I have, then I have spoken well.” You said correctly: “If I am delivered from the affairs of this age, for it is impossible for the mind to be concerned with both one thing and another, just as the Lord said, ‘You cannot serve both God and Mammon’ (Matt. 6:24). Mammon refers to every activity of this world. Therefore, if a person does not renounce it, he cannot serve God.

2. What other kind of service to God is there, if not this: to have nothing in our minds that is foreign to Him when we bless Him, no lust when we pray to Him, no malice when we sing to Him, no hatred when we worship Him, and no evil jealousy which places obstacles in our way when we sit before Him, nor shameful lust in our members when we remember Him: for all these are dark walls that surround the poor soul, and it cannot serve God purely while harboring these things within itself. This places obstacles in her path, preventing her from encountering God, from blessing Him in secret, and from praying to Him in the sweetness of love, in the joy of the heart, and in the holy desire to be enlightened by Him.

3. Because of this, the mind is always clouded and cannot prosper in God, since it does not take care to cut this off wisely. Yet it is impossible for it to concern itself with cutting this off unless it becomes carefree regarding the affairs of this world³⁰. One concern is directed outward—toward the things of this world, for the repose of the body—while the other is directed inward, toward the satisfaction of the passions, and erects obstacles to the virtues. But the soul does not perceive this inner, passionate concern unless it is freed from the outer one. Therefore, the Lord Jesus said that anyone who has not renounced his entire will cannot be My disciple (Luke 14:26).

4. External concern stems from one’s own will, while internal concern arises from external influences. Our Lord Jesus, knowing that the will reigns over one or the other, commanded that it be cut off. Since the mind becomes dead while the soul is preoccupied with external matters, the internal passions then exert their influence without hesitation (without restraint). Thus, if the soul obeys Jesus' word—to cut off all its desires—it begins to hate every deed of this world. And then the mind is stirred and remains vigilant until it has cast them out of its home, listening ceaselessly to the soul and guarding it, lest it turn back to that which caused it distress.

5. The soul is like a young married woman who, when her husband is away, without fear or shame, does not take care of the household with the diligence (as she ought to). But when her husband returns to his home, she immediately, out of fear, ceases what she had been doing and begins to attend to everything according to her husband's will. And he, having returned, attends to the household affairs in every way that is needed. So it is with the mind. When it is stirred, it cares for the soul and guards it unceasingly until she gives birth through him, and he raises her children. And finally, they become of one heart; the soul submits to the mind, and she submits to him, as it is written in the Epistle: "The husband is the head of the wife." And again: "A man ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God; but a woman is the glory of her husband. For a man does not come from a woman, but a woman from a man; nor was a man created for the sake of a woman, but a woman for the sake of a man." For this reason, a wife ought to have authority over her head, because of the angel. Yet neither is the husband without the wife, nor the wife without the husband, in the Lord. For just as the wife is from the husband, so also the husband is from the wife; but all things are from God" (1 Cor. 11:3, 7–12).

6. This word applies to those who have been deemed worthy to become one with the Lord and no longer have their former nature. These are the ones who pray to God in purity. These are the ones who bless God with a holy heart. These are the ones enlightened by God. These are the true worshippers whom God seeks. These are the ones of whom He said, "I will dwell in them and walk among them" (2 Cor. 6:16). What He said applies to them: that if two agree (among themselves), whatever they ask for in His name will be granted to them (Matt. 18:19). Thus, He desires that His own be pure from all material things—both outwardly and inwardly in the soul—and from everything that He abolished in His own body through His Incarnation, as He said: "Abide in Me, and I in you" (John 15:4). You see, brother, that He first desires us to be in Him through our deeds; then He will be in us, for the sake of purity to the best of our ability.

7. But someone will say: I have come to be in Him through baptism, yet I cannot live a life (consistent with that). Listen, beloved! Certainly, whoever receives baptism receives it for the abolition of sin, as the Apostle said: "For we were buried with Him through baptism into death, so that the body of sin might be done away with, that we should no longer be slaves to sin" (Rom. 6:4, 6). For it is impossible for Christ to dwell together with sin. Therefore, if Christ has taken up residence in you, then sin has died, "but the Spirit lives for righteousness," as the Apostle also said (, Rom. 8:10). For "a married woman is bound by law to her living husband; but if her husband dies, she is released from the law of her husband. Therefore, while her husband is still alive, she is an adulteress if she belongs to another man; but if her husband dies, she is free from that law, so that she is not an adulteress if she belongs to another man" (Rom. 7:2–3).

8. Therefore, whoever wishes to know whether Christ has taken up residence within him will recognize this from his own thoughts. As long as sin draws the heart, God has not yet taken up residence in him, and His Spirit has not yet found rest within him. For it is fitting for God to dwell in a person when he performs deeds (consistent with this), and for a person to be in God when his soul is freed (from passions), as the Apostle said: "Whoever is joined to an adulterer is one body with the adulterer; but whoever is joined to the Lord is one spirit with the Lord" (1 Cor. 6:16–17). For every form of unnaturalness is called a harlot.

9. Thus, when the soul is set free and passes beyond all that obstructs its path in the air (that is, in its ascent to God), then it begins to be in God and receives from His Spirit—as it is said, "If anyone is joined to the Lord, he is one spirit with the Lord," —and He teaches her how to pray—she who worships Him unceasingly and clings to Him. And He dwells within her, guiding her and giving her rest unceasingly, revealing to her His ineffable honors and gifts. For she is reborn of Him through baptism and through the breathing of His Spirit, as it is written: "Whoever is born of God does not sin, and the evil one does not touch him" (1 John 5:18), "for he is born of God" (1 John 3:9). As He said in the Gospel: "Unless you turn and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:3). And again: "Be like newborn infants, longing for the pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up" (1 Peter 2:2).

10. What, then, are the characteristics of a child? A child, if beaten, cries, and rejoices with those who rejoice with him; if scolded, he does not get angry, and if praised, he does not become arrogant; if his friend is honored more than he is, he does not feel jealous; if something belonging to him is taken away, he does not get upset; if they leave him a small inheritance, he does not inquire about it, does not enter into a dispute with anyone, does not take offense over what is his, and does not hate anyone; if he is poor, he does not grieve; if he is rich, he does not act haughtily; if he sees a woman, he does not lust after her; sensual pleasure or excessive worry do not rule over him; he does not condemn anyone, nor does he lord it over anyone; he does not envy anyone; he does not speak boastfully about what he does not know; he does not mock his neighbor because of his appearance; he has no enmity toward anyone; he does not pretend; he does not seek the honors of this world; he does not seek to amass wealth; he is not a lover of money; is not insolent; is not self-indulgent; does not teach with passion, nor does he worry about anyone; if stripped of his clothes, he does not grieve; does not insist on his own way; fears neither hunger nor evildoers; fears neither wild beasts nor strife; when persecution comes, he does not waver.

11. Such is the one of whom our Lord Jesus spoke (holding him up as an example): “Unless you turn and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven.” But when a child grows up a little and evil begins to dwell within him, the Apostle rebukes him, saying: “Let us not continue as infants, tossed to and fro and carried about by every wind of doctrine, by the trickery of men, by the cunning craftiness of deceitful scheming; but speaking the truth in love, let us grow up in every way into Him” (Eph. 4:14–15). And again he says: “As infants, I fed you with milk, not with solid food; for you were not yet ready for it, nor are you ready even now” (1 Cor. 3:2–3). And He also says: “For as long as the heir is a child, he is in no way superior to a slave, though he is the master of all. But he is subject to guardians and trustees until the time set by his father. So also, when we were children, we were enslaved under the elements of the world” (Gal. 4:1–3). And again: “Flee the desires of youth” (2 Tim. 2:22). Teaching us to reject such childishness, he said: “Brethren, do not be children in your thinking; but be infants in evil, while in your thinking be mature” (1 Cor. 14:20). So, what is the nature of (true) childlikeness in Christ? Here is what it is, according to the words of the Apostle Peter: “Put away all malice, all deceit, hypocrisy, envy, and all slander, as newborn infants” (1 Peter 2:1). Do you see, brother, what the words spoken by our Lord Jesus mean: “Amen, amen, I say to you, unless you turn and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 18:3)? These words are full of awe, because our Lord spoke them with an oath: “Amen, Amen, I say to you”: He Himself is the Amen. Why did the Apostle say: since there is no one greater than God, “He swears by Himself, saying, ‘Truly’ (amen), ‘I will surely bless you’” (Heb. 6:13–14).

12. Let us, then, understand this word clearly and strive in every way, with fear and trembling, to fulfill it at every moment, as soon as the opportunity arises. When the enemy strikes us with an arrow of hostility toward our neighbor—or because someone insults us, dishonors us, slanders us, or argues with us—so that we might yield to him, or when an impure distress begins to gnaw at us, stirring up a bitter memory of what our neighbor has done to us—intending to darken our soul with anger and hatred—when anything of this sort approaches our soul, let us then hasten to recall the word of our Lord, which He spoke with an oath, saying: “Amen, Amen, I say to you: unless you turn and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven.” Who would not be afraid upon hearing these words? Or which of the wise, desiring to save his soul, would not cast out of his heart every grudge he holds against his neighbor? Or who among those who fear falling into Gehenna will not root out from his heart all hatred, lest he be cast out of the kingdom? For our Lord said with decisive words: “Unless you turn and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven.” This word is hard for those who cling to their own will, who love the world, and who have not known (or received) the gift of the Holy Spirit; for upon whomever He descends, He grants the forgetting of all evil and teaches him His own ways: — meekness instead of anger, peace instead of enmity, humility instead of strife, love instead of hatred, and patience instead of faintheartedness. Such are those who have been granted rebirth.

13. Let us therefore strive to cut away from our hearts what the great Apostle has told us, and let us set it aside so that we may become like little children. The Apostles, having taken care of this and cut it off from their souls (in order to become infants in Christ), later returned to holy maturity and perfection. For the Lord, after breathing on them, said, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (John 20:22); and when He appeared to them on the Sea of Galilee, He said, “Children, do you have anything to eat?” (Luke 24:41), reminding them that through the breathing of the Spirit, He had made them children—even though in the flesh they were not children. Again it is written: “Behold, I and the children whom God has given Me. “Since the children share in flesh and blood, He Himself likewise truly shared in the same, so that through death He might destroy the one who holds the power of death—that is, the devil—and deliver them” (Heb. 2: 14–15). Whose flesh and blood did He truly share, if not those who have abandoned all deceit and attained the measure of holy childhood? And they, too, have once again become perfect, according to the words of the Apostle: “Until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God, to a mature man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4:13). And again, “the restoration of the body brings about the creation of itself through love” (v. 16). Thus writes the Apostle John, saying: “I am writing to you, little children, because you have known the Father... I have written to you, young men, because you have overcome the evil one” (1 John 2:13–14). You have now come to understand that those who were once consumed by malice have themselves become warriors against the enemy, because they have been stripped of his full armor, which is malice, and they themselves later became fathers and attained the measure of perfection, so that revelations and mysteries are entrusted to them until they attain wisdom, unity, goodness, gentleness, and purity, for these are the attributes of gentleness. They are the ones who have glorified Christ in their bodies.

14. Let us therefore be encouraged, beloved brother, by the great famine (it seems, a spiritual one), let us not lose heart in anything, but let us ceaselessly implore God’s goodness, that He may not allow us to be deceived by the wiles of the enemy and the envious one, who works evil without mercy and shamelessly insists and says, “If not now, then tomorrow,” but I will not yield until³¹ I overcome him. Why should we pray unceasingly, saying, as Saint David did: “Look upon me and hear me, O Lord my God; enlighten my eyes, lest I fall asleep in death; lest my enemy say, ‘I have prevailed against him.’ Those who hate me will rejoice if I stumble” (Ps. 12:4–6). If our enemies begin to overcome us, let us cry out, saying: “O God, who is like You? Do not be silent, nor be gentle, O God” (do not be gentle toward our enemies). “For Your enemies, O God, have raised a clamor” (they have cried out... they have proclaimed), “and those who hate You have lifted up their heads. They have acted treacherously against Your people by their own will,” saying, “We will blot out the memory of Israel” (Ps. 82: 2–5). But the one who was empowered by the Holy Spirit said: “O God, set me like a stake, like a reed before the wind. Fill their faces with shame, that they may know that You alone are the Most High over all the earth” (Ps. 82:14, 17, 19). Thus, those who strive in their faith strengthen their hearts against their enemies, and before the enemies come to fight them, they establish themselves on the holy rock, which is Christ, saying with a steadfast heart: “They surrounded me like a swarm of bees, and they blazed like a fire among thorns; but by the name of the Lord I withstood them” (Ps. 117: 12).

15. When we see that our enemies have surrounded us with their cunning—which is despondency (sloth)—or are lulling our souls with the sweetness of lust, or are preventing us from feeling anger toward our neighbor when he does something wrong, or are weighing down our eyes with the desire for carnal pleasures, or seek to entice us to savor sweet delicacies, or make our neighbor’s words a poison to us, or urge us to disparage another’s words, or instill division among the brethren, saying: ‘this one is good, but that one is bad’—so, when such things surround us, let us not lose heart, but rather let us cry out with a steadfast heart, like David, saying: “The Lord is the defender of my life! Though an army march against me, my heart shall not fear; though war arise against me, in Him I will trust. One thing I have asked of the Lord, that will I seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to visit His holy temple. For He has hidden me... and lifted me up; and now He has lifted up my head above my enemies” (Ps. 26: 1, 3–6). This is characteristic of those who have lifted their minds from dead works, which the Apostle calls “night,” saying: “We are not of the night, nor of darkness” (1 Thess. 5: 5). Rebuking those who are careless about themselves, He said: “For those who sleep, sleep at night; and those who get drunk, get drunk at night” (v. 7). And again: “The Day of the Lord will come like a thief in the night, and they will not escape” (vv. 2–3), because they are in the night. But to those who have lifted their minds above the passions—which are the night—He said: “As children of the day, let us be sober, having put on the breastplate of faith and love, and the helmet of the hope of salvation” (v. 8).

16. Let us therefore do everything with a sober mind, free from dead works, and be watchful with our souls at all times, so that we do nothing but what is natural, for our nature is changeable, according to the words of the Prophet Isaiah, who said: “The Lord is gracious to you, O humble and wavering one; you have had no comfort” (Isa. 54:10–11). For the soul is like iron: if left neglected, it rusts; but when it is kindled by fire, the fire purifies it, and while it is in the fire, it becomes like fire itself, and no one can take it (in their hands), because it is fire. So it is with the soul: as long as it abides with God and sits before Him, it remains a fire and consumes all its enemies who caused it to rust during its neglect, and (this fire) purifies it in renewal, like iron, and it no longer takes pleasure in anything worldly, but finds rest in its own nature, which it has been deemed worthy of, since it was originally its own. But when it abandons its nature, it dies. For just as an animal dies if it is submerged in water, because it is of an earthly nature, so too do fish die if they are cast onto the land, because they are of a watery nature; likewise, birds, while in the air, remain at peace, but when they descend to the ground, they fear being caught: so too does the perfect soul, dwelling in its own nature, die immediately upon leaving that nature.

17. This is why those who have become worthy and have been granted these gifts regard the world as a prison for themselves and do not wish to mingle with it, lest they die. Such a soul can no longer love the world, even if it wished to, remembering its former state—in which it found itself before it began to dwell in God—and recalling what the world did to it and how it rendered it empty. For just as when an enemy of the king enters a city, and the men of the city, out of fear, surrender to him, he immediately hastens, in his malice, to destroy the king's images and abolish his laws; then he introduces other harsh laws and sets up his own image there, and finally compels the entire multitude of the people to labor for him. But when the citizens secretly send word to the true king, saying, "Come, help us," and he, enraged at his enemy, comes with his army, then the citizens, upon hearing this, joyfully open the gates to him, and he enters and slays his enemy, destroys the image that had been forcibly set up, and repeals the laws; the city rejoices, and the true King, having restored his image and his laws, dwells within it, fortifies it so that no one may ever again take possession of it, and teaches those who live there to fight, so that they may stand fearlessly against any enemy. Such is the soul which, after holy baptism, was once again forcibly seized by the enemy, who humbled it with all manner of shameful wiles, overthrew the image of the King and set up his own image and his own laws, forced it to concern itself with the affairs of this world, taught it to act carelessly and wickedly, and in general made it whatever he wished—but to which, at last, the goodness of the holy and great King Jesus sent repentance—and the soul rejoiced. Repentance opened the way, and the great King Christ, entering into it, destroyed her enemy, erased his image and his ungodly laws, and, having set her free, established His holy image within her, imparted His laws to her, taught all her faculties to wage war, and finally rests in that soul, for she has become His. Thus it is with the soul by the grace of God!

18. Therefore, it is impossible for a soul to enter into the rest of the Son of God unless it bears the image of the King. Just as no merchant accepts or gives a coin unless it bears the king's image, nor does the weigher weigh it, nor does the king admit it into his treasury: so, if the soul does not bear the image of the Great King Jesus, the angels will not admit it, and the King Himself will cast it out, saying, "How did you enter here without bearing My image?" The sign of this image is love. For He Himself said: "By this everyone will know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another" (John 13:35). But His love cannot dwell in us when the soul is divided, seeking God while also loving the world. Just as a bird cannot fly with one wing, or while carrying a burden, so too the soul cannot prosper in God while bound by anything of this world. Just as a ship, lacking something necessary, cannot sail, so too the soul cannot cross the waves of the passions unless it possesses some virtue. Just as sailors do not wear fine clothes, gloves, or boots, and (in case of need) cannot sail unless they are naked, so too the soul cannot cross the waves of the opposing spirits of malice unless it is stripped of all worldly things. Just as a warrior, going out to battle against the king's enemies, cannot stand against them unless he possesses some part of his full armor: so it is impossible for a monk to resist passions without possessing some virtue. Just as when a small section of a wall in a walled city is destroyed, the enemies, wishing to enter it, focus all their attention on that ruined section in order to enter through it—and even though there are guards at the gates, they cannot withstand the enemies unless the ruined section is rebuilt—so too, an ascetic monk, when possessed by any passion, cannot withstand the enemies and attain the measure of perfection.

19. It is not I who say this, but Divine Scripture itself. Thus it is written in the Book of Genesis: "And God said to Noah, 'I have found you to be righteous in this generation'" and perfect (Gen. 7:1). Again, He said to Abraham: "Be blameless before Me, and I will establish a covenant with you... an everlasting covenant" (Gen. 17:1, 7). Isaac, meanwhile, when blessing his son Jacob, said to him: "May my God strengthen you, so that you may fulfill all His will" (Gen. 28:1–). Again, in the Book of Numbers it is written: "Anyone who has made a vow shall abstain from drinking wine, wine vinegar, strong drink, and anything derived" (from grapes) "even to the pith" (Num. 6:1–4). And in Deuteronomy: "When you go out to war against your enemies, keep yourself from every evil word until your enemy is delivered into your hands"

(Deut. 23: 9–). “As for these seven nations, do not leave any of them alive, lest they teach you to sin against Me” (Deut. 20: 16, 18). Teaching those of us who say, “How soon will you destroy them, when there are so many of them?” not to lose heart, He said: “You will not be able to destroy them in a single year, lest the land become desolate and the wild beasts multiply against you; but little by little, until you multiply and grow strong... and God will enlarge your borders” (Deut. 7:22). God also commanded them many times, saying: “Take care not to make a covenant with the Canaanites, whom I intend to destroy from before you” (v. 2).

20. Also, when Joshua went and surrounded Jericho and destroyed it, God said, “Curse it and everything in it” (Joshua 6:16). Furthermore, when Joshua wanted to fight the people of Gibeon, Israel fled from them, unable to stand against their enemies, because of a small item under a curse that Achar had stolen. Then Joshua fell on his face and wept before God, saying, “Turn away Your wrath from Israel against their enemies” (Joshua 7:8), and “What shall I do?” And the Archangel of the Lord’s power said to him, “Since you are bound by an oath, Israel, you cannot stand against your enemies” (–13). And (Joshua) did not go out to battle again until he had put Achar to death. We also see that God took the kingdom away from Saul because of the oath he had made concerning the Amalekites. And furthermore, because Jonathan dipped “his staff (into a honeycomb) and put it to his mouth, God did not hear Israel on that day” (1 Sam. 14:27, 37). Again, Ecclesiastes, teaching us that even the slightest passion destroys the power of virtues, says: “Dead flies spoil the sweetness of the oil” (10:1). Ezekiel also says: on the day “the righteous turns away from the path of his righteousness and commits iniquity, I will bring a disease upon him, and I will not remember his righteousness” (Ezek. 18:24). Again, the Apostle says: “A little leaven leavens the whole lump” (Gal. 5:9). Ananias and Sapphira, his wife, when they took part of the proceeds from the sale of a field and lied, immediately fell at the apostles’ feet and breathed their last, for this small offense. Again, James says: “Whoever keeps the whole law but fails in one point has become guilty of all of it” (James 2:10).

21. Encouraging us to turn to Him, God says through Ezekiel: “On the day the wicked man turns from his wicked ways and does what is just and right, I will not remember his wickedness, but he will live” (18:21); “For I take no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but rather that he should turn and live; turn, then, and live, all you of the house of Israel” (33:11). Again, Jeremiah says: “Turn to Me, O house of Israel, and I will have mercy on you, says the Lord” (Jer. 3: 12; 36:3). And again: “Does a fallen man not rise again? Or does one who turns away not return? Why then have these people of Mine in Jerusalem turned away with a stubborn heart, and set their hearts on their own will, and refused to return, says the Lord” (Jer. 8: 4, 5)? “Return to Me, and I will return to you” (Mal. 3: 7). And the Lord Jesus said: “If you forgive others their sins, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive, neither will your Father forgive you” (Matt. 6: 14–15). Likewise, the Apostle says: “If anyone among you falls into any kind of sin, you who are spiritual should restore such a one in a spirit of gentleness” (Gal. 6: 1). Again, James says: “Brothers, if anyone among you strays from the way of truth, and someone brings him back, let him know that whoever brings a sinner back from the error of his way will save a soul from death and cover a multitude of sins” (James 5:19–20).

22. All these testimonies from Scripture urge us to examine ourselves to see if, while laboring (to do what is right), we harbor malice toward our neighbor, or if we hold a grudge against him, refusing to forgive him (for anything), lest this ruin our labor. In such a case, even our Lord Jesus Christ will not help us at the hour when our enemies attack us. For He Himself severely rebuked certain such people, saying: “You wicked servant! I forgave you the entire debt because you begged Me. Should you not also have had mercy on your fellow servant? And in anger... he handed him over to the torturer, until he had paid back the entire debt. So also will my heavenly Father do to you, if you do not forgive each of your brothers their transgressions from your hearts” (Matt. 18: 32 – 35). Examine yourself, brother, every day, if you wish to know your own heart—what is in it before God: is it condemnation (of your brother), or hatred (toward him), or envy, or contempt? If such poison takes root in your heart, remember (then) the Word of the Lord Jesus, spoken by Him: “So also your heavenly Father will do to you, unless you forgive each of your brothers their offenses from your hearts.” Whoever fears falling into Gehenna, let him cast out all malice from his heart, lest that terrible judgment fall upon him. Pay attention, then, to your heart, brother, and be on guard against your enemies, for they are all cunning in their wickedness. Be convinced in your heart of the truth of this saying: that it is impossible for a person to do good while doing evil, but it is possible for a person to do evil under the guise of good.

23. Therefore, our Savior taught us to be on guard against them (the enemies), saying: “For narrow is the gate and difficult is the way that leads to life, and few are those who find it. But the gate is wide and the road is broad that leads to destruction, and there are many who go through it. 'Take heed,' He says, 'of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravenous wolves. 'By their fruits you will recognize them'" (Matt. 7:14, 13, 15, 16). What, then, are these fruits of theirs, if not every kind of unnaturalness with which they press upon us, seeking to incline our hearts toward it? But false prophets cannot persuade those who love God with all their hearts to believe anything they say, according to the words of the Apostle: "Who will separate us from the love of God? Will tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword? For I have come to know that neither death nor life, nor angels nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other created thing will be able to separate us from the love of God." Do you see, my brother, what those who love God with all their hearts are like—that nothing worldly can separate them from His love?

24. Take care, then, that nothing harmful may separate you from the love of God—whether gold, or silver, or dwellings, or the sweetness of pleasure, or hatred, or slander, or a wound to the heart caused by a word, or any other poison poured into our hearts by the serpent. Do not be troubled (when you see such things within yourself), but rather hasten to fix your gaze on the bronze serpent that Moses made at the Lord's command. He set it on a pole at the top of the mountain so that anyone bitten by a serpent might immediately look upon it and be healed. Our Lord Jesus Christ became like this bronze serpent. (The serpent) is the enemy; by listening to him, Adam became an enemy of God. Our Lord Jesus became a perfect man, in every way—except for sin—like Adam, for our sake; but the bronze serpent, though similar (in appearance) to the one who was God's enemy, has no evil thoughts, no venom, no malice; it does not crawl or hiss, and it has no breath of the enemy. Our Lord Jesus fulfilled this type in order to neutralize the poison that Adam tasted from the serpent's mouth. And nature, which had become unnatural, was restored to its natural state. God spoke similarly to Moses: "What is this in your hand?" And he said, "A staff." And He said to him, 'Cast it on the ground.' So he cast it on the ground, and it became a serpent; and Moses fled from it. Then the Lord said to Moses, 'Stretch out your hand and take it by the tail.' So he stretched out his hand, took it by the tail, and it became a staff in his hand" (Ex. 4:2–4). After this, God spoke to him on various occasions, saying: "Take the staff (which had turned into a serpent) and strike the river of Egypt with it in the presence of Pharaoh, and its water will turn to blood"; then: "Strike the Red Sea with it, and it will dry up"; and then: "Take the staff that is in your hand, with which you struck the sea, and strike the rock, and it will pour out water" (Exodus 7:19; 14:16; Numbers 20:8).

25. Do you see how, by following in the footsteps of our Lord Jesus Christ, one who was once an enemy and a serpent is transformed into a staff, and none of his enemies can stand against him? This mystery is indeed great. Why, then, if the serpent sows its venom within us, do we hasten to look upon Him who was lifted up on the cross? All of this—the sufferings, the cross, and death—was done to Him for our sake. And He endured it all without changing, without taking offense at those who maligned Him, without uttering a harsh word, but remained steadfast, like the bronze serpent. Therefore, if we heed Him and follow in His footsteps, we will be spared from the bites of hidden serpents. His strength and help come from Him who said: "Just as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whoever believes in Him may not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:14–15). This is what it means to follow in His footsteps—to be healed through Him. How, then, are we healed? If we believe that He is powerful (to do so). For those bitten in the wilderness, it was not the bronze serpent itself that came to heal them, but the one bitten by the serpent, looking upon it with faith, was healed. Many died there from the serpents because they did not believe the Word of God, as the Apostle said: "Let us not test Christ, as they tested Him, and perished by the serpents" (1 Cor. 10: 9).

26. Do you know, brother, that even to this day there is a serpent in the soul that desires to tempt Jesus? And what else is tempting Him but to question His commandments and not to keep them, as it is written: "And one of them, a lawyer, asked Him, testing Him, and said, 'Teacher, which is the greatest commandment in the Law?' Jesus replied, 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength, as yourself. On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets'" (Matt. 22:35–40). Do you see that those who ask questions but do not act are called tempters? Because they do not want to believe in the bronze serpent, which can save them from the venom of the invisible serpent. So guard your heart and do not lose heart, saying, "How can I keep the virtues, being a sinful person?" For when a person forsakes his sins and turns to God, repentance renews him, as the Apostle says: "Just as we have put on the image of the earthly, so let us also put on the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. 15: 49). Do you see that God has given man the ability to be transformed through repentance and to be made completely new through it?

27. As long as a baby is in its mother's womb, she protects it at every moment from all evil. If he cries, she gives him her nipple and gently taps him on the cheek, warning him so that he will drink her milk with reverence and not be bold. If he cries because of this, she takes pity on him as on the fruit of her womb, comforts him, kisses him, and cherishes him until he takes her nipple. If you show a baby gold, or silver, or pearls, or any other treasure in the world, he may glance at it, but while in his mother's arms, he scorns it all in order to enjoy her nipple. His father does not scold him for not working or for not going to war against his enemies, because he is still too young and unable to do so: he has legs but cannot stand on them; he has arms but cannot hold a weapon. So his mother patiently endures him until he grows up little by little. When he grows a little older and tries to wrestle with someone else, and that person throws him to the ground, his father does not get angry with him for this, knowing that he is still a child. But when he becomes a man, his true character is revealed—whether he is an enemy to his father's enemies. Then his father entrusts his affairs to him, since he is his son. But if, after all the efforts his parents have made on his behalf, he, having grown up, becomes a scourge to them, hates his parents, refuses to heed their guidance, and befriends their enemies, then they, having withdrawn their favor from him, will cast him out of their home, (resolving) not to give him an inheritance.

28. And we, brother, will take care of ourselves, (compelling ourselves) to remain under the shelter of repentance; we will drink the milk from its teats, so that it may nourish us. Let us despise all that is visible, so that its milk may be sweet to our lips. Let us bear the yoke of his instruction, so that it may care for us more earnestly. If we engage in battle against our enemies, and they cast us down like little children, let us weep before him, so that he may implore our Father to avenge us against those who have wronged us. Let us cut off every desire of our hearts and love to be strangers, so that it may save us, as it saved Abraham. Let us submit to his hand, like Jacob, so that we may receive a blessing from our Father. Let us hate the desires of our hearts, just as Moses hated them, and, having been preserved under its shelter, let us rise up against those who sought to kill him (repentance), as one free from every sensual delight. Let us not despise it, lest it come to hate us, as Esau did. Let us preserve its purity, so that it may exalt us in the land of our enemies. Let us always have it as a good shelter, just as Jesus, the son of Nun, the "Servant," says, "Jesus, the son of Nun, the young man, did not leave the tabernacle" (Ex. 33:11). Let us not give place to despondency in our hearts, lest it render us heirless in the Promised Land. Let us love humility in all things, and let us long to enter the land flowing with milk and honey, like Caleb. Let us not covet anything harmful, lest we be destroyed, like Ahar. Let us love his (repentant) conscience, so that it may humble us every hour and save us in the hour of temptation, like Rahab. Let us not love the pleasures of the palate from any delicacy, lest it destroy us, as it did the sons of Elijah. Let us guard ourselves against all unrighteousness, like Samuel, whose conscience was unblemished, so that we might not do anything evil to our neighbor. Let us not love malicious envy toward others, lest it (repentance) reject us, as it did Saul. Let us love not to repay evil to our neighbor, so that it (repentance) may preserve us from evil, as it did David. Let us not love self-praise and vanity, lest it cast us away from the presence of our Father, as it did with Absalom. But let us love humility and honesty, so that it may make us avengers against all the enemies of our Father, as it did with Solomon. Let us love complete renunciation of all things, restraining our members from every dead work, so that we may receive a courageous heart against our enemies, like Elijah the Tishbite. Let us not be pleasure-seekers or lustful, lest repentance destroy us as it did Ahab. Let us strive until death, so as not to lose His holy inheritance, like Nahab the Israelite. Let us be obedient in all things to our Fathers in God, cutting off every will of our own, so that, through perfect submission to them, their blessing may remain upon us, as it did upon Elisha. Let us not be lovers of money or deceitful people-pleasers, lest punishment befall us as it did to Gehazi. Let us love the faithful in all things (men) more than ourselves, so that it (repentance) may bless us, as it did the Shunammite. Let us not be passionate lovers of shameful deeds, lest it destroy us from its presence, as it did to Ahijah and Zedekiah, who were burned in the fire by the king of Babylon. Let us hate sin for the sake of our souls, even unto death, so that it may help us in our hour of need, as it did for Susanna. Let us not crave various delicacies, lest it forsake us, just as it did not forsake those who received food from Nebuchadnezzar's table. Let us love suffering in all things, so that it may rejoice over us, as it did over those who were with Azariah. Let us not be deceitful, like the Babylonians who grumbled against the faithful. Let us perform our (prayerful) services without indulging the sloth of the body, like Daniel, who preferred to die rather than abandon the prayers he offered daily. For God is powerful to preserve those who love Him from temptations and to destroy the wicked. Thus, the faith of the righteous (Daniel) toward God turned the beasts into lambs and sheep. Blessed is the God of repentance, and blessed is he who loves Him (repentance) and submits his neck to the yoke of His will (repentance), until he is reborn from above by the will of God.

29. Therefore, brother, a person needs great discernment, the cutting off of every carnal desire, and vigilance in all his ways, so that he may not go astray or fall into the hands of his enemies (of repentance). Thus, a tendency toward self-righteousness hardens him, the condemnation of sinners drives him away, and the humiliation of the negligent cuts him off. It is written about him in Proverbs: “The paths to her house are narrow; the sluggard’s bread he does not eat. She makes fine garments for her husband. She is like a merchant ship trading from afar: she gathers wealth for herself” (Prov. 31: 27, 22, 14). Let us therefore seek to understand this from these words. A merchant, when loading a ship, places in it not just one kind of goods, but everything from which, as he knows, he will make a profit. When he sees someone suffering a loss, he does not compete with that person, but rather with those who have grown rich and are living in peace in their homes. He turns away from anything that brings a loss, and he acquires anything that brings a profit until he can buy it for himself. His unchanging rule is this: whatever brings him profit, he must strive to purchase more of the same, and ask those who do not envy him—those who have grown wealthy and rest in their homes—how much to sell this for and how much to buy that for. Such is the soul that desires to meet God without hindrance. It is not satisfied with a single venture, but seeks out every venture that is profitable (for salvation); and if it learns of a venture that is unprofitable, it flees from it so as not to suffer a loss.

30. Now, my brother, have you called yourself a merchant of Jesus? Then take care to be one. The King’s trade is far removed from anything that brings loss. Here are the things that are unprofitable to Him: human glory, pride, self-righteousness, arrogance, hurtful words, self-indulgence, boasting, and a love of entertainment. All these things are unprofitable to the merchants of Jesus, and it is impossible for them to please Him if they have such things in their shop. Examine yourself, brother: what is within you? Let your mind scrutinize your emotions—which of them bear fruit for God, and which are drawn toward sin. Are your eyes not captivated by the sweetness of pleasure? Is your tongue not overcome by insolence? Do you not see your heart delighting in human honor? Do your ears not delight in slander? All of this is detrimental to the mind. In the Book of Leviticus it is written: “Thus you shall say to Aaron: ‘You shall not bring to My altar any of the clean animals that has a blemish, lest you die’” (Lev. 22:18, 20). Aaron is a symbol of the mind. Since the enemy (usually) mingles his evil with righteous undertakings, God commanded that they be examined before being offered to Him, lest one die. To die, however, means to descend from contemplation and enter into agreement with those who seek to defile one’s senses.

31. Such are the words of those who have loved Jesus and placed their trust in Him! And their souls became a bride adorned with every virtue, possessing her own holy mirror, according to the words of the Apostle: “But we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord” (2 Cor. 3: 18). For “now we see in a mirror, dimly, but then we shall see Him face to face” (1 Cor. 13:12). Thus, those who have become His brides through purity look within themselves, as in a mirror, to see if there is any blemish on their faces that might displease their Bridegroom. For He seeks virgins, pure souls without blemish, as it is written of Rebekah, that she was very fair and had never known a man (Gen. 24:16). And the Prophet says: “Virgins will be brought to the King in her wake; her faithful ones will be brought to You” (Ps. 44:15). “Will be brought” points to His holy humanity, and “her faithful ones” points to their attachment to Him. Since rebirth through holy baptism has renewed them from all corruption, and repentance purifies them and makes them holy virgins who have forgotten all corruption and no longer remember it, as the Prophet said to them: “Hear, O daughter, and see; incline your ear, and forget your people and your father’s house. Then the King will desire your beauty” (Ps. 44:11–12). And all the heavenly powers will marvel at her because of the purity with which repentance has cleansed her and made her one body with the Lord, and they will say: “Who is this coming up, white and beautiful, supported by her brother?” (Song of Songs 8:5)?

32. Let us therefore devote all our strength, with tears, to striving little by little until we cast off the deeds of the old man, and to guard ourselves against every harmful act, until His love comes to us and, having taken away from us the image of the earthly, places in our hearts His holy, heavenly image, so that we may be worthy of Him, pure from every vice, as the Apostle said: “Just as we have put on the image of the earthly, so shall we put on the image of the heavenly” (1 Cor. 15:49). Since the Apostle knew that there is no man without sin since the time of the Fall, and that repentance can restore a person to sinless renewal, he therefore said that we should abandon the deeds of one who has transgressed the Commandment and perform the deeds—that is, the holy Commandments of our Lord Jesus Christ, who created mercy and bore the bondage of man in order to lead him into the hidden paradise and bestow upon him all His holy virtues, allowing him to taste of the tree of life, which is the purity manifested by Him in Himself, and having pacified the Cherubim with their flaming weapons, which were set to guard the way to the tree of life—which is the knowledge of His holy words, protecting them (the faithful) at all times—and shielding their ears from every word of the serpent, reminding them of the bitter bondage into which they had previously fallen, so that they might not return to it, and teaching them to give thanks unceasingly to Him who redeemed them with His precious blood. He blotted out the record of their bondage by the Cross (Col. 2: 14) and made them brothers and friends (John 15: 14; 20:17), having poured out His Spirit upon them by grace and comforted their hearts, He said, “I am ascending to My Father and your Father, and to My God and your God” (John 20:17). Furthermore: “Father, I desire that wherever I am, they also may be with Me, for I have loved them as You have loved Me” (John 17: 24, 23). He also showed us that He did not say this about everyone, but about those who, having set aside their own wills, followed His holy will and cut off from themselves every desire for this world. For He said: “I have chosen them out of the world; therefore the world hates them, because they are not of the world” (John 15:19; 17:9, 14). Do you see that those who have forsaken worldly things—they are the ones who have been deemed worthy to be the brides of the Lord Jesus? They abide in union with Him, as the Apostle said: “For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two will become one flesh. This mystery is profound, and I am speaking in reference to Christ and the Church” (Eph. 5: 31, 32). And again he said: “to be a co-heir, a fellow member of the body, and a partaker of His promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel” (Eph. 3: 6). Do you see that His Holy Spirit dwells in those who have been deemed worthy to become one body with the Lord? And He helps them; He cares for them, as the Lord said: “It is not you who will speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you” (Matt. 10:20). Likewise, the Apostle says: “But God has revealed these things to us through His Spirit; for the Spirit searches all things, even the depths of God” (1 Cor. 2:10). “We,” he says further, “have the mind of Christ” (v. 16). How, then, is it possible for the mind of Christ to think of any sin?

33. Consider this mystery with your heart, brother: every kind on earth gives birth to its own kind, not to a different kind—whether it be livestock, a wild animal, a reptile, or a bird. Why did God bring them all to Adam—to see if there was anything like him? And none was found, because they were not of his nature. Then God, taking one of Adam’s ribs, created her as his wife, just as He had taken her from the man. This great mystery is also found in those who become brides of Christ, since they are of His very essence through rebirth and of His holy body, as the Apostle says: “We are all one body in Christ, and individually members of one another” (Rom. 12:5). And again: “For we are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones” (Eph. 5:30). Do you see what He desires? That a person be like Him in every way, just as Eve came from Adam and is like him in every way. Why, if we possess something of the foolishness of beasts, or the greed of wild animals, or the fickleness of birds, or the venom of reptiles, then such souls cannot be virgins and brides to Him, because they are not in accordance with His deeds. Do you see, brother, how He desires that a person be like Him, free from all unnaturalness, so as to be deemed worthy to be His bride? The soul recognizes its own thoughts through its deeds. If it performs the works of the Spirit, then (it is clear that) the Holy Spirit dwells within it, since the works of the Spirit regenerate the soul, making it dispassionate. And it is impossible for the Holy Spirit not to dwell in such a soul, as the Lord said: “If you love Me, keep My commandments. And I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Comforter—the Spirit of truth” (John 14: 15–17). And the Apostle also says: “Or do you not know yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you—unless, of course, you are unwise?” (2 Cor. 13: 5).

34. Do you see that if anyone does not possess the works of Jesus, he is unwise and is not His bride? All the virgins prepared their lamps, but those who lacked the works were left outside the door. A net cast into the sea gathered [all kinds of fish], but [only the good ones] were accepted into the kingdom. The weeds grew up with the wheat, but when the harvest came, they were bound in bundles and thrown into the fire. All the branches remained on the vine, but those that bore no fruit were cast into the fire. The sheep grazed together with the goats, but He brought only the sheep with Him, while the goats were cast out. The sower sowed all his seeds equally, but was pleased only with those that grew in good soil. The one who gave silver (talents, mnás) gave it without partiality, but only the one who doubled it brought him joy. All were invited to the wedding, but the one who did not have wedding clothes (the king) commanded to be cast into eternal darkness. These words apply to us, because we all say we believe, but those who do not have the works of His divinity, He will cast out, as He said: “For many are called, but few are chosen” (Matt. 22:14).

35. Let us examine ourselves, brothers, and consider our deeds before we meet the Lord. Let us not look to those who follow the carnal desires of their hearts, lest we lose the great wealth we are to find in the hour of need. Let us strive to acquire it, and let us despise what we have to leave behind as an enemy. Let us think of those who spent all their labor on the pursuit of perishable (goods), who abandoned them and departed, and for that reason inherited Gehenna, because they did not wish to follow in the footsteps of the Lord, so as to be deemed worthy to be His brides. Let us therefore strive before God with tears, with a sorrowful heart and secret groaning, so that (He may not allow us) to fall into such disgrace as theirs. For when a storm rages at sea, and many ships are lost while others remain intact, they do not say, “We too will sink into the abyss like them,” but rather they encourage one another not to lose heart and implore God to help them. Truly, a great storm is raging on earth. Let us, then, compel ourselves in every way to labor, and cry out to the Lord, lest we perish: just as when a storm arises at sea, the captain of the ship always finds, among both the sailors and the passengers, those who encourage him. (Let us know that) if a person does not rid himself of every thing that leads to destruction, he cannot be saved from this stormy sea. And Moses could not sing a song to the Lord until he had crossed the sea and seen the death of those who had sought to keep his people in Egypt, so that they might remain there as slaves. And when he had already led them across, when they had become completely free, only then did he cry out: “Let us sing to the Lord, for He has triumphed gloriously; He has cast horse and rider into the sea” (Ex. 15:1).

36. Thus, when the mind rescues the soul’s senses from the desires of the flesh and transcends them, then the pillar of contemplation will separate the soul from the desires of the flesh. Then, if God sees the shamelessness of the passions as they rush upon the soul, seeking to keep its senses in sin, while the mind sits unceasingly with God in secret, He sends Him His help and destroys them all at once, as it is written: “The Lord said to Moses: ‘Why do you cry out to Me? Command the sons of Israel to prepare themselves. And you, take the staff that is in your hand and strike the water of the sea—and it will become dry’” (Ex. 14:15–16). God is faithful to extend His hand (of help) to Moses even now, to save Israel (the people) from the hands of the Egyptians—whose desires we once fulfilled—so that we too may be deemed worthy to sing a new song to Him, saying, “Let us sing to the Lord, for He has glorified Himself.” But how can we say, “For He has been glorified,” if we cling to our enemies and turn to Egypt of our own free will, craving the food there, and urging Aaron: ‘Make us gods’ who would lead us back to Egypt (Ex. 32:1)—and if we are so humbled by our faintheartedness that we despise spiritual food? But God is mighty enough to bring Moses back to us from the mountain to destroy the goring calf, by which we have provoked God to anger. God, who has granted us repentance, is able to bring us back to Himself once more, and to strengthen Moses to pray for us, saying: “If You will forgive their sins, forgive them; but if not, blot me out of the book of life” (Ex. 32:32), and to clothe Jesus with power, in due time, to destroy the seven nations who, through their envious deceit, have made the Promised Land their own—so that Israel may receive its inheritance, living in it without envy forever and ever. Amen. His is the power, His is the help, His is the protection, His is the wisdom, His is the guardianship. He is in us, O Lord Jesus Christ, to the glory and honor of God the Father and the Holy Spirit, “ ” before the ages, now, and forever and ever. Amen. When you read this, brother, take care to put it into practice, so that the Lord may cover you in the hour of temptation. Amen.

26. The words passed down by Abba Peter, a disciple of Isaiah

1. My father said: Be courageous in restoring what needs to be corrected. Purity prays to God. The fear of God and self-restraint (in all things) put away sins. If a person harbors a spirit of vengeance in his heart, his prayer is in vain. Do not seek advice or words (about matters) of this age, and do not give it yourself to those who ask you. Keep your ears constantly open to those who speak within you, and pray to God to grant you the gift of knowing whose words to obey. Exert your strength—do not say one thing with your lips while harboring another in your heart.

2. He said again that humbling oneself before God with reason, and obeying the commandments with humility, bring about love, and love brings about dispassion.

3. He also said that one who practices silence must examine himself every hour to see if he has passed beyond those who are meant to hold him aloft, and if he has been freed from them while still remaining here.

For as long as he remains subject to their bondage, he has not yet been freed (from them). That is why toil lies before him until grace is with him.

4. He said again: A person who harbors condemnation in his heart is far from God's grace. When I asked him about this, he said: If you wish to follow our Lord, Jesus Christ, keep His word; if you wish to crucify the old man with Him, you must cut off those who lead you away from the cross, prepare yourself to endure humiliation, soothe the hearts of those who embitter you, humble yourself, rule over your desires, keep your lips silent, and not condemn anyone in your heart.

5. He also said that one who is in silence must have such a fear of encountering God that it anticipates even his breath; for as long as sin draws his heart toward itself, the fear has not yet been perfected in him, and mercy is still far from him.

6. He said again: "This is what is pitiful—that we have dispassion on our lips, yet lawlessness and evil in our hearts."

7. He also said that if a person does not strive, even unto death, to make his body like that which the beloved Jesus bore, he will not meet Him with joy, nor will he yet be freed from bitter bondage.

8. And this is what he said further: "Have mercy! Have mercy! Have mercy! To what state has the soul come! In what purity was it created, and under what power does it now stand, and by what vanity is it bound!"

9. He also said: "As long as you are in this body, I beg you, do not let your heart slacken, for just as a man cannot expect any fruit from his faith while it is still sprouting in his field—because he does not know what will become of it before it is stored in his granaries—so a man cannot let his heart slacken 'as long as there is breath in his nostrils' (Job 27:3), and just as a man does not know what affliction will befall him until his last breath, so a man must not let his heart slacken as long as he has breath, but he must always cry out to God for His help and mercy.

10. I asked him, saying, "Father, what is humility, and what gives rise to it?" And he said to me, "Obedience, the cutting off of one's own will in humility without effort, purity, bearing insults, and enduring the words of one's neighbor without burden—this is what humility is."

11. He said again: "Blessed is he who has acquired the new man before meeting Christ." The Apostle also said that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 15:50), and he further said: "If there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not acting like mere mortals and walking according to the flesh?" (1 Cor. 3:3)?

12. He also said: We find ourselves in such tribulations from our enemies because we have not properly recognized our sins and have not experienced sorrow with understanding; for if sorrow were revealed in us, it would lay bare our sins before us. But when we are granted to see our sins in truth, then we will be ashamed even to look upon the faces of those standing before us, or even upon shameless women, because they are more honorable than we are; for they commit their sins with such boldness because they do not know God, whereas our hearts are filled with sin, even though we are believers.

13. He said again: Enduring reproach and yielding one's will to one's neighbor according to God, so as not to allow the enemy to enter among us, reveals a person of action; for if anyone has an alert mind and stands with reason at the feet of the Lord Jesus, he will take care to cut off his own will—so as not to be separated from his beloved Lord. But the one who holds fast to his own will in everything is not at peace even with the faithful, because timidity, anger, and resentment toward his brother accompany his heart everywhere. The one who says, "Nothing will happen to me if I speak or listen," is like a blind man who, whether being led in or led out, does not see the light. Understand this from what happens to the sun: even a small passing cloud can obscure its brightness and warmth. But this is not evident to everyone, only to those who possess knowledge.

14. He said again: A person who is always looking at his own sins has no tongue with which to speak to anyone.

15. He said again: "Hate everything in the world, and the rest of the flesh, because they make you an enemy of God. Just as a person who has an enemy wages war against him, so we must wage war against our own body, so as not to give it any rest."

16. He said again: A practitioner who loves God must pay attention to every thought of his own, and examine and discern them to see whether they originate from his body or not. For as long as unnatural desires have power over any of his members, to that extent he is not yet considered a virgin.

17. I asked him: What is the meaning of the words of the Gospel prayer, "Hallowed be Thy name"? And he said: This applies to the perfect, for it is impossible for the name of God to be hallowed within us, who are possessed by passions.

18. He said again: "Our ancient fathers said that withdrawal (from the world) is flight from the body (renunciation of the body) and contemplation of death."

19. He spoke again about peace with one's neighbors, saying that where there is no peace, God does not dwell. But whoever sees his own sins also sees peace. For it is not sin that leaves no room for God's dwelling, but humility. David, he says, having sinned with Uriah's wife, found nothing to offer to God as a sacrifice for his sins except the following words: "A broken spirit is a sacrifice to God; a broken and contrite heart, O God, You will not despise" (Ps. 50:19).

20. He said again that cowardice and the condemnation of others fill the mind with rebellion and prevent it from seeing the light of God.

21. He said again: "Strive with all your strength to avoid the following three passions that corrupt the soul: greed, ambition, and the love of ease; for when they gain the upper hand over the soul, they prevent it from prospering."

22. He said again: "If, while you are sitting in your cell, a thought comes to you to judge your neighbor, then judge him by measuring your own sins, concluding that your sins are greater than those of your neighbor. Likewise, if it occurs to you that you are doing righteous deeds, do not assume that they are pleasing to God." Every healthy part of the body cares for the sick part, saying, "I have something in common with it," and sympathizes with it until it recovers. The hard-hearted person says in his heart, "I have never sinned," but the one who has acquired humility bears his neighbor's reproach, saying, "It is I who have sinned." He who despises humility holds in his heart that he is wise and has never hurt anyone, but he who fears God cares for the virtues, lest even one of them be lost.

23. He said again: "If, while sitting in your cell, you perform the service (leitorgian) to God, and your heart is drawn to anything that is not of God, yet you think that this is not a sin—that these are merely thoughts and not sin—then (know that) the service you perform in silence is not true. If you say, "God accepts the service of the heart that I have performed in silence," then (you must agree that) even when your heart is in league with evil in silence, that silence is counted as a sin against God.

24. I asked him, and he told me that one who finds no help in times of war and peace cannot believe.

25. He spoke again about teaching, saying that fear is inherent in this matter, lest one sin against what one teaches; for as soon as one sins, one can no longer teach.

26. He spoke again about Holy Communion: "Woe is me! Woe is me! For if I associate with the enemies of God, what kind of communion can I have with Him? Thus, I partake of the Eucharist to my own judgment and condemnation. For this is the word we speak: "Holy things for the holy," that is, the holy (should receive) these holy (mysteries). But if I am holy, who then are those who act within me?"

27. I asked him, saying, "What is the fear of God?" And he told me that a person who is drawn to anything that is not of God does not have the fear of God.

28. I asked him again, "What is a servant of God?" And he told me that as long as a person is enslaved to his passions, he cannot be considered a servant of God; rather, he is a servant of whatever possesses him.

29. I said again: "Woe is me! Woe is me! For I have not striven to purify myself in order to receive grace. Woe is me! Woe is me! For I have not striven to triumph over my enemies in battle, so that I might reign with Christ; for how can one who is enslaved to others draw near to his King? Woe is me!" Woe is me! For Your name, O Lord, rests upon me, yet I serve Your enemies. Woe is me! Woe is me! For I partake of food that my God abhors, and because of this He does not heal me.

30. I visited him when he was sick and found him suffering greatly. Seeing the sorrow in my heart because of his suffering, he said to me: "Only when subjected to such infirmities can I barely recall that bitter hour; but the health of the flesh is of no use (for such pursuits)." It seeks robust health in order to wage war against God, but the tree that is watered daily does not wither and does not cease to bear fruit (according to its kind).

31. He said again: "A person needs a courageous and noble heart to care for the observance of God's commandments."

32. He said again: “Woe is me! Woe is me! For I have accusers before me—some I know, and some I do not know—and I cannot renounce them. Woe is me! Woe is me! For I have accusers, and how can I meet my Lord and His saints when my enemies have left not a single part of me sound before His face?!”

33. I asked him, “What must a person of silence do?” And he said to me, “A person of silence needs the following three [virtues]: constant fear, unceasing prayer, and unrelenting vigilance over his own heart.”

34. He said again that a man of silence must guard himself so as not to hear a single word that is unprofitable to him, for this destroys his labor.

35. He also spoke of Abba Serapion, recounting that when an elder asked him, “Out of love, tell me, how do you see yourself?” he replied, “I am like one who, standing on a tower and looking out, waves to those passing by so that they will not approach him.” And the elder who had asked him said: “I see myself as having built a fence around myself and locked it with iron bolts, so that when someone knocks, I do not know who is there, or where they came from, or what they want, or what they are like, and I do not open the door for them until they leave.”

36. He said again: “Whoever seeks the Lord with a contrite heart, He hears that person if he asks for it with understanding, and diligently seeks Him with a contrite heart, and is not bound by anything worldly, but cares for his soul with fear, so that he may present it blameless before God’s judgment seat by his own strength.”

27. On “Take heed to yourself” (Deut. 15:9)

1. Pay close attention to yourself, daring and believing that our Lord Jesus Christ, who is God, and possessing ineffable glory and greatness, became an example for us, “that we may follow in His footsteps” (1 Peter 2:21), and for our sake humbled Himself with the greatest and most immeasurable humility, taking the form of a servant, becoming poor, regarding disgrace as nothing, enduring many shameful insults, and as it is written, “Like a sheep led to the slaughter, and like a lamb before its shearer is silent, so He did not open His mouth. In humility His judgment was taken away” (Isaiah 53:7–8)—and (finally) He endured death with great reproach for our sake: so that we too, in accordance with His commandment and because of our own sins, might willingly endure it, whether anyone, justly or unjustly, reviles us or slanders us, and—what can we say—even if they drive us to death, let us be led like a lamb to the slaughter, and let us be, like senseless cattle, not resisting at all, but rather, if we can, praying, or at least remaining silent, with great humility.

2. Pay close attention to this, believing that it is most beneficial and salvific for the soul to endure insults and dishonor for God’s sake, and to bear them willingly and serenely, reflecting that, because of my sins, I deserve to suffer even more, and that in every way I am deemed worthy to suffer and bear something for the Lord, so that, perhaps, through many sufferings and humiliations, I may, even if only in a small way, become an imitator of the sufferings of my God. And whenever you remember those who have insulted you, pray for them from the heart and sincerely, as for those who have brought you great blessings, without complaining against them in the least.

3. Take great care to regard as a great death, as the ruin of your soul and eternal torment, and thus to despise and utterly hate self-seeking and the love of glory—the desire for glory, or honor, or human praise—and also the thought that you are something, or that you have accomplished some virtue, or that you are better than anyone else; and cut off every shameful desire and carnal pleasure, even the slightest; likewise, do not allow yourself to socialize with anyone unnecessarily, or to touch another’s body, or to eat even a little out of turn; so that, by keeping yourself in this way and guarding yourself in small matters, you may not fall into grave sins, and, by despising the small things, may not gradually sin in greater ones.

4. Take great care to consider yourself, from the bottom of your heart and in truth, the least and most sinful of all Christians, and always keep your soul weeping, humbled, and groaning; and, as one unworthy and foolish, always remain silent, and in general do not speak unless necessary.

5. Take care to always remember and keep before your eyes the eternal fire, the eternal torments, and those condemned to it, and consider yourself more one of those there than one of the living.

6. Pay close attention to yourself, knowing that our Lord died and rose again for us, so that you may no longer live for yourself but for the Lord, who “died and rose again” for us (2 Cor. 5:15), taking courage and believing that you are always in His presence, and that He sees your heart.

7. Pay close attention to yourself, always being ready to obey God's will—whether it be death, life, or any kind of suffering—with all your desire and faith, and always expecting the great and terrible trials that will come upon you, along with sorrows, torments, and the most bitter death.

8. Be very careful that, as one who stands before God, you do nothing without His will, not even the smallest thing. Whatever you wish to do—whether to speak, act, visit someone, eat, drink, go to sleep, or do anything else—first ascertain whether it is according to God, and confess the reason why you desire it; then do it as is fitting before God. In this way, in all your deeds and words, confess yourself to God, so that you may gain greater familiarity with Him and greater boldness before Him.

9. Pay close attention to yourself so that, if anyone offends you in any way and you feel sorrow or anger, you remain silent and say nothing except what is proper until you have first calmed your heart through prayer; only then should you finally speak with your brother. If you need to rebuke a brother, and you find yourself in a state of anger and agitation, then by no means say anything to him, lest you become even more upset. But when you see that both you and he are in a good frame of mind and gentle disposition, then speak to him—not as one who rebukes, but as one who reminds, with all humility.

10. Be very mindful to expect daily the temptation that is coming upon you—whether it be death, or great sorrows and misfortunes—and (when it comes) endure it willingly and without confusion, remembering that “we must through many tribulations enter the kingdom of God” (Acts 14:22).

11. Be very careful, in everything that lies before you—whether in word, deed, or thought—not to seek your own will or your own peace, but to discern God's will carefully, and carry it out perfectly; and even if it seems difficult, endure it and do it for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, believing with all your heart that it is beneficial to you, more so than all human wisdom: for His commandment is eternal life, and “those who seek the Lord shall not lack any good thing” (Ps. 33:11).

12. Be mindful at all times, as if you were always in the presence of God, so that you expect nothing from anyone but everything from Him alone, with faith. And whatever you may need, pray to God that you may receive what you need according to His will. Give thanks to God always for all that you have, as He has granted it all to you. If you lose something, do not place your hope in any person; likewise, do not grieve or complain against anyone, but bear it cheerfully and without distress, thinking to yourself: “I deserve even greater sorrows because of my sins; however, if God wishes to have mercy on me, He can.” If you maintain this attitude, He will provide for all your needs.

13. Pay close attention to yourself: do not agree to accept anything unless you are certain that God is sending it to you as a reward for your righteous labors; and then accept it with complete peace of mind. But when you see that it comes from injustice, strife, deceit, or hypocrisy, reject and cast it aside, remembering that “better is a small portion with the fear of the Lord than great treasures without fear” (Prov. 15:16).

14. Pay close attention to yourself, and compel yourself to remain silent, so that God may grant you the strength to struggle and strive. But if someone needs to speak with you, and you first discern for yourself that this need is blessed, and that in this case it is better before God to speak than to remain silent—then finally open your mouth with the fear of God and trembling, keeping your face downcast and your words respectful and appropriate. When you speak with someone, speak sparingly out of love, and fall silent as soon as possible. If you are asked about something, say only what is necessary, and say nothing more.

15. Take great care to abstain not only from sexual immorality but also from lust of the eyes, the ears, the tongue, and the touch; keep your eyes focused only on yourself and your work, and do not turn them toward another person, unless you see that there is a blessed need for it. As for a woman or a man of attractive appearance, do not look at them at all unless it is necessary. Do not allow your ears to hear anything against anyone, nor idle conversations. Let your lips remain silent and speak only when necessary.

16. When you read this, my beloved, do your utmost to ensure its fulfillment, so that God may protect you in the hour of temptation. Amen.

28. On the Branches of Evil

1. It is necessary to speak of the branches of evil so that a person may know what passion is and what separates him from God, and may pray for His grace regarding each of them—that His help may be with him and that He may give him the strength to fight against them until he is able to cast them off entirely. For they are wounds in the soul and separate it from God.

2. Blessed is the one who has cast them off, for he will be a wise sheep, fit for God's altar, and will hear the joyful voice of the Lord: "Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, I will set you over many things; enter into the joy of your Lord" (Matt. 25:21). But those who wish to follow their fleshly desires and refuse to heal themselves with the holy medicine of repentance in order to become pure—in the hour of need they will be found naked, lacking the garment of virtue, and will be cast into utter darkness, where the devil dwells, clothed in the garments of the passions, which are: fornication, lust, greed, slander, anger, envy, vanity, and pride. These are the very branches (of evil), and there are many like them, such as: intemperance, adornment of the body, entertainment, sloth, frivolous speech, shameless glances, the desire for expansion, unscrupulousness, disregard for God's judgment, envy of one's neighbor, lying against a brother, seeking to please men, false testimony, false knowledge, the desire to teach, love for the customs of the world, faintheartedness, impatience, hatred of one's neighbor, failure to reproach oneself (unself-awareness and complacency), love for human glory rather than the glory of God, flaunting one's deeds to be glorified by people, a love for exquisite delicacies, indulging in carnal passions in the heart, regarding self-denial (or self-abasement) as a temptation, boasting of one's knowledge, quarrelsomeness, insisting on one's own will, regarding oneself as intelligent and wise, regarding one's brother as foolish, and humiliating him.

3. All this takes place in a poor soul until it separates it from God. These are the heavy burdens that Adam took upon himself when he ate from the tree. It is of these that it is said: "He took our infirmities and bore our diseases" (Isa. 53:4...). It is these that our Lord Jesus Christ put to death on the cross. They are the old wineskins into which no new wine is poured. They are the grave clothes with which Lazarus was bound. They are the demons whom Christ sent into the herd of pigs. This is the old man, whom the Apostle commanded us to put off. This is what he said: "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 15:50). This is what he says: "For if you live according to the flesh, you will die" (Rom. 8:13). These are the tares that sprang up from the soil of Adam when he was cast out of Paradise.

4. But Christ's yoke is light: anger-free purity, kindness, meekness, joy of the spirit, self-control over passions, love for all, holy reasoning, unshakable faith, endurance of afflictions, regarding oneself as a stranger to the world, and the desire to depart from the body and meet Christ. These are the light burdens that Christ has commanded us to bear. This is the path on which the saints undertook many labors until they completed it. This is what no one can attain unless they cast off the old man, free themselves from him, and acquire love—and love makes them carefree regarding everything. But this love cannot be kindled within us as long as we love anything of this world, as it is written: "You cannot partake of the Lord's table and the table of demons" (1 Cor. 10:21). And Isaiah says: "Who will tell you that fire is burning? Who will tell you of the eternal place? (unless) he walks in righteousness, speaks the right path, hates lawlessness and injustice, and shakes his hands free from bribes: he who stops his ears from hearing of bloodshed and shuts his eyes from seeing injustice—he will dwell in the heights of a cave in a strong rock: "Bread will be given to him, and his water will be sure" (Isa. 33: 14–16).

5. Do you see what honor God bestows upon those who strive in this brief time and have cast off the burden of the world by enduring their sorrows? Do you see how God's help comes upon those who have cut off their own desires and erases all passions within them, because they have followed God's will? But those who cling to their own desires and wish to fulfill them—though they "begin in the Spirit"—are unable to stand firm against their enemies because of their desire to fulfill their own will, and so they "end in the flesh" (Gal. 3: 3), rendering their labor vain and fruitless. For this, the prophet Jeremiah rebukes them, saying, "Cursed is the one who does the work of the Lord carelessly" (Jer. 48:10).

6. Do you see that if some, desiring to serve God, are enslaved to their passions, God does not dwell with them, but, leaving them to their own will, delivers them into the hands of those who hate them? And instead of the honor they seek from people, they receive reproach for not having stood up to their enemies until God came to their aid and humbled them (the enemies). Thus, without toil, sweat, and suffering, a person is not heard by God, according to all the Scriptures.

7. Let us therefore implore God's mercy with all our hearts, with tears and sorrow, submitting to every person for the Lord's sake, humbling ourselves even before our brothers, as though they were wiser than we are, repaying no one evil for evil, and harboring no evil thoughts in our hearts toward anyone, but remaining united in heart, saying nothing about the needs of the world or about anything: "This is mine," but examining our minds daily to see how far they have progressed, and guarding them so that they do not entertain impure thoughts, —depriving our body of satiety, so that it may not demand from us the satisfaction of its passions—so that the body may humble itself before the soul, and the soul may submit to the mind and become a bride, pure from every defilement, and call out to her bridegroom, saying: “Let my brother come down into his garden, and let him eat of its fruit” (Song of Songs 5:1).

8. Let us therefore strive, brothers, so that, having gained such boldness toward Him, we too may hear the word He spoke: “I desire that wherever I am, they also may be with Me”; for I have loved them as You have loved Me, Father. “You are in Me, and I am in them” (John 17:23–24). May the Holy Trinity, consubstantial and without beginning, show mercy to us, that we may find rest, together with all His saints, on the Day of Judgment. To Him be glory and power forever and ever. Amen.

29. Lamentations

1. Woe to us, fleeting and transient beings, that because of our temporary, lawless, carnal lusts, we will not behold the glory of the Lord!

2. Woe to us, for although “the perishable must put on the imperishable” (1 Cor. 15:50), we, having despised the imperishable, are irresistibly drawn to the perishable!

3. Woe to us, for we nourish our flesh—which is destined to decay into worms and putrefaction—in sin, fearing neither the fire that will torment us eternally nor the worm that never sleeps!

4. Woe to us, for our bodies—defiled by impurities—are honored with bows and kisses by Christ-loving people, while we are like whitewashed tombs, harboring deadly sin within us!

5. Woe to us, for through intemperance in food and delicacies we store up within ourselves the seeds of lust, and through this we are stirred up to lawless carnal union!

6. Woe to us, for we do not compare corruption with incorruption, nor do we fear God’s divine and terrible justice!

7. Woe to us, for we are faint-hearted in doing good, yet zealous and quick to do evil!

8. Woe to us, for we have made our body—which is capable of being a dwelling place of eternal light—a dwelling place of eternal darkness!

9. Woe to us, for He who became the Son of Man, consubstantial with God the Father, has no place to lay His head within us—though He became incarnate for our sake—while evil foxes and deceitful spirits have made their dens within us!

10. Woe to us, for those who are righteous in heart will present their souls to the Judge as blameless and their bodies as holy and unstained, while we, having defiled souls and unclean bodies, must await nothing but condemnation to eternal torment!

11. Woe to us, for though we are lovers of injustice and all impurity, we demand for ourselves the honor due to the saints!

12. Woe to us, for though we are the condemned, guilty of many sins, we mingle among the saints and the meek as if we were pure and free!

13. Woe to us, for though we are full of transgressions, we admonish and instruct those who are far better than we are!

14. Woe to us, for having a log in our own eye, yet acting as if we were blameless, we pass judgment and take offense at the slightest (like a splinter) faults of our brothers!

15. Woe to us, for we bind heavy and unbearable burdens upon others, yet we ourselves, as if we were the weakest in body, refuse even to touch them with a finger!

16. Woe to us, for though we are lacking in the divine monastic life, we rush without shame to teach others active virtue!

17. Woe to us, for having forgotten our past sins, we neither agonize over nor weep for our new ones!

18. Woe to us, for having begun well with God’s help and grace, we have now become carnal!

19. Woe to us, for we have become so mired in impure thoughts that, as if we did not see our own sins, we ask whether we have committed them!

20. Woe to us, for when we eat and drink, we do not remember the battle raging within us because of our gluttony!

21. Woe to us, for as soon as the demons stir up lustful memories within us, they find us already ready for them, in harmony with our thoughts!

22. Woe to us, for having abandoned divine prayers and thoughtful readings, we spend our days in empty daydreams and idle chatter!
23. Woe to us, for our hearts are so hardened that, though we often strive earnestly for contrition and tears, we fail to achieve it because of our extreme negligence and sloth!
24. Woe to us, for when God said, "The soul that sins shall die" (Ezek. 18:4), we do not care about it in the least, even though it sins ceaselessly.
25. Woe to us, for while our body is prone to sin because of satiety and pleasures, we stir up impure and vile thoughts to the point of lust, receive the arrows of the Evil One into our hearts through our eyes, and through physical contact become lustful beasts, neither considering our rational dignity nor fearing eternal torment!
26. Woe to us, for we groan and worry much about the sufferings and illnesses of the flesh, yet we remain insensitive to the wounds and incurable diseases of the soul!
27. Woe to us, for the sovereign power of the soul is subject to its slave—the flesh—and the worse prevails over the better, rather than both working in a single desire for the God who created them!
28. Woe to us, for our sins are renewed by evil and impure thoughts, and we fail to distinguish between God's withdrawal from us and the invasion of impure spirits within us!
29. Woe to us, for, being foolish and unwise, we love and admire the praise of the saints rather than their feats and deeds.
30. Woe to us, for in keeping God's commandments we show neither the fear of servants, nor the zeal and prudence of hired men, nor the love of sons!
31. Woe to us, for in order to please people, we do not refuse to say and do everything, without caring about what is righteous!
32. Woe to us, for we are ashamed before men when we sin, yet pay no heed to eternal shame.
33. Woe to us, for though we were born of poor and obscure parents, we did not know ourselves—we did not think of ourselves—yet having vowed before God a life of poverty and obscurity, we have become so conceited that we demand to be placed on a par with the rich and the famous!
34. Woe to us, for in the world we were abstinent because of poverty, but now, having been called to abstinence, we are very concerned with satisfying our stomachs and the comfort of the flesh!
35. Woe to us, for while the angels gather around those who fear God, and the demons around those who do not fear Him and transgress His commandments, we place ourselves in the ranks of the demons!
36. Woe to us, for when we meet and converse with the rich and powerful, we strive to please them, yet when the poor approach us as supplicants, we turn away from them as if they were a nuisance!
37. Woe to us, for we do not treat every person as our duty requires, but act as we see fit and as we please.
38. Woe to us, for we precisely define our rights (our claims), judge them, and teach about them, yet we have strayed far from doing good!
39. And woe to us, for we carefully clear the land of thorns and thistles and other plants harmful to the fruit, yet we do not carefully purify our souls with the fear of God from the evil and impure thoughts that corrupt the holy virtues!
40. Woe to us, for even though we are to depart from this earth, where we live as strangers, we spend many years preoccupied with earthly and perishable things, yet at the time of our imminent departure from here, we will not be granted any authority over any of them!
41. Woe to us, for we must give an account to the dreadful Judge of every deed of our earthly life, every idle word, and every evil and impure thought and memory of our soul—yet we are so carefree about our souls as if we were not to be held accountable for the entirety of our lives!
42. Woe to us indeed, not only because of our wickedness and lawlessness, by which we have sinned, but also because of our contempt for God's promises and our unbelief in them!
43. Woe to us, for like fools we have clung to corruption, and though we had the opportunity, through a life according to the Gospel, to be united with incorruption, because of our love for earthly things, we have remained strangers to eternal incorruption!
44. Woe to us, for we have preferred loathsome corruption to incorruptibility!
45. Woe to us, for though we had the opportunity to overcome every form of sensuality, out of self-indulgence we chose instead to be overcome by our passions!

46. Woe to us, for we are ashamed and afraid to sin in the sight of people, yet before the eyes of Him who sees what is hidden, we neither tremble nor fear to blaspheme and sin!
47. Woe to us, for we do not season our words with divine salt, but always speak to our neighbor words that are useless and far from godliness!
48. Woe to us, for we speak to people with flattery, deceit, and pretense, without fear of condemnation for it!
49. Woe to us, for our sloth and despondency allow demons to steal the tenderness from our hearts!
50. Woe to us, for having renounced the world, yet we surpass the laity in our passions!
51. Woe to us, for though we ourselves are in need of much teaching and instruction, we correct others when they err in trivial matters!
52. Woe to us if the Lord tests us on earth and brings us to judgment while we remain unrepentant!
53. Woe to us, for we do not look into the depths of our own hearts, and therefore we are overcome by sensuality and pride!
54. Woe to us, for while we constantly defile our souls with impure thoughts, we nevertheless desire that others regard us as saints and honor us with such titles!
55. Woe to us, for having given ourselves over to vanities, we have forgotten the struggle against the devil!
56. Woe to us who sin here without fear! For there we will be met by the unquenchable fire of Gehenna, pitch-black darkness, the never-sleeping worm, weeping and gnashing of teeth, and eternal shame before creatures both higher and lower than ourselves.
57. Woe to our unwise and unrepentant soul! For at the resurrection of the dead, with wailing and gnashing of teeth, it will weep and groan in its sinful body, struck with despair by the bitter and agonizing torments of the eternal fire.
58. Woe to us, for in this land of exile and sojourn we love accursed revelry, yet we do not remember the sweetness of paradise and we despise the Kingdom of Heaven!
59. Woe to us, for we are like the foolish virgins in our lack of mercy, and we do not purchase oil here through acts of charity toward our neighbors to light the lamps (there)!
60. Woe to us, for day and night we send up prayers to God, saying, “Lord! Lord!” yet we do not do what He has commanded!
61. Woe to the one who wrote these lamentations, for though I am guilty of everything written here, I have not even uttered a single sigh of repentance!
62. Woe to the one who grieves for others while neglecting his own sorrows (and does not grieve for himself)!
63. Woe to us, for though we have accusations in our consciences—accuses that ceaselessly condemn us and testify against us—we are not ashamed; and though we are subject to condemnation and torment for all we have done, we do not tremble at the dreadful Judgment Seat of God!
64. Woe to us, for while our deeds stink, we rejoice in human praise!
65. Woe to us, for our wandering thoughts, our distraction, and our forgetfulness rob our hearts of the fear of God!
66. Woe to us, for our preoccupation with worldly vanities turns our hearts into barren ground and dulls our sensitivity to spiritual matters!
67. Woe to us, for though we are sustained by God’s long-suffering, we are not struck down by death for our deeds; and yet, having been granted such mercy, we do not strive to become merciful ourselves!
68. Woe to us, for we do not now remember our sins, but when our soul is separated from the body, then all of them—in word, deed, and thought—will be revealed to us at once, imprinted and written in the memory of our hearts, amid excruciating and bitter repentance!
69. Woe to us, for despite the Apostle’s declaration to all that “whoever eats (the bread) and drinks (the Lord’s cup) unworthily eats and drinks judgment upon himself, not discerning the Lord’s body” (1 Cor. 11:29)—we, being filled with our own impurities, approach the awesome mysteries of God, excusing ourselves for what we have done in our nighttime fantasies and wicked thoughts! Whoever approaches God with impure thoughts, with eyes that are not blameless, with a body that is not chaste, with the desires of soul and body that are not untainted—to how many bodily diseases and infirmities of the soul does he make himself liable? And then—to eternal torment and boundless shame.

70. Woe is me, that I write this while shedding bitter tears, yet have not even begun the work of repentance!
71. Woe is me, for I speak the truth but do not perform good deeds!
72. Woe to me, who teaches well but acts badly!
73. Woe to those who sin in the pleasures of the flesh! For their end will be bitter, with eternal shame.
74. Woe to those who grieve over useless things! For they have deprived themselves of the soul-saving sorrow that leads to repentance.
75. Woe to the slanderers and the abusers! For they have alienated themselves from blessed love.
76. Woe to the ill-wishers and the envious! For they have made themselves strangers to God's goodness and mercy.
77. Woe to those who seek to please men! For they cannot please God.
78. Woe to the flatterers! For they have fallen away from God's truth.
79. Woe to the proud! For they stand on the side of the apostate devil.
80. Woe to those who do not fear the Lord! For they will become entangled in countless sins and will be chastised both here and there.
81. Woe to us, for we cannot tolerate (and protect ourselves from) the stings and bites of fleas, nits, lice, flies, mosquitoes, and bees, yet against the jaws of the great dragon—which stings us and devours us as if at a feeding trough, and pierces us with all manner of deadly stings—we provide ourselves with no help or refuge!
82. Woe to us, for the devil exhausts us with pleasures and illnesses, hardships, and all manner of worldly allurements, yet we refuse to turn away from our evils!
83. Woe to us, for while the apostasy has lasted so many years and so many have abandoned the Orthodox faith, we shed no tears, our hearts do not ache, nor do we restrain ourselves from our passions, but we add sin upon sin, so that for our evil deeds and for our unbelief, we may immediately receive bitter eternal torment in Gehenna!
84. Woe to us who have written these lamentations, for as our end has already drawn near, we—having neither repented of the evil deeds of our youth nor mourned them—have added in our old age great and unbearable evils and the gravest sins.
85. Woe to us, for we are not even ashamed of the gravest sufferings and various bodily ailments, but we revel in sin, and with contempt for what is right, with complete intemperance and licentiousness, we feed our vile and sinful bodies!
86. Woe to us, for we must pass through a fire that rages more fiercely than the waves of the sea, “so that each one may receive what he has done in the body, whether good or evil” (2 Cor. 5:10).
87. Woe to us, for we do not give thought to that dark and incorporeal burning, nor to the eternal bitter weeping and gnashing of teeth there! For God will take away the brightness from the flame, yet leave the burning and the darkness in the fire for the ungodly and sinners.
88. Woe to me, poor soul! “For I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart” (Rom. 9:2)! For, lamenting over myself, I must say: evil has clouded my mind and obscured the truth; death has conquered life; the earthly, perishable, and temporary has replaced the heavenly, imperishable, and eternal; what is vile and hateful has seemed sweeter and more pleasing than the true love of Christ and honor; delusion, having condemned the truth to exile, has cast it out of my soul; I have chosen sorrow instead of joy, shame and reproach instead of boldness and praise; I preferred bitterness to sweetness; I loved the earth and its ashes more than heaven and its kingdom; the darkness of the evil-hating enemy entered my heart and obscured the light of knowledge in my mind.
89. Woe is me! Woe is me! What snares of the devil have ensnared me and, tripping me up, cast me down from such a height! I have grown weary, and my sweat has drenched me in vain. Who will not weep for me? Who will not weep bitterly for me, who am exhausted by vain labors and have suffered shipwreck at the harbor? “Have mercy on me, have mercy on me, have mercy on me, O friends” (Job 19:21), and plead earnestly with my good and merciful Lord Christ, that He may have mercy on me and dispel this dreadful darkness of the devil, the enemy of goodness, from my mind, so that I may see the mire in which I lie and, though able to rise, refuse to do so. Or has my shortened time already cut off all hope for me?! There is no sickness greater than mine; there is no wound like mine; there is no tearing like the tearing of my heart; “for my iniquities have overtaken my head” (Ps. 37: 5). My wounds are not wounds from a sword, and my dead are not the dead of battle, but the enemy's fiery arrows have pierced me and blinded my inner self, and "I have sunk into the depths of darkness, and there is no standing" (Ps. 68:3), —"the fear of which I was terrified has come upon me" (Job 3:25),—"and the shadow of death has covered us" (Ps. 43:20).

90. Woe is me! Soul, look and see the present, which is fleeting, and which, in a little while, will pass away with bitterness and sorrow, and the future—which is most dreadful. Consider, soul, how many blessings and hopes you are forsaking, and what torments you will soon inherit, without end and without consolation! Therefore, before the light fades from above your head, come forward in advance, and, falling down, pray and beseech the Giver of eternal light to deliver you from the all-consuming flame and from lightless darkness. For it is His to forgive sins and bestow blessings upon us, who are unworthy of His mercy. To Him be glory and power forever and ever. Amen.

2. Rules and Advice for Novice Monks³²

Beloved brother! If you have already left this vain world and dedicated yourself to God, repent of your sins and keep the resolution you have made. Do not listen to your own thoughts when they begin to torment you, saying, "Your past sins will never be forgiven." But observe the following rules:

1. Do not eat with a woman; do not form a close bond with a young man; do not sleep in the same bed with a youth. When you take off your clothes, do not look at your own body.

2. If you are urged to drink wine, do not drink more than three small cups. Do not break this rule, even for the sake of friendship.

3. Do not neglect the prayers prescribed for specific times, lest you fall into the hands of your enemies. Strive as much as you can to meditate on the Psalms, for this will keep you from an impure life.

4. Love hard work and self-denial, so that your passions may be subdued. Do not consider yourself anything special in any respect, and you will never cease to weep over your sins.

5. Guard yourself against lies, for they will drive the fear of God from you. Do not reveal your good deeds to everyone, lest your enemy steal them.

6. Confide your afflictions to your spiritual fathers, so that you may find help through their counsel.

7. Compel yourself to engage in manual labor, and the fear of God will be renewed within you.

8. Do not judge your brother who sins, and do not despise him, lest you fall into the hands of your enemies.

9. Do not be argumentative, insisting on your own way, lest evil take root in you.

10. Love humility and do not rely on your own counsel. Train your tongue to say, "Forgive me," and humility will come upon you.

11. When you sit in your cell, be mindful of three things: unceasing prayer, deepening your understanding of the Psalms, and manual labor.

12. Tell yourself: "I will not remain in this world beyond today," and you will be delivered from sin.

13. Do not be talkative, lest your former sins be renewed within you. Do not be lazy in your work; strive to delve deeply into the Psalms—and the peace of God will come upon you.

14. Compel yourself to weep in prayer, and God will have mercy on you and strip away your old self.

15. Know that labor, poverty, self-denial, and silence lead to humility, and humility brings forgiveness of all sins. Humility consists in a person considering himself a sinner and unrighteous, not insisting on his own words, cutting off his own desires, lowering his eyes, enduring insults, hating honor and peace, and saying to everyone, "Forgive me." By the power of humility, enemies are put to flight.

16. Always be sorrowful, but when the brothers come to you, rejoice with them—so that the fear of God may be renewed in you.

17. If you are going somewhere with the brothers, keep a little distance from them so that you may remain silent. Do not look this way and that, but immerse yourself in the psalms and pray to God in your mind. Wherever you go, do not be too trusting with the locals. Maintain modesty and shyness in everything, and do not reach out for what is offered to you until you are asked.

18. Do not sleep with another person under the same blanket. Pray at length before going to sleep, even if you are weary from your journey.

19. Do not allow anyone to anoint your body with oil, unless you are seriously ill.

³² Patr. Lat. vol. CIII, pp. 427, 434.

20. When you sit at the table with your brothers, do not eat with relish, and reach only for what is in front of you. Keep your knees folded. Do not raise your eyes to look at another. Do not drink water greedily or with a gurgling sound in your throat.

21. If you need to clear your throat while sitting among your brothers, stand up and do so away from them. Do not stretch or yawn when you are in the company of others, and if a yawn comes over you, do not open your mouth, and it will pass.

22. Do not open your mouth wide to laugh, for this will show that you lack the fear of God.

23. Do not covet another's possessions. If you acquire a book, do not decorate it, for this will reveal your attachment to it.

24. If you sin in any way, do not be ashamed to admit it, and do not make excuses with lies; instead, kneel down, confess your sin, and ask for forgiveness, and it will be granted to you.

25. If someone lies to you, do not be angry, but say, "Forgive me."

26. Do not be ashamed to ask your mentor questions.

27. If someone knocks on the door of your cell while you are sitting and busy with your work, set aside your work and attend to them.

28. Do not speak to anyone, nor listen to another's words without good reason.

29. If your spiritual father sends you on a journey, ask him how you should conduct yourself, and then act according to his instructions. Do not take his words out of context. If you guard your eyes and ears, you will not sin with your tongue either.

30. If you live with a brother, be with him as a stranger; do not command him to do anything, and do not act as if you are superior to him. If he commands you to do something you do not want to do, set aside your own will and do not offend him (by refusing), so that the peace between you is not disturbed. Know that whoever obeys is the greatest.

31. If you live with a brother and he tells you, "Cook something," ask, "What would you like?" And if he gives you a choice, cook whatever comes to hand, with the fear of God.

32. When you wake from sleep, offer a prayer before you set about any task; then immerse yourself in the Word of God, and only then set to work diligently.

33. Welcome the traveler joyfully and greet him, lest your meeting be harmful to both of you. When he enters, do not ask him any idle questions, but first ask him to pray; then, when he sits down, say to him, "How are you, my brother?"—and then give him a book to read. If he is weary from his journey, let him rest and wash his feet. If he begins to speak idle words, say to him, "Forgive me, my brother; I am weak and cannot bear to hear this." If his clothes are torn, mend them. If he is infirm and his clothes are soiled, wash them. But if he is a vagrant and you have holy guests with you at that time, do not let him in; instead, greet him properly and send him on his way. If, however, he is poor, do not send him away without comfort; give him whatever God has provided.

34. If a brother leaves something with you, do not examine what has been left, unless he is present.

35. If someone leaves you in his cell and goes out, do not look up to see what is in it, but when he is leaving, say to him, "Give me some work to do, and I will work until you return," and whatever he gives you, do it with diligence.

36. Do not pray lazily or carelessly, for by doing so, instead of pleasing God, you will provoke His wrath. Stand in prayer with fear and trembling, without leaning against the wall or spreading your legs, so that you stand on one foot and keep the other set back. Resist your own thoughts and do not allow them to be preoccupied with carnal matters, so that your prayer may be accepted.

37. When you attend the Liturgy, guard your thoughts and feelings, and stand in awe before God the Most High, so that you may worthily receive the Body and Blood of Christ and thereby heal your passions.

38. While you are young, do not wear fine clothing until you reach old age.

39. When traveling with someone older than you, do not walk ahead of him. If your elder stands up to speak with someone, do not remain seated; stand up with him and remain standing until he tells you to sit down.

40. When you enter a city or village, lower your gaze, lest what you see become a cause for strife in your cell.

41. Do not sleep in a place where you fear you might sin in your heart. Do not eat with a woman, and do not look at her—not even at her clothes—if you can help it.

42. If you are traveling with an elder, do not let him carry anything himself. If you are young, each of you should carry your own share. If the load is light, take turns carrying it by the hour. Let the one who is carrying go ahead, as should the one who is weak, and when he sits down to rest because he is exhausted, sit down with him as well.

43. When you ask an elder about your thoughts, reveal them freely, just as they are, to one whom you trust to keep your secrets. In choosing an elder, do not prefer one who is advanced in years, but one who is seasoned with spiritual knowledge and experience, lest you suffer harm or your passions multiply.

44. Compel yourself to pray long into the night, so that your mind may be enlightened. Reflect on your sins and pray to God about them, and He will forgive you.

45. If anyone begins to judge his brother in your presence, even if the one judging is among those who judge you yourself, say to him humbly: "Forgive me, my brother; I am sinful and weak, and I myself am guilty of what you are speaking of, which is why I cannot bear to hear it."

46. In everything, put your fellow brothers before yourself, and if a friend shows you honor in their presence, say: "It is for your sake that he has shown me such honor."

47. If anyone asks to borrow something from you, do not refuse.

48. Do not dwell often in your heart on the memory of those whom you have left behind for the sake of God's love, but remember death and judgment, and that none of them will be able to help you at that time.

49. If, while sitting in your cell, you remember someone who has wronged you, rise immediately and pray for him in your heart, that God may have mercy on him; in this way, the passion you harbor toward him will soon fade.

50. If you wish to receive the Body and Blood of Christ, make sure that no anger or hatred toward anyone remains in your heart; and if you know that someone is angry with you, ask him for forgiveness first, as our Lord has commanded.

51. If at night (in a dream) you suffer attacks of lust, be careful not to dwell on those shameful images in your thoughts during the day, lest your heart be defiled by sensual pleasure; but fall down before the Lord, and He will have mercy on you, for He knows human weakness.

52. If you impose extreme fasting upon yourself and begin to offer prolonged prayers, do not think that they will save you, but believe that God will be appeased by the affliction of your body and will help you in your weakness.

53. If illness overtakes you, do not lose heart or become discouraged, but give thanks to God that He is working to bring you this blessing through your illness.

54. While living in your cell, establish a fixed amount and a set time for your meals, and do not deviate from this. Give your body only as much as it needs to remain strong enough to perform prayers and the service of God. If, outside your cell, you are offered delicacies, do not eat your fill.

55. If the devils tempt you to undertake a task that you are not strong enough to handle, do not listen to them, for they usually lead a person's heart toward such tasks that he is powerless to overcome, so that they may later plunge him into despondency and mock him. And all their undertakings are without measure and without order.

56. Eat once a day, but do not eat until you are full. Give your body as much as it needs according to nature's demands (based on your constitution).

57. Set aside one half of the night for prayerful vigil, and the other for the rest of your body. Before going to bed, stay awake for about two hours in prayer and praise of God (psalm singing), then let your body rest. If your body grows lazy when the time comes to rise for prayer, say to it: "Do you really want to take a little rest at this time, only to face endless torment later? Wouldn't it be better to labor a little here, so that there you may enjoy eternal rest with the saints?" Then laziness will depart from you, and divine help will come to you.

58. When you take monastic vows, set your servant free; if he wishes to follow you and enter monastic life, do not allow him to live with you.

59. If you go to sell handicrafts, do not haggle over the price, as laypeople do. Do the same when you buy something; know that having few possessions brings you closer to God.

60. If a brother leaves something with you and you need it, do not touch it unless he gives you permission.

61. If a brother asks you to buy something for him when you go into town, do so; but if other brothers are with you, do it in their presence.

62. If an item is given to you, return it after using it as much as necessary, but do not keep it until it is asked back from you; if anything in it is damaged, repair it. If you yourself lend an item to someone, do not demand it back if you see that the person cannot return it to you for any reason, especially when you have no need for it at all.

63. If, after leaving your cell, you return and find that another brother is already living there, look for another one for yourself, but do not drive him out under any circumstances, lest God be angry with you. But if he himself voluntarily wishes to leave it, then you are in the right. If, in doing so, he takes any of its belongings, do not demand them back from him.

64. If you wish to leave your cell entirely, take nothing of its belongings with you, but give it to some poor brother, and God will have mercy on you wherever you go.

65. Nothing delights the demons more than when someone hides his thoughts from his spiritual father. Do not think to be like the fathers unless you imitate their labors.

66. Guard yourself against wealth and the love of it, for it corrupts the fruits of monastic life.

67. If you are struggling with a temptation that is pressing upon you, do not grow weak, but prostrate yourself before God and say: “Help me, Lord, for I am weak and cannot withstand this battle”—and He will help you if your prayer comes from a pure heart. If, after struggling, you overcome it, do not boast about it or rely on yourself, but be even more vigilant, for the enemy will not delay in bringing you a new battle, stronger than the previous one.

68. When you pray to God, do not say, “Lord, take this away from me and give me that”—but say, “Lord, my God, You know what is salvific for me; help me and do not allow me to sin before You or perish in my sins, for I am a sinful and weak person; do not deliver me to my enemies, for I have taken refuge in You; deliver me, Lord, for You are my strength and my hope.—To You be glory and thanksgiving forever. Amen.

3. Sayings of Abba Isaiah³³

1. Abba Isaiah said³⁴ : Since the same misfortunes befall both the sinful and the righteous, one should not think that all who suffer misfortunes do so because of any previous sins.

2. Those who do everything solely for themselves are serving their own pride—the greatest of all evils—from which arise isolation, unsociability, unfriendliness, falsehood, and wickedness. Man was not created to be isolated, but to live in communion with his fellow human beings, and even more so with God, the Creator of all things. Therefore, a wise person must be sociable and God-loving, so that he may also be pleasing to God.

3. Abba Isaiah said³⁵ : “From the love of human glory comes falsehood. Whoever repels falsehood with humility will find the fear of God growing in his heart. Do not, therefore, love the glory of this world, lest the glory of God depart from you.”

4. When, in performing your service, you do so with humility, as one unworthy, it is acceptable to God. But if, while doing so, a proud thought arises in your heart and you accept it, and, recalling another who is slumbering and neglectful, you condemn him in your thoughts, then know that your labor is in vain.

5. When and how does one become humble? When he has no tongue—to tell anyone that he is negligent, or to respond to one who has offended him; no eyes—to see the transgressions of another; no ears—to hear what is not beneficial to his soul; no hands—to overcome anyone, and he does not lay the blame for anything on anyone else, but attributes everything to his own sins.

6. A person must first and foremost acquire faith in God and unwavering love for Him, as well as kindness, refraining from repaying evil with evil, a life of hardship, humility, purity, and love for humanity—love and obedience toward all.

7. Detest all worldly things and bodily comfort, for they have made you an enemy of God. But just as a person who has an enemy wages war against him, so too must we wage war against the body, so as not to give it rest.

³³ Cited as a supplement to those included in the “Exalted Sayings.”

³⁴ Quoted by St. Damascene. Patr. graec., vol. 40, p. 1212.

³⁵ Taken from the Alphabetical Paterikon.

8. A brother asked what the words “Hallowed be Thy name” mean. The elder replied: This is proper to the perfect, for it is impossible for the name of God to be hallowed within us as long as passions rule over us.

9. He said again: “It is better to remain silent than to speak, for silence gathers, while talkativeness scatters.”

10. It is a great feat to overcome vanity. One who falls into this deceitful passion becomes alien to compassion, is hard-hearted toward all, and ultimately falls into conceit and pride—this is the ultimate evil, the mother of destruction. Keep your deeds secret, then, and take care of this sickness of the heart, lest, for the sake of pleasing others, you forfeit the reward of your self-control. For whoever does anything to be seen by others deprives himself of his reward, as the Lord said.

11. Whoever desires to be honored by people cannot be free from envy, and whoever is envious cannot attain humility. Such a person has surrendered his soul to his enemies, and they lead it into many sins and destroy it. Flee, then, from vain glory, and you will be deemed worthy of God’s glory in the age to come.

12. If a thought comes to you to condemn your neighbor for any transgression, consider within yourself that you have sinned more than he has; and as for the good that you seem to be doing, do not believe that it is pleasing to God, and do not condemn your sincere brother. Self-abasement is the place of inner peace.

13. Abba Isaiah, having once seen a brother committing a shameful sin, did not rebuke him, but said: “If God, who created him, seeing this, does not consume him with fire, who am I to rebuke him?”

14. He also said: “Let us remember the One who had nowhere to lay His head.” Understand this, man, and do not pretend to be wise. It is He—and what has He become for your sake? The Lord of all is a stranger and has no home. O how ineffably great is Your love for mankind, O Lord! How greatly have You humbled Yourself for my sake? But if He who created all things by His word has nowhere to lay His head, why do you, wretched man, dwell so much on the vain? Why are you blinded by insatiability?

15. He who has acquired humility takes upon himself the fault of his brother, saying, “I have sinned.” He who considers himself wise despises and rebukes his brother, but he who humbles himself will never rebuke his brother.

16. Wisdom does not lie in speaking, but in knowing the right time to speak. Be silent with wisdom, and speak with wisdom. Before you begin to speak, think about what to say so that you may give a fitting answer. Do not boast of your wisdom. The one who says, “I know nothing,” knows the most. The crown of wisdom is to reproach oneself and place oneself below everyone else.

17. Idle talk is fueled by five causes: idle chatter, vanity, oversleeping, dandyism, and overeating. If you wish to avoid slander, do not give in to these passions, but instead of idle talk, arm yourself with psalm-singing; instead of vanity, love the humility of Christ; instead of sleeping too much, guard yourself with vigilance; instead of fine clothes, wear rags and tatters; instead of overeating, bind yourself with abstinence and fasting. For passions, like the links of a chain, are bound together, one after another.

18. A wise rich man hides his treasures within his house, for a treasure displayed in plain sight stirs up envy and invites slander from the ruler. So too does a virtuous yet humble monk conceal his virtues, just as that rich man conceals his treasures. Such a monk does not act on his own desires, but constantly reproves himself and trains himself in secret instruction, according to the word of Scripture: “My heart is hot within me, and a fire is kindled in my meditation” (Ps. 38: 4). What kind of fire is this? Hear the word of Scripture that says, “Our God is a consuming fire” (Heb. 12:29). Just as wax melts and the sludge of vile impurities dries up in the presence of fire, so too are vile thoughts dried up by the secret teaching, the passions of the soul wither away, the mind is enlightened, thought becomes clear, and the heart is filled with joy. Secret instruction strikes at demons and drives away evil thoughts, for it enlightens the inner person. Whoever arms himself with secret instruction is strengthened by God, receives power from the angels, and is glorified among people. Secret instruction and reading are the home of the soul, into which there is no entry; they are an unshakable pillar, a quiet and serene refuge, in which the soul will undoubtedly be saved. The demons are greatly agitated and murmur when a monk arms himself with secret instruction—that is, with the prayer: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me”—and with the solitary reading of the Holy Scriptures. This secret instruction is the mirror of the mind and the lamp of conscience. Secret instruction dries up fornication, tames fury, drives away anger, removes pride, dispels vanity (the sorrowful feeling of futility), and extinguishes despondency. The secret teaching enlightens the sovereign mind, drives away sloth, gives rise to tenderness, instills the fear of God, and brings tears. The secret teaching grants the monk unpretentious humility, a devout vigil, and unhindered prayer. It is a treasure of prayer that drives away unworthy thoughts, strikes down demons, and purifies the body. Secret instruction teaches long-suffering, makes one a partaker of self-control, and proclaims Gehenna. Secret instruction keeps the mind free from idle thoughts, directing it to think only of death. The secret teaching is filled with every good deed and adorned with every virtue, and is far removed from every evil deed: it is nowhere near such things.

4. On Guarding the Mind: 27 Chapters³⁶

1. Anger against the passions is natural to the mind. There can be no anger or purity in a person—that is, unless he becomes angry at everything instilled in him by the enemy. Whoever wishes to attain this natural anger of the mind must cut off all his own desires until he places himself in a state characterized by the mind (a rational, spiritual state in which the soul and body are entirely subject to the spirit).

2. If, while confronting the enemy, you see that his horde, having weakened, is fleeing from you, let not your heart rejoice at this, for these enemies have set a cunning trap for you behind them. And it is there that they are preparing the most vicious attack against you. When they marched against you, they left a significant portion of their army in ambush outside the city, ordering them not to move. And now, when you resisted them and marched against them, they fled from your presence as if powerless; but if your heart is lifted up because you have driven them away, and you thus leave the city, then those who remained behind in ambush will rise up, and those fleeing ahead of you will stop—and they will surround your poor soul on all sides, so that it will have no refuge left. The city is prayer; standing against enemies is a conflict of thoughts in Christ Jesus; and rising up against them is wrath.

3. Let us therefore, beloved, stand in the fear of God, preserving and observing the practice of virtues, giving no offense to our conscience, but heeding ourselves in the fear of God, until it too is set free along with us, so that there may be unity between us and it, and it may finally become our guardian, showing us everything that might cause us to stumble. But if we do not obey it, it will turn away from us and abandon us. Then we will fall into the hands of our enemies, who will never let us go, as our Lord taught us, saying: “Settle matters quickly with your adversary while you are still on the way with him,” and so on (Matt. 5:25). It is said that this adversary is the conscience, because it opposes a person who desires to follow the will of his flesh. If he does not listen to it, it will deliver him into the hands of his enemies.

4. When God sees that the mind has submitted to Him with all its strength and expects help from nowhere but Him alone, then He strengthens it, saying: “Do not be afraid, for I have delivered you, and I have called you by My name; you are Mine. And when you pass through the waters, I am with you, and the rivers will not overwhelm you; and when you walk through the fire, you will not be burned, and the flame will not consume you. For I am the Lord your God, the Holy One of Israel, who saves you” (Isaiah 43:1–3).

5. When the mind hears such encouragement, it boldly turns to its enemies and says: “Who wants to fight against me? Let him stand against me! And who wants to contend with me? Let him come near to me! Behold, the Lord is my helper; who will harm me? Behold, you will all wear out like a garment eaten by moths.”

6. If your heart, having come to utterly hate sin, strives to overcome it and, having turned away from everything that gives rise to sin, has set before your eyes the torment (of eternity), then know that your Helper dwells with you—and you, without offending Him in any way, but weeping before His face, say, listening to your heart: “May Your mercy, O Lord, deliver me, for I am not strong enough to escape the enemy’s hands without Your help!” And He will preserve you from all evil.

7. A monk must shut all the doors of his soul—that is, his senses—so as not to fall through them. When, in this way, the mind sees that nothing is intruding to take possession of it, it prepares for immortality, gathering all its senses together and making them one body. (Thought: The mind, undistracted by the external world through the senses, focuses inward and enters into that age. A thought also attributed to Basil the Great.)

8. When the mind becomes free from all hope in anything visible and worldly, this is a sign that sin has died within you.

9. When the mind becomes free from passions, then the barrier that stood between it and God falls away.

³⁶ From Dobrotol. Graec., p. 33.

10. When the mind is freed from all its enemies and rests, then it is in another, new age, beholding what is new and imperishable. “For wherever the corpse is, there the vultures will gather” (Matt. 24:28).

11. Sometimes demons lie in wait with cunning, hoping that a person will let his heart down, thinking he has already rested (from the battle). (If this happens), they suddenly pounce on the poor soul and seize it like a little bird. And if they prove stronger than it and overcome it, they will mercilessly humble it with every kind of sin, worse than the previous ones, for which it had begged forgiveness. Let us therefore stand unceasingly in the fear of God and strictly guard our hearts, performing our ascetic practices with unwavering diligence and preserving the virtues—that is, a sound mind and heart—which serve as a barrier against the malice of our enemies.

12. Our Teacher Jesus Christ, knowing the extreme unmercifulness of our enemies and having compassion on the human race, commanded how strictly we must guard our hearts, saying: “Be ready at all times, for you do not know at what hour the thief will come, so that when he comes, he may not find you sleeping” (Matt. 24: 43 ff.). And again: “Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be weighed down with gluttony, drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly” (Luke 21: 34). So keep watch over your heart, paying attention to your feelings. And if the remembrance of God is with you, you will easily catch the enemies who creep up to steal it. For the one who watches his thoughts closely will immediately recognize those who wish to enter and defile him. They confuse the mind so that it becomes distracted and idle (falls behind in its work). But those who know their cunning remain unperturbed, praying to the Lord.

13. Unless a person hates everything that happens in this world, he cannot serve and worship God as he ought. For what is the service of God, if not to have nothing foreign in one’s mind when praying, no (sensual) pleasure when blessing God, no anger when singing to Him, no hatred when glorifying Him, and no malicious zeal or envy when sitting before Him and remembering Him? For all these dark things are a wall surrounding the poor soul, and while it harbors them within itself, it cannot serve God purely. For they keep it suspended in the air and prevent it from encountering God (from standing before Him with a clear mind), from secretly blessing Him and praying to Him with a sweet heart, so that it may be enlightened by Him. The mind is always clouded and cannot succeed in a life according to God precisely because it does not take care to cut off all of this wisely.

14. When the mind strives to free the soul’s faculties from carnal desires and to guide them (carry them across, as in a boat) to dispassion, and to separate the soul itself from carnal desires, then, if shameless passions rush upon the soul to take possession of its faculties and draw them into sin, and the mind begins to cry out to God secretly and unceasingly, God, seeing this, will send His help and drive them away in an instant.

15. I implore you, while you are still in the body, do not let your heart grow lax. For just as a farmer cannot rely on any grain growing in his field—since he does not know what will become of it until he has gathered it into his granaries—so a person cannot let his heart grow lax as long as there is breath within him (Job 27:3). He does not know what trials will befall him until his last breath, and therefore he must not let his heart grow weak as long as he has breath. But he must always cry out to God for His help and mercy.

16. He who finds no help in the midst of battle cannot trust in peace either.

17. When someone turns away from the evil side, then he truly recognizes all the sins he has committed before God; for usually he does not see his sins unless he turns away from them with bitter repentance (that is, with contrition and sorrow of heart). Those who have reached this stage weep, multiply their prayers, and cover themselves with shame before God, remembering their unseemly association with the passions. Let us therefore strive, brothers, to the best of our ability, and God will assist us through the abundance of His mercy. If we have not preserved our hearts as our fathers did, let us at least strive to keep our bodies sinless, as God requires. And let us believe that during this time of famine that has befallen us, He will show us mercy, just as He does to His saints.

18. One who has devoted his heart to seeking God in true piety cannot immediately conclude that his labor is pleasing to God. For as long as his conscience accuses him of anything unnatural, he remains alien to freedom. For where there is an accuser, there is also a judge; and where there is judgment, there is no freedom. Therefore, when, while praying, you see that absolutely nothing accuses you of evil, then you may say that you are free and have entered into His holy rest by His good pleasure. When you see that the good fruit has taken root and is no longer choked by the enemy’s weeds, that the warriors who relied on their own cunning, though not of their own accord, have retreated so as no longer to wage war against your senses; that a cloud has cast its shadow over your tabernacle, and the sun no longer scorches you by day, nor the moon by night; that everything within you is now ready for the tabernacle, to erect it and preserve it according to God's will—then know that you have won the victory by the power of God. Then, at last, He Himself will cast His shadow over the tabernacle, for it is His. But as long as the battle rages, a person lives in fear and trembling, wondering whether he will triumph today or be defeated, and whether tomorrow he will be defeated or triumph. The struggle weighs heavily on the heart, but dispassion is free from strife: for it has already received what is due and has ceased to concern itself with the three parts of man that were once separated, because they have attained mutual reconciliation in God. These three parts are: the soul, the body, and the spirit. When they become one through the action of the Holy Spirit, they can no longer be separated. Do not think that you have died to sin as long as you are still being tormented by enemies, whether during wakefulness or during sleep. For as long as the poor man is still running the race, he has no boldness.

19. If the mind is inspired and resolves to follow willingly the love that extinguishes bodily passions, and by its power refuses to allow anything unnatural (passions, sin) to take hold of the heart, then, by resisting what is unnatural in this way, it finally achieves that which completely separates it from what is natural.

20. Examine yourself daily, brother, and as you look into your heart before God and see what is passionate within it, cut it off from your heart, lest a terrible fate befall you (before you are purified).

21. Pay attention to your heart, brother, and watch your enemies vigilantly, for they are cunning in their malice. Be deeply convinced of the truth that one cannot do good to a person who does (loves) evil. That is why the Savior teaches us to be vigilant, saying, “Narrow is the gate and difficult is the way that leads to life, and few are those who find it” (Matt. 7:14).

22. Be mindful that nothing destructive may turn you away from the love of God; guard your heart and do not lose heart, saying, “Where can I preserve it, I who am a sinner?” For when a person forsakes his sins and turns to God, then his repentance renews him and makes him entirely new.

23. Divine Scripture, both the Old and the New Testaments, speaks everywhere of guarding the heart. A monk must understand the purpose of Scripture—to whom it speaks, what it says, and for what purpose. He must also constantly persevere in the work of asceticism and, heeding the wiles of the adversary, like a skilled helmsman, be able to navigate the waves of the mind, guided by grace, so that in this way—without straying from the path but focusing solely on himself—he may converse with God in silence, without scattered thoughts or a restless mind.

24. The times demand prayer from us, just as the winds, turbulence, and storms of the air demand a helmsman. We are capable of receiving the promptings of both good and evil thoughts. A pious and God-loving thought is called—and truly is—, the master of the passions. We, the silent ones, must carefully and soberly distinguish and classify virtues and vices: which virtue to maintain in the presence of the brethren and the fathers, and which to practice when we are alone; and which virtue is first, which second, and which third; as well as which passion is spiritual and which is physical, and which virtue is spiritual and which is physical; furthermore, because of which virtue pride strikes the mind, because of which vanity takes root, because of which anger arises, and because of which gluttony attacks. For we must “cast down every argument and every pretension that sets itself up against the knowledge of God” (2 Cor. 10:5).

25. The first virtue is detachment, that is, mortification of every person and every deed; from this is born a desirable longing for God, and this naturally gives rise to anger, which rises up against everything instilled by the enemy. Then the fear of God finds a dwelling place within a person, and through the action of this fear, love is subsequently revealed.

26. During prayer, one must turn away stray thoughts from the heart through pious opposition, lest we find ourselves praying to God with our lips while our hearts are occupied with inappropriate thoughts. God does not accept from the silent one a prayer that is distracted by thoughts and careless. And Scripture commands us everywhere to guard the feelings of the soul. If the monk's will submits to God's law, and the mind begins to govern its subordinates according to this law—that is, all the emotions of the soul, especially anger and lust, for they are subject to the mind—then virtue is accomplished in us and righteousness is fulfilled; our desire is directed toward God and His will, and our anger is directed against the devil and sin. What else is needed?—Secret instruction.

27. If shame takes root in your heart while you sit in your cell, take care to resist evil, lest it otherwise take hold of you: strive to remember God, that He is listening to you, and that everything your heart thinks is open before Him. Say to your soul: If you fear sinners like yourself, lest they see your sins, should you not all the more fear God, Who hears everything? From this exhortation, the fear of God will be revealed in your soul, and if you abide in it, you will remain steadfast against passion (passions will not carry you away), as it is written: “Those who trust in the Lord are like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but abides forever in Jerusalem” (Ps. 124:1). And in every deed you do, keep in mind that God sees your every thought, and you will never sin. To Him be glory forever. Amen.

5. Chapters on Asceticism and Silence³⁷

1. Three virtues are the constant guardians of the mind: its natural inclination, courage, and lack of sloth.

2. There are three virtues which, when the mind perceives them within itself, assure it that it has attained immortality: “discernment,” which subtly distinguishes one passion from another; “foresight,” which anticipates everything in advance; and “detachment,” which refuses to associate with any foreign thought.

3. There are three virtues that always bring light to the mind: to harbor no malice toward anyone, to endure all that happens without distress, and to show kindness to those who do evil. These three virtues give rise to three others that are superior to them: not harboring malice toward anyone gives rise to love; enduring all that happens without distress brings meekness; and showing kindness to those who do evil brings peace.

4. There are four virtues that purify the soul: silence, observance of the commandments (obedience), self-denial, and humility.

5. Abba Isaiah said: I regard myself as a stray horse with no master: whoever finds it mounts it and rides it; and when one lets it go, another takes it and likewise mounts it and rides it.

6. Guard yourself so that you do not take pleasure in what you once sinned in, lest your former sins be renewed within you. Love humility, and it will cover you from your sins. Give your heart in obedience to your fathers, and the grace of God will dwell within you. Do not consider yourself wise, lest you fall into the hands of your enemies. Train your tongue to ask for forgiveness, and humility will come upon you. While sitting in your cell, devote yourself to three things: manual labor, contemplation of God, and prayer. Think daily that today we must labor in this world, but tomorrow is unknown; and you will not sin before God.

7. Do not be gluttonous in your eating, lest your former sins be revived within you. Do not lose heart in any labor, lest you fall prey to the enemy’s attacks. Compel yourself to (secret) instruction, and soon you will find rest in God (the peace of God). Force yourself to pray for a long time with weeping, and perhaps God will have mercy on you and strip away from you the old, sin-loving man.

8. Labor, poverty, wandering, suffering, and silence give birth to humility, and for humility all sins are forgiven.

9. If lust torments you, wear yourself out ceaselessly with vigil, hunger, and thirst, and humble yourself before everyone; if someone’s physical beauty begins to draw your heart, or if you lust after a woman, remember the stench (that will be in the grave)—and calm yourself.

10. Brother! As long as you are in this life, give your body no rest, and do not trust it when you see that it is free from passions. For demons often lie in wait for a time, and if a person ceases to care about his salvation, they suddenly attack the poor soul and seize it like a little bird; and if they overcome it, they mercilessly subdue it with every kind of sin. Let us therefore stand in the fear of God and guard ourselves, continuing to do our works and observe all the virtues that serve as a barrier against the malice of our enemies. The labors and struggles of this brief time not only preserve us from evil deeds but also prepare crowns for the soul before its departure from the body. Let us, then, who bear the seal of holy baptism, strive to turn away from our sins, so that we may find mercy on the day of judgment. Let us strive, beloved, for the time is near. Blessed is the one who has this concern day and night.

11. If your heart is wandering, and you do not know how to control it, know that some action of yours is leading it astray, whether you intended it or not. If Gideon had not commanded that the water jars be smashed, the light of the lamps would not have been seen (Judg. 7:19 ff.): so, if a person does not despise his own body, he will not see the light of the Divine.

12. If, in a walled city, even a small section of the wall is breached, the enemies, if they wish to enter the city, direct all their attention to this breach in order to enter through it. Although guards stand at the gates, they cannot withstand the enemies unless the damaged section is repaired. Likewise, it is impossible for a monk to withstand his enemies when he is overcome by any passion, and he cannot attain the proper degree of perfection.

³⁷ Patr. graec., vol. 40, after the words.

Saint Mark the Ascetic

Information on the Life and Writings of Saint Mark

Saint Mark the Ascetic is counted among the most renowned Fathers of Egypt. Yet little is known about the circumstances of his life. Palladius (Lives, ch. 20), who saw him in person, says that he was of an exceedingly quiet and meek disposition, so much so that no one could compare to him in this regard, and that from a young age he loved to study the Holy Scriptures and became so well-versed in them that he knew the Old and New Testaments by heart (Sozomen repeats the same account in Church History, Book 6, Chapters 29 and 30). The austerity of his life and the purity of his heart elevated him to a high degree of spiritual perfection. St. Macarius of Alexandria testifies to God's special grace toward him during the reception of the Holy Mysteries, which points not only to the great strength of St. Mark's faith but also to the fervor of his love for the Lord and to his extreme humility. St. Mark lived for more than a hundred years and, it is believed, passed away at the beginning of the fifth century. But he lived among and interacted with the first successors to the life and teachings of Saint Anthony, and perhaps even with Anthony himself. God's grace, life experiences, and the study of the Word of God made him deeply knowledgeable about the mysteries of the spiritual life. Without concealing this gift, he taught and wrote extensively, but only some of his writings have survived to the present day. Ten of his sayings have been published in Russian translation. Patriarch Photius cited only eight of them, while Nikephoros Kallistos, in addition to these eight, attributes another thirty-two sayings to him (Church History, Book 13, Chapters 53 and 544). In this collection, we have included what is found in Dobrotolyubie, adding to it instructions drawn from all his other sermons, and have arranged everything in the following order:

1. A Letter to the Monk Nicholas. It is placed first because it contains an account of the ascetic life from its beginning to its end. It will be followed by:
2. Instructions drawn from the other writings of St. Mark, as a continuation of the lessons given in the epistle and a preparation for understanding the brief sayings contained in the chapters that follow immediately.
3. Two hundred chapters on the spiritual law.
4. 226 chapters for those who think they can be justified by their deeds. The following sources were used in the translation: the Greek edition of Dobrotolyubie, the works of St. Mark as published in Migne's Patrologiae graecae, vol. 65, and the manuscript from the Monastery of St. Sava in Palestine, which is more complete and accurate than the others.

Instructions of Mark the Ascetic on the Spiritual Life

1. Epistle to the Monk Nicholas

1. You have long been deeply concerned for your own salvation, and out of great care for a life according to God, you have told us everything about yourself—with what ardent zeal you resolved to cleave to the Lord through an austere life, abstinence, and every other form of self-denial, striving in vigils and diligent prayer; you also described the battles and the multitude of carnal passions that are kindled within your body and rise up against your soul from the law of sin, which opposes the law of our mind; especially, you lamented that the passions of anger and lust torment you greatly, and you sought some method or verbal instruction regarding what efforts and struggles you must undertake to gain the upper hand (rise above) these destructive passions.

2. At that time, as much as possible, in the spirit of my love for you, I offered you soul-saving thoughts and wise counsel, showing by what labors and what ascetic efforts the soul—with discernment and enlightened guidance, living wisely according to the Gospel—can, aided by grace for the sake of faith, overcome the evil (thoughts and feelings) that gush forth within the heart, especially the passions mentioned. For whatever passions the soul has become characterized by—due to a predisposition toward them and familiarity with them—and by which it is particularly stirred, against those very passions must it undertake a ceaseless and most diligent struggle until it subdues the carnal and inarticulate influences (temptations) of sin, by which it was previously subjugated, carried away and led captive through an inner union with them in thought—compelled by frequent recollection of (evil) thoughts and passionate discourse with them.

3. Now, however, since I have distanced myself from you in body and in person—though not in heart—by going into the desert to the true workers and warriors of Christ, so that I too, by striving and fighting—even if only a little—alongside the brothers who struggle against the enemy’s influences and valiantly resist the passions, might cast off sloth, cut off laxity, cast off indifference, and embrace zeal and every kind of care, striving toward the pleasure of God, I have taken the trouble to write down for your sincerity a brief instruction and soul-saving counsel, so that what I have told you in person, when you read it attentively and concisely in this brief exhortation of mine, may bring you spiritual benefit, just as if we were together with you in person.

4. This, my son, is where you must begin the God-given, salvific ordering of your life. You must keep in your mind, unforgettably and ever-memorable, with ceaseless reflection, all the providential acts of the God who loves mankind—both past and present—and all His blessings for the salvation of your soul; and you must not allow yourself, whether because of the clouding of evil forgetfulness (instilled by the enemy), or because of sloth, to forget His many and great blessings and thus spend the rest of your life in a useless and ungrateful manner. For such memories, like a thorn, pierce the heart and constantly move it to confess (God’s bounties), to humility, to giving thanks with a contrite heart, to rejoicing in all that is good, and to acquiring, as a reward (for His blessings), good character and customs and every virtue according to God, as a result of delving deeply with a conscientious mind into the following prophetic word: “What shall I render to the Lord for all He has given me?” (Ps. 115:3). When the soul recalls all the blessings bestowed upon it from birth by the God who loves mankind, as well as how many times it has been delivered from misfortunes, or how many times, having fallen into lawlessness and having wilfully slipped into transgressions, it was not, by righteous judgment, delivered over to the spirits that had deceived it for destruction and death, but the loving Lord, long-suffering and overlooking her transgressions, preserved her, awaiting her conversion; and even as she willingly served the enemies and evil spirits through her passions, He nourished her, sheltered her, and provided for her in every way; and finally, by a gracious gesture, He set her on the path to salvation, instilled in her heart a love for the ascetic life, inspired her with joy to leave the world and all the allure of its carnal pleasures, adorned her with the angelic image of the ascetic life, and arranged for her to be warmly received by the holy fathers into the brotherhood at (when the soul brings all this to mind), then who, having thoughts guided by a good conscience and reflecting on all this, will not remain forever in heartfelt contrition? Having such a foundation in the blessings received earlier, when he himself had done nothing good, will he not take hold of a firm and everlasting hope, saying to himself: If then, when I did nothing good but, on the contrary, sinned greatly before His face, wallowing in carnal impurity and in many other sins, He did not treat me according to my sins nor repay me according to my iniquities, but showed me mercy with such gifts and graces, then when I finally devote myself entirely to His service through a completely blameless life and the cultivation of every virtue, what blessings and what spiritual gifts will He bestow upon me, strengthening, guiding, and enabling me in every good work?” Thus, whoever, never forgetting God’s blessings, harbors such a thought, inclines, directs, and compels himself toward every good deed of virtue and every act of righteousness, being always zealous and always ready to do God’s will.

5. Therefore, beloved son, having a natural mind by the grace of Christ, always preserve within yourself such conduct and such good reflection; do not allow yourself to be covered by a dark cloud of pernicious forgetfulness, nor hindered in your progress by sloth—which renders the mind futile and diverts it from the proper way of life—nor clouded in thought by ignorance—the cause of all evils—nor carried away by all-corrupting indolence, nor seduced by carnal pleasures, nor overcome by gluttony, nor enslaved in your mind by desires and defiled within yourself by association with lustful thoughts, nor conquered by anger that breeds hatred toward your brother, if, under some pitiful and accursed pretext, grieving and being grieved, you begin to harbor evil thoughts against your neighbor in your memory, nor by one who is led astray from pure prayer to God, nor by one whose mind is taken captive to spy on a brother of one mind with beastly thoughts. (For if all this is allowed to continue,) because of such a senseless disposition, full of carnal reasoning, and bound in conscience, you will be delivered for a time to the instructive punishment of the evil spirits to whom you yielded, until your mind, having become utterly impoverished and consumed by sorrow and despondency, due to the loss of spiritual progress in God because of past sins, will once again begin to embrace the beginning of the path to salvation with all humility, having, after much toil in prayer and all-night vigils, received forgiveness for his sins through their humble confession before God and his neighbors. Thus he begins to come to his senses again and, enlightened by the light of the Gospel, comes to know by God's grace that whoever does not surrender himself entirely to the cross in humble reflection and self-abasement, and does not subject himself before all to trampling, humiliation, contempt, justification, ridicule, and mockery—and to endure all this with joy for the Lord's sake, seeking nothing human—neither glory, nor honor, nor praise, nor sweet food and drink, nor (fine) garments—cannot be a true Christian.

6. Therefore, if such feats, struggles, and crowns await us, how long will we allow ourselves to be mocked by a false appearance of piety and to serve the Lord with deceit, while at the same time being honored by people and appearing to the One who sees all as something else? For though we are honored by many as saints, we are still beasts in our nature, possessing only the outward appearance of godliness but having not acquired its power before God (2 Tim. 3: 5), though honored by many as virgins and blamelessly pure, we are defiled inwardly before Him who sees what is hidden by the impurities of our desires and lustful thoughts, and we are tainted by the influences of our passions; yet, because of our utterly hypocritical asceticism, and also because of human praise, we are negligent in this matter, blinded in our minds. How long will we walk in the vanity of the mind, failing to assimilate the wisdom of the Gospel and failing to embrace a life of integrity, with the resolve to diligently follow its path so that we may also find boldness in our conscience, yet still rely on the mere apparent righteousness of the outward person, and deceive ourselves with outward virtues due to a lack of true understanding of the matter, desiring to please people and seeking from them glory, honor, and praise?

7. Truly, He who reveals the secrets of darkness and brings to light the thoughts of the heart (1 Cor. 4:5), the Judge who cannot be deceived, will come—He who is not ashamed of the rich nor shows partiality to the poor. He will strip away the outward veil and reveal the truth hidden within, and He will crown those who live conscientiously—the true ascetics and warriors—before His Father in the presence of the angels; but the hypocrites, who merely clothe themselves in the appearance of piety and only outwardly display a “blameless” life before others, vainly relying on it and deceiving themselves with it, He will solemnly expose them before the entire Holy Church and before the whole heavenly host, and send them into utter darkness with the most striking shame.

8. (Such people are like) the holy virgins who preserved their outward virginity (for they were not at all condemned for this) and, moreover, had some oil in their vessels—that is, they possessed certain outward virtues and good qualities, as well as certain gifts—which is why their lamps burned for a time; but, due to negligence, ignorance, and sloth, they paid no attention to their inner lives and did not properly understand a multitude of passions stirred up by evil spirits lurked within, causing their thoughts to be corrupted by hostile influences; and they (the virgins) associated with these passions in their thoughts, being secretly carried away and overcome by the worst kind of envy, malicious jealousy, defiance, rivalry, hatred, anger, grief, vindictiveness, hypocrisy, irritability, pride, vanity, people-pleasing, self-indulgence, greed, negligence, carnal lust, sensuality in their thoughts, unbelief, fearlessness (before God), fear (of something external), sorrow, backbiting, all manner of self-indulgence, sleep, conceit, self-justification, arrogance, vanity, insatiability, luxury, greed, despair—the most calamitous of all—and other subtlest influences of sin. They (the virgins) not only performed good deeds and led the virtuous life they outwardly displayed before people—for which they received praise from them— and even the spiritual gifts, if they had any, they sold to the spirits of vanity and the desire to please men; carried away by other passions, they mingled cunning and carnal schemes with their good endeavors, thereby rendering them impure and displeasing to God, like Cain's offering. For all this, they are deprived of rejoicing with the Bridegroom and have been left outside the heavenly palace, which is shut to them.

9. Reflecting on this with strict discernment and self-examination, let us understand and recognize the state in which we find ourselves, and, while there is still time for repentance and conversion, let us correct ourselves, taking care that our good deeds, being performed with purity, may be truly good, without any admixture of carnal reasoning, lest they be rejected as a flawed offering because of recklessness, negligence, and a lack of true knowledge: otherwise, we will bear the toil of chastity, abstinence, vigil, fasting, and every form of self-denial, and we will spend our days—and yet what seems to us to be such righteousness will not be accepted by Christ, the Heavenly Priest, having been found to be a defiled sacrifice because of the passions mentioned.

10. Therefore, my son, above all else, one who wishes to take up the cross and follow Christ must be concerned with knowledge and understanding, constantly examining one's own thoughts, with great concern for salvation and deep devotion to God, seeking counsel from the united and like-minded servants of God who are striving in the same endeavor, so that, not knowing where or how to direct one's path, one does not walk in darkness without a bright lamp. For the self-willed person, walking without the guidance and direction of the Gospel, often stumbles and falls into the many pits and snares of the evil one; he often goes astray and is subjected to great misfortunes, and does not know where he will ultimately end up. Many have performed great acts of self-denial and endured great toil and sweat for God's sake, but their self-will, lack of discernment, and failure to deem it necessary to seek saving counsel from their neighbor have rendered such labors displeasing to God and in vain.

11. But you, beloved son, as I said at the beginning of this exhortation, do not forget the blessings bestowed upon you by the worshiped, Philanthropic God, even as you are led astray from them by the theft of the enemy's malice and by sloth; but, keeping before your eyes all whether spiritual or physical, the blessings bestowed upon you from the beginning of your life until now, reflect on them and learn from them, as it is said: "Do not forget all His rewards" (Ps. 102: 2). In this way, your heart will be readily moved toward the fear of God and love, and you will be able to give thanks to God through a disciplined life, virtuous conduct, a godly conscience, proper speech, true faith, humble wisdom, and, simply put, you will devote your whole self to God. This is what the remembrance of the blessings you have received from the Good and Philanthropic Lord will lead you to! Through such remembrance of His blessings—especially with the help of a divine prompting—your heart will be involuntarily pierced by love and longing for God, for He has not bestowed upon anyone else, even those more worthy than you, the marvelous grace He has bestowed upon you through His ineffable love for humanity.

12. Therefore, strive to keep in constant remembrance all the blessings you have received from God; above all, recall that great grace and wondrous blessing which He bestowed upon you—as you told me—at the time when you were sailing with your mother from the Holy Places to Constantinople, when a terrible and unbearable storm arose at night, with the sea in great turmoil, and all who were on the ship—, the sailors, and your own mother—perished in the depths, while you alone, along with two others, were saved by the glorious divine power and cast ashore; (remember) also how the Lord arranged your journey to Ancyra, where you were received with fatherly kindness by a certain generous man and were united in love with the most devout son Epiphanius, with whom you both, under the guidance of a certain reverend man, embarked on the path of salvation (in renunciation of the world), and were accepted as sincere children by the holy servants of God.

13. For all these blessings bestowed upon you by God, what can you offer in return to Him who has called you to eternal life? As justice demands, you must no longer live for yourself, but for Christ, who died for you and rose again; you must strive for every righteous virtue and the fulfillment of every commandment, always seeking "what is the will of God—what is good, pleasing, and perfect" (Rom. 12:2), and striving with all your might to fulfill it. Above all, my son, submit your youth to the word of God, as this word requires: "Present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual worship" (Rom. 12:1). Cool and dry up every moisture of carnal lust through eating sparingly, drinking sparingly, and all-night vigils, so that you too may say from your heart: "I was like a wineskin on the ground" (³⁸), "I have not forgotten Your righteous deeds" (Ps. 118: 83). Realizing that you belong to Christ, "crucify your flesh," as the Apostle says, "with its passions and desires" (Gal. 5:24), and "put to death the members that are on the earth" (Col. 3:5)—that is, not only acts of fornication, but also the impurity stirred up in the flesh by evil spirits. And the one who desires to be deemed worthy of the crown of true, undefiled, and all-perfect virginity does not limit his struggle to this alone, but, following the Apostolic teaching, strives to put to death the very movement of this passion. Even this is not enough for one who, out of a strong love (for purity), has set his heart on instilling in his body an angelic and most pure virginity; rather, he prays that even the simplest, fleeting thought of lust—which is suggested to the mind as a passing vision, without the movement or influence of carnal passion—might vanish. But this can be achieved only through help from above, by the sole power and gift of the Holy Spirit, if indeed there are any deemed worthy of such grace.

14. Thus, one who desires to attain the crown of pure, incorporeal, and undefiled virginity crucifies his flesh through ascetic labors, "putting to death the members which are on earth," through arduous and patient self-restraint, causing the outer man to wither away, thinning him out and making him aged and skeletal, so that the inner man may be renewed more freely by the action of grace for the sake of faith and spiritual deeds, progressing day by day toward the better, growing in love, adorning himself with meekness, rejoicing in spiritual joy, receiving from Christ the pledge of peace, being guided by kindness, clothed in benevolence, embraced by the fear of God, enlightened by knowledge and (spiritual) understanding, adorned with wisdom, and guided by humble wisdom. Through these and similar virtues, the mind, renewed by the Holy Spirit, receives within itself the imprint of the God-like image, is clothed in the intellectual, ineffable beauty of the Lord's likeness, and is made partaker of the riches of spiritual wisdom.

15. Therefore, my son, temper your youthful flesh, nourish your soul, and renew your mind with the virtues mentioned above, through the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Youthful flesh, fattened by various delicacies and wine, becomes like a boar ready for slaughter. The soul is thus hardened by the burning of carnal pleasures, and the mind is captivated by the inflaming of evil lust, unable to resist the flesh's allure. Thus, the rush of blood is the ebb of the spirit. As for wine, let youth not even smell its scent, lest the carnal pleasure, flared up by a double fire—internally from the influence of passion and externally from wine-drinking—drive out the spiritual sweetness of painful contrition and produce confusion and hardening in the heart. Let youth not even drink water to the point of satiety, so as to preserve spiritual desire (a good disposition), for moderation in water greatly contributes to the chastity of the body. When you put this into practice, you will confirm it through your own experience. For I prescribe and establish this for you, not in the sense that I wish to impose some involuntary yoke upon you, but I lovingly advise and offer this as a good means for preserving true virginity and strict chastity, leaving it to your free will to do as you please.

16. Now let us speak a little about the irrational passion of anger, which, in its course and effect, devastates the entire soul, throws it into confusion and darkens it, and makes a person like a beast—especially one who is easily tempted and quickly given to it. This passion is strengthened, sustained, and made insurmountable by pride; and as long as this devilish tree of bitterness (Heb. 12:15)—that is, of anger and irritability—is watered by the evil water of pride, it continues to grow and flourish, bearing abundant fruit of lawlessness. Thus, this edifice of the evil one in the soul remains indestructible as long as it has strength and support in the foundations of pride. Therefore, if you want this tree of lawlessness (by which I mean the passion of grief, anger, and irritability) to wither in the body and become barren, so that the axe of the Spirit may come and cut it down, and it may be cast into the fire, according to the Gospel, and disappear along with all malice, —if you want this house of lawlessness, which the evil one builds in the soul for evil, gathering in his thoughts from everywhere, like stones, well-founded and unfounded pretexts from deeds or words, and preparing a structure of malice in the soul, laying thoughts of pride as its firm foundation—if you want this house to be destroyed and torn down, then take up the humility of the Lord, never forgetting it in your heart. Who is He, and what did He become for our sake? From what height of the light of the Godhead—revealed in measure even to the heavenly beings and glorified in heaven by every rational creature—Angels, Archangels, Thrones, Dominions, Principalities, Powers, Cherubim, Seraphim, and all other unnamed intelligent powers whose names have not come down to us—and to what depth of human humility did He descend by His ineffable goodness, becoming in every way like us, who sit in darkness and the shadow of death, held captive by the enemy because of Adam's transgression, and possessed by him through the passions at work within us.

17. Thus, the Lord of all visible and invisible creatures was not ashamed of us, who were suffering in such bondage and were subject to a bitter death, but humbled Himself and took upon (upon Himself) the Man, upon whom, by the Lord's decree, it was decreed to bear sorrows as penance, and became like us in every way except sin—that is, except for the passions of wickedness. All that was imposed on man by divine decree as penance for the sin of the (progenitor's) transgression—such as death, toil, hunger, thirst, and the like—He took upon Himself, becoming what we are, so that we might become what He is: "The Word became flesh" (John 1:14), so that the flesh might become the Word; "Though He was rich, yet for our sake He became poor, so that through His poverty we might become rich" (2 Cor. 8:9). Out of His great love for humanity, He became like us, so that we too might become like Him in every virtue. For ever since Christ came, man—who was (even from the beginning) created in the image and likeness of God—is truly renewed by the grace and power of the Holy Spirit, attaining to the measure of perfect love, which drives out fear and can no longer be subject to falling away, for "love never fails" (1 Cor. 13:8), because, as John says, "God is love, and whoever abides in love abides in God" (1 John 4:16). The Apostles and all those who, like them, labored in virtue and presented themselves to the Lord as perfect—having followed Christ with complete devotion throughout their lives—were deemed worthy of this measure.

18. Therefore, if you always keep in mind, without forgetting, the humility that the Lord showed us out of His ineffable love for us—that is, the incarnation of the Word of God in the womb, His assumption of human nature, His birth of a woman, the stages of His physical growth, the dishonor, the hardships, the insults, the mockery, the reproaches, beatings, spitting, mockery, insults, the scarlet cloak, the crown of thorns, the rulers' condemnation of Him, the cries against Him from the lawless Jews, His own people: "Take Him away, take Him away, crucify Him" (John 19: 15), the cross, the nails, the spear, the vinegar and gall He was given to drink, the rejoicing of the pagans, the mockery of those passing by who said, "If You are the Son of God, come down from the cross, and we will believe in You" (Matt. 27: 42)—and the other sufferings He endured for our sake: crucifixion, death, a three-day burial, descent into Hades—and then the fruits of His sufferings: resurrection from the dead, the emptying of Hades and death through the delivery of the souls gathered to the Lord, ascension into heaven, sitting at the right hand of the Father, above every principal and authority and every name that is named (Eph. 1: 21), honor, glory, and worship from all the angels to the Firstborn from the dead, because of His sufferings, according to the Apostolic word, which says: "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, though He was in the form of God, did not regard equality with God as something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men, and being found in human form, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient even to death—even death on a cross. Therefore God also highly exalted Him and bestowed on Him the Name that is above every name, so that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow—in heaven, on earth, and under the earth—and so on" (Phil. 2:5–10)... Behold to what glory and exaltation, according to God's truth, the Lord's sufferings mentioned above have raised the Son of Man!

19. Therefore, if you keep such thoughts in your heart with warm affection and without neglect, the passions of grief, anger, and irritability will not prevail over you. For when the foundation is removed from beneath them—that is, when the passion of pride is eradicated by immersion in the humility of Christ—then the entire edifice of lawless anger, fury, and sorrow will easily crumble of its own accord. What cruel and stony heart would not be broken, moved to compassion, and humbled if it always kept in mind such humility of the Only-Begotten Son of God on our behalf and remembered His sufferings described above? Will it not, on the contrary, willingly become dust, ashes, and a footstool for all people, according to Scripture? When the soul, beholding Christ's humility, is thus humbled and broken, what irritability can take hold of it? What anger and what grief can take root?

20. But it seems that the neglect of these thoughts—which are salvific and life-giving for us—and its sister, sloth, along with their accomplice and equal, ignorance—these are the gravest and most inward diseases of the soul, which are difficult to recognize and even more difficult to heal, as they carry away and darken the soul with unbridled curiosity (by probing into everything external except oneself)—are the cause of all other evil passions acting within and hiding there: they produce fearlessness (before God) and indifference toward all that is good, and grant every passion the freedom to enter the soul and act within it without shame. When the soul is covered (as by some gloomy veil) with all-pervading forgetfulness, ruinous sloth, and—the mother and nurturer of all evil—ignorance, then the pitiful, blinded mind readily attaches itself to every thing visible, conceivable, or heard: it sees, for example, a woman's beauty and is immediately wounded by carnal lust. Memory, having thus passionately and with delight received what has been seen, heard, and touched, then paints images of these things within, through the imagination of thoughts and wicked conversation with them, and thereby defiles the still-passionate, wretched mind through the influence of lustful spirits.

21. Finally, the flesh—whether it is plump, very young, or excessively moist—is swiftly aroused by such memories and acts in its natural way, moving toward lust, sometimes in sleep, sometimes while awake, emitting impurity, even without actual intercourse with a wife. Such a person may be regarded by many as chaste, a virgin, and pure, or may even lay claim to holiness; but before the One who sees what is hidden, he is a vile fornicator and adulterer, and on that day he will be justly condemned unless he weeps and wails before God, in whose presence he thought and did evil, and does not offer worthy repentance—having mortified the flesh through fasting, vigils, and unceasing prayers, and having healed and corrected the mind through holy remembrances and instruction in the Word of God. For the living voice that said is not a lie: "Anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (Matt. 5:28). Therefore, it is very beneficial—especially for the young—to avoid seeing women altogether, even if they are considered holy, and, if possible, to live apart from all people: in this way, he will make the spiritual struggle much easier for himself and will more tangibly feel his progress, especially if he strictly watches over himself and abides in prayer, striving to eat sparingly, drink little—even water—and engage in prolonged vigils, as well as consulting with experienced spiritual fathers, striving to be with them and benefit from their guidance. For it is extremely dangerous to live in isolation, according to one's own will, without witnesses, or to live with those who are inexperienced in the spiritual battle. Malice (Satan) has many wiles, many hidden ambushes, and a variety of snares spread by the enemy everywhere. Therefore, as much as possible, one must strive in every way to live together and converse frequently with men who are knowledgeable in spiritual matters, so that even if one lacks the light of true knowledge due to one's spiritual infancy and imperfection, by walking alongside those who possess it, he may not walk in darkness, nor be endangered by snares and traps, nor fall prey to the beasts of the mind, which, lurking in the darkness, captivate and corrupt those who walk in it without the intelligent lamp of the Divine Word.

22. But if you wish, my son, to acquire and possess within yourself your own lamp of spiritual light and guidance, so that you may walk unhindered in the deepest night of this age "and your steps may be guided by the Lord" (Ps. 118: 133), and according to the prophetic word, "you have greatly desired" the way of the Gospel—that is, to fulfill the most perfect Gospel commandments with the most ardent faith and to become a partaker in the Lord's sufferings through longing for them and prayer—then I will show you a wonderful way to achieve this, consisting of a moral, inner disposition of the spirit, which requires not physical labor or feats, but rather the painstaking labor of the soul, the mastery of the mind (over everything within), and attentive thought, aided by the fear and love of God. With this disposition, you can easily put the ranks of enemies to flight, just like the blessed David, who, with faith and hope in God, by slaying a single foreign giant, thereby put the darkness of the enemies and their people to flight.

23. My words are directed at three strong and mighty foreign giants, upon whom rests the entire opposing power of the mental Holofernes; if they are overthrown and slain, then the entire power of the wicked spirits will be utterly exhausted. These three giants of the evil one, who appear to be strong, are those we have already mentioned—ignorance, the mother of all evils, forgetfulness, her sister, accomplice, and helper; and, weaving a dark garment and covering for the soul from the gloom—indolence (apathy)—which upholds and strengthens the first two, gives them stability, and causes evil to become, as it were, ingrained and embodied in the most negligent soul. For from indifference (apathy), forgetfulness, and ignorance, the foundations of all other passions grow stronger and multiply. Being mutual helpers to one another and unable to exist without one another, they (together as a whole) constitute the powerful forces of the adversary and the chief commanders of the evil one. Through them, the host of deceitful spirits weaves its snares in the soul and succeeds in carrying out its schemes.

24. If you wish to triumph over your passions and easily put to flight the hordes of mental enemies, then—through prayer and God's assistance—gather your thoughts within yourself and descend into the depths of your heart, and seek out within yourself these three mighty giants of the devil: namely, forgetfulness, indifference, and sloth, and ignorance—for it is by feeding on these that all other passions act, live, and grow stronger in self-indulgent hearts and unpunished souls. With strict self-examination and a vigilant mind, aided from above, you will certainly find (discern within yourself, seize) these passions—unknown to others and even unimaginable, most destructive of all evil passions—with the opposing weapons of truth: a good memory, the source of all that is good; enlightened knowledge, by which a soul kept alert drives away the darkness of ignorance; and a living zeal that stirs and leads the soul to salvation. Then, having clothed yourself in these very weapons of virtue, with every prayer and supplication, by the power of the Holy Spirit, you will valiantly and courageously defeat (completely drive away) the aforementioned three giants—the mental foreigners—namely: with a mind set on things above, always meditating on "whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is commendable—if there is any excellence and if there is anything worthy of praise" (Phil. 4:8), you will drive away the most pernicious forgetfulness; with enlightened heavenly guidance, you will destroy the ruinous darkness of ignorance; and with a lively zeal ready for every good deed, you will banish godless indifference (sloth), which causes evil to take root in the soul. You can acquire these virtues not by your own will alone, but by the power of God and the assistance of the Holy Spirit, through much attention and prayer; and having acquired them in this way, you can, through them, rid yourself of the three mighty giants of the evil one mentioned above. When, through the power of active grace, the (threefold) union of true knowledge, remembrance of God's words, and godly zeal is formed in the soul and carefully preserved there, then even the slightest trace of forgetfulness, ignorance, and indifference will vanish from the soul. They will turn to nothing, and grace in Christ Jesus, our Lord, to whom be glory and power forever and ever, will finally reign in the soul. Amen.

2. Monk Nicholas's Response to the Writing of Mark the Ascetic

Thanks be to God, thanks be to Him! Thanks be to His surpassing and ineffable gift, that He, out of love for the soul—tormented by fierce passions and deprived of all strength—visited it with a merciful will wholly entrusted to God; I say, through your virtuous and God-united soul, by which a radiant spark, filled with divine light and bearing a spiritual lure, was sent to me—and through the lamp of words of labor and love, born of a mind united with God, the Lord has snatched my soul from the deepest darkness and storm and has done this, so that my thought arose vigorously from the three giants revealed to me. Truly, these giants are great and fierce, and they never cease to attack the human race. Whom do they hold so fiercely and savagely on earth as me, who am still possessed by them of my own free will? But He Who never rejoices in the destruction of the living, has had mercy on [me] and shown His long-suffering and compassionate mercy toward me; and, having stirred up that pious thought, He awakened my will, which had been sleeping the deepest sleep, and pointed out and revealed to me the aforementioned giants. I say, first of all, forgetfulness, which drove Adam out of paradise; for if he had not forgotten the Lord's commandment, he would not have fallen from such glory; and despondency, to which he succumbed and thereby obeyed his wife; and ignorance, through which he did not realize what he was and what he had become. The Lord Jesus made these three spirits clear to me through the Holy Spirit, who dwells within you. For truly He sent a double-edged sword, which is the Word of God, and cleaved my mind in two with great stillness. He did not stop there, but truly instilled a certain spiritual sweetness into my will through your words. So, with how many mouths and how many tongues can I worthily give thanks to the true Lord God for His blessings, which you have reminded me of, or, again, for sending me skillful and loving words that stir the soul to seek the truth and keep God's commandments, and, finally, for the great benefit [brought about by this] to those who desire to walk in the Lord's way, which leads to eternal life? For your words have brought such benefit not only to me but also to all who have heard them—their minds have been greatly enlightened, and they have received great benefit from these clearly expressed words. Therefore, these words proved to be as true as reality itself, and they were heard not merely as words, but as an evident reality before our very eyes; for immediately this word instilled great vigilance in our wills. And since this word was effective, it did not remain idle, but immediately bore ears of grain and brought forth ripe fruit; yet it did not stop there, for none of us is ever satisfied with it, as God knows: no matter how many times I read it, my poor soul is never sated. Therefore, through the prayer of your holiness, may this gift be granted to me, so that the heavenly spark may abide in me and utterly destroy, to the very end, the aforementioned giants; lest I ever forget myself and, through the treachery of my own willful caprice, plunge myself into the aforementioned evil and become food for my enemies. But I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, who dwells within you, that for the sake of your piety and those who strive like you, He will not despise me nor deliver me into the mouths of the aforementioned giants; but, always reminding me through His holy servants, He will show me, the wretched one, His way through your holy prayers. Therefore, I ask and implore your kind-hearted and venerable soul not to look down on me for having dared, with hope, to compose this reply to Your Holiness; but, seeing the Father's mercy open wide, though my writing is poor, I ask and implore you to remember me at every hour; for the Lord always visits [His] steadfast and unceasing servant—that is, the mind of your blessed soul, worthily purified—so that through your holiness I too, having been delivered from my evils, may find a happy outcome, by the grace of the philanthropic Christ God, to whom, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be honor and power forever. Amen.

2. The Teachings of Saint Mark, drawn from his other writings

1. Faith consists not only in being baptized into Christ, but also in keeping His commandments. Holy Baptism perfectly bestows perfection upon us, but it does not make perfect those who do not keep the commandments.

2. If, even after baptism, we remain subject to sin, it is not because the baptism was imperfect, but because we are negligent in keeping the commandments and remain self-indulgent according to our own will. Neither God nor Satan compels our will even after baptism. In baptism, we were mysteriously freed from the bondage of sin, as it is written: “For the law of the Spirit of life has set me free from the law of sin and death” (Rom. 8:2); but because of our neglect to keep the commandments of the One who cleansed us, we have fallen under the power of sin, and since we have not kept the commandments, we have once again become captives of the enemy.

3. A person, by his own will, remains where he chooses to be, even if he has been baptized, because self-determination cannot be compelled. When Scripture says, “The poor in spirit will inherit the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 11:12), it speaks of one’s own free will, so that each of us may compel ourselves after baptism not to turn toward evil, but to abide in what is good. To those who have received the strength to fulfill the commandments as believers, the Lord commands them to strive in them, so that they may not turn back.

4. Spiritual deeds are not something separate from the commandments. They are the commandments. Show me spiritual practices other than the commandments. If you point to prayer—that is a commandment; if you speak of subduing thoughts—that too is a commandment (“Be sober and watchful”); if you speak of fasting and vigil—that is also a commandment; if you point to self-denial, that is a commandment (let him deny himself), and whatever act of ascetic virtue you might mention—all of them are commandments. (The goal of asceticism is the most precise fulfillment of the commandments.)

5. Holy Baptism grants complete freedom (from the bondage of sin, just as repentance does); but to bind oneself again with passion or to remain free by keeping the commandments is a matter of self-willed choice. If a thought strays toward any sinful pleasure, it is due to self-willed passion, and not out of any compulsion. According to Scripture, we have the power to “cast down arguments” (2 Cor. 10:4). A wicked thought, for those who cast it down within themselves, is a sign of love for God, not of sin; for it is not the arising of the thought that is sin, but the mind’s friendly conversation with it. If we do not love it, why do we linger in it? It is impossible for anything that we hate from the heart to converse with our heart for any length of time without our own evil participation in it.

6. When, after holy baptism, being in a state where we are able to keep the commandments, we fail to keep them, then—even without desiring it—we are held captive by sin (we fall back into the bondage of sin) until, through repentance, we implore God, turning to all His commandments, and He destroys the sin of our self-will.

7. You have been clothed with Christ through baptism (Gal. 3:27) and possess the power and weapons to demolish strongholds (2 Cor. 10:4). But if, having the power over them, you do not cast them down at the first sign of their attack, then it is evident that you indulge in them out of unbelief, consenting to them and becoming their ally. You yourself are to blame for such conduct.

8. Sometimes, without our consent, some wicked thought—one we detest—like a robber, suddenly attacks us and forcibly holds our mind captive. However, know for certain that even this thought originated from ourselves, for either after baptism we gave ourselves over to such an evil thought—though we did not act upon it—or, of our own free will, we harbor within ourselves certain seeds of evil, which is why the evil one takes root in us, and he, having held us captive with these wicked seeds, will not depart until we cast them aside; but the evil thought that dwells within us through the commission of evil will be driven out when we offer God works worthy of repentance. Thus, you yourself are to blame for the involuntary, troubling thought, because, having the power to drive it away and purify your mind of it at the very first stirrings, you did not do so, but conversed with it willingly, even though you did not act upon it. (It comes to a warm place, to an old acquaintance, a friend.)

9. When you see in your heart the help that is given to you, know for certain that this grace did not come from outside, but was mysteriously given to you at baptism and has now taken effect to the extent that, having come to hate the thought, you have turned away from it.

10. Christ the Lord, having delivered us from all violence (through the grace of baptism), did not forbid the thoughts that arise in our hearts, so that some, being hated from the heart, might be immediately eradicated, while others, to the extent that we love them, might remain, so that both the grace of Christ and the human will—whether it loves works for the sake of grace or thoughts for the sake of self-indulgence—might be revealed.

11. Like some kind of evil kinship, our lusts and the inclinations of our thoughts act in concert with one another. Every thought, having taken root in its lover, passes it on to his neighbor, so that a person, strongly drawn by habit to the first, is already carried away by the second even against his will. For who can escape pride when filled with vanity? Or who, having indulged in sleep and given themselves over to pleasure, will not be overcome by thoughts of fornication? Or who, having given themselves over to greed, will not be bound by lack of mercy? And those who delight in all these things—how will they escape irritability and anger?

12. And once we have received grace, it is up to our free will to walk according to the flesh or according to the Spirit. But it is impossible to walk according to the Spirit while loving human praise and indulging the body, and it is impossible to live according to the flesh while inwardly preferring the future over the present. Therefore, we must hate human praise and the comfort of the body, through which wicked thoughts take root in us even against our will, and sincerely say to the Lord: “I have hated them with perfect hatred; they have become my enemies” (Ps. 138:22).

13. To those baptized in the Catholic Church, grace is mysteriously bestowed through baptism and dwells within them in secret; then, as they keep the commandments and maintain mental hope, it is revealed in the believer, according to the Lord’s word: “Whoever believes in Me, rivers of living water will flow from within him. He said this about the Spirit, whom those who believed in His name were to receive” (John 7: 38, 39).

14. Because of their lack of faith, everyone falls under the power of sin, “being drawn away and enticed by their own lust; and when lust has conceived, it gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is fully grown, brings forth death” (James 1:14–15). From one’s own lust arises sin of the mind, and from this comes the commission of an act in accordance with it. As soon as anyone falls away (from the obligation of baptism), he is immediately held captive by sin.

15. The Holy Spirit is given to those who believe firmly at the very moment of baptism, but we ourselves grieve and quench Him within ourselves. That is why the Apostle commands: “Do not quench the Spirit” (1 Thess. 5:19), “Do not grieve the Holy Spirit, by whom you were sealed for the day of redemption” (Eph. 4: 30). This does not mean that every baptized person who has received grace thereby is unchangeable and no longer requires repentance, but that through baptism, by Christ’s gift, we have been granted God’s perfect grace to fulfill all the commandments; yet afterward, anyone who has received this grace sacramentally but fails to keep the commandments—to the extent that they neglect them—remains under the power of sin because, through negligence, having received the power to act, they fail to perform the works. Whether we wish to be made perfect, quickly or slowly, we must believe in Christ completely and keep all His commandments, having received from Him the power to do so. To the extent that we, by faith, keep God’s commandments, to that extent does the Holy Spirit produce His fruits within us. The fruits of the Spirit, according to St. Paul, are: “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control” (Gal. 5:22).

16. Therefore, if any of the faithful, living according to the commandments, has attained a certain spiritual effect commensurate with that, let him believe that he has already received the power to do so, for in baptism he received the grace of the Spirit—the source of all that is good, not only of the hidden and spiritual virtues, but also of the manifest ones. And let no one who is virtuous presume to do anything good by his own strength alone, for a good person “brings forth good things from the good treasure of the heart” (Matt. 12:35), says the Word, meaning by “treasure” the Holy Spirit hidden in the hearts of the faithful.

17. Having come to know with certainty that, according to the Apostle’s word, he possesses Christ hidden within him from baptism, he leaves behind all the things of this world and dwells in his heart, “guarding it with all diligence” (Prov. 4:23). For “it is God who works in us both to will and to act according to his good pleasure” (Phil. 2:13). By the phrase “to will and to act”—“to will and to act”—the Apostle shows that the will to practice virtues depends on our self-control, but that it is impossible to practice them or to root out sins without God. The saying, “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15:5), has the same meaning. But we also have a part to play in all this.

18. The royal mind of each person first receives good and beneficial counsel from Christ, who dwells within, in the secret temple of the heart, and puts it into practice through a virtuous life, which in turn brings glory to Christ—the One who granted this counsel—through good thoughts.

19. The blessings that the righteous will receive at the resurrection are found on high, while their betrothal and the firstfruits of these blessings are already at work spiritually in the hearts of believers, so that, being assured of the future, we may despise all that is present and love God unto death. Therefore, the Apostle did not say, “You are to approach,” but “You have approached Mount Zion and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem” (Heb. 12:22); for we have all been made capable of this through baptism, but only those who are steadfast in faith are deemed worthy to receive it—those who die daily for the sake of Christ’s love, that is, those who stand above all thought of this earthly life and think of nothing else but how to attain perfect love for Christ. Seeking this above all else, Saint Paul said: "I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me," that is, to love as I was loved by Christ (Phil. 3: 12). And when he attained this love, he no longer wished to think about anything—neither the sorrows of the body nor the wonders of creation—but he clearly left everything behind and said, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" (Rom. 8:35–39). He no longer wished to think about anything, but only to abide there (in the heart, in the love of Christ).

20. The Apostle said that we have the firstfruits of the Spirit within us (Rom. 8:23), indicating the measure of our capacity, for we cannot contain the full work of the Spirit except through perfect obedience. Just as the sun, being perfect, pours out from itself a grace that is perfect, simple, and equal to all, yet each person receives the sunlight only to the extent that their eye is purified—so too has the Holy Spirit, through baptism, made those who believe in Him capable of receiving all His works and gifts: however, His gifts do not operate in everyone to the same degree, but are given to each according to their observance of the commandments, insofar as they bear witness through good deeds and demonstrate the measure of their faith in Christ.

21. Satanic temptation consists solely in a thought—a perception of a wicked thing (deed)—which finds an opening to approach our mind only through our lack of faith. For when, having received the commandment to have no concern for anything but to "guard your heart with all diligence" (Prov. 4:23) and to seek within ourselves the kingdom of heaven that exists, the mind will turn away from the heart and from the aforementioned pursuit, immediately giving way to the devil's temptation and becoming susceptible to his wicked counsel. But even then, the devil has no power to set our thoughts in motion, otherwise he would not spare us, forcibly instilling every evil thought and not allowing us to think of anything good; but he has only the power to instill what is perverse in the very first thought, in order to test our inner disposition—toward which it inclines, toward his counsel or toward God's commandment—since they are opposed to one another.

22. When a hateful thought takes root within and becomes entrenched, this depends not on a new disposition of ours, but on a previous perception. Such a thought remains fixed in a single-minded state; the indignation of the heart prevents it from turning into rambling thoughts and passion. A single-minded (bare) thought, hated by one who is attentive to oneself, lacks the power to draw the mind into rambling thoughts. This happens only when the heart sympathizes with it. Therefore, if we completely renounce all sympathy, the appearance (in the mind) of previously accepted images will always remain single-minded, and will no longer be able to harm us or condemn our conscience.

23. When the mind recognizes the futility of its resistance to previously accepted images (impressions) and confesses its past guilt to God, this very temptation is immediately dispelled, and the mind once again has the power to heed the heart and guard it "with all diligence" through prayer, striving to enter the innermost and safest chambers of the heart, where there are no longer the winds of deceitful thoughts, raging violently and casting the soul and body into the rapids of sensuality and the torrent of impurity, there is no broad and spacious path, paved with the words and images of worldly wisdom, which beguiles those who follow it, even if they are very wise; for the purest innermost chambers of the soul and the house of Christ receive into themselves our mind, stripped bare and bringing nothing from this age, whether it be justified by reason or not, except for "these three," as named by the Apostle: "faith, hope, and love" (1 Cor. 13). Therefore, whoever loves the truth and desires to labor wholeheartedly may, as stated above, not be carried away by previously formed impressions, but listen to his heart, to progress toward the inner life and draw near to God—provided they do not neglect the labors of prayer and a life lived according to God; for one who carefully restrains themselves every day—not only outwardly but also inwardly—from mental flights of fancy and carnal pleasures cannot help but labor with their heart.

24. To be free from the temptations of evil is a characteristic of the Unchanging Nature alone, not of human nature. And Adam was subject to Satan's temptation, yet he had the power to obey it or to disobey it. A temptation of thought is neither sin nor righteousness, but a revelation of our self-willed nature. That is why it is permitted to tempt us, so that those who incline toward the commandment may be deemed worthy of victory crowns for their faithfulness, and those who incline toward self-indulgence may be shown to be worthy of condemnation for their unfaithfulness. But we must also know this: judgment is not rendered immediately after every change in us, as to whether we have proven ourselves capable or worthy of rejection, but when, throughout our entire sojourn in this life, we are tested by trials—winning and being defeated, falling and rising, straying and being guided back to the right path—only then, on the day of our departure, after all has been taken into account, will we be judged or commended accordingly. Therefore, a trial is not a sin. Not at all! For although temptation involuntarily (without our consent) presents things to us in a single thought, we have received from the Lord the power of spiritual action, and it is within our own power, at the very first thought, having discerned what is harmful and what is beneficial, to reject or accept these thoughts, which multiply not out of necessity but from the disposition of the soul.

25. Since our soul, clouded by sensuality and vanity, has fallen into the depths of folly, it heeds neither the commandments of Scripture, nor natural reason, nor the counsel of the wise, but follows only its own designs. Therefore, harboring within itself these causes of evil, it cannot be free from the actions characteristic of them. To the extent that each person believes in the Lord regarding future blessings, having despised human glory and pleasures, to that extent does he keep his thoughts in check, and to that extent is he more at peace than one who loves pleasures; this is why we differ from one another both in our thoughts and in our way of life.

26. Know for certain that the Lord sees into the hearts of all people: He immediately intercedes, as He has promised, for those who hate the first appearance of wicked thoughts, and does not allow the multitude of their wandering thoughts, once aroused, to defile their minds and consciences; but those who do not suppress the first stirrings of such thoughts with faith and hope in God, but rather take pleasure in them, He leaves as unbelievers without help, to be struck by the subsequent thoughts, which He does not remove, for He sees that we love their first allure rather than hating them at their first appearance.

27. No power compels us by force to either good or evil, but whoever we serve of our own free will—God or the devil—that one then encourages us toward everything that falls within his domain.

28. The origins of our actions are two inclinations of thought, unnoticed by the mind: human praise and the gratification of the body, which, when they involuntarily take hold of us before our will consents to them, constitute neither vice nor virtue, but serve only as a revelation of our will's inclination—toward which we are drawn. The Lord desires that we endure insults and afflict ourselves, while the devil desires the opposite; and therefore, when we rejoice in the aforementioned inclinations, it is evident that, having disobeyed the Lord, we are inclining toward a spirit of sensuality; but when we grieve over these inclinations, it is evident that we are turning toward God, having chosen the narrow path. That is why these temptations are permitted to assail people, so that those who love God's commandment and find delight in it may submit their will to Christ, and He, finding an opening in them, may direct their minds toward the truth. Understand the opposite as well: those who, on the contrary, love human glory and the gratification of the flesh, give the devil an opening, and he, having found his way in, offers us his evil suggestions; and as we take delight in thoughts of them, he never ceases to add to them until we come to hate the two aforementioned passions from the heart. But we love them so much that not only do we forsake virtue for their sake, but we also, when the opportunity arises, exchange one of these passions for the other: sometimes we mortify the body for the sake of vanity, and sometimes we endure dishonor for the sake of sensual pleasure. And when we carelessly consent to them, we begin to seek the means of satisfying them. The means of vanity and bodily pleasure is the love of money, which, according to Divine Scripture, is the root of all evil (1 Tim. 6:10).

29. The Lord did not say to Adam, "On the very day you eat of it, I will put you to death," but, warning them, He foretold to them the law of righteousness, saying, "On the very day you eat of it, you will surely die" (Gen. 2:17). And in general, the Lord has ordained that for every deed, whether good or evil, a fitting recompense should follow naturally, and not by special decree, as some who are ignorant of the spiritual law suppose.

30. We must remember that if we hate any of our fellow believers as evil, then God will hate us as evil; and if we reject anyone from repentance as a sinner, then we too will be rejected (by God) as sinners, and if we do not forgive our neighbor's sins, then in the same way we ourselves will not receive forgiveness for our sins. Proclaiming this law, our Lawgiver Christ said to us: "Do not judge, and you will not be judged; do not condemn, and you will not be condemned; forgive, and you will be forgiven" (Luke 6:37). Knowing this law, the Holy Apostle Paul clearly stated: "For when you judge another, you condemn yourself" (Rom. 2:1). And the Prophet, not knowing this, cried out to God: "For You will repay each one according to his deeds" (Ps. 61:13), and another Prophet, speaking on behalf of God, says: "Vengeance is Mine; I will repay, says the Lord" (Deut. 32:35).

31. The Prophet Daniel says: "Atone for your sins with alms, and for your iniquities with acts of generosity (toward the poor)" (Dan. 4:24). But perhaps you will say: I have no money; how can I be generous to the poor? You have no money, but you have desires; renounce them and use them to do good. Can you not give alms with your physical hand? Give alms with a righteous will: "If your brother sins against you, forgive him" (Luke 17:3), according to the Lord's word, and this will be a great act of charity for you. If we seek the forgiveness of sins from God, we must act in this way with every sin, toward everyone, so that what is said (in the Gospel) may come true: "Forgive, and you will be forgiven" (Luke 6:37). It is a great deed for someone who has money to give alms to the poor; but to show mercy to one's neighbors for their sins (committed against us) is all the more important for the forgiveness of sins, inasmuch as the soul, by its very nature, is nobler than the body. But if we ask God for forgiveness (of sins) and have received what we asked for many times over, so that we have not suffered any harm here because of it, yet refuse to let our neighbors share in this gift, then by this very act we become like that wicked servant who, having received forgiveness of a debt—ten talents—from his Master, did not forgive his neighbor, who owed him only a hundred denarii; to whom the Lord, as if judging according to the law, said: "You wicked servant! I forgave you the entire debt because you begged Me—should you not also have had mercy on your fellow servant and forgiven his debt, just as I forgave you?" "And he was angry," it is said, "and handed him over to the torturers until he paid back the entire debt." And he draws a conclusion from this, saying: "So also will My heavenly Father do to you, if you do not forgive each of your brothers their trespasses from your hearts" (Matt. 18: 32 – 35).

32. The Lord said, "Woe to you who are rich" (Luke 6:24). But in saying this, He does not condemn all who have become wealthy, for among them are those who truly know how to manage their wealth according to the will of God, who gave it, and who, as Scripture says, receive a hundredfold in this life, such as: Blessed Abraham and the righteous Job, who, being merciful, became even richer both here and in the age to come, but He rebukes (as we said above) those who, having a greedy disposition, appropriate God's gifts for themselves—whether in regard to material possessions or His various acts of generosity—and refuse to be merciful toward their neighbor. For it is not wealth not given by the Lord that causes harm to its possessor, but the greed arising from injustice and its mother, —unmercifulness—which, by avoiding entirely, the steadfast believers have wholly renounced these present blessings, not because they have recklessly come to hate God's creation, but out of faith in Christ, who commanded them to act thus, receiving from Him the fulfillment of their daily needs. Another may grow rich even without property, possessing in his wealth a word or knowledge, or some other means of showing mercy, granted to all, for he receives it in order to impart it to the poor.

33. Those who have sinned should not despair. Let this not be so. For we are condemned not for the multitude of our sins, but for our refusal to repent and to come to know the wonders of Christ, as Truth Himself testifies: "Do you think," says the Lord, "that these Galileans, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices, were more sinful than all the people on earth? No," I tell you, "but unless you repent, you too will perish. Or those eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam fell and crushed them—do you think they were more sinful than all the people living in Jerusalem? No, I tell you; but unless you repent, you will all perish as well" (Luke 13:2–5). Do you see that we are condemned for lacking repentance?

34. Repentance, however, as I understand it, is not limited by time or by any particular deeds, but is accomplished through Christ's commandments, in accordance with them. Some of the commandments are more general, encompassing many of the specific ones, and cutting off many aspects of vice at once, as, for example, it is said in Scripture: "Give to everyone who asks of you, and do not demand your own back from the one who takes it" (Luke 6:30), and: "Do not turn away anyone who wants to borrow from you" (Matthew 5:42)—these are specific commandments. The general commandment, however, which encompasses them all, is: "Sell your possessions and give to the poor," and: "Take up your cross and follow Me" (Matthew 19:21), where "cross" refers to the endurance of the afflictions that befall us. For whoever has given everything to the poor and taken up his cross has fulfilled all the aforementioned commandments at once. Likewise: "I want," says the Apostle, "men to pray in every place, lifting up holy hands" (1 Tim. 2:8), and the general principle of this (the Lord): "Go into your inner room and pray to your Father, who is in secret" (Matt. 6:6), and again: "Pray without ceasing" (1 Thess. 5:17): he who enters his inner room and prays without ceasing has thereby fully fulfilled the prayer offered in every place. It is also said: "Do not commit adultery, do not commit fornication, do not murder," and the like, and the general principle of all this is: "casting down arguments and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God" (2 Cor. 10:5). He who subdues his thoughts has erected a barrier against all the aforementioned vices. That is why those who love God and have firm faith compel themselves to observe the general commandments, without neglecting the specific ones that arise as circumstances require. And so I believe that the work of repentance is accomplished through the following three virtues: the purification of thoughts, unceasing prayer, and patience in the afflictions that befall us; and all this must be accomplished not only outwardly but also in the mind, so that those who have labored long may thereby become dispassionate. And since the work of repentance, as we have stated, cannot be accomplished without the three virtues mentioned above, I believe that repentance is always appropriate for all who desire salvation, both sinners and the righteous, for there is no such level of perfection that does not require the practice of the aforementioned virtues; through them, beginners gain an introduction to piety, those of intermediate standing—progress in it, and the perfect—confirmation in it.

35. The Lord commands everyone: “Repent” (Matt. 4:17), so that even the spiritual and those who are making progress may not neglect this command, paying attention even to the most subtle and minor transgressions, for it is said: “He who despises a small matter will fall little by little” (Sirach 19:1). And do not say: How can a spiritual person fall? As long as he remains as he is, he does not fall; but when he allows even a small thing from the enemy to enter him and remains in it without repenting, that small thing, having taken root and grown, will no longer tolerate remaining separate from him, but draws him into union with itself as if by a chain— —a long-standing attachment, drawing him by force. And if, having entered into a struggle with it (this evil) through prayer, he rejects it, he will remain at his current level of spiritual maturity. But if, of course, he is led astray (from his usual level) by the increasing pressure of that which possesses him, thereby diminishing the struggle and the effort of prayer, he will inevitably be seduced by other passions as well. And so, gradually being led astray—each according to the extent of their own deviation—they are deprived of divine help, and finally are led into even greater sins, sometimes unwillingly, under the compulsion of the evil that had previously taken hold of them. But you will say to me: Could he not, at the beginning of his fall, have implored God not to fall into ultimate evil? And I tell you that he could have, but, having despised the small thing and, of his own free will, accepted it into himself as insignificant, he no longer prays for this, not knowing that this small thing is the beginning and cause of a greater one: so it is with both good and evil! But when the passion grows stronger and, with the help of his own will, finds a place within him, it then rises up against him by force, against his will. Then, realizing his misfortune, he prays to God, waging war against the enemy whom, out of ignorance, he had previously defended, arguing on its behalf with others. Sometimes, however, even when heard by the Lord, he receives no help, because it comes not as a person thinks, but as God ordains for our benefit. For He, knowing our weakness and contempt, helps us greatly through afflictions, so that, having been delivered without suffering, we may not eagerly commit the same sins again. And that is why we affirm that it is necessary to endure what befalls us and to remain in repentance, as is most fitting.

36. You will object to this: What further repentance is required of those who have truly pleased God and attained perfection? I acknowledge with you that such people have existed and still exist, but listen carefully and you will understand that even they have a need for it. The Lord has equated looking at a woman with lust to adultery, likened anger toward a neighbor to murder, and shown that we will give an account even for idle words (Matt. 5:28, 29; 12:36). Who, then, has never felt lust at the sight of another, has never been angry with a neighbor without cause, and has never even been guilty of a thoughtless word, so as to have no need for repentance? For even if one is not like this now, one was once like this; and therefore, with regard to repentance, one remains in debt until death. But let us suppose that there are some who are free from these weaknesses, as they say, and who have been free from every vice from birth—though this is impossible, according to the words of Saint Paul: “All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by His grace” (Rom. 3: 23, 24). However, even if such people existed, they are still descended from Adam; all were born under the sin of transgression and are therefore, by God’s judgment, condemned to death and cannot be saved without Christ.

37. Consider those who have lived since the beginning of the world, and you will find that for those who pleased God, the mystery of godliness was accomplished through repentance. No one was condemned unless they despised it, and no one was justified unless they sought it. Samson, Saul, and Eli, along with his sons—having already attained a measure of holiness but having grown weary of repentance—first lost it, and then, when the time of reprieve had passed, died a terrible death. If the devil never ceases to fight against us, then repentance must never be abandoned. The saints compel themselves to offer it also for their neighbors, since they cannot be perfect without active love,

38. If repentance is a plea for mercy, then those who have must take care not to hear, “You are full” (1 Cor. 4:8); all the more so must the poor ask according to their need, for “everyone who asks receives” (Matt. 7:8). If the one who shows mercy (to others) is himself shown mercy, then, as I believe, the whole world is sustained by repentance, when one is providentially helped by another. Through repentance, God saved the people of Nineveh, but destroyed the people of Sodom, who were indifferent to Him.

39. Even if we strive in repentance until death, we will still not have fulfilled our duty, for we have done nothing worthy of the kingdom of heaven. For just as we eat, drink, speak, and hear, so naturally must we also repent. Sometimes one who is worthy of death according to the law is put to death, but whoever lives does so by faith for the sake of repentance; even if not from one’s own sins, then from the sin of transgression—we have been cleansed through baptism, and having been cleansed, we have received the commandments; but whoever fails to fulfill the latter has defiled the former, “forgetting the cleansing of your former sins” (2 Peter 1:9), from which no one is free at any time, even if they have never neglected any of the commandments. Therefore, repentance is necessary for all: for it reveals sins that were once committed willfully but now occur involuntarily, when we come to hate our passions and turn away from them. He who restricts it turns back to the past and renews his old transgressions.

40. As for our active life, we cannot do anything worthy without repentance, but (the Lord) shows us great mercy because of our intention. One who disciplines himself and remains steadfast in repentance until his very death—even if he sins in some way—will be saved because of his self-discipline, for the Lord has promised this in the Gospel. Whoever says that he has no need of repentance considers himself righteous and is called in Scripture a child of evil; for through his belief in his own righteousness, appearing as if he had already repented without even knowing it, instead of being crucified, he consorts with the passions: for conceit and pride are passions. One who is conceited cannot be saved, for it is said in Scripture: “The scornful and the arrogant man, the haughty one, will come to nothing” (Habakkuk 2:5). If humility does no harm whatsoever to the perfect, then let him not forsake its cause—repentance. Faithful Abraham and righteous Job, in their humility, called themselves dust and ashes, and these words are a sign of humility. The three youths, truly magnanimous and great martyrs, confessed their faith in the midst of the burning flames, and speaking of themselves—“We have sinned and transgressed”—repented of past evils even though they were already perfect, and the essence of nearly their entire song consists of repentance. So, if even those who were most pleasing to God and who proved themselves perfect in their deeds resorted to the help of repentance right up until their death, who can rely on themselves and despise repentance under the pretext of righteousness?

41. We must forgive those who have wronged us, knowing that the reward for forgiving wrongs surpasses the reward for any other virtue. And if we are unable to do this because of the sin that has taken hold of us, then we must, through vigil and suffering, pray to God that He may have mercy on us and grant us such strength. At the same time, at all times, in every place, and in every endeavor, we must have a single intention: to rejoice rather than grieve in the face of various offenses from others—not simply or without reason, but because we have the opportunity to forgive those who have sinned (against us) and to receive forgiveness for our own sins. For in this lies true knowledge of God, which is vaster than all other knowledge and through which we can implore God and be heard; this is the fruit of faith; by this our faith in Christ is proven; through this we can take up our cross and follow Christ, this is the mother of the first and greatest commandments, for through this we can love God with all our heart and our neighbor as ourselves; for this we must fast, remain vigilant, and mortify our flesh, so that our heart and inner disposition may be opened, accept this within themselves, and no longer reject it. Then, because we forgive our neighbor’s sins, we will find that the grace secretly given to us at Holy Baptism will act within us no longer imperceptibly, but tangibly to our consciousness and senses.

42. Those who are wise in the letter of the law consider only those who wrong others to be guilty, but those enlightened by the Spirit, even when wronged by others, reproach themselves—unless they willingly endure the wrongs with joy—and they reproach themselves not only for this but also because their sorrows stem from their own past sins, even though one sin may be lighter than another. Whoever takes vengeance on his own account is, as it were, accusing God of a lack of justice; but whoever endures the suffering that has come upon him as if it were his own confesses the evil he has previously committed, for which he suffers, bearing the hardship.

43. Two passions hinder the virtue of forgiving offenses: pride and sensuality—and therefore, one must first renounce them in one’s mind and only then strive to acquire this virtue. Therefore, engage in a struggle with your own will to overcome these passions. This is an internal struggle, not an external one (for we are not to wage war against our neighbors), but an internal one, and no one among men will come to our aid. We will have only one Helper, mysteriously hidden within us since the time of our baptism—Christ, Who is invincible and from Whom nothing is hidden. He will assist us in this struggle if we fulfill His commandments to the best of our ability. As for our enemies, as mentioned above: sensuality, which is bound up with the flesh, and pride, which possesses both you and me. They deceived Eve and seduced Adam: sensuality pointed to the tree, “which is good for food,” “and pleasing to the eyes,” while vanity added to that: “You will be like God, knowing good and evil” (Gen. 3:5–6).

44. (From where did the monks derive their way of life?) Monks do not adhere to a way of thinking opposed to the Church, but strive to follow the mind of Christ, according to the words of the Apostle: “Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, who, being in the form of God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped, but emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant” (Phil. 2:6–7). Know, then, that such a way of thinking and living is granted by God and gives rise to a great virtue—humility. The Lord commanded the Church to do this work, saying: “Do not work for the food that perishes, but for the food that endures to eternal life” (; John 6:27). What is this work? It is to seek, through prayer, the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, which is within us, as the Lord said (Luke 17:21), promising that He will provide all that is necessary for the body to those who seek Him (Matthew 6:33). To call those who have heard this from the Lord, who have believed (His word), and who fulfill it to the best of their ability “acting contrary to nature” is to reproach God, Who commanded this.

45. How do monks who follow this rule fall? It is not those who adhere to it who fall, but those who abandon it and, having been ensnared by vanity and concern for worldly matters, neglect what is most important in monastic life—I am speaking of prayer and humility. That is why the devil does not prevent us from thinking about and doing all worldly matters, so long as he can draw us away from prayer and humility, for he knows that whatever is done without these two (virtues), even if it is good, he will eventually take away. By prayer, I mean not only that which is performed with the body, but also that which is offered to God with an undistracted mind. For if one of these two—the body or the mind—is prematurely separated, then the other, left alone, does not stand before God but before its own will.

46. Blessed Paul, desiring that we by no means be negligent in prayer, says, “Pray without ceasing” (1 Thess. 5:17), and at the same time, pointing to the undistracted state of the mind, he said: “Do not conform to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind, so that you may discern what is the will of God—what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom. 12:2). Since God, in view of our lack of faith and weakness, has given various commandments so that each person, according to his or her own effort, might avoid torment and attain salvation, the Apostle instructs us toward the perfect will of God, desiring that we might not be judged at all; and knowing that prayer contributes to the fulfillment of all the commandments, he never ceases to command and speak of it in many ways and on many occasions: “Praying at all times in the Spirit, and keeping alert in this regard with all perseverance and prayer” (Eph. 6: 18).

47. Prayer takes various forms: for it is one thing to pray to God with an undistracted mind, and another to stand in prayer with the body while the mind wanders; and yet another is to set aside time and, having put aside worldly conversations and activities, to pray; and yet another is to prefer and prioritize prayer above all worldly concerns as much as possible, according to the words of the same Apostle: “The Lord is near; do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God” (Phil. 4:6). As the blessed Peter says: “Be self-controlled and alert in your prayers, casting all your cares upon Him, for He cares for you” (1 Peter 4:7 and chapter 5:7). First of all, the Lord Himself, knowing that everything is established through prayer, said: “Do not worry about what you will eat or drink, or what you will wear; but seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you” (Matt. 6:31, 33). But perhaps the Lord is also calling us through this to greater faith: for who, having set aside concern for the temporal and not suffering want in it, will not trust God regarding eternal blessings? Revealing this, the Lord said: “Whoever is faithful in a little is faithful also in much” (Luke 16:10).

48. The Lord, knowing that daily care for the body is inevitable for us, has not cut off our daily concerns, but has permitted us to care for the present day in a very proper manner. He commands, in a godly and loving way, not to worry about tomorrow, for it is impossible for people clothed in the body to completely disregard what pertains to bodily life: through prayer and self-restraint, one can reduce much to little, but it is impossible to completely disregard everything (pertaining to the body). Therefore, whoever desires, according to Scripture, “to grow up into a perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4:13), must not give preference to various ministries over prayer, nor, without need, as it happens, take them upon himself; nor should he, when they arise out of some necessity and by God’s providence, shy away from or reject them under the pretext of prayer, but he must discern the difference (between prayer and other activities) and serve God’s providence without hesitation. Whoever reasons otherwise does not believe that, according to Scripture, one commandment is higher and more important than another, and does not wish, in the words of the Prophet, “to be guided by all the commandments” (Ps. 118:128) that come his way according to God’s providence.

49. Necessary and prudent undertakings are unavoidable, but we must reject untimely pursuits, preferring prayer to them—and especially those that lead us into great expenditures and the accumulation of excessive wealth. For to the extent that one limits these matters for the Lord’s sake and cuts away their superfluous elements, to that extent the mind is kept from distraction; and to the extent that the mind is kept from distraction, to that extent it makes room for pure prayer and demonstrates sincere faith in Christ. If, however, anyone—whether through lack of faith or some other weakness—is unable to do this, let him at least recognize the truth and, to the best of his ability, strive forward, acknowledging his own immaturity.

50. Let us strive, through hope and prayer, to cast aside all worldly cares; but if we cannot accomplish this perfectly, let us confess our shortcomings to God, and let us by no means neglect our diligence in prayer, for it is better to be rebuked for frequent lapses than for complete abandonment. In all that we have said about prayer and indispensable service, we greatly need God’s guidance to discern when and which activity we should give priority to over prayer. For everyone, while engaged in their favorite activity, thinks they are performing the proper service, not realizing that all our deeds must be directed toward pleasing God, and not toward pleasing ourselves. It is even more difficult to discern that even these necessary and unavoidable duties are not always the same, but that one of them must be given priority over another at the appropriate time: for each of these duties is not performed constantly, but at the appropriate time, whereas the duty of prayer is ordained to be unceasing; therefore, we must give it priority over activities in which there is no pressing necessity. And all the Apostles, teaching the people about this distinction—the people who wished to enlist them in service—said: “It is not fitting for us, having forsaken the word of God, to serve tables. Therefore, brothers, look out for seven men among you who are well-respected, whom we will appoint to this service. But we will devote ourselves to prayer and to the ministry of the word.” And this proposal was approved by the whole assembly” (Acts 6:2–5). What, then, do we learn from this? That people who cannot devote themselves to prayer are well-suited to serve, so that we may not be deprived of either, and that those who are better able should not neglect what is better.

51. Let us begin the work of prayer, and as we progress gradually, we will find that not only hope in God, but also firm faith, sincere love, forgiveness, love for the brethren, self-control, patience, inner guidance, and deliverance from temptations—these are the gifts of grace, heartfelt confession, and fervent tears are granted to the faithful through prayer; and not only these (things listed above), but also endurance of the sorrows that befall us, and pure love for one’s neighbor, and knowledge of the spiritual law and the attainment of God’s truth, and the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and the bestowal of spiritual treasures, and all that God has promised to give to the faithful here and in the age to come—(all these they receive through prayer). In a word—it is impossible to restore the image of God within oneself in any other way than by God’s grace and faith, if a person, with great humility, keeps his mind focused in undistracted prayer.

52. There are three kinds of piety: the first is to avoid sin; the second is, having sinned, to endure the sorrows that befall us; and the third consists in weeping over our lack of patience if we are unable to endure these sorrows. For what is not corrected here by appropriate means of reconciliation (with God) will necessarily bring upon us judgment there, unless God, seeing us weeping and humbled, as He Himself knows, erases our sins by His almighty grace.

53. Oh, how insidious and how imperceptible is the passion of seeking human approval—it even takes hold of the wise! For the actions of other passions are easily discerned by those who commit them and therefore lead those possessed by them to weeping and humility, whereas the desire to please men is concealed by words and appearances of piety, so that it is difficult for the people it deceives to discern its various forms.

54. Listen to how Scripture condemns the desire to please men. First, the Prophet David says: “God has scattered the bones of those who please men; they have been put to shame, for God has humbled them” (Ps. 52: 6), and the Apostle says: “Do not work merely to please men, as those who please men” (Eph. 6:6) and further: “Or am I now seeking to please men? If I were still trying to please men, I would not be a servant of Christ” (Gal. 1:10). And you will find much of this in the Holy Scriptures if you read them.

55. What are the various forms of seeking to please people? The mother of these forms—and the first among them—is unbelief, and following it, as its offspring, are: envy, hatred, flattery, jealousy, quarrels, hypocrisy, partiality, service only for show, slander, lies, a pretense of false piety rather than true piety, and similar, hard-to-detect, and obscure passions. But worst of all is that some praise all of this with skillful words as good, while concealing the harm that lies within them. If you wish, I will reveal some of their deceit: a cunning people-pleaser, while advising one person, plots against another; while praising one, he condemns another; while teaching his neighbor, he praises himself; he takes part in a trial not to judge fairly, but to take revenge on an enemy; he accuses with flattery until, by rebuking his enemy, he is accepted by him; he slanders without naming names to conceal his calumny; he persuades the poor to tell him what they need, as if wishing to provide it for them, and when they do, he publicizes them as beggars; boasts before the inexperienced, but speaks humbly before the experienced, seeking praise from both; when the virtuous are praised, he resents it and, by starting another story, deflects the praise; he condemns rulers when they are absent, but when they are present, praises them to their faces, mocks the humble and wise, and spies on teachers to rebuke them; he belittles simplicity to appear supremely wise; he ignores the virtues of all his neighbors but keeps their misdeeds in mind. In short: he seizes every opportunity and fawns on people, (unwittingly) revealing a multifaceted passion for pleasing others: he attempts to conceal his own evil deeds by inquiring about those of others. True monks, however, do not act this way; on the contrary, out of a spirit of mercy, they overlook the evil deeds of others, while openly confessing their own before God. For this reason, they are slandered by people who do not know their intentions, since they seek to please God rather than people. Thus, sometimes pleasing Him, sometimes humbling themselves, they expect a reward from the Lord for both, for He said: “Whoever exalts himself will be humbled, and whoever humbles himself will be exalted” (Luke 18:14).

56. Of the sorrows that befall us, nothing comes upon us unjustly, but everything happens according to God’s righteous judgment. Some suffer for their own evil deeds, and others for their neighbor’s. Take, for example, the three youths, who, having been cast into the furnace, teach us this way of thinking, saying that they were cast in because of their own fault (Dan. 3:28, 31) and by God’s command, even though they had taken on the appearance of others at that time. And Saint David, when he was reviled by Shemei, confessed that he had been subjected to revilement because of his own fault and by God’s command (2 Chronicles 16:11). Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the other prophets foretold to the people (of Israel) and to the nations (of the Gentiles) that tribulations would befall them in future times, commensurate with the sins of each, declaring to them both their sins and their calamities, for they say: “Because they spoke this and did that and that, such-and-such befell them.” And the blessed David, explaining this, says in the Psalm: “I have understood, O Lord, that Your judgments are righteous, and You have truly humbled me” (Ps. 118: 75) and further: “You have delivered me to the scorn of fools. I was struck dumb and did not open my mouth, for You have done this” (Ps. 38:9–10).

57. Let us accept those who rebuke us as accusers sent by God to expose the evil thoughts hidden within us, so that, having carefully examined our thoughts, we may correct ourselves—even though we are unaware of much of the evil lurking within us, for only a perfect man is capable of remembering all his shortcomings. If even our obvious shortcomings are not easily noticed by us, how much less so are our thoughts; and since we are unaware of most of the evil hidden within us, we are perplexed by the sorrows that befall us. Let us recognize, as people of reason, that the Lord allows sorrows to come upon us for our own good and thereby does us much good: first, through this, the (evil) thoughts that secretly control us are revealed; and once they are revealed, the Lord grants us true and sincere humility, and then bestows upon us deliverance from vain pride and the complete exposure of all the evil hidden within us. Know for certain that if we do not endure the sorrows that befall us with faith and gratitude, we cannot recognize the evil hidden within us; and if we do not clearly recognize it, we cannot reject our present evil thoughts, nor seek purification from past evils, nor gain firm assurance regarding the future.

58. The sorrows and rebukes that befall us may not seem to correspond to our sins, but in a spiritual sense they retain all truth. We can see this from Holy Scripture as well: did those who perished when the Tower of Siloam collapsed bring the tower crashing down upon others? Or did the captives, taken to Babylon for seventy years as a punishment, take others captive as a punishment? Such are not the cases of punishment, but just as soldiers, if found guilty of any crime, are subjected to corporal punishment, yet do not suffer the very same evil they committed—so too are we all punished by the afflictions that befall us at the proper time and in a manner conducive to repentance, but not in the same way, nor at the same time, nor by the same means. It is precisely this—that is, the delay in time and the dissimilarity between the afflictions that befall us and our sins—that leads many to disbelieve in God’s truth.

59. The cause of every sorrowful event (that befalls us) lies in the thoughts of each of us: I might say that words and deeds are also causes, but since they do not precede thought, I therefore attribute everything to thoughts. Thought comes first, and then, through words and deeds, communion is formed between us (and our neighbors). Communion, however, is of two kinds: one arises from malice, and the other from love. Through communion, we accept one another, even those we do not know, and accepting our neighbor necessarily entails suffering, as the Holy Scriptures say: “He who stands surety for his friend gives his hand to the enemy” (Prov. 6:1). Thus, everyone endures what befalls them not only for themselves but also for their neighbor—insofar as they have taken that burden upon themselves.

60. Accepting one’s neighbor’s suffering, when it stems from malice, happens involuntarily. And it happens this way: one who deprives another (his neighbor) of something, even though he does not wish to, takes upon himself the temptations of the one deprived; likewise, one who slanders takes upon himself the temptations of the one slandered; one who extorts takes upon himself the temptations of the one extorted; one who wearies takes upon himself the temptations of the one wearied; one who speaks ill of another takes upon himself the temptations of the one spoken ill of; the one who despises—the one who is despised; the liar takes upon himself the temptations of the one he has slandered; and so as not to list everything separately, I will say briefly: whoever wrongs his neighbor takes upon himself, in proportion to the wrong, the temptation of the one he has wronged. Divine Scripture also testifies to this, saying: “Whoever digs a pit for the upright will fall into it, and whoever heaps a stone upon himself will bring it down upon himself” (Prov. 26: 27), and also: “All the plans of the wicked come to nothing, but all the plans of the righteous come from the Lord” (Prov. 16:33). “Is God unjust when He inflicts wrath” (Rom. 3:5)—not only upon those who are chastened by afflictions, but also upon those who recklessly rebel against these afflictions.

61. Taking upon oneself one’s neighbor out of love is what the Lord Jesus has entrusted to us in every way, first by healing our spiritual infirmities, then by “healing every disease and every sickness, taking away the sin of the world,” renewing those who firmly believe in Him and purifying their nature, granting them deliverance from death, bequeathing the fear of God, teaching piety, showing that we must suffer for love’s sake even unto death; moreover, He has granted us patience through the communion of the Spirit and future blessings, “which no eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered the human heart” (1 Cor. 2:9). Therefore, He endures temptations for us, suffers insults, mockery, and bondage; He is betrayed, struck on the cheeks, made to drink vinegar and gall, nailed to the cross, and pierced with a spear. Thus, having united Himself with us in both flesh and spirit, and having taken upon Himself our sufferings, He then handed down this law to the holy Apostles and disciples, the Prophets, the Fathers, and the Patriarchs—teaching some beforehand through the Holy Spirit, and revealing it to others through His Most Pure Body. Demonstrating this self-sacrifice, He said: “Greater love has no one than this, that someone lay down his life for his friends” (John 15:13). That is why Saint Paul, imitating the Lord, said: “Now I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and in my flesh I am filling up what is lacking in Christ’s afflictions for the sake of His body, that is, the Church” (Col. 1: 24), alluding to this acceptance out of love.

62. Do you wish to understand more clearly how all the Apostles, in thought, word, and deed, entered into communion with us and, through this communion, bore our trials? (They did this) in thought: by presenting the Scriptures to us, citing prophecies, exhorting us to believe in Christ as our Savior, assuring us that we must serve Him as the Son of God by nature, praying for us, shedding tears, and doing everything that can be done by one who is faithful in thought. In other words: by pleading with us, warning us, teaching us, rebuking us, and reproaching us for our lack of faith, rebuking our ignorance, explaining the Scriptures, revealing the times, confessing Christ, and proclaiming that He was crucified for us, affirming that the Word made flesh is one, not two, even though we understand Him to consist of two natures, united inseparably and without confusion, at all times, in every place, and in every deed, cutting off wickedness, refusing to agree with falsehood, not conversing with those who boast in the flesh, not associating with the vain, not fearing the proud, destroying the wicked, receiving the humble, taking the godly as our own, and teaching us to do the same. And in their deeds: being persecuted, reviled, deprived, insulted, cast into prisons, killed, and suffering similar things for our sake. Thus, having entered into fellowship with us, they also accepted our trials, for they say: "If we are afflicted, it is for your salvation; if we are comforted, it is for your comfort," having received the law from the Lord, who said: "Greater love has no one than this, that someone lay down his life for his friends" (John 15: 13). And they passed this on to us, saying: "For if the Lord laid down His life for us, we also ought to lay down our lives for our brothers" (1 John 3:16), and also: "Bear one another's burdens, and in this way fulfill the law of Christ" (Galatians 6:2).

63. And so, if we have come to understand these two kinds of fellowship with one another—that is, acceptance, out of necessity and that which springs from love—then, in accordance with these, we will not be curious about the temptations that befall us—how, or when, or through whom they come upon us—for only God knows how each of them corresponds to the spiritual forces, the time of their inevitable occurrence, and the cooperation of all creation in this. And we must only believe in God's truth and know that everything that befalls us involuntarily happens to us either for the sake of love or because of malice; and therefore we must endure it, not reject it, lest we add yet another sin to our sins.

64. The will of the flesh is the natural movement of the body, followed by a passion arising without thought—which is strengthened by sleep and the body's rest; of these, the blessed Peter speaks: "Do not be surprised at the fiery trial that has come upon you to test you, as though something strange were happening to you" (1 Peter 4:12). And the blessed Paul said of them: "The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh"; that is why he commands, saying: "Walk by the Spirit, and do not fulfill the desires of the flesh" (Gal. 5:16–17). The Apostles said this, desiring that we not consent to such impulses.

65. Those who strive for virtue must, having begun their endeavor, see it through to the end. As for the young and the old—those who are in good health and fear neither toil nor hostility—it is more beneficial to embrace constant fasting with all their zeal: to eat bread in moderation and to drink water from time to time (in moderation as well), so as to finish a meal while still feeling some hunger and thirst, lest the enjoyment (of food and drink) become an obstacle to the necessary service of God. If, by partaking of the aforementioned food, we become fully satisfied, we will soon desire other delicacies. But if we do not become satisfied, then, always being hungry, even if we desire satisfaction, we will desire to be satisfied even with just bread.

66. It is not easy to master a shameless stomach: for it is a god to those it overcomes, and it is impossible for one who obeys it to remain blameless. And I see misfortune arising not only from overindulgence but also from abstaining from food; for when we go without food for many days, despondency, having found a foothold within us, will rise up and fight against us, and our nightly vigil will be cast into sleep, and our daytime prayer into carnal thoughts, so that we derive no benefit whatsoever because of sleep and suffer greater harm from carnal thoughts; for, as those who fast more than others, we begin to be presumptuous and to look down on those who are lesser, and such an attitude (toward ourselves and our neighbors) is heavier than any sin.

67. Just as a foolish farmer, having tilled his field at great expense and left it unseeded, has labored to his own loss, so too, if we, having disciplined our bodies with great self-control, fail to sow the seeds of prayer, it will turn out that we have labored against ourselves. But perhaps someone will say: if prayer is the main work of righteousness, what need is there for fasting? It is of the utmost importance: for just as a poor farmer, if he sows in a field overgrown with weeds without first tilling the soil anew, will reap thorns instead of wheat—so too, if we sow the seed of prayer without first mortifying our bodies through fasting, we will bear the fruits of sin instead of righteousness. For this body is of the same earth, and if it is not cultivated with the same diligence as the earth, it will never bear the fruit of righteousness.

68. Fasting, just as it benefits those who approach it wisely, so does it harm those who undertake it unwisely. Therefore, those who seek the benefits of fasting must guard against its harm—that is, pride—and the bread we eat after completing the fast we have set for ourselves must be divided into days of abstinence from food, so that, by eating a small portion each day, we may subdue the desires of our flesh and keep our hearts steadfast in the most beneficial prayer, so that, being preserved by God's power from pride, we may take care throughout all the days of our lives to remain in humility, without which no one can ever please God.

69. If we were to strive for humility, there would be no need to punish us, for all the evil and sorrow that befalls us comes upon us because of our pride. If an angel of Satan was sent to the Apostle "to torment him" so that he would not become proud, how much more will Satan himself be sent to trample us when we become proud, until we humble ourselves. Our forefathers owned homes, possessed wealth, had wives, cared for their children, and yet, because of their insatiable humility, conversed with God; but we have withdrawn from the world, despised wealth, left our homes, and, thinking that we dwell with God, are mocked by demons because of our pride. The one who exalts himself does not know himself, for if he saw his own folly and weakness, he would not exalt himself; and how can one who does not know himself come to know God? If he could not recognize the folly in which he dwells, how could he possibly come to know the wisdom of God, from which he is far removed and to which he is a stranger? He who knows God contemplates His greatness and, reproaching himself, speaks like the blessed Job: "I had heard of You by hearsay before, but now my eye has seen You. Therefore I despised myself and melted away; I considered myself dust and ashes" (Job 42:5–6). Thus, those who imitate Job know Him. Therefore, if we too desire to see God, let us reproach ourselves and be humble and wise, so that we may not only see Him before us, but, having Him living and resting within us, may delight in Him; for in this way our folly will be made wise by His wisdom, and our weakness will be strengthened by His power through our Lord Jesus Christ.

70. Fasting, vigil, and the life of a pilgrim are good (deeds); however, these are merely the outward labors of a virtuous life, but the Christian life is more internal than these (bodily virtues), and no one should place their hope (solely) in them. For it happens to some that, while they partake of grace, the malice (of the enemy)—still lurking within them—sets a trap: it willingly yields to them and remains dormant, but leads a person to think that his mind has been purified, and then lures him into the conceit that he is a perfect Christian, and then, when a person ceases to be vigilant (assuming he is free and becomes careless), the malice attacks him like a robber, secretly lying in ambush, tempting him, and casting him into the depths of the earth. For if robbers or soldiers, being men of twenty years of age, know how to set traps for their enemies, lay ambushes, lie in wait for them, and attack them from the rear, surrounding them on all sides and beating them, how much more so does malice—which has lived for so many thousands of years— and whose purpose is to destroy souls. It knows how to set a secret ambush in the heart and, at certain times, to remain inactive, in order to lull the soul into a false sense of its own perfection. The foundation of Christianity is this: that a person, no matter how many righteous deeds he may perform, should not rest on them or consider himself great, but should remain humble in spirit. And if he becomes a partaker of grace, let him not think that he has achieved anything, nor let him imagine himself to be a great man, nor let him begin to teach; and even while leading a good life marked by great humility, asceticism, and prayer—and being a partaker of grace—let him not think highly of his own soul. But in truth, this beginning of grace was given to him then especially so that he might endure the toil, hunger and thirst, so that he might not be sated in his longing nor consider himself righteous and rich in grace, but might weep and mourn as a mother weeps who had an only son who, after she had raised him, died unexpectedly.

71. Whoever fulfills the law in outward life and conduct is free only from the consequences of wickedness, offering up to God as a sacrifice the senseless actions of the passions; and such a person, because of spiritual infancy, is content with this way of life for the sake of salvation.

72. He who has truly come to love the Gospel life has eradicated both the beginning and the end of his wickedness; through deed and word, he surpasses every virtue, offering a sacrifice of praise and confession, having been freed from all anxiety (arising) from the workings of the passions, and being free in mind from the struggle against them, finds in the hope of future blessings an insatiable delight that nourishes the soul.

73. The fear of Gehenna encourages beginners to avoid wickedness, while the desire for a reward of good deeds inspires those who are making progress to strive to do good, and the mystery of love elevates the mind above all creation, making it blind to everything other than God. It is from among those who have become blind to everything other than God that the Lord enlightens (11c. 145.8), revealing to them the Most Divine.

74. "The Kingdom of Heaven is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of flour, until the whole was leavened" (Matt. 13:33). This signifies that the mind, having received the Lord's word into itself, hid it within its threefold nature—that is, according to the Apostle, the body, the spirit, and the soul—and gathered all their subtleties in thought, like flour scattered in many ways, into a single leaven of faith, awaiting to become in every way like the word at work within it. In the same way, the Lord likened the word of truth to a mustard seed, which, though small, when sown in the hearts of those who hear, grows through appropriate action and becomes—according to Scripture—like a great tree standing on high ground, serving as "a refuge for approaching thoughts."

75. The spiritual law consists of Christ's commandments, of which the first and greatest is love; it thinks no evil, but loves all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things (1 Cor. 13:5, 7), according to the word of Scripture. It is by this love that we are distinguished from one another, yet none of us attains the fullness of its worth; rather, we hope that Christ's grace will make up for our shortcomings, provided we do not cease to act to the best of our ability, for God knows how much we are unable to do because of our weakness, and how much we fail to perform acts of love through negligence. But since love is strengthened not only by voluntary efforts but also by the trials that befall us, we therefore need much patience and meekness, with God's help. The Divine Apostle says: "Let anyone who thinks he is wise in this age become a fool, so that he may become wise" (1 Cor. 3:18).

76. The land of the Chaldeans (Acts 7:4) is a life of passions, in which the idols of sin are created and worshiped. Mesopotamia (ibid., v. 2), on the other hand, is a life that embraces both opposing vices. But the Promised Land (Heb. 11:9) is a state filled with every good thing. Thus, anyone who, like ancient Israel, returns to his old ways, is once again cast down into the slavery of the passions, losing the freedom that has been granted.

77. Whoever has valiantly conquered bodily passions and has striven sufficiently against the evil spirits, driving their designs out of the land of his soul, must pray that he may be granted a pure heart, and that a righteous spirit may be renewed within him (Ps. 50: 12)—that is, that he may be completely rid of evil thoughts and, by the gift of grace, be filled with divine thoughts, and thus become God's mental world, bright and great, consisting of moral, natural, and theological contemplations.

78. A pure heart (Ps. 50: 12) is one that has presented to God a memory that is completely formless (pure of impressions) and devoid of images, and is ready to receive only God's impressions, from which it is usually made luminous.

79. Whoever has overcome the soul's inclination toward the body through divine desire has become unlimited, even though he remains in the body. For God, who draws the desire of the one who desires, is incomparably superior to all things and does not permit the one who desires to attach his desire to anything that comes after God. Therefore, let us desire God with all the strength of our desire, and let us ensure that our free will is not possessed by anything bodily; let us set our disposition (of the soul) truly above all sensory and mental things, and (then) we will not, of our own free will, accept any harm from natural life, insofar as it concerns being with God, who is indescribable by nature.

80. The great Moses, having set up his tabernacle outside the camp—that is, having established his thought and mind beyond the visible—begins to worship God (Ex. 34: 8), and having entered into darkness (Ex. 20: 21), into the invisible and immaterial realm of knowledge, he remains there, initiated into the most sacred mysteries.

81. Until we completely free our minds from the habitual attachment to our own being and to everything that comes after God, we do not attain constancy in virtue. But when we attain this dignity through love, then we will come to know the power of God's promise: for the worthy must believe that there is unshakable assurance where the mind first establishes its power through love. For unless the mind has stepped outside of itself and of all that can be conceived, and has established itself in the silence that transcends thought, it cannot be free from the changeability inherent in all things.

82. Those who, "out of fear of the Jews," were sitting in an upper room in Galilee, "with the doors locked" (John 20: 19)—that is, out of fear of evil spirits, living safely in the land of revelations, at the height of divine contemplation, having shut off their senses like doors—they receive the Word of God, which comes to them in an incomprehensible way, appearing to them without sensory perception; and through the proclamation of peace, it grants them dispassion, and through the breath—the division of the Holy Spirit—grants them authority over evil spirits and reveals to them the signs (John 20: 20) of His mysteries.

83. One who observes the sixth day according to the Gospel, having first put to death the initial stirrings of sin, attains through virtues a state of dispassion, pure from all evil, keeping the Sabbath (Ex. 16:29–30) with the mind even from the subtlest conception of passions in the imagination. And having crossed the Jordan (Gen. 32:22, 30), one is transported to the land of knowledge, where the mind, mysteriously created by the world, dwells in the Spirit of God.

84. The Sabbath of Sabbaths (Lev. 16, 31) is the peace of the rational soul, which, by diverting the mind even from all the divine words secretly contained in created beings, in the rapture of love has wholly clothed it in the one God and, through mysterious theology, has made the mind utterly inseparable from God.

3. 200 Chapters on the Spiritual Law

1. Since you have repeatedly expressed a desire to know how, according to the Apostle, “the law is spiritual” (Rom. 7: 14) and what is the disposition of the mind and the conduct of those who strive to observe it, we will speak of this to the best of our ability.

2. First, God, as we know, is the beginning, the middle, and the end of all good. But good³⁹ can neither come into being nor be assured except in Christ Jesus and in the Holy Spirit.

3. Every good thing is given to us by the Lord with a specific purpose. Whoever believes this will not lose it.

4. Firm faith is a strong tower⁴⁰. For the believer, Christ is everything.

5. May the One who presides over all good things preside over all your endeavors, so that your endeavors may be according to God.

6. The humble and spiritually minded person, when reading the Holy Scriptures, will apply everything to himself and not to another.

7. Call upon God to open the eyes of your heart so that you may see the benefit of prayer and of reading, understood through experience.

8. One who possesses any spiritual gift and shows compassion toward the needy preserves his gift through this compassion, but the proud will lose it, being struck down by thoughts of pride.

9. The lips of the humble speak the truth, and whoever contradicts it is like a servant who strikes the Lord on the cheek.

10. Do not be a disciple of self-praise, lest you learn pride instead of humility.

11. Do not exalt yourself with knowledge from Scripture (borrowed), lest your mind fall into a spirit of blasphemy.

12. Do not attempt to resolve a dark and confusing matter through argumentation, but rather through what the spiritual law commands—patience, prayer, and unshakable⁴¹ hope.

13. One who prays in the flesh and does not yet possess a spiritual mind is like the blind man who cried out, saying, “Son of David, have mercy on me” (Mark 10:48)!

14. This same man, who had previously been blind, when he received his sight and saw the Lord, no longer called Him the Son of David, but confessed Him to be the Son of God and worshiped Him (John 9:35–38).

15. Do not become arrogant while shedding tears in your prayer, for it was Christ who touched your eyes, and you have received spiritual sight.

16. Only he who, following the example of the blind man, casts off his garments⁴² and draws near to the Lord becomes His (true) follower and a preacher of the most perfect doctrines (Mark 10:50–51).

17. Evil (sin), when indulged in one’s thoughts (with pleasure), hardens the heart (petrifies it), while self-restraint coupled with hope, by eradicating evil, softens the heart (reduces it to dust).

18. There is a proper and beneficial grinding down of the heart—leading to its softening—and there is another, disorderly and harmful one—leading only to its destruction⁴³.

19. Vigilance, prayer, and patience in the face of (adversities, misfortunes, and sorrows) are a form of grinding (crushing) that does not merely inflict wounds, but is beneficial to the heart—provided we do not hinder their integration through self-indulgence⁴⁴. He who abides in them, and in other things as well, will be aided; but he who disregards them and divides them (separating one from the other) will suffer unbearably at the hour of departure⁴⁵.

³⁹ Of course, this does not refer to good deeds done by people, but to blessings from God.

⁴⁰ A pillar in the East is not a pile of stones, but a tall residential building, providing safety from evil people.

⁴¹ Monologistos means “one-word”—in other words, resolute. Many elders, when faced with confusion, would pray and receive guidance.

⁴² Of course, this is selfless resolve.

⁴⁴ A solution is a mixture of different elements, such as water and wine. The three virtues mentioned must always be intertwined. Self-indulgence disrupts their union.

⁴⁵ Then one will realize that one has acted wrongly without meaning to.

20. A pleasure-seeking heart (one that seeks only pleasures) becomes, at the hour of departure, a prison and bonds for the soul, while a hardworking heart (one that loves to mortify and weary itself against its own will, for the Lord's sake) is an open door (to the next life).

21. The iron gates leading into the city (Acts 12:10) are a hard heart; for the afflicted and the contrite, they "will open of themselves," just as they did for Peter⁴⁶.

22. There are many forms of prayer, each distinct from the other. However, no form of prayer is harmful, except for that which is not prayer but a work of Satan.

23. One man, intending to do evil, first prayed in his mind as was his custom, and, having been providentially prevented (from doing evil), afterward gave much thanks (for that)⁴⁷.

24. David, intending to kill Nabal of Carmel, was turned away from this intention by the memory of divine retribution and gave much thanks for it afterward. We also know what he did when he forgot God, and he did not cease (to be godless and unrepentant) until the prophet Nathan brought him back to remembrance of God.

25. As you remember God, increase your prayers so that the Lord may remember you when you forget Him.

26. As you read the Holy Scriptures, understand what is hidden within them (specifically for you): "For whatever was written in former times was written for our instruction" (Rom. 15: 4).

27. Scripture calls faith "the assurance of things hoped for" (Heb. 11:1) and describes those who do not know that Christ is in them as unskilled (2 Cor. 13:5).

28. Just as thoughts are revealed through deeds and words, so too are future rewards foreshadowed by the actions of the heart (what it is drawn to, what it finds pleasing).

29. A generous heart will clearly be shown generosity, and a merciful heart will likewise encounter mercy; but the opposite evokes the opposite and its consequence.

30. The law of freedom teaches all truth; many read it with their minds, but few understand it by living out the commandments accordingly.

31. Do not seek its perfection in human virtues, for there is nothing perfect in them: its perfection is hidden in the cross of Christ.

32. The Law of Liberty is read with true understanding, understood through the practice of the commandments, and fulfilled by the bounties of Christ.

33. When our conscience compels us to follow all of God's commandments, then we will understand that the Lord's law is blameless, and that although it is made possible by our own goodness (our natural moral and religious feelings and dispositions), it cannot be fully realized in people without God's grace.

34. Those who do not consider themselves bound by every commandment of Christ interpret God's law carnally, "not understanding either what they say or the things about which they make assertions" (1 Tim. 1:7), and therefore think they can fulfill it through their deeds.

35. One deed is clearly performed as good, yet the intention of the one performing it is not for good; another is in itself seemingly evil, yet the intention of the one performing it is for good. And it is not only deeds that are done this way, but some also speak in this manner: some present a deed in a different light out of inexperience or ignorance; others do so maliciously; and still others do so under the guise of piety.

36. One who conceals slander and defamation within expressions of praise—unrecognizable to the simple-minded—is similar to one who is vain while appearing humble. They manage for a long time to hide the truth within lies, but eventually, carried away by their true nature, they are exposed by their deeds.

37. It happens that one person, while seemingly doing something good for a neighbor, suffers harm in his soul, and it happens that another, precisely because he does not do such an outward service for his neighbor, receives benefit in his soul.

38. There is condemnation born of malice and vengeance, and there is another kind, born of the fear of God and the truth.

⁴⁷ This, of course, refers to some actual event, such as what is called "unexpected joy."

39. Do not rebuke one who has ceased to sin and is already repentant. But if, as you say, you wish to rebuke him for God's sake, first confess your own sins before him.
40. God reigns over every virtue, just as the sun reigns over the light of day.
41. Having performed a virtuous deed, remember the One who said, "Without Me you can do nothing" (John 15:5).
42. It is so arranged that sorrow is good for people, while vanity and pleasure are evil.
43. One who endures slander from others avoids sin and, in the midst of sorrow, finds intercession.
44. The believer in Christ, trusting in the reward commensurate with his faith, willingly endures every injustice.
45. He who prays for those who wrong him strikes down demons, but he who resists the former is wounded by the latter.
46. It is better to suffer unjust treatment from people than from demons, but the one who pleases the Lord has triumphed over both.
47. Every blessing comes providentially from the Lord, but it departs secretly from the ungrateful, the insensitive, and the idle.
48. Every sin ends in forbidden pleasure, and every virtue in spiritual consolation. And just as the former stirs up (sets in motion, provokes) its kindred spirits, so the latter stirs up its kindred spirits.
49. Human reproach causes sorrow to the heart, but it becomes a cause of purity for the one who endures it.
50. Ignorance provides an excuse and the freedom to oppose what is beneficial, and, having become bolder, multiplies the objections (or proposals) of evil.
51. Lacking nothing, accept the sorrows that come your way, and, as one who must give an account, set aside all self-importance.
52. Having sinned in secret, do not attempt (even before God) to conceal it—(do not think that what is hidden remains so)—for "every thing is naked and laid bare before the eyes of the Lord; to Him we must give an account" (Heb. 4:13).
53. Present yourself mentally to the Lord: "For man looks at the outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7).
54. Think and do nothing without a purpose in God, for he who travels aimlessly wastes his labor in vain.
55. It is difficult for one who sins without necessity to repent, for it is impossible to hide from God's truth.
56. A sorrowful event reminds the wise of God, but it grieves the one who forgets God in proportion to that forgetfulness.
57. Let every involuntary sorrow be your teacher in such remembrance, and may your impulse toward repentance never fail.
58. Forgetfulness in and of itself has no power, but it is sustained by our negligence and is proportional to it.
59. Do not say, "What am I to do? I do not even want it, yet it (forgetfulness) comes." This is because you neglected what was required of you when you remembered it.
60. Do the good deeds you remember, and then those you do not remember will also be revealed to you; do not recklessly surrender your thoughts to forgetfulness.
61. Scripture says: "Hell and destruction are evident before the Lord" (Prov. 15:11). This refers to ignorance and forgetfulness of the heart.
62. Hell is ignorance, for both are dark. Ruin, however, is forgetfulness, for in both, something of what once was is lost.
63. Be concerned with your own evil deeds, not those of your neighbor, and your mental sanctuary will not be plundered.
64. Negligence leaves no room for any good that is within one's power (it is not accepted for anything). Almsgiving and prayer restore those who have become negligent to their duty.
65. Sorrow for God is an integral part of piety, for true love is tested by adversity.
66. Do not think that you can acquire virtue without sorrow: such virtue is unreliable (untested) because of the peace (you experience while acquiring it).

67. Consider the outcome of every involuntary sorrow, and you will find in it the removal (purification) of sins.

68. Much advice from others is helpful, but for each person, nothing is more suitable than their own decision.

69. When seeking healing, take care of your conscience; do what it tells you, and you will benefit.

70. God and one's conscience know everyone's secret deeds, and through them may they find correction.

71. A person does as much as he can of his own free will, but God arranges the outcome of his deeds according to justice⁴⁸.

72. If you wish to accept praise from people without being condemned, first love the rebuke for your sins.

73. Whatever reproach anyone may suffer for the sake of Christ's truth, he may be glorified a hundredfold by the people. But it is far better to do every good deed for the sake of the future (reward).

74. When one person benefits another through words or deeds, both should acknowledge God's grace in this. The one who does not understand this will be overcome by the one who does⁴⁹.

75. One who praises a neighbor out of hypocrisy will later rebuke him, and he will be put to shame.

76. One who is unaware of the enemies' ambushes is easily hardened, and one who does not understand the causes of passions (their roots and triggers) easily falls.

77. From self-indulgence (acting for one's own pleasure) comes negligence, and from negligence comes forgetfulness. For God has granted everyone knowledge of what is beneficial to them.

78. A person offers (a word) to his neighbor to the extent of his knowledge, but God acts in the listener to the extent of his faith.

79. I have seen simple people who humbled themselves through their deeds, and they became wiser than the wise⁵⁰.

80. Another simple person, upon hearing them praised, did not imitate their humility but merely boasted of his simplicity, and from this he became proud.

81. He who belittles knowledge and boasts of his ignorance is an ignoramus not only in word but also in mind.

82. Just as there is wisdom in words and there is wisdom itself, so there is ignorance in words and there is ignorance itself.

83. Ignorance in speech does no harm whatsoever to the most devout, just as verbal wisdom does no harm to the humble and wise.

84. Do not say, "I do not know what is right, and therefore I am not at fault if I do not do it." For if you were to do the good that you know, then everything else would gradually be revealed to you, one thing being understood through another, just as members of the same family come to know one another (Proverbs 48). It is of no benefit to you to know the second (what you do not know) before fulfilling the first (what is known). For "the mind boasts" because of inactivity (a lack of deeds), "but love builds up, since it bears with all things" (1 Cor. 8:1, 13:7).

85. Read the words of Divine Scripture through deeds, and do not dwell excessively on words, puffing yourself up with mere mental concepts.

86. He who has abandoned deeds and is content with knowledge alone holds, instead of a double-edged sword, a reed staff, which, in battle, according to Scripture (Isa. 36:6), will wound his hand and, having pierced it, will pour the poison of pride into his enemies first.

87. Every thought has its own measure and weight before God. Thus, it is the same thing before Him to think with bias or in only one way (that is, only with the mind without deeds, or only with one's own mind without consulting those with experience).

88. Let the one who has fulfilled a commandment expect temptation because of it. For love for Christ is tested by adversities (cf. ch. 65).

⁴⁸ Chapter 71 in the Savv. manuscript, as published by Migne, reads as follows: He who labors aimlessly (without purpose or order) is poor in all things, but he who proceeds with hope is doubly rich.

⁴⁹ Perhaps the only thought is that, of the two, the one who understands this is the greater.

⁵⁰ Paul the Simple.

89. Do not despise (do not neglect) any thought out of carelessness. For no thought is hidden from God.

90. When you notice that a thought promises you human glory, know for certain that it is preparing a humiliation for you.

91. The enemy knows the demands of the spiritual law and seeks only to deceive the mind (through suggested thoughts, not deeds, in those who lead a spiritual life). In this way, he either succeeds in making his accomplice (when someone agrees to the suggestion) submit to the labors of repentance (if he acknowledges his guilt), or, if he does not repent (having failed to acknowledge his guilt), he burdens him with involuntary, painful afflictions (and hardships, which God usually sends upon such people for their instruction). It sometimes happens that he incites people to rebel against such promptings (sorrows, through grumbling, disobedience to God's decree, and ignorance that he has deserved them), so as to thereby multiply the painful afflictions even here (for God sends them again and again so that he may come to his senses) and, at the time of his departure, to expose him as unfaithful (to expose his unbelief in Providence and the fact that he himself was at fault).

92. Many have successfully resisted the misfortunes that occur (in life), but without prayer and repentance, no one will escape the fierce (extremes after death).

93. Evil draws its strength from one another, just as good grows (matures, strengthens) from one another. Both stir and guide their adherents to press forward further.

94. The devil makes small sins appear insignificant in our eyes, for otherwise he cannot lead us into greater sins.

95. The root of shameful lust is human praise, just as the root of chastity is the conviction of our sinfulness—not merely when we hear it, but also when we accept it upon ourselves.

96. There is no benefit to one who, having renounced the world, lives a life of self-indulgence (for his own pleasure, always doing only what pleases and is agreeable to his heart). For what he did before through his wealth, he does now as well, having nothing.

97. Again, the ascetic, if he acquires money, is a brother to the first in inner disposition, since he, too, is born of the same mother—the pursuit of what is sweet to the heart—only of a different father, due to a change in passion.

98. It sometimes happens that a person suppresses his passions for the sake of greater pleasure (because life is more peaceful without being enslaved by them), and others, unaware of his purpose, praise him; yet perhaps he himself realizes that his efforts are in vain.

99. The cause of all sin is vanity and the desire for pleasure. One who has not come to hate these will not overcome his passions.

100. The root of all evil is the love of money (1 Tim. 6:10), but it is evident that this love of money itself is formed for the sake of these passions (it is required by them, is established by them, and depends on them).

101. The mind is blinded by these three passions: the love of money, I say, vanity, and the desire for pleasure.

102. The three daughters of the leech, of whom Scripture speaks, are the “love of the beloved” born of the mother, folly (Prov. 30: 15).

103. Reason and faith—the companions of our nature—have been dulled by nothing other than these passions.

104. Rage, anger, quarrels, murders, and the entire rest of the catalog of evils have intensified greatly among people because of them.

105. Thus, we must hate the love of money, vanity, and the passion for pleasure as the mothers of vices and the stepmothers of virtues.

106. Because of them, we have received the commandment not to love the world or the things in the world—not (in that sense) so that we might recklessly hate God's creations, but so that we might cut off the causes of those passions.

107. “No one,” says Scripture, “who is a soldier gets entangled in the affairs of this life” (2 Tim. 2:4). For whoever, having become entangled in them, wishes to conquer the passions is like a man who tries to extinguish a fire with straw.

- 108. Whoever becomes angry with his neighbor because of money, glory, or pleasures has not yet realized that God rules over all with righteousness.
- 109. When you hear the Lord's words: "If anyone does not renounce all his possessions, he is not worthy of Me" (Luke 14:33, Matt. 10:38), understand that this refers not only to possessions but also to all the inner sources of evil.
- 110. One who does not know the truth cannot truly believe. For knowledge, by its very nature, precedes faith.
- 111. Just as God has assigned to each of the visible creatures that which is proper to it, so too will He reward human thoughts according to their nature, whether we want it or not.
- 112. If anyone, sinning openly and without repentance, has not suffered any afflictions until the very end, know that his judgment will be without mercy.
- 113. The one who prays with a pure heart endures the afflictions he faces, but the one who holds a grudge has not yet prayed with a pure heart.
- 114. When suffering harm, insult, or persecution from someone, do not think of the present, but of what lies ahead in the future, and you will find that he has become the source of many blessings for you, not only in the present but also in the age to come.
- 115. Just as bitter wormwood is beneficial to those with indigestion, so too is it beneficial for the wicked to endure bitter trials: for these remedies serve to restore health to the former and to bring about repentance in the latter.
- 116. If you do not wish to suffer evil, do not wish to do evil either; for the latter is inevitably followed by the former. "For whatever a man sows, that he will also reap" (Gal. 6:7).
- 117. Since we sow evil of our own free will and reap it against our will, we must marvel at God's justice.
- 118. There is bound to be a certain interval of time between sowing and reaping. But for this reason, we must not doubt that there will be a reward.
- 119. When we sin, do not blame the body but the mind; for if the mind had not led the way, the body would not have followed.
- 120. A secret villain is more malicious than those who wrong others openly; therefore, he is more wicked and is punished.
- 121. He who weaves intrigues and secretly does evil is a serpent, according to Scripture, "sitting in ambush on the path and biting the horse's heel" (Gen. 49:17).
- 122. Whoever praises a neighbor for one thing and rebukes him for another at the same time is possessed by vanity and envy: with praise, he attempts to conceal his envy, and with rebuke, he sets himself up as better than his neighbor.
- 123. Just as it is impossible to shepherd sheep and wolves together, so it is impossible for one who acts deceitfully toward his neighbor to receive mercy.
- 124. Whoever secretly mixes his own will with the commandment is an adulterer, as shown in Wisdom, and "because of his lack of understanding, he will suffer sickness and disgrace" (Prov. 6:32–33).
- 125. Just as water and fire do not mix because they are opposites, so self-justification and humility are opposed to one another.
- 126. He who seeks the forgiveness of sins loves humility, but he who condemns another seals (fixes upon himself) his own evil deeds.
- 127. Do not leave any sin unatoned for, no matter how small, lest it later lead you to greater sins.
- 128. If you want to be saved, love the true word (the word of truth about yourself) and never recklessly reject rebuke.
- 129. The word of truth transformed the offspring of the viper and showed them how to avoid future wrath (Matt. 3:7).
- 130. Whoever receives the words of truth receives God the Word, for it is said, "Whoever receives you receives Me" (Matt. 10:40).
- 131. The paralytic, lowered through the roof, is a sinner, rebuked by the faithful in the name of God and, for the sake of their faith, receiving forgiveness (of sins) (Luke 5:19).
- 132. It is better to pray for one's neighbor with reverence and goodwill than to condemn him for every sin.

133. The truly repentant is subjected to ridicule by the unwise. But this is a sign to him that his repentance is pleasing to God.

134. Strive to abstain from everything (1 Cor. 9:25) and do not cease (from this struggle) until the Lord has destroyed the seed of Babylon.

135. Imagine that there are twelve passions of immorality. If you willingly embrace even one of them, it will take the place of the remaining eleven.

136. Sin is a burning fire. To the extent that you remove fuel, it will die down; and to the extent that you add fuel, it will blaze all the more.

137. If you are puffed up with praise, expect dishonor, for, as Scripture says, “Whoever exalts himself will be humbled” (Matt. 23:12).

138. Only when we have rejected every sin—even those committed in thought—will we begin the true battle against the recollections of the passions that preoccupy us.

139. A remembrance is an involuntary recollection of past sins. Whoever is still struggling (with the passions) strives to prevent (such a thought) from developing into a passion, but whoever has already conquered them cuts off its very first stirrings.

140. A stir of the heart is an involuntary movement of the heart, unaccompanied by images⁵¹. It is like a key (that opens the door to the heart for sin); therefore, the experienced strive to seize it at the very beginning.

141. Where images of thoughts take root, there (presumably) was a predisposition: for that movement, which is an innocent (involuntary) impulse, is not accompanied by images. It happens that one flees from them like a burning ember from the fire (either having been burned or fearing to be burned), while another does not turn away from them until the flame ignites⁵².

142. Do not say, “I do not even want it, yet it (the thought) comes.” For, certainly, if not this very thing, then you surely love the causes of it.

143. The one who seeks praise is in the grip of passion, and the one who laments the sorrow that has befallen him certainly loves consolation.

144. Like pans on a scale, the mind of one who loves pleasure cannot rest on one side. At times he weeps and laments his sins; at other times he struggles and argues with his neighbor, chasing after pleasures.

145. He who tests all things and holds fast to what is good will, by that very fact, certainly keep himself from every kind of evil (1 Thess. 5:21–22).

146. A patient man is rich in understanding (Prov. 14:29), just as is one who inclines his ear to words of wisdom.

147. Without remembrance of God, knowledge cannot be true. Without the former, the latter is false.

148. For the hard-hearted, the word of the most subtle knowledge is of no use, for without fear (such a person) does not take upon himself the labors of repentance.

149. For the meek, the word of faith (concerning the consolations of faith) is fitting, since he does not test God’s long-suffering and is not struck down by frequent transgressions (against God’s will or commandments).

150. Do not rebuke a strong-willed man for his pride, but rather point out to him the burden of future disgrace, for in this way a wise man will more readily accept rebuke (within himself).

151. Whoever does not love rebuke surely wallows in passions on purpose, but whoever loves it clearly shuns their temptations.

152. Do not desire to hear about the deceitfulness of others, for in doing so, the traits of that deceitfulness are inscribed within us as well.

153. After hearing evil words, be angry at yourself, not at the one who spoke them; for the wicked have a deceitful ear, and the one who responds is also deceitful⁵³.

154. If by chance someone finds themselves among idle talkers, let them consider themselves guilty of such talk—if not regarding the present, then regarding the past (because they themselves once chatted with them).

⁵¹ A paraphrase, due to the conciseness of the Greek phrase.

⁵² This resembles the elder’s answer to the question: Should one allow thoughts to enter? “Let them in,” he said, “and then fight them and drive them out.”

⁵³ True, this is a proverb, but the idea is clear. The Latin paraphrase: pravarum enim rerum aviditor, pravus evadit nuntius. The listener of evil things is himself evil, and so is the messenger.

155. If you see someone hypocritically praising you, expect him to rebuke you at another time.
156. Consider present hardships as equivalent to future blessings, and apathy will never weaken your resolve.
157. If you praise a person as good for a material gift, apart from God (forgetting that this is done by God's Providence), then later that same person will turn out to be evil to you.
158. Every blessing comes from the Lord according to His will, and those who bring it to us are the servants of blessings.
159. Accept the intertwining of good and evil with an even mind; for this, God will ultimately avert the anomalies of events in your life.
160. The inequality of (involuntary) thoughts involuntarily brings about changes in one's own thoughts as well. And in the external realm, God balances the involuntary with the voluntary.
161. The sensory (external state) is a product of the intellectual (internal order), bringing, by God's decree, what is due (according to one's worth).
162. When the heart is full of desire for pleasure, then harmful thoughts and words arise. Just as we recognize the burning of matter (within) by its smoke.
163. Remain in your heart with your mind, and you will not be troubled by temptations; but if you stray from there, endure whatever befalls you.
164. Pray that temptation may not come upon you, but when it does, accept it as your own, not as something foreign.
165. Turn your mind away from all self-love, and then you will be able to see the devil's schemes.
166. Whoever claims to see all the devil's schemes without knowing how does so to present himself as perfect.
167. When the mind is freed from concern for the body, it sees the wiles of the enemy in proportion to that freedom.
168. One who is carried away by thoughts is blinded by them and sees the acts of sin, but cannot see their causes.
169. It happens that a person, while outwardly fulfilling a commandment, is (inwardly) enslaved to passion and ruins a good deed with evil thoughts.
170. Having allowed the seed of sin to take root within you (by accepting a thought), do not say, "It will not overcome me"—for to the extent that you have allowed it in, you have already been overcome by it.
171. Everything that is born begins small and, being nourished little by little, grows.
172. The snare of sin is a multi-layered net. Whoever becomes even partially entangled in it and fails to take heed will soon be completely ensnared by it.
173. Do not desire to hear of the misfortune of your enemies, for whoever willingly listens to such talk reaps (immediately) the fruits of his own will.
174. Do not think that every affliction befalls people because of their sins. For it happens that some please God, yet still suffer trials. And it is written not only that "the wicked and the lawless will be driven out" (Ps. 36:28), but likewise that "those who desire to live godly lives in Christ Jesus will be persecuted" (2 Tim. 3:12).
175. In times of sorrow, beware of the allurements of sensual pleasure. For since it promises comfort in sorrow, it is easy to be tempted to accept it.
176. Some call those prudent who know how to manage their sensual desires wisely, but the truly prudent are those who master their own desires.
177. Before you have eradicated the evil (passions), do not listen to your heart, for whatever is planted within it, such are the inclinations it demands.
178. Just as some snakes are found in the woods while others lurk secretly in houses, so too are passions: some are merely imagined (formed in thought), while others actively influence (enter into actions and hide within them), though it happens that they transform from one form to another.
179. When you see that what lies within you has been stirred into intense motion and draws your silent mind toward passion, know that at some earlier time the mind itself was occupied with it, set it in motion, and implanted it in the heart.
180. A cloud does not form without the breath of the wind, nor is passion born without the (movement of) thoughts.

181. If, according to Scripture, we no longer act by the will of the flesh, then, with the Lord's help, even what was previously implanted within us (passions of the soul and evil habits) will easily cease to trouble us.

182. The images that have taken root in the mind are more evil and more powerful than those that are purely mental, but the latter precede them and are their cause.

183. There is evil that, proceeding from the heart, takes hold of us because of long-standing attachment and the heart's alignment with it, and there is evil that battles in our thoughts because of daily occurrences.

184. God judges deeds according to their intentions. "May the Lord grant you," He says, "according to your heart" (Ps. 19:5),

185. Whoever does not remain conscientiously in contemplation will not accept even physical labor for the sake of piety.

186. Conscience is a natural book (of God's commandments): whoever reads it diligently receives experiences of divine intercession.

187. Whoever does not willingly undertake labors for the truth (in its defense) will be punished much more severely through involuntary circumstances.

188. Whoever, having come to know God's will, fulfills it to the best of their ability, will avoid great hardships through small ones.

189. Whoever seeks to overcome temptations without prayer and patience will not repel them but will become even more entangled in them.

190. The Lord is hidden in His commandments and is found by those who seek Him in proportion to their fulfillment of them.

191. Do not say, "I have kept the commandments, and yet I have not found the Lord." All who seek Him in truth will find peace.

192. Peace is deliverance from the passions, which cannot be attained without the influence of the Holy Spirit.

193. The fulfillment of a commandment is one thing, and virtue is another, though each draws its motivation for good from the other.

194. Keeping the commandments means performing the acts commanded, while virtue is that state of heart through which what is done is truly pleasing to God.

195. Just as material wealth, though one in essence, is manifold in terms of the objects of acquisition, so too is virtue one in essence but manifests itself in manifold deeds.

196. Whoever, having no deeds, pontificates and speaks words (discourses on how to live) is rich in unrighteousness, and "his labors," according to Scripture, "enter into the houses of strangers" (Prov. 5:10).

197. "Everything is subject to gold," says Scripture (Ecclesiastes 10:19). But by God's grace, the life of the mind (the spiritual life) will be governed.

198. A good conscience is acquired through prayer, and pure prayer through a good conscience. By their very nature, they are mutually dependent.

199. Jacob made Joseph a multicolored tunic. And the Lord grants the meek the knowledge of the truth, as it is written: "The Lord will instruct the meek in His ways" (Ps. 24: 9).

200. Always do good to the best of your ability, and when an opportunity arises to do more, do not settle for less, for "whoever turns back," says the Lord, "has no part in the Kingdom of God" (Luke 9:62).

4. To Those Who Think They Can Be Justified by Their Works, 226 chapters⁵⁴

1. In the following chapters, the weakness of faith in those who merely live righteously outwardly is exposed by those who truly believe and know the truth faithfully.

2. The Lord, wishing to show that while every commandment is binding, adoption as sons is nevertheless granted to people through His blood, says: "When you have done all that is commanded you, say, 'We are unworthy servants; for we have done what we were bound to do'" (Luke 17:10). Therefore, the kingdom of heaven is not a reward for deeds, but the grace of the Lord, prepared for His faithful servants.

3. A servant does not demand freedom as a reward, but serves willingly, as one who is in debt, and awaits it as a gift of grace.

⁵⁴ Opposed to this is not faith, but the disposition of the heart, which serves as the source of actions.

4. “Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:3), and He grants freedom to those who serve Him faithfully. For He says: “Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a few things, I will set you over many things; enter into the joy of your Lord” (Matt. 25:23).

5. He is not yet a faithful servant who relies solely on mere knowledge, but he who believes through obedience to Christ, who gave the commandments.

6. He who honors the Lord does what is commanded, and if he sins in any way or disobeys Him, he accepts as his due whatever punishment he receives for it.

7. Be both inquisitive and diligent, for mere knowledge puffs a person up.

8. Temptations that befall us unexpectedly, by God’s providence, teach us to be diligent and unwittingly lead us to repentance.

9. The afflictions that befall people are the result of their own evil deeds. But if we endure them with prayer, we will once again receive an increase in blessings.

10. Some, having been praised for their virtue, took pleasure in it and thought that this sweetness of vanity was a comfort (from above). Others, having been convicted of sin, were pained, and they regarded this beneficial pain as the work of the enemy.

11. Those who, because of their deeds, exalt themselves above those who are not quite as zealous, rightly think they can justify themselves by their outward deeds; but we, who, relying solely on mere knowledge, look down on the uninformed, are far more foolish than they are.

12. Knowledge without corresponding deeds is not yet firm, even if it is true. Deeds serve as confirmation of everything.

13. Often, knowledge (regarding a matter) is obscured by neglect of the deed itself. For those deeds that are completely neglected will gradually fade from memory.

14. Scripture inspires us to know God through reason so that we may rightly serve Him through our deeds.

15. When we fulfill the commandments openly, although we receive something special from the Lord in return, we derive benefit according to the purpose of our will.

16. One who desires to do something but is unable to do so is, as it were, considered by God, the Knower of Hearts, to have done it. This must be understood both in relation to good and in relation to evil.

17. The mind, even without the body, does much good and much evil, while the body, without the mind, cannot do either. For the decisions of free will precede action.

18. Some, while failing to keep the commandments, think they believe rightly; others, while keeping them, expect the kingdom as a just reward. Both groups err against the truth.

19. A master is not obligated to reward his servants, but then again, those who do not serve rightly do not receive freedom.

20. If Christ died for us, and we “no longer live for ourselves but for Him who died for us and was raised” (2 Cor. 5:15), then it is clear that we have committed ourselves to serving Him until death. How, then, can we consider adoption as the due reward?

21. Christ is Lord by nature and Lord by the economy of salvation, for He created us—the living—and redeemed those who had died in sin with His blood, and granted grace to those who believe in this way.

22. When you hear the words of Scripture that the Lord will repay each person according to his deeds (Ps. 61:13), do not think that deeds (in and of themselves) are worthy of Gehenna or the Kingdom, but that Christ will reward each person according to their deeds of unbelief in Him or faith, as God our Creator and Redeemer, and not as the One who weighs things (i.e., deeds and rewards).

23. We, having been deemed worthy of the bath of rebirth, perform good deeds not for the sake of reward, but to preserve the purity given to us.

24. Every good deed that we perform by our own natural powers, though it removes us from its opposite (the evil deed), cannot bring about our sanctification without grace.

25. The temperate person abstains from gluttony, the non-covetous from greed, the silent one from loquacity, the pure one from attachment to sensual pleasures, the chaste one from fornication, the content one from avarice, the meek one from agitation (anger), the humble from vanity, the obedient from defiance, the self-reproaching from hypocrisy; likewise, the one who prays turns away from despair, the voluntary beggar from the accumulation of wealth, the confessor from apostasy, and the martyr from idolatry. Do you see how every virtue, even one practiced unto death, is nothing other than a turning away from sin, and this turning away from sin is a matter of nature, not something for which the kingdom may be rewarded?

26. Man barely preserves what is natural to him, but Christ grants adoption as sons through the cross.

27. There is a specific commandment and there is a general (all-encompassing) commandment. For in one instance, one is commanded to give to the needy in portions, while in another, one is commanded to renounce (at once) all one's possessions.

28. There is the work of grace, unrecognizable to a child (in spiritual age), and there is the work of malice (the enemy), which resembles the truth. It is good not to dwell too much on such actions⁵⁵, lest one be deceived, and not to condemn them, lest there be truth in them, but to bring everything to God with hope, for He knows the benefit of both.

29. He who wishes to cross the sea of the mind must be patient, humble and wise, vigilant, and self-restrained. But if he forces himself to embark on this endeavor without these four qualities, he will only torment his heart and will not be able to cross over.

30. Silence is the cutting off of all evil. If, moreover, it is combined with those four virtues in prayer, there is no better aid or shorter path to dispassion than this (arrangement).

31. One cannot achieve silence of the mind without the body, nor can one purify the space between them without silence and prayer.

32. The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh (Gal. 6:17), but those who walk by the Spirit do not fulfill the desires of the flesh.

33. Prayer is not perfect without a mental invocation. The Lord hears the mind that cries out with undivided attention.

34. A mind that prays with undivided attention breaks the heart. "A broken and contrite heart, O God, You will not despise" (Ps. 50:19).

35. And prayer is called a virtue, though it is the mother of virtues, for it gives birth to them through union with Christ.

36. Whatever we do without prayer and good hope will ultimately prove harmful and (at the very least) imperfect.

37. When you hear that "the last will be first, and the first will be last" (Matt. 19:30), understand this to refer to those who possess virtue and those who possess love. For although love is last in order among the virtues, in worth it is first among them all, leaving behind all those that came before it.

38. When despondency takes hold—whether during prayer or because of the enemy's manifold attacks—recall the Exodus and the fierce sufferings. It is better, however, to cling to God through prayer and hope than to dwell on external matters, even if they are beneficial.

39. No single virtue by itself opens the door of our nature (cf. Chapters 224 and 225), unless they all depend on one another in sequence.

40. He who feeds on thoughts is intemperate, for even if they are useful, they cannot be more useful than hope.

41. Every sin leads to death unless it is cleansed by repentance. Even if a saint prays for another on account of such a sin, the prayer will not be heard.

42. One who repents properly does not defend his labor against past sins, but appeases God through them.

43. We ought to have done every good deed that our nature is capable of doing every day. What, then, shall we give to God in return for the evil we have done in the past?

44. No matter how much we increase our virtues today, this is merely a condemnation of our former negligence, not a recompense (to God for it).

45. One who is contrite in spirit (who grieves over sins) but at ease in the flesh (who satisfies the body in every way) is like one who torments himself physically (who denies the body everything) but whose mind is scattered.

46. Voluntary affliction on both sides (that is, of the body and of the soul) mutually reinforces one another: the soul's affliction reinforces the body's, and the body's affliction reinforces the soul's; but their separation is worse and more burdensome (than their afflictions).

⁵⁵ A Greek saying captures the idea: how people gaze at their own finery in the mirror.

47. It is a great virtue to endure what befalls us and, according to the Lord's word, to love the neighbor who hates us.
48. The sign of sincere love is the forgiveness of offenses. Thus did the Lord love the world.
49. It is impossible to forgive someone's transgressions from the heart without true knowledge, for it reveals to everyone that what befalls them is their own doing.
50. You will lose nothing of what you have set aside for the Lord, for in due time it will return to you many times over (multiplied).
51. When the mind forgets the goal of piety, then the outward act of virtue becomes useless.
52. If bad counsel (not that of others, but one's own lack of prudence) is harmful to every person, it is all the more so for those who have embraced a life of austerity.
53. Prove yourself a wise man through your deeds, for no word is wiser than a deed.
54. Ascetic labors for piety will be followed by intercession. This can be known from God's law and from conscience.
55. One person accepted a thought and held onto it without examining it, while another, having accepted it, tested it against the truth. The question is, which of them acted more piously?
56. To endure suffering and not blame others for one's misfortunes is true wisdom.
57. One who does good and seeks reward does not serve God, but his own will.
58. One who has sinned cannot escape retribution except through repentance commensurate with the sin.
59. Some say that we cannot do good until we have effectively received the grace of the Holy Spirit (and this is false).
60. Those whose will is always inclined toward self-indulgence refuse to do even what is within their power, under the pretext that there is no help from above.
61. Those baptized into Christ have already been mysteriously granted grace, but it takes effect (tangibly) as we keep the commandments. Although this grace never ceases to help us secretly, it is up to us to do or not do good according to our own will.
62. First, it divinely stirs the conscience, and it is through this that even evildoers, having repented, have found favor with God.
63. Again, it is often hidden in the instruction of a neighbor; sometimes it follows a thought while reading and instructs the mind in the truth through a natural consequence (of that thought). Therefore, if we do not hide this gift in such and similar specific instances when it is given (that is, if we follow what grace inspires), then we will truly enter into the joy of the Lord (we will be granted active grace).
64. One who seeks (hopes to receive) the active grace of the Holy Spirit before keeping the commandments is like a slave bought with money who, the moment he has just been purchased, seeks to have his freedom signed for him along with the payment for him.
65. Whoever has come to understand that external misfortunes occur according to God's justice, having sought the Lord, has found knowledge along with righteousness.
66. If, in accordance with Scripture, you "keep in mind that the Lord's ways are throughout the earth" (Ps. 104:7), then every event will be a teacher of the knowledge of God for you.
67. Everyone receives what is due (what they have earned) according to their inner disposition, but only God knows the details of how external circumstances correspond to each person's inner state.
68. When you suffer any dishonor from people, quickly bring to mind the reward of "the glory that comes from God" (John 5:44), and in this way you will remain free from sorrow and confusion even in dishonor, and faithful and blameless in glory when it comes.
69. When you are praised by the people, by God's grace, do not intentionally add anything ostentatious to the Lord's judgment, lest everything change and you experience the opposite (shame).
70. A seed will not sprout without soil and water, and a person will not benefit without voluntary effort and divine intercession.
71. Rain cannot fall without a cloud, nor can one please God without a clear conscience.
72. Do not refuse to learn, even if you are very wise. For God's order is more beneficial than our wisdom.
73. When, driven by some form of self-indulgence, the heart strays from the path of self-discipline, it becomes unstoppable, like a very heavy stone that has begun to roll down a slippery slope.

74. Just as an inexperienced calf, running from blade of grass to blade of grass, stumbles upon a place where the slope is steep on both sides (to the right and to the left), so it is with the soul, which is gradually led astray by thoughts (from its proper order and focus).

75. When the mind, having been strengthened in the Lord, diverts the soul from a long-standing bad habit, then the heart is, as if by executioners, put to death by the mind and passion, which drag it this way and that.

76. Just as those sailing the sea in hope of a profit willingly endure the scorching heat of the sun, so those who hate evil love rebuke. The former struggle against the winds, and the latter against their passions.

77. Just as "fleeing into winter or on the Sabbath" (Matt. 24:20) causes illness to the body and defilement (literally, humiliation) to the soul, so too does the uprising of the passions in a decaying body and a sanctified soul (in the person of the priesthood).

78. No one is as good and merciful as the Lord, but He does not forgive the sins of those who do not repent.

79. There are many of us who grieve over our sins, yet willingly cherish their causes within ourselves.

80. The mole, burrowing beneath the earth and being blind, cannot see the stars; and the unbeliever (in God) regarding the temporal cannot believe in the eternal either.

81. As a grace before all other graces, God has granted people the knowledge of the truth, which first and foremost teaches its recipients to believe in the One who bestowed it.

82. When a sinful soul does not accept the afflictions it encounters (does not learn from them), then the angels say of it: "We have tried to heal Babylon, but she is not healed" (Jer. 51:9).

83. The mind that forgets true knowledge wages war against people, regarding what is harmful to itself as beneficial.

84. Just as fire cannot burn in water, so too can no evil thought take root in a God-loving heart. For every God-loving person is diligent, and voluntary labor is by its very nature the enemy of lust.

85. A passion, willingly nurtured in the soul through action, later rises up violently within its lover, even if he does not wish it to.

86. We love the causes of involuntary thoughts—that is, the things from which they arise—but we obviously love the very objects of voluntary thoughts.

87. Conceit and boasting are the causes of slander, while greed and vanity are the causes of unmercifulness and hypocrisy.

88. When the devil sees that the mind has begun to pray from the heart, he then brings about great and cunning temptations. But he will not hinder small virtues with major attacks.

89. A stubborn thought reveals a person's bias, while its swift eradication signifies struggle and resistance.

90. There are three states of mind into which the mind enters, changing within itself: the natural, the supernatural, and the unnatural. When it enters its natural state, it finds itself to be the source of evil thoughts and the cause of passions, and confesses its sins to God; but when it is in the unnatural state, it forgets God's truth and wages war against people as if they were wronging it unjustly. And when he is exalted to a supernatural state, he finds within himself the fruits of the Holy Spirit, which the Apostle described—"love, joy, peace," and so on (Gal. 5: 22), and knows that if he gives preference to carnal concerns, he cannot remain there; and having departed from there, he falls into sin and the sorrowful misfortunes that follow it—though not immediately, but in due time, as God's truth decrees.

91. A person's knowledge is true to the extent that it is confirmed by their gentleness, humility, and love.

92. Everyone who has been baptized in the Orthodox faith will mysteriously receive all grace, but will ultimately receive tangible confirmation of this as they fulfill the commandments.

93. Christ's commandment, when faithfully observed, grants comfort amid the many afflictions of the heart; however, both come in due time.

94. Let prayer be an integral part of everything you do, for you can do nothing without God's help.

95. There is nothing more powerful than prayer for obtaining God's assistance, and nothing more useful than prayer for pleasing God.

96. The fulfillment of all the commandments lies in prayer: for there is nothing higher than love for God.

97. Unceasing prayer is a sign of love for God in the one who abides in it, whereas neglect of it and distraction (during it) are signs of worldly love (the captivity of the heart by anything other than God).

98. Whoever performs vigils without sorrow, endures patiently, and prays shares in the power of the Holy Spirit; but even the one who, though feeling sorrow during these acts, willingly endures them by an act of the will will soon receive intercession from above.

99. Just as one commandment, as has been said, is higher than another, so too is one faith firmer than another.

100. There is faith that comes from hearing (Rom. 10:17), according to the Apostle, and “there is faith that comes from the message of the things hoped for” (Heb. 11:1).

101. It is good to respond to those who ask with words, but it is better to assist them through prayer and virtue; for through these, the one who offers himself to God helps his neighbors, while himself becoming worthy of help.

102. If you wish to offer a brief word to the inquisitive, point them toward prayer, true faith, and patience in all sorrowful circumstances, for every other good is attained through these.

103. In whatever matter a person has placed all his hope in God, he will no longer quarrel with his neighbors over that matter.

104. If, according to Scripture, everything involuntary has its cause in the voluntary, then no one is as much an enemy to a person as he is to himself.

105. The leader of all evils is ignorance; second only to it is unbelief.

106. Flee from temptation through patience and prayer. But if you resist it by means other than these, it will attack you with greater force.

107. The meek are the wisest of the wise in the eyes of God, and the humble of heart are the strongest of the strong, for they bear the yoke of Christ wisely.

108. Whatever we say or do without prayer subsequently turns out to be either sinful or harmful, and without our knowledge, our deeds expose us.

109. In deeds, words, and thoughts, only One is righteous, but through faith, grace, and repentance, there are many righteous people.

110. Just as it is not characteristic of one who repents to be haughty, so it is impossible for one who sins willfully to be humble.

111. Humility is not a condemnation of conscience, but a confession of God’s grace and His benevolence.

112. Just as a physical house is to the air that fills it, so is the mind to divine grace: to the extent that you cast out material things, so much will enter; and to the extent that you bring them in, so much will depart.

113. The material things of a house are vessels and food; the material things of the mind are vanity and self-indulgence.

114. A generous heart is one that trusts in God, while a narrow heart is one preoccupied with worldly concerns.

115. The grace of the Spirit is one and unchanging, but it works in each person as it wills.

116. Just as rain, pouring down upon the earth, nourishes and sustains the inherent qualities of plants—sweetness in the sweet ones, tartness in the tart ones—so too does grace, dwelling in the hearts of believers, adapt its effects to their virtues, without changing in itself.

117. To those who hunger for Christ’s sake, it becomes food; to those who thirst, a sweet drink; to those who shiver, clothing; to those who labor, rest; to those who pray, the assurance that their prayer has been heard; and to those who weep, comfort.

118. Therefore, when you hear the words of Scripture about the Holy Spirit—that He “rested upon each of the Apostles” (Acts 2:3), or that He “descended upon the Prophet” (1 Sam. 10:10), or that He acts (1 Cor. 12:11), we are sometimes offended (Eph. 4:30), quenched (1 Thess. 5:19), or provoked (Acts 17:16), and likewise that some have the firstfruits of the Spirit (Rom. 8:23), while others are filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts 2: 4)—do not think of the Spirit as though there were any division, alteration, or change within Him, but believe, as we have said before, that He is unchanging, immutable, and almighty. Therefore, in His workings, He remains one and the same, and He grants to each person what is fitting in a godly manner. He is like the sun, which has poured itself out entirely upon the baptized; yet each of us is enlightened to the extent that, having come to hate the passions that darken us, we root them out within ourselves; and to the extent that we are found to love them, we are darkened.

119. Whoever hates the passions cuts off their causes as well; but whoever is inclined toward these causes is, even unwillingly, overcome by the passions.

120. When evil thoughts arise within you, let us blame ourselves for them, and not original sin.

121. The roots of these thoughts are the obvious sins that each of us commits with our hands, feet, and mouths.

122. It is impossible for one who hates the causes of a passion to converse with that passion in his mind.

123. Who would converse with vanity if he despises disgrace? Who would be ashamed of dishonor if he loves humiliation? Who would consent to the indulgence of the flesh if he has a contrite and humble heart? Who would concern themselves with the transitory or wage war over it if they believe in Christ?

124. One who is rejected by another, yet does not enter into a dispute with the rejecter—neither in word nor in thought—has attained true knowledge and demonstrates steadfast faith in the Lord.

125. “The sons of men are deceitful in their measures; they are not truthful” (Ps. 61:10), whereas God preserves for each person what he truly deserves.

126. If there is neither excess for the one who wrongs (in wronging) nor deprivation for the one who is wronged (in enduring), “for man walks about in a circle, yet he is in vain agitated” (Ps. 38: 7).

127. If you see that someone is deeply distressed over insults, know that he is filled with thoughts of vanity and is now reaping, with displeasure, the fruits of the seeds he himself sowed in his heart.

128. Whoever has indulged in bodily pleasures beyond what is proper will pay for this excess with a hundredfold of suffering.

129. A spiritual father is obligated to speak the truth to his disciple; and when the disciple does not listen, he must warn him of the misfortunes that will befall him as a result.

130. Whoever is wronged by another and does not seek due retribution from the wrongdoer thereby demonstrates faith in Christ and will receive a hundredfold in this life, and will inherit eternal life.

131. The remembrance of God is accompanied by a heart that yearns for piety; but whoever forgets God becomes self-indulgent and insensitive.

132. Do not say that the dispassionate cannot grieve, for if not for himself, then he must do so for his neighbor.

133. When the enemy has gathered many records of sins committed in forgetfulness, he then compels the debtor to commit the same sins without forgetfulness, blasphemously abusing the law of sin.

134. If you wish to remember God unceasingly, do not reject misfortunes as though they were unjust, but endure them as if they were justly befalling you. For patience (in this spirit) awakens the memory (of God) at every turn, while refusal (to endure in this way) diminishes the heart’s spiritual contemplation (cutting off its striving toward God and turning it toward the earth) and, through the joy (of having cast off the burden), brings about forgetfulness.

135. If you want the Lord to cover your sins, do not boast before others if you possess any virtue. For just as we treat our virtues, so does God treat our sins.

136. Having concealed a virtue, do not become proud in your mind, as if you had done something good. Righteousness requires not only concealing what is good, but also not thinking about anything that is forbidden.

137. Do not rejoice when you do good to someone, but rather when you endure the resistance that follows (from the one you have helped) without holding a grudge. For just as nights follow days, so does evil follow good.

138. Vanity, greed, and self-indulgence will not leave good deeds untainted unless they themselves first fall away out of fear of God.

139. In involuntary, painful afflictions, God’s mercy is hidden, which draws those who endure them to repentance and delivers them from eternal torment.

140. Some, in keeping the commandments, expect that this will serve as a counterweight to their sins on the scales (of God’s justice), while others think by doing so they can appease the One who died for our sins. The question is: Which of these views is correct?

- 141. The fear of Gehenna and the love of the Kingdom give us patience in tribulations. And this does not come from ourselves, but from the One who guides our thoughts.
- 142. The believer in the future turns away from earthly pleasures without hesitation (or without argument), while the unbeliever is self-indulgent and insensitive.
- 143. Do not say that a poor person cannot indulge in pleasures without the means to do so, for one can indulge in sensual pleasures even more intensely in one's thoughts (than in action).
- 144. Knowledge of deeds (practical wisdom) is one thing, and knowledge of the truth is another. Just as the sun is superior to the moon, so the latter is more beneficial than the former.
- 145. Knowledge of deeds (active prudence) increases as one fulfills the commandments, while knowledge of the truth increases as one places one's hope in Christ.
- 146. If you wish to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth, strive always to rise above the sensory realm and, through hope, cling to the One God. By turning inward in this way with self-compulsion, you will encounter the principalities and powers that wage war against you through the delusions of your thoughts; but by overcoming them through prayer and remaining steadfast in hope, you will receive God's grace, which delivers you from the wrath to come.
- 147. Whoever understands the mysterious words of Saint Paul, who said that "our struggle is against the spiritual forces of evil" (Eph. 6:12), will also understand the Lord's parable, in which He taught that we must always pray and not lose heart (Luke 18:1).
- 148. The Law figuratively commands us to work for six days and to rest from our labors on the seventh. The work of the soul consists in doing good with one's possessions—that is, through deeds—while its rest, or peace, lies in selling all one's possessions and giving to the poor, as the Lord said, and, having found peace through such detachment from worldly goods, rejoicing in spiritual hope. It is into this very rest that St. Paul encourages us to enter with diligence, saying, "Let us strive to enter that rest" (Heb. 4:11).
- 149. We have said this without precluding the future or determining that all reward will be here, but (we merely imply) that one must first receive the true grace of the Holy Spirit in one's heart and then, in accordance with this, enter the Kingdom of Heaven. Revealing this, the Lord also said: "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you" (Luke 17:21). The Apostle said the same thing: "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for" (Heb. 11:1), and also: "Examine yourselves to see whether you are in the faith. Or do you not know that Jesus Christ lives in you—unless, of course, you fail the test?" (2 Cor. 13:5).
- 150. One who has come to know the truth does not resist sorrowful trials. For he knows that they lead a person to the fear of God.
- 151. Past sins, when recalled in detail, harm the person of good faith. For if they arise anew in the soul, accompanied by sorrow, they drive one away from hope; and if they are imagined without sorrow, they once again instill within the soul the defilement of the past.
- 152. When the mind, through self-denial, embraces unshakable hope, then the enemy, under the pretext of confession, paints a picture before him of past sins, so as to rekindle the passions—which, by God's grace, had already been forgotten—and secretly harm the person. For in such a case, even a mind that has already been enlightened and hates the passions is necessarily darkened, troubled by what has been done; and if it is still veiled as by a mist and sympathetic to the passions, it will stray in every way (into such thoughts) and begin to converse passionately with their promptings, so that such a recollection will not be a confession but a passionate indulgence.
- 153. If you wish to offer God a blameless confession, then, without recalling in detail your past transgressions, bear their consequences courageously.
- 154. Severe afflictions come as punishment for sins committed in the past, each bringing with it a punishment commensurate with the specific transgression.
- 155. The one who is knowledgeable in these matters and has come to know the truth confesses to God not by recalling what has been done, but by enduring what befalls him.
- 156. Having cast aside the heart's sorrow over sins and dishonor, do not promise to achieve repentance through other virtues, for vanity and insensitivity usually serve sin as well.
- 157. Just as virtues are usually born of painful afflictions and dishonor, so sins arise from pride and pleasures.
- 158. Every carnal pleasure arises from a prior state of repose (of the body), and unbelief predisposes one to this repose.

- 159. One who is under the power of sin cannot overcome carnal reasoning on his own, because a constant inflammation is ingrained in his members.
- 160. Those who are passionate must remain in prayer and obedience, for it is only through them—or for their sake—that one can barely struggle against the passions.
- 161. Whoever fights against his own desires with obedience and prayer is a skilled warrior, clearly demonstrating his inner struggle by withdrawing from the sensual.
- 162. Whoever does not align his will with God’s will stumbles in his own endeavors and falls into the hands of his enemies.
- 163. When you see two sinners who love one another, know that they are helping one another in self-indulgence.
- 164. The self-righteous (proud) and the vain get along well with one another: for the former praises the vain one, who bows down slavishly before him, while the latter extols the self-righteous one, who often praises him.
- 165. The God-loving listener benefits in both cases: when his virtues are spoken of with praise, he becomes even more zealous for them, and when his evil deeds are exposed, he is compelled to repentance. We ought to live in accordance with our progress, and in accordance with our way of life, we ought to offer up prayer to God.
- 166. It is certainly good to hold fast to the chief virtue and not to worry about anything in particular, nor to pray about anything in particular, but only to seek the Kingdom of God according to the Lord’s word (Matt. 6:33). But if we still concern ourselves with every need, then we must pray for each one as well; for whoever does anything or worries about anything without prayer does not bring his work to a successful conclusion. And this is precisely what the Lord meant when He said, “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15:5).
- 167. Whoever neglects the commandment to pray falls into the most inappropriate disobedience, one of which leads him to another, like a prisoner.
- 168. Whoever accepts present afflictions with equanimity, inspired by the hope of future blessings, has attained the knowledge of the truth and will easily be freed from anger and sorrow.
- 169. Whoever accepts scorn and dishonor for the sake of the truth walks the Apostolic path, having taken up the cross and being bound by its chains. But whoever, without this, attempts to heed the heart is deceived by the mind and falls into the devil’s temptations and snares.
- 170. One who struggles cannot overcome either thoughts without their causes or these causes without thoughts. For if we reject one of these separately, shortly thereafter we will be cast back into both by the other.
- 171. Whoever fights against others out of fear of suffering some evil or insult will either suffer evil in abundance here, or be tormented without mercy in the age to come.
- 172. Whoever wishes to cast off every burden must entrust everything to God in prayer and, keeping a firm hope in Him, despise concerns for the sensual as much as possible.
- 173. When the devil sees that a person is unduly preoccupied with bodily matters without need, he first seizes the prey of knowledge (plunders the mind), and then (having succeeded in this), cuts off hope in God as the head.
- 174. When you reach the secluded place of pure prayer, do not entertain at that time the thoughts the enemy instills, lest you lose what is best. For it is better to strike him with the arrows of prayer—he who is confined below—than to converse with him when, by presenting trivial matters to our attention, he devises ways to distract us from praying against him.
- 175. Knowledge of things is useful to a person during times of temptation and despondency, but during prayer it is usually harmful.
- 176. If you have been called to teach about the Lord but are not being listened to, grieve over this in your heart, but do not show your distress openly. For such grief will not lead to your condemnation along with those who do not heed you, whereas if you show your distress openly, you will be tempted by the very same ones.
- 177. During a conversation, do not conceal what is necessary and beneficial for those present; express only what is pleasant in plain language, and what is harsh (strict) in a veiled manner.
- 178. Do not rebuke to their face those who are not under your authority, for this is a matter of authority rather than counsel.

- 179. What is said generally to many is beneficial to all, but each person's conscience guides them individually.
- 180. The one who speaks the truth must also give thanks to God, as one who receives from God what ought to be said. For truth is not the work of the speaker, but of God acting (within him or upon him).
- 181. Do not enter into a dispute with those who have not made a vow of obedience to you when they oppose the truth, lest (instead of edification) only enmity arise, according to Scripture (see 2 Tim. 2:23).
- 182. Whoever indulges a novice when he contradicts where he should not is leading him astray in this matter and encouraging him (in general) to disregard his vows of obedience.
- 183. Whoever, with the fear of God, admonishes and instructs a sinner acquires for himself a virtue opposite to the transgression. But the resentful and ill-willed critic, according to the spiritual law, falls into the same passion as the one he criticizes.
- 184. One who teaches the law well fears the Lawgiver and, out of fear of Him, shuns all evil.
- 185. Do not be two-tongued—that is, saying one thing with your words but feeling another in your conscience. For Scripture places such a person under an oath (Sirach 28:15).
- 186. One speaks the truth and is hated by fools for it; another acts hypocritically and is loved for it; yet neither of these rewards lasts. In due time, the Lord will give each his due.
- 187. Whoever wishes to be spared future sorrows must willingly endure the present ones. For by mentally exchanging one for the other in this way, he will, through small sorrows, avoid great torments.
- 188. Refrain from boasting with your words and from conceit in your thoughts, lest you be led to do the opposite, for good deeds are not accomplished by a single person but by the help of the all-seeing God.
- 189. The all-seeing God assigns us fitting fates not only according to our deeds but also according to our thoughts and voluntary intentions.
- 190. Involuntary thoughts arise from a preceding sin, while voluntary ones arise from a self-willed mind. That is why the latter are the cause of the former.
- 191. Evil thoughts that are not in accordance with the heart are accompanied by sorrow, which is why they quickly disappear; but those that are in accordance with the heart are accompanied by joy, which is why it is difficult to shake them off.
- 192. The self-indulgent person grieves over reproaches and deprivations, while the lover of God grieves over praise and abundance.
- 193. One who is ignorant of God's judgments walks (inwardly) along a path flanked by rapids on both sides, and is easily cast down by any wind: when praised, he becomes conceited; when criticized, he becomes irritated; when feasting in abundance, he indulges in lust; when experiencing scarcity, he weeps; when he knows something, he puts on a show; when he does not know, he pretends to be knowledgeable; when he is rich, he boasts; when he is poor, he hypocritically pretends; when he is sated, he becomes insolent; when he fasts, he becomes vain; he quarrels with those who rebuke him, and regards those who excuse him as foolish.
- 194. Until one, through the grace of Christ, attains knowledge of the truth and the fear of God, he will continue to suffer severe wounds not only from his passions but also from external circumstances.
- 195. When you wish to resolve a perplexing (confusing) matter, seek what is pleasing to God in it, and you will certainly find a beneficial solution.
- 196. Whatever matters God favors, all creation assists in; and whatever He turns away from, all creation opposes.
- 197. Whoever resists adverse circumstances, without realizing it, is opposing God's command; but whoever accepts them with true understanding, according to Scripture, endures the Lord.
- 198. When temptation comes, do not seek the cause or purpose of it, but (take care) to endure it with gratitude, without sorrow, and without holding a grudge.
- 199. The evil of others does not add to our sin unless we accept it—that is, adopt it or make it our own—with evil thoughts.
- 200. Since there is no person who can please God without temptations, we must thank God for every sorrowful event.
- 201. If Peter had not given up his nightly fishing, he would not have been granted the daytime catch; and if Paul had not been blinded physically, he would not have gained spiritual sight; and if Stephen had not been slandered as a blasphemer, the heavens would not have opened to him, and he would not have beheld God.

202. Just as an act in accordance with God is called a virtue, so too is unexpected sorrow called a trial.

203. God tested Abraham—that is, He sent him sorrows for his own good—not to find out what kind of man he was, for the One who knows all things before the beginning of time already knew him, but to give him an opportunity for perfect faith (to come to know it and be established in it).

204. Every sorrow reveals the inclination of our will—whether it leans to the right or to the left. A sudden sorrow is therefore called a temptation because it puts the one who experiences it to the test regarding his inner dispositions.

205. The fear of God compels us to fight against sin, and when we fight, God’s grace destroys it.

206. Wisdom consists not only in knowing the truth in its natural sequence, but also in enduring the evil inflicted upon us by others as if it were our own (as if we deserved it). (’s experience showed that) those who remained with only the first kind of knowledge were lifted up by pride, while those who attained the second acquired humility.

207. If you want to keep evil thoughts from tormenting you, cultivate humility of soul and bodily suffering—not just in part, but at all times, in every place, and in every endeavor.

208. Whoever voluntarily trains himself through afflictions will not be overcome by involuntary thoughts; but whoever does not take upon himself the former will inevitably be enslaved by the latter.

209. When, as a result of an offense, your gut and your heart become agitated, do not grieve that what had previously lain dormant within has been stirred to life; but joyfully cast aside the thoughts that have arisen within, knowing that as they are eradicated at the first stir, the evil lying beneath them and setting them in motion is usually eradicated as well; but if you allow these thoughts to take root and appear frequently, then evil usually gains strength.

210. Without contrition of the heart, it is impossible to be completely rid of evil; the heart, however, is contrite through threefold abstinence, namely: from sleep, food, and bodily rest. For contentment in these things nourishes self-indulgence (satisfaction), multiplying evil thoughts and instilling a reluctance to pray and to fulfill proper obedience.

211. Having been chosen to lead the brethren, maintain your authority and do not remain silent about what ought to be said or commanded because of opposition from some. In matters where they obey you, you will receive a reward because of their virtue; in matters where they do not obey, forgive them, and for that you will receive an equal reward from the One who said, “Forgive, and you will be forgiven” (Luke 6:37).

212. The events of life are like a marketplace. Those who know how to trade make a profit, while those who do not suffer a loss.

213. If someone does not listen to you from the very first word, do not coerce them with argumentation, but rather draw them to your side by highlighting the benefit they have rejected. For kindness is more beneficial to you than their obedience.

214. When the corruption of one person (who has harmed himself through disobedience or by some other means) spreads to many, then one should not be long-suffering, “seeking not one’s own benefit, but that of many, so that they may be saved” (1 Cor. 10:33). For the common good is more beneficial than the private good.

215. If anyone falls into any sin and does not grieve over it in proportion to the offense, he will easily fall again into the same (enemy’s) snare.

216. Just as a lioness does not approach a calf in friendship, so shamelessness does not accept “godly sorrow” (2 Cor. 7:10).

217. Just as a sheep does not mate with a wolf to bear offspring, so too does a heart filled with satiety prevent the conception of virtues.

218. No one can experience godly sorrow and grief unless they first love their causes.

219. The fear of God and reproof welcome sorrow into their fellowship, while self-restraint and vigilance are in harmony with sorrow.

220. Whoever is not instructed by the commandments and exhortations of Scripture must be driven on with “a horse’s whip and a donkey’s goad” (Prov. 26: 3)⁵⁶ ; but if he rejects even this, “then you will pull his jaw with bit and bridle” (Ps. 31: 9).

⁵⁶ Donkeys are not driven with a whip, but are pricked in the flanks with an awl attached to a stick.

221. Whoever is easily overcome by small temptations will inevitably be enslaved by greater ones, but whoever despises the small ones will rebel against the Lord even in the face of greater ones.

222. Do not attempt to correct with rebukes one who boasts of his virtues, for the same person cannot be both a lover of ostentation and a lover of truth.

223. Every word of Christ reveals God's mercy, truth, and wisdom, and through hearing instills their power into the souls of those who willingly listen to Him. Therefore, the unmerciful and the unrighteous, who listened to Him reluctantly, not only failed to recognize God's wisdom but also crucified the One who taught it. So we, too, must examine whether we listen to Him willingly. For He said: "Whoever loves Me will keep My commandments, and he will be loved by My Father, and I will love him and reveal Myself to him" (John 14:15, 21). Do you see how He has concealed His manifestation within the commandments? Yet the most comprehensive of all the commandments is love for God and neighbor, which is born through detachment from all material things in the stillness of the mind.

224. Knowing this, the Lord commands us, saying, "Do not worry about tomorrow" (Matt. 6:34). And so it should be. For how can one who has not detached himself from material things and from concern for them be freed from evil thoughts? But when one is overwhelmed by thoughts, how will he see the fundamental sin hidden beneath them—which is the darkness and gloom of the soul, and from which all wicked thoughts and desires originate—when the devil, tempting through a gentle enticement, points out the sin, and the person, driven by vanity and self-indulgence, joins forces with him? Even if, upon reflection, he did not resolve to commit it, he nevertheless took pleasure in the impulse and became entangled with it. But if he does not recognize this principal sin—when and how, having prayed about it, will he be cleansed of it? And without being cleansed, how will he find a place of pure nature (Ezek. 37: 27)? And if he does not find this, how will he see the inner house of Christ?—if we are the house of God, according to the words of the Prophets, the Gospel, and the Apostles (Zech. 2:10, John 14:23, 1 Cor. 3:16).

225. Therefore, we must strive, in the manner described above, to find this house and, while abiding in prayer, knock at the door (Matt. 7:7), so that either here or at the time of our departure, the Lord may open it to us and not say, if we are found wanting: "I do not know where you come from" (Luke 13:25). We must not only ask and receive, but also preserve what has been given to us, for some have lost it even after receiving it. A mere knowledge of the subjects mentioned above, or even some casual experience (regarding them), may be possessed even by those who began their studies late, and the young, but even the elders—the devout and highly experienced—hardly possess the constant and patient practice of this, having often lost it through inattention and then, through deliberate effort, sought it out and regained it. Let us, then, not cease to do the same until we have mastered this practice, so that it may remain in us inseparably.

226. Of the many, we have come to know only a few of the justifications of the spiritual law—which we must continually learn and put into practice—as the great Psalmist inspires those who often sing in the Lord Jesus, to whom be glory, power, and worship, now and forever. Amen.

Abba Evagrius of Pontus

Information about the Life of Abba Evagrius

It is known that Evagrius of Pontus, a hermit monk and abbot, was born around the middle of the 4th century in the town of Ivor, near Pontus Euxinus (the Monastery of St. Basil was not far from this town). His lineage or talents drew the attention of the great saints who flourished at that time: Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory the Theologian. Under their guidance, he grew and developed in spirit and in his understanding of the faith and life in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Basil the Great ordained him a reader; Gregory of Nyssa ordained him a deacon and left him in Constantinople while he attended the Second Ecumenical Council there. A certain circumstance that endangered his purity forced him to leave Constantinople. And so, after staying briefly in Jerusalem, he set out for Egypt, where he lived the ascetic life first in Nitria, then in the cells, and finally in the Skete, under the guidance of and in fellowship with the great abbots of that time. Palladius, his disciple through Socrates, writes about him in Laudatoria, chapter 73: "Finding it unjust to remain silent about the deeds of Evagrius, the renowned deacon of Christ, a man of the Apostolic life, and, on the contrary, deeming it just to commit them to writing, for the edification of readers and the glorification of the grace of our Savior, I will first describe how he entered the monastic life and how, having labored in a manner worthy of his vow, he passed away in the desert at the age of 54, according to the words of Scripture: 'He died at a young age, having fulfilled the years of his duty, for his soul was pleasing to the Lord.' He was a native of Pontus, from the city of Ivora, the son of a presbyter; St. Basil, Bishop of Caesarea, ordained him a reader at the church in Argos. After the passing of St. Basil the Bishop, St. Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa—the brother of Bishop Basil, who had attained apostolic glory, and who was most wise, most dispassionate, and highly renowned for his learning—noting Evagrius's aptitude, ordained him a deacon. Later, having accompanied him to the great Council of Constantinople, St. Gregory the Bishop left him there with the blessed Bishop Nectarius, as the most skilled in refuting all heresies. And he became renowned in the great city, courageously defeating every heresy with his words. It so happened that this man, who was respected throughout the city for his exemplary moral integrity, was afflicted by a passionate love for a woman, as he himself later told us after he had been freed from this temptation. The woman loved him in return, and she was of noble birth. Evagrius, since he feared God, was ashamed before his own conscience, and envisioned the filth of vice and the schadenfreude of the heretics, earnestly prayed to God to thwart the woman's intentions, for she, inflamed by passion, was striving to draw him into sin. He wanted to distance himself from her, but could not, held captive by the bonds of favors. Shortly after the prayer with which he had prevented himself from committing sin, an angel appeared to him in a vision, dressed as a provincial military officer; taking him, the angel led him as if to a court of law and cast him into a dungeon, placing iron shackles around his neck and binding his hands with iron chains. Those who came to see him did not tell him the reason for his imprisonment, but he himself, tormented by his conscience, thought he had been subjected to this because of that affair, and believed that the woman's husband had reported it to the judge. Moreover, it seemed to him that others were being tried right there for the same crime. Because of this, he was in extreme distress and fear. Then an angel took the form of one of his sincere friends and came as if to visit him. He entered, appearing deeply shocked and saddened that his friend was suffering the disgrace of chains and was imprisoned among forty criminals, and said to him: "Father Deacon! Why are they holding you so dishonorably with criminals?" He replied, "Truly, I do not know, but I suspect that a certain eparch has denounced me out of mad jealousy, and I fear that the city governor may have been bribed by him and that they might subject me to severe punishment." The one who appeared in the form of a friend said to him, "If you are willing to listen to your friend, I would advise you to leave this city, for, as I see it, it is not good for you to live here." Evagrius said to him, "If God delivers me from this trouble, and you later see me in Constantinople, let me be subjected to an even greater punishment." The friend said to him, "If so, I will bring the Gospel; swear to me on it that you will leave this city and become a monk, and I will deliver you from this calamity." Evagrius said, "I swear, as you wish, only deliver me from this dark cloud." After that, his friend brought the Gospel and demanded an oath. Evagrius swore to him on the Gospel that he would not remain in the city for more than one day, and that was only to load his belongings onto a ship. With that, the vision ended. Rising, filled with anxiety, he reasoned: "Even if the oath was given in a fit of passion, I have nevertheless sworn it." Therefore, without the slightest delay, he transferred everything he owned to the ship and sailed to Jerusalem. There he donned the monastic habit and was received by the blessed Melania the Roman. But the devil once again clouded his heart and shook his resolve to such an extent that he changed his clothes yet again, and his mind was overcome by the vanity of oratory. But God, who preserves us all from destruction, brought upon him yet another affliction here, sending a fever upon him and, through a severe illness lasting six months, exhausting his body, which had been hindering him from continuing on the path he had already begun. When the doctors gave up on him, finding no way to cure him, the blessed Melania said to him: "It seems to me that your illness is not a simple one, my son; tell me, is there something weighing on your heart?" He confessed to her everything that had happened to him in Constantinople. The blessed woman said to him, "Give me your word before God that you will resolve to lead a monastic life, and though I am a sinner, I will pray to the Lord that He may grant you continued life for repentance and the reformation of your heart." When he gave his word, she prayed, and Evagrius recovered within a few days. After his recovery, she herself brought him a monastic robe, and, having put it on, he set out for Egypt, where, after living for two years on Mount Nitrian, he withdrew into the desert in the third year. He lived for fourteen years in the so-called cells, subsisting only on bread and water, with occasionally a small amount of oil, and allowing himself no comfort in this regard. He ate neither greens nor fruit nor grapes; he drank no wine and did not wash his body. Thus did this man, who had previously lived in comfort, torment himself, yet even here the temptations did not leave him. At times, the demon of lust would assail him fiercely, as he himself recounted; and then, during the winter, he would sit naked in a well all night long, until his body grew numb. At other times, the spirit of blasphemy tormented him, and then he would not enter under a roof for forty days, afflicting himself. In general, he endured so many temptations from various demons that it is difficult to list them all; he was even beaten by demons. But by mortifying his body in this way and enduring such trials, the blessed one was inwardly enlivened by the Holy Spirit, and, having purified his mind, was granted the gift of discernment and the ability to distinguish between spirits. This valiant ascetic of Christ told us before his death: “For three years now, carnal lust has not troubled me.” If, after such an austere life, after such tireless ascetic labors and unceasing vigilance in prayer, the enemy of goodness and the destructive demon attacked this righteous man so fiercely, how much more must careless people suffer at the hands of this unclean demon—or because of their own negligence! He composed one hundred prayers and wrote three books, namely: “iera”—or rather, “stihira” (brief sayings in the form of verses or parables), “monahon”—monk or practical lessons, and “antirritikon”—the struggle—on the battle against demons and passions. In Socrates (Book 4, Chapter 23), we also find that Evagrius was a disciple of both Macarius—the Egyptian and the Alexandrian—under whose guidance, having previously been a philosopher in name only, he acquired practical philosophy. Having come to Egypt from Constantinople, he met the aforementioned men and began to imitate their way of life. Below, Socrates cites two incidents from Evagrius’s life, in his own words, from which it is evident what kind of relationship he had with Macarius the Great. The first is that Abba Macarius asked Evagrius about the difference in the effects on the soul between the memory of insults from people and the memory of insults from demons; the second is how, upon arriving at Abba Macarius’s dwelling, Evagrius—exhausted from his journey in the heat—asked for a little water and was refused. Both of these accounts are cited in his letters to Anatolius (Chapters 93, 94). Further on, Socrates mentions that Evagrius, in his book The Gnostic, writes about himself: “We learned from the righteous Gregory that there are four virtues and corresponding concepts: prudence, courage, temperance, and justice.” Who is this Gregory? According to Palladius, it is Gregory of Nyssa, but according to Socrates, it is Gregory of Nazianzus, who is said to have ordained him as a deacon in Constantinople. Did Socrates confuse Gregory of Nazianzus with Gregory of Nyssa? Palladius was better positioned to know the truth. Finally, we find the following account in Socrates’ work. The wonderful Ammonius, who had been in Rome with Athanasius the Great and wished to see nothing there except the Church of Peter and Paul, was later called to the episcopate in Egypt by Theophilus of Alexandria; fleeing from this, he cut off his own right ear so that the disfigurement of his body might deter his ordination. Some time later, Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, appointed Evagrius to the episcopate; he, too, fled, but did not mutilate any part of his body. Upon meeting Ammonius, Evagrius said kindly to him: “You did wrong to cut off your ear; you will answer to God for such an act.” “And will you not be held accountable, Evagrius, for cutting off your own tongue and, out of pride, failing to make use of the grace granted to you?” replied Ammonius. Regarding Evagrius’s works, Socrates writes: “He wrote very good books.” One of them is titled “The Monk,” or On Activity; another, “The Gnostic,” or To the Man Who Has Attained Knowledge, divided into fifty chapters; and the third, “The Antirritikos” (antirritikos), or a selection from the Divine Scriptures against the tempting demons, divided into eight parts, corresponding to the number of the eight thoughts. In addition, he compiled 600 questions about the future and two more books written in verse: one addressed to monks living in cenobitic communities, or communal monasteries, and the other to a maiden. Those who read these books will discover how remarkable they are. Sozomen (Book 6, Chapter 30), having said of the aforementioned Ammonius that he was one of the “long-robed” monks, had attained the height of wisdom, and was highly learned—so much so that he had read through the works of Origen, Didymus, and other spiritual writers—adds: “The wise Evagrius, a most learned man, strong in mind and speech, and especially capable of distinguishing between thoughts (intentions) that lead to virtue and those that lead to vice, and of disposing himself to cultivate the former and guard against the latter, was a friend of Ammonius. However, his writings will reveal what kind of scholar he was. His character, they say, was marked by moderation and displayed so little vanity and pride that neither well-deserved praise inflated his ego nor undeserved reproaches caused him distress. He studied and learned the Holy Scriptures under Bishop Gregory of Nazianzus, under whom he served as archdeacon during the latter’s tenure as primate of the Church of Constantinople. He was a handsome man and took pleasure in dressing elegantly. One of the nobles, noticing his acquaintance with his own wife, was consumed with jealousy and resolved to kill him. When the plot was already being put into action, God sent him a terrifying yet salvific dream while he slept.” Sozomen adds nothing further of note. It is impossible not to notice that Socrates, as cited by Sozomen, disagrees with Palladius regarding which Gregory patronized Evagrius and contributed to his education. Palladius names

Gregory of Nyssa, while Sozomen names Gregory of Nazianzus. One can reconcile their accounts as follows: Evagrius was ordained a deacon by Gregory of Nyssa, but he was also under the guidance of Gregory of Nazianzus and benefited from his teachings. When Gregory the Theologian was called to Constantinople to serve as patriarch, Gregory of Nyssa arrived at the Council convened under his leadership, accompanied by Evagrius. There, Evagrius may have served as protodeacon under Nazianzen and, after the Council, remained in Constantinople on the advice of both Grigories. Socrates and Sozomen speak of him as having been in Constantinople, while Palladius describes what happened prior to that. Palladius, as a disciple of Evagrius, deserves greater credence, for he surely heard what he reports directly from Evagrius himself. The Patrologia (vol. 40, p. 1215) dates Evagrius's death to the year 399. The same source also includes reviews of Evagrius's writings. Incidentally, Blessed Jerome wrote (Epist. 135 ad Ctesiph) that "Evagrius's books are read not only by the Greeks throughout the East, but also in the West by the Latins in the translation by Rufinus, his disciple." The Patrologia contains all that has survived of Evagrius's writings. Foremost among them are the chapters on the active life addressed to Anatolius. This, as one might surmise, is what remains of the book that the historians we have cited title The Monk. The chapters of * * are preceded by a brief letter to Anatolius, serving as an introduction to them. This is followed by 71 chapters of logos praktikos—teachings on the ascetic life. After these come 100 chapters. However, since the majority of these chapters are among the 71 mentioned earlier, only the text of those chapters not included there is presented here. In total, however, there are 100 chapters. We will also title this section: "One Hundred Chapters on the Active Life, Addressed to Anatolius." Next, in the Patrologia, there follows an article which, in our Dobrotolubie, is more clearly titled: "The Model of Monastic Life, Teaching How One Should Strive and Remain Silent." The same is true in the Greek Dobrotolubie. The title of Patrologia is difficult to convey even by paraphrase. We will retain our title. Next come 33 chapters titled kat anoloythian (not kat analogian?); their content: the reflection of the spiritual in the visible; 25 chapters arranged alphabetically; these are aphoristic sayings on spiritual matters. Appended to these last are another 26 sayings, not arranged alphabetically. Following this is a section on the eight vicious thoughts, part of the ancient book Antirritikon. Finally, there are brief rules for the Kinuit monks and for virgins. All of this is presented here in translation.

The Monk Evagrius's Instructions on Asceticism

1. Chapters on the Active Life, Addressed to Anatolius

You previously wrote to me, my most beloved brother Anatolius, from the Holy Mountain (presumably Mount Nitrian) to my skete, asking me to explain to you the symbolic meaning of the Egyptian monastic schema, believing that it is not without good reason that it differs so greatly from all other forms of human attire. I will gladly recount to you what I myself have learned about this from the Holy Fathers. The kukulli is a symbol of the grace of our Savior God, which overshadows the minds of the monks and, with its covering, protects their childlikeness in Christ from those who ceaselessly seek to strike them and inflict wounds. Those who wear it on their heads sing with firm and active faith: "Unless the Lord builds the house and guards the city, the builder labors in vain, and the watchman stays awake in vain" (Ps. 126:1). Such cries instill humility and uproot pride, that ancient evil which cast Lucifer, the morning star, down to earth. The fact that their hands are bare⁵⁷ shows the sincerity of their lives. For vanity knows how to disguise itself and cast a shadow of virtue, always seeking glory from people and driving away faith, as the Savior says: "How can you believe, when you receive glory from one another and do not seek the glory that comes from the one God?" (John 5:44). Goodness must not be for the sake of anything else; on the contrary, everything else must be for its sake. If this is not acknowledged, it will become clear that what drives us to do good is more valuable to us than goodness itself, and this would be the height of absurdity—to imagine something higher than God and to speak in such a way. The analav (our paraman), crisscrossing their shoulders like a cross, is a symbol of faith in Christ, who receives (αναλαμβάνεσης) the meek, always removes obstacles, and ensures that our actions proceed unhindered. The belt that binds their loins repels all impurity and proclaims: "It is good for a man not to touch his wife" (1 Cor. 7:1). They possess grace, as they always "bear about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus" (2 Cor. 4:10), as they subdue all irrational bodily passions, root out evil in the soul through the practice of goodness, and as they love poverty and flee from the love of wealth, which is idolatry. The staff is the tree of life, obliging all who take it in their hands and lean on it to be established in Christ. Here, in brief, are the things symbolized by the schema! (When clothing them in it), the Holy Fathers always speak these words to them: Children! The fear of God strengthens faith, and self-restraint strengthens the fear of God; patience and hope make it unwavering, and from them springs dispassion; the fruit of dispassion is love, and love is the gateway to physical knowledge, which leads to theology and supreme bliss. And this is enough for now regarding the holy schema and the teachings of the elders. Now let us speak of the active and contemplative life—not merely what we saw (in the elders) and heard (from them), but also what we were commanded by them to pass on to others, dividing what pertains to the active life into one hundred chapters, and what pertains to the contemplative life into 650, concealing some things and veiling others, lest we give what is holy to the dogs or cast our pearls before swine (Matt. 7:6)—though this is clear to those who follow in their footsteps along the same path.

⁵⁷ Cassian writes that their sleeves reached only to their elbows.

1. Christianity is the law—(dogma)—of our Savior Jesus Christ, combining, as far as life is concerned, knowledge of things and the knowledge of God.

2. The Kingdom of Heaven is the dispassion of the soul through true knowledge of the One Who Is.

3. The Kingdom of God is the knowledge of the Most Holy Trinity, which extends in accordance with the state of the mind and fills it with an endless life of bliss.

4. Whoever loves something naturally desires it, and whatever one desires, one strives to attain. Every pleasure is preceded by desire, and desire is born of sensation. That which is unrelated to sensation is free from passion.

5. Demons personally engage in battle with the hermits, but against those who lead a virtuous life in monasteries or communities, they arm the most negligent brothers. Yet the latter struggle is far easier than the former, for one cannot find people on earth who are more wicked than demons or who embody all their malice.

6. A wandering mind is steadied by reading, vigil, and prayer. A burning lust is quenched by fasting, labor, and asceticism. A surging anger is calmed by psalm-singing, magnanimity, and mercy. All of this proves effective when practiced at the right time and in the proper measure. Everything that is untimely and excessive is short-lived (unstable), and what is short-lived is more harmful than beneficial.

7. When the soul craves various delicacies, let us satisfy it with bread and water, so that it may be grateful even for a thin slice. For satiety craves varied delicacies, but hunger regards even being sated with bread as bliss⁵⁸.

8. Scarcity of water greatly contributes to the temperance of the body. Let those three hundred Israelites who, with Gideon, defeated Midian convince you of this.

9. Just as it is impossible for death and life to coexist in a person at the same moment, so too is it impossible for love and money to coexist in anyone. Love not only consumes money but also sacrifices our very temporary life.

10. The pursuit of worldly pleasures is a tower impregnable to the demon of sorrow. For sorrow is the deprivation of pleasure—whether present or anticipated. We cannot rid ourselves of this enemy as long as we are attached to anything earthly. There he sets his snare to stir up sorrow, targeting whatever he sees us most attached to.

11. Anger and hatred multiply the irritation of the heart, while charity and meekness extinguish it.

12. May the sun not set while we are still angry, lest the demons, attacking at night, frighten our souls and make our minds more timid for the struggle the next day. Terrifying dreams usually follow angry agitation, and nothing else compels our mind to break ranks (desert) as much as anxious anger.

13. When, for whatever reason, the irritable part of our soul becomes agitated, the demons offer us solitude as a good thing, so that, by removing the causes of our distress, we might not be freed from our confusion⁵⁹. But when lust flares up, they try to make us sociable (to keep us among people), calling us cruel and savage for withdrawing, so that, lusting after bodies, we might encounter bodies (by remaining in society). We must not believe them, but rather do the opposite of what they suggest.

14. Do not give yourself over to thoughts of anger, waging a mental war against the one who has grieved you, nor—again—to lustful thoughts, lingering on sensual fantasies. The former darkens the soul, while the latter stirs up passion; both defile the mind, and when you pray, filling your imagination with passionate images as if they were idols and thus failing to offer God a pure prayer, you immediately fall prey to the demon of despondency, who usually attacks in such states and, like a dog, snatches the soul as if it were carrion.

⁵⁸ This chapter is cited by St. John Climacus, Ladder 14, Chapter 12.

⁵⁹ So that, in overcoming our sorrows, we do not dull our sense of indignation and anger while living among others.

15. Anger is by nature intended to wage war against demons and to fight against every sinful delight. Therefore, the angels, by stirring up spiritual delight within us and allowing us to taste its bliss, incline us to direct our anger against the demons; whereas the demons, by drawing us toward worldly lusts, compel us to wage war with anger against people, contrary to our nature, so that the mind, having become clouded and devoid of reason, may become a traitor to the virtues.

16. Be careful not to drive away a brother in your anger. For this, you will never escape the demon of sorrow throughout your life, who will always hold this against you during prayer.

17. Resentment is extinguished by gifts. Let Jacob convince you of this—he who appeased Esau with gifts, even as Esau was coming to meet him with four hundred men (Gen. 32:6, 33:1). But we, the poor, can fulfill this need (as a substitute for gifts) with a meal.

18. When you are attacked by the demon of despondency, then, dividing your soul in two and making one part the comforter and the other the one being comforted, let us instill in ourselves good hopes, singing the following verses of David: “Why are you downcast, O my soul?” “Why are you troubled, O my soul?” “Trust in God, for I will confess to Him; He is the salvation of my face and my God” (Ps. 41:6).

19. During times of temptation, one must not leave one’s cell by inventing some pious excuse, but must remain inside and endure, bravely facing all attackers—especially the demon of despondency, which is truly the most burdensome of all, yet also the one that makes the soul the most experienced. If one runs away or avoids the struggle, the mind will remain inexperienced, timid, and quick to flee.

20. It is difficult to avoid the thought of vanity, for whatever you do to drive it away becomes the beginning of a new surge of vanity. Not every righteous thought of ours, however, is opposed by demons; rather, these evil creatures favor some of them, in the hope of deceiving us.

21. One who has touched upon knowledge and tasted its sweetness will no longer trust the demon of vanity, even if it were to offer him all the pleasures of the world. For what more could it promise than spiritual contemplation? But until we have tasted knowledge, let us diligently lead a life of active service, declaring to God our purpose—that we do everything for the sake of His knowledge.

22. Remember your former life and your past sins, and how, having been a man of passions, you passed over to a life that does not indulge the passions, and how you once again withdrew from the world, which in many ways often humbled you greatly. Reflect also on the One who protects you in the desert and drives away the demons who gnash their teeth at you. Such reflections instill humility and prevent the demon of pride from gaining a foothold.

23. Whatever we remember with passion was first perceived with passion in reality; and likewise, whatever we perceive with passion in reality, we will later remember with passion. For one who has conquered the demons that stir up passions, the things with which they stir them up are now worthless. For the spiritual warrior is mightier than the material one.

24. The passions of the soul take their impetus (for their activity) from people, while those of the body take it from the body. The activity of bodily passions is curbed by self-restraint, and that of the soul’s passions by spiritual love.

25. The demons that preside over the passions of the soul persist stubbornly until death itself, tormenting the soul, while those that preside over the passions of the body depart more quickly. Moreover, some demons, like the rising or setting sun, affect only a particular part of the soul, whereas the midday demon usually engulfs the entire soul and overwhelms the mind. Why is the life of a hermit sweet after the passions have been subdued? Because then only bare memories of them remain, and, as for the struggle, it is not so much the struggle itself that remains as the contemplation of it.

26. It is worth considering whether thought sets the passions in motion, or whether the passions set thought in motion. Some accept the former, while others accept the latter. Usually, the passions are set in motion by the senses, but when one possesses love and self-restraint, they do not move; when one lacks them, they do. Anger requires greater remedies than lust, and love is called great precisely because it is the bridle of anger. St. Moses symbolically called it “ophiokhom” (one who fights serpents) when he listed what may and may not be eaten (Lev. 11:22).

27. Because of the well-known and never-ceasing malice of demons, the soul flares up against the thoughts (implanted by them) as soon as it senses their approach, and defends itself by adopting the passionate quality of the attackers (anger).

28. It is not always possible to follow the usual rules, but one must pay attention to the circumstances and strive to do what is possible within them to the best of one's ability. Even the demons themselves are unaware of this law of timeliness. That is why, always hostile toward us, they prevent us from doing what is possible and compel us to do what is impossible. Thus, they dissuade the sick from giving thanks to God for the afflictions that have befallen them and from generously bearing with those who serve them; they incline the weak toward the strictest abstinence and compel those burdened (by age or labor) to sing psalms while standing.

29. When necessity compels us to stay for a short time in a city or village, then, in our dealings with laypeople, let us observe the strictest self-restraint, lest our mind, having grown complacent and having abandoned its usual vigilance, do something rash or flee, driven by demons.

30. During times of temptation, do not begin prayer until you have first spoken a few angry words against the tempter. For when the soul is tainted by evil thoughts, its prayer cannot be pure. But if you say anything in anger against them, you will thereby throw your adversaries into confusion and destroy their suggestions. Anger usually has a similar effect on good thoughts as well.

31. Whoever wishes to test malicious demons and acquire the skill to discern their schemes, let him observe his thoughts and note what they insist upon and where they yield, under what circumstances and at what times which of them is particularly active, which follows which, and which does not agree with which, and let him seek from Christ the Lord the resolution to all this. Demons are very angry at those who actively pursue virtues with knowledge of the matter (and bring everything to light), desiring "to shoot down the upright in heart in the darkness" (Ps. 10: 3).

32. In this observation, you will find two demons to be extremely swift, almost outpacing the movement of our mind—the demon of fornication and the demon that entices us to blasphemy. But the latter is short-lived, while the former, if it does not stir up passionate thoughts, does not prevent us from progressing in the knowledge of God.

33. Only the One who united them can separate the body from the soul, while the soul can be separated from the body by one who strives for virtue (in asceticism). For our fathers call asceticism the remembrance of death and flight from the body (that is, so as not to indulge the flesh in lust).

34. Those who lavishly nourish their flesh and extend their care for it to the point of lust (Rom. 13:14) do themselves no good; let them complain about themselves afterward, and not about her. On the contrary, those who have attained spiritual dispassion through this very body and diligently strive (through its very means) to contemplate the Existent confess the grace of the Creator (who gave us the body).

35. When the mind begins to offer prayers without distraction, then the entire daily and nightly struggle is reduced to a struggle against the irritable part of the soul.

36. A sign of dispassion is when the mind begins to see its own light, becomes at peace with sleep-induced reveries, and understands things easily (and correctly).

37. When the mind does not imagine anything worldly during prayer, it means that it has grown strong.

38. The mind, having, with God's help, completed the course of an active life and attained contemplation, feels little and no longer feels the stirrings of the irrational part of the soul: contemplation elevates it above sorrow and separates it from the sensual.

39. A soul is not impassive merely because it is not captivated by things, but because it remains unperturbed even when recalling them.

40. It is not strictly speaking said of the perfect man that he "restrains himself," nor of the dispassionate man that he "endures," for endurance belongs to one who suffers, and restraint to one who is driven by desire.

41. It is a great feat to pray without distraction, but to sing without distraction is even greater.

42. One who has established virtues within himself and is completely governed by them no longer remembers the law, or the commandments, or punishment, but speaks (as if naturally) and acts in accordance with what his well-established, noble character inspires him to do.

43. Demonic songs stir up our lust and plunge the soul into shameful fantasies, whereas psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs always draw the mind to the remembrance of virtues, thereby cooling the heat of anger and quenching lust.

44. Just as those engaged in combat strike blows—and mutually receive them—so too do the demons, who are at war with us; when they strike us, they certainly receive blows from us in return. “I will strike them down, and they will not be able to stand” (Ps. 17: 39). And again: “Those who insult me and my enemies—they are overcome and fall” (Ps. 26:2).

45. Wisdom goes hand in hand with peace, and prudence with toil. One cannot acquire wisdom without struggle, nor can one successfully wage that struggle without prudence. It is entrusted to prudence to resist the anger stirred up by demons, just as it is to compel the powers of the soul to act as is proper to their nature, and thus to pave the way to wisdom.

46. The temptation of a monk is a thought which, having entered through the passionate part of the soul, clouds the mind.

47. A monk’s sin is the consent of the mind to a forbidden, sinful passion.

48. Angels rejoice when sinful evil is diminished, and demons rejoice when virtue is diminished. For the former are servants of mercy and love, while the latter are slaves of wrath and hatred. The former, drawing near to us, fill us with spiritual contemplation, while the latter, drawing near, plunge the soul into shameful imaginings.

49. Virtues do not stop the demons’ attacks against us, but they keep us unharmed by them.

50. An active life (the practice of virtue) is a spiritual method for purifying the passionate part of the soul.

51. For the complete healing of the soul’s faculties, merely performing the commandments is not enough if the mind does not simultaneously maintain the corresponding contemplations.

52. Just as one can accept the good thoughts implanted in us by the angels, so one can repel the evil thoughts instilled by demons. The former thoughts are followed by a peaceful state of the soul, while the latter are followed by turmoil.

53. The source of dispassion is love; dispassion itself is the flower of an active life, and an active life consists in the fulfillment of the commandments. The guardian of this fulfillment of the commandments is the fear of God, which is the fruit of true faith; faith, in turn, is an inner good of the soul, which is usually found even in those who have not yet believed in God.

54. Just as the soul, acting through the body, senses which members are weak, so the mind, acting through its own activity, recognizes its strengths and, noticing which one hinders it (due to its corruption), seeks out the commandment that will heal it.

55. The mind, waging a passionate war, does not see the enemy’s schemes; for at such a time it is like one fighting at night (in darkness). But, having attained dispassion, it readily discerns the enemies’ wiles.

56. The ultimate goal of the active life is love, and the end of knowledge is theology. The beginning of both, however, is faith and the contemplation of things. Those demons that attack the passionate part of the soul are called the adversaries of the active life; those that attack the very power of thought are called the enemies of all truth and the adversaries of contemplation.

57. Nothing that purifies the body remains with the purified person afterward, but virtues, having purified the soul, remain within it thereafter, along with the purified soul itself.

58. The rational soul acts in accordance with its nature when its desiring part strives for virtue, its impulsive part strives for it, and its thinking part is devoted to the contemplation of being.

59. One who excels in the active life diminishes the passions, while one who excels in contemplation diminishes ignorance. Regarding the passions, it is said that their complete eradication will never come to pass; regarding ignorance, it is said that it will come to an end in part, but not entirely.

60. The good and the bad that we encounter in life can contribute to both virtues and vices. The task of prudence is to use them to foster the former and counteract the latter.

61. The soul is tripartite, according to our wise teacher (meaning Gregory of Nyssa). When virtue resides in the rational part, it is called prudence (fronesis); discernment (synesis), and wisdom (sofia); when it resides in the volitional part, it is called chastity, love, and self-restraint; when it resides in the emotional part, it is called courage and patience; and when it pervades the entire soul, it is called righteousness. The task of prudence is to wage war against forces opposed to us, to protect virtues, to drive out vices, and to manage neutral (indifferent) matters appropriately according to the time. The task of discernment is to arrange everything that contributes to our goal in a fitting manner, and the task of wisdom is to contemplate corporeal and incorporeal beings in every respect. The task of chastity is to view dispassionately those things that usually arouse in us irrational dreams and desires; the task of love is to show ourselves toward every person bearing the image of God in the same way that love relates to the original image, even if demons attempt to degrade others in our sight; the task of self-restraint is to joyfully reject everything that delights the throat. The work of patience and courage is to fear no enemies and willingly endure all manner of hardships. The work of righteousness is to keep all parts of the soul in agreement and harmony with one another.

62. The fruit of sowing is the harvest, and that of virtue is knowledge. Just as tears accompany the sowing of seeds, so joy accompanies the harvest (Ps. 125:6).

63. A person will not rid himself of passionate memories unless he takes care to heal the covetous and irritable parts of himself, weakening the former through fasting, vigil, and sleeping on the bare ground, and taming the latter through long-suffering, forgiveness, and almsgiving. Almost all demonic thoughts, which plunge the mind into every kind of trouble and ruin, are composed of these two passions. But it is impossible for anyone to rid themselves of the passions unless they completely despise food and drink, possessions and glory, and even their own body, for the sake of those who often attempt to strike them through these things (i.e., demons). Therefore, we must imitate those in distress at sea, who cast off their belongings because of the force of the winds and the towering waves. At the same time, however, we must take great care that, in casting off our belongings in this way, we do not do so merely to be seen by others. For by doing so, we will lose our reward and suffer a shipwreck even more bitter than before, when the demon of vanity blows its wind upon us. That is why our Lord, in the Gospels, instructs our ruler—the mind—saying: “Take care not to practice your acts of charity before men, so that you may be seen by them; otherwise, you will have no reward from your Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 6:1). And again: “When you pray,” He says, “do not be like the hypocrites, who love to stand and pray in the marketplaces and on the street corners so that people may see them; truly I tell you, they have received their reward” (v. 5). And again He says: “But when you fast, do not look gloomy like the hypocrites, for they disfigure their faces to show others that they are fasting; truly I tell you, they have received their reward” (v. 16). But listen here to the Physician of souls, as He heals irritability through almsgiving, purifies the mind through prayer, and mortifies lust through fasting—from which the new man is formed, renewed in the image of the One who created him (Col. 3: 10–11), in whom, because of dispassion, “there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus; and there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcised nor uncircumcised, barbarian nor Scythian, slave nor free, but Christ is all and in all” (Gal. 3: 28).

64. Impure thoughts, taking root in us because of our passions, lead the mind to utter destruction and ruin. For just as the thought of bread takes root in the hungry person because of hunger, and the thought of water in the thirsty person because of thirst, so too the thought of money and other possessions takes root because of the love of money, and shameful thoughts because of lustful passion. In the same way, our fixation on thoughts of vanity and other such things is explained. It is impossible for a mind, submerged and drowning in such thoughts, to stand before God and be crowned with the crown of righteousness. That threefold-corrupted mind was plundered by these thoughts; according to the Gospel parable, it refused the supper of the knowledge of God. Likewise, the one bound hand and foot and cast into utter darkness wore a garment woven from these thoughts, which the Inviter deemed unworthy of such a wedding feast. The wedding garment is the dispassion of the rational soul that has renounced worldly desires. The reason why thoughts of sensual things, when they become entrenched, corrupt knowledge will be discussed in the chapters on prayer.

65. A demonic thought is opposed by three thoughts, which cut it off when it becomes entrenched in the mind: the angelic thought; our own thought, arising from our free will when it is directed toward the good; and another of our own thoughts, prompted by human nature, by which even pagans love, for example, their children and honor their parents. A good thought, however, is opposed by only two thoughts: a demonic one, and one of our own arising from our will, which has strayed toward the worse. For no evil thought arises from nature: since from the beginning we were not evil, because the Lord sowed good seed in His field. There was a time when there was no evil, and there will be a time when there will be none. The seeds of virtue are indelible. I am convinced of this by the rich man in the Gospel who, even after being condemned to hell, showed mercy to his brothers—and mercy is the finest seed of virtue.

66. Some of the impure demons always sit beside those who are reading and devise all manner of ways to distract their minds and lead them astray. Often, taking their cue from the Divine Scriptures themselves, they lead them into evil thoughts; it happens that they cause them to yawn contrary to their usual habit, or induce a heavy sleep, very different from the ordinary kind. I have experienced this myself, but did not fully understand the reason, even though I was often subjected to it. From Saint Macarius, however, I heard that both untimely yawning and sleep come from demons; as proof of this, he cites the custom of making the sign of the cross over one's mouth when yawning, according to an ancient, time-honored tradition. We endure all this from them because, while reading, we do not maintain sober attention and do not remember that we are reading the holy words of the Living God.

67. There are instances among demons of succession and handover, when one of them grows weary in battle but has managed to set his beloved passion in motion. Having observed this, I found the following: When thoughts of a certain passion rarely come to us for a long time, and then it suddenly and unexpectedly stirs and begins to burn—even though we gave no cause for it through any negligence—then know that a demon more wicked than the previous one has taken hold of us and, taking the place of the one who departed, has filled us with his evil. Seeing this, let the mind take refuge in the Lord, and, having taken up the helmet of salvation, having put on the breastplate of righteousness, having drawn the spiritual sword, having raised the shield of faith (Eph. 6:14–17), and looking up to heaven with tears, let it say: Lord Jesus Christ, “the strength of my salvation” (Ps. 139: 8). “Incline Your ear to me; hasten to deliver me; be to me a God of defense and a house of refuge, that You may save me” (Ps. 30: 3). Let him, especially through fasting and vigils, make his sword gleaming. After this, even if he suffers for some time yet, beset and pelted by the fiery arrows of the evil one, this demon too will eventually, little by little, become just as his predecessor was, and will subside until another, even more wicked one arrives to take his place.

68. Impure thoughts often take root and extend to many things; they cross great seas and do not shrink from traveling long distances, driven by a burning passion. But when they are somewhat purified, they become much more restrained than these (unbridled ones) and cannot spread widely to many things because of the weakness of their passion. That is why they move mostly within the bounds of what is natural, and, as the wise Solomon said, at certain times they mock (Prov. 7:12), gathering reeds for lawless idolatry (Exod. 5:12, 7), without touching the tares. Therefore, one must guard the heart with all diligence, so that it may be saved “like a gazelle from a snare, and like a bird from a net” (Prov. 6:5). For it is easier to purify an impure soul than to restore to health a soul that, having been purified, has once again become covered with wounds—due to the intensified barriers erected by the demon of sorrow, who constantly leaps into the pupils of the eyes and, even during prayer, exposes the idol of sinful passion.

69. Christ awakens the rational nature, which has been deadened by sin, to repentance through the contemplation of all ages (that is, the past, the present, and, above all, the future), while His Father resurrects this soul—which is then dying the death of Christ, the death of sin—through the knowledge of God. This is what the Apostle's words mean: “If we have died with Him, we shall also live with Him” (2 Tim. 2:11).

70. When the mind casts off the old man and puts on the one who is of grace, then during prayer it will behold its own state, resembling a sapphire or the color of the sky—which in Holy Scripture is called the place of God, as the elders saw it on Mount Sinai (Exod. 24:10).

71. The mind will not perceive the place of God within itself unless it rises above all thoughts of the material and the created; nor will it rise above them unless it casts off the passions that bind it to sensory objects and give rise to thoughts about them. It will cast off these passions through virtues, and simple thoughts through spiritual contemplation; but it will set even these aside when that light appears to it which, during prayer, imprints the place of God.

2. Evagrius the Monk on the Active Life: One Hundred Chapters

1. Our holy and most experienced teacher said: A monk should be disposed within himself as if he were to die tomorrow, and yet treat his body as if he were to live many years. For, he says, this cuts off thoughts of despondency and makes the monk most zealous, while this keeps the body healthy and compels him to observe constant self-restraint.

2. I have learned that the demon of vanity, pursued by almost all the demons, shamelessly stands upon the corpses of those who pursue him and flaunts the greatness of his virtue before the monk⁶⁰.

3. One must discern the differences among demons and recognize their times. From our thoughts (and thoughts arise from deeds), we come to know which demons are rare but severe, which are constant but lighter, and which suddenly pounce and carry the mind away into blasphemy. We must also be vigilant so that, when thoughts begin to shift their focus, before we depart from our usual state, we may manage to say something against them and discern who is present within them. For in this way, with God's help, we ourselves will succeed, and we will force them to fly away in sorrow, marveling at us.

⁶⁰ Perhaps, after all the demons have been driven out and defeated, one stands upon the corpses of those they have defeated, and so on.

4. When demons grow weary from battling the monks, they retreat a short distance to observe which virtue will be neglected during this interval; then, suddenly attacking from that side, they plunder the poor soul.

5. Evil demons sometimes call upon demons even more wicked than themselves for help, and, having devised a plan, begin to wage war against one another, united in a single purpose—the destruction of the soul.

6. May the demon who steals the mind away to blasphemy and to the most depraved imaginings—which I am ashamed even to put into writing—not confuse us or stifle our righteous zeal. God, the Knower of hearts, knows that even while living in the world, we did not succumb to such madness. This demon's aim is to force us to cease praying, so that when we stand before the Lord our God, we dare not lift our hands to Him against whom we have harbored such thoughts.

7. Signs of the passions at work in the soul include either a spoken word or a physical movement, by which our enemies discern whether we harbor their thoughts within us and are afflicted by their kind, or whether, having rejected them, we are concerned for our own salvation. God alone, who created us, knows all things and has no need of any visible signs to discern what is hidden in the heart.

8. Demons wage war against laypeople more through material things themselves, but against monks mostly through thoughts, because in the desert they have no material things. But since it is easier and quicker to sin in thought than in deed, the mental battle is more severe than the one waged through material things. The mind is something extremely swift and uncontrollable, prone to sinful imaginings.

9. We are not commanded to work ceaselessly, to stay awake (not to sleep), or to fast (not to eat), but we are commanded to pray unceasingly. For those ascetic practices aimed at healing the lustful part of the soul require the body in order to be active, and the body, without support, cannot endure ceaseless labor and deprivation. But prayer purifies and strengthens the mind for battle; the mind is created to pray even without this body and to wage war against demons in defense of all the powers of the soul.

10. When the demons waging war against the lustful part of the soul show us, in our sleep, encounters with acquaintances, feasts with relatives, a chorus of women, and other such things—the very things on which lust usually feeds—and we become carried away by them, it means that we are afflicted by this part of ourselves, and this passion is strong within us. But when they take possession of our irritable part, they force us (in our sleep) to walk along terrifyingly precipitous places, and they bring upon us armed men, or poisonous snakes and carnivorous beasts. If now (in a dream) we are terrified by those places and, pursued by beasts and people, take to flight, then we must take care of our irritable part and, invoking Christ the Lord during our waking hours, make use of the remedies indicated earlier.

11. Natural bodily movements in a dream, without shameful fantasies, indicate that the soul is, in a certain sense, healthy; whereas the interweaving of such fantasies is a sign that it is sick. Know, moreover, that the vision of indistinct faces points to the remnants of a long-standing passion, while the vision of distinct faces points to new wounds of the heart.

12. We shall determine the signs of dispassion by day through our thoughts, and by night through our dreams. We shall call dispassion the health of the soul, and self-control its nourishment, because it alone usually unites us with the holy powers, since union with the incorporeal is possible only when we are in harmony with them.

13. There are two peaceful states of the soul: one is the result of the depletion and drying up of natural juices, and the other occurs when demons withdraw. The first is accompanied by humility and contrition of heart—tears and boundless devotion to God—while the second is followed by vanity and pride, which take hold of the monk after the other demons have departed. Whoever keeps within the bounds of the first state will more readily recognize demonic attacks and schemes.

14. The demon of vanity is opposed to the demon of lust, and for both of them to attack the soul together is an impossibility, for one of them promises honor, while the other plunges one into dishonor. Therefore, when any one of them approaches and begins to trouble you, generate within yourself the thoughts of the demon opposed to it; and if you are able, as the saying goes, to drive out a wedge with a wedge, then know that you are close to the limits of dispassion, for your mind has proven strong enough to drive out demonic suggestions with human thoughts. But of course, to drive away a thought of vanity through humility, or a thought of lust through chastity, would be a sign of the deepest dispassion. Try to act this way toward all demons that are opposed to one another. At the same time, you will discover which passion fills you most. However, ask God with all your strength to teach you and help you drive away your enemies in a second way.

15. The more a soul prospers, the stronger its adversaries become. I do not think that the same demons always remain with it. Those who keenly observe the temptations that assail them know this best, seeing that their usual dispassion is shaken more strongly than before by new demons, the successors of the former ones.

16. Perfect dispassion arises in the soul upon overcoming all the demons that oppose an active life; imperfect dispassion, however, is when the soul, by its own strength and without making concessions, still struggles against the demon attacking it.

17. The mind will not pass through, will not safely traverse that path of passions (trials), and will not enter the realm of the incorporeal unless it puts its inner self in order. This internal disorder will inevitably turn it back toward those from whom it originated.

18. Both virtues and vices blind the mind: in the case of the former, it fails to see vices; in the case of the latter, it fails to see virtues.

Sayings of the Holy Elders

1. It is necessary to inquire about the paths followed by the elders of old and to guide oneself along them. One can find much that they have said and done well. One of them says that constant dry fasting, practiced with love, quickly leads a monk to the haven of dispassion. He also freed a brother, who was troubled by dreams at night, from them by commanding him to visit the sick while fasting. For, he said in response to a question on this matter, nothing extinguishes the passions as effectively as charity.

2. One of the wise men of that time approached the righteous Anthony and said: “How do you endure, Father, such a life, deprived of the comfort that books provide?” He replied: “My book, O philosopher, is this created nature. It is always with me, and whenever I wish, I can read the words of God in it.”

3. Once, a chosen vessel, the Egyptian elder Macarius, asked me: “What is the reason that, when we hold a grudge against people, we disrupt the soul’s power of remembrance⁶¹, yet when we hold a grudge against demons, we suffer no harm?” When I, at a loss for an answer, asked him to explain this to me, he said: “It is because the former is contrary to nature (the irritable faculty), while the latter is in accordance with it.”

4. Once, during the intense midday heat, I came to the holy Father Macarius and, burning with thirst, asked him for a drink of water. But he said: “Be content with the shade, for many travelers and sailors at this time are deprived even of that.” Later, when I brought up the subject of self-restraint in connection with this incident, he said: “Believe me, my son, for twenty whole years I have not allowed myself to have my fill of bread, water, or sleep. I ate my bread by weight and drank water by measure, and, leaning against a wall, I would catch a little sleep.”

5. A monk⁶² received news of his father’s death, but he said to the one who brought him the news: “Stop blaspheming, for my Father is immortal.”

6. A brother once asked an elder if he should eat with his mother and sisters when he returned home. The elder replied, “Do not eat with a woman.”

7. One brother had only the Gospel, but later he sold even that, gave the money to feed the hungry, and uttered these memorable words: “I have sold the very word that tells me, ‘Sell your possessions and give to the poor’ (Matt. 19:21).”

8. Near Alexandria, at the northernmost part of the bay called Mary’s Bay, there is an island where a monk lived who was most experienced in spiritual matters. He said that whatever monks do, they do for five reasons: for God’s sake, out of natural necessity, out of custom, out of need, and for the sake of manual labor. He also said that virtue is essentially one, but it takes on different forms in the powers of the soul, just as sunlight has no shape of its own but usually takes the shape of the openings through which it passes.

9. Another monk said: “I deprive myself of pleasures in order to cut off the causes of anger. For I know that anger always stirs up strife over pleasures, disturbing the mind and driving away knowledge.” One of the elders said that love does not know how to preserve stores of bread or money. He also said: “I do not know of any instance where the demons have deceived me twice in the same matter.”

⁶¹ In the “Valuable Sayings”: we lose our remembrance of God.

⁶² According to Palladius—Evagrius himself. But Evagrius here quotes the sayings of earlier elders, not his own.

10. It is impossible to love all the brothers equally, but one can treat everyone impartially, being free from ill will and hatred. After God, we must love most of all the priests, who purify us through the Holy Mysteries and pray for us; as for our elders, we must honor them as angels. But for now, let this be said to you by me, beloved brother Anatoly: this is how much we have found and gathered from the branches of our vine, ripening by the grace of the Holy Spirit. If, however, the sun of righteousness continues to shine upon us and the grape becomes fully ripe, then we will drink from it the wine that “gladdens the heart of man” (Ps. 103: 15), through the prayers and supplications of the righteous Gregory, who planted me, and of the venerable Fathers here who nourish me, and by the power of Christ Jesus our Lord, who restores me, to whom be glory and power forever and ever. Amen.

3. The monastic treatise by Evagrius, in which he teaches how one ought to strive and observe silence

1. It is written in Jeremiah: “And you shall not take a wife for yourself in this place. For thus says the Lord concerning the sons and daughters born in this place: they shall die of a painful death” (16:1, etc.). This passage points to the same truth that the Apostle speaks of: “A married man is concerned with worldly matters, how to please his wife... And a married woman is concerned with worldly matters, how to please her husband” (1 Cor. 7:33–34), if we understand that the Prophet is not speaking only of those sons and daughters who are born of marital life when he says: “They will perish by a painful death,” but also of the sons and daughters born in the heart—that is, of carnal thoughts and desires—since they, too, die in the painful, feeble, and enfeebled reasoning of this world and do not attain heavenly and eternal life. “But the unmarried,” it says, “is concerned with the things of the Lord, how to please the Lord” (1 Cor. 7:32), and always produces evergreen and immortal fruits of heavenly life.

2. Such is the monk, and such a monk ought to be—that is, that by separating himself from a wife, he may not father sons or daughters in the aforementioned place; and not only that, but that he may also be a soldier of Christ, not attached to material things, free from cares, and alien to the thoughts and deeds of this restless world, as the Apostle says: “No one serving as a soldier gets entangled in civilian affairs, but strives to please his commanding officer” (2 Tim. 2:4). In these things, above all, let the monk abide, having left behind all the things of this world and striving for the beautiful and good trophies (signs of victory) of silence. How beautiful and good is the struggle in silence—how truly beautiful and good! “His yoke is easy and His burden is light” (Matt. 11:30): sweet is the life, pleasant is the deed.

3. Do you wish, my beloved, to truly embrace the life of solitude and strive for the rewards of silence? Leave behind worldly cares, with their principles and powers; that is, be as if you were immaterial, dispassionate, and free from all desire, so that, being free from the restless vicissitudes associated with them, you may remain in silence. For if anyone does not detach himself from all this, he will not be able to lead this kind of life properly. Choose food that is simple, easily obtained, and requires little effort to prepare, rather than food that is varied and leads to distraction. If a thought of sumptuous dishes comes to you—as if out of a love of novelty—dismiss it, paying it no heed whatsoever. For through this the enemy will tempt you, tempting you to turn you away from silence. You have the Lord Jesus in the person of Martha, rebuking the soul that is anxious about these things and saying, “You are anxious and troubled about many things. “One thing is needed” (Luke 10:41)—namely, to listen to the word of God; the rest will follow without difficulty. That is why He immediately adds: “But Mary has chosen the good part, which will not be taken away from her” (42). You also have the example of the widow of Zarephath, who showed hospitality to the Prophet (1 Kings 17:10). Even if you had only a single loaf of bread and some water, you could still properly perform the act of hospitality with them and receive a reward for it. But even if you lacked these things, simply welcome the traveler with a willing heart and speak a kind word to him; in this way, you can still earn the reward for hospitality. For it is said: “A kind word is better than a gift” (Sirach 18:16–17).

4. You must also reflect on almsgiving. Do not desire to have wealth in order to distribute it to the poor. For this, too, is a snare of the evil one, who often comes in the guise of vanity and plunges the mind into restless (busy) pursuits. In the Gospel of the Lord Jesus, you have the widow who has received a good testimony, who with two mites surpassed the will and power (the worth of the offerings) of the rich. “For,” said the Lord, “they all gave out of their abundance into the treasury, but she out of her poverty put in all she had” (Luke 21:4). As for clothing, do not desire to have extra garments; provide for yourself only those that are sufficient to meet this bodily need. “Cast your burden upon the Lord” (Ps. 54: 23), and He will provide for you. “For He cares for us,” says the Word of God (1 Pet. 5: 7). If you are in need of food or clothing, do not be ashamed to accept them if others offer them to you . For this is a form of pride. Even if you yourself have an abundance of these things, give to those who do not have them. God wants His children (or servants) to manage their household affairs (or finances) in this way. That is why the Apostle, writing to the Corinthians, speaks of those who suffer want in their necessities: “Your abundance in these things is their lack, and their abundance will be your lack, so that there may be equality, as it is written: ‘He who has much has not increased, and he who has little has not decreased’” (2 Cor. 8:14–15). Therefore, having what you need for the present, do not worry about the future—about tomorrow, for example, or the next week, or the next month, or the next year. When tomorrow comes, that time itself will provide you with what you need, if you seek first the kingdom of heaven and God’s righteousness. For the Lord says: “Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things will be added to you” (Matt. 6:33).

5. Do not take in a young servant, lest the enemy use him to set up some temptation and disturb your mind with concerns about fine food, for then you will no longer be able to care for yourself alone. Let this thought (of having a young disciple) come to you as a means of physical comfort (as if it were necessary), but seek what is better—that is, spiritual peace—for spiritual peace is by far better than physical comfort. Even if the thought suggests that this must be done for the boy’s benefit, do not believe it: for this is not our concern, but that of the other holy fathers living in the monastery. Be concerned only with your own benefit, observing the rule of the silent life as it should be. Do not love to live with people who are worldly and restless. Either live alone, or with brothers who are detached from worldly things and of one mind with you. One who lives with people who are attached to worldly things and full of cares will, of course, become involved in their cares and begin to engage in worldly customs, empty talk, and all other evil deeds—anger, sorrow, unbridled attachment to worldly things, fear, and turmoil. Do not allow yourself to be distracted by parental concerns and family ties. Refrain from frequent visits with them, lest they rob you of your cell’s silence and drag you into their usual troubles. “Leave,” says the Lord, “the dead to bury their own dead; but you, come after Me” (Matt. 8:22). Even if the cell in which you live is full of noise, flee; do not spare it either, lest you be led astray by your love for it. Thus, do everything and strive for everything so that you may attain silence, freeing yourself from all things, and focus on one thing alone: how to abide in God’s will and successfully wage war against the unseen forces.

6. If it is impossible for you to maintain true silence in your own country, resolve to find silence in a foreign land and direct all your thoughts toward this end. Be like a shrewd merchant, trying everything to secure true silence for yourself and accepting whatever is necessary and beneficial for that purpose. Moreover, I tell you, love the life of a pilgrim, for it frees you from the hardships that are inevitable in your own country, and it alone allows you to taste all the blessings of the silent life. Avoid staying in the city and sit patiently in the wilderness. “For,” says Saint David, “I fled far away and took up residence in the wilderness” (Ps. 54:8). If possible, do not go into the city at all; for there you will see nothing wholesome, nothing useful, and nothing conducive to the ascetic life you have chosen. “I have seen,” says the same saint again, “iniquity and strife in the city” (Ps. 54:10). Seek out secluded and undisturbed places, and do not be afraid to settle there. Even if you see demonic apparitions there, do not be frightened and do not flee from this field of labor, which is our salvation. Endure without fear, and you will behold the greatness of God (Exod. 14:13), His intercession, His protection, and every other sign of salvation. “I wait,” says that blessed man, “for God to save me from faintheartedness and from the storm” (Ps. 54:9). Do not let the desire to go out for entertainment overcome your resolve (to live in silence). For such wandering, driven by lust, corrupts a mind that is free from malice (1 Thess. 4:12). Many temptations arise from this. Fear falling into sin and remain steadfast in your cell.

7. If you have friends, avoid meeting with them frequently. Seeing them at long intervals will be more beneficial both for you and for them. But if you feel that they are causing you any harm, do not go near them at all. You should have friends who are beneficial to you and who support your way of life. Avoid meeting with deceitful and unrighteous people; do not live with any of them, and reject their wicked proposals: for they do not serve God nor live for His sake. Let your friends be peace-loving men, spiritual brothers, and holy fathers. For the Lord called such people by this name, saying: “My mother, and my brothers, and my sisters are those who do the will of my Father in heaven” (Matt. 12:50, Mark 3:35). Do not associate with the restless and the fussy, and do not go to their meals, lest they draw you into their deceptions and lead you away from the discipline and art of the silent life; for they have such a passion (to entice). Do not incline your ear to their words, and do not accept the designs of their hearts. For they are truly harmful. Let your soul rest with the faithful of the earth, and let your heart ache in sympathy with their weeping, following the example of David, who says : “My eyes are on the faithful of the earth, that they may dwell with me” (Ps. 100: 6). If anyone walking in the way of God’s love comes to you and invites you to partake of bread and salt, and you wish to go, go; but return quickly to your cell. If possible, never spend the night outside your cell, so that the grace of silence may always remain with you and you may perform the cell ministry you have established without hindrance.

8. Do not indulge your craving for fine foods, nor be enticed by the allure of luxurious pleasures; for, as the Apostle says, “she who lives in luxury is already dead” (1 Tim. 5:6). Do not fill your stomach with food from others, lest you become addicted to it and get into the habit of frequently dining out. For it is said: “Do not be enticed by the fullness of the stomach” (Prov. 24:15). If you find that you are often called out of your cell, refuse, for being outside the cell too often is harmful. It robs you of grace, clouds your thoughts, and extinguishes the warm desire (to dwell in silence with God). Consider wine: if it stands undisturbed in one place for a long time, it settles well, becoming clear and fragrant; but if it is moved from place to place, it becomes cloudy, dark, and unpleasant to the taste because of the sediment and yeast that have risen to the surface. Comparing yourself to it, try to be like it in the first case: cut off contact with many people, so that your mind is not scattered by thoughts and your silence is not disturbed. Take up some kind of craft and devote yourself to it, if possible, day and night, so that not only will you not be a burden to anyone, but you will also be able to provide for others, as St. Paul the Apostle commands (2 Thess. 3:12, Eph. 4:28). In this way, you will overcome the demon of despondency and cut off all other enemy temptations. For the spirit of despondency usually attacks the idle person, of whom the Wise One says that he “lives in idleness” (Prov. 13:4). You cannot avoid sin in giving and receiving. Therefore, whether you sell or buy, accept a small loss compared to the true value, so that, in seeking the true value, you do not get carried away by the schemes of the greedy and fall into deeds harmful to the soul—greed, perjury, breaking your word, and thereby not dishonor or bring shame upon the honorable dignity of our calling. Keeping this in mind, conduct yourself with caution in your giving and receiving⁶³. If, however, you wish to choose the better path—and this is possible for you—entrust the care of yourself to another, a faithful person, so that, having thus become serene (free from vexing cares, at peace within yourself), you may then live a good and joyful life, filled with hope.

9. The rule of silence obliges you to such wholesome deeds. I will now suggest to you other things that must also be observed within it. Listen to me, then, and put into practice what I command you. Sitting in your cell, recall the day of your death; imagine the lifelessness of your body at that time; picture the extreme state (in which your soul will find itself); and be deeply moved by this. In this way, you will strengthen within yourself a contempt for the vanity that disturbs the world, kindle love for the humble lot you have chosen for yourself, and yearn steadfastly and unceasingly to remain in your silence. Recall, too, the present condition of the souls in hell. Consider what it is like for them there—in what bitter silence, in what agonizing groans, in what fear and dread as they await the Last Judgment—what their ceaseless mental anguish is like, and what their boundless tears are like. Remember also the Day of Resurrection and the standing before God. Imagine that dreadful and terrifying judgment; bring to mind what awaits sinners there—shame before the face of God and His Christ, before the Angels, archangels, the powers, and before all people; picture all the torments—eternal fire, the worm that never sleeps, Tartarus, darkness—and above all this, the gnashing of teeth, fears, and agonizing sufferings. Also bring to mind the blessings reserved for the righteous: the bold communion with God the Father and His Christ, with the angels, archangels, powers, and the entire host of saints; the kingdom with its treasures, joy, and delight. Bring both of these to mind. And for the fate of sinners, groan and weep; clothe yourself in the garment of lamentation, fearing as it were that you yourself might be among them; but for the blessings prepared for the righteous, rejoice, exult, and be glad. Strive to be made worthy of these (blessings) and to avoid those (torments). See to it, then, that you never forget this—whether you are in your cell or elsewhere—and do not let this thought slip from your mind, so that, at least through this, you may avoid impure and destructive thoughts.

10. Let your fasting be as much as your strength allows before the Lord. It will purify your sins and transgressions, make your soul dignified and noble, sanctify your mind, drive away demons, and bring you closer to God. Once you have eaten once a day, do not desire to eat again, so as not to have too many needs and not to disturb your mind. From this, you will always have something to use for acts of charity, and your bodily passions will be put to death. But if the brothers happen to be present and you need to eat a second or third time, do not frown or be disheartened, but rather rejoice that you were able to serve the brothers' needs. For when you eat a second or third time, give thanks to God that you have fulfilled the law of love, and that because of this, God Himself will be the Guardian of your life. It happens that sometimes illness strikes, and physical weakness requires you to eat twice, three times, or even many times; do not be troubled by such thoughts. For there is no need to strictly observe the ascetic practices of our life even during illness, but in some cases to make concessions so that you may recover your health as quickly as possible and resume the same ascetic labors. As for which foods to abstain from, the Word of God has not forbidden eating anything, but has declared: "I have given you everything, like the green plants. Eat, and do not be in doubt" (Gen. 9:3; 1 Cor. 10:25, 27). And again: "What goes into the mouth does not defile a person" (Matt. 15:11). Therefore, abstaining from certain foods should always be a matter of our own free will and a voluntary act of the soul.

11. Endure sleeping on the bare ground, vigils, and all other hardships willingly, looking forward to the glory that is to be revealed to you with all the saints. "For the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that is to be revealed to us," says the Apostle (Rom. 8:18). When you begin to lose heart, pray as it is written (James 5:13), but pray with fear and trembling, with a sorrowful heart, soberly and alertly. We must pray in this way, especially for the sake of our malicious and cunning invisible enemies, who are always attempting to hinder us in this endeavor. When they see us standing in prayer, they swiftly approach us and plant in our minds things we should not recall or think about during prayer, in order to take our minds captive and render our supplications and prayers fruitless, vain, and useless during the time of prayer. For prayer, supplication, and petition are vain and useless when, as has been said, they are not offered with fear and trembling, nor with sobriety and alertness. If, when approaching a king or any person, everyone presents their petition with fear and trembling and with full attention, should we not all the more stand before God, the Lord of all, and Christ, the King of kings and Lord of lords, in the same manner and offer our prayers and supplications to Him in the same way? To our God be glory forever and ever. Amen.

7. On the Eight Thoughts, to Anatolius

1. There are eight principal thoughts from which all other thoughts arise. The first is gluttony, followed by fornication; the third is greed, the fourth is sorrow, the fifth is anger, the sixth is despondency, the seventh is vanity, and the eighth is pride. Whether these thoughts trouble the soul or not does not depend on us, but whether they remain within us for a long time or not, whether they set the passions in motion or not—that depends on us.

2. The thought of gluttony urges the monk to abandon his ascetic practice as soon as possible, presenting him with images of illnesses of the stomach, liver, or spleen; dropsy or some other prolonged illness; a scarcity of medical supplies; and a lack of doctors. At the same time, it brings to mind certain brothers who had indeed suffered from such illnesses. Sometimes the enemy even inspires the afflicted brothers themselves to go to the fasting monks and tell them what happened to them, adding that it was caused by overly strict abstinence.

3. The demon of fornication stirs up carnal lust and violently attacks those who practice abstinence, so that they may cease their abstinence, thinking that it brings them no benefit. Defiling the soul, he compels it to engage in such acts and makes it seem as though it is speaking and hearing certain words, as if the act itself were taking place before its eyes.

4. Greed implies advanced old age, inability to work with one’s hands, hunger, illness, the sorrow of poverty, and the hardship of having to accept from others what is necessary for bodily needs.

5. Sorrow sometimes arises from the deprivation of what is desirable, and sometimes accompanies anger. When it arises from the deprivation of what is desirable, it occurs as follows: certain thoughts come to mind in advance and remind the soul of home, loved ones, and its former way of life. When they see that she does not resist but follows them and mentally indulges in those pleasures, then, seizing her, they plunge her into sorrow—both because those objects do not exist and because, according to the established order of life, they cannot possibly exist. And the poor soul—the more passionately she had given herself over to her initial thoughts, the more she is struck and crushed by the second.

6. Anger is the swiftest of passions. It springs into action and flares up against the one who has wronged, or who seems to have wronged. It embitters the soul more and more; especially during prayer, it seizes the mind, vividly presenting the face of the one who has caused sorrow. It happens that sometimes, having taken root in the soul and turned into enmity, it causes nighttime anxieties, physical torment, the terrors of death, and attacks by venomous reptiles and beasts. These four phenomena, which arise from the formation of enmity, are accompanied by many thoughts, as any observer will find.

7. The demon of despondency, also called the “midday demon” (Ps. 90:6), is the heaviest of all demons. It attacks the monk around the fourth hour (which is ten in the morning by our reckoning) and torments his soul until the eighth hour (two in the afternoon), and at first compels him to observe with displeasure that the sun moves slowly, or does not move at all, and that the day seems to have become fifty hours long. Then he compels him to glance out the window frequently, or even to leave his cell—to look at the sun to see how much time remains until nine o’clock—and in doing so, he does not fail to prompt him to look here and there to see if any of the brothers are present. At the same time, he stirs up resentment in him toward the place, toward the very way of life, and toward his manual labor, adding that love among the brothers has dried up and there is no one to comfort him. If, in those days, someone had offended the monk, the demon brings this to mind as well to increase his resentment. Then it leads him to desire other places where it is easier to find what is necessary to meet his needs by taking up a trade that is less difficult but more profitable. To this it adds that pleasing the Lord does not depend on one’s location; God can be worshiped anywhere. It links this to memories of family and former contentment, and here it prophesies a long life, paints a picture of the hardships of asceticism, and employs all manner of tricks so that the monk will finally leave his cell and flee from the path of asceticism. Another demon does not immediately follow this one. But whoever fights and prevails will, after the struggle, experience a certain state of peace, and the soul will be filled with inexpressible joy.

8. The thought of vanity is the most subtle. It appears before those who live virtuously and begins to proclaim their feats and gather praise for them from people, depicting how the cast-out demons scream, how women are healed, how crowds of people jostle to touch his garments; finally, it predicts the priesthood for him, leads him to the doors of those seeking him, who, upon his refusal, carry him away bound against his will—and thus, having stirred up empty hopes within him, departs, leaving him to be tempted further either by the demon of pride or by the demon of sorrow, who immediately instills in him thoughts contrary to those hopes. It happens that he hands this man—who until recently was a venerable and holy priest—over to the demon of fornication.

9. The demon of pride is the cause of the soul’s most disastrous downfall. He instills in it the refusal to acknowledge God as its Helper, but rather to attribute its own righteousness to itself, and to look down on its brothers as ignorant, because not everyone thinks the same way about it. Pride is followed by anger and sorrow, and the ultimate evil—mental delirium and madness, and the vision of many demons in the air.

8. His thoughts on this subject, combined with the treatise on the eight thoughts

1. There are five practices through which God’s favor is obtained. The first is pure prayer; the second is singing psalms; the third is reading the Holy Scriptures; the fourth is reflecting with contrition on one’s sins, on death, and on the Last Judgment; the fifth is manual labor.

2. If you wish to serve God in the flesh, just as the incorporeal beings do, strive to keep prayer constantly hidden in your heart. For in this way, even before death, your soul will draw near to the likeness of the angels.

3. Just as our body, when separated from the soul, becomes dead and foul-smelling, so too is the soul in which prayer does not dwell dead and foul-smelling. But that the absence of prayer must be considered more bitter than any death is clearly taught to us by the Prophet Daniel, who was ready rather to die than to deprive himself of prayer at any hour. One must remember God more often than one breathes.

4. Accompany every inspiration with a sober invocation of the name of Jesus and a humble meditation on death. Both of these actions bring great benefit to the soul.

5. Do you wish to be known by God? Make sure that you are as little known to people as possible. If you always remember that God is the Witness of everything you do, in soul and body, then you will not sin in any matter, and you will have God as your Companion.

6. Nothing makes a person more like God than doing good deeds for others. But when performing acts of kindness, one must be careful in every way not to turn them into a means of self-promotion.

7. Ultimately, what will make you worthy of God is if you do nothing unworthy of Him.

8. You will glorify God most beautifully when, through virtue, you imprint His likeness upon your soul.

9. People become better when they draw closer to God.

10. A wise person who honors and worships God is recognized by Him. Therefore, he is not the least bit troubled if he remains unknown to all people. The task of prudence is to stir up that part of the soul where anger resides to wage an inner battle. The task of wisdom is to stir the mind to constant, attentive vigilance. The task of truth is to direct that part in which desire resides solely toward virtue and toward God. Finally, the task of courage is to govern the five senses and not allow them to defile our inner self—that is, the spirit—or our outer self—that is, the body.

11. The soul is a living, simple, incorporeal substance, invisible to the physical eye, as well as immortal and endowed with intellect and reason. Just as the eye is to the body, so is the intellect to the soul.

12. Among the rational creatures that exist under heaven—some fight, others defend, and still others attack. People fight, the angels of God defend, and the unclean forces attack. But it is not because of any lack on the part of those who defend, nor because of any excess of strength in those who attack, but because of the carelessness of those who struggle that the knowledge of divine things and of God Himself does not take root within us.

13. Evil is not, in itself, a substance, but rather the absence of good: just as darkness is nothing other than the absence of light.

14. Simplicity is not very cautious or prudent, and those who are free and safe from evil do not suspect it.

15. In truth, debauchery is senseless, and one can think of nothing that might prompt dissolute people to come to their senses.

16. Pure and blessed souls are remarkably perceptive; they immediately recognize the devil and drive him away, even though he is otherwise very cunning and extremely malicious in his attacks.

17. Nothing pleases God more than self-denial of the flesh.

18. One of the Holy Fathers said that whoever cannot embrace the strict and arduous monastic life may attain salvation by other means. If they have faith in the monks, comfort them, and provide for their needs, then this, among other things, will be one of the most important deeds leading to their salvation.

19. Spend the night in prayerful labor, and your soul will soon find comfort.

20. Engage in reading with a calm spirit, so that your mind may be constantly drawn to the contemplation of God's wondrous works, as if lifted up by a hand reaching out to it.

21. Sleeping during the day indicates either a physical illness, or despondency of the soul, or its carelessness, or inexperience.

22. Every soul, through the grace of the Holy Spirit and through its own labor and diligence, can gather and combine within itself the following qualities: speech with wisdom (perhaps eloquence combined with intellectual cultivation), action with contemplation, virtue with knowledge, faith with understanding free from all forgetfulness—and in such a way that none of these qualities is greater or lesser than the others. For then it is united with the true and good God, and with Him alone.

23. There are eight thoughts from which every sin arises: for those who lead a solitary life—thoughts of despondency, vanity, pride, stinginess, and sorrow; and for those who live under the authority of others (in monastic communities)—gluttony, anger, and fornication.

11. On Various Sinful Thoughts, Chapter⁶⁴

1. Among the demons who oppose an active life, the first to take up arms are those entrusted with lusts or the cravings of gluttony, those who instill in us the love of money, and those who incite us to seek human glory. All the others, following behind them, take in turn those whom they have already wounded. For one cannot fall into the clutches of fornication unless one has first fallen from gluttony; one cannot be overcome by anger unless one stands and fights for food, money, or glory; one cannot escape the demon of sorrow unless one has suffered some loss in all this; nor can one avoid pride—that first offspring of the devil—unless one has uprooted “the root of all evil—the love of money” (1 Tim. 6: 10), for, in the words of the wise Solomon, “Poverty humbles a man” (Prov. 10:4), and, to put it briefly, a person cannot fall prey to any demon unless he has first been wounded by these primary ones. Why, then, did the devil present these three thoughts to the Savior: the first, when he asked that stones be turned into bread; the second, when he promised even the whole world if He, having fallen, would worship him; and the third, when he assured Him that if He obeyed him, He would be glorified by suffering no harm, having thrown Himself from such a height (from the church’s roof). But the Lord, rising above all this, commanded the devil to depart, thereby teaching us that we cannot drive the devil away unless we despise these three thoughts.

2. All demonic thoughts introduce images of sensory things into the soul, and the mind, having received their imprint, turns them over within itself. Consequently, by the subject of the thought, one can recognize which demon has approached us: for example, if the face of someone who has harmed me or dishonored me appears in my thoughts, this reveals that the demon of rancor has approached; if, on the other hand, money or fame comes to mind, one cannot fail to recognize, by this subject, who is troubling us; likewise, with other thoughts, by their subject you can determine who stands before you and instills them. I am not saying, however, that all memories of these things come from demons, because the mind itself, when a person sets it in motion, usually reproduces images of what has been; but only those memories come from demons that simultaneously arouse irritation or desire, which is unnatural. Because these forces are disturbed, the mind engages in mental fornication and quarrels, and is no longer able to hold within itself thoughts of God, its Lawgiver, since this radiance (i.e., undisturbed contemplation of God) appears in the sovereign mind only when thoughts that revolve around worldly matters during prayer are suppressed.

3. Chapter 63 on the Active Life, addressed to Anatolius.

4. On “Dreams.” It is worthy of investigation how demons imprint and reproduce images in our sovereign mind through sleep-induced visions. Something similar usually happens to the mind (even while awake) when it either sees with the eyes, hears with the ears, or perceives something from the outside through some other sense, and retains it in memory; and memory, setting in motion what it has received through the body, brings these images into the ruling mind. Thus, it seems to me that demons (in dreams) introduce images into the mind by setting memory in motion, because the sense organs are kept inactive by sleep at that time. But the question arises again: how do they set memory in motion? Is it through the passions? Yes, (if we consider passionate dreams), and this is evident from the fact that the pure and dispassionate do not experience anything of the sort. But there is also a simple (dispassionate) movement of memory, originating from ourselves or from the holy powers, through which (it seems that) we converse and dine with the saints. However, one must bear in mind that just as the soul perceives certain images through the body, so too does memory reproduce them without the body (that is, with or without passion). The same thing happens during sleep, when the body is at rest. For just as one can think of water both when thirsty and when not thirsty, so too can one think of gold both with greed and without greed. The same applies to other objects as well (both in waking life and in sleep). And when the mind encounters (or becomes aware within itself during sleep) such and such dreams, recognize in this distinction the malice of the demons (who seek our ruin in everything). It is also necessary to know that demons make use of external things to produce dreams, for example, the sound of waves when someone is swimming.

5. Our irritability, when stirred up contrary to its natural disposition, greatly contributes to the manifestations of demons and proves very useful for all their evil schemes. That is why not one of them refrains from provoking it day and night. But when they see that it is restrained by meekness, they try in advance to loosen it under some seemingly righteous pretexts, so that, once it becomes strained, it may become susceptible to the arousal of their beastly thoughts. That is why, whether for just or unjust causes, we must not allow her to be provoked, so as not to thus place a dangerous sword in the hands of those who instill evil in us—which, as I know, many do for the most trivial reasons, becoming more inflamed than is proper. Tell me, then, why do you so quickly find yourself in a state of strife, if you have renounced food, money, and glory? Why do you feed the dog, having vowed to possess nothing? If it barks and lunges at people, it is clear that you harbor something within and wish to preserve it. I am certain that such a person is far from pure prayer, knowing that anger is the destroyer of such prayer. Moreover, I am amazed at how he has forgotten the saints: David, who cries out, “Cease from anger and forsake wrath” (Ps. 36: 8), and Ecclesiastes, who commands: “Put away wrath from your heart, and cast away deceit from your flesh” (Eccl. 11:10), and the Apostle, who commands us to lift up “holy hands without anger or doubt” at all times and “in every place” (1 Tim. 2:8). The ancient custom—to drive dogs out of the house during prayer—teaches us precisely this, for it implies that there should be no anger in those who pray. One of the pagan sages even claimed that the gods do not partake of bile or thigh meat, though he himself did not understand, I think, what he was saying: for I believe that bile is a symbol of anger, and thigh meat—of bestial lust. As for the idea that one should not concern oneself with clothing or food, I think it is superfluous even to write about it, since the Savior Himself forbids this in the Gospels, saying: “Do not worry about your life, what you will eat or what you will drink, or what you will wear” (Matt. 6:25). For this is fitting for pagans as unbelievers who reject Divine Providence and deny the Creator, but it must be completely foreign to Christians, since they have once and for all come to believe that even two sparrows sold for a single assarius are under the care of the holy angels. Meanwhile, it is the custom of demons, following impure thoughts, to instill thoughts of excessive worry, so that Jesus might be led astray from the “people” of thoughts “existing in” the mind, and so that the word, suppressed by anxious thoughts, might remain “barren” (Matt. 13: 22). Having cast them aside, let us “cast our cares upon the Lord” (Ps. 54:23) and be “content with what we have” (Heb. 13:5), so that, by living a frugal life and wearing humble clothing, we may, day by day, cast off these sources of vanity. Whoever feels ashamed to wear humble clothing should look to St. Paul, who endured “cold and nakedness” (2 Cor. 11:27), inspired by the certain hope of receiving “the crown of righteousness” (2 Tim. 4:8). But since St. Paul called this world a spectacle and a race (1 Cor. 9:24), let us see whether it is possible for one who is burdened with thoughts of “striving toward the honor of the higher calling” (Phil. 3:14) of God and to fight against the powers, the principalities, and the rulers of the darkness of this age (Eph. 6:12)? I, at least, do not affirm this, having been taught by this very sensational story (by what happens in the theaters), because this (fighter) will certainly be hindered by his clothing, which entangles him, just as anxious thoughts entangle the mind—if the saying is true that the mind remains inseparably with its treasure. For it says: “Where your treasure is, there your heart will be also” (Matt. 6: 21).

⁶⁴ This treatise is included in the works of St. Nilus. But since there are chapters among these that are word for word similar to chapters in other treatises by Evagrius, it is reasonable to believe that this treatise, like the others, was included in St. Nilus’s work by mistake. The compilers of Dobrotolyubie evidently took it from the complete collection of Evagrius’s writings.

6. Among thoughts, some strike, while others are struck down; sometimes the good are struck down by the evil, and sometimes the evil are struck down by the good. The Holy Spirit heeds the firstborn thought (which takes precedence and dominance) and judges or accepts us according to it. What am I saying? This is what it is! I have a certain thought, for example, hospitality, and I have it for the Lord’s sake; but when the tempter comes, it is cut down by the fact that he inspires me to practice hospitality for the sake of glory. And again, I have a thought of hospitality to appear good before people, but when a better thought comes along, it is transformed by that thought, which directs our virtue more toward the Lord and compels us to do it not for the sake of people. Thus, if in our very deeds we ultimately remain with our first thoughts—being tempted by the second only in that regard—then we will receive our reward based on those first-born thoughts alone; for as human beings and as those engaged in a struggle against demons, we do not have the strength to always keep a righteous thought uncorrupted, —just as, conversely, an evil thought cannot remain within us without there being an attempt to resist it with a good thought, because within us there are seeds of virtue (which cannot be stifled). However, if any of these competing thoughts takes hold, it takes the place of the one being tempted (that is, it completely supplants the first thought), and the person begins to act, driven finally by this thought.

7. As we have learned through long observation, the difference between angelic thoughts, human thoughts, and those that come from demons is as follows: Angelic thoughts seek to understand the nature of things and explore their spiritual significance—such as: for what purpose was gold created, and why is it scattered like sand in distant parts of the earth, where it is sought out with great effort and toil? how, once found, it is washed with water and subjected to fire, and thus comes into the hands of artisans who fashion from it for the Tabernacle a lampstand, a censer, “cups and bowls” (2 Chr. 4:21), from which, by the grace of the Savior, the king of Babylon no longer drinks (Dan. 5:3). Cleopas, however, brings a heart set ablaze by these mysteries. The demonic mind knows nothing of this and does not seek to understand it, but only shamelessly instills a desire for the acquisition of sensual gold and foretells the pleasure and glory that are to come from it. But the human mind seeks neither acquisition nor is it curious about what gold symbolizes; rather, it introduces into the thought a single simple image of gold, without passion or greed. A similar line of reasoning must be applied to other objects as well, if anyone were to secretly exercise their mind according to this model.

8. There is a thought that may rightly be called a wanderer. It appears to the brethren mostly in the early morning and leads the mind from city to city, from town to town, from house to house; at first it engages in simple conversation, and then, after engaging in lengthy conversations with certain acquaintances, it corrupts its own state; in accordance with the qualities of those it has met, it gradually drifts away from the awareness of God and virtue and forgets its calling and vow. Therefore, the hermit must watch out for this demon, observing where he comes from and where he settles, for it is not by chance or accident that he makes such a wide circuit, but does so with the intention of disrupting the hermit’s state, so that the mind, inflamed by all this and intoxicated by many conversations, may immediately fall prey to the demon of lust, or anger, or sorrow, which most severely damage the clarity of his disposition. But if we intend to understand more clearly the wiles of this demon, we will not suddenly contradict him, nor will we immediately reveal (to the fathers) how he mentally constructs conversations within us and by what means he gradually drives the mind into the realm of death; for he will immediately flee at this, not tolerating that anyone see how he does all this, and thus we will learn nothing of what we wished to know. But it is better to allow him, on the second or third day, to carry out his drama to the end, so that, having learned his cunning twists and turns with precision, we may then put him to flight with a single word of rebuke. But since during the time of temptation the mind is sometimes agitated and fails to see clearly what is happening within us, once the devil has departed, here is what you must do: Sit down and reflect on your own what happened to you—where you began and where you went, at what point you were seized by a spirit of lust, or sorrow, or anger, and how everything else unfolded afterward: examine all of this and commit it to memory, so that when it comes again, you will be able to expose it; note even the very place it hides in, and you will no longer follow in its footsteps. After this, if you wish to drive it to fury, expose it immediately as soon as it appears, and name the first place you entered (mentally, during your first tempting wandering), then the second and the third, for it becomes greatly irritated, unable to bear being put to shame. The proof that it is timely (beneficial) to address him in this way is that the thought will flee from you, for it is impossible for him to stand firm in the face of such a clear exposure. The defeat of this demon will be followed by a deep sleep, numbness of the eyelids accompanied by great chill, excessive yawning, and heaviness in the shoulders—all of which the Holy Spirit dispels through fervent prayer.

9. Hatred of demons greatly aids us in our salvation and is very useful in the practice of virtues; yet we are unable to cultivate it within ourselves as some kind of good quality, because the spirits of sensuality dispel it within us and again call the soul to fellowship and familiarity with them. But the Physician of souls heals this fellowship—which is worse than gangrene that is difficult to cure—by abandonment, allowing us to suffer something terrible from them both night and day. As a result, the soul returns to its original (normal) hatred of them, learning to speak to the Lord with the words of David: “With perfect hatred I have hated them; they were my enemies” (Ps. 138: 22). For he hates his enemies with perfect hatred who sins neither in deed nor in thought—which is a sign of the greatest and first (as it was in Adam) dispassion.

10. As for the demon that renders the soul insensitive, is there even any need to speak of him? I, at least, am afraid to write about him. For just as the soul departs from its own nature, so he takes hold of it, casting aside both the fear of God and all reverence, does not regard sin as sin nor lawlessness as lawlessness, remembers the dreadful judgment and eternal torment as mere (empty) words, and mocks that fiery, truly earth-shattering upheaval—and though he confesses God, he does not wish to know His commandments. You beat your breast when she moves toward sin, and she feels nothing; you speak to her from the Scriptures, and she, as if blinded, does not see, and, as if deaf, does not hear; you present to her the reproach of others, yet she attaches no importance to it, nor does she feel shame before them—just like a pig that, having closed its eyes, broke through its own fence. This demon is incited by thoughts of vanity, if we allow them to take root within us for too long; and because of it, “unless those days had been cut short, no flesh would have been saved” (Matt. 24:20). It is one of the demons that rarely attacks the brethren (i.e., the Kinovites, those living in community). The reason for this is obvious, for at the sight of others’ misfortunes—whether someone is struck by illness or struck down by sudden death—he immediately flees, since the soul, filled with compassion at such times, is overcome with contrition, and the blindness imposed upon it by the demon falls from its eyes. We (hermits) are deprived of this, due to the desert and the rarity of the infirm among us. Providing a means to put this particular demon to flight, the Lord in the Gospels commanded us to visit the sick and to visit those in prison, when He says: “I was sick, and you visited Me; I was in prison, and you came to Me” (Matt. 25:36). At the same time, it is important to know that if any of the hermits, having been attacked by this demon, did not entertain lustful thoughts or abandon his dwelling out of despondency, this means that he has received from heaven the patience and chastity bestowed upon him. Blessed is he who has been deemed worthy of such dispassion! As for those who, having vowed to live an ascetic life in reverent service to God, prefer to settle among the laity, let them beware of this demon. But I am ashamed even before people to speak or write any more about him.

11. On the spirit of sorrow. All demons teach the soul to love pleasure; the demon of sorrow alone does not do this, but rather disturbs the thoughts of those entering the desert, cutting off all spiritual pleasure and drying up the soul with sorrow, for “the bones of a sorrowful man are parched” (Prov. 17:22). Attacking with moderation, however, he makes the hermit well-trained: for he inclines him to despise all the goods of this world and to turn away from every comfort. But when he torments him long and intensely, he then gives rise to thoughts that advise the hermit to destroy his own soul, or compel it to flee far from that place; having entertained such thoughts, Job once suffered while being tormented by him, for he said: “If it were possible, I would kill myself, or I would beg another to do so for me” (Job 30:24). The symbol of this spirit is the viper, whose venom, when administered in small quantities, neutralizes other poisons, but when taken in excess, kills the living creature that ingests it. Paul delivered the lawless man in Corinth to this demon; that is why he soon wrote to them again, saying: “Restore him to full fellowship, so that he may not be overwhelmed by excessive sorrow” (2 Cor. 2:7–8). Thus, this spirit that torments people is also the cause of true repentance. That is why St. John the Baptist called those whom he had rebuked and who had fled to God “brood of vipers,” saying: “Who warned you to flee from the coming wrath? Bear fruit worthy of repentance, then, and do not begin to say to yourselves, ‘We have Abraham as our father.’ For I tell you that God is able to raise up children for Abraham from these stones” (Matt. 3:7–9). However, anyone who, following the example of Abraham, left his homeland and his family (Gen. 12:1), thereby became stronger than this demon.

12. Whoever has conquered anger has conquered the demons; but whoever has become a slave to it is alien to the monastic life and far from the ways of our Savior, for the Lord, as it is said, teaches the meek His ways (Ps. 24: 9). That is why the minds of the hermits are so elusive—they flee to the valley of meekness. For the demons fear no other virtue nearly as much as meekness. That great Moses, called “meek,” possessed it more than any other man (Num. 12:3). And St. David spoke of it, saying that it is worthy of God’s remembrance, when he said: “Remember, O Lord, David and all his meekness” (Ps. 131: 1). But the Savior Himself commanded us to imitate His meekness, saying: “Learn from Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls” (Matt. 11:29). But if anyone abstains from food and drink yet stirs up anger within himself through evil thoughts, he is like a ship crossing the sea with a demon at the helm. Therefore, to the best of our ability, we must keep an eye on this dog of ours and train him so that he torments only the wolves and does not bite the sheep, showing all gentleness toward all people (Titus 3:2).

13. On vanity. Of all thoughts, only the thought of vanity is multifaceted, encompassing almost the entire universe and opening the doors to all demons, like some evil traitor to a city. It robs the hermit’s mind and, filling it with a multitude of words and things, destroys his prayers, through which he strives to heal the wounds of his soul. This thought is fostered by all the demons who have already been defeated; through it, they gain entry into the soul once more, thus making “the last the first” (Luke 11: 26). From this thought is born the thought of pride, which cast down from heaven to earth “the seal of likeness and the crown of goodness” (Ezek. 28: 12). But turn away from it, without becoming entrenched in it, lest we betray our lives to others and make our lives unmerciful (Prov. 5:9). Earnest prayer puts this demon to flight, as does refraining from doing or saying anything of one’s own accord that leads to accursed vanity.

14. When the mind of a hermit has acquired a measure of detachment, he then, mounting the steed of vanity, begins to gallop through the cities, reveling uncontrollably in his own praise and glory. But, by God’s providence, the spirit of waywardness meets him and, confining him to some stable, teaches him this: not to leave his bed before he has recovered, and not to imitate those impatient patients who, while still harboring remnants of their illness, set out on a journey or begin to visit the baths, and thereby relapse into their former ailments. Therefore, while sitting in our cell, let us pay closer attention to ourselves, so that, by excelling in virtue, we may become unshakable in the face of evil; by being renewed in knowledge, we may be deemed worthy of a multitude of diverse contemplations; and, by rising in prayer, we may more clearly behold the light of our Savior.

15. I am unable to describe all the demonic wickedness, and I am ashamed to enumerate all their evil schemes, fearing even for the simplest of my readers. However, listen to the wicked schemes of the spirit of fornication. When someone attains a certain dispassion in the lustful sphere, and his foul thoughts grow somewhat cold, then it introduces (into his thoughts) men and women and presents them playing with one another, making the hermit a spectator of their shameful acts and bodily movements. But this temptation is not one of those that take root (in the mind), because attentive prayer and an extremely austere diet, combined with vigil and practice in spiritual contemplation, drive it away like a cloud without water. But it happens that this deceiver even touches the flesh, stirring up in it an irrational decay, and devises thousands of other schemes, which need not be made public or committed to writing. A surge of anger directed at the demon behind these thoughts is a powerful remedy against them, for the demon fears this anger greatly when it flares up in response to such thoughts, since it thereby disrupts all his schemes. And this is the meaning of the words: “Be angry and do not sin” (Ps. 4:5). A beneficial remedy applied to the soul during times of temptation. The demon of anger imitates this demon by presenting (in the mind’s visions) to the hermit the image of one of his parents, friends, or relatives suffering wrongs at the hands of insignificant people, thereby stirring up his anger and prompting him to say something malicious or to act against those who appear to him in his mind (as the offenders). One must be mindful of this and quickly root out such imaginings, lest, by becoming entrenched in them, they become a smoldering ember during prayer. Such temptations most often afflict hot-tempered people, who are easily incited to act (against others) and who are far from pure prayer and from the knowledge of our Savior Jesus Christ.

16. The Lord has entrusted the thoughts of this age to man, as a good shepherd does to his sheep, giving him desire and fury as helpers, so that with fury he might put the thoughts of wolves (demonic ones) to flight, and with his desire, he might love the sheep (good thoughts) with all his heart and tend them, enduring time and again the winds and rains that knock him off his feet. He also gave him the law on how to tend the sheep, and “a place of rest and still waters” (Ps. 22: 2), and a psaltery and a lyre, and a staff and a rod (and decreed) that from this flock (and pastures) he should feed himself and clothe himself, and gather “mountain hay” (Prov. 27: 25). “For who,” he says, “tends a flock and does not eat the milk of the flock?” (1 Cor. 9:7). Therefore, the hermit must watch over this flock day and night, so that no offspring (of the sheep—a lamb) is snatched away by wild beasts or falls into the hands of robbers; and if such a thing happens somewhere in the wilderness, he must immediately rescue (the captive) from the mouth of a lion or a she-bear (1 Sam. 17:34, 35). There are also thoughts that are like ravenous beasts: thoughts about a brother, if they dwell within us with hatred; thoughts about a woman, if they revolve within us with shameful lust; thoughts about silver and gold, if they take root with greed; and even thoughts about holy gifts, if they dwell in the mind with vanity. The same must be said of other thoughts, if they are carried away by passions. One must not only guard [one’s flock] by day, but also watch over it at night, staying awake. For it happens that some, lost in shameful and deceitful reveries, lose what is theirs. This is what St. James meant when he said: “I have not brought you any of the sheep that were torn by wild beasts; I myself have made up for them—the ones stolen by day and the ones stolen by night. I was in the scorching heat by day and in the cold by night, and sleep fled from my eyes” (Gen. 31: 39–40). If despondency befalls us from overwork, then, having taken refuge in the rock of knowledge, let us begin a conversation with the Psalter, striking the strings of knowledge with virtues. Let us, then, tend the sheep once more beneath Mount Sinai, so that the God of our fathers may call us out of the bush (Ex. 3:1, 4) and grant us the power of signs and wonders.

17. Christ awakens the rational nature, which has been deadened by sin, (to repentance) through the contemplation of all ages (that is, the past, the present, and, above all, the future), and His Father resurrects this soul—which is dying through Christ’s death (turning away from sin in baptism or repentance)—resurrects through the knowledge of Himself. And this is precisely what the Apostle Paul meant when he said: “If we have died with Christ, we believe that we will also live with Him” (Rom. 6:8).

18. When the mind, having cast off the old man, is clothed in the one who is of grace, then during prayer it will behold its own nature, like a sapphire or a heavenly flower, which Scripture also calls the place of God, as the elders saw on Mount Sinai (Ex. 24: 10).

19. Among the unclean demons, some tempt a person as a human being, while others disturb a person as a speechless animal. The former, upon coming, instill in us thoughts of vanity, or pride, or envy, or condemnation, which do not concern any of the speechless creatures, while the latter, when they approach, stir up anger or lust contrary to their nature, for these passions are common to us and to the irrational, and are hidden from us beneath our rational nature (i.e., they lie below it, or beneath it). Why, then, does the Holy Spirit, referring to the thoughts that occur in people as human beings, say: "I said: 'You are gods, and all of you are sons of the Most High; yet you die like mortals, and fall like one of the princes'" (Ps. 81: 6–7)? But considering the thoughts that move within a person, as in a speechless being, what is there to say? "Do not be like a horse or a mule, which have no understanding; you must bridle their jaws with a bit and a bridle, lest they come near you" (Ps. 31: 9).

20. When an enemy comes and strikes you, and you wish, as it is written, to turn his sword against his own heart (Ps. 36: 15), then do as we tell you. Analyze within yourself the thought he has planted in you: who it is, what it consists of, and what exactly in it strikes the mind. What am I saying? Here is what it is. Let the thought of the love of money be sent to you by him. Break it down into the mind that received it, into the thought of gold, into the gold itself, and into the passion for money. Finally, ask: what of all this is sin? Is it the mind? But how can it be the image of God? Or is it the thought of gold? But who, possessing a mind, can say this? Is not gold itself, then, the sin? But why, then, was it created? Thus, it remains to attribute the sin to the fourth (that is, to the passion for money), which is neither a thing independent in its essence nor a concept of a thing, but rather a certain misanthropic delight, born of free will and compelling the mind to misuse God's creatures for evil purposes—a delight that God's law commands us to suppress. When you examine this, the thought will vanish, having been broken down into what it truly is, and the demon will flee as soon as your mind is uplifted by sorrow, inspired by such insight. But if you do not wish to turn his own sword against him, and instead desire first to strike him down with your sling, then take a stone from your shepherd's bag, and enter into this contemplation: how is it that angels and demons are drawn to our world, while we are not drawn to theirs? For it does not occur to us to bring the angels any closer to God, nor to make the demons any more impure. Also (and meditate on this), how "the morning star, rising in the morning, will fall to the earth" (Isaiah 14: 12), "and the sea is like a boiling cauldron, and the abyss of Tartarus like a captive; it sets the abyss ablaze like a furnace of bronze" (Job 41: 22–23), stirring up everyone with his malice and desiring to rule over all? Contemplation of these matters greatly wounds the demon and puts his entire host to flight. But such action is possible only for those who have purified themselves to some extent and perceive, to some degree, the causes of what has come to pass. But the impure are unable to maintain such contemplation; even if they have been taught by others to cast spells, they will not be heard when, during the inner battle, dust rises like a pillar within them and everything is in turmoil because of their passions. For it is absolutely necessary for the entire host of foreign invaders to stand still so that a single Goliath may step forward against our David. Likewise, in the case of other impure thoughts, we will employ both the (previously mentioned) analysis of the thought and this (second) form of battle.

21. When any impure thoughts flee too quickly, let us seek the reasons why this happened. Whether it is due to the rarity of such things—that is, because the object of the thought is difficult to attain—or to the dispassion inherent in us, the enemy was unable to do anything to us. For example, if one of the hermits imagines that he has been entrusted with the spiritual governance of the foremost city and does not dwell on such fantasies, it is obvious that this is due to the first reason (the unattainability of the object); but if someone dreams of becoming the ruler of some city (and consequently the matter is quite likely to come to pass), and he also regards the thought (with contempt), then this blessed one is imbued with dispassion. Likewise, with other thoughts, it will become clear (why the thoughts fled so quickly) if we apply the same method of examination. We need to know this to invigorate our zeal and efforts, for through this we will learn whether we have crossed the Jordan and are near the "city of palm trees" (Deut. 34:3), or whether we still dwell in the wilderness and are being attacked by foreigners. The demon of avarice, it seems to me, is highly skilled and inventive in his deceptions. Often, having been driven to the extreme of renouncing everything, he takes on the guise of a steward and a lover of the poor; he warmly welcomes travelers who do not even exist, sends what is needed to others in need, visits the city's dungeons, ransoms those who are being sold, attaches himself to wealthy women, and tells them whom they should show compassion toward, while to others, whose hearts are already full, he instills a renunciation of the world; and in this way, little by little, having beguiled the soul, he burdens it with thoughts of greed and leads it into vanity. He leads many to praise the Lord for such actions of the hermit, while causing some to quietly discuss the priesthood among themselves; he foretells the death of the current priest and adds that the hermit himself cannot escape (election), no matter what he does to prevent it. Thus, the poor mind, entangled in such thoughts, argues with those who do not accept him; to those who do accept him, he eagerly distributes gifts and, with gratitude, warmly receives them; but he hands over some of the stubborn (opponents) to the judges and demands that they be expelled from the city. Meanwhile, as such thoughts swirl within, the demon of pride appears, furrows the air of the cell with frequent flashes of lightning, sends in winged serpents, and—as the ultimate evil—robs one of one’s mind. But let us pray that such thoughts may vanish, and let us strive, in a spirit of gratitude, to live in harmony with our meager circumstances. “For we brought nothing into this world, and it is clear that we can take nothing out of it; but if we have food and clothing, with these we will be content” (1 Tim. 6:7–8), remembering what St. Paul went on to say: “The love of money is the root of all kinds of evil” (6:10).

22. All impure thoughts take root in us because of the passions that plunge the mind into ruin and destruction. For just as the thought of bread becomes ingrained in the hungry person because of hunger, and the thought of water in the thirsty person because of thirst, so too do thoughts of money and shameful thoughts arising from abundant food become ingrained in us because of (corresponding) passions. Something similar is revealed with regard to thoughts of vanity, as well as other thoughts. But it is impossible for a mind overwhelmed by such thoughts to stand before God and be adorned with the crown of righteousness. That threefold-sinful mind was consumed by these thoughts; according to the Gospel parable, it refused the supper of the knowledge of God (Luke 14:18–20). Likewise, the one bound hand and foot and cast into utter darkness wore a garment woven from these very thoughts, which the Inviter deemed unworthy of the wedding feast (Matthew 22:11–13). The wedding garment is the dispassion of the rational soul that has renounced worldly desires. As for the reason why thoughts of sensual things that linger within us for a long time corrupt our knowledge, this is discussed in the chapters on prayer.

23. Among the demons who oppose the active life, there are three principal ones, followed by the entire host of these foreign invaders, who stand at the forefront of the battle and, through impure thoughts, entice the soul into sin: first, those entrusted with the desire for gluttony; second, those who instill the love of money; and third, those who urge us to seek human glory. Therefore, if you desire pure prayer, guard yourself against anger; if you love chastity, restrain your stomach by not allowing it to be sated with bread and by afflicting it with scarcity of water. Be vigilant in prayer and cast resentment far from yourself; may the words of the Holy Spirit never fail you, and may you knock at the door of Scripture with the hands of virtue. Then dispassion of the heart will shine within you, and you will see your mind shining like a star in prayer. The selection from St. Nilus of Sinai extends up to Chapter 27. We will include those as well. The preceding 23 chapters comprise his 24 chapters.

24. When the demon of gluttony, after frequent and intense struggles, is unable to undermine your established self-restraint, he then instills in your mind a desire for the strictest asceticism; to this end, he brings to mind the story of Daniel—that meager life and the seeds (which served as his sole food) (Dan. 1:16), reminds him of certain other hermits who always lived this way—even in their early days—and compels him to imitate them, so that, in pursuing excessive abstinence, he may fail to achieve even moderate abstinence when his body, due to its weakness, proves incapable of it. I believe it is right not to heed such suggestions and not to deprive oneself of bread, oil, and water. For the brethren have learned through experience that such a diet is the very best, provided one eats and drinks only sparingly and once a day. And it would be surprising if anyone, eating and drinking to their fill, could attain the crown of dispassion. By “detachment,” I do not mean abstaining from sinful deeds—for that is called “abstinence”—but rather the cutting off of passionate thoughts from the heart, which St. Paul called the “spiritual circumcision of the inner Jew” (Rom. 2:29). If anyone’s spirit falters upon hearing such words, let him recall the “chosen vessel” (Acts 9:15), the Apostle who completed his course amid hunger and thirst. The spirit of despondency also imitated this demon; this enemy of the truth instills in the patient soul the thought of retreating into the deepest wilderness, urging him to emulate John the Baptist and the first hermit—Anthony—so that, unable to endure the long-term and superhuman solitude, he would flee in shame, abandoning his place; and this one, boasting afterward, would say, “I have been strengthened by him” (Ps. 12: 5).

25. Same as Chapter 68—Evagrius the First.

26. Demons do not know our hearts, as some people think. For the Knower of Hearts alone “knows the human mind” (Job 7:20) “and has formed their hearts alone” (Ps. 32:15). But whether from the words we speak or from certain bodily movements, they discern many of the stirrings that take place in the heart. Suppose, for example, that in conversation we denounce those who have slandered us. From these words, the demons conclude that we regard them with hostility, and they take this as an opportunity to instill in us evil thoughts against them ; once we accept these thoughts, we fall under the yoke of the demon of malice, and this demon then ceaselessly stirs up vengeful thoughts against them within us. Therefore, the Holy Spirit rightly rebukes us, saying: “While sitting, you slandered your brother, and you set a snare for your mother’s son” (Ps. 49:20)—that is, you have opened the door to thoughts of malice and disturbed your mind during prayer by constantly picturing the face of your enemy, thereby treating him as a god. For whatever the mind constantly fixates on during prayer must rightly be acknowledged as a god. Therefore, let us avoid the disease of slander; let us not speak ill of anyone or distort our faces when recalling any neighbor. For evil demons watch our every movement with curiosity and leave nothing unexamined that might be used against us—whether rising, sitting, standing, our actions, our words, or our gaze—they are curious about everything, “learning from us all day long with flattery” (Ps. 37: 13), so that during prayer they may shame the humble mind and extinguish its blessed light.

12. Sayings of Abba Evagrius the Monk⁶⁵

1. Abba Evagrius said: Avoid conversation about worldly matters, so that your mind may not be disturbed and your rule of silence may not be broken.

2. He also said: It is very important to pray without distraction, and even more so to sing (psalms) without distraction.

3. He also said: Always remember your final destination; do not forget the eternal judgment, and you will preserve your soul from every sin.

4. He also said: If there were no temptations, no one would be saved.

5. Abba Evagrius said: The beginning of salvation is self-reproach.

6. He also said: “If you fall into despondency, pray—but pray with fear and trembling; pray earnestly, with alertness, and with a clear mind.”

7. At the beginning of his monastic life, Abba Evagrius went to a certain elder and said to him, “Abba! Give me a word that saves the soul.” The elder said to him, “If you want to be saved, then whoever you go to, do not speak until he asks you, “⁶⁶ ”

8. Once, for some reason, there was a gathering in the cells, and Abba Evagrius was speaking there. A presbyter said to him, “We know, Abba, that if you were on your own side, you could have been a bishop long ago and presided over many, but now you sit here as a stranger.” Abba Evagrius, though moved by this, was not flustered; nodding his head, he said, “That is true, Father, but ‘I have spoken once, and I will not speak a second time’ (Job 39:35).”

9. Evagrius says in his Gnostics: We have learned from the righteous Gregory that there are four principal virtues: prudence (fronesis), courage, chastity, and justice. The task of prudence, he said, consists in contemplating the intelligent holy powers; the task of courage is to stand firm in the truth and, even if opposition arises, not to turn toward what is false; having received the seeds from the first farmer, to turn away from the sower (the enemy) is, in his view, characteristic of chastity⁶⁷. And the work of justice is to give each person their due.

10. In the same work, he says: the pillar of truth, Basil of Cappadocia, says: knowledge that comes from people is perfected through constant study and practice, while that which comes from grace is perfected through truth, meekness, and mercy; the former can be acquired even by passionate people, but the latter can be received only by the dispassionate, who during prayer behold the light that illuminates their minds.

11. He also said there: Serapion, the angel of the Church of Tmuita, said that the mind is purified by delighting in spiritual knowledge, love heals anger, and self-restraint curbs lust and desire.

⁶⁵ From the Memorable Tales, the Collection of His Eminence Ignatius, and the Alphabetical Paterikon.

⁶⁶ For the scholar Evagrius, this was no small feat.

⁶⁷ From the parable: the sower is the devil.

12. Furthermore, Didymus said: “Constantly converse with yourself about Providence and judgment, and strive to keep these matters in mind. Providence is especially evident in lifting us from sin and ignorance to virtue and knowledge.”

Volume II

Preface

In selecting the articles for this volume, it was necessary to follow the order of the Greek Dobrotolubie. This is what has been done. Having selected from St. Cassian—who was omitted previously—specifically his ascetic teachings, while omitting his monastic rule, we present the ascetic instructions of the Venerable Hesychius of Jerusalem and Nilus of Sinai. But here we had to stop following the Greek Dobrotolubie; for it omits many holy ascetic Fathers—the foremost interpreters of the ascetic life from its primarily inner perspective—such as St. Ephrem the Syrian, John Climacus, Barsanuphius, and John, Abba Dorotheus, and Isaac the Syrian. To deprive our collection of their teachings would be a great injustice. That is why we have decided to draw upon them. Including the writings of these Fathers in their entirety would be inappropriate, and there is no pressing need for it, since all of them have already been translated into Russian. They have all been translated; but not everyone has them at their fingertips. In our desire to overcome this obstacle and convey the holy teachings of these Fathers to all souls who thirst for them, we have selected from them what is most essential for the spiritual life, confident that here, not infrequently, a single word can replace entire volumes. St. Cassian served as a guide in selecting these excerpts; having set the purification of the heart from passions as the goal of asceticism, he directed all his ascetic discourses toward this end. The excerpts from his writings were compiled with this in mind; it also guides the arrangement of the material taken from St. Nilus of Sinai; it determined the selection from St. Ephrem; and it guided the inclusions from St. Barsanuphius and John, St. Abba Dorotheus, and St. Isaac the Syrian, although the contributions from the latter three are not indicated by separate headings. Thus, the entire second volume of our Dobrotolyubie will constitute a collection of the godly teachings of the Fathers, primarily concerning the struggle against the passions for the purification of the heart—the ultimate goal of asceticism.

Editor's Note for the HTML Version (2005)

The main text of the second through fifth volumes of *Dobrotolyubie has been edited to bring it in line with modern Russian spelling and pronunciation. Quotations from Holy Scripture have been left unchanged. Their meaning can be clarified, if necessary, by referring to the modern Russian edition of the Old and New Testaments. The distinction in the spelling of the words “mir” (society, sometimes—the created universe as a whole), “mir” (peace, order, harmony), and “mvpo” (a fragrant mixture for sacred anointing) has also been left unchanged.

Saint John Cassian the Roman

A Brief Account of Him

St. John Cassian the Roman was born (around 350–360), likely in the region of Gaul, near Marseille, to noble and wealthy parents, and received a good scholarly education. From a young age, he loved the God-pleasing life and, burning with the desire to attain perfection in it, set out for the East, where he entered the Monastery of Bethlehem and took monastic vows. There, having heard of the glorious ascetic lives of the Egyptian Fathers, he wished to see them and learn from them. To this end, having agreed with his friend Herman, he set out for Egypt around the year 390, after a two-year stay at the monastery in Bethlehem. They spent seven full years there, living in sketes, cells, monasteries, and among hermits in seclusion; they observed everything, studied it, and practiced it themselves; and they became thoroughly acquainted with the ascetic life there, in all its nuances. They returned to their monastery in 397; but in the same year they set out again for the same Egyptian desert regions and remained there until 400. Leaving Egypt this time, St. Cassian and his friend traveled to Constantinople, where they were warmly received by St. Chrysostom, who ordained St. Cassian as a deacon and his friend, as the elder of the two, as a priest (in the year 400). When St. Chrysostom was sentenced to exile, his loyal followers sent (in 405) several intercessors to Rome to Pope Innocent regarding this matter, among whom were St. Cassian and his friend. This mission came to nothing. After this, St. Cassian did not return to the East, but went to his homeland, where he continued his ascetic life according to the Egyptian model; he became renowned for both the holiness of his life and his wisdom as a teacher, and was ordained a priest. Disciples began to gather around him one after another, and soon they formed an entire monastery. Following their example, a women's monastery was established nearby. In both monasteries, the rule was adopted according to which monks lived and found salvation in Eastern—and especially Egyptian—monasteries. The reorganization of these monasteries in a new spirit and according to new rules, along with the evident successes of those who labored there, attracted the attention of many hierarchs and abbots of monasteries in the Gallic region. Wishing to establish such practices in their own monasteries, they asked St. Cassian to write for them Eastern monastic rules that would reflect the very spirit of asceticism. He willingly fulfilled this request, setting forth everything in 12 books of decrees and 24 discourses. St. Cassian passed away in 435. His feast day is celebrated on February 29. From these ascetic writings of St. Cassian, the former Dobrotolyubie included eight books (5–12) on the struggle against the eight principal passions and one (the second) discourse on reasoning—both in abridged form. We, too, follow this example. The main texts included will be the eight books on the struggle against the passions, in the most complete translation, with the addition in some places of passages from the treatises and the dialogues where appropriate. But in addition, we have deemed it necessary to place before them several excerpts from the dialogues, which demonstrate the significance of the struggle against the passions in the spiritual life, or its place in the course of asceticism; clarify the necessity of this struggle; and present a general outline of the passions and the struggle against them; and following these, to append further excerpts describing two other struggles—namely, the struggle against thoughts and the sorrow arising from misfortunes and calamities—as a supplement to the previous description of the struggle against the eight thoughts. At the very end, necessary instructions on several subjects are appended; although these address the spiritual life in general, they are closely related to the spiritual struggle, namely: on grace and free will, as the agents in the formation of the spiritual life; on prayer, in which they converge; on the degrees of perfection in the spiritual life, according to the motivations for it; and on the conclusion of penitential labors. – Why do these additions not prevent us from titling all the excerpts from the writings of St. Cassian as follows: “An Overview of the Spiritual Struggle”? Thus, the excerpts from St. Cassian will be organized under the following headings:

1. The Purpose and Goal of Asceticism.
2. In view of this goal, we must also determine what our renunciation of the world should be like.
3. The Struggle Between the Flesh and the Spirit.

7. The struggle against all kinds of afflictions.

An Overview of the Spiritual Struggle

1. The Purpose and End of Asceticism

1. All sciences and arts have their own purpose (scopton) and their own end (telos)—and with these in mind, a diligent lover of the arts willingly endures all toil and expense. So the farmer, enduring now the heat, now the cold, tirelessly plows and loosens the soil, having as his “purpose” to clear it of all foreign debris and make it more fertile; convinced that otherwise he will not attain his “end,” that is, a bountiful harvest, to sustain himself and increase his wealth. So too, our asceticism has its own purpose and its own end, for the sake of which we tirelessly and joyfully undertake all labors, —for the sake of which the meager fare of fasting does not weigh us down, the weariness from vigils brings us joy, the constant reading of the Scriptures with reflection knows no satiety, and we are not daunted by ceaseless labor, nor by being stripped of everything and living in poverty in all things, nor even by the horrors of this boundless wilderness.

2. The end of our ascetic life is the Kingdom of God, and the goal is purity of heart, without which it is impossible to attain that end. With our gaze fixed on this goal, we must direct our course as straight as possible, as if along a straight line; and if our thoughts stray from it even slightly, we must immediately return to contemplating it and correct them, as if following a standard.

3. This is what St. Paul teaches when he says to those who have taken upon themselves the good yoke of Christ: “You bear fruit in holiness, and the end is eternal life” (Rom. 6:22). By this he is saying, as it were: your goal is purity of heart, and the end is eternal life. Therefore, whatever can lead us toward this goal—that is, purity of heart—we must pursue with all our strength, and whatever distracts us from it, we must avoid as destructive and harmful. For it is for this purpose that we undertake and do everything; for this purpose we leave behind our parents, our homeland, our positions, our wealth, the joys of this world, and all pleasures—so that we may safely maintain the constant purity of heart. If, therefore, we always keep this goal in mind, then all our actions and thoughts will be directed straight toward its attainment. But if it does not remain constantly before our eyes, then all our labors and efforts, not being directed toward this one thing, will be expended in vain.

4. Therefore, we must do everything and desire everything for the sake of this purity; for its sake, we must go into the desert, fast, keep vigils, labor, practice bodily poverty, read Scripture, and cultivate other virtues—that is, to make our hearts free from any destructive passions and to keep them that way. We ought to undertake fasting, vigils, solitude, and the study of Scripture for this primary goal—that is, purity of heart—and because of them, we must not allow ourselves to disturb this chief virtue. For when this principal virtue remains preserved and unharmed within us, there will be no harm if, in any case, we are compelled by necessity to omit any of the aforementioned ascetic practices; but if we persevere in all of them while violating this one, there will be no benefit in it; for everything must be done for its sake. These deeds are not perfection itself, but rather means to perfection. Therefore, it would be in vain for anyone to labor who, content with them alone as if they were the “supreme good,” were to stop the striving of his heart at them, rather than extending it until he reaches the end for which they themselves are desirable.

2. With this goal in mind, we must also determine what form our renunciation should take

1. There are three kinds of renunciation of the world: the first is that in which we physically abandon all the riches and possessions of the world; the second is that in which we abandon our former habits, vices, and passions, both spiritual and physical; the third is that in which, turning our minds away from all that is present and visible, we contemplate only the future and desire what is invisible. The Lord commanded Abraham to accomplish all three of these renunciations together when He said to him: “Go forth from your land, and from your kindred, and from your father’s house” (Gen. 12:1): “from your country,” that is, from worldly wealth and earthly possessions; “from your kindred,” that is, from your former way of life, former habits, and vices, which, having clung to us from birth, are as close to us as blood relatives; “from your father’s house,” that is, from every memory of the world and everything in it that meets our eyes. This happens when, having died with Christ to the elements of the world, we look, according to the Apostle, no longer at what is seen, but at what is unseen; “For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal” (2 Cor. 4:18)—and, having departed in our hearts from this temporary and visible home, we turn our eyes and minds to that home in which we are to dwell forever; —when “though we walk in the flesh, we do not wage war according to the flesh” in the Lord (2 Cor. 10:3), proclaiming through our deeds and our lives the blessed Apostle’s words: “Our citizenship is in heaven” (Phil. 3:20).

2. It will be of little benefit to us if, having made the first renunciation with all the warmth of faith, we do not carry out the second with the same zeal and fervor—so that, having thus succeeded in attaining this as well, we may also attain the third, in which, having left the house of our former father according to the old self, we direct the gaze of our mind entirely toward the heavenly. Therefore, if we wish to attain true perfection, we must strive to leave behind—just as we have physically left our parents, our homeland, our wealth, and worldly pleasures—all of these things in our hearts as well, and never again turn our desires toward what we have rejected with contempt: just as the Israelites, led out of Egypt, who, after tasting the heavenly manna, longed for the unclean and vile foods of Egypt, saying, “It was good for us in Egypt, when we sat by the pots” (Exod. 16: 3; Num. 11:5). And anyone who, having renounced the world, returns to former cares and is carried away by former desires, speaks in deed and thought the same thing as they did: “It was good for me in Egypt” (the world). Merely leaving the world behind in body, and merely moving away from this “Egypt,” will be of no benefit to us if we are likewise unable to attain renunciation of the heart, which is higher and more beneficial. Regarding that renunciation which we have called bodily, this is what the Apostle proclaimed: “If I give away all my possessions, and if I surrender my body to be burned, but have no love, I gain nothing” (1 Cor. 13:3). That is to say, even if I renounce everything to the point of leaving nothing for myself, and add to this total self-giving the martyrdom and burning of my own flesh—so that I may give up my body for Christ—yet if I am impatient, angry, envious, or proud, if I am inflamed by the offenses of others or seek my own interests, if I dwell on what is evil, or if I bear everything that is done to me with impatience and reluctance—then my renunciation and the burning away of the outer self will be of no benefit to me, since the inner self is still burdened by the same old passions.

3. Therefore, with all earnestness, we must hasten to ensure that our inner self, too, casts off and dispenses with all the wealth of passions it has accumulated in its former life—passions which, clinging to the body and soul, are essentially our own; and if, while we are still in this body, they are not cut off and cast aside, they will not cease to accompany us even after death. For just as virtues—or love itself, which is their source—when acquired in this age, make their lover beautiful and radiant even after the end of this life; so too do vices, having covered the soul with repulsive hues, carry it, stained by them, into that eternal abode. The beauty or repulsiveness of the soul arises from the nature of virtues or vices, from which a certain hue is drawn that makes it either so radiant and beautiful that it becomes worthy to hear the prophetic word: “The King will desire your goodness” (Ps. 44: 11)—or so utterly black, foul, and hideous that it itself, confessing the stench of its own corruption, will say: “My wounds have become foul and festering because of my folly” (Ps. 37: 6). Therefore, they (virtues and passions) are, in fact, our true wealth, which remains inseparable from the soul, and which no king can give us, nor any enemy take from us. They are, in fact, our true wealth, which even death itself is powerless to tear away from the soul. (To disperse the evil wealth of the passions means to put them to death—which cannot be achieved without struggling against them. This is why those who have renounced the world inevitably face a struggle with the passions, which they must undertake from the very beginning. St. Cassian offers general reflections on this struggle in his Conversations—the fourth, “On the Struggle Between the Flesh and the Spirit,” and the fifth, “On the Eight Principal Passions”—and provides, in particular, a detailed description of the struggle against each of the eight principal passions in the books of his Orders. – We will draw on the most essential points from all of this.)

3. The Struggle Between the Flesh and the Spirit

1. There is a conflict within our members, as we read in the Apostle: “The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are opposed to one another, so that you do not do what you wish” (Gal. 5:17). By God’s providential design, it has, as it were, become ingrained in our very nature. And can it be regarded as anything other than a natural attribute of human nature after the fall of the first man, if it is common to all without exception? We must, however, believe that it exists within us by God’s will, for our good and not for our harm, since it is natural to all. It has been left within us to stir up in us a zeal for the highest perfection.

2. The word “flesh” in this passage should not be understood in the sense of a human being as a creature, but in the sense of the carnal will, or evil desires; likewise, the word “spirit” should not be understood as referring to any personal being, but to the good and holy desires of the soul. The Apostle himself defined this meaning, saying: “Walk by the Spirit, and do not gratify the desires of the flesh; for the flesh lusts against the Spirit,” and so on (ibid., vv. 16–17). Since both kinds of desires exist within the same person, a constant internal struggle rages within us. Whereas the lust of the flesh, which primarily seeks what is sinful, finds pleasure solely in what pertains to the satisfaction of the needs of this present life; the spirit, on the contrary, desires entirely to cling to spiritual matters, setting aside even the most necessary needs of the flesh, and wishes to devote itself exclusively to those alone, without giving even the slightest thought to this mortal flesh. The flesh delights in abundance and all manner of pleasures; the spirit takes no pleasure even in attending to matters of natural necessity. The former desires to be sated with sleep and filled with food; for the latter, vigils and fasting are so nourishing that he would not even allow himself sleep or food in the amount necessary for life. The former desires to abound in all manner of riches; the latter is not satisfied even with having a small amount of bread for daily consumption. She desires to live in luxury and be surrounded by a crowd of flatterers; for him, a harsh life and the vastness of an inaccessible desert are more delightful, and the presence of mortals is not pleasant. She is captivated by human honors and praise; for him, persecution and insults are a source of joy.

3. When our will is guided by self-love and worldly wisdom, it devises a certain middle ground—one worthy of every condemnation—between these two inclinations, seeking to abstain from carnal passions in such a way as to avoid, at the same time, the hardships that are inevitable when fulfilling the demands of the spirit, —desiring to attain bodily purity without mortifying the flesh, to acquire purity of heart without the toil of vigils, to abound in spiritual virtues while giving rest to the flesh, to obtain the grace of patience without bitter slander, to display the humility of Christ without loss of worldly honor, to follow the simplicity of piety while maintaining the arrogance of this age, to serve Christ while seeking human glory and favor, to speak the decisive truth without encountering any insult, however slight—in short, to attain the blessings of the future without losing those of the present. Such a will does not lead to true perfection, but, by placing one in a state of lukewarmness, makes one like those of whom the Lord speaks reproachfully in the Book of Revelation: “I know your deeds; you are neither cold nor hot. I wish you were either cold or hot! So, because you are lukewarm, I will spit you out of My mouth” (Rev. 3:15–16). But when grace comes, it stirs up the energy of the spirit and restores within it the highest aspirations, which detach it from all that is earthly. Under their influence, the will can no longer remain indifferent and lukewarm, but is filled with zeal for what is best and sacrifices all that is lower to it. Meanwhile, however, a tendency toward its former state of indifference remains within it, and it is very ready to fall back into it. To prevent this from happening, movements hostile to the higher aspirations remain in the flesh; the will, having tasted the higher goods, cannot condone them, and as soon as it senses them, it is immediately stirred to life with all its zeal and valiantly defends its higher goods. And it happens that as soon as the will slips into God-opposing lukewarmness, the struggle of the flesh rises up and rouses it to action. From this it is clear that we would remain forever in the state of the aforementioned God-opposing lukewarmness if the struggle rising up within us did not lead us out of it. For in that state, when—slaving to self-indulgence—we wish to grant ourselves some indulgence, the flesh immediately rises up and, wounding us with the stings of sinful impulses and passions, does not allow us to stand in the desired, joyful purity, but draws us toward a cooling pleasure—one that is not pleasing to God— —it draws us, as it were, onto a path overgrown with thorns. But this stirs the slumbering zeal for God; it rises up and drives away the encroaching enemies. Acting within us daily, this struggle leads us to a beneficial resolve, —to reject a life of idleness and carelessness, to attain purity of heart through much toil and contrition of spirit, —to preserve the purity of the body through strict fasting, hunger, thirst, and sleeplessness, —to ascend to a good state of mind through reading, reflection, and unceasing prayer.

4. Something similar is mysteriously depicted in God’s plan concerning the nations hostile to Israel, as we read in the Book of Judges: “The Lord left these nations to test Israel through them... so that He might teach them the ways of war” (Judg. 3:1–2). — The Lord arranged such warfare not because He did not want peace for Israel, or because He did not care for its welfare, but because He saw how beneficial it was for Israel. Subjected to almost constant attacks by those nations, Israel could not help but feel a constant need for God’s help, and therefore had to remain in constant, hopeful reliance on Him and in prayer. Unable to abandon the business of war, they had no time to give themselves over to carelessness or to slacken through laziness and idleness. For often safety and happiness bring down those whom misfortunes could not defeat.

5. And from what else do we find the soul asleep in those who are castrated in the flesh, if not from the fact that, through delusion, having freed themselves from this carnal need, they think they have no need either for the labor of bodily abstinence or for contrition of the heart? Lulled by such carelessness, they do not concern themselves with attaining true perfection or with purifying the heart from the passions of the soul. Such a state, rising above the carnal state, remains merely spiritual—a state which the Lord Himself has called worthy of rejection—because, having passed from coldness to warmth, it has come to rest in this repulsive warmth.

6. Thus, at the very beginning of renunciation, as we cease to be carnal—that is, as we begin to separate ourselves from worldly customs and abstain from overt carnal impurity— we must hasten and strive with all our might to immediately assimilate the spiritual state as well; otherwise, simply because we have renounced the world in our outward being, or have ceased to defile ourselves with carnal immorality, while imagining ourselves to have already attained perfection, we might later become negligent and careless in eradicating the causes of the passions and, thus remaining halfway between the flesh and the spirit, fail to attain the degree of spiritual perfection, believing that for this perfection it is sufficient merely to separate ourselves outwardly from the life and pleasures of the world and to refrain from carnal debauchery and promiscuity. For if we remain in this state of lukewarmness (indifference), which is considered the worst, we will be spewed out of the Lord's mouth, as He says: "Because you are lukewarm... I will spew you out of My mouth" (Rev. 3:16). The Lord has rightly declared concerning those who, having been received by Him into the womb of love, later grew cold, that they will be spewed out by Him with a certain abhorrence. For a carnal person—that is, a worldly or pagan person—turns more readily to salvation and ascends to the heights of spiritual perfection than one who, having taken up the yoke of Christ, has not set out on the path to perfection and has allowed the initial fire of spiritual zeal to grow cold. For when such a person, humbled by sensual passions and aware of his own impurity due to carnal defilement, comes to contrition and turns to the source of all purity and perfection, he will, abhorring that cold state of unbelief and carelessness in which he once found himself, and burning with zeal, more easily ascend to perfection. On the contrary, whoever sets out to do God's work with coldness and enters the path of this calling without humility and due zeal—once struck by this calamitous contagion—can no longer improve on his own or accept counsel from others. For, in the words of the Lord, he says in his heart, "I am rich; I have prospered, and I lack nothing"; whereas it is more fitting to apply to him what follows: "and do not realize that you are wretched, pitiful, poor, blind, and naked" (Rev. 3:17). Thus, he becomes worse than a worldly person in that he loses awareness of how poor, blind, and naked he is, of how much he needs correction, and of how greatly he needs instruction and admonition from others; therefore, he does not accept any word of salvation, not realizing that in the age to come he will inevitably be subject to the strictest judgment and punishment.

4. A General Overview of the Passions and the Struggle Against Them

1. There are eight principal passions: gluttony, lust, greed, anger, sorrow, despondency, vanity, and pride.

2. Passions are of "two kinds": natural ones, arising from natural needs—such as gluttony and fornication—and unnatural ones, not rooted in nature—such as avarice. Their "manifestations," however, take "four forms": some act only in the body and through the body, such as gluttony and fornication—while others manifest even without the body's involvement, such as vanity and pride; furthermore, some are aroused from without, such as avarice and anger—while others arise from internal causes, such as despondency and sorrow. This manner of manifestation of the passions' effects gives reason to recognize two further categories among them—dividing them into carnal and spiritual: the carnal arise in the body and nourish and delight the body; while the spiritual stem from the soul's inclinations and nourish the soul, though they often have a destructive effect on the body. The latter are cured by a simple, internal healing of the heart; the carnal, however, are cured by a twofold remedy—both external and internal.

3. Let us clarify some of what has been said with a more detailed discussion. The passions of gluttony and fornication, rooted in the body, are sometimes aroused without the soul's involvement, merely by the stimulation of the desires from which they arise; yet they also draw in the soul because of its connection to the body. To curb them, it is not enough to arm oneself against them with mental resolve alone; one must also subdue the body itself through fasting, vigil, and exhaustion through labor; temporary seclusion is sometimes necessary, and often complete asceticism. For just as they arise from the depravity of both soul and body, so they can be overcome only through the labor of both. – Vanity and pride arise in the soul without the mediation of the body. For what need does vanity have of anything bodily, when, through a single desire for praise and glory, it leads the soul it has captivated to ruin? Or what bodily action took place in Lucifer's pride, when he conceived it solely in his soul and thoughts, as the Prophet says: "You said in your heart, 'I will ascend to heaven... and I will be like the Most High'" (Isa. 14:13–14). He certainly had no instigator in such pride; it was conceived and matured entirely within him.

4. Although these eight passions have different origins and different effects, the first six—namely, gluttony, fornication, avarice, anger, sorrow, and despondency—are linked by a certain special affinity, whereby the excess of one gives rise to the next. For from the excess of gluttony, lust necessarily arises; from lust, avarice; from avarice, anger; from anger, sorrow; and from sorrow, despondency. Therefore, one must combat them in the same order, proceeding in the struggle from the preceding to the subsequent: to overcome despondency, one must first suppress sorrow; to drive away sorrow, one must first suppress anger; to extinguish anger, one must trample on avarice; to root out avarice, one must subdue lust; to subdue lust, one must curb the passion for gluttony. And the remaining two passions, vanity and pride, are linked in the same way—that is, the intensification of the first gives rise to the other; excessive vanity gives birth to the passion of pride; victory over them is achieved in the same order; that is, to eradicate pride, one must suppress vanity. But these two passions are not connected to the other six in a generative sense; for they are not born from them, but rather arise after their eradication. We fall into these two passions especially after victory and triumph over the other passions. – However, although these eight passions stand in the relationship to one another as has now been shown, they are more specifically divided into four pairs: lust is united in a special pair with gluttony, anger with avarice, despondency with sorrow, and pride with vanity.

5. Each of the passions manifests itself in more than one way.

6. Thus, gluttony comes in three forms: either it gives rise to the desire to eat before the appointed hour; or it seeks to eat in great quantities until one is stuffed, without regard for the quality of the food; or it demands delicacies. Hence come disorderly eating, eating on the go, gluttony, and sensual indulgence. From these three arise various evil afflictions in the soul: from the first comes resentment toward the monastic rule; from this resentment grows dissatisfaction with monastic life to the point of intolerability, which is usually soon followed by flight from the monastery; the second gives rise to carnal lust and sensuality; and the third plunges one into the love of money and leaves no room for the poverty of Christ.

7. There are three kinds of lust: the first is committed through sexual intercourse between one sex and another; the second occurs without sexual intercourse with a woman—for which Onan, the son of the Patriarch Judah, was struck down by the Lord (Gen. 38:9–10), and which is called “uncleanness” in Scripture; the third is committed in the mind and heart, of which the Lord says in the Gospel: “Whoever looks at a woman with lust has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Matt. 5:28). The blessed Apostle pointed out these three kinds in the following verse: “Put to death, therefore, whatever belongs to your earthly nature: sexual immorality, impurity, and lust,” and so on (Col. 3: 5).

8. There are three kinds of love of money: in the first, it prevents one who has renounced the world from divesting himself of all possessions; in the second, it compels one who has already given everything to the poor to acquire such possessions again; in the third, it stirs up a desire for acquisitions even in one who previously had nothing.

9. There are also three kinds of anger: the first is that which burns within; the second is that which bursts forth in word and deed; the third is that which smolders for a long time and is called rancor.

10. There are two kinds of sorrow: the first is that which comes after anger has subsided, or is caused by losses and damages suffered, and by the unfulfillment of desires; the second arises from fears and anxieties about one’s own fate, or from unreasonable worries.

11. There are two kinds of despondency: one plunges one into sleep, while the other drives one from the cell.

12. Though vanity takes many forms, it has two main kinds: in the first, we boast of physical advantages and visible things; in the second, we are inflamed by a desire for vain glory because of spiritual matters.

13. There are two kinds of pride: the first is carnal, and the second is spiritual, which is more destructive than the first. It especially tempts those who have excelled in certain virtues.

14. Although these eight passions tempt the entire human race, they do not attack everyone in the same way. For in one person, the spirit of lust takes precedence; in another, anger prevails; in yet another, vanity reigns; and in another, pride reigns supreme: so that although all passions assail everyone, each of us succumbs to them in a different way and order.

15. Therefore, we must wage war against these passions in such a way that each person, having discovered which passion is particularly harmful to him, directs his struggle primarily against it, using every effort and care to watch over it and suppress it, directing against it the spears of daily fasting, throwing at it, moment by moment, the arrows of the heart’s groans and sighs, and ceaselessly shedding tears in prayer to God for an end to the turmoil that agitates him. For no one can triumph over any passion until he is convinced that he cannot defeat it through his own diligence or effort; although it is necessary for him, in order to purify himself of it, to devote himself day and night to every effort and every concern in this regard.

16. When such a warrior feels that he has been freed from his foremost passion, he must then once again examine the recesses of his heart with full attention, so that, having seen which passion within him is still the strongest compared to the rest, he may direct all his spiritual weapons specifically against it. By overcoming his foremost passions in this way each time, he will more quickly and easily achieve victory over the remaining, lesser ones.

17. When you have triumphed over one or more passions, you must not become proud of this victory. Otherwise, the Lord, seeing the pride of your heart, will cease to shield and protect it—and you, abandoned by Him, will once again begin to be troubled by the very passion you had conquered—by the grace of God. And the Prophet would not have prayed, “O Lord, do not deliver the soul that confesses to You to the beasts” (Ps. 73:19), had he not known that those who are haughty in heart once again fall prey to the very passions they had conquered, so that they might be humbled.

5. The Struggle Against the Eight Principal Passions

1. In describing the struggle against the eight principal passions, we will outline their characteristics, identify their causes, and propose suitable remedies against them.

1. The Struggle Against Gluttony

1. The first struggle we must undertake is the struggle against gluttony, or the passion of overindulgence.

2. Regarding the practice of abstinence from food, or fasting, no single rule can be established that applies to everyone; for not all bodies have the same strength, and this virtue is observed not by the strength of the soul alone, but must also be commensurate with the strength of the body. It is not possible for everyone to fast for weeks at a time; some cannot go without food for more than two or three days, while others find it difficult to go without food until sunset. Nor are vegetables, herbs, or dry bread nourishing for everyone. Furthermore, one person may need two pounds to feel full, while another feels heavy after eating a pound or half a pound. But all who practice abstinence must have one goal: to eat according to their capacity without indulging in gluttony. For not only the quality of food but also its quantity relaxes the soul, kindling within it a harmful, sinful fire.

3. No matter what delicacies the stomach is filled with, this gives rise to the seeds of carnal lust, and the mind, weighed down by the burden of food, is no longer strong enough to steer the rudder of reason. It is not only the excessive consumption of wine that intoxicates the mind, but the overindulgence in all kinds of food usually makes it unsteady and wavering, and deprives it of pure and blameless thoughts. For the people of Sodom, the cause of their corruption and destruction was not only drunkenness, but also the overindulgence of the belly. Listen to how the Lord rebukes Jerusalem through the prophet (Ezek. 16:49). In what way did your sister, Sodom, sin, if not by eating her bread to the point of satiety and overindulgence? Since such satiety with bread inflamed them with the unquenchable fire of carnal lust, they were burned by sulfuric fire from heaven according to God’s judgment. If, in this way, their mere excess in the consumption of bread—driven by the passion for satiety—cast them into the turbulent abyss of depravity, what then can be said of those who, while in the prime of physical health, allow themselves to eat meat and drink wine in excessive quantities, consuming them not so much as their physical needs require, but as their self-indulgent lust dictates?

4. The Fathers defined moderation in food as this: that we should cease eating the food that necessity compels us to take to sustain the body’s life while we still feel like eating. Judging by this, even one who is physically frail can perfectly demonstrate the virtue of moderation, on a par with the strong and healthy, if by force of will he restrains his desire for food when the frailty of the flesh does not require it. For the Apostle also says: “Do not gratify the desires of the flesh” (Rom. 13:14). He did not entirely forbid caring for the body, but merely forbade doing so out of lust—he rejected lustful concern for the flesh, yet did not exclude reasonable care for it that is necessary for life; he forbade the former so that, by indulging the flesh, we might not fall into ruinous acts of lust, and he permitted the latter so that the body, being weakened by unreasonable severity, might not become powerless to carry out our spiritual pursuits and labors.

5. Thus, the degree of abstinence must be determined by the judgment of each person’s conscience. Everyone must set for themselves the degree of abstinence required by the struggle against the rebellion of the flesh. — Fasts prescribed by the canons must certainly be observed; but if abstinence in the consumption of food is not maintained afterward, observing them will not lead to perfect purity. Fasting during prolonged periods will result only in temporary weakness and exhaustion of the body at that time, and not in the purity of chastity, if it is followed by the body being sated to the full: for the purity of the soul is inseparably linked to the fasting of the stomach. Those who are not content with maintaining a constant and even level of abstinence do not possess lasting purity of chastity. Strict fasts, if followed by excessive indulgence in food, are of no value, and their fruit is soon supplanted by the passion for gluttony. Why is it better to nourish oneself sensibly and in moderation with food every day than to observe long and extremely strict fasts from time to time? Excessive fasting not only undermines the steadfastness and firmness of the soul but also renders prayer lifeless due to the body's exhaustion.

6. To preserve the purity of soul and body, abstinence from food alone is not enough unless it is accompanied by other spiritual virtues. First and foremost, one must learn humility through the virtue of obedience, contrition of heart, and weariness of the body. One must not only avoid money and possessions but also root out the very desire for them. For it is not enough merely not to have them—which is usually the case out of necessity—but one must not allow the very desire to possess them, even if they were to be offered by chance. We must suppress the fury of anger, overcome the heaviness of sorrow, despise vain glory, trample the arrogance of pride, and also rein in the mind's fickle and wavering wanderings by constantly remembering God. We must always turn our hearts back from restless wandering to the contemplation of God, as soon as the crafty enemy, seeking to distract our minds from this contemplation, creeps into the recesses of the heart.

7. No one can ever suppress the stirrings of lust once it flares up unless they are strong enough to rein in the urges of gluttony. The purity of the inner person is recognized by the perfection of this virtue. For you would never believe that one whom you see overcome by the weakest in a light skirmish could contend in battle against the strongest opponents.

8. Therefore, first we must trample underfoot the lust for gluttony—and refine our minds not only through fasting but also through vigils, as well as through reading and constant contrition of heart, as we recall all that has tempted or overcome us, sometimes groaning in horror at the multitude of sins, sometimes burning with a desire for perfection and purity. And we must bring it to the point where, being occupied and, as it were, absorbed in such ascetic labors and thoughts, he regards the very act of nourishing himself with food not so much as a permitted source of pleasure as a burden imposed as punishment, and approaches it more as something unavoidably necessary for the body than as something desirable for the soul. If we constantly keep ourselves in such spiritual vigilance and contrition, we will soon subdue the lust of the flesh, which reaches extreme frenzy when stoked by food, and blunt its destructive sting. Thus, through an abundance of tears and unceasing weeping of the heart, we can extinguish the furnace of our body—kindled within us by the king of Babylon, that is, the devil—who sets us up for occasions of sin and stirs up our passions, by which we then, like the addition of oil and pitch to a furnace, burn even more fiercely (toward immorality); until, by God's grace, through the breath of His dewy Spirit in our hearts, the flames of carnal lust are completely extinguished within us. And here is our first struggle—to quench the lust for gluttony and self-indulgence with the desire for perfection! For this reason, we must not only suppress the desire for excessive food through contemplation of the virtues, but also consume the food necessary for our nature—which is unfavorable to chastity—only with careful and thoughtful attention of the heart. And we must organize the course of our lives in such a way that we are never distracted from spiritual pursuits, except when the weakness of the body compels us to attend to its necessary care. But even when we submit to this necessity—satisfying the needs of life rather than enslaving ourselves to the soul's desires—we must hasten as quickly as possible to set it aside, as a matter that distracts us from our salvific pursuits. And even during the meal itself, we must not fall behind in these pursuits. For we cannot in any way refrain from taking pleasure in the food set before us unless the soul, having fixed its attention on the contemplation of the Divine, takes even greater delight at the same time in the love of virtues and the beauty of necessary things. Indeed, everything in this world begins to be despised as transitory—when one keeps the gaze of the mind constantly fixed on imperishable and eternal goods, already tasting with the heart, even while still in the body, the bliss of the life to come.

9. Having conquered, through such a disposition, the lust for gluttony and overindulgence—no longer slaves to the flesh—we will be deemed worthy to enter into the highest battles: to fight against the impure forces, which usually engage in personal combat only with those who have already triumphed. Thus, the suppression of carnal desires proves to be the most solid foundation of all battles. Without conquering one's own flesh, no one can fight lawfully; and whoever does not fight lawfully is not crowned.

10. Do you want to hear a true warrior of Christ, fighting according to the legitimate rules of combat?—Listen carefully.—“I,” he says, “run not as one who has no goal; I fight not as one who beats the air; but I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, after preaching to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Cor. 9:26–27). Do you see how he has established the main task of the struggle within himself—that is, in his own flesh—as if on the firmest foundation, and has combined the entire success of the struggle in the single act of exhausting the flesh and subduing his own body? “I,” he says, “run in such a way, not aimlessly.” He does not run aimlessly who, beholding the heavenly Jerusalem, has in it an unshakable goal toward which he must unwaveringly direct the swift course of his heart. He does not run toward uncertainty who, forgetting what lies behind and straining toward what lies ahead, strives for “the honor of the higher calling of God in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 3: 13–14), toward which he always directs the gaze of his mind and toward which he hastens with all the readiness of his heart, crying out with confidence: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith” (2 Tim. 4:7). And since he was aware of how tirelessly, with the keenest zeal of his whole conscience, he ran “in the fragrance of Christ’s anointing” (Song of Songs 1:3), and by mortifying the flesh had successfully won the victory in the spiritual battle; therefore, with unquestionable hope, he declares: “There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day” (2 Tim. 4:8). And in order to reveal to us as well this hope of reward, if we imitate him in the same course of struggle, he added: “Not only to me, but to all who have loved His appearing”, proclaiming that on the day of judgment we too will share in his crown if, by loving the coming of Christ—not only the coming in which He will appear even to those who do not wish it, but especially the coming in which He always descends to holy souls—we achieve victory in the spiritual struggle by mortifying the flesh. The Lord speaks of this last coming in the Gospel: “I and the Father will come to him and make our home with him” (John 14:23). And again: “Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if anyone hears My voice and opens the door, I will come in to him, and I will dine with him, and he with Me” (Rev. 3:20).

11. Moreover, the Apostle does not merely describe the feat of running that he accomplished, saying: “I run in this way, not aimlessly”: [which refers in particular to the aspiration of his mind and the fervor of his spirit, with which he followed Christ with all his passion, singing with the Bride: “We follow You in the fragrance of Your peace” (Song of Songs 1:3); and again: “My soul clings to You” (Ps. 62:9)]; but he also testifies that he won the victory in another kind of struggle when he says: “Thus I fight, not as one who beats the air, but I mortify my body and bring it into subjection”: which specifically refers to the painstaking labors of self-restraint, to bodily mortification, and to the exhaustion of the flesh. Here he presents himself as a vigilant wrestler against his own flesh, indicating that he did not strike it with the blows of self-restraint in vain, but that by mortifying his body he succeeded in securing the triumph of victory—when, having subdued it with the whips of self-restraint and exhausted it with the blows of fasting, he bestowed upon the victorious spirit the crown of immortality and the palm of incorruption. Do you see the lawful order of the battle, do you discern the outcome of the spiritual contests—how Christ the Warrior, having won victory over the rebellious flesh and cast it down at his feet, is carried as a great triumphant victor on the chariot of victory?! – He does not run in vain, for he is certain that he will soon enter the holy city, the heavenly Jerusalem. “Thus he strives” in fasting—that is, in mortifying the flesh—“not as one striking the air,” that is, not as one who strikes in vain with the blows of self-restraint, for by them he strikes not empty air, but the spirits of malice swirling within it, through the mortification of his body. For whoever says, “not as one who beats the air,” implies that it is not empty or void air that is struck, but also certain beings within it. Since he, having overcome these kinds of battles (i.e., with the body), now emerged adorned with many victory wreaths, he naturally began to face attacks from the strongest enemies; and, having triumphed over the first of them—the envious ones—he began to proclaim with confidence: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12).

12. For the warrior of Christ, as long as he is in the body, opportunities to win laurels for his battles never run out; but the more he is exalted by the successes of his victories, the more formidable a series of battles lies ahead of him. For after he has conquered and subdued his own flesh, what multitudes of adversaries, what hordes of enemies rise up against this victorious warrior of Christ, provoked by his victories! This is so that the warrior of Christ, basking in the peace of the world, may not forget the glorious battles of his struggle, and, having grown complacent from inactivity and a false sense of security from enemies, may not lose the zeal and courage to display victorious valor worthy of the highest rewards. Therefore, if we wish to achieve the highest triumphs—not by diminishing but by growing in strength and courage—then we too must undergo the trials of battle in the same order: first, we must accomplish that which enables us to say with the Apostle, “Thus I fight, not as one who beats the air; but I discipline my body and bring it into subjection,”—and then, when we have prevailed in this battle, to enter into another, in the success of which we might again say with the Apostle: “For our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms.” For we cannot engage in battle against these in any other way than after victory over the flesh—and we will never be deemed worthy to experience the struggle against spirits if we are constantly defeated in the struggle against the flesh and overcome in the contest with the belly. And justly will the Apostle rebuke us, saying: “No temptation has overtaken you except what is common to mankind” (1 Cor. 10:13).

13. A monk who desires to achieve the feat of inner battles let him set this for himself in advance and take care that, before the hour for taking food—as determined by the rule and common to all—and especially outside of mealtimes, he by no means allow himself to partake of any food or drink, no matter how pleasant or sweet they may seem. Nor, even after the meal has ended, should he allow himself to indulge in anything of the sort, even in the slightest degree. Likewise, he must strictly observe the time and duration of sleep, as prescribed by the rule. And desires of this kind must be cut off with the same zeal with which we must cut off the stirrings of lustful passion. For whoever has been unable to suppress the excessive desires of the stomach—how will he be able to quench the fire of carnal lust? And whoever has been unable to subdue the obvious and minor passions—how will he be able to overcome the secret ones that arise without any witnesses?

14. It is not an external enemy we must fear; our enemy lies within ourselves. That is why an unceasing internal war rages within us. If we triumph in it, all external strife will become insignificant, and everything will be peaceful for the soldier of Christ, and all will be subject to him. We will have no reason to fear an enemy from without once what is within us, having been conquered, submits to the Spirit. We must not believe that, for the perfection of the heart and the purity of the body, the fast consisting solely of abstaining from visible foods is sufficient. No, to this we must also add the fast of the soul. For it, too, has its own harmful foods, from which, having become unaccustomed, it falls into the abyss of sensuality, even without an abundance of physical nourishment. — Self-condemnation is its food, and a most pleasant one at that. Anger, too, is its food, though not so light, and at times harmful, even deadly. Envy is the soul’s food, poisonously corrupting its vital juices and ceaselessly tormenting it—the wretched soul—with the happy successes of others. Her vanity is food that temporarily delights her with a pleasant taste, but afterward leaves her empty, stripped bare, and deprived of all virtue, rendering her barren and incapable of bearing spiritual fruit—and consequently not only deprives her of the reward for her immeasurable labors but also brings upon her severe punishments. Every lust and wandering of the fickle heart is a kind of grazing of the soul in a pasture of its own kind, feeding it with harmful fare, while depriving it of heavenly bread and solid food. Therefore, by abstaining from all this to the best of our ability in our holy fasting, we will make the observance of bodily fasting meaningful and fruitful. For the mortification of the flesh, when united with the contrition of the spirit, will present a most pleasing sacrifice to God and establish a dwelling place worthy of His holiness in the pure and beautifully adorned recesses of the heart. But if, while fasting physically, we become entangled in the most destructive passions of the soul, then the exhaustion of the flesh will be of no benefit to us, since we remain defiled in our most precious part—that is, when that part of our nature which is actually made the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit remains corrupt. For it is not the perishable flesh, but the pure heart that becomes a dwelling place for God and a temple of the Holy Spirit. Therefore, when our outer self fasts, we must also keep our inner self from harmful temptations. The Holy Apostle exhorts us to present it to God as pure, so that we may be deemed worthy to receive Christ as a guest within us, when he says: “that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith” (Eph. 3:16–17).

15. We must choose food that tempers, rather than stirs up, the heat of carnal desire, and that is readily available and in accordance with the general custom and practice of the brethren. Gluttony manifests itself in three ways: one person is driven to eat before the hour set by the rule; another leads one to fill and overfill the stomach with food, whatever its nature; the third is satisfied only with the most pleasant and exquisite delicacies. Therefore, a monk must observe a threefold rule against this: first, to wait for the prescribed time when food is permitted; second, not to indulge in overindulgence; third, to be content with some simple and inexpensive food. And whatever is permitted in this regard that is not in accordance with common custom and practice, the most ancient tradition of the Fathers does not approve of, as defiled by vanity, pride, and boastfulness. Nor have we seen anyone among those distinguished by the gift of knowledge and reason, nor have we known anyone among those whom God's grace has set forth as the most brilliant luminaries to be emulated, who would abstain from eating bread, which is considered simple and of little value. Conversely, we have never seen anyone among those who ate only greens, vegetables, and tree fruits who was counted among the most experienced men, or who was graced with discernment and knowledge.

16. Works of love should be preferred to fasting. We learned this from the Egyptian Fathers. For when we, desiring to learn the rules of these elders, came from Syria to Egypt, we were received there with astonishingly warm and heartfelt hospitality—and wherever we went, nowhere, for our comfort, did they insist on observing the fixed meal times prescribed by the rule, as we were accustomed to seeing in the monasteries of Palestine—but everywhere they allowed us to eat before that time, except on Wednesdays and Fridays. One of the elders, when we asked him why the rule of daily fasting was observed so loosely among them, replied: “Fasting is always with me, but I cannot keep you with me forever. Moreover, although fasting is very beneficial and always necessary, it is a voluntary sacrifice; whereas the practice of love is an urgent requirement of the commandment.” Therefore, by receiving Christ within you, I must nourish Him. But when I send you on your way, I can make up for the leniency shown for His sake by observing the strictest fast. For “the wedding guests cannot fast while the bridegroom is with them. But the days will come when the bridegroom is taken away from them, and then they will fast” (Luke 5:34–35).

17. Extremes, as the Holy Fathers say, are equally harmful on both sides—both excessive fasting and overindulgence. We know of some who, though not overcome by gluttony, were brought down by excessive fasting and fell into the very same passion of gluttony because of the weakness resulting from excessive fasting.

18. We must be careful both not to eat before the appointed time or beyond moderation out of a desire for carnal pleasure, and to eat at the appointed hour even if we do not feel like it; for both an excessive desire for carnal pleasure and an aversion to food are stirred up by our enemy. Moreover, immoderate abstinence is more harmful than overindulgence; for from the latter, through repentance, one can return to proper conduct, whereas from the former, one cannot.

19. Our early Fathers often discussed how to navigate between these two extremes while observing reasonable moderation; they preferred bread to all other kinds of food and established the proper measure of its consumption as two small loaves weighing about a pound.

20. The general rule of moderation in abstinence is that each person, in accordance with their strength, physical condition, and age, should eat only as much food as is necessary to maintain physical health, and not as much as the desire for satiety demands. Whoever does not observe a consistent measure—fasting excessively at one time and overeating at another—and thereby harms both prayer and chastity: prayer, because without food one cannot be alert in prayer, but rather, overcome by weakness, drifts off to sleep; and chastity, because the fire of carnal lust, which is kindled by excessive eating, continues to burn even during strict fasting.

21. Moderate eating, according to the Fathers, consists in consuming just enough food each day so that one still feels hungry after eating. Such moderation will keep the soul and body in balance and prevent a person from falling into either excessive fasting, which weakens the body, or overindulgence, which stifles the spirit.

22. We offer one more salvific instruction from Blessed Macarius, so that we may edifyingly conclude our book on fasting and abstinence with the opinion of such a man. He says that a monk must practice fasting so wisely as if he were to remain in the body for a hundred years; and he must restrain the movements of the soul—forgiving offenses, casting aside sorrow, and attaching no importance to griefs and losses—as if he were capable of dying every day. In regard to the first—that is, fasting—he advises a prudence beneficial to the soul, which would compel the monk to always walk the path of steady rigor in abstinence, not allowing him, even in the event of physical exhaustion, to shift from rigor to excess; and with regard to the second—that is, the restraint of the soul's movements—a saving magnanimity that would be strong enough not only to despise what seems prosperous in this world, but also to remain unshaken by misfortunes and sorrows, and to disregard them as insignificant, keeping the gaze of one's mind constantly fixed on the place where one expects to be called every day and every minute.

2. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Lust

1. According to the tradition of the Fathers, our second struggle is against the spirit of lust—a struggle longer and more constant than any other, and one that very few have completely overcome—a fierce battle that begins at the first stage of maturity and does not cease until the other passions have been conquered. Since the rebellion here is twofold, armed with two kinds of weapons for battle, it must also be opposed with two kinds of weapons in hand. Physical fasting alone is not enough to attain perfect purity of chastity; it must be surpassed by contrite repentance of the spirit and unceasing prayer against this most impure spirit; then unceasing study of the Scriptures combined with intellectual reflection, as well as physical labor and manual work, which keep the heart from wandering and bring it back to itself; and above all, deep and true humility, without which victory over any passion can never be attained.

2. The transformation of this passion depends on the complete purification of the heart, from which, according to the Lord's word, the poison of this disease flows. "For from the heart," He says, "come evil thoughts... adultery, fornication," and so on (Matt. 15:19). Therefore, one must first purify that from which the source of life and death flows, as Solomon says: "Guard your heart with all diligence, for from it flow the springs of life" (Prov. 4:23); for the flesh is subject to its will and power. The law of fasting and frugal eating must certainly be followed with all diligence, so that the flesh, sated by an abundance of food, does not, in defiance of the soul's commands, cast down its ruler—the spirit—in its wild excess. But if we reduce the whole essence of our endeavor to mere physical exhaustion, without at the same time fasting with our soul from other passions, and without engaging it in either instruction in the divine or other spiritual activities; then we will by no means be able to ascend to the very heights of true purity; for in such a case, that which is dominant within us will defile our body, even if it were pure. Therefore, we must, as the Lord instructs, "first cleanse the inside of the cups and dishes, so that their outside may also be clean" (Matt. 23:26).

3. Other passions are usually purified, among other things, through interaction with people and daily activities and tasks with them, and are healed, in a way, by the very unpleasantness and annoyance caused by succumbing to them. For example, outbursts of anger, insults, and impatience—in addition to heartfelt instruction and vigilant attention—are also cured by visiting the brethren and frequently bringing these passions to light. Since they are more readily revealed when one is thus provoked, they are more frequently exposed and, consequently, more quickly healed. But this illness, when the body is exhausted and the heart is crushed, also requires solitude and withdrawal from people, so that, with the causes of its destructive, feverish agitation thus removed, one may more quickly attain a state of complete recovery. Just as it is beneficial for those suffering from any illness that foods harmful to them not even be brought before their eyes, lest a deadly desire arise in them at the sight of them: so too do silence and solitude greatly contribute to the expulsion of this particular disease (lust), so that the ailing soul, not being distracted by various people and things, may more freely ascend to the purest intellectual contemplation, and through this may more easily uproot the contagious stirrings of lust.

4. It is one thing to be abstinent, and another to be pure, having attained a serene state of chaste integrity and virginal innocence. Such a virtue is attributed solely to those who are virgins in both soul and body, such as, for example, both Johns (the Forerunner and the Evangelist) in the New Testament, and Elijah, Jeremiah, and Daniel in the Old Testament. It is not unjust to honor, on the same level as them, those who, after a fall, through long ascetic labors and zealous pursuit of what was lost, have attained a state of purity and integrity of soul and body similar to theirs, and who feel the stirrings of the flesh not so much as an attack of shameful lust as merely a natural impulse. And so, we say, it is extremely difficult to attain such a state among the masses—is it not even impossible?—Let no one, however, expect to learn this from our reasoning, but let each one arrive at this conclusion through the examination of his own conscience. — We have no doubt that there are many who practice self-restraint, who drive away and suppress the assaults of the flesh—whether experienced rarely or daily—either through fear of Gehenna or through the desire for the Kingdom of Heaven. Regarding them, the elders hold that although they may not be completely overwhelmed or defeated by passionate stirrings, they cannot, however, be safe from attacks or entirely invulnerable. For one who is in the position of a fighter, even though he often defeats and overcomes his opponent, will inevitably sometimes experience anxiety and wounding himself.

5. If, in our hearts, we are rightfully called, along with the Apostle, to engage in spiritual struggle (2 Tim. 2:5), then—not relying on our own strength (for human efforts are not sufficient to accomplish this)—but trusting in the Lord's help, let us strive with all zeal to overcome this most impure spirit. For this passion will not cease to contest the soul's victory until the soul realizes that successfully waging such a struggle is beyond its strength, and that by its own labors and efforts it cannot possibly achieve victory unless it is strengthened by the Lord's help and intercession.

6. And indeed, if every success in virtue is a work of the Lord's grace, and the overcoming of every passion is His victory, then this work in particular (i.e., the attainment of purity and the overcoming of lustful passion) is a special grace and gift, as confirmed by the teachings of the Holy Fathers and the experiences of purification from this passion, according to the testimony of those who have been deemed worthy to attain it. For to feel no sting from the flesh is, in a certain sense, the same as, while remaining in the body, to step outside the flesh; to be clothed in the flesh yet to be outside of nature. And therefore it is impossible for a person to soar on his own—so to speak, on his own wings—to such a heavenly height of perfection, unless the Lord's grace, through the gift of purity, lifts him out of the mire of the earth. For no virtue brings carnal people so close to the heavenly angels, in imitating their way of life, as the attainment of the grace of purity, through which they, while still living on earth, have, according to the Apostle, "a dwelling in heaven" (Phil. 3: 20), and here, in their mortal flesh, already possess what is promised to the saints in the life to come, after they have laid aside their mortal bodies.

7. Listen to what the Apostle says: "Everyone who competes in the games exercises self-control in all things" (1 Cor. 9:25). He holds up the athlete in the arena as a model for us in our spiritual struggle. To succeed in the contests, the athlete not only abstains from all forbidden food, drunkenness, and intoxication, but also from inactivity, idleness, and laziness, striving through constant practice and dedication to the task to develop his strength and acquire skill; he sets aside all worry and sorrow regarding worldly and marital affairs, preoccupying himself solely with the concern of how to achieve success and obtain the victor's wreath; Above all, he takes care to keep himself pure from carnal defilement, so that even in his sleep he might not be led astray by shameful dreams, and thereby diminish the strength acquired through long time and no small effort. Here you see everything that a spiritual ascetic ought to do; you also see that, for success in your spiritual endeavor, you too must above all preserve purity and chastity. For if purity is so essential in worldly, external contests for fleeting crowns, how much more essential is it in our spiritual, inner striving for heavenly crowns? We are required not only to maintain external purity from carnal sin or involuntary defilement, but above all to maintain the inner purity of thought and feeling. We must guard the very depths of our hearts with every means of preservation. What those (competitors in the arena) desire to possess only physically, we must possess in the depths of our conscience, where our Lord, the Judge of our deeds, beholds every movement of our will down to the smallest detail. We must, therefore, prevent from arising within us even the careless thought of what we fear to do openly, and avoid defiling ourselves—even by secret consent in our hearts—with what we are ashamed to reveal before others. For although this may be hidden from people, it cannot be concealed from the angels or from Almighty God Himself, from whom no secrets are hidden.

8. A sign and measure of the perfection of purity we have attained is this: when we are at rest or indulging in deep sleep, no seductive image arises within us; or if one does arise, it is not strong enough to stir up any lustful desires. For such an impulse, though not counted as full guilt in sin, nevertheless serves as a sure sign that the soul has not yet attained perfection, and shows that passion has not yet been completely eradicated, when dreamlike images manage to produce this kind of defilement.

9. The quality of one's thoughts, which is not entirely carefully guarded amid the distractions of the day, is revealed during the night's rest; and therefore, when the aforementioned transgression occurs, it is not the dream that should be held responsible, but rather the failure to maintain vigilance in the preceding time, and one should see in this a manifestation of an illness hidden within, which the night did not bring into being for the first time (as if it had not existed before), but which—hidden in the inner fibers of the soul—was brought to the surface of the skin while the body was being strengthened by sleep, revealing the inner feverish heat of passion that we ourselves had kindled by feeding on unwholesome thoughts throughout the day. Likewise, physical illnesses are not generated at the very moment they become apparent, but are acquired in the time preceding that, when a person, eating carelessly and consuming all manner of food harmful to health, accumulates disease-causing fluids within themselves.

10. God Himself, the Creator and Maker of the entire human race, knowing the nature of His creation better than anyone, directs the cure to the very source from which the causes of this passionate disease primarily arise, when He says: "Anyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (Matt. 5:28). In remarking on the lust of the eyes, He condemns not so much the eyes themselves as that inner feeling which misuses their service in seeing. This heart, sick and wounded by the arrow of lust, looks with desire—the gift of sight, granted by the Creator for good, is turned by its own passion to serve evil deeds, and the disease of lust hidden within it is brought to light through the act of looking. That is why the saving commandment is prescribed to the one whose passion causes evil wounding through sight. For it is not said, “Guard your eyes with all diligence,” but rather, “Guard your heart with all diligence” (Prov. 4:23).

11. Let our first and foremost act in preserving the purity of our hearts be this: whenever, through the subtle wiles of the devil’s malice, a thought of any woman—be it our mother, sisters, relatives, or even holy women—creeps into our minds, let us hasten to banish it from our thoughts as quickly as possible; lest, if we linger too long in such thoughts, our enemy, the deceiver, might imperceptibly divert our minds from these women to others through whom he could sow thoughts harmful to the soul. Therefore, in striving to fulfill the commandment, “Guard your heart with all diligence,” we must, according to God’s original command, carefully “guard” the venomous “head” of the serpent (Gen. 3)—that is, the beginnings of evil thoughts through which the devil attempts to creep into our soul; so that, if its head were to penetrate our heart through our negligence, its entire body would not creep in as well—that is, impure thoughts and consent to sinful pleasure would not arise. For once the enemy is let in, having captured the soul, he will inevitably kill it with his poisonous torment. We must also “strike down the sinners arising in our land”—that is, our carnal desires—“at the very dawn of their birth” (Ps. 100:8), and “smash the sons of Babylon against a rock” while they are still infants (–136:9). For if they are not crushed while they are still tender and weak, then, having grown up through our indulgence, they will rise up against us with great strength, and—either destroy us, or, if they are defeated, certainly not without great sighs and toil. For “when the strong man”—that is, our spirit—“has armed himself and guards his house,” that is, protects the peace of our heart with the Fear of God, then “his possessions are at peace” (Luke 11:21), that is, the fruits of his labors and virtues, acquired over a long period of time. “But when one stronger than he comes and overcomes him,” that is, the devil through consent to the thoughts he instills, then “he will take away all his weapons, on which he relied,” that is, the remembrance of the Scriptures, or the fear of God, “and will scatter his plunder” (Luke 11: 22), that is, his skills in virtue will be scattered by all manner of vices opposed to them.

12. “This,” says St. Paul, “is the will of God—your sanctification” (1 Thess. 4:3). And so as to leave us with no doubt or obscure misunderstanding as to what exactly he means by holiness—whether truth, or love, or humility, or patience—for holiness is attained through all these virtues—he goes on to specify directly what he actually meant by holiness: “This is the will of God, your sanctification: that you abstain from sexual immorality; that each of you know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor, not in the passion of lust, like the Gentiles who do not know God” (1 Thess. 4:3–5). See how he extols chastity, calling it the honor of the vessel—that is, our body—and a sanctuary. Consequently, on the contrary, whoever remains in lustful passion is in a state of dishonor and impurity and lives far from holiness. – A little further on, St. Paul adds, again calling chastity “””: “For God did not call us to impurity, but to holiness. Therefore, whoever rejects this does not reject a human being, but God, who has given His Holy Spirit within us” (ibid., vv. 7–8). He gave his commandment unbreakable power and importance when he said—that whoever rejects this, that is, what I have said, does not despise a person, that is, me who commands this, but God, speaking through me, Who has appointed our hearts as a dwelling place for His Holy Spirit. Do you see how, in simple words, he extolled this virtue! First, he actually attributes holiness to it; second, he asserts that through it the vessel of our body is freed from all impurity; third, that by casting out shameful impurity, this vessel will be held in honor, like a sanctuary; and finally, that its greatest advantage is that through it the Holy Spirit will dwell in our hearts.

13. I will also cite another testimony similar to this one from the same Apostle. —Writing to the Hebrews, he says: “Pursue peace with all people, and holiness, without which no one will see the Lord” (Heb. 12:14). Here, too, he clearly affirms that without holiness—which he usually refers to as the purity and chastity of soul and body—it is utterly impossible to see God.

14. The higher and more heavenly the dignity of chastity is, the more intense are the slanders it provokes from the enemy. That is why we must all the more diligently observe not only bodily abstinence but also contrition of heart, with ceaseless sighs of prayer, so that the furnace of our flesh—which the King of Babylon ceaselessly attempts to kindle with the embers of carnal temptations— may be constantly extinguished and cooled by the dew of the Holy Spirit descending into our hearts.

15. We can maintain this state of mind constantly if we always remember that God is the Watcher of night and day and the Knower not only of our secret deeds but also of all our thoughts—and believe that we must give Him an account for everything that turns in our hearts, just as for all our deeds and actions.

16. So that even during sleep impure dreams may not defile us, we must always observe a consistently moderate fast. For whoever violates a reasonable measure of strictness in abstaining from food will inevitably go beyond the proper measure of leniency in this matter as well. And as the measure of our nourishment changes, so too must the quality of our purity inevitably change. – But in this we must maintain constant humility of heart and patience, as well as careful self-guard against anger and other passions throughout the day. For as soon as the fire of anger takes hold within us, the heat of lust will easily follow. Above all, it is necessary to remain vigilant and watchful over oneself at night. For just as purity and self-discipline during the day prepare the way for purity at night, so too does nighttime vigilance provide the heart—as well as our self-awareness—with the strength and fortitude to resist all that is impure during the day.

17. Is it possible to completely extinguish the fire of lust, the heat of which our flesh seems to feel as if by nature?—Let us first consider what Blessed Paul has to say on this matter. “Put to death,” he says, “your earthly members” (Col 3:5). Which members, then, does he command us to put to death? – Certainly not to cut off hands and feet or any other parts; but to destroy the sinful body, of which he speaks elsewhere: “Let the sinful body of the flesh be put to death” (Rom. 6:6)—and which, like any other body, has its own members. It is these that the Apostle commands us to put to death. And he immediately lists exactly which ones they are. – For after saying, “Put to death your members that are on earth,” he continues: “sexual immorality, impurity, passion, evil desire, and greed, which is idolatry.” The first member is “fornication”: this is the sin of unlawful carnal union; the second member is “impurity,” which sometimes occurs without any physical contact with a woman, either during sleep or while awake; the third element—“passion”—which, lying in the depths of the soul, can be kindled even without the influence of physical desire; the fourth element—“evil lust”—which may refer not only to the aforementioned impure passion but also, in general, to all pernicious desires, and which is nothing but a disease of a depraved will; The Apostle identifies “greed” as the final element of the sinful body, suggesting that one must not only abstain from desiring the possessions of others but also generously despise one’s own, as the early community of believers mentioned in the Book of Acts indeed did (Acts 4:32, 35). From all that has been said, I draw the following conclusion: if many, for Christ’s sake, renounced their possessions—so that they cut off from their hearts not only the possession of money but also the desire for it—then it follows that lustful passion can be extinguished in the same way. For the Apostle would not have combined the impossible with the possible. But recognizing both as possible, he commanded that both be put to death. – And so confident was the blessed Paul in the possibility of eradicating the lustful passion from our members that he not only commanded that it be put to death, but also decreed that not even its name be uttered among us, saying: “But among you there must not even be a hint of sexual immorality, or of any kind of impurity, or of greed, because these are improper for God’s holy people. Nor should there be obscenity, foolish talk, or coarse joking, which are out of place” (Eph. 5:3–4). Therefore, there can be no doubt that the passion of fornication can be eradicated from our members—since the Apostle commanded that they be cut off just as covetousness, idle talk, and mockery are, all of which are easily cut off.

18. However, we must know that even if we observe the strictest form of abstinence—namely, hunger, thirst, vigil, and constant labor—and devote ourselves with unwavering zeal to reading books that save the soul; we cannot, however, by these efforts alone, attain the unceasing purity of chastity unless the special grace of God comes to our aid. Let everyone know that he must tirelessly practice these ascetic exercises solely so that, through the sorrow they patiently endure, and thereby draw God’s mercy upon himself, so that he may be deemed worthy of the divine gift of deliverance from the battle of the flesh and from the dominion of prevailing passions—and not in the hope that, by his own efforts through these deeds, he might attain the unshakable purity of bodily chastity which he so desires and seeks.

19. Desires for these things cannot be suppressed or rejected unless they are replaced by other, salvific desires. Therefore, if we wish to eradicate carnal desires from our hearts, we must quickly replace them with spiritual desires, so that our spirit, always striving toward their objects, may have neither the inclination nor the time to pay attention to the allure of fleeting earthly joys. And when our spirit, through daily practice in spiritual endeavors, becomes established in this mindset of detachment from all things, then it will understand through experience the power of the following verse, which we all often repeat, but whose power is known only to a few who are experienced: “I have set the Lord always before me; because He is at my right hand, I shall not be shaken” (Ps. 15: 8). Only those who have attained the purity of body and spirit of which we speak truly comprehend the power and meaning of this verse—those who realize that they are guarded by the Lord at every moment so that they do not stray back to their former ways, and that His right hand—that is, their holy deeds—is constantly protected by Him. For the Lord is always present with His saints, not on the left side—since a holy man has nothing on the left, that is, nothing evil—but on the right. But to sinners and the impure, He remains invisible, because they lack the right side, where He is usually present.

20. There are many degrees of chastity by which one ascends to unshakable purity. I will divide the ladder of such perfection in chastity into six degrees, which, however, are in reality traversed imperceptibly, just as our bodies imperceptibly grow each day and, without our knowledge, reach their perfect form. – The “first” degree of chastity is when a monk is not troubled by carnal lust while awake; – the “second” is when the mind does not linger on lustful thoughts; the “third” is when, at the sight of a woman, he is not in the least disturbed by desire; the “fourth” is when, while awake, he does not allow even the slightest physical movement; the “fifth” is when even the subtlest consent to a physical act does not disturb the mind when reasoning or reading brings to mind human birth; “the sixth”—if one is not disturbed even in sleep by seductive dreams about women.

21. Complete chaste purity, beginning with abstinence from lustful thoughts and movements, is distinguished by the perfect stilling of carnal stirrings and peace from them. Fully matured chastity always preserves the unshakable and steadfast purity of body and soul, and is nothing other than holiness. This occurs when the “flesh,” having ceased to “lust after the spirit,” begins to harmonize with the spirit’s desires and virtue, and when the two are united by a firm bond, and, as the Psalmist says, come to dwell together as brothers (Ps. 132: 1). – Then God is with them; for it is said that “His dwelling place is in peace” (Ps. 75:3)—that is, not in the clamor of strife and the struggle against passions, but in the peace of chastity and in the constant tranquility of the heart. For when someone, by subduing carnal passions, is deemed worthy to attain this place of peace, he simultaneously becomes a dwelling place of God.

3. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Greed

1. The third struggle we face is against the spirit of avarice, —a passion foreign and uncharacteristic of our nature, and one that arises in a monk from nothing other than the faintheartedness of a weak-willed soul that is not properly disposed, and for the most part from a poorly conceived beginning of renunciation of the world, the foundation of which was not a fervent love for God. Other movements of the passions seem to have their origin within us, as if implanted in human nature and somehow ingrained in the flesh. Since they are present from the moment of our birth, their activity precedes the manifestation in us of the ability to distinguish between good and evil—and they can be overcome only through long and arduous effort. But this disease (greed) comes later than they do and is imposed on the soul from without; therefore, it may be more easily prevented and cast out. But if, through carelessness, it is neglected and once admitted into the heart, it becomes the most destructive of all and the most difficult to expel: for it becomes the root of all evil (1 Tim. 6:10), serving as a source of various passions.

2. If this passion gains a hold on a monk’s faint-hearted and cold soul, it first prompts him to seek small gains, painting vivid pictures of certain reasons—seemingly just and reasonable—why he must either set aside some money for himself when renouncing the world or acquire it afterward. “What is provided in the monastery,” it complains, “is insufficient and barely tolerable for a healthy and strong body. What will you do if you fall ill and have nothing set aside for such an occasion to help yourself in your infirmity? Monastic provisions are meager, and the neglect of the sick is great.” If you have nothing of your own that you could use to restore your physical health, you will be forced to die a miserable death. — And even the clothing provided by the monastery is insufficient unless you manage to set aside something with which to buy yourself another set. Finally, it is not possible to live in the same monastery forever; and in that case, if you do not set aside money for travel expenses and the sea crossing, you will not be able to move on from there whenever you wish, and thus, constrained by extreme poverty, you will constantly lead a miserable, labor-filled life without any success. – When a monk entangles his mind with such thoughts, he begins to devise ways to acquire even a single denarius; and to this end, he seeks out some private work, which he performs with the utmost care, without his Abba’s knowledge. After secretly selling it and receiving the coveted coin, he frets and fusses over it, wondering where to put it or to whom to entrust it for safekeeping; meanwhile, an even more acute concern has already begun to gnaw at him: how to double that coin—and he intently devises elaborate plans for what to buy with it and what financial maneuvers to employ to achieve this. And when he succeeds in this, as he desires, a most insatiable greed for gold arises within him, which then flares up ever more intensely the greater the profit he reaps: for as his money multiplies, so does the frenzy of his passion for it. Other anxious thoughts further fan the flames: the prospect of a long life, advanced old age, and various prolonged infirmities—which will be impossible to endure in old age unless one accumulates a large amount of money in one's younger years. – Thus, the wretched soul, bound by the chains of this serpent (the love of money), is drawn farther and farther along, in a desire to multiply—with unseemly anxiety—a fortune that was ill-gotten from the start, thereby breeding within itself a poison that devours her ever more cruelly, like a flame. Consumed entirely by greedy thoughts, she turns her heart's gaze to nothing but the source from which she might obtain money, so that with it she might flee as quickly as possible from the yoke of monastic austerity. As soon as any hope of obtaining money flashes before her, she no longer values anything: for its sake, she will not shrink from lying, breaking an oath, stealing, or betraying her fidelity. In short, gold and the hope of gain are her god in all things, just as the belly is for others. That is why the blessed Apostle, foreseeing the destructive poison of this disease, called it not only the root of all evil but also idolatry, saying: “and covetousness” (—put to death), “which is idolatry” (Col. 3:5).

3. There are three kinds of this affliction, which all the Fathers condemn with equal abhorrence: one is the one whose destructiveness we have described above—which, by deceiving certain unfortunate souls, persuades them to accumulate what they did not even possess before, when they lived in the world; the second is that which prompts them to desire again and reclaim what they left behind at the beginning of their renunciation of the world; the third is that which, arising from the very ill-conceived beginning of monastic life—accepted with an imperfect renunciation of all things—prevents those whom it manages to infect with this spiritual coldness from completely divesting themselves of all worldly possessions, by frightening them with the prospect of future deprivation and weakening them through unbelief: and then, because they have retained money and other property—which they were supposed to have left behind upon renouncing the world—it no longer allows them to attain Gospel perfection in any way— And in Holy Scripture we find examples of the condemnation of these three kinds of downfall, accompanied by severe punishments for them. Thus, Gehazi, desiring to obtain what he had not possessed before, not only failed to receive the grace of prophecy—which he was to have received from his teacher, as it were by hereditary succession—but was also struck with leprosy by Elisha's curse (2 Kings 5:21, 27). Judas, on the other hand, desiring to reclaim the money he had previously rejected when he followed Christ, not only fell into the betrayal of the Lord and lost his apostolic office, but was also not granted a natural end to his life, bringing it to a close by suicide (Matt. 27:5); and Ananias and Sapphira, having withheld a portion of what they owned, were sentenced to death by the Apostles (Acts 5:1–11).

4. Concerning those who have renounced the world but were later overcome by unbelief and fear to remain stripped of all earthly possessions, Deuteronomy mysteriously prescribes: “Any man who is fearful and fainthearted” (let him not go out to war) “shall go and return to his home; so that he may not strike fear into the heart of his brother, as he has done to his own heart” (Deut. 20: 8). What, one might ask, could be more evident than this prophecy? Does not Holy Scripture clearly desire that they should rather not even aspire to such a calling, nor take its name upon themselves, than to weaken others with their words and bad example through their unfounded fear, and lead them away from Gospel perfection? Therefore, they are commanded to withdraw from the battle and return to their homes, for no one with a divided heart can fight in the Lord's war. For “a double-minded man is unstable in all his ways” (James 1:8). And upon reflecting on the meaning of that Gospel parable—in which it is said that a king, having gone out with ten thousand men against another who was marching against him with twenty thousand, and not hoping to succeed in battle against him while the other was still far off, sent to ask for peace (obviously not wishing to begin the battle at all)— we come to the same conclusion: that it is better for the persons mentioned above not to begin renouncing the world at all than, having begun, to fail to persevere in it earnestly and with complete precision, thereby exposing themselves to great danger. For, as the Wise One says, “It is better for you not to make a promise than, having promised, not to fulfill it” (Eccl. 5: 4). It is well said here that one goes forth with ten thousand, while the other with twenty. For the number of passions that assail us is greater than the number of good dispositions fighting on our behalf. But “no one can... serve both God and mammon” (Matt. 6:24), and: “No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God” (Luke 9:62).

5. Such people usually try to justify their continued greed by appealing to the authority of Holy Scripture. By misinterpreting it, they are only too happy to distort and alter at will the meaning of the Apostle and even the Lord Himself, failing to adapt their own lives or understanding to the meaning of Scripture, but instead twisting Scripture to suit their own self-indulgence. Wishing to demonstrate in this instance as well that Scripture agrees with their opinion, they say: “It is written: ‘It is more blessed to give than to receive’ (Acts 20:35).” By interpreting these words in the most perverse manner, they believe that they completely nullify the force of the saying that states: “If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow Me” (Matt. 19:21). They think that, based on such a plausible argument, they should not give up their wealth, and they proclaim themselves to be even more blessed than those who have given it up, when, being themselves secure through their former possessions, they share the surplus with others; whereas they are ashamed to embrace, with the Apostle, glorious poverty for Christ’s sake, and do not wish to be content with the labor of their own hands and the meager monastic sustenance. They are left with one of two options: either to acknowledge that they have deceived themselves and have never renounced the world, since they are so attached to their former wealth; or, if they wish to test the monastic calling through deeds and labor, to reject and disperse everything, so that, retaining nothing for themselves of what they have renounced, they may boast with the Apostle of hunger and thirst, cold and nakedness (2 Cor. 11:27).

6. There is a saying attributed to St. Basil, Bishop of Caesarea, which he addressed to a senator who was frozen in the kind of—who, while claiming to have renounced the world, retained some of his property, unwilling to support himself by the labor of his own hands or to learn true humility through poverty in all things, arduous labor, and monastic obedience. “And,” he said to him, “you have lost your status as a senator and have not become a monk.”

7. Therefore, if we wish to lawfully engage in spiritual struggle, let us drive this destructive enemy from our hearts—for while it is no great feat to defeat him, to be defeated by him is dishonorable and disgraceful. For to be defeated by a strong opponent, though painful because of being cast down, and regrettable because of the loss of victory, yet in such a case the defeated derive some consolation from the awareness of their opponent’s strength. But if one must endure this when the opponent is weak, and the nature of the struggle is not difficult, then the humiliating shame will cause far greater pain than the pain of being cast down, and the disgrace will be a far heavier burden.

8. Final victory and complete triumph over this enemy can be expected only when the monk’s conscience is not stained by the possession of even the smallest coin. For whoever, having been carried away by even a small monetary gift, has once taken root in his heart the seed of covetous desire, it is impossible not to be immediately consumed by the fire of desire for greater things. And a soldier of Christ will remain victorious, will be beyond all danger, and will be immune to the assault of this passion, only as long as this most vile spirit has not sown the seeds of its lust in his heart. Just as, in all kinds of passions, one must primarily guard against the head of the serpent, so too, with regard to this one, one must take the most meticulous precautions to ensure that its head does not penetrate inward in any way. For if it is allowed to enter, nourished by its own substance and growing in strength, it will of its own accord kindle an excessive fire. And therefore, one must not only fear the possession of money, but the very desire for it must be completely eradicated from the soul; and it is not so much a matter of avoiding acts of greed as of cutting off its passion at the root: for the lack of money will bring us no benefit if the desire to have it remains within us.

9. Even one who lacks money may not be free from the disease of avarice; and it will be of no benefit to strip oneself of all possessions if one has failed to cut off the passion of greed, having taken pleasure in the act of becoming destitute rather than in the virtue of poverty itself, and having come to terms with the harsh necessity (of doing so) not without a heavy heart. For just as the Gospel proclaims some who are not defiled in body to be unclean in heart (Matt. 5:28), so too those who are not in the least burdened by the weight of money may be condemned along with the avaricious, in heart and mind. They lacked only the opportunity to acquire wealth, not the will, which in God’s eyes always carries more weight than necessity. That is why we must take every possible care to ensure that the fruits of our labor are not lost in vain: for it is truly regrettable to suffer the consequences of stripping oneself of everything and falling into poverty, only to lose the fruits of this due to the barren, sinful desires of the will.

10. Do you want to know what pernicious fruits this passion bears and what offshoots of other passions it gives rise to, to the ruin of whoever embraces it—if it is not thoroughly eradicated? Look at Judas, who was counted among the Apostles! How did it—since he did not wish to crush the deadly head of this serpent—destroy him with its poison, entangling him in the snares of its lust, and cast him into what a precipitous abyss of crime, when it taught him to sell the Redeemer of the world and the Author of human salvation for thirty pieces of silver? He would never have been driven to such a godless act of betrayal had he not been infected with the disease of greed, nor would he have become the sacrilegious instigator of the Lord's murder had he not previously grown accustomed to stealing from the treasury entrusted to him.

11. Here is the most striking example of the tyranny of this passion, which, as we have said, once it has taken hold of his soul, no longer allows him to observe any rule of honesty, and no amount of profit can ever satisfy it. For the end of its frenzy lies not in becoming rich, but in stripping oneself of everything. Take this very Judas, for example: having been given control of the funds set aside for distribution to the poor—so that, having sated himself with the abundance of this money, he might at least temper his passion—he, on the contrary, was so inflamed by an unbridled passion that he not only secretly stole from the funds but also desired to sell the Lord Himself. For the frenzy of this passion cannot be sated by any amount of wealth.

12. That is why St. Peter the Apostle, knowing that it is impossible for one who possesses anything out of passion to keep the love of money within proper bounds, and that the end of this passion is not determined by a sum—whether small or large—but by complete detachment from all things, punished Ananias and Sapphira with death for having withheld something for themselves from their possessions. And they perished because of a lie born of greed, just as Judas destroyed himself through the sin of betraying the Lord. What a similarity there is between them in both crime and punishment! There, the love of money led to betrayal; here, to lies. There, the truth is betrayed; here, the sin of lying is committed. Although the act of sin there and here may not appear similar, they both converge on the same goal. The former, in order to escape poverty, coveted once again what he had rejected; and the latter, in order not to become poor, attempted to keep for themselves a portion of their possessions, which they were obliged either to bring faithfully to the Apostles or to distribute entirely to the brethren. That is why, in both cases, the same punishment of death ensued: for both sins sprang from the same root—the love of money. — If, then (to take this further), such a severe sentence was passed on those who did not covet the possessions of others but sought to keep their own and had no desire to acquire more, but only a desire to preserve what they had, what then can be said of those who covet to amass money they never possessed, and who, while appearing poor before people, are revealed before God to be rich in the passion of greed?

13. Those who are greedy must be regarded as lepers of spirit and soul, like Gezuius, who, coveting the perishable money of this world, was struck by a contagious and unclean leprosy. Through this, he left us a clear indication that a soul defiled by the sinful passion of greed is afflicted by the spiritual contagion of the passions and stands before the eyes of the Lord as unclean, under eternal condemnation.

14. Therefore, if, striving for perfection, you have left everything and followed Christ, heeding His word: “Go, sell your possessions and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow Me” (Matt. 19: 21), then why, having already put your hand to the plow, do you look back, only to be declared unfit for the Kingdom of Heaven by the very words of the Lord Himself (Luke 9: 62)? Having been placed on the roof—the height of Gospel perfection—why do you go back into your house to take from there anything that you had so willingly despised before (Luke 17:31)? Having been placed in the field of virtuous deeds, why do you once again strive to burden yourself with worldly possessions, from which you stripped yourself when you renounced the world?—If, warned by poverty at that time, you had nothing to leave behind, then all the more so should you now refrain from acquiring what you did not previously possess. It was by God's special favor toward you that you were thus prepared (through poverty to renounce the world)—so that, unhindered by any bonds of worldly possessions, you might hasten all the more to Him. However, let none of the poor feel humiliated because of this (that they have nothing to leave behind); for there is no one who does not have something to leave behind. He who has cut off at the root the very passion for acquiring worldly possessions has renounced all worldly possessions.

15. We cannot preserve this virtue of non-possessiveness whole and unharmed except by living in a monastery, if, as the Apostle says, “having food and clothing, we will be content with these” (1 Tim. 6:8).

16. Therefore, keeping in mind the condemnation of Ananias and Sapphira, let us be afraid to hold on to anything that we have vowed to abandon completely, intending to renounce the world. Fearing also the example of Gehazi, who was punished with incurable leprosy for the sin of greed, let us be careful not to acquire what we did not previously possess. Equally horrified by both Judas's wickedness and his fate, let us do our utmost to avoid accumulating money again, which we have renounced once and for all. – Above all else, reflecting on the mortality of our nature and the uncertainty of the hour of our death, let us take care that when the Day of the Lord comes, like a thief in the night, it does not find our conscience stained by greed, even for a single olive; for even that alone, by nullifying all the fruits of our renunciation of the world, will cause what the Lord said to the rich man in the Gospel to be turned against us: “You fool! This very night your soul will be required of you; and the things you have prepared, whose will they be?” (Luke 12:20)? And without giving the slightest thought to tomorrow, let us not allow ourselves to deviate from the rules of communal life. Undoubtedly, we will be unable to fulfill this, nor will we be able to live peacefully under the rules of the monastic charter, unless the virtue of patience is first firmly established within us on a solid foundation—a virtue whose source is none other than humility.

4. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Anger

1. In the fourth battle, we must root out the deadly poison of anger from the depths of our souls. For as long as it lodges in our hearts and blinds the eye of our mind with pernicious darkness, we cannot acquire a correct discernment of good and evil, nor the acuity of virtuous contemplation; nor can we possess the maturity of counsel, nor share in life, nor hold fast to the truth, nor even perceive true spiritual light; for it is said: “My eye is troubled by wrath” (Ps. 6: 8); we cannot become partakers of wisdom, even if we were proclaimed wise by the opinion of all, since “wrath rests in the bosom of fools” (Eccl. 7: 10); nor can we attain eternal life, even if by human standards we were considered wise, for “anger destroys even the wise” (Prov. 15:1); we cannot always uphold the scales of justice according to the dictates of our hearts, for “the anger of a man does not bring about the righteousness of God” (James 1:20); nor can we in any way possess the dignity so common even among the people of this age, even if, by virtue of birth, we were regarded as noble and honorable, since “a hot-tempered man is not respectable” (Prov. 11: 25), nor can we possess the wisdom of counsel, even if we appear to have acquired extensive knowledge, for “a hot-tempered man acts without counsel” (Prov. 14: 17); we cannot be at peace from anxieties and disturbances, nor free from sin, even if others caused us no trouble at all, for “a wrathful man” (himself) “stirs up strife; but a hot-tempered man reveals” (discloses without shame) “sins” (Prov. 29: 22).

2. Some, striving to excuse this destructive disease of the soul, attempt to downplay its (indecent) by means of the most indecent interpretation of Scripture, saying: it is no harm to be angry with our brothers who sin, since God Himself is inflamed with anger and fury against those who either do not wish to know Him or, knowing Him, do not honor Him as they ought—as, for example: “And the Lord was angry with His people” (Ps. 105: 40), or as in another passage where the Prophet prays, saying: “O Lord, do not rebuke me in Your wrath, nor chastise me in Your anger” (Ps. 6: 2). – And they do not realize that, while thereby granting people the freedom to act according to this passion to their own ruin, they also impute an impure, carnal passion to God, who is infinite and the source of all purity.

3. If these and similar passages of Scripture are understood literally, in a crude, sensory sense, it would follow that God sleeps and wakes, sits and walks, turns toward someone and turns away from them, draws near and moves away—and that He has bodily parts—a head, eyes, hands, feet, and the like. — Just as all this cannot be understood literally—without the utmost sacrilege—of the One who, according to Scripture itself, is invisible, indescribable, and omnipresent, so too can we not attribute to Him, without blasphemy, outbursts of anger and fury. The terms “limbs” and “movements” denote divine attributes and providential actions toward us, which we can more easily understand under these figurative names: “eyes” signify God’s omniscience and omnipotence; “hands” and “feet”—His creativity and providence; “muscles”—His strength and omnipotence, and so on. Likewise, when we read about God’s anger or fury, we must understand it not in a human sense, but in a manner befitting God, who is free from all agitation; —that is, we must understand that He is the Judge and the righteous avenger of all that is done unjustly in this world; and, fearing God’s righteous punishment when reading such sayings, we must in every way guard against doing anything contrary to His will.

4. Let the monk, striving for perfection and desiring to engage in spiritual struggles in accordance with the law, be free from every stirrings of the passions of anger and fury, hearing what the chosen vessel commands him: “Let all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, and slander be put away from you, along with all malice” (Eph. 4:31)—who, in saying, “Let all anger be put away from you,” did not exclude from this command any movement of anger, as if it were necessary or beneficial. Therefore, when a monk hastens, if necessary, to heal a sinning brother, let him do so in such a way that, while seeking to administer a remedy to one suffering—perhaps from a very mild fever—he does not, in his anger, plunge himself into the worse disease of blindness. For whoever wishes to heal another’s wound must himself be healthy and free from all illness, lest the words of the Gospel be spoken to him: “Physician, heal yourself” (Luke 4:23)—and likewise: “Why do you see the speck in your brother’s eye, but do not notice the log in your own eye? Or how can you say to your brother, ‘Let me remove the speck from your eye,’ when there is a log in your own eye?” (Matthew 7:3–4)!

5. Whatever the cause that kindles the flame of anger, it blinds the eyes of the heart, and by casting a veil over the sharpness of intellectual vision, it prevents us from seeing the Sun of Righteousness. It makes no difference whether a sheet of gold, lead, or some other metal is placed over the eyes; the value of the metals makes no difference in the blindness they cause. – Yet anger can also serve us very well when we become indignant, resenting the lustful impulses of our heart and taking offense that something is rising up in the recesses of our breast—something we should not do or even speak of— we are ashamed before others, trembling with fear at the thought of the presence of the Angels and God Himself, who is everywhere and all-pervading, and of the all-seeing Eye of God, from which no secrets of our conscience can possibly be hidden. Or when we grow angry at this very anger itself, wondering why it has crept in, stirring us up against our brother, and with anger we cast out its pernicious promptings, not allowing it to hide in the recesses of our hearts to harm us. Thus the Prophet teaches us to be angry; he so resolutely cast this passion out of his own feelings that he did not even wish to render retribution to his obvious enemies, even those whom God had delivered into his hands. Thus, when Semei, throwing stones at King David, slandered him to his face before everyone, and Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, wanted to cut off his head in retaliation for such an insult to the King, blessed David, moved by godly indignation against such a suggestion, preserved his unshakable meekness, and set an example of humility and steadfast patience, saying: “What is this to me and to you, son of Saruina? Leave him alone, and let him curse, for the Lord has told him to curse David; and who will ask, ‘Why have you done this?’ My own son, who came from my own body, seeks my life—how much more so the son of Jemini! Let him curse me, for the Lord has told him to do so. Perhaps the Lord will look upon my humility and restore my good fortune in place of his curse this very day” (2 Sam. 16:10–12).

6. Thus, we are permitted to be angry, but in a way that leads to salvation—that is, toward ourselves and toward the evil thoughts that arise—to “be angry” at them, and “not to sin,” that is, not to put them into practice to our own ruin. The following verse expresses this very same meaning more clearly: “Repent in your hearts, O you who dwell in your beds” (Ps. 4:5), that is, whatever you think in your hearts due to the sudden intrusion of tempting suggestions, once you have managed, through calm reflection, to quell all the noise and turbulence of anger—and, as it were, to lie down on a peaceful bed—correct and atone for it with saving contrition. And the blessed Paul, drawing on the instruction of this verse, after saying, “Be angry, yet do not sin,” added: “Do not let the sun go down on your anger, nor give the devil a foothold” (Eph. 4:26–27). If it is harmful to allow the sun of righteousness to set while we are still angry, and if, when we become angry, we immediately give the devil a foothold in our hearts, then how could he have previously commanded us to be angry, saying, “Be angry, but do not sin”? Does He not clearly express the following: be angry at your own passions and at your very anger itself, so that otherwise—if you give in to it—the Sun of Righteousness—Christ—will not begin to set in your minds darkened by anger, and with His departure, you will not have given the devil a foothold in your hearts.

7. In an allegorical sense, the sun can be understood as the mind, which is rightly called the sun because it illuminates all the thoughts and desires of our heart—and the prohibition against anger can be seen as the commandment not to extinguish this light with the passion of anger; so that, when it sets, the darkness of turbulent confusion—along with its originator, the devil—does not take over our entire heart, and we, enveloped in the darkness of anger, do not remain, as it were, in the dark of night, unaware of what to do. It is in this sense that the Apostles’ passage is to be understood, as handed down to us in the teachings of the elders, who do not permit us to allow anger to creep into our hearts even for a single moment, taking every possible care to avoid falling under the punishment decreed for this in the Gospel: “Whoever is angry with his brother will be subject to judgment” (Matt. 5:22). – Moreover, if it were permissible to continue being angry until sunset, the passion of anger, taking advantage of such permission, would always rush to satisfy its vengeance, as if lawfully, before the sun sets.

8. What, then, are we to say of those whose relentlessness knows no bounds—not even at sunset—but who harbor resentment for many days against those with whom they have quarreled? Let them sometimes say in words that they are not angry; yet their actions often clearly reveal their deep resentment when, for example, they do not address others with proper speech or speak with their usual kindness. They imagine that they are not sinning in this, because they do not seek retribution for their irritation. But they simply do not dare, or are unable, to reveal it; yet it boils within their hearts, and they silently endure it, thereby turning the poison of anger to their own ruin; they do not immediately expel the bitterness of resentment through the strength of their soul, but digest it over many days, and only gradually, with time, do they somewhat subdue it.

9. It is as if one who, driven by anger, does only what he can, is still not satisfied with his vengeance and resentment! This is exactly what those do who restrain their angry impulses not out of a desire for peace, but out of an inability to take revenge, venting it nonetheless however they can. For, having no way to inflict anything more on those at whom they are angry than to refuse to speak to them with their usual kindness, they vent their anger on them in this way. As if it were enough to temper anger by restraining its outward expression, and there were no need to root it out from the recesses of the heart—lest, darkened by its gloom, we lose sound judgment and the light of knowledge, and cease to be a temple of the Holy Spirit while the spirit of anger dwells within us. For anger hidden in the heart, though it does not offend those present, drives out the brightest radiance of the Holy Spirit just as much as anger that is revealed.

10. And how can we think that God would allow us to hold onto anger for even a single moment, when He does not permit us to offer the sacrifice of our spiritual prayers if we are aware—not that we are angry with another, but that another has something against us—saying: “If you bring your gift to the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar; first go and be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift” (Matt. 5:23–24)? – How, then, can we think that we are permitted to hold a grudge against a brother—not for many days, but even until sunset—if, as states, while he holds a grudge against us, we are not permitted to offer our prayers to God—we who are commanded by the Apostle: “Pray without ceasing” (1 Thess. 5:17), and: “I want men everywhere to pray, lifting up holy hands without anger or disputing” (1 Tim. 2:8)? – Therefore, if we harbor such poison in our hearts, we are left with only two options: either never to pray at all, and thus be guilty of violating the Apostolic and Gospel commandment that enjoins us to pray without ceasing and in every place, – or—if, somehow deluding ourselves, we dare to offer our prayer despite the prohibition against it—to know that in such a case we are not offering prayer to the Lord, but expressing proud disobedience, in a spirit of rebellion against Him.

11. But why should we dwell any longer on the Gospel and Apostolic commandments, when even the Old Law—which seems to make some allowance for our weaknesses—also warns against it, saying, “You shall not hate your brother in your heart” (Lev. 19:17)—and again: “The way of the malicious leads to death” (Prov. 12:28)—and further: “Your hand shall not take vengeance, nor shall you bear a grudge against the sons of your people” (Lev. 19:18)? —You see that even there, ill will toward one’s brothers is cut off not only in action but also in secret thoughts, when we are commanded to root out hatred from the heart and, regarding an offense, not only to refrain from retaliation but even to forget it.

12. Sometimes, overcome by pride or impatience, when we feel a particular inner compulsion to correct our disorderly and chaotic disposition, we complain to ourselves that we lack a desert—meaning, in other words, the hope that there, undisturbed by anyone, we would immediately acquire the virtue of patience, thus evidently excusing our own negligence (in curbing our outbursts of anger) and attributing the cause of their arousal not to our own impatience but shifting the blame onto our brothers. But if we continue to shift the blame for our shortcomings in this matter onto others, we will never be able to attain the proper measure of patience and perfection. Do not place the task of correcting and pacifying our hearts in the hands of another’s will, over which we have no control whatsoever, but keep it within the good disposition of our own will. That we may not become angry should depend not on the perfection of another, but on our own virtue, acquired not through someone else’s patience, but through our own magnanimity.

13. Moreover, one should seek the desert only after being perfected and purified of every passion, or after having thoroughly purged all passions in the community of the brethren, and one should enter it not out of cowardly flight, but out of a desire to attain the heights of divine contemplation, which even the perfected cannot attain except in the desert. For whatever passions we carry into the desert that have not been healed will be felt as hidden within us, not as having been eradicated. And just as the desert reserves the purest contemplation for those whose hearts are purified and reveals the knowledge of spiritual mysteries in the most sincere vision, so too does it usually not only preserve but even intensify the passions of those who have not purified themselves of them. In such a case, a person may seem patient and humble to himself as long as he does not see anyone or interact with others; but immediately returns to his former disposition as soon as any circumstance prompts him to act: then the passions that had been hidden within him immediately surge forth and, like unbridled horses fattened by long inactivity, burst from their stalls with great eagerness and fury, leading to the ruin of their rider. For passions, not having been purified beforehand, become even more frenzied within us when the opportunities to reveal and restrain them among people are cut off. And we lose even the shadow of patience—which we imagined we possessed while living among our brothers, and which we displayed, at least out of respect for them and out of shame at appearing cowardly before everyone—in the carefree wilderness of carelessness.

14. This is similar to how all kinds of poisonous snakes or beasts, as long as they remain hidden in the desert and in their burrows and lairs, do no harm—and yet they are not declared harmless simply because they do not harm anyone in such cases: for this is not due to their benign nature, but because the desert compels them to be so; but as soon as they find an opportunity to harm, they immediately reveal the venom and savagery hidden within them. – So, too, for those seeking perfection, it is not enough simply not to be angry at people (when there is no interaction or conflict with them. Anger remains alive in such cases; it is merely concealed and ready to pounce on anything at a moment's notice). I recall how, while living in the desert, I would sometimes get angry at my writing cane if I didn't like its thickness or thinness—sometimes at a small knife if, when cutting with it, it had become dull and wouldn't cut quickly—sometimes at a flint if a spark of fire didn't fly from it quickly enough when I was in a hurry to read; and the surge of indignation would sometimes be so intense that a curse would involuntarily escape my lips against the lifeless object, or inevitably against the devil: which would dispel my confusion—and my soul would be calmed. Thus, in the pursuit of perfection, the absence of people who might provoke anger is of little benefit, since—if patience is not acquired beforehand—the passion of anger can exert its power even on mute objects and trivial matters; for as long as it remains in our hearts, it prevents us both from attaining a peaceful state of mind and from freeing ourselves from other passions.

15. Why, then, if we desire to attain that supreme divine good of which it is said, “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8), must we not only cast this passion out of our actions but also uproot it from the depths of our soul? For it will be of little use to suppress the fury of anger in speech and not reveal it in action, if God—from whom the secrets of the heart are not hidden—sees it in the innermost recesses of the heart. The Gospel commands us to cut off the roots of passions rather than their fruits, for once the roots are uprooted, the fruits will certainly no longer sprout, – and the soul will thus be able to abide constantly in all patience and holiness, when anger is not only removed from the surface of our actions and deeds but also uprooted from the innermost recesses of our thoughts. And that is why we must put to death anger and hatred, so as not to fall into the sin of murder, which cannot be committed without them. “For whoever is angry with his brother without cause will be subject to judgment” (Matt. 5:22); and—“whoever hates his brother is a murderer” (1 John 3:15). Since in his heart he desires the destruction of the one against whom he is angry; then, although people do not consider him to have shed blood with his own hand or by the sword, the very passion of anger declares him a murderer before the Lord, Who will reward or punish each person not only for the act itself but also for the intention of the will, as He Himself says through the Prophet: “I know their deeds and their thoughts, and I am coming to gather all the nations...” (Isa. 66:18). And the Apostle: “They condemn or justify one another in their own minds on the day when God, who is hidden, will judge men” (Rom. 2:15–16).

16. Therefore, a disciple of Christ who is striving lawfully must uproot the passion of anger from within himself. For the complete healing of this disease, the following treatment is necessary: first of all, to believe that it is not fitting to be angry under any circumstances, whether for just or unjust reasons—knowing that as soon as our inner light, the light of our heart, is darkened by the darkness of anger, we will immediately lose the light of discernment, the steadfastness of prudence, propriety, and the standard of truth; second, to hold fast to the conviction that if the spirit of anger takes root within us, the purity of our spirit will inevitably be clouded as a result, and it can no longer serve as a temple of the Holy Spirit; finally, to reflect on the fact that, as long as we remain in anger, we will be utterly unable to pray or pour out our petitions before God. Above all, bearing in mind the uncertainty of the limits of human life, let us constantly bear in mind that we may depart from this body at any moment, and that neither the observance of chastity, nor the renunciation of all possessions, nor the contempt for wealth, nor the labors of fasting and vigils will help us in the least when, for a single act of anger and hatred, the Judge of the universe threatens us with eternal torment.

5. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Sorrow

1. In the fifth battle, we must fend off the barbs of all-consuming sorrow—which, if it somehow gains possession of our heart, cuts off the vision of divine contemplation, and, having cast the entire soul down from the heights of holy serenity, ultimately weakens and oppresses it: it prevents it from offering prayers with its usual heartfelt fervor, nor does it allow it to devote itself to the reading of the Holy Scriptures—that spiritual weapon and remedy—nor does it permit it to live in peace and quiet with the brethren, —it makes her impatient and grumbling toward all the obligatory duties of obedience; and, having taken away all sound judgment and agitated the heart, it renders her as if mad and intoxicated, and crushes and overwhelms her with ruinous despair.

2. Why, if we wish to labor lawfully in the spiritual battle, must we treat this illness with no less care? For “as moths in a garment and worms in a tree, so sorrow harms a man’s heart” (Prov. 25:21)—as the Divine Spirit has clearly and unequivocally expressed the power of this pernicious and most destructive passion. Just as clothing eaten away by moths is no longer of any value and is no longer fit for honorable use—and just as a tree hollowed out by worms is no longer worthy of being set aside for the construction or decoration of any building, even a modest one, but is destined to be burned by fire: so too the soul, devoured by the pangs of the most crushing sorrow, is no longer fit for that high-priestly vestment which the Holy Spirit, descending from heaven first upon Aaron’s beard, then takes upon its hem, as depicted in the prophecy of Saint David—in the following words: “For the myrrh on the head, descending upon the beard, the beard of Aaron, descending upon the hem of his garments” (132:2)—nor for the building and adornment of that spiritual temple whose foundation was laid by Paul, the most wise Architect, when he said: “You are God’s temple, and the Spirit of God dwells in you” (1 Cor. 3:16), and for which certain kinds of trees are used, as the Bride describes in the Song of Songs, saying: “Let the cedars be the beams of our house, and our planks of cypress” (Song of Songs 1:16). And so these kinds of trees are chosen for the temple of God—fragrant and rot-resistant, which would be subject neither to decay from age nor to the gnawing of worms.

3. Sometimes this illness tends to arise from a preceding passion—whether anger, lust, or greed—when a person experiences the loss of a hope preconceived in the mind that their affairs or possessions would bring satisfaction according to their nature; at other times, however, without any apparent cause, that could have plunged us into this abyss, under the influence of the crafty enemy, such sorrow suddenly seizes us that we are unable to receive even the most dear and necessary people with our usual warmth, and whatever they may say in appropriate conversation is then regarded by us as inappropriate and superfluous; and we offer them no pleasant reply, because every corner of our heart is filled with bitter sorrow.

4. This most clearly proves that the pangs of sorrow within us are not always aroused by the fault of others, but rather by our own; for we ourselves carry within us the causes of all our sorrows, namely in the seeds of the passions, which, as soon as the rain of temptations waters our soul, immediately burst forth into their sprouts and fruits. No one is ever compelled to sin—even if the bad example of others were to incite him to it—unless he has the substance of that sin hidden in his heart. And one cannot possibly believe, for example, that someone would suddenly be seized by the passion of lustful desire (having been unaware of it before) merely by glancing at a beautiful woman and being struck by her beauty; rather, one must assume that if he lusted after her in that moment, it was because the sight of her brought to the surface a disease hidden within. That is why we must direct all our attention primarily toward purifying our eyes of passion and correcting our feelings and dispositions.

5. There is also another kind of sorrow—the most pernicious—when it instills in a sinful soul not the intention to reform one’s life and purify oneself of passions, but the most destructive despair. It was this very sorrow that prevented Cain from repenting after the fratricide, and did not allow Judas, after his betrayal, to seek a means of atonement, but rather led him, through the despair it instilled, to hang himself.

6. We should regard sorrow as beneficial to us only when we accept it, having been moved either by repentance for our sins, or by a fervent desire for perfection, or by the contemplation of future bliss. Blessed Paul speaks of it as well: “For godly sorrow produces repentance leading to salvation, but the sorrow of this world produces death” (2 Cor. 7:10).

7. But that sorrow which brings about repentance leading to salvation is undoubtedly faithful, submissive, gracious, humble, gentle, pleasant, and patient; for, springing from love for God, although it tirelessly strives toward bodily mortification and the brokenness of spirit out of a desire for perfection, it is at the same time constantly comforted and enlivened by the hope of success, and therefore retains all the pleasantness of friendliness and good-naturedness, possessing within herself all the fruits of the Holy Spirit, which the same Apostle enumerates: “The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control” (Gal. 5:22). But this one—the sorrow of this world—is extremely grumbling, impatient, harsh, filled with repulsive stubbornness, fruitless lamentation, and ruinous despair; it upsets and distracts those it overtakes from every pursuit and from salutary self-examination, and not only stifles the power of prayer but also devastates all the spiritual fruits mentioned above, which are usually brought about by that “sorrow according to God.”

8. Why, apart from that sorrow which is received either through saving repentance, or through zeal for perfection, or through the desire for future blessings, every other kind of sorrow—being worldly and death-bringing—must be rejected and completely cast out, just as the spirit of fornication, the love of money, and anger must be.

9. We can drive this most destructive passion from ourselves if, by constantly nourishing our soul with spiritual instruction, we revive and strengthen it with hope and the contemplation of future bliss. In this way, we can overcome all kinds of sorrows—those arising from prior anger, those resulting from the loss of profit or the incurrance of a loss, those born of the wrongs done to us, and those arising from irrational emotional distress, and those that plunge us into mortal despair: for, being constantly comforted by the contemplation of eternal future blessings and remaining steadfast in this state of mind, we will neither lose heart in times of misfortune nor become elated in times of happiness, viewing both as insignificant and fleeting. (To soothe a sorrowful spirit, read also Section 7 of the excerpts from St. Cassian—on the struggle against calamities and sorrows.)

6. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Despondency

1. The sixth struggle we face is against the passion which the Greeks call αχθία, and which we may call despondency, boredom, or heartache. It is akin to sorrow, is experienced most acutely by monks wandering in the deserts, and is a hostile enemy of those living in solitude; it troubles every monk, especially around the sixth hour, (which is 12 o'clock at noon in our time), like some kind of fever that strikes the afflicted soul at certain hours with its all-disrupting effects. Some elders (Evagrius, Volume I, p. 631) call it the “midday demon,” which is mentioned in Psalm 90.

2. When despondency assails the poor soul of a monk, it gives rise to dread of the place, aversion to the cell, and contempt for the brothers living with him or at some distance from him, regarding them as negligent and entirely unspiritual; it also makes him completely lazy and deters him from any work he usually engages in at his dwelling. It also robs him of the desire to sit in his cell, prevents him from taking up reading, and compels him to sigh and complain that, having lived here so long, he has made no progress whatsoever and has reaped no spiritual fruit; it instills in him the painful realization that he remains in this place in vain and that, when he could have guided others and been of benefit to many, he has not trained anyone here, nor has he spiritually nurtured anyone through his guidance and teaching. Then it extols distant monasteries to him, describing those places as more conducive to spiritual progress and more likely to contribute to salvation, and portrays fellowship with the brothers there as delightful and full of spiritual edification; in contrast, it portrays his present situation as unbearable, reminding him that there is no edification to be gained from the brothers residing here, and that everything necessary for the sustenance of the body is obtained only with immense effort. Finally, it instills in the hermit the conviction that, by remaining in this place, he cannot be saved unless—leaving the cell in which, if he lingers any longer, he will perish—he moves from here to another place as soon as possible. After this, around the fifth and sixth hours, it reduces his body to such exhaustion and stirs up such hunger that he feels as if he were weary and exhausted from a long journey and the hardest labor, or as if he had endured a two- or three-day fast without any food. And so he looks around anxiously from side to side, sighs that none of his brothers is coming to him, frequently leaves his cell and returns to it, and gazes at the sun, as if it were not in such a hurry to set. In such senseless confusion of mind, as if shrouded in darkness, he becomes incapable of any spiritual activity and begins to think that there is no other remedy for such a affliction except to visit a brother or to find solace in sleep. Then this destructive spirit begins to suggest to the one it is tormenting that he must offer the necessary greetings to the brethren or visit the sick, whether near or far; it also instills in him, as a duty, the idea that he ought to find such-and-such male or female relatives here, and to visit them more often—that it would be a great act of piety to visit such-and-such a devout woman, who has dedicated herself to God but is deprived of any support from her relatives, more often and to provide her with everything she needs, since her own relatives neglect her, —and that one should labor more in such acts of piety than sit idly in one’s cell without any fruit or success.

3. Thus the poor soul, beset by such hostile wiles, is in such turmoil that the monk, weary in spirit from despondency, either tries to throw himself into bed or, leaving the seclusion of his cell, attempts to seek deliverance from such a scourge by visiting a brother. But this very remedy, which he now uses as a cure, will soon be turned by the enemy into a means of causing him even greater distress. For the enemy will attack more frequently and more fiercely the one whom he has learned, through experience, immediately turns his back on him as soon as the struggle begins, and who seeks his salvation not in victory or in resistance, but in flight; until, having gradually drifted away from the cell, he begins to forget the primary purpose of his calling, which consists in the pursuit of divine, all-surpassing purity—a purity that can be attained nowhere else but through constant, silent abiding in the cell and unceasing divine instruction. Thus, the soldier of Christ eventually flees from his army, becomes entangled in worldly affairs, and ceases to be pleasing to the Commander (2 Tim. 2: 4), under whom he promised to serve.

4. Blessed David expressed all the pernicious consequences of this disease most beautifully in the following verse: “My soul slumbers from despondency” (Ps. 118:28). And indeed, it is not the body but the soul that slumbers at this time. For the soul, wounded by the arrow of this destructive passion, truly falls asleep to every striving for virtue and to the watchfulness over its spiritual sensibilities.

5. Therefore, the true warrior of Christ, desiring to strive lawfully in the struggle for perfection, must also strive to drive this disease from the recesses of his soul and boldly arm himself against this most unseemly spirit of despondency—so that he may neither fall from being struck by the arrow of sleep nor flee from the confinement of his hermitage, even under the specious pretext of piety.

6. For whoever he begins to overcome from any angle, he will either leave that person to remain in the cell without any progress, as one who is lazy and careless—or, having driven him out of there, will make him idle and lazy in every endeavor, forcing him to constantly wander around the brothers’ cells and monasteries, and to think of nothing else but where and under what pretext to find an opportunity to have his next meal. For the mind of an idler thinks of nothing else but food and the belly, until, having encountered somewhere a fellowship of men or women frozen in the same indifference, he becomes entangled in their affairs and needs. Once he has gradually become entangled in such pursuits, which are so harmful to his soul—as if squeezed in the coils of a serpent—he will never again be able to free himself from them in order to return to the neglected duties of his former calling.

7. Thus, the main thing that the spirit of despondency produces in us is that it makes us lazy, deters us from our work, and teaches us idleness. Therefore, the main way to counteract it is: do not give in; keep at your work. In this regard, we can take as a remedy for despondency what St. Paul wrote to the Thessalonians about labor: “I urge you, brothers... to be diligent, to be quiet, and to attend to your own affairs and work with your own hands” (1 Thess. 4:10–11). – He says: “I urge you to be diligent and to remain quiet”—that is, remain quietly in your cells so that, amid the various rumors that are unavoidable for one who idles about here and there, you do not lose your inner peace, and do not then begin to cause the same disturbance to others; “attend to your own affairs”—that is, do not, driven by curiosity, seek to learn about worldly matters or pry into the conduct of various brothers—so that, instead of caring for your own self-improvement and zealously pursuing virtue, you do not become accustomed to wasting your time on condemning and slandering your brothers; “and work with your own hands”—that is, while sitting in your cell, devote yourself to manual labor. By this, he cut off the very possibility of what he had previously warned against. Whoever loves to sit at work has no time to wander here and there, prying into others’ affairs, meddling in them, and gossiping about them. In his second epistle to the same Thessalonians, he adds to this: “We command you, brothers, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to keep away from any brother who walks in disorder, and not according to the tradition that you received from us” (2 Thess. 3:6). Here he is no longer asking, but commanding—and not with mere words, but in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—making it clear that this is an urgent command. From the rest of his discourse, it is evident that this is a command regarding work, and that those who shun it must not be tolerated in the Christian community. – Thus, he commands us to withdraw from those who do not wish to work and to cut them off, as members corrupted by destructive idleness, so that the disease of inactivity, like a deadly contagion, does not spread to the healthy members of the body. This in itself was already a strong incentive to diligence, but he reinforces it even further by setting himself as an example for them to follow (ibid., v. 7). “We,” he says, “while living among you, did not eat anyone’s bread for free” (v. 8), even though “the Lord has commanded that those who preach the gospel should live from the gospel” (1 Cor. 9:14). If, then, even the one who preached the Gospel and performed such a lofty spiritual work did not accept food for free, what can we say in defense of our own laziness—we who are not only not entrusted with any preaching of the Word, but are also commanded to have no other concern except the care of our own soul? By what right do we dare, with idle hands, to eat bread for free—bread that the chosen vessel, burdened with the cares of preaching the Gospel, did not allow himself to eat unless it was the fruit of his own labor? – Lest it seem, however, that his own example is exceptional and is not offered as a model for all to imitate, the Apostle makes it clear that he was not alone in doing so, but that all who were with him—that is, Silas and Timothy, who are writing this with him—also engaged in manual labor. – Lest anyone be tempted to deviate from following his example, imagining that they all worked in silence without intending to set an example that obligates us to labor as well, he states that they had the freedom not to work, yet they worked, “so that we might set an example for you, that you may imitate us” (2 Thess. 3:9)—so that, even if you forget the verbal teaching so often imparted to your ears, you might at least retain in your memory our examples, which have been set before your eyes. Finally, after so many exhortations, the Apostle no longer addresses them with the counsel of a teacher or a physician, but with the authority of the Apostolic office, saying: “If anyone is unwilling to work, let him not eat” (v. 10)! This is a verdict against those who are presumed or foreseen to despise this commandment, pronounced from the seat of the Apostolic judgment.

8. And in his epistle to the Ephesians, the Apostle prescribed this very labor, saying: “Let the thief no longer steal, but rather let him labor, doing honest work with his own hands, so that he may have something to share with those in need” (Eph. 4:28). – We also find in the Acts of the Apostles that he not only taught this but also acted accordingly himself. For when he came to Corinth, he did not wish to stay elsewhere but with Aquila and Priscilla, because they were masters of the same trade in which he himself was usually engaged—with the clear intention of working alongside them (Acts 18:1–3). – Later, while sailing to Jerusalem, he stopped in Miletus; from there he sent word to Ephesus and summoned the elders of the Church in Ephesus. As he instructed them on how to govern the Church of God in his absence, he said that he had asked neither money nor clothing from them; that his own hands had provided for his needs and those of his companions—and that he did this to show that, by working in this way, one ought to help the needy, remembering the commandment of the Lord Himself: “It is more blessed to give than to receive” (Acts 20: 33–35). Thus, by setting an example of diligence, he also teaches that it is better to help those in need with what has been earned through hard work than with what comes into one’s hands by other means. If a monk acts in this way, he is then adorned with a twofold virtue: by renouncing all things, he attains the perfect poverty of Christ; and through his labor and disposition, he displays the generosity of the rich—honoring God through his righteous labors and offering Him a sacrifice from the fruits of his righteousness.

9. The Egyptian Fathers do not in any way permit monks to be idle, especially the young ones, measuring the state of the heart and the degree of progress in patience and humility by their diligence in work. Not only do they accept nothing for their own sustenance, but they also feed visiting brothers and travelers from the fruits of their labor, and send large quantities of food of every kind to the regions of Libya, which are afflicted by barrenness and famine, and they also deliver large quantities of food of every kind to the cities where people are languishing in filthy dungeons, believing that through such offerings from the fruit of their hands they are presenting a sacrifice pleasing to the Lord. – On this subject, the ancient Fathers of Egypt also coined the following saying: a working monk is tempted by a single demon, but an idle one is attacked by a countless multitude of demons.

10. When I began living in the desert, I told Abba Moses (of Libya; see his Conversations 1 and 2) that yesterday I had been utterly overcome by the affliction of despondency and could not free myself from it except by going to Abba Paul: “No,” he told me, “you did not free yourself from it, but rather showed yourself to be devoted and submissive to it.” For afterward it will attack you even more fiercely, as it would a coward and a fugitive, having seen how you allowed yourself to be defeated from the very first engagement and immediately fled the battlefield—unless you resolve on other occasions to engage this enemy in battle, not by repelling its fierce attacks by leaving your cell or sinking into sleep, but by overcoming it with patience and resistance. Thus, experience has shown that one must not flee from the onslaught of despondency, shying away from the struggle against it, but must overcome it by courageously resisting it.

7. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Vanity

1. The seventh battle we face is against the spirit of vanity—a spirit that is multifaceted, changeable, and subtle, so that even the most keen-eyed can scarcely not only guard against it, but also discern and recognize it. Other passions are simple and monotonous, but this one is multifaceted and varied; it assails the warrior from all sides and in every direction, both while he is still fighting and when he has already emerged victorious. For it seeks to wound the warrior of Christ through his clothing, his bearing, his gait, his voice, his work, his vigils, his fasts, his prayer, his solitude, his reading, his knowledge, his silence, his obedience, his humility, and his good nature, —and, like a most dangerous underwater rock, covered by surging waves, will suddenly cause a disastrous shipwreck to those sailing with a favorable wind, while they remain unawares.

2. Therefore, whoever desires to walk the Royal Path with “the weapons of righteousness in both hands” must, according to the Apostolic teaching, walk with equanimity through “honor and dishonor, slander and praise” (2 Cor. 6: 7–8), and with the utmost caution direct their journey along the path of virtue, amid the surging waves of temptation, guided by reason and the breath of the Spirit of the Lord, knowing that as soon as we deviate even slightly to the right or to the left, we will immediately be dashed against the deadly underwater rocks. That is why we hear the exhortation from the wise Solomon: “Do not turn to the right or to the left” (Prov. 4:27), —that is, do not flatter yourself because of your virtues, and do not exalt yourself because of your spiritual successes; likewise, when straying onto the crooked path of passions, do not, as the Apostle says, seek glory from them in your shame (Phil. 3:19). — The devil, in those whom he could not instill with vanity through the beauty of stately and dazzling clothing, attempts to sow it in them through clumsy, untidy, and beggarly attire; those whom he could not plunge into this passion through honor, he entices toward it through humiliation; whom he could not compel to boast of his learning and eloquence, in that person he provokes it through self-importance in silence. If someone fasts openly, he is troubled by vain glory; but if, out of contempt for such glory, someone conceals his fast, he suffers an attack of self-exaltation. To avoid being tainted by the disease of vanity, some avoid offering long prayers in full view of their brothers; but once they begin to practice them in secret, with no one to witness such deeds, they cannot help but boast to themselves. Our elders beautifully illustrate the nature of this affliction by comparing it to onions and garlic, which, once one layer is peeled away, are found to be covered by another just like it; and no matter how many times you peel away the layers, they are always found to be covered.

3. It does not cease to pursue even those who, fleeing glory, take refuge in the desert, away from all contact with mortals; and the farther one flees from the world, the more fiercely it attacks him. As for those living in monasteries, it attempts to lead one into pride by the fact that he is more patient than anyone else in work and labor; another by the fact that he is more eager than anyone else to obey; and yet another by the fact that he surpasses all others in humility. One is tempted by this because of the breadth of his knowledge; another, because of the long hours spent reading; yet another, because of the length of his vigils. And for each, this affliction seeks to wound him through his very virtues, setting up stumbling blocks to his ruin precisely where the fruits of life are reaped. Likewise, for those who wish to walk the path of piety and perfection, the enemies—the slanderers—do not fail to hide snares of delusion, just as on the very path along which they themselves walk, according to the words of the blessed David: “On this path, which I have walked, they have hidden a snare for me” (Ps. 141:3)—so that we, on that very path of virtue along which we journey, striving for the honor of a higher calling, might become puffed up by our own successes, stumble, and, entangled in the snare of vanity, fall, with the feet of our souls bound. Thus it happens that, while we remain unconquered by the enemy’s attack, we are overcome by the height of our triumph over him.

4. All other passions, when overcome, fade away, and as they are conquered, they grow weaker with each passing day; likewise, under the influence of place or time, they are exhausted and subside; or in every way, because of their conflict with the virtues opposed to them, it is easier to guard against them and avoid them. But this one, when struck down, rises up to fight with even greater ferocity, and when it is thought to have breathed its last, through its own death it becomes even more alive, healthy, and powerful. Other passions tyrannize only those whom they have defeated in battle; but this one presses down on its conquerors even more fiercely, and the more severely it has been struck down, the more excessively it fights back with the thought of exaltation on the occasion of its victory over itself. It is especially evident here that the enemy’s cunning lies in the fact that, through his schemes, the soldier of Christ falls by his own arrows, after the enemy himself was unable to defeat him with his own weapons.

5. Other passions, as we have said, are calmed by the influence of a different environment; they also subside and fade away when the object of sin, or the opportunity for it, or the occasion for it, is removed; but this one penetrates even into the desert with those who flee there to escape it, and fears no environment, just as it does not weaken even when the object is removed from sight; for it draws its strength from nowhere else but from the successes in virtue of the very person it attacks. — Other passions, as we said earlier, sometimes soften and disappear with the passage of time; but for this one, the passage of time not only does no harm, but gathers even more fuel for its vanity.

6. Finally, other passions—since they are at odds with their opposing virtues and wage war openly, as in broad daylight—are easier to overcome and easier to guard against; but this one, having squeezed itself between the virtues and mingled with our ranks, fights as if in the dark of night, and deceives all the more cruelly because we neither expect nor fear its attack.

7. We read that Ezekiah, King of Judah, a man of perfect righteousness in all things, was brought down by a single arrow of pride; and he who, by a single prayer, could have obtained the defeat of 185,000 Assyrian troops, was defeated by vain love of glory, —he who, after God had determined the limit of his life and the day of his death, was granted an extension of life for another 15 years through his own prayer, confirmed by the sun's retreat by 10 degrees; he, after such a testimony to his virtue and such a sign of God's favor toward him, lost everything because of a single act of pride and self-aggrandizement, lost everything—and not only himself, but also exposed his entire people to God's wrath—a wrath so great that, when he humbled himself and began to implore God along with all his people, he could only ask that this wrath not come in his own lifetime (2 Kings 20; 2 Chronicles 32). So ruinous and grievously sinful is the passion of pride!

8. Uzziah, the great-grandfather of the aforementioned king, also praised in the testimony of Holy Scripture, after many virtues and many praiseworthy deeds and institutions for the good of the people, became puffed up with vain pride and "offended the Lord his God" by a deed displeasing to Him, he immediately fell from the heights of his glory and was struck down with leprosy (2 Chr. 26). Here is another example of a grievous fall! See from this how pernicious happy successes can be when, in their midst, one fails to guard oneself against vanity and pride, and how, in such a case, those who do not heed or guard themselves, not having been humbled by difficult circumstances, are struck even more severely by their very triumphs, and, having escaped the danger of death in battle, fall because of their triumphs and victories.

9. Why does the Apostle exhort us: "Let us not be conceited" (Gal. 5: 26)? And the Lord, rebuking the Pharisees, says: "How can you believe, when you receive glory from one another but do not seek the glory that comes from the one God?" (John 5: 44). It is of such people that blessed David speaks with a warning: "God will scatter the bones of those who please men" (Ps. 52:6).

10. The vanity of beginners and of those who have not yet made much progress in virtue and spiritual knowledge usually leads them to boast either about the tone of their voice—that is, that they sing more pleasantly than others—or about being thin of body, or handsome in appearance, or having wealthy and noble parents, or having spurned military service and honors. To others, it suggests that if they had remained in the world, they would have easily attained both honors and wealth—even though they could never have achieved them—thus inflating their pride by sacrificing them to vain hopes and causing them to take pride in renouncing what they never possessed.

11. In others, it instills a desire for the priesthood or the diaconate, painting a picture in their minds that they would then perform their duties with such holiness and rigor that they could serve as an example of holiness to other priests; moreover, they would benefit many through their conduct and the delivery of their sermons. Sometimes it even causes one who lives in the desert or in seclusion in a cell to dream in his mind that he is visiting the homes of various people and monasteries and, through the power of his imagined convictions, is leading many onto the path of a righteous life. And so this poor soul is led hither and thither by such vanity, rambling as if in a deep sleep, and, carried away by the sweetness of such thoughts and filled with such dreams, is for the most part unable to notice either its own actions or the presence of the brothers, even if they were actually before its eyes, being sweetly immersed, as if in something truly happening, in what it, while awake, fantasizes about as if in a dream, wandering in the meanderings of its thoughts.

12. I recall that when I lived in the Skete Desert, an elder, having come to a brother's cell to visit him, heard him speaking inside and paused, wishing to know what he was reading from Holy Scripture or what he was reciting from memory, as is the custom there to do while working. Leaning in closer, the pious observer heard that the brother, as if in church, was delivering a sermon to the people: this meant that, deluded by a spirit of vanity, he imagined himself to be a priest and was carrying out the task he had long dreamed of. After waiting a little longer, the elder heard that the brother had finished his sermon, and, assuming a different role—as if he were now a deacon—began to proclaim, “Let the catechumens depart.” The elder knocked on the door. The brother came out, greeted him with his usual respect, and, ushering him inside, asked how long ago he had arrived, pretending to be concerned about whether he had had to stand outside for too long and whether he had suffered any discomfort as a result—though in reality his conscience was gnawing at him for his fantasies and for what he had done as a result of them. The elder replied kindly: “I had just arrived when you announced, ‘Let those who have been catechized come forward.’”

13. I have deemed it necessary to include this here so that, by having before our eyes a complete picture of the force and order with which the passions—by which the poor soul is tormented—assault us, we may be more attentive to ourselves and thereby more easily avoid the enemy’s snares and traps. This is precisely how the Egyptian Fathers proceed. Without hesitation, they bring all such matters out into the open, and through their stories about others and about themselves—as if they themselves were still experiencing what they describe— they reveal and lay bare before the young monks the struggles of all passions, both those the young monks are already enduring and those they are yet to endure, so that, through this exposition of the deceptions of all passions, the novices, burning with zeal, may come to know the secrets of their true battles, and, seeing them as in a mirror, they might understand both the causes of the passions that torment them and the remedies against them; and as for future battles, before they arise, they might know in advance how to guard against them, how to stand up to their attackers, and how to fight them. Just as the most skilled of physicians are in the habit not only of treating present illnesses but also, through their perceptive experience, of counteracting future ones, preventing them with cautionary instructions or healing potions: so too do these truest physicians of the soul, through their spiritual instruction—which serves as a sort of antidote—preemptively destroy the diseases of the heart that might arise, preventing them from taking root in the souls of young monks, while revealing to them both the causes of the passions’ attacks and the remedies against them.

14. A soldier of Christ who desires to lawfully engage in true spiritual struggle must strive by every means to defeat this multifaceted and varied beast. And first of all, we can avoid encountering this multifaceted beast—which is ready to pounce on us from all sides with its depravity—if, keeping in mind that saying of David: “The Lord has scattered the bones of those who please men” (Ps. 52:6), and we do not allow ourselves to do or undertake anything with the vain intention of gaining empty glory. Furthermore, we must strive to uphold and preserve what we have done with good intentions through the same—good vigilance—so that the disease of vanity does not creep in afterward and destroy the fruits of all our labors. Likewise, whatever is not customary among the brethren and is not practiced by all must be rejected with all diligence as a boastful act; and we must avoid at all costs anything that might make us stand out among others or, since we alone do it, might earn us glory among people. It is through such displays of self that it becomes most evident that the deadly contagion of vanity has taken hold of us: which, however, we could avoid if we kept in mind that not only will we completely lose the fruit of our labors—which we undertake with a vain intention—but we will also be guilty of a greater crime and, like sacrilegious offenders, will have to endure eternal torment; since, to the offense of God, we desired to do for people what we ought to have done for Him, and thereby preferred people to God, and the glory of the world to the glory of God—as the God who searches the hearts will then convict us.

8. The Struggle Against the Spirit of Pride

1. The eighth and final battle lies before us: the battle against the spirit of pride. Although this passion is listed last in the order of the struggle against the passions, it is the first in origin and in time. It is the fiercest and most untamable beast, attacking especially the perfected and devouring them with savage bites when they have almost reached the very summit of virtue.

2. There are two kinds of pride: the first is that which, as we have said, afflicts men of a high spiritual life; the other seizes the beginners and the carnal. And although both these kinds of pride are fueled by pernicious exaltation both before God and before men, the first pertains directly to God, while the second pertains specifically to men. We will examine the origin of the latter and the remedies against it, God willing, in the final chapters of this book; but for now, we intend to discuss briefly the former, by which, as we said above, the perfected are primarily tempted.

3. There is no other passion that so utterly destroys all virtues, and so strips a person of all righteousness and holiness, as this evil pride: like a pervasive contagion, it is not content with weakening a single limb or part, but inflicts a fatal disorder upon the entire body, and seeks to bring down and destroy even those who already stand on the heights of virtue through an exceedingly grievous fall. Every other passion is content with its own limits and its own goal, and although it disturbs other virtues as well, it is directed primarily against one, which it predominantly oppresses and attacks. Thus, gluttony—that is, the passion for overeating or indulging in sweets—corrupts strict abstinence; lust defiles chastity; and anger drives out patience. Thus, a person enslaved by a single passion is not entirely devoid of other virtues; but after the destruction of that one virtue—which falls to the opposing passion that has zealously armed itself against it—he may still retain the others, at least in part: but this one, as soon as it takes hold of a poor soul, like some ferocious tyrant, having captured the highest stronghold of virtue (humility), destroys and ravages their entire city to the ground. Having razed the once-lofty walls of holiness and mingled them with the dust of vice, it allows no sign of freedom to remain in the soul it has subjugated. The richer the soul it captures, the heavier the yoke of slavery it imposes upon it, stripping it of all its virtuous possessions through the most brutal plunder.

4. If you wish to know more precisely the extent of this most cruel tyrant's power, let us recall how a certain angel—who, because of the excess of his splendor and beauty, was called Lucifer—was cast down from heaven for no other reason than this passion, and how he, pierced by the arrow of pride, fell from that highest rank of the blessed angels into the abyss. Thus, if such an incorporeal being, endowed with such remarkable advantages, could be cast down from heaven to earth by a single surge of pride, then the magnitude of that destructive fall shows just how vigilantly we, clothed in mortal flesh, must guard against it. – And how we may avoid this most pernicious contagion of passion, we can learn by tracing the origin and causes of the aforementioned fall. For it is impossible to cure any infirmity or prescribe remedies for any disease unless their origins and causes have first been examined through careful investigation. – This (Archangel), clothed in divine radiance and shining more brightly than the other higher powers by the Creator's generosity, came to believe that this splendor of wisdom and this beauty of virtue, with which he was adorned by the Creator's grace, were possessed by him through his own natural powers rather than through God's bountiful gift. And having become exalted for this reason, he considered himself equal to God, as one who, like God, lacked nothing—as if he had no need of divine assistance to remain in such purity. Thus, he relied entirely on the power of his free will, believing that it alone would abundantly provide him with everything necessary for complete perfection in virtue and for the continuity of supreme bliss. This single thought became for him the primary cause of his ruinous fall. Having been forsaken by God because of this—in Whom he considered himself to have no need—and having immediately become unstable and vulnerable as a result, he felt the weakness of his own nature and lost the bliss he had enjoyed as a gift from God. Thus, since he "loved" "boastful words," in which, exulting, he said, "I will ascend to heaven" (Isa. 14: 13), "and a flattering tongue," with which, deceiving himself, he said, "I will be like the Most High," just as he later deceived Adam and Eve by suggesting to them, "You will be like gods"—behold, this is his sentence: "For this reason, God will utterly destroy you, uproot you, and remove you from your dwelling. The righteous will see this and be afraid; they will laugh at him and say: 'This is the man who did not make God his helper, but trusted in the abundance of his wealth and in the power of his vanity'" (Ps. 51: 6–9). The last words ("this is the man") can quite rightly be applied to those who hope to attain the highest good without God's protection and help.

5. This is the cause of the first fall and the beginning of the principal passion—which, having crept into the first man through the one who was first afflicted by it, gave rise to the whole multitude of passions. And he—the first man—believing that by the power of his free will alone and through his own efforts he could attain the glory of the Godhead, lost even that which he had received through the Creator's goodness.

6. Thus, the examples and testimonies of Holy Scripture most clearly demonstrate that the passion of pride, although it is the last in the order of spiritual battles, is nevertheless the first in origin, and is the source of all sins and transgressions. Unlike other passions, it does not destroy only the virtue opposed to it—that is, humility—but is the destroyer of all virtues together; and it tempts not just any mediocre or insignificant virtues, but especially those that stand at the height of power. For the Prophet speaks of this spirit as follows: "His chosen ones are his food" (Hab. 1: 16). Therefore, even the blessed David, though he guarded the recesses of his heart with such care that from to Him from whom the secrets of his conscience were not hidden, boldly proclaimed: “O Lord, my heart has not been haughty, nor have my eyes looked with pride; I have not walked in the matter of the mighty, nor in the matter of those more excellent than I” (Ps. 130: 1)—and again: “Let there be no pride in the midst of my house” (Ps. 100: 7); yet knowing how difficult it is even for the perfect to guard against any stirrings of this passion, he did not rely solely on his own efforts in this matter, but sought the Lord’s help in prayer, that He might grant him to avoid being wounded by the arrow of this enemy, saying: “Let not the foot of pride come upon me” (Ps. 35: 12), (i.e., do not let me, O Lord, take any step prompted by pride)—fearing and dreading that he might fall into what is said of the proud: “God opposes the proud” (James 4:6)—and also: “No one who is haughty is pure in God’s sight” (Proverbs 16:5).

7. How great an evil is pride, when even the angels and other forces opposed to it are insufficient to resist it, but God Himself rises up against it! It should be noted that the Apostle did not say of those who are ensnared by other passions that God opposes them—that is, he did not say: “God opposes the gluttonous, the sexually immoral, the angry, or the greedy,” but only the proud. For those passions either affect only the individual who commits them or, apparently, are directed against their accomplices—that is, other people; but this one is directed specifically against God, and therefore it particularly deserves to have Him as its adversary.

8. We can avoid the snares of this most vile spirit if, regarding each of the virtues in which we feel we are succeeding, we say with the Apostle: “Not I, but the grace of God that is with me,” and: “By the grace of God I am what I am” (1 Cor. 15: 10), — and: “It is God who works in us both to will and to act for His good pleasure” (Phil. 2:13),— as the Author of our salvation Himself says: “Whoever abides in Me, and I in him, he will bear much fruit; for apart from Me you can do nothing” (John 15: 5),—and the Psalmist echoes: “Unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain; unless the Lord guards the city, the watchman stays awake in vain” (Ps. 126: 1). And the will of none who desire and strive is sufficient for one clothed in flesh—which wars against the spirit—to attain perfect purity and innocence without the special protection of divine mercy, and thereby be deemed worthy to receive that which he so strongly desires and toward which he so earnestly strives. For “every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights” (James 1:17). “What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you had not received it?” (1 Corinthians 4:7).

9. I say this not to belittle human effort or to discourage anyone from diligent and strenuous labor. On the contrary, I firmly affirm—not in my own opinion, but that of the elders—that perfection cannot be attained without them, and that through them alone, without God’s grace, it cannot be brought to the proper degree by anyone. For just as we say that human efforts alone, without God’s help, cannot attain it, so we affirm that God’s grace is bestowed only upon those who labor in the sweat of their brow, or, in the words of the Apostle, is given only to those who desire and strive for it—judging also by the fact that in Psalm 88 it is sung from God’s perspective: “I have set my help upon the mighty; I have exalted the chosen one from among men” (v. 20). Although, according to the Lord’s word, we say that to those who ask it is given, to those who knock it is opened, and to those who seek it is found; yet asking, seeking, and knocking are not in themselves sufficient for this, unless God’s mercy grants what we ask for, opens what we knock on, and enables us to find what we seek. He is ready to grant us all this as soon as we give Him the opportunity to do so by offering our good will; for He desires and awaits our perfection and salvation far more than we do. And Blessed David was so deeply aware of the impossibility of succeeding in his endeavors and labors by his own efforts alone that he pleaded twice for the grace that the Lord Himself might set his works aright, saying: “Set aright the works of our hands for us, and set aright the works of our hands” (Ps. 89: 17)—and again: “O God, establish what You have done in us” (Ps. 67: 29).

10. Therefore, we must strive for perfection by devoting ourselves to fasting, vigils, prayers, and the mortification of heart and body, so that, puffed up with pride, we do not render all this in vain. We must believe that not only can we not attain perfection itself through our own efforts and labors, but also that the very things in which we exercise ourselves to attain it—that is, ascetic deeds and various spiritual practices—we cannot perform properly without the help of God’s grace.

11. We must always give thanks to God not only for the fact that He created us rational beings, endowed us with free will, bestowed the grace of baptism, and provided us with the guidance of the Law, but also for the fact that He sustains us daily through His providence, namely: He delivers us from the enemy’s slanders, helps us overcome carnal passions, shields us from dangers without our knowledge, protects us from falling into sin, helps us and enlightens us in the knowledge and understanding of the requirements of His law, secretly instills in us contrition for our negligence and transgressions, salvifically corrects us, granting us special grace, and sometimes even against our will draws us toward salvation. – Finally, He directs our freest will—which is more inclined toward passions—toward the best actions beneficial to the soul, and turns it onto the path of virtue through the grace of His influence upon it.

12. This is what humility before God truly consists of; this is the faith of the most ancient Fathers, which remains unblemished even to this day among their successors. The apostolic powers they displayed—not only among us but also among the unbelievers and the faint of faith—bear undeniable witness to this faith of theirs.

13. Joash, King of Judah, at first led a praiseworthy life; but later, having become proud, he was given over to dishonorable and impure passions, or, as the Apostle says: “It is unnatural for an untrained mind to devise such things” (Rom. 1:26, 28). Such is the law of God’s righteousness: whoever is unrepentantly puffed up with prideful arrogance of heart is given over to the shame of the most vile carnal disgrace, so that, being humbled in this way, he might realize that if he now finds himself so defiled, it is because he previously refused to acknowledge the deepest and most serious impurity arising from prideful exaltation, and so that, having realized this, he might be moved to purify himself of both passions.

14. It is therefore evident that no one can attain the ultimate limit of perfection and purity except through true humility, which, while visibly demonstrating it before his brothers, he also manifests before God in the innermost recesses of his heart, believing that without His protection and help, which visit him at every moment, he can in no way attain the perfection he desires and toward which he strives with all his might.

15. Thus far, as far as our limited gifts have allowed, with God’s help we have spoken sufficiently about spiritual pride, by which, as has been said, even the perfect are tempted. This kind of pride is known to few and experienced by few, because not many strive to attain perfect purity of heart in order to reach such trials. It usually assails only those who, having conquered all other passions, are already nearly at the very summit of virtue. Our most cunning enemy, since he could not overcome them by luring them into carnal sin, now attempts to trip them up and bring them down through a spiritual fall, plotting thereby to deprive them of all the fruits they had previously attained with great effort. As for us, who are still ensnared by carnal passions, he does not even deign to tempt us in this way, but trips us up with crude, so to speak, carnal pride. And therefore, regarding this—which we, or people of our standing, are most in danger of falling into, and especially the souls of young or novice monks—I consider it necessary to say a few words, as we promised.

16. This carnal pride, as we have said, if—after the proper beginning of renunciation of the world has been made, yet without due zeal—remains in the monk’s soul, prevents him from descending from his former worldly arrogance to the true humility of Christ, and first makes him disobedient and stubborn; then it prevents him from being meek and courteous, as well as from conducting himself on an equal footing with all his brothers and living like everyone else, without standing out; in particular, it does not allow him, in accordance with the commandment of God and our Savior, to divest himself of all earthly possessions; and yet, since renunciation of the world is nothing other than a demonstration of the death of the self to all things and of the cross, and cannot truly be begun or built upon any other foundation than the awareness that one is spiritually dead to all the affairs of this world, and the belief that one must also die bodily every day,—it, on the contrary, tempts him to hope for a long life, presents various prolonged illnesses ahead, unsettles him with shame and embarrassment if, having been left with nothing, he begins to support himself from others’ rather than his own resources, and instills the idea that it is far better to obtain food and clothing by one’s own means than by others’, reminding him, in confirmation of this, the following saying: “It is more blessed to give than to receive” (Acts 20:35)—the true meaning of which these people, whose hearts have grown dull and cold, can never comprehend.

17. A monk who has begun his renunciation of the world in such an unwholesome way can never embrace the true and simple humility of Christ. He will not cease either to boast of his noble birth, or to take pride in his former worldly life—which he has left behind only in body, not in heart—or to take pride in the money he has kept for himself to his own ruin, because, because of it, he can no longer bear the yoke of monastic discipline with peace of mind, nor submit to the instructions of any elder. Whoever is overcome by pride considers it humiliating to observe any rules of submission or obedience; he even is reluctant to listen to the general teaching on the perfection of the spiritual life, and at times even harbors a complete aversion to it, especially when, reproached by his conscience, he suspects that it is deliberately directed against him. In the latter case, his heart becomes even more embittered and flares up with anger. Afterward, he speaks in a loud voice, uses coarse language, gives a defiant and bitter reply, walks with a proud and restless gait, and talks incessantly. Thus, it happens that spiritual conversation not only brings him no benefit whatsoever, but on the contrary proves harmful, becoming for him a cause of greater sin.

18. I have heard that one of the young monks, when Abba rebuked him for “why, having abandoned the humility he had shown for some time after renouncing the world, he had begun to swell with devilish pride,” replied to him with extreme arrogance: “Did I humble myself for some time just to be subordinate forever?” – At this utterly unrestrained and criminal reply, the elder was so stunned with astonishment that his speech faltered, as if he had heard such words not from a human being but from the ancient Lucifer himself, and he could not utter a single sound from his lips against such audacity, but only let out sighs and groans from his heart, silently repeating in his mind what was said about our Savior: “Who, being in the form of God... humbled Himself by becoming obedient”—not for a time (as this man, possessed by the devilish spirit of pride, says), but “even unto death” (Phil. 2:6, 8).

19. This carnal pride manifests itself in the following ways: in speech, it takes the form of loudness; in silence—irritability; in joy—loud, boisterous laughter; in sorrow—meaningless gloom; in reply—sharpness; in speech—lightness, with words bursting out haphazardly without any involvement of the heart. It knows no patience, is alien to love, is bold in inflicting insults but faint-hearted in enduring them, is reluctant to obey unless preceded by its own desire and will, unyielding to exhortation, incapable of renouncing her own desires, extremely stubborn when it comes to submitting to others, always striving to have her way, and never willing to yield to another; and thus it happens that, having become incapable of accepting salutary counsel, she trusts her own opinion more than the judgment of the elders.

20. Through these stages of decline, the one who is once seized by pride, having sunk to the depths, recoils in horror from strict communal discipline, and, – believing that if he makes little progress on the path to perfection, it is because his communion with the brethren slows him down, and that if he succeeds little in acquiring patience and humility, it is the fault of others, due to obstacles on their part, —he develops a desire to live in a secluded cell, or even undertakes to establish a separate monastery, with the aim of drawing many to a strict way of life, and hastens to gather those who are to follow his teaching and instruction, thus transforming himself from an unworthy disciple into the most unworthy of teachers.

21. Therefore, if we wish for our edifice to rise to the very top and be pleasing to God, let us strive to lay its foundation not according to our self-serving will, but according to the precise teaching of the Gospel, according to which such a foundation can be nothing other than the fear of God and humility, born of meekness and simplicity of heart. Humility, however, cannot be attained without stripping ourselves of everything without which it is impossible to be established in good obedience, steadfast patience, unshakable meekness, or perfect love; and without these, our heart can by no means be the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit, as the Lord proclaims through the Prophet: “Whom shall I look upon? Only the meek and quiet, who tremble at My words” (Ps. 66:2).

22. Why must the soldier of Christ, who, lawfully striving in spiritual battles, desires to be crowned by the Lord, make every effort to exterminate this most ferocious beast—the devourer of all virtues—being certain that as long as it remains in his heart, not only will he be unable to free himself from all passions, but that even if he acquires any virtue at all, it too will perish from its poison. For the edifice of virtues cannot be erected in our soul unless the foundations of true humility are first laid in our heart; and this humility, being most firmly established, alone is capable of strongly supporting the edifice of perfection and love raised to its highest point. To this end, we must, first of all, manifest true humility toward our brothers and sisters with sincere disposition, without allowing ourselves in any way to grieve or offend them—which we cannot possibly accomplish unless, out of love for Christ, true renunciation of all things is deeply rooted within us, consisting in the complete stripping away of all worldly possessions; second, we must accept the yoke of obedience and submission with a simple heart and without any pretense, so that, apart from Abba’s command, “,” no other will should dwell within us at all; this can be observed by no one except one who has not only considered himself dead to this world but also regards himself as foolish and senseless, and without any hesitation carries out whatever the elders command, believing that all of it is sacred and proclaimed by God Himself.

23. When we maintain this attitude, then without a doubt a state of humility so unshakable and unchanging will follow that, considering ourselves the lowest of all, we will endure with the utmost patience whatever is inflicted upon us, however groundless, offensive, or even harmful it may be, —as if it were imposed upon us by our spiritual fathers (as an act of obedience or a trial). And not only will we bear all such things easily, but we will also regard them as small and insignificant, if, at the same time, we constantly keep in mind and feel the sufferings of our Lord and all the Saints; for then the slanders we endure will seem all the lighter to us, in proportion to how far we fall short of their great deeds and fruitful lives. The inspiration to endure that flows from this will be even stronger if, at the same time, we reflect that we too will soon depart from this world and, at the end of our lives, will immediately become partakers of their bliss and glory. Such reflection is destructive not only to pride but also to all passions. After this, we must firmly and steadfastly maintain such humility before God: this will be accomplished if we hold fast to the conviction that, on our own, without His help and grace, we can do nothing that pertains to the perfection of virtue, and if we sincerely believe that even what we have managed to comprehend is His gift.

6. The Struggle Against Thoughts, and Through Them Against Evil Spirits

1. Question. We see no success in maintaining our focus, despite all our efforts. We cannot keep the mind from wandering. Even when we feel that the heart is empathetically drawn toward a particular contemplation, the mind, insensitively drifting away from it, plunges with immeasurable speed into its usual wanderings. Thus, countless times each day, it is carried off captive by its own flights of fancy here and there. Consequently, one even begins to despair of ever achieving the desired remedy for this weakness, and it seems that focusing one's attention on this matter is a futile effort, when one sees that the soul, despite everything, still sets out to wander with swift flights every minute. You draw it toward spiritual contemplation through the fear of God, but before it can settle into it, it instantly vanishes from view again. And then, as if anticipating its intention to flee, you seize it at the very beginning and draw it back to the contemplation from which it had begun to stray, intending, as it were, to bind it with the most intense attention of the heart—yet even as you labor over it, it manages to slip away from the inner sanctuary faster than an eel from a fisherman's hands. Striving in this way every day with all diligence to keep my thoughts in check, and seeing no success in it, I involuntarily come to the conclusion that such wanderings of the mind do not come from us, but are surely simply our nature (– Collected Works 7, 3).

2. It is unwise to jump to conclusions so quickly without properly investigating the matter. It is unfair to assume, simply because of one's own inability or lack of skill to succeed at something, that such success is impossible for anyone. It is as if someone who cannot swim and cannot stay afloat were to conclude that, since his body, due to its weight, cannot stay afloat, and since everyone's body is the same as his, then no one's body can stay afloat, and consequently no one can swim—that it is simply the nature of bodies that they cannot swim. No matter how correct such a conclusion might seem to him, his experience does not support it. Such is your judgment as well. Our mind, by its very nature, cannot remain idle; why is it inevitable that, if it does not possess objects prudently prepared in advance upon which to exercise its movements and with which to constantly occupy itself, it will—by virtue of its agility—dart here and there and fly everywhere, until, through long-term practice and constant habit—what you call futile labor—it learns from experience what materials he must store in his memory so that he may revolve around them in his tireless flights, and through unceasing devotion to this labor acquire the strength to repel the enemy's opposing suggestions—by which he was previously distracted—and thus remain unshakably in that state (of equanimity and inner peace) which he desires. Therefore, we should not attribute the fickleness of the mind's aimless wandering to human nature, nor to God—its Creator. For the word of Scripture is true: “God made man upright, but they” (people) “have sought out many thoughts” (Eccl. 7:30). Consequently, the quality of our thoughts depends on us. And the Psalmist says: “Blessed is the man who has his refuge in you; set his heart on ascending” (Ps. 83:6). You see that it is within our power to set in our hearts either “ascents”—that is, thoughts that reach up to God—or “descents”—that is, thoughts that fall down to earthly and carnal things. If thoughts were not within our power, would the Lord not have rebuked the Pharisees, saying, “Why do you harbor wicked thoughts in your hearts?” (Matt. 9:4)? Nor would He have commanded through the Prophets: “Remove your evil thoughts from My sight” (Isa. 1:16)—and: “How long will your wicked thoughts linger within you?” (Jer. 4:14). (—Col. 7:4).

3. It is true that many vain thoughts trouble us even against our will and deceive us almost without our knowledge, entering us so imperceptibly and cunningly that we not only cannot prevent their entry but also perceive them with great difficulty; but to accept or reject them is possible for anyone who, with God's help, applies their diligence and effort to this end. Just as their arising does not depend on us, so their rejection or acceptance lies within our will. Moreover, even in the very arising of thoughts, not everything should be attributed to the onslaught of thoughts or to those spirits that seek to instill them; rather, it is up to us to correct the nature of our thoughts and to ensure that spiritual and holy thoughts arise in our hearts in place of carnal and earthly ones—if not always, then for the most part. When someone studies Holy Scripture wisely and diligently, practices the psalms and singing, abides in fasting and vigil, and constantly remembers the future—the Kingdom of Heaven and the fiery Gehenna—as well as all of God’s works, then evil thoughts diminish and appear less frequently. But when, on the contrary, someone is preoccupied with worldly cares and carnal affairs, and indulges in vain and idle talk, then evil thoughts multiply within us (—Collect 1:16–17).

4. The activity of our mind is well compared to a millstone, which spins rapidly in a circle due to the swift current of water. It cannot stop spinning at all, being driven by the water; but it is up to the miller whether to grind wheat, rye, or chaff. Likewise, our mind throughout this present life, being constantly set in motion by streams of impressions rushing at it from all sides, cannot be free from the agitation of thoughts; but which of these to accept or assimilate depends on our will and discretion. If, as has been said, we constantly engage in the study of Holy Scripture, fill our memory with spiritual subjects, and nurture a desire for perfection and hope for future bliss, then spiritual thoughts will arise from this, and our mind will be kept in constant reflection on those subjects in which we have delved deeply. But if, out of carelessness and negligence, we occupy ourselves with the objects of the passions and idle conversation, or indulge in worldly concerns and vain cares; then, by their very nature, thoughts will spring up like weeds and give our hearts harmful work, according to the saying of the Lord and Savior: “Where your treasure is”—that is, your deeds and your attention—there “your heart will be also” (Matt. 6:21). (Col. 1. 18).

5. We must know that there are three sources of our thoughts: from God, from the devil, and from ourselves. From God—when He deigns to visit us with the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, stirring within us either a zeal for the highest achievement, or contrition over our lack of success and our indulgence in laziness and carelessness; or when He reveals heavenly mysteries to us and directs our intentions toward better deeds. Thus the Lord inspired Artaxerxes to ask for the records; and when he learned from them of Mordecai’s good deeds, he immediately revoked his previous cruel decree to destroy the Jewish people (Esther 6). So too was it promised to the Apostles: “It is not you who will speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you” (Matt. 10:20). – Thoughts originate from the devil when he attempts to lead us astray, arousing through them passionate delight, or with cunning deceit presents evil under the guise of good, “transforming himself” before us “into an angel of light” (2 Cor. 11:14). Thus, he “put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot to betray the Lord” (John 13:2)—and into the heart of Ananias—“to lie to the Holy Spirit” (Acts 5:3). – Thoughts arise from within us when we naturally recall what we have seen, heard, or done (— Sob. 1:19).

6. We must always keep this threefold cause of thoughts in mind, so that we may not judge the thoughts arising in our hearts based on them, but rather treat them accordingly. In this regard, we must imitate skilled coin examiners (money changers)—who know how to accurately determine whether a coin is gold and whether it is pure gold, or whether it is copper that resembles gold in luster; whether it bears the image of the king, and if so, whether it is lawfully depicted; and whether the coin also has the lawful weight. We must do the same spiritually with regard to our thoughts. First, we must examine whether what has entered our hearts is truly or not. For example, if a certain teaching is presented, we must consider whether it has been purified by the divine fire of the Holy Spirit, or whether it belongs to Jewish superstition, or whether it stems from the arrogant philosophy of the world and merely wears the mask of piety. By doing so, we will fulfill the Apostolic instruction: “Do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are from God” (1 John 4:1); and we will be safe from straying from the truth. But those who did not take care to heed this warning were subjected to a disastrous apostasy from the faith. Smooth-tongued deceivers first drew them to themselves with certain pious sentiments and arguments consistent with the Holy Faith, as if with the glitter of gold; and then taught them doctrines contrary to the faith, which—deceived by the initial appearance of piety—they did not think to subject to scrutiny; and, having thus accepted a counterfeit copper coin for gold, they fell into heretical errors. – Second, we must carefully discern whether we are hearing a false interpretation of Holy Scripture, which, masquerading as the pure gold of a true understanding of the divine words, attempts to deceive us with the appearance of this precious metal—so that we might accept it along with the admixture of copper that is falsely attributed to it. This is how Satan attempted to tempt Christ the Savior Himself. And this is how he tempts all of us, already with some success, just as he did with our Lord. – Third, – we must be vigilant in every way, lest the enemy, by distorting the precious sayings of Holy Scripture through cunning interpretation, succeed in leading us to apply and use them improperly, deceptively cloaking this with a tradition supposedly originating from the elders, as if unlawfully affixing the royal seal to a counterfeit coin.

He succeeds in doing this when he entices us into excessive and burdensome labor, into excessive vigils, disorderly prayers, and inappropriate reading, and, luring us with the promise of good, leads us to a soul-destroying end; or when he advises us to make unnecessary visits, so that, by driving us from our seclusion, he may deprive us of blessed silence; or when he instills the idea of taking on the care of pious, helpless women, so as to entangle one in ruinous concerns; or when he incites the desire for holy orders, under the pretext of edifying many, thereby distracting one from our humble calling. All such suggestions, cloaked in the guise of mercy, piety, and supreme success, deceive the inexperienced. Outwardly, they resemble the coins of the true King; but they are not minted by true spiritual coin-makers—not by experienced Orthodox Fathers—but are forged by the cunning of demons for harm and ruin. The saying of the Proverb writer applies perfectly to them: “There is a way that seems right to a man, but its end leads to the gates of hell” (Prov. 16:25). – The final (fourth) observation of the experienced coin-maker, concerning the examination of weight, will be fulfilled by us in our spiritual work if, whenever a thought prompts us to do something, we place it on the scales of our conscience and, with the utmost rigor, examine whether it has true weight—whether it is heavy with the fear of God, whether it contains everything—in terms of its meaning and significance—whether ostentation and novelty make it light, whether vanity would later diminish its weight, and whether human glory would erode it. Having weighed all this and determined it by the testimonies of the Apostles and Prophets, we must then either accept it as consistent with them, or reject it with the utmost rigor as contrary to them and harmful to us (—Col. 1:20–21).

7. Thus, we must ceaselessly examine all the recesses of our hearts and, with keen vigilance, observe the traces of those who enter, lest some mental beast—or even a lion or a dragon itself—sneak in there as well, and, secretly imprinting its destructive marks there, it might not also pave the way for others to enter the recesses of our hearts, should we be inattentive to our thoughts. By cultivating the soil of our heart in this way, hour by hour and minute by minute, with the Gospel plow—that is, through unceasing remembrance of the Lord’s cross—we will easily be able to destroy the lairs of pernicious beasts and the dens of venomous serpents—and drive them out of ourselves (—Collect 1, 22).

8. The image of the perfect mind (one that exercises control over its own thoughts) is beautifully exemplified in the figure of the centurion in the Gospel. In the account of him, moral strength—which enables one not to be carried away by every passing thought, but to accept good thoughts according to one’s own judgment and to cast aside those contrary to it without any difficulty—is described in the following words of his, if understood allegorically: “For I, too, am a man subject to authority, but having soldiers under my command, I say to one, ‘Go,’ and he goes; and to another, ‘Come,’ and he comes; and to my servant, ‘Do this,’ and he does it” (Matt. 8:9). If we, too, were to fight courageously against disorderly inner impulses and passions, gaining the strength to subject them to our authority and our reason, to quell the lusts waging war within our flesh, to keep the disorderly crowd of our thoughts under the yoke of the mind’s authority, and drive away from the confines of our hearts, under the saving banner of the Lord’s cross, the gathering of the most wicked enemy forces, then for such triumphs and victories we would be elevated to the rank of a centurion in its spiritual sense. And in this way, having risen to the height of such dignity, we will possess the same commanding authority and power as he does, by which we will no longer be carried away by whatever thoughts we do not desire, but in those by which we find spiritual delight, we will have the opportunity to abide and cling to them, imperiously commanding the evil temptations: “Depart”—and they will depart; and inviting good thoughts: “Come,” and they will come; and to our servant—the flesh—we will command what is necessary for chastity and self-restraint, and it will carry it out without any objection, no longer arousing vices contrary to the spirit, but showing it complete submission (—Sob. 7:5).

9. But how can this be achieved? It will come of its own accord when we unite so sincerely with God that He will act within us. The Apostle confirms this when he says: “The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down arguments and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God” (2 Cor. 10:4). Whatever we undertake to overcome these thoughts will be ineffective until God Himself acts through us in union with us. Then our feeble means will become strong and all-conquering—they will demolish the enemy’s strongholds and strike down and drive out every kind of thought. And the prophetic word will be fulfilled in us: “Let the weak say, ‘I am strong,’” “and let the meek be mighty” (Joel 3:10–11)—and what St. Paul says of himself: “When I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor. 12:10). For then “the power of God” will be made perfect “in our weakness” (v. 9). Therefore, with all the desire of our hearts, let us strive for union with the Lord, until what Blessed David experienced: “My soul clings to You; Your right hand upholds me” (Ps. 62: 9)—and each of us, together with him, will begin to sing: “It is good for me to cling to God” (Ps. 72: 28). Of course, this requires constant effort and toil; but without this, there is no success in any endeavor. All the more so, one cannot expect it in such an important matter. No virtue attains perfection without effort—and no one can attain the stilling of the mind without extreme exertion of the heart. The Lord’s words apply directly here: “The kingdom of God is taken by force, and those who use force seize it” (Matt. 11:12). In order for our spirit to “reach the measure of the full stature of Christ” (Eph. 4:13)—and to become “one spirit with the Lord” (1 Cor. 6:17)—it must always remain vigilant with great intensity and labor at this with unceasing zeal. Having attained this, it can then join the Apostle in solemnly exclaiming: “I can do all things through Him who strengthens me” (Phil. 4:13). (—A paraphrase from The Collects, Book 7, Chapters 5 and 6).

10. Why must all our attention always be directed toward that one thing—to swiftly bring our thoughts back to the remembrance of God from their wandering and circling? Just as one who wishes to erect and join the dome’s vault correctly at the top constantly traces a circle around the structure with a cord from the center, thereby giving its curvature a uniform direction throughout; so too, anyone who attempts such a task without this aid—even if he possesses great skill—cannot infallibly maintain the correct roundness, nor can he determine at a glance how far he has deviated from it without resorting to the aforementioned guide to correctness: so too is our spirit: if, having established within ourselves the loving remembrance of God as a kind of immovable center, we do not then, proceed from it and, with it as a guide, examine all its actions and labors at every moment, using it as a standard to determine the quality of thoughts and undertakings—accepting some and rejecting others—and using it as a faithful compass to direct everything it does; then he will by no means build, as he ought, that spiritual edifice of which Paul is the architect (1 Cor. 3:10), nor will he impart to it the beauty of that house which, desiring to build for the Lord in his heart, the blessed David cried out: “O Lord, I love the beauty of Your house and the place where Your glory dwells” (Ps. 25: 8), but will senselessly erect in his heart an ugly house, unworthy of the Holy Spirit and always ready to collapse, destined not to receive glory for it from the One he awaits, but to be deemed unworthy of the visitor who has not been granted entry into such a dwelling (i.e., the Holy Spirit), but rather to be pitifully crushed under the ruins of his own structure (—Discourses 24:6).

11. Dark forces act upon us primarily through our thoughts, and of course it would be easier for us to cope with them if we were not constantly and in great numbers surrounded by these enemies who wish us ill—but there is no need to be terrified by this. These enemies do indeed constantly slander us, but they only sow and stir up evil within us; they do not compel us to commit it. If they were given the power not only to instill evil but also to forcibly draw us toward it, then whatever sinful desire they might wish to kindle in our hearts, not a single person would be able to avoid sinning because of it. But we see that just as they are permitted to incite us, so too are we granted both the strength to resist such incitements, and the freedom to yield to them. What, then, is there to fear?—However, if anyone fears their violence and attacks, to that person we, on the other hand, offer God’s protection and God’s help, which is more powerful than theirs, as it is said: “The one who is in you is greater than the one who is in the world” (1 John 4:4), — Whose intercession overcomes for us with incomparably greater power than that with which the enemy’s side rises up against us. For God not only inspires good deeds but also protects them and brings them to completion; so that sometimes, without our will or our knowledge, He draws us to salvation. It is therefore settled that no one can be deceived by the devil except the one who himself chooses to consent to him. Ecclesiastes clearly expressed this in the following words: “For there is no dispute against those who do evil quickly; therefore the hearts of the sons of men are set on doing evil” (Eccl. 8:11). It is therefore evident that everyone sins because, when evil thoughts assail him, he does not immediately resist them with opposition. For it is said: “Resist the devil, and he will flee from you” (James 4:7). (—Conversations 7:8).

12. Some may wonder how these evil spirits enter into communion with the soul—how they converse with it imperceptibly, instill in it whatever they wish, see its thoughts and movements, and use them to its detriment. — But there is nothing strange about this. A spirit can enter into communion with another spirit and secretly influence it, suggesting what is desirable to it. For between them, just as between people, there is a certain similarity and kinship by nature. But for them to enter into one another and take possession of one another is utterly impossible. This can truly be attributed only to the Divine (—Collects 7, 9, 10).

13. What has been said above is in no way contradicted by what happens to the possessed when, under the influence of unclean spirits, they say and do things they do not want to, and are compelled to utter words they do not understand. It is well known that not everyone is affected by spirits in the same way in such cases. Some are so completely taken over by them that they are completely unaware of what they are doing or saying, while others are aware and recall it afterward. Both of these occur due to the influence of an unclean spirit—not, however, in such a way that it penetrates the very substance of the soul and, as if merging with it and somehow clothing itself in it, utters words and speech through the lips of the afflicted person. They are in no way capable of doing this. What happens is that the unclean spirit, dwelling in those members through which the soul acts and imposing an unbearable burden upon them, shrouds the soul's rational faculties in a terrible darkness and suppresses their activity (by such suppression of the organs of this activity). As we see, this sometimes happens due to wine, as well as from fever, excessive cold, and other illnesses arising from external causes. Lest the devil, having gained power over his flesh, should devise to do the same to the blessed Job, the Lord forbade him by a special command, saying: "Behold, I deliver him into your hands; only spare his soul" (Job 2:6), that is, do not drive him mad by disrupting the seat of the soul, invading his reason, and damaging the faculty of understanding, by means of which he (Job) must resist you (— Own 7:12).

14. However, although the spirit thus blends seamlessly with this coarse and solid matter—that is, with the flesh—which may be very convenient, it does not follow from this that it can also unite with the soul, which is likewise spirit, in such a way as to make it, like the body, a receptacle for its being. This is possible only for the One Trinity, Who not only encompasses every rational being but also penetrates it. The one God is wholly present everywhere and in everything, so that He sees all our thoughts, all our inner movements, and all the secrets of our souls. "There is no creature hidden from Him; but all things are naked and open to the eyes of Him" (Heb. 4:13)—and "He tests the hearts and minds with righteousness" (Ps. 7:10). (—Col. 7:13).

15. But how do unclean spirits know our thoughts?—They do not read them directly in the soul, but discern them from their manifestation in external, sensory signs—that is, from our words and actions. But they cannot in any way penetrate those thoughts that have not yet emerged from within the soul. Even whether and how the thoughts they instill are accepted, they do not learn from the soul itself, nor from the innermost movements that occur secretly within it as a result, but rather from the manifestations of those thoughts outside the soul. For example, if, having planted a thought of gluttony, they see that a monk has begun to gaze out the window and at the sun, or to ask what time it is, they know from this that a gluttonous desire has been implanted in him. And it is not surprising that the aerial powers recognize this and similar things, since we see that even intelligent people are able to discern a person's inner state through their eyes, face, and other external signs. Certainly, those who, like spirits, are undoubtedly much more subtle and perceptive than humans can discern this even more accurately (— Collected Works 7, 15).

16. It must be understood that not all demons kindle all passions in people, but certain spirits are assigned to each passion; for some of them delight in impure and shameful lusts, others love blasphemy, others anger and fury, others find comfort in sorrow, and others in vanity and pride—and each sows into human hearts the passion in which he himself particularly delights; but they do not all stir up their passions at once, but in turn, depending on what the time, place, and receptiveness of the one being tempted require (— Collect. 7, 17).

17. And one must know that not all of them are equally evil or equally strong. The weakest spirits set out to attack the beginners and the feeble, and when these are defeated, then the strongest are sent—and in this way, the soldier of Christ must gradually endure ever stronger battles, in proportion to his own progress and the increase of his spiritual strength. And none of the saints could in any way have withstood the malice of such and so many enemies, or stood firm against their slanders and fierce rage, if Christ—the most merciful intercessor and helper—had not always been present with us in our battle, who does not equalize the strength of the combatants, who does not repel and restrain the disorderly raids of the enemies, and who "does not allow us to be tempted beyond what we are able to bear" (1 Cor. 10:13). (—Col. 7, 20).

18. That demons have no power to harm every person is most clearly demonstrated by the example of the blessed Job, whom the enemy did not dare to tempt beyond what was permitted by God's will—as is also attested by the confession of the evil spirits recorded in the Gospel accounts: "If you cast us out, send us into the herd of pigs" (Matt. 8:31). All the more reason, then, to believe that they cannot enter any person created in the image of God at will, since without God's permission they did not even have the power to enter unclean and speechless animals. Indeed, if they had been given the power to tempt and embitter any person at will, then no one—not to mention young monks, but even men of perfect virtue—would be able to live in the desert, surrounded by such a horde of such evil enemies (— Collects 7:22).

19. It is also known that unclean spirits do not enter the bodies of those possessed by them unless they have first taken possession of their minds and thoughts. Having first stripped them of the fear of God, the remembrance of God, and spiritual instruction, they then boldly attack them as if they were defenseless and deprived of God's help and protection—and therefore easily conquered—and finally establish their dwelling within them, as in a domain granted to them. – However, it is also true that those who are tormented by them most severely and excessively are those who, though not possessed by them physically, are most ruinously possessed by them in their souls—namely, those who have become ensnared by their passions and lusts; for, in the words of the Apostle, “whoever is overcome by something is its slave” (2 Peter 2:19), (– Sermon 7, 24, 25).

20. Scripture testifies that two angels—one good and one evil—are ever present with each of us. Of the good ones, the Savior says: “Take care not to despise even one of these little ones; for I tell you that their angels in heaven always see the face of My heavenly Father” (Matt. 18: 10)—and Blessed David: “The angel of the Lord encamps around those who fear Him and delivers them” (Ps. 33: 8); further evidence of their existence is found in the Book of Acts, where it is said of Peter: “He has an angel” (– 12: 15). Both angels are discussed at length in the book The Shepherd. – If we also consider the one who sought access to Blessed Job, we will clearly understand that it was the one who had always slandered him but could never induce him to sin; that is why he asked the Lord for authority over him—confessing that until then he had been defeated not by Job's virtue but by the Lord's intercession, who had always shielded him with His protection. And it is also said of Judas: “Let the devil stand at his right hand” (Ps. 108: 6). (– Collection 8, 17).

7. The Struggle Against All Kinds of Sorrows Arising from Misfortunes and Calamities

1. In Palestine, in the deserts between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, barbarians suddenly attacked the monks—and beat many of them severely. How could God have allowed such wickedness to be committed against His servants? – This question usually troubles the minds of those who, having little faith and knowledge, think that the virtues and deeds of the saints are rewarded during the brief span of this life—the temporal one. But we, who do not “set our hope solely on this present life in Christ,” so that, according to the Apostle, “we may not be the most wretched of all men” (1 Cor. 15: 19), must not be led astray by such opinions; lest, through ignorance of the true definition of the truth regarding such events, we—falling into terror and confusion from the temptations to which we find ourselves subjected—be led astray from the path of righteousness (Ps. 72: 2), —or, to put it in even more alarming terms, not to attribute to God injustice and indifference toward human affairs, on the grounds that, as it were, He does not deliver the holy and the righteous from temptation, nor does He repay the good with good and the wicked with evil in this life—and thus not deserve condemnation along with those whom the prophet Zephaniah threatens on behalf of the Lord, saying: “I will take vengeance on those who say in their hearts, ‘The Lord will not do any good, nor will He do any harm’” (Zeph. 1: 12), or to suffer the same fate as those who, with such complaints, blaspheme against God: “Everyone who does evil is good in the sight of the Lord, and He delights in them; and where is the God of justice?” (Mal. 2: 17)? Add to this the blasphemy described by the Prophet afterward: “Is it in vain that we have served God, and even more, that we have kept His commandments and walked in prayer before the face of the Lord Almighty? And now we bless the strangers, and all who practice lawlessness are prospering: they have defied God and yet are saved” (Mal. 3:14–15). – Therefore, in order for us to avoid ignorance—which is the root and cause of this most shameful delusion—we must first clearly discern what is truly good and what is evil. Holding fast then not to the false opinion of the crowd on this matter, but to the true definition of Scripture, we will no longer be deceived by the delusions of unbelievers.

2. Everything that exists and occurs in the world falls into three categories: good, evil, and the middle way. We must therefore discern what good, evil, and the middle way truly are, so that our faith, grounded in sound knowledge, may remain unshaken in the face of all temptations. In human affairs, nothing should be regarded as an essential good except for one spiritual virtue, which, by sincere faith leading us to God, compels us to cling unceasingly to this unchanging good. Conversely, nothing should be regarded as evil except for one sin, which, separating us from the good God, binds us to the evil devil. That which is in the middle is that which may be attributed to one side or the other, depending on the quality and disposition of the one who benefits from it, such as: wealth, power, honor, physical strength, health, beauty, life itself or death, poverty, the frailty of the flesh, slander, and other such things, which, depending on the nature and disposition of the one who uses them, can serve either for good or for evil. For even wealth can often serve for good, according to the Apostle, who “commands those who are rich in this present age to be rich in good deeds, to be generous and ready to share, storing up for themselves a good foundation for the future, so that they may receive eternal life” (1 Tim. 6: 17–19); but again, it turns to evil when it is gathered merely to hoard and bury in the ground, as the miserly do, or to squander on luxury and pleasures rather than for the benefit of those in need. Likewise, the fact that power and honor, physical strength, and health are neutral—and suitable for both sides—easily proves that many of the saints in the Old Testament, possessing all these things, were very pleasing to God; whereas, on the contrary, those who made poor use of these blessings, turning them to serve their evil inclinations, were unjustly punished or put to death, as the Books of Kings often recount. Likewise, understand that other moderate things are not true goodness—which consists solely in virtues—but are something in between; for just as they are useful and beneficial to the righteous—who use them for righteous and necessary deeds, enabling them to store up good fruits as treasures for eternal life—so too are they useless and harmful to those who misuse them, leading them only to sin and death.

3. Keeping this distinction between things and deeds firmly in mind, and knowing that there is no true good except virtue arising from the fear of God and love for God, and that there is no true evil except sin and separation from God, let us now examine with the utmost attention, whether it has ever happened that God, either by Himself or through another, has caused such evil to any of His saints? You will undoubtedly find no such instance anywhere. For it has never happened that another could lead anyone into sin when that person does not desire this evil and resists it; and if it ever happened that someone was led into sin, it was only one who himself had begun this sin within himself, through a lack of sobriety of heart and a depraved will. Thus, when the devil sought to lead the righteous Job into this evil—into sin—he employed all the wiles of his malice against him—depriving him of all his wealth, striking his children dead, and covering Job himself from head to toe with wounds that caused unbearable pain—yet he could not in any way stain him with sin; because “in all these trials” Job remained unshaken and “did not charge God with wrongdoing” (Job 1:22)—he did not succumb to blasphemy.

4. But how is it that God Himself says of Himself: “I am... the One who creates peace and forms calamity” (Isa. 45: 7)—and the Prophet testifies of Him: “Is there a calamity in a city that the Lord has not brought about?” (Amos 3: 6)? – In Holy Scripture, the word “evil” sometimes refers to unfortunate events, not because they are evil in their very nature, but because they are perceived as evil by those to whom they are sent for their own good. For the Word of God, when speaking to people, necessarily speaks in human words and with human sentiments. Thus, the life-saving surgery and cauterization that a doctor beneficently performs on those suffering from dangerous sores are regarded as evil by those who must endure them; likewise, spurs to a horse and correction for a sinner are no delight; and all disciplinary strictness seems bitter to those undergoing education, as the Apostle says: “No discipline seems pleasant at the time, but painful; but afterward it yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it”—and again: “The Lord disciplines those He loves, and He punishes every son He accepts. For what son is there whom his father does not discipline?” (Heb. 12:6, 7, 11)? – Thus, the word “evil” is sometimes used to mean unfortunate events, as in the following passage: “And God relented concerning the evil that He had said He would do to them, and He did not do it” (Jonah 3:10). And again: “For You, O Lord, are gracious and merciful, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love, and You repent of the evil You intended to bring upon us” (Jonah 4:2), that is, of the painful hardships and calamities that You are compelled to bring upon us because of our sins. Knowing how beneficial these are for some—not out of hostility toward them, but out of a desire for their salvation—another prophet prays thus: “Bring evil upon them, O Lord; bring evil upon the proud of the earth” (Isa. 26:15). And the Lord Himself says: “Behold, I will bring evil upon you” (Jer. 11:11)—that is, sorrows and ruin, by which, having been salvifically punished at the present time, you will finally be compelled to turn and hasten to Me, Whom you forgot in the days of your happiness. Why can we not acknowledge them as an essential evil, when they serve the good of many and lead them to the attainment of eternal joys? Therefore—let us return to the question at hand—everything that is commonly regarded as evil, whether inflicted upon us by enemies or afflicting us in some other way, should not be regarded by us as evil, but as something intermediate. And then it will no longer be what the one who inflicted it in a fit of rage considers it to be, but what the one who endures it feels it to be. Why, then, when a holy man is put to death, should one not think that evil has been done to him, but rather something intermediate? Because, whereas for the sinner it is evil, for the righteous it is a source of peace and deliverance from evils. “For the righteous man, death is rest, and his way is hidden” (Job 3:23). A righteous man suffers no loss from such a death—since nothing new or unprecedented has happened to him, —but what was bound to happen to him by natural necessity, he accepted through the malice of the enemy, not without benefit for eternal life, and he paid the debt of human death—which he was bound to pay according to the inevitable law of our present existence—with the rich fruit of suffering as a pledge of the great reward awaiting him.

5. This, however, does not exonerate the evildoers. The wicked lawbreaker will not go unpunished simply because his evil deed could not cause substantial harm to the righteous man. For patience is a virtue of the righteous, and it is not the one who inflicted death or suffering, but the one who patiently endured them who deserves a reward. For just as the former will justly suffer punishment for his brutal cruelty, so the latter, despite not having suffered any substantial harm, will be rewarded; because, having patiently endured trials and sufferings through the strength of his spirit, he turned everything inflicted upon him with evil intent to his own good, to the increase of his bliss in the life to come.

6. Thus, Job's patience did not earn a good reward for the devil, who had made him more glorious through his temptations, but for Job himself, who endured them courageously; nor will Judas be granted deliverance from eternal torment because his betrayal served to save the human race. For one must look not to the consequence of an act, but to the disposition of the one who performs it. Why, then, must we steadfastly maintain the firm conviction that no one can be harmed by another unless they themselves invite it upon themselves through the weakness of their heart and cowardice, when even the blessed Apostle affirms the same principle in a single verse: "We know that all things work together for good for those who love God" (Rom. 8:28). For in saying, "all things work together for good," He encompassed everything—not only what is considered happiness, but also what is regarded as misfortune; as the same Apostle says elsewhere about himself, that he has passed through both: "the weapons of righteousness on the right and on the left—that is, glory and dishonor, slander and praise: as if deceivers, yet true; as if in sorrow, yet always rejoicing; as if poor, yet making many rich," and so on (2 Cor. 6:7–10). Thus, everything—both what is regarded as happiness and what the Apostle attributes to the right side, describing it with the words "glory and praise," as well as what is regarded as misfortune and what He expressed with the words: "disgrace and abuse"—attributing these to the left side—are transformed in a perfect man into "weapons of righteousness": if he magnanimously endures the (grievous) blows inflicted upon him, fighting with them—that is, using as weapons the very things with which he is attacked, and by being armed with it—like a bow, a sword, and the strongest shield—against those who inflict it upon him, he perfectly demonstrates his patience and courage, celebrating the most glorious triumph of his steadfastness with those very enemy arrows that strike him down to death; and if, in this way, neither carried away by good fortune nor disheartened by misfortune, but walking the straight path and the royal way, he is not, from such a peaceful state of heart, pushed aside—as it were—by the presence of joy, nor again knocked down—as it were—by the onslaught of misfortune and a surge of sorrow. — "Peace is with those who love Your law, O Lord, and they have no stumbling block," testifies St. David (Ps. 118: 165); but of those who change with every turn of events, according to their nature and differences, it is said: "The fool, like the moon, changes" (Sirach 27:11). Likewise, of the perfect and the wise it is said: "For those who love God, all things work together for good"; and of the weak and the foolish it is proclaimed: "All things are contrary to the foolish man" (Prov. 14: 7), because he neither uses happiness for his own good nor is corrected by misfortune. The same moral strength is required to bear afflictions courageously as is needed to maintain proper moderation in joys; and it is certain that whoever is thrown off course by one of these circumstances is not strong enough to withstand either of them. However, happiness does more harm to a person than misfortune. For the latter sometimes restrains and humbles a person against their will, leading them to a salutary contrition that either disposes them to sin less or compels them to reform entirely; whereas the former, inflating the soul with pernicious yet pleasant flattery, reduces to dust in terrible ruin those who, because of their successes in happiness, consider themselves safe.

7. Such perfect men are allegorically called "ambidextrous" in Holy Scripture, as was Ehud, as written in the Book of Judges, who used both hands as if they were his right hand (3:15). We, too, can possess such spiritual perfection if we turn both happiness—regarded as the "right hand"—and misfortune—called the "left hand"—toward the right side through good and righteous use, so that whatever happens to us may be, according to the Apostle, "weapons of righteousness." Within our inner self, we discern two sides and, so to speak, two hands. And no saint can fail to possess both the one we call "right" and the one we call "left"; but the perfection of his virtue is recognized by the fact that he turns both into the right hand, making good use of them. To make it clearer what we are talking about, I say: a holy man possesses the right hand when he displays spiritual progress—when, burning with the Spirit, he reigns over all his desires and passions; when, being free from every devilish attack, he cuts off and severs carnal passions without any effort or discomfort; when, having risen high above the earth, he regards all that is present and earthly as fleeting smoke and an empty shadow, and despises it as something destined to pass away immediately; when, in the rapture of his mind, he not only ardently desires the future but also sees it most clearly; when he is most effectively nourished by spiritual contemplations; when he clearly perceives, as through a door opened for him, he beholds the heavenly mysteries; when he sends up prayers to the Lord with purity and fervor; when, ablaze with the fire of the Spirit, he is so drawn with all the longing of his soul toward the invisible and eternal that he thinks he is no longer in the flesh; he also possesses this state, —when he is engulfed by storms of temptation, when he is inflamed by surges of lustful arousal toward carnal desires, when he is incited to frenzied anger by the fire of irritating disturbances, when he is driven to pride or vanity by self-exaltation, when he is oppressed by “sorrow that leads to death” (2 Cor. 7:10), when he is utterly disheartened by the assaults of insidious despondency, and when, with the departure of all spiritual fervor, he grows numb from coldness and a certain inexplicable melancholy—so that not only do good thoughts, which warm the inner fire, depart from him, but also psalms, prayer, and reading, and seclusion in the cell all become terribly tedious to him, and all the instruments of virtue are met with a certain unbearable aversion and reluctance—all of which indicate that when a monk is afflicted in this way, he knows that the left side is pressing upon him. Thus, whoever, regarding that which, as we have said, belongs to the right side, is not puffed up by the vanity that arises, nor, regarding that which belongs to the left side, while courageously fighting, falls into despair; that person will use both hands as if they were the right hand, and having emerged victorious in both actions, will receive the palm of victory from both his left and his right states. Such a palm, as we read, was earned by the blessed Job, who was crowned for his deeds with his right hand when, being a wealthy and noble father of seven sons, he offered sacrifices to the Lord daily for their purification, desiring to make them not so much for himself, but rather pleasing and acceptable to God; when his door was open to all who came; when he was a foot to the lame and an eye to the blind; when the shoulders of the infirm were warmed by the sheepskins from his flock; when he was a father to orphans and a husband to widows; when even in his heart he did not rejoice at the downfall of his enemy. That same Job, acting with unwavering courage, triumphed over calamities with inimitably high fortitude: when, having lost his seven sons in a single moment, he did not grieve with bitter sorrow as a father would, but as a servant of God found peace in the will of his Creator; when, having gone from being rich to the poorest, from abundance to nakedness, from a healthy man to a leper, from a noble and glorious man to one who was humiliated and despised, he kept his spirit’s courage intact; and when, finally, having lost all his possessions and all his wealth, he became a dweller in a dunghill, and as if some torturer of his own body—the cruelest of all—were scraping away the oozing pus with a shard of pottery and plunging his fingers deep into the wounds covering every part of his body, extracting worms from them. Through all this, he did not in the slightest fall into blasphemy against God, nor did he grumble against his Creator in any way; indeed, —without the slightest fear of such a burden of the most acute temptations, he tore off and cast aside even the very garment covering his body—the only thing that could have been spared from the devil’s plunder—and added his own voluntary nakedness to that with which this most ferocious plunderer had struck him. Likewise, the hair of his head—the only part of his former signs of glory that remained untouched—he cut off and cast to his tormentor; and, thus severing what his raging enemy had left him, he proclaimed his joy at his triumph over him with a heavenly voice: “If we have accepted the good things from the hand of the Lord, shall we not endure the evil? Naked I came from my mother’s womb, and naked shall I return there: the Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away; as it pleases the Lord, so it has come to pass; blessed be the name of the Lord” (Job 2:10; 1:21). — I will rightly call Joseph “ambidextrous” as well, for in times of prosperity he was dear to his father, respectful toward his brothers, and pleasing to God; in times of adversity, he was chaste, faithful to his master, most gentle in his imprisonment, not holding grudges for wrongs done to him, charitable toward his enemies, and toward the envious—and even toward those who were nearly his murderers—not only was he tenderly disposed toward his brothers, but he was also abundantly generous to them. These and those like them are rightly called “ambidextrous”; for they use both hands as their right hand, and, passing through the trials enumerated by the Apostle, can say, like Him: “the weapons of righteousness, the right hand and the left, glory and dishonor, slander and praise,” and so on. — Let us, too, be ambidextrous, so that neither the abundance nor the scarcity of temporal blessings will sway us; neither will the former lure us into the pleasures of ruinous licentiousness, nor the latter plunge us into despair and grumbling, but when, in both cases, we give equal thanks to God, we will derive equal benefit from both happiness and misfortune; when we are like the true man of both hands, the Teacher of the Nations, who testified of himself: "I have learned to be content in whatever circumstances I find myself. I know how to be brought low, and I know how to abound; in any and every circumstance, I have learned the secret of facing plenty and hunger, abundance and need. I can do all things through Him who strengthens me" (Phil. 4:11–13).

8. Temptation, as we have said, comes in two forms—that is, through happiness and through misfortune; the reason why people are tempted, however, is threefold: for the most part, it is for the sake of testing; sometimes, for the sake of correction; and not infrequently, as punishment for sins. Thus, as we read, the blessed Abraham and many saints endured countless sorrows, like Job, for the sake of testing; and for his sake, the Jewish people were also subjected to trials in the wilderness, as Moses says in Deuteronomy: "And you shall remember the whole journey by which the Lord your God has led you these forty years in the wilderness, to test you and afflict you, so that He might know what was in your heart—whether you would keep His commandments or not" (Deut. 8:2)—and as is recalled in the Psalm: "I tested you at the waters of Meribah" (Ps. 80:8). And that Job was subjected to all that he endured precisely for this reason is directly attested to by God Himself, who says: "Did you think I had created you for any other purpose than to prove that you are righteous?" (Job 40:3). This happens for the sake of correction when the Lord, humbling His righteous ones for some minor and slight sins, or for their pride in their own righteousness, subjects them to various temptations—so that, having purified them in the present from every defilement of thought and having burned away every impurity He sees hidden within their innermost being, impurity (Isa. 1: 25), so that they may be presented to the future trial as pure as gold, allowing nothing to remain in them that, after being tested by the fire of judgment, would be found to require purification by punitive burning. In this sense it is said: "Many are the afflictions of the righteous" (Ps. 33: 20); and also: "My son, do not despise the Lord's discipline, nor lose heart when He rebukes you. For the Lord disciplines the one He loves, and He chastises every son He accepts. If you endure discipline, God is treating you as sons; for what son is there whom the Father does not discipline? But if you are without discipline—which all have shared in—then you are adulterers, not sons" (Heb. 12: 5–9); and in Revelation: "Those whom I love, I rebuke and discipline" (– 3: 19). To such people, under the image of Jerusalem, the Prophet Jeremiah speaks on behalf of God: "I will bring an end to all the nations" (I will destroy them), "in which I scattered you; but I will not bring an end to you, yet I will discipline you in judgment" (Jer. 30: 11). It is for this salvific correction that St. David prays, saying: "Test me, O Lord, and try me; examine my heart and my mind" (Ps. 25:2). Likewise, the prophet Jeremiah, understanding the salvific nature of such a trial, cries out: "Chastise us, O Lord, but in judgment, not in wrath" (Jer. 10:24). Likewise, Isaiah says: "I will bless You, O Lord, for You were angry with me, but You turned away Your wrath and had mercy on me" (Isa. 12:1). Blows of temptation are also sent because of sins. Thus, the Lord threatens to send such blows upon the people of Israel, saying: "I will send the teeth of beasts against you, with the fury of the creatures that crawl on the ground" (Deut. 32:24); and in the Psalms it is said of them: "Many are the wounds of the sinner" (Ps. 31:10); likewise in the Gospel: "You were well; do not sin anymore, lest something worse happen to you" (John 5:14). There is also a fourth reason why certain sufferings are sent to some, as we know from Scripture—namely, so that the glory and works of God may be revealed through them. Thus, in the Gospel it is said of the man born blind: "Neither this man nor his parents sinned, but this happened so that the works of God might be displayed in him" (John 9:3)—and regarding Lazarus's illness: "This illness is not unto death, but for the glory of God, so that the Son of God may be glorified through it" (John 11:4). There are also other kinds of divine retribution that befall certain individuals who have surpassed the very highest degree of evil and to whom, as we read, Dathan, Abiram, and Korah were condemned—and especially those of whom the Apostle speaks: "For this reason God gave them over to a depraved mind, to do what ought not to be done" (Rom. 1: 26, 28)—which must be regarded as the most severe of all punishments. It is of them that the Psalmist speaks: "They are not among the labors of men, nor do they share in the sufferings of men" (Ps. 72: 5); for they do not deserve to be saved by the Lord's intervention or to receive healing through temporary punishments, as "those who have gone astray and given themselves over to debauchery, committing every kind of impurity" (Eph. 4:19)—and because of the hardening of their hearts from a long-standing life of unceasing sin, they exceed all measures of purification and retribution within the very short span of life in this age. The Word of God rebukes such people through the prophet Amos: "You have been laid waste, as God laid waste Sodom and Gomorrah; and you were like a brand snatched from the fire, yet you have not returned to Me, says the Lord" (Amos 4:11), and through the prophet Jeremiah: “I have slain and destroyed My people, yet they have not turned from their ways” (Jer. 15: 7)—and elsewhere: “You struck them, but they were not wounded; you crushed them, but they would not accept discipline; you hardened their faces more than stone, and they would not turn back” (Jer. 5: 3). Thus, finally, the Lord—like the most skilled Physician—having exhausted all healing remedies and seeing that there is no longer a single remedy that could be applied to their wounds, is, as it were, overcome by the magnitude of their iniquities and, having been compelled to withdraw from His merciful punishment of them, proclaims to them, saying: “My zeal will be withdrawn from you, and I will rest; I will not care about you” (Ezek. 16:42). As for the others, whose hearts have not yet been hardened by frequent sin, who have not yet deserved such a severe and destructive punishment, but are capable of accepting a corrective punishment for their salvation, it is said: “I will punish them by making them hear of their affliction” (I will correct them by letting them hear of the sorrow that threatens them) (Hosea 7:12).

9. How can one acquire and maintain patience and serenity? – True patience and serenity cannot be acquired or maintained without humility of heart. When patience springs from this source, there will be no need to shut oneself away in a cell or take refuge in the desert to avoid the sorrow caused by adversity. When rooted deep within the soul in the virtue of humility—its mother and protector—it no longer needs external aids. For if we are troubled by some groundless accusation, it is clear that the foundations of humility are not firmly established within us, and our inner edifice is subjected to a devastating upheaval at the slightest gust of a storm. Patience is not praiseworthy and worthy of admiration when inner calm is preserved, unshaken by any arrows of the enemy; but it is majestic and glorious when it remains unshakable amid the onslaught of the storm of temptations. And the more it appears to be crushed and shaken, the more it is strengthened; and the more it is seemingly dulled, the more it is refined. For it is no secret that patience derives its name from the endurance of afflictions, and therefore no one can be called patient except the one who endures all that is inflicted upon him without distress. And it is precisely for this reason that Solomon so rightly praises him: “Better is a patient man than a mighty man, and one who controls his anger than one who captures a city” (Prov. 16: 32). Furthermore: “A patient man is of great understanding, but a hot-tempered man is utterly foolish” (Prov. 14: 29). Thus, when someone, having endured slander, is consumed by the fire of anger, the insult inflicted upon him should not be regarded as the cause of such a sin on his part, but merely as an occasion for the revelation of the disease (anger) hidden within him, in accordance with the meaning of the Savior’s parable of the two houses—one built on rock and the other on sand—both of which were struck with equal force by the rushing waters and the stormy winds, yet with unequal consequences; for in this instance, the house built on solid rock suffered no harm at all from such a powerful onslaught, while the one built on shifting sand was immediately destroyed—and was destroyed, evidently, not because it was struck by the waves rushing toward it, but because it had been foolishly built on sand. Likewise, a holy person differs from a sinner not in that he is tempted by temptations no stronger than those faced by the sinner, but in that he is not overcome even by great temptations, whereas the sinner falls even under small ones. And, as we have said, the courage of any righteous person would not be praiseworthy if he were victorious without having been tempted; indeed, victory would have no place if there were no attack from the enemy. For “blessed is the man who endures temptation, for when he has been tested, he will receive the crown of life, which God has promised to those who love Him” (James 1:12). And according to the Apostle Paul, “the power of God” is not in peace and comfort, but “is made perfect in weakness” (2 Cor. 12:9). For thus the Lord said to Jeremiah: “Behold, today I have made you like a fortified city, an iron pillar, and a bronze wall against all the kings of Judah, its princes, its priests, and the people of the land; they will wage war against you, but they will not prevail, for I am with you” (Jer. 1:18–19). (– Collect 18:13).

10. I wish to present to you at least two examples of such patience—one of which was demonstrated by a pious woman who, desiring to perfect herself in the virtue of patience, not only did not flee from temptations but even sought out things that would grieve her; and no matter how often she was insulted, she did not falter under temptation. This woman lived in Alexandria; she came from a noble family and devoutly served God in the house left to her by her parents. Once, when she went to the late Archbishop Athanasius, she asked him to entrust to her care and support a widow from among those supported by the church. “Give me,” she said, “one of the sisters whom I might comfort.” The Archbishop, praising the woman’s good intentions and her zeal for works of mercy, ordered that a widow be chosen from among them all who would surpass the rest in moral integrity, dignity, and courtesy, so that her desire to show such generosity would not be dampened by the wickedness of the one who was to benefit from it, and so that she, in showing it, would not suffer harm to her faith if offended by the latter's wickedness. Thus, having accepted this chosen one, she brought her into her home and began to serve her in every way. But seeing her modesty and gentleness, and receiving from her every moment a token of respect in gratitude for her act of charity, she returned after a few days to the aforementioned High Priest and said: "I asked that you command that I be given one whom I might comfort and whom I might serve with complete obedience." At first, he did not understand the reason for such a request or what this woman desired, and, thinking that her petition had been neglected due to the caretaker's carelessness toward the widows, he asked—not without some inner confusion—about the reasons for such a delay. He was told that the most virtuous widow of them all had been sent to her. Then, realizing what that wise woman was seeking, he ordered that she be given the most unruly widow of all—one who would surpass all others in anger, quarrelsomeness, violence, talkativeness, and frivolity. When they found and gave her such a woman, she took her into her home and began to serve her with the same—or even greater—zeal as she had served the first; yet in gratitude for such services, she received from her only insults—unworthy curses, slander, and abuse—and, reproaching her with scathing invective, the widow grumbled that she had begged the Archbishop for her not for peace of mind, but for torment, and had transferred her from a peaceful life to a difficult one, rather than from a difficult one to a peaceful one. This woman's insolence in such insults sometimes went so far that she could not even restrain her hands, yet the lady only redoubled her humble service in response, learning to overcome her fury not by resistance but by submitting herself even more humbly to her, and to tame her fury with loving gentleness. Having thus fully established herself in patience through these trials and having attained perfection in this desired virtue, she went to the aforementioned Saint to thank him both for his wise choice and for his own beneficial instruction, for the fact that he had finally, entirely in accordance with her desire, appointed for her such a most worthy teacher, through whose ceaseless insults she was strengthened daily in patience, until she reached the very summit of this virtue. At last, Lord, you have given me, for my comfort, exactly the one I wished to have; and that first teacher, by her respectful attitude toward me, comforted and consoled me more than I did her. – It suffices to say this much about women, so that the memory of such a matter may not only edify us, but also put us to shame; for unless we shut ourselves away in a cell, we cannot preserve our patience (– Collect. 18. 14).

11. Now let us consider another example of the patience of Abba Paphnutius, who lived in complete seclusion in the famous Skete Desert, where he now serves as a presbyter. Even as a young monk, he shone with such grace-filled holiness that the great men of that time marveled at his progress, and—despite the fact that he was the youngest of them all—they equated him with the elders and decided to include him in their number. When this became known, the envy that had once stirred the hearts of his brothers against Joseph now inflamed one of the Skete brothers with its poisonous fire, who maliciously sought to defile his beauty with some stain of disgrace. To this end, having waited until Paphnutius had gone to church on Sunday, he sneaked into his cell and, hiding his book among the wreaths—which are usually woven there from palm branches—went to church himself, pleased with his cunning; and at the end of the Sunday service, in front of all the brothers, he lodged a complaint with St. Isidore, who was then a presbyter, that a book had been stolen from his cell. This complaint so bewildered everyone—and especially the presbyter—that they did not know what to think or what to do, being struck by such a new and unheard-of crime there. Then the accuser who had reported this demanded that, after keeping all the brothers in the church, a few chosen from among them be sent to search all the cells. When the three elders appointed for this task by the presbyter, having searched all the other cells, came to Paphnutius's cell, they found a book hidden among the palm fronds—just as the slanderer had concealed it there—and, taking it, brought it immediately to the church and laid it before everyone. Paphnutius, though in good conscience he was certain of his innocence regarding this sin, nevertheless, as if guilty of theft, submitted himself to the judgment of the elders, expressing his willingness to bear whatever penalty might be imposed as reparation and asking that they grant him an opportunity for repentance. He said nothing in his own defense, for out of modest shame he feared that, by trying to wash away the stain of theft with words, he might incur further condemnation for lying, when no one suspected anything other than what had been found. Upon the conclusion of the proceedings and the drafting of the ruling, he left the church, not discouraged, but entrusting himself to the judgment of God Himself, and began to repent, intensifying his prayers with copious tears, tripling his fasting, and, in the utmost humility of spirit, humbling himself before others. When, for nearly two weeks, he had thus subjected himself to every kind of mortification of the flesh and spirit, and then, early on a Saturday or Sunday morning, came to the church—not to receive Holy Communion, but to prostrate himself at its doors and humbly beg forgiveness—then God, the witness and knower of all that is hidden, not bearing to let him continue to afflict himself and be disgraced by others, caused the devil to reveal what that inventor of evil, that dishonest thief of others' possessions, that cunning defamer of others' glory, had done without any witnesses. For, seized by the most ferocious demon, he himself revealed all the cunning details of his secret scheme; and thus, the very one who had instigated the crime and the intrigues became its treacherous exposé. Afterward, this unclean spirit tormented this unfortunate brother severely and for a long time, so that not only the prayers of the other Saints present there—who possessed the divine gift of authority over demons—could not purify him of it, but even the special grace of Isidore the Presbyter failed to drive out this most ferocious tormentor, even though, by the Lord's generosity, he had been granted such power over them that the possessed were not even brought to his door once they had received healing. This was because Christ the Lord had reserved this glory for Paphnutius, so that the offender might be healed only by the prayers of the one against whom he had plotted, and might receive forgiveness for his sin and deliverance from his present punishment, proclaiming the name of the One whose glory he had hoped to overshadow as a jealous enemy (—Col. 18:15).

12. Two reasons prompted me to recount this story: first, so that by reflecting on this man's unshakable steadfastness, we might demonstrate all the more composure and patience, especially since we are subjected to fewer slanders from the enemy; second, to draw from it the firm conviction that we cannot be safe from the storm of temptations and the devil's attacks if we place all the protection of our patience and all our hope in it not in the strength of our inner self, but in the walls of a cell, or in desert solitude, or in the fellowship of the saints, or in anything at all outside of ourselves. For if the Lord, who said in the Gospel, "The Kingdom of God is within you" (Luke 17:21), does not strengthen our spirit with the power of His intercession, then we will hope in vain—whether to overcome the slanders of the enemy of the air with the help of those living with us, or to ward them off by physical distance (i.e., by retreating to the desert), or to keep them out by shutting ourselves behind walls and a roof (i.e., by confining ourselves to a cell). For St. Paphnutius possessed all these things, and yet the tempter found a way to attack him—and neither the stronghold of walls, nor the solitude of the desert, nor the intercession of so many saints in that community could ward off this most wicked spirit from him. But since this holy servant of God did not place the hope of his heart in anything external, but in the Judge of all secrets Himself, he could in no way be shaken by the wiles of such an attack. Likewise, did not the one whom envy drove to such a crime also benefit from the blessings of the desert, the protection of a remote dwelling, and the fellowship of the blessed Isidore, the Abba and Presbyter, and the other saints? And yet, when the devil's storm found him himself built upon sand, it not only dealt a heavy blow to his dwelling (his inner structure), but completely destroyed it. Let us therefore cease to seek the foundations of our unshakable inner peace outside ourselves, and to expect that the weakness of our own patience might be aided by the patience of others. For just as "the Kingdom of God is within us," so too "a man's enemies are those of his own household" (Matt. 10:36). And no one resists me more than my own feelings, which are my closest household members. Let us therefore pay closer attention to ourselves, so that our household enemies may not wound us. For when those within our own household do not rise up against us, then the Kingdom of God abides within us in unperturbed peace of mind. And if we carefully weigh the causes of what is happening within us, we will find that I cannot be wounded by any person—not even the most malicious one—unless I myself rise up against myself through the restlessness of my own heart. For if I am ever hurt, the cause lies not in an attack from without, but in my own impatience. Just as solid food is beneficial for the healthy but harmful to the sick, it cannot harm the one who receives it unless his weakness gives it the power to cause him harm (—Sob. 18:16).

8. On Divine Grace and Free Will

1. We must always be firmly convinced that we can in no way attain perfection through our own labors and deeds, even if we were to practice every virtue with tireless diligence. Human efforts alone cannot possess such value and power as to elevate us to the heights of holiness and bliss unless the Lord Himself assists us and directs our hearts toward what is beneficial for us. Therefore, at every moment we must cry out to God with David: "Establish my steps in Your ways, that my feet may not slip" (Ps. 16: 5)—so that this invisible ruler of the human spirit may turn our will toward virtue, since it is more inclined toward vice, whether through ignorance of what is good or through the delusion of the passions. This is very clearly expressed by the Prophet in a single verse of a psalm: "I turned aside to pasture; and the Lord accepted me" (Ps. 117:13). The first half of the verse refers to the instability of our will; the second half refers to the help always ready for us from the Lord, Who, whenever we begin to waver, stretches out His hands to us, supports us, and strengthens us, lest we fall into a complete downfall by our own will alone. – Thus, no righteous person has enough strength within himself to attain righteousness; he wavers constantly and is ready to fall at any moment. Therefore, the Lord's mercy sustains him with His hand, lest, having fallen due to the weakness of his will, he perish completely in his fall (Discourses 3:12). And who would be so presumptuous and blind as to think that he has no need for God's constant assistance, when the Lord Himself clearly teaches in the Gospel: "Just as a branch cannot bear fruit by itself unless it remains on the vine, so neither can you unless you remain in Me; apart from Me you can do nothing" (John 15:4–5)? How foolish, even blasphemous, it is to attribute any good deeds to one's own efforts rather than to God's grace and assistance, when the Lord's words testify that without His assistance no one can bear spiritual fruit (– Collect 3, 16)?

2. We believe that just as the beginning of a good disposition is planted within us by a special inspiration from God, so too the practice of virtue is granted by Him; our task, however, is to submit to God's inspiration and accept His help with greater or lesser readiness. We deserve a reward—or a just punishment—depending on whether we are negligent or, with reverent submission, strive to conform to God's decrees and providence, which are extended to us through His gracious favor. This was clearly expressed in the healing of the blind men of Jericho. That the Lord passed by them is the grace of Divine Providence and condescension. But their cry, "Have mercy on us, Lord, Son of David" (Matt. 20:31), was an expression of their faith and hope; the healing itself, however, was again due to God's mercy (– Collect 3, 19).

3. A farmer, though he labors hard to cultivate the land, cannot expect a bountiful harvest unless timely rain falls on the tilled soil and the weather is favorable. Just as God does not grant a harvest to lazy farmers who do not strive to cultivate their land, so too will constant diligence bring no benefit to the hardworking if God's mercy does not favor them. Likewise, in the matter of living according to God, our own efforts are necessary, but if God's grace does not accompany us, we will succeed in nothing. Confess, then, that God is the primary source not only of good deeds but also of good thoughts: He inspires us with His Holy Will and gives us the strength and the right opportunity to fulfill what we rightly desire; "for every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of lights" (James 1:17). (–Collect 13, 3).

4. God's will always desires that the human being He created should not perish, but live forever. If God perceives even a spark of inclination toward good in our hearts, in His mercy He will not let it go out; but desiring that all may be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth, He does everything possible to ensure that this spark is transformed into a flame. God's grace is near to all; it calls everyone, without exception, to salvation and to the knowledge of the truth, for He says: "Come to Me, all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). (– Discourses 13, 7).

5. It is beyond human understanding how this salvation pertains to our free will as well, for it is said: "If you are willing and obey Me, you will eat the good of the land" (Isa. 1: 19), and yet it is the work of "neither the one who wills, nor the one who runs, but God who shows mercy" (Rom. 9: 16)—how it is that God will repay each person according to his deeds, and yet He Himself is "the one who both wills and works for good" (Phil. 2: 13)—why are we commanded to "create in yourselves a new heart and a new spirit" (Ezek. 18:31), and yet it is also said: "I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you" (Ezek. 11: 19). It will not be difficult to resolve these doubts if we remember that both God's grace and our free will are involved in our salvation, and that although a person may sometimes desire virtue, he always needs God's help to fulfill these desires; just as it is not enough for a sick person merely to desire to be healthy; rather, the Giver of life—God—must grant the strength to restore health. To be fully convinced that even the good desires arising from the natural capacity given by the merciful Creator can be fulfilled only with God's help, it suffices to recall the words of the Apostle: "For I have the desire to do what is good, but I cannot carry it out" (Rom. 7:18). (– Collect 13, 9).

6. Many ask: When does grace work within us—is it when a good desire manifests itself in us, or does a good desire manifest itself in us when God's grace visits us? Experience confirms both: Saul and Matthew the tax collector did not desire these things on their own, but desired them in response to a calling; Zacchaeus and the thief on the cross preceded the work of grace with their own desire. Thus it must be understood: when God sees that we are inclined toward the good, He guides and strengthens our readiness; but if we do not desire the good, or have grown cold toward it, He gives us saving promptings, through which a good disposition is formed or renewed (– Collect 13, 11).

7. One must not think that human nature is capable of evil alone. The Creator has sown in our souls the seeds of all virtues, but for them to grow, they require God's influence; yet human beings always retain the free will to accept or reject these gracious influences. If the arrangement of our salvation did not depend on us at all, the Apostle would not have said, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling"; but if everything depended solely on us, He would not have added, "For it is God who works in you, both to will and to act according to His good pleasure" (Phil. 2: 12–13). God's grace both precedes us—for the Prophet says, "My God, His mercy will go before me" (Ps. 58: 11)—and follows our will, which is why it is said, "And in the morning my prayer will go before You" (Ps. 87: 14). (– Collect 13, 12).

8. God's grace always directs our will toward what is good, yet in such a way that it also requires or expects corresponding efforts from us. Lest it bestow its gifts upon the careless, it seeks out opportunities to rouse us from our cold indifference; so that the generous bestowal of its gifts may not seem unwarranted, it grants them in response to our desire and labor. Nevertheless, grace is always given as a gift, for it rewards our meager efforts with immeasurable generosity. Therefore, no matter how great human labors may be, they cannot make grace a gift that is not freely given. The Apostle to the Gentiles, although he said that he "labored more than all the apostles," he nevertheless adds that these labors do not belong to him, but to "the grace of God that is with him" (1 Cor. 15:10). Thus, with the words "I have labored," he expresses the efforts of his will; with the words "not I, but the grace of God"—divine assistance; and with the phrase "with me"—he shows that grace assisted him, not while he was idle and careless, but while he was laboring (—Sob., 13:13).

9. God arranges our salvation in many diverse and incomprehensible ways: in those who desire and seek salvation, He strengthens that desire, and in those who lack it, He stirs it up; He helps fulfill our salvific desires—and instills holy desires, or confirms them. That is why in our prayers we call Him both Protector, Savior, and Helper. Like the most tender Father and a compassionate Physician, He accomplishes everything in all of us: in some He initiates the beginning of salvation and kindles zeal for Him, in others He brings deeds to completion and virtues to perfection—He holds some back from imminent downfall, while for others He provides opportunities and favorable circumstances for salvation—He assists those who desire and strive, and draws and inclines those who are unwilling and resistant toward a good disposition: He accomplishes everything everywhere—stirring up, assisting, and confirming—but without infringing upon the freedom He Himself has granted (– Sob., 13, 18).

9. On Prayer

1. One must set as one's primary goal and the pinnacle of perfection unceasing prayer, grounded in the stilling of the soul and purity of heart, for the attainment of which we endure bodily toil and maintain a contrite heart. The connection between all these deeds and prayer is inseparable and reciprocal. For just as the practice of these virtues leads to perfection in prayer, so too—unless prayer completes and crowns them all—they cannot remain firm and steadfast. Just as the unceasing, pure, and unshakable prayer of which we speak cannot be attained or brought to perfection without them, so too these virtues—which, in the ordering of life according to God, precede it—cannot be manifested in perfection without unceasing prayer. Therefore, we could not proceed directly to a discussion of the power of prayer, which crowns the edifice of all virtues, unless we had first systematically identified and examined everything that must be cut away or prepared in order to attain it—or unless, in accordance with the meaning of the Gospel parable (Luke 14: 28–30)—we had not first calculated and gathered everything necessary for the construction of this most exalted spiritual pillar; which, however, even if prepared, will not function as it should and will not allow the final pinnacles of perfection to be properly placed upon it unless, first, after removing every impurity of vice and casting out the debris and dead refuse of the passions, a most solid foundation of simplicity and humility is laid upon the living and firm ground of our heart—as it were, upon that Gospel rock (Luke 6: 48), the most solid foundation of simplicity and humility is laid, upon which this pillar might be erected through the building up of spiritual virtues, standing unshakably and raising its head to the very heights of heaven, trusting in its own strength. But when it is established on such a foundation, then let a torrential rain of passions fall; let the rushing rivers of persecution attack like battering rams; let a fierce storm of hostile spirits rage—it will not only remain undestroyed, but will not even feel their impact.

2. Therefore, so that prayer may be offered with due fervor and purity, the following must be observed in every way: first, all concern for worldly matters must be completely cut off; second, not only must preoccupation with any business or circumstance be avoided, but even the memory of such things must not be allowed; likewise, distraction, idle talk, verbosity, and jokes must be suppressed, and above all, the turmoil caused by anger or grief must be completely suppressed, and the pernicious stirrings of carnal lust and the craving for wealth must be uprooted entirely. Once these and similar vices—those visible to human eyes—have been thoroughly expelled and cut off, and after such a preliminary purification of everything, culminating in purity and blamelessness, one must then, first of all, lay an unshakable foundation of deep humility, strong enough to support a pillar reaching up to the very heavens; then, upon this foundation, the edifice of spiritual virtues must be erected, and the spirit must be kept from all flight and fickle wandering, so that in this way the spiritual gaze may gradually begin to rise toward the contemplation of God. For whatever our soul has absorbed before the hour of prayer inevitably comes to mind during prayer, being brought there by the hand of memory. Therefore, whatever state we wish to be in during prayer, we must prepare ourselves to be in that state before the time of prayer; and whatever we would not wish to see crowding within us when we pray, let us hasten to banish it from the innermost recesses of our hearts beforehand, so that we may fulfill the Apostle's command: "Pray without ceasing" (1 Thess. 5:17).

3. Our mind is aptly compared to an extremely light feather or a wisp of down, which, when not dampened by any external liquid, is usually carried aloft to great heights by the slightest breath of wind, due to its lightness; but when weighed down by any moisture, instead of rising into the air, it falls to the ground and sticks to the earth because of the weight of the moisture it has absorbed. So too is our mind: if it is not burdened by passions and worldly cares that come upon it, nor corrupted by the moisture of pernicious lust, then—being light by virtue of its natural purity—at the slightest breath of spiritual reflection, it soars upward and, leaving behind what is lowly and earthly, is carried away toward the heavenly and the invisible. That is precisely why the Lord's commandments admonish us: "Take heed to yourselves, lest your hearts be weighed down with gluttony, drunkenness, and the cares of this life" (Luke 21:34). So, if we wish for our prayers to penetrate not only to heaven but even beyond the heavens, let us strive to raise our minds to their natural lightness, purifying them of all earthly vices and of every trace of worldly passions, so that, no longer weighed down by any foreign burden, our prayer may soar easily to God.

4. Pay attention to the causes which the Lord has pointed out as weighing down our minds. He did not point to adultery, fornication, murder, blasphemy, or theft—all of which are universally recognized as mortal sins worthy of condemnation—but to gluttony, drunkenness, and the cares and concerns of this world—which not only are not avoided by anyone in this world and are not considered shameful, but, it is a shame to say, even some who have renounced the world indulge in these same pleasures, seeing in them neither harm nor misfortune for themselves. However, these three evils, which weigh down the soul, separate it from God, and press it down to the earth—if understood according to the letter of the law—are easy to avoid, especially for us, who are so far removed from any contact with the world and have absolutely no opportunity to become involved in these visible cares, drunkenness, and gluttony. But there is another kind of spiritual gluttony and drunkenness, which is more difficult to avoid, and there is another kind of worldly concern and sorrow of this age, which also encompass us, even after our complete renunciation of all worldly possessions, our abstinence from wine and all gluttony, and our dwelling in desert solitude. I am referring to the indulgences of the flesh, attachments, and passions; if we do not purify ourselves of these, then even without the intoxication of wine or an abundance of food, our hearts will be weighed down by a drunkenness and gluttony that are even more harmful. And only the one whose mind, having cast off the bonds of all passions, finds deep peace, and whose heart clings most firmly to God as the supreme good with all its longing, can perfectly fulfill the Apostolic commandment: "Pray without ceasing."

5. I believe it is impossible to encompass all kinds of prayer without deep contrition of heart, purity of soul, and enlightenment from the Holy Spirit. There are as many kinds of prayer as there are different states and moods that can arise in a single soul—or indeed in all souls. As the mind progresses in purity and in the quality of the state into which it is led—whether by chance or by virtue of its own inner workings—it rises renewed, and in each such moment it is transformed; and therefore it is evident that no one can always offer the same kind of prayers. Everyone prays differently when joyful, differently when burdened by sorrow or misfortune; differently when flourishing in spiritual progress; differently when oppressed by a multitude of enemy attacks; differently when seeking forgiveness of sins; differently when praying for an increase in grace, or for the acquisition of some virtue, or for the extinguishing of some passion; differently when struck with fear upon reflecting on Gehenna and the future judgment; or when he is inflamed with hope and desire for future blessings; or when he is in need and danger; or when he enjoys safety and peace; or when he is enlightened by revelations of heavenly mysteries; or when he grieves over barrenness in virtue and dryness of the spirit.

6. According to their subject matter, the Apostle distinguishes four kinds of prayer, saying: "I urge, then, first of all, that petitions, prayers, intercessions, and thanksgivings be made" (1 Tim. 2:1). – "Prayer" (δεησις) is a supplication or entreaty concerning sins, when someone, having come to a state of contrition over the sins they have committed—whether present or past—asks for forgiveness for them; – "supplication" – προσευχή—occurs when, in prayer, we offer or promise something to God (saying, "I will do such-and-such, O Lord, if only You will have mercy"); "intercession," – εντεξις, – occurs when, in the fervor of the spirit, we offer prayers for others—for those we love or for the peace of the whole world; "thanksgiving" – ευχαριστία—occurs when the mind offers thanks (and praise) to God, recalling God's past blessings, or seeing His present ones, or foreseeing the blessings God has prepared in the future for those who love Him.

7. Following these four kinds of prayer is a most exalted state of prayer, which consists in the contemplation of the one God and in ardent love for Him, and in which our mind, embraced and permeated by this love, converses with God in the most intimate manner and with special sincerity. The Lord's Prayer—"Our Father," etc. (Matt. 6:9–13)—inspires us to seek this state earnestly. We say, "Our Father!" and thereby, confessing God—the Ruler of the universe—as our Father, we confess together that we have been delivered from the state of slavery and adopted by God as His children. – And by adding next, "Who art in heaven," we express our readiness to turn away with complete aversion from attachment to this present earthly life—which is transient and distances us far from our Father—and, on the contrary, to strive with the greatest desire toward that realm, where our Father dwells, and not to allow ourselves anything that, by making us unworthy of this exalted adoption, would deprive us—as illegitimate children—of our Father's inheritance and subject us to the full severity of God's righteous judgment. Having attained such a high rank as sons of God, we must burn with such filial love for God that we no longer seek our own interests, but desire with all our heart His glory—the glory of our Father—saying to Him: "Hallowed be Thy Name," thereby testifying that our entire desire and all our joy is the glory of our Father—that the glorious Name of our Father may be glorified, reverently honored, and worshiped. The second petition of a purified mind is the petition, "Thy Kingdom come" of His Father—that is, the kingdom in which Christ reigns among the saints, when, after the devil's power over us has been taken away and the passions have been cast out of our hearts, God begins to reign in us through the fragrance of virtues—or the kingdom promised at the appointed time to all the perfect and to the children of God, when Christ will say to them: "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25:34). The third petition, proper to the sons: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven"—which means: may people be like the angels—and just as they fulfill God's will in heaven, so may all who live on earth do not their own will, but His; it also means: may everything in our lives be according to Your will; we entrust our fate to You, believing that You—who are all things—arrange both happiness and misfortune for our good, and care more for our salvation than we do ourselves. Furthermore: "Give us this day our daily bread." "Daily"—that is, above all that is essential—the highest of all essences—(which can only be "the bread that came down from heaven"). When it says "today," it indicates that yesterday's partaking of it is insufficient unless it is also given to us now, to convince us of its daily necessity at all times to offer this prayer, since there is no day on which we do not need to strengthen the heart of our inner being by receiving and partaking of this bread. "And forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors." The merciful Lord promises us forgiveness of our sins if we ourselves set an example of forgiveness toward our brothers: "forgive us, as we also forgive." It is clear that, in the hope of this prayer, only those who have themselves forgiven their debtors may boldly ask for forgiveness. But whoever does not wholeheartedly forgive a brother who has sinned against him will, by this prayer, be asking not for mercy but for condemnation. For if this prayer of his is heard, then, in accordance with his example, what else can follow but unrelenting wrath and the inevitable decree of punishment? "Judgment without mercy will be shown to anyone who has not shown mercy" (James 2:13). "And lead us not into temptation." Recalling the words of the Apostle James: "Blessed is the man who endures temptation" (James 1:12)—we must understand these words of prayer not as "do not allow us ever to be tempted," but rather as "do not allow us to be overcome by temptation." Job was tempted, but he was not led into temptation; for, with God's help, "he did not attribute folly to God" (Job 1:22), nor did he defile his lips with blasphemous murmuring, to which the tempter sought to lead him. Abraham was tempted, Joseph was tempted, but neither one nor the other was led into temptation; for neither of them carried out the tempter's will. "But deliver us from the evil one”—that is, do not allow us to be tempted by the devil beyond our strength, but “grant us, with the temptation, a way out, so that we may be able to endure it” (1 Cor. 10:13).

8. Although the proposed prayer, having been uttered by the Lord Himself, embodies the fullness of (prayerful) perfection; the Lord leads His faithful even further—to a certain higher state, as we mentioned above—to that fervent prayer, known or experienced by very few, indeed, I would say, ineffable, which, transcending all human understanding, is not expressed by the sound of a voice, the movement of the tongue, or the utterance of any words, and which the mind, illuminated by the outpouring of that heavenly light, does not express through feeble human speech, but, having gathered its senses, pours forth from itself uncontrollably, as if from a most abundant source, and in some inexpressible way pours it forth directly to the Lord, revealing in that briefest moment of time what, having come to its senses, it is unable to utter in words or trace in thought.

9. This kind of prayerful state is a gift from God; generally, however, a grace-filled prayerful disposition is characterized by a sense of tenderness, the presence of which stirs the mind into pure and fervent prayer. This tenderness arises on various occasions, as experience has shown. Sometimes, while singing psalms, the words of a particular verse provided an occasion for fervent prayer; at other times, the melodious sound of a brother’s voice stirred the souls of those who were amazed to intense supplication. We also know that at times, clear and reverent singing instilled great fervor in those present; and not infrequently, the exhortation of a perfect man and spiritual conversation stirred in those who were kneeling a desire for an abundant outpouring of prayers. It happened that we were no less deeply moved to complete tenderness by the death of a brother or some dear person. Likewise, the memory of our own coldness and sloth would sometimes kindle in us a saving spiritual fervor. And in general, the instances in which God’s grace awakens our souls from insensitivity and drowsiness are innumerable.

10. Just as tenderness arises in various circumstances, so too does it manifest itself in diverse ways: at times it reveals itself as an indescribable spiritual joy; at times it plunges all the soul’s powers and movements into deep silence; at times it brings forth tears in greater or lesser abundance. Tears, or a certain tearful mood, are its more common expressions. These tears arise either from the heart’s sorrow at the awareness of one’s sins, or from the contemplation of eternal blessings and the desire for eternal glory, or from the awareness of God’s great blessings upon oneself, accompanied by a sense of one’s unworthiness and inadequacy, or from the sense of our troubled sojourn on earth.

11. What is the sign that a prayer has been heard?—When, during prayer, no doubt troubles us, and nothing dampens our hope in our petition with despair; if, in the very outpouring of prayer, we feel that we have received what we asked for, then let us not doubt that our prayers have indeed been heard. For the one who prays will be deemed worthy to be heard and to receive what is asked for to the extent that he believes that God is looking upon him and is able to grant his request. For the saying of our Lord is unchanging: “Whatever you ask for in prayer, believe that you have received it, and it will be yours” (Mark 11:24). In this regard, the Word of God points out many reasons that contribute to a prayer being answered. Thus, a prayer is heard when two agree to pray (Matt. 18:19)—or when someone prays with faith, even if that faith is as small as a mustard seed (Matt. 17:20)—or when someone prays persistently (Luke 11:8)—or when almsgiving is combined with prayer (Sirach 29:15)—and other acts of mercy (Psalm 58:6–9). See how many ways there are to obtain the grace of having one’s prayer heard; therefore, let no one fall into despair when asking for the blessings of salvation. For suppose that you lack many of the things through which a prayer is heard; but surely you can be persistent in prayer, which is within the reach of everyone who desires it. For this reason alone, the Lord promised to grant whatever is asked for. Therefore, without wavering in unbelief, let us be persistent in prayer, and we will receive what we ask for. Thus the Lord promised: “Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you” (Luke 11:9–10). But everyone who prays must know that he will certainly not be heard if he doubts that he will be heard.

12. Above all else, with regard to prayer, we must fulfill the Gospel commandment to pray to our heavenly Father after entering our inner room and closing the door. This should be done literally, but even more so spiritually. We pray within our inner room when, having completely detached our hearts from all thoughts and cares, we offer our prayers to the Lord in a certain secret manner and with boldness. We pray with the door shut when, with our lips sealed, we pray in silence to the One who tests not our words but our hearts. We pray in a secret place when, with only our heart and an attentive mind, we offer our petitions to God alone, so that even the most hostile powers cannot know what we are praying for. Why is it necessary to pray in deep silence? Not only so as not to distract our fellow worshippers from prayer or disturb their devotional feelings with our whispers or exclamations, but also so that the intention (purpose) of our prayer may be hidden from our very enemies, who slander us—especially when we pray.

13. Our prayer will attain its proper perfection when what the Lord prayed to His Father is fulfilled in us: that “the love with which You have loved Me may be in them” (John 17:26); and further: “just as You, Father, are in Me, and I am in You, may they also be one in Us” (ibid., v. 21). This will be the case when all our love, all our desire, all our zeal, all our striving, all our thoughts, everything we see, everything we speak of, and everything we hope for—will be God; and when that unity which exists between the Father and the Son, and between the Son and the Father, pours into our hearts and minds—so that just as He loves us with sincere purity and indivisible love, so too may we be united with Him by pure and indivisible love. Whoever attains this enters a state in which unceasing prayer cannot but burn in his heart; then every movement of his life and every aspiration of his heart will be a single, unbroken prayer, a foretaste and pledge of eternally blessed life.

14. To attain the highest perfection in prayer, one must establish oneself in the unceasing remembrance of God—a goal achieved through a brief, frequently repeated prayer (Conversations, 9:36). Our Fathers have found that one who strives for constant remembrance of God must acquire the habit of ceaselessly repeating the following prayer: “O God, hear my cry; O Lord, come to my aid” (Ps. 69:2). – This verse was not chosen unworthily from all of Scripture: it expresses all the dispositions required in prayer and meets all the needs of the one who prays. It contains a humble confession of one’s helplessness, a confession that God is the only helper, always ready to assist—faith and hope that He will help the one uttering this prayer and deliver him from every trouble. Whoever ceaselessly calls upon God with these words wisely perceives and feels in his heart that God is present with him, and turns to Him as to a Father with a son’s loving heart—and thereby draws upon himself God’s protection, shelter, and defense. And in this way, this brief prayer becomes an impregnable wall against the attacks of demons—a dispeller of the clamor of thoughts, a refuter of evil intentions, a tamer of passionate impulses, and a nurturer of every good inclination in the heart. The Fathers have also commanded us: if the passion of gluttony troubles you in its various manifestations, cry out: “O God, hear my cry for help; O Lord, hasten to my aid”; – or if you feel the need for stricter fasting to subdue the flesh, and do not hope to master yourself, pray: “O God, hear my cry for help,” and so on. If the spirit of despondency torments you, and sorrow consumes you, deterring you from every proper task, say: “O God, hear my cry for help”; – or if a certain spiritual joy visits your soul, and you wish to preserve and elevate it, say the same words: “God, hear my cry for help.” If the temptations of the flesh arise with their alluring sweetness—and you fear that this fire might scorch the fragrant blossom of chastity—cry out: “O God, hear my cry for help,” and so on; or if tranquility and coolness have entered your limbs, and you desire that this good state continue, or remain in you forever, repeat more earnestly: “O God, hear my cry for help,” and so on. So, in every spiritual need, repeat this one prayer; and it will be for you a deliverance from all that is evil and a safeguard of all that is good within you. Let it therefore constantly resound in your heart; in every task and service, on the road and at the table, when going to sleep and upon waking, do not cease to recite this verse and learn from it, until, through constant practice, you become accustomed to reciting it even in your sleep.

15. The fruit of this will be, first and foremost, that you will reject all the wealth of your own thoughts, and, held fast by the unity of this verse, you will become more and more accustomed to uniting your mind in thought upon the one Helper, seeing Him as ever present with you, all-seeing, and all-encompassing. From there, then, ascending to the most vivid communion with God, you will begin to be filled with ever more exalted mysteries, immersing yourself in God, abiding in Him alone, and finding satisfaction in Him alone. Thus, at last, you will attain that pure prayer mentioned above, which no longer admits any image into your mind, nor is expressed by any sound of the voice or the utterance of any words, but bursts forth from the heart with irrepressible liveliness, an ineffably rapturous, fiery yearning of the mind toward God, and pours out before Him in inexpressible sighs and groans.

10. On Guidance in the Spiritual Life—A Discourse with Advice from the Most Experienced

1. Once, the elders gathered around St. Anthony the Great and, from evening until morning, discussed various spiritual topics—and especially which virtue, above all others, could keep us beyond the reach of the devil’s snares of deception and lead us directly along the path to perfection. Various opinions were put forward: some advocated fasting and vigil; others, non-attachment to possessions and contempt for all things; still others, hermitage or retreat into the desert; and still others, love for humanity. When everyone had spoken in this way, Blessed Anthony began to speak. “Everything you have said is salvific and necessary for those who seek God and desire to come to Him. But the experiences of the downfall of those who excelled in these virtues do not allow us to give precedence to any one of them. For even those who distinguished themselves by strict fasting and vigils, those who remained constantly in desert solitude, those who reached the extreme degree of non-attachment to possessions, and those who were generous givers of alms fell into the enemy’s snare and fell. And the reason for this, I believe, was none other than a lack of discernment. For discernment teaches a person to walk the royal path, avoiding dangerous extremes: with regard to fasting, for example, it permits neither excessive exhaustion of the body nor indulgence toward it. In the Gospel, it is called the eye and the lamp of the soul: “The lamp of the body,” says the Lord, “is the eye. If your eye is clear, your whole body will be full of light; but if your eye is bad, your whole body will be full of darkness” (Matt. 6:22–23). Just as light illuminates everything and the eye sees everything, so too does it, by reviewing and examining all of a person’s thoughts and deeds, clarify and determine what should be done and what should be avoided. But when someone lacks such discernment, then his deeds and thoughts, not being strictly examined, flow as they will, and here the enemy manages to substitute what appears to be good for what is true, and, using it to conceal a pit or a snare, casts him into them and destroys him.”

2. St. Anthony’s decision is confirmed by countless examples. Let us recall the pitiful downfall of the elder Iron. He had devoted himself to an extremely strict fast and deep seclusion, and, so as not to violate them in any way, at the enemy’s instigation, he stopped attending the usual gatherings of the hermits on Saturdays and Sundays, where, through mutual discussion, they clarified the various paths and crossroads of the ascetic life. Deceived by this, which seemed like good advice from the enemy, he succumbed to an even greater delusion—he mistook the enemy for an angel when he appeared to him in that form, and agreed, at his word, to throw himself into a dry well—he was crushed and died on the third day. “Here is another example: two brothers, intending to journey into the deepest desert, vowed to accept no food other than that which the Lord Himself would provide. When, wandering through the desert, they grew so exhausted that they could no longer move, they were attacked by the Maziks—a wild and cruel people; but seeing them in such a pitiful state, they took pity on them and offered them bread. One of them came to his senses and agreed to accept the bread, even though it was from people, as if it had been sent by the Lord; he regained his strength and survived. The other, however, stubbornly stuck to his decision—and died of starvation. Here is another example: a certain strict ascetic and hermit considered himself worthy of communion with the heavenly powers—and the enemy wasted no time in taking advantage of this; he began to appear to him as an angel, giving revelations about human deeds and thoughts, and producing light in the cell without a lamp. Having thus gained his complete trust, the enemy finally commanded him to sacrifice his son to God, following the example of Abraham. And this would certainly have been carried out had the son, seeing the unusual preparations, not managed to flee. – Furthermore: in Mesopotamia, the enemy led a certain ascetic and hermit to unquestioning faith in dreams by presenting to him in a vision two peoples: the Christian people, with the Apostles and Martyrs, in darkness, disgrace, sorrow, and weeping—and the Jewish people, with Moses, the Patriarchs, and the Prophets, in radiant splendor, glory, and joy—and persuaded him to convert to Judaism and undergo circumcision. “These examples alone are enough to convince us that lack of discernment is an open door to downfall and ruin.”

3. Prudence is a gift from God, which, however, must be developed and cultivated. How? By entrusting everything to the judgment of the most experienced Fathers. This is the wisest school of prudence, in which even those who lack a particular aptitude for it learn to reason well about what is proper. Thus is the question resolved—how prudence is acquired. True discernment is acquired through true humility, the first proof of which is to reveal to the Fathers not only what we do, but also what we think, trusting not in our own thoughts in anything, but following the instructions of the elders in everything, and considering good or bad only what they recognize as such. Such conduct helps one to remain safely on the right path and protects one from all the devil’s snares. It is impossible for one who orders his life not according to his own judgment but according to the counsel of those who have succeeded to fall prey to demonic deception. Thus, submitting one’s thoughts to the judgment of the Fathers replaces one’s own discernment and teaches it. The enemy hates the light; therefore, the revelation of evil thoughts, as soon as they are brought to light, dispels and destroys them. Just as a snake, drawn from a dark burrow into the light, tries to flee and hide, so too do evil thoughts, once exposed through open confession and repentance, try to flee from a person. This is confirmed by many, many examples and experiences.

4. Abba Serapion recounts about himself: When I was a novice, I would secretly take a piece of dry bread from Abba and eat it. I did this for a very long time, and the passion took such hold of me that I could not overcome it. My conscience condemned me; yet I was ashamed to tell Abba about it. — But by the providence of the merciful God, some brothers happened to visit the elder, and they began to open up their thoughts to him and ask for his permission regarding them. The elder answered them as was necessary, and in the course of the conversation, he also spoke about abstinence in food. Then he added: “Nothing harms monks as much, and nothing delights the demons as much, as concealing one’s thoughts from one’s spiritual fathers.” These words struck me deeply; it seemed to me that God had revealed my sins to the elder, and, overcome with remorse, I began to weep—then I took from my bosom a piece of bread that I had been stealing, and, throwing myself to the ground, I asked him to forgive my past sins and to pray that I might be kept from doing this in the future. Then the elder said: “Your confession has freed you from your bondage; by revealing your sins, you have struck down the demon who was tormenting you while you remained silent. Until now, you allowed him to possess you, neither opposing him nor exposing him, but now that he has been driven out of your heart and exposed, he will no longer have a place within you.” The elder had not yet finished speaking when it seemed as though a burning torch had come out of my innermost being and filled the entire cell with a foul odor, so that those present thought sulfur was burning. The elder added: “Behold, the Lord has clearly confirmed the truth of my words and your deliverance.” Thus, through the act of confession, the passion of gluttony departed from me, and since then, my former desire has not even crossed my mind.

5. What do we see in Samuel?—He, having been consecrated to God from infancy and having been granted a conversation with Him, did not trust his own thoughts, but, having been called twice by God, hurried to the elder Elijah and received instruction from him on how to respond to God. Thus, God Himself chose to guide even the one He had deemed worthy of conversing with Him through the elder’s instruction, so as to lead him to humility through it. — Do we not see the same thing in St. Paul? The Lord Himself called him; but immediately He sent him to Ananias to learn the way of truth from him. — And St. Paul himself, after several attempts at preaching the Gospel, went to Jerusalem to verify his message, “lest I be running in vain” (Gal. 2:2)—even though he was tangibly accompanied by the grace of the Holy Spirit. Thus it is evident that the Lord reveals the path to perfection to no one except those guided toward it by spiritual Fathers, just as He says through the Prophet: “Ask your father, and he will tell you; your elders, and they will tell you” (Deut. 32: 7).

11. On the Degrees of Perfection in the Spiritual Life, According to the Motives Leading to It

1. Three motivations compel people to subdue their passions, namely: fear of the torments of Gehenna in the future, or fear of the severity of the laws in the present; hope and desire to attain the kingdom of heaven; and finally, love of virtue or benevolence. That fear causes one to abhor the filth of evil is stated in Proverbs: “The fear of the Lord hates iniquity” (8:13). That hope also restrains one from being carried away by passions is stated here: “All who hope in Him shall not be put to shame” (Ps. 33: 23). As for love, it is said that it does not even fear the fall into sin: “Love never fails” (1 Cor. 13: 8). Therefore, the Apostle summed up the whole matter of salvation in the acquisition of these three virtues, saying: “And now these three remain: faith, hope, and love—these three” (1 Cor. 13:13). Faith, by instilling fear of the future judgment and torments, turns us away from the defilement of the passions; hope, by drawing our minds away from the present with the expectation of heavenly rewards, compels us to despise all carnal pleasures; love, by its fire kindling in us a love for Christ and for progress in spiritual virtues, impels us to turn away with utter hatred from everything that is contrary to them. Although these three virtues all lead us to the same end—that is, they urge us to abstain from everything that is forbidden—they differ greatly from one another in their degrees of excellence. The first two are characteristic of those people who, while striving for progress, have not yet come to love them with all their hearts; the third, however, belongs exclusively to God and to those people who have restored within themselves the image and likeness of God. For God alone creates all that is good, not out of fear or a desire for reward, but out of pure love. ““The Lord has done everything for His own sake,” says Solomon (Prov. 16:4), that is, out of His goodness He lavishly pours out every kind of blessing upon both the worthy and the unworthy; for He cannot be grieved by offenses nor angered by the lawlessness of men, as He is eternally perfect and, by His very nature, unchanging goodness.

2. Therefore, whoever strives for perfection must gradually ascend from the first stage of fear—properly called “servile fear”—to the path of hope. Here, a person is likened no longer to a slave but to a hired worker; for he acts in anticipation of future reward. Although he, confident in the forgiveness of his sins, no longer fears punishment for them, and, aware of his good deeds, hopes to receive a good reward for them, he has not yet reached the state proper to a son, who, fully confident in his Father’s all-generous favor toward him, unhesitatingly regards as his own all that belongs to the Father.

3. Therefore, we must hasten our progress so that, through “love that never fails,” having ascended to the third degree of sonship—those who regard all that belongs to the Father as their own—we may be deemed worthy to take on the image and likeness of the heavenly Father and, following the example of His true Son, cry out: “All that the Father has is mine” (John 16: 15)—which is what Blessed Paul also testifies about us, saying: “All that you are—whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or the present, or the future—all that you are” (1 Cor. 3:21–22). The Savior’s commandment also calls us to such godlikeness: “Be perfect,” He says, “just as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt. 5:48). For those who are still in the state of slaves and hired hands, the inclination toward good is sometimes interrupted—namely, when the soul, due to a certain cooling of its feelings or because of distraction by worldly pleasures and joys, ceases to be moved by the fear of Gehenna or the desire for future blessings. Thus, we can attain true perfection in no other way than by loving God for no other reason than the very impulse of love for Him; for He, too, first loved us for no other reason than our salvation. To this end, we must strive with ardent zeal to ascend from fear to hope, and from hope to the degree of love for God—or love for the virtues themselves—with complete fervor of the soul, so that, having embraced such devotion to the good, we may, as far as human nature allows, remain steadfast in it.

4. There is a great difference between one who extinguishes the flame of passions within himself out of fear of hell or hope for future reward—and one who, moved by a sense of divine love, turns away in revulsion from vice and impurity itself, and guards in his heart the virtue of purity out of love and devotion to purity, and does everything, without fear of torment, but out of love for virtue, and not looking toward the reward promised in the future, but being satisfied by the conscious enjoyment of present good. In such a state, a person—even if no one were to witness his deeds—will not allow himself to take advantage of an opportunity to sin, nor will he even defile himself secretly in his thoughts with sinful pleasure; for, nurturing in his heart a true love for virtue, he not only rejects anything contrary to it but also turns away from it with revulsion. But whoever is held back from being carried away by the allure of the passions by fear will, once the barrier imposed by fear is removed, return to what he loves, and therefore will not always be steadfast in his virtue, nor will he ever find peace from the struggle of the passions; for he will in no way be able to attain the firm and unceasing inner peace that comes from the establishment of purity. Where there is no respite from battle, one cannot help but sustain wounds from time to time. For no matter how skilled one may be in the art of war, no matter how valiantly one may fight, even if one frequently inflicts fatal wounds on one’s enemies, it is impossible for the enemy’s blade not to strike one occasionally. On the contrary, whoever has suppressed every rebellion of the passions, already enjoys a secure peace, and has committed himself to virtue itself; that person will constantly preserve this state of good disposition, by which he is wholly enveloped and to which he is wholly devoted, since he is certain that nothing is more ruinous than the loss of purity. Respect for those present will not in the least increase his integrity, nor will solitude diminish it in the slightest; but always and everywhere carrying with him the judge not only of his deeds but also of his thoughts—his conscience—he strives above all to please the One whom, as he is convinced, cannot be bypassed, deceived, or hidden from.

5. Whoever, relying on God’s help rather than on his own zealous labor, is deemed worthy to attain this degree of perfection, will pass from the state of servitude, in which fear reigns, and from the state of a hired hand, in which the motive is not the inner goodness of the one acting but the expectation of reward, into the state of sonship, in which neither fear nor the desire for reward has a place, but only “love that never fails” acts unceasingly. Whoever, through such love, restores within himself the image and likeness of God will delight in goodness simply because of his heart’s inclination toward goodness itself; and having acquired patience and meekness—qualities in some measure akin to God’s—he will no longer be angered by any of the vices of sinners, but rather, sympathizing and having compassion on their weaknesses, pray for their forgiveness, remembering that he himself had previously been overcome by similar passions until the Lord’s mercy saved him, and that it was not by his own efforts that he broke free from the bonds of the carnal life, but God’s grace delivered him from it; —so that he might understand that it is not wrath but compassion that must be shown toward sinners, with a peaceful heart before God: “You have loosed my bonds”: “To You I will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving” (Ps. 115:7),—and further: “If the Lord had not helped me, my soul would soon have gone down to the grave” (Ps. 93:17); and so that, being in such a humble state of mind, he might fulfill the following commandment of Gospel perfection: “Love your enemies, do good to those who hate you, and pray for those who persecute you and cast you out” (Matt. 5: 44); and in this way, he was deemed worthy to receive the reward attached to this commandment, by which we are not only made to bear the image and likeness of God, but are also called children of God: “that you may be,” it says there, “sons of your Father who is in heaven: for He causes His sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous” (v. 45). Realizing that he has attained such love, Blessed John says: “Let us have confidence on the day of judgment, for just as He is, so are we in this world” (1 John 4:17). For man, by his very nature feeble and weak, how else can he be “as He is,” if not by extending the benevolent love of his heart—in imitation of God—to the good and the evil, the righteous and the unrighteous? —So that he may do good out of devotion to goodness itself, revealing in himself that he is truly a child of God, of whom the same blessed Apostle proclaims: “Everyone born of God does not commit sin, for His seed remains in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God” (1 John 3:9), and again: “We know that everyone born of God does not commit sin; but the one born of God keeps himself safe, and the evil one does not touch him” (1 John 5:18). – (This, however, should not be understood to refer to every kind of sin, but only to mortal sins. – In truth, even the holiest of souls cannot avoid falling into those minor transgressions that occur in speech, in thought, in desire—whether through ignorance, forgetfulness, some kind of excess, or an unforeseen circumstance—which, though distinct from the sin called “sin leading to death,” nevertheless cannot be without some degree of guilt and reproach). Therefore, whoever, as we have said, acquires a love for what is good and becomes an imitator of God, having clothed himself with the Lord’s mercy and long-suffering (Col. 3: 12), will pray even for his very persecutors, crying out like his Lord: “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Luke 23:34). A clear sign of a soul not yet purified of evil passions is when a person feels no compassion for the sins of others but passes harsh judgment on them.

12. On the End of Penitential Works

1. Perfect repentance consists in no longer committing those sins for which we repent and for which our conscience convicts us; the proof of our satisfaction for them and of their forgiveness is the banishment from our hearts of even the slightest sympathy for them. Let everyone know that he is not yet forgiven for his past sins, as long as, while undertaking the labors and sighs of atonement for them, images of sinful deeds—whether those he himself committed or similar ones—flit before the eyes of his mind, and through this, not merely by indulging in unseemly objects but even by the mere recollection of them, the soul’s inner peace is shattered. Therefore, let the one who is vigilantly laboring toward such satisfaction consider himself absolved of his sins—and forgiven for all that he has done previously—only when he feels that his heart is no longer moved in the least by their allurements, and not merely by imagination. For the judge of repentance and forgiveness sits in our conscience; before the Day of Judgment, while we still linger in this flesh, He grants us the remission of our guilt and declares the completion of atonement through the proclamation of forgiveness. And to express what we have said more clearly—I say: then, at last, we must believe that all the defilements of our past sins have been forgiven when both sensual desires and passions are banished from our hearts.

2. Question: But from where, then, can that holy and saving contrition and humility arise within us, which are so described from the perspective of the penitent: “I have acknowledged my iniquity and have not concealed my sin; I will confess my iniquity to the Lord,” so that what follows may truly and justly apply to us: “and You have forgiven the wickedness of my heart” (Ps. 31:5)? Or how, prostrating ourselves in prayer, could we stir up within ourselves such tears of repentance that would be powerful enough to win us forgiveness of sins, as St. David did: “I wash my bed every night; with my tears I drench my couch” (Ps. 6:7), if we banish from our hearts every memory of our sins—which, on the contrary, we are commanded to keep firmly by the word of the Lord Himself: “I am the one who blots out your transgressions and your sins; I will not remember them, but you must remember them” (Isa. 43:25)? Why, not only while doing needlework but also during prayer, do I deliberately try to bring to mind in my soul the memory of past sins, so that, having more effectively disposed myself toward true humility and a contrite heart, I may have the boldness to say with the Prophet: “Behold my humility and my toil, and forgive all my sins” (Ps. 24: 18).

3. Answer: What has been said refers to the end of repentance and to the sign of a clear conscience and righteousness. As for the remembrance of sins, this is certainly quite useful and necessary; but only for those who are still undergoing the process of repentance—so that, beating their breasts, they may ceaselessly cry out: “For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me” (Ps. 50:5)—and also: “For I will declare my transgressions and take care of my sin” (Ps. 37:19). Thus, when we repent, and the memory of past sinful deeds still wounds us, it is necessary that the rain of tears born of the awareness of our guilt extinguish the fire of the burning conscience. But when, through the work of deep humility of heart and contrition of spirit, through tireless penitential labor and sighing, the memory of those sins is lulled to sleep and the sting of conscience is removed from the depths of the soul by the grace of the merciful God, then it will be clear that he has reached the end of atonement, has deservedly received complete forgiveness, and has been cleansed of the defilement of all his sins. However, such oblivion is attained only through the atonement of past sins and passionate inclinations, and through the complete and total purification of the heart; and no one can attain it without humility—not those who, through negligence or arrogance, neglect the purification of their passions—but only the one who, through bitter weeping and ceaseless sighs, washes away all the filth of past impurities, and who, through these labors, can cry out to God with all the strength of his soul: “I have acknowledged my iniquity and have not concealed my sin” (Ps. 31: 5),—and: “My tears have been my bread day and night” (Ps. 41:4)—so that, as a result, he may justly hear from the Lord Himself: “I have removed your iniquity like a cloud, and your sin like the darkness” (Isa. 44:22).

4. You said earlier that you deliberately bring to mind memories of past sins. This should not be done; even if such a memory intrudes against your will, it must be driven out immediately, because it distracts the mind from pure contemplation—especially for one who dwells in solitude—entangling it in the impurities of this world and suffocating it with the stench of the passions. For when you renew the memory of what you did before—whether out of ignorance or lust—under the prince of this world, from there, —I will concede to you that no sensual pleasure creeps up on you with such a thought—then, without a doubt, this mere mental contact with former corruption will taint the air of the mind with a repulsive stench and drive away the spiritual fragrance, or the sweetness of the aroma of virtues. Why, when the memory of past passionate deeds stirs the senses, one must recoil from it just as an honest and dignified man flees from a shameless and brazen woman who, in full view of everyone, approaches him with embraces or words. For if he does not immediately reject her touch and allows even the briefest delay in an improper conversation with her, then even if he refuses to consent to shameful pleasure, he will by no means escape the condemnation of all who pass by, as one who has permitted something disgraceful and reprehensible. Likewise, if we are led into such thoughts by a contagious memory, we must not linger in them even for a moment, but must immediately turn away from these imaginings—so that when the angels, passing by, see us entangled in such impure and shameful thoughts, they may not be prevented from saying of us: “The Lord’s blessing be upon you; we have blessed you in the name of the Lord” (Ps. 128:8). But it often happens that some inexperienced person, while reflecting with contrition on his own failings or those of others, is imperceptibly pierced by the subtlest arrow of lust and yields to it—and thus what began under the guise of piety ends in a shameful and ruinous outcome for himself. “For there is a way that seems right to a man, but its end leads to the gates of hell” (Prov. 16:25).

The Venerable Isichius, Priest of Jerusalem

A Brief Account of Him

The Venerable Isichius, a native of Jerusalem, was a student and disciple of St. Gregory the Theologian in his youth. After the death of his great mentor, he led an ascetic life in one of the Palestinian deserts, where he continued to study the spirit of Christianity—sometimes through books, sometimes through oral conversations with his contemporaries among the ascetics of Palestine, and sometimes through his own life experiences and research. In the year 412, the Archbishop of Jerusalem ordained the enlightened ascetic as a presbyter, and from that time on, combining the office of presbyter with that of preacher, he is remembered in the history of the Church as one of its most renowned teachers. “The Great Euthymius,” as his disciple Cyril of Scythopolis writes (in the Life of St. Euthymius), was greatly comforted by the fact that St. Juvenal, Patriarch of Jerusalem, upon arriving at his monastery in 429 to consecrate the church, brought with him the learned Isichius, a presbyter and teacher of the Church.” Theophanes, in his chronograph, dates his death to the 26th year of the reign of Theodosius the Younger, which corresponds to 432–433. In Emperor Basil’s calendar, his commemoration is listed for March 28. Here, as throughout the East, he is now commemorated along with all the holy fathers on Cheese Saturday. In the canon of St. Theodore the Studite for this day, in the 9th verse, he is placed among the great teachers: Basil the Great, Gregory the Theologian, John Chrysostom, Athanasius the Great, the two Cyrils—of Jerusalem and of Alexandria—St. Epiphanius, Gregory of Nyssa—and is referred to as “another theologian,” naturally after Gregory the Theologian. By virtue of his scholarly works, St. Hesychius was a worthy disciple of St. Gregory the Theologian. The Menologion of Emperor Basil, recognizing St. Hesychius as a preacher and interpreter of Holy Scripture, states: “He explained and expounded the entire Holy Scripture with clarity and presented it for the common good; therefore, he was most renowned and remarkable to all.” From among his many works, following the example of the Greek Philoteleos, we have included in this collection a sermon addressed to Theodulus, divided into 203 chapters, as the most beneficial for those wishing to cultivate sobriety, attentiveness, and the guarding of the heart. Blessed Photius, in his Philokalia, in the 198th reading, calls this discourse “more suitable than any other writing for those leading an ascetic life for the sake of the inheritance of the Kingdom of Heaven.” It is set forth, he says, clearly and in every respect as required for people who do not engage in deep studies, but who devote all their effort and diligence to the deeds of an active life.” [In the translation, the Greek text of Theotokos was supplemented in some places from Migne’s Patrologia Graeca, vol. 93].

To Theodulus: A Soul-Benefiting and Salvific Word on Sobriety and Prayer⁶⁸

1. Sobriety is a spiritual art which, if practiced for a long time and with constant zeal, with God’s help, completely delivers a person from passionate thoughts, words, and evil deeds; it grants to those who practice it in this way a true knowledge of the incomprehensible God, as far as this is possible for us, and a hidden revelation of the hidden divine mysteries; and it is the creator of every commandment of the Old and New Testaments and the bestower of every blessing of the age to come. – It is, in fact, purity of heart itself, which, due to its greatness and lofty qualities—or, to speak more truthfully, due to our inattention and negligence—is now exceedingly rare among monks; yet Christ blesses it, saying, “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8). Being such, it is acquired at a high price. Sobriety, if it abides constantly in a person, becomes for him a guide to a righteous and God-pleasing life. It is also a ladder to contemplation; it teaches us to properly govern the movements of the three parts of the soul (that is, the three faculties: the intellect, the passion, and the will) and to keep our senses firm—and in its possessor it daily renews the four cardinal virtues (that is, wisdom, courage, temperance, and justice).

2. The great Lawgiver Moses—and even more so the Holy Spirit—demonstrating how blameless, pure, all-encompassing, and exalted this virtue is, and teaching us how to begin and perfect it, says: “Take heed to yourself, lest there be a secret word of lawlessness in your heart” (Deut. 15: 9), calling a “secret word” any mental image of a sinful thing that is abhorrent to God: what the Holy Fathers also call a suggestion brought into the heart by the devil, which, as soon as it appears in the mind, is immediately followed by our thoughts, which passionately argue with it.

3. Sobriety is the path to every virtue and to God’s commandments; it is also called silence of the heart, and is the same as guarding the mind, which is kept in complete freedom from daydreaming.

4. Just as one born blind cannot see the light of the sun, so too does one who does not live in sobriety fail to see the radiance of the grace that flows abundantly from above; nor will such a person be freed from sinful deeds, words, and thoughts that are abhorrent to God. In their final journey, such people will not escape the princes of Tartarus (who await them).

5. Attention is the ceaseless stillness of the heart, free from every thought, in which it breathes—through Christ Jesus, the Son of God and God Himself, and breathes through Him alone always, unceasingly, and perpetually; calls upon Him, “ ”; stands valiantly with Him against His enemies; and confesses his transgressions to Him, who has the power to forgive sins. Such a soul, through this invocation, often embraces Christ, the Only One who knows the secrets of the heart, while striving in every way to hide its sweetness and its inner struggle from all people, lest the crafty enemy somehow grant evil a convenient entry into it and destroy its most virtuous deeds.

6. Sobriety is the firm establishment of the mind's thought and its standing at the door of the heart; so that it sees how foreign thoughts—these thieves and plunderers—approach, hears what these destroyers say and do, and observes what demons sketch out and establish as an image, attempting to entice the mind into daydreams and thus deceive it. If we willingly undergo such a process, it will—if we so desire—very thoroughly and clearly demonstrate, through experience, the art of spiritual warfare and provide us with expertise in it.

7. A deep fear—on the one hand, of God's abandonment, and on the other, of the instructive allowance of external temptations—usually gives rise to frequent vigilance in the mind of a person striving to block the source of evil thoughts and deeds. It is precisely for this purpose that trials occur, and unexpected temptations are sent by God—to correct our lives, especially when someone has tasted the sweetness of rest from this good (mindfulness and sobriety)—and has grown complacent. From this frequent vigilance arises a habit; from this—a certain natural continuity of sobriety; and from this, by its very nature, the vision of battle is gradually born, followed by the unceasing prayer of Jesus, the sweet stillness of the mind free from daydreams, and a wondrous state arising from union with Jesus.

8. The mind that stands firm, calling upon Christ against its enemies and taking refuge in Him, is like a beast that, surrounded by a multitude of dogs, stands courageously against them, sheltered within a kind of enclosure. From afar, mentally conjuring up the imaginary forms of invisible enemies, it prays ceaselessly to Jesus, the Peacemaker, against them, and thereby remains invulnerable to them.

9. If you know—and it has been granted to you “to appear before the Lord tomorrow”—not merely to be seen, but also to see (Ps. 5:4)—then you understand what I am saying. If not, remain sober, and you will receive it.

10. The composition of the seas is a multitude of waters; and the composition and foundation of sobriety is the alertness and profound stillness of the soul, as well as the abyss of wondrous and ineffable contemplations, and of reasonable humility, righteousness, and love—is (in and of itself) the ultimate sobriety and prayer to Christ Jesus, free from thoughts, with sighs, unceasing, laborious, yet without despondency or weariness (Luke 18:1).

11. “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter,” says the Lord, “into the kingdom of heaven, but the one who does the will of My Father” (Matt. 7:21). And the will of His Father is this: “You who love the Lord, hate evil” (Ps. 96:10). Therefore, when we pray to Jesus Christ, let us hate evil thoughts—and God's will is fulfilled.

12. Our Lord and God, having become incarnate, set forth a model of every virtue as an example to the human race and as a call to rise from the ancient fall, vividly illustrating all His virtuous life in the flesh. Among the many other good examples He set, after His baptism He went into the wilderness, where, through fasting, He engaged in a spiritual battle with the devil, who approached Him as if He were a mere human being; and through the means of victory over him—that is, humility, fasting, prayer, and sobriety—which He practiced even though He had no need of them, as God and God of gods—He taught us, His unworthy servants, how to wage the battle against the spirits of wickedness as we ought.

13. As for the various methods (techniques) of self-discipline that, in my opinion, can gradually purify the mind of passionate thoughts—I will not hesitate to explain them to you without flowery or embellished language. For I do not consider it wise, even in this discourse—as is often the case in accounts of external wars—to obscure what is useful with a profusion of words, especially for simple people... “But you, my son Timothy,” I will say to you in the words of the Apostle, “pay close attention” to what you are about to “read” (1 Tim. 4:13).

14. Thus, there is one method (technique) of sobriety: to watch unceasingly over daydreams or fantasies; for without daydreams, Satan cannot devise thoughts and present them to the mind to deceive it.

15. Another is to keep your heart deeply silent at all times, free from every thought, and to pray.

16. Yet another: to constantly call upon the Lord Jesus Christ for help in humility.

17. Yet another way is to keep a constant remembrance of death in your soul.

18. All these practices, my beloved, are like gatekeepers who bar the entrance of evil thoughts; as for the idea that one should look only toward heaven (always occupying the mind with the contemplation of heavenly things), attaching no importance to the earth (and all that is earthly)—which is also one of the effective means of spiritual sobriety, just like the others—I will explain this in more detail elsewhere, with the help of God, who gives the word.

19. If we cut off the causes of the passions (the triggers that stir them up) and engage in spiritual practices for only a short time, rather than remaining in this way of life forever, with this very activity as our focus; we will easily return to carnal passions, having gained no other fruit from that (good endeavor) except the utter darkening of the mind and the deepest descent into the material world.

20. For one who strives inwardly, the following four practices are necessary at every moment: humility, utmost vigilance, resistance to (thoughts), and prayer. Humility—so that, as he wages war against his adversaries—the proud demons—he may always have Christ’s help at hand in his heart; for the Lord hates the proud. Vigilance—so that he may always keep his heart free from any thought, even if it seems good. Resistance—so that, as soon as one realizes who has come, one may immediately resist the evil one with anger, as it is said: “I answer those who revile my word” (Ps. 118:42)—“Shall not my soul obey God?” (Ps. 61:2)? Prayer—so that after the resistance, he may immediately cry out to Christ from the depths of his heart with an unutterable sigh. And then the one who is striving will see how his enemy, by the name of Jesus, is scattered like dust by the wind and driven away, or how smoke vanishes along with its delusions.

21. Whoever does not have prayer purified of thoughts has no weapon for battle—prayer, I say, that is constantly at work in the innermost recesses of the soul, so that by the invocation of the Lord Jesus Christ the enemy, who secretly wages war, may be (invisibly) scourged and scorched.

22. You must look inward with a sharp and intense gaze of the mind to recognize those who enter; and once you recognize them, immediately crush the serpent’s head with opposition, crying out to Christ with a sigh at the same time. Then you will experience the invisible divine intercession. You will also clearly see then the righteousness of the heart (whether it acts righteously, or what constitutes the righteous action of the heart).

23. Just as one who holds a mirror in his hand and looks into it, standing among others, sees his own face as it is, and sees others looking into the same mirror: so, one who looks intently into his own heart sees his own condition there, and sees the gloomy faces of the mental Ethiopians.

24. The mind cannot overcome demonic delusions by its own power alone; let it never presume to do so. For our enemies, being cunning, feign defeat while plotting to bring down the fighter from another direction—through pride; but when the name of Jesus is invoked, they will not endure even a moment to stand and plot against you.

25. Take care not to think too highly of yourself (nor devise your own methods of struggle), as ancient Israel did; otherwise, you too will be delivered into the hands of your mental enemies. For that people, having been delivered from the Egyptians by the God of all, later devised for themselves a helper—a cast idol.

26. By the “fused idol,” understand our weak mind, which—as long as it invokes Jesus Christ against the spirits of wickedness—easily drives them out and, with skillful artistry, puts the enemy’s invisible, warlike forces to flight; but as soon as it recklessly dares to rely on itself alone, it falls and is shattered, like the so-called swift-winged one. This is what the one who trusts in the Lord confesses: “‘The Lord,’ he says, ‘is my helper and my defender; in Him my heart trusts, and He will help me, and my flesh will flourish’ (Ps. 27: 7); and ‘who,’ besides the Lord, ‘will rise up for me against the deceitful? Or who will stand up for me against those who commit iniquity’ (Ps. 93:16)—countless thoughts? But he who trusts in himself rather than in God will fall a terrible fall. Flocks of pigeons, having soared high, spin around and fall downward. If they do not manage to turn around in time, they crash to the ground and are crushed to death.

27. May this, my beloved—if you wish to wage the struggle as you ought—serve as an exemplary guide to the form and manner of the silence of the heart: the small creature, the spider. It seizes and kills tiny flies, and you, if like it (sitting in its webbed lair), you remain in silent stillness within your soul, do not cease to strike down the infants of Babylon—for which striking down the Holy Spirit, through David, would call you blessed (Ps. 136: 9).

28. Just as it is impossible for the Red Sea to be seen in the firmament of heaven among the stars, and just as it is impossible for a person walking on earth not to breathe the air here: so it is impossible for us to purify our hearts of passionate thoughts and drive out from them our mental enemies without frequently invoking the name of Jesus Christ.

29. If, with humble reflection, the remembrance of death, self-denial, the struggle against (evil) thoughts, and the invocation of Jesus Christ, you always abide in your heart, and with these tools soberly traverse each day the mental path—narrow, yet joy-filled and sweet— then you will enter into the holy contemplations of the saints, and you will be enlightened by the knowledge of profound mysteries from Christ, “in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge” (Col. 2:3) and “in whom dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily” (v. 9). For in Jesus you will sense that the Holy Spirit has descended into your soul, and as the human mind is enlightened by Him, it “beholds the glory of God with an unveiled face” (2 Cor. 3:18). “No one,” says the Apostle, “can say ‘Lord Jesus’ except by the Holy Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:3), Who secretly confirms those who seek Him (in truth, in Him).

30. Those who love instruction must also know this: that evil demons, envying us because of the great benefit derived from the spiritual struggle—the wisdom it brings and the ascent to God—often conceal this mental struggle from us and quell it, (with the intention, moreover, that) when we (having forgotten the dangers of their attacks) become careless, they may suddenly carry off our minds (into daydreams) and once again make us negligent, inattentive to our hearts. For they are constantly preoccupied with a single goal and a single endeavor: to prevent our hearts from paying attention to themselves at all, knowing what riches are thereby gathered in the soul. – But it is precisely then (during the lull in the battle) that we will immerse ourselves in spiritual contemplation, remembering our Lord Jesus Christ—and the battle will once again take hold of our minds. Let us do everything, so to speak, by the counsel of the Lord Himself and with great humility.

31. While living in community, we must, of our own free will and with a willing heart, set aside every personal desire before the abbot, and thus, with God’s help, become, as it were, self-surrendered and will-less. At the same time, we must do our utmost not to be provoked by irritability and not to allow unreasonable and unnatural outbursts of anger, for otherwise, in the hour of spiritual battle, we will find ourselves lacking courage. For our will, unless we voluntarily restrain it, is usually provoked against those who attempt to restrain it by force (without our consent); and because of this, the anger thus stirred up, barking maliciously, destroys the understanding of the battle (the skill to wage it), which was barely acquired with great difficulty. Anger is usually destructive. If it is directed against demonic thoughts, it shatters and destroys them; but if it flares up against people, it destroys within us the good thoughts we have toward them. Thus, anger, as is evident, is destructive to all kinds of thoughts, whether they be evil or, as may happen, even righteous. It is given to us by God, like a shield and a bow, and remains so if it does not deviate from its purpose. But if it begins to act contrary to that purpose, it becomes a destroyer. I have seen that even a dog, which at times boldly attacks wolves, torments sheep.

32. Thus, one must flee from insolence (reckless freedom in dealing with others) as from the venom of an asp, and avoid frequent conversations as from serpents and the spawn of the viper; for they can very quickly lead to complete forgetfulness of the inner struggle and bring the soul down from the uplifting heights afforded by purity of heart. Such forgetfulness, which is worthy of a curse, resists attention like water resists fire, and becomes a powerful adversary at every moment. From forgetfulness we fall into indifference; from indifference we pass to neglect (of the rules of the spiritual life) and despondency—and to unbridled lusts; and in this way we turn back again, like a dog to its own vomit (2 Peter 2:22). Let us therefore flee from licentiousness as from a deadly poison; and let us cure the evil disease of forgetfulness by the strictest vigilance of the mind and the ceaseless invocation of our Lord Jesus Christ: for without Him we can “do nothing” (John 15:5).

33. It is not customary—indeed, it is impossible—to be friends with the serpent and harbor it within one’s innermost being; nor is it possible to pamper the body in every way, to love it and please it—except by providing what is strictly necessary—while at the same time striving for heavenly virtue. For the serpent, by its very nature, cannot refrain from wounding the one who has taken it in, and the body cannot refrain from defiling the one who pleases it with movements of lustful delight. When the body sins in any way, it must be flogged mercilessly until it bleeds, like a runaway slave drunk with wine, so that it may know that there is a master (the mind) above it, ready to punish it, and so that it may not seek sensual intoxication as if with wine in a tavern, lest this nocturnal slave—this perishable dust—forget its imperishable mistress (the soul). Do not trust your flesh until the very end of your life. The desires of the flesh, says the Apostle, “are hostile toward God; for they do not submit to God’s law” (Rom. 8:7)—and: “For the flesh is at war with the Spirit” (Gal. 5:17)—and again: “Those who are in the flesh cannot please God. But you are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit” (Rom. 8:8–9).

34. The task of “prudence” is to always direct our impulsive nature toward the struggles of the inner battle and toward self-discipline; the task of “wisdom” is to direct our mental faculties toward strict and unceasing sobriety and toward spiritual contemplation; the task of “righteousness” is to direct our volitional power toward virtue and toward God; the task of “courage” is to govern the five senses and restrain them so that they do not defile either our inner self or our heart, nor our outer self or our body.

35. “His splendor is upon Israel”—upon the mind that beholds the beauty of God’s glory as much as possible—“and His power is in the clouds” (Ps. 67: 35)—upon the light-beaming souls who, in the morning, fix their gaze upon Him who sits at the right hand of the Father, Who, illuminating them just as the sun shines its rays upon pure clouds, reveals them as most lovely.

36. “One who sins will destroy the good of many,” says Divine Scripture (Eccl. 9:18); and the mind, by sinning, destroys what is written about in the previous chapter—these heavenly drinks and foods.

37. We are no stronger than Samson, no wiser than Solomon, no more prudent than the blessed David, nor do we love God more than the chief apostle Peter. Let us not, then, place our hope in ourselves; for Scripture says that whoever trusts in himself will fall a terrible fall.

38. Let us learn humility from Christ, meekness from David, and from Peter—how to weep over our occasional falls—but let us not despair like Samson, Judas, and the very wise Solomon.

39. “The devil, like a roaring lion, prowls around seeking someone to devour” (1 Peter 5:8). May we never cease to exercise watchfulness of heart, sobriety, discernment (of thoughts), and prayer to Christ Jesus, our God. For you will find no better help throughout your entire life than that of Jesus: because He alone, as God, knows the demons’ snares, wiles, and deceptions.

40. Let the soul boldly trust in Christ and call upon Him; let it by no means fear its enemies: for it does not fight alone, but with the Awesome King Jesus Christ, the Creator of all that exists—both incorporeal and corporeal, visible and invisible.

41. Just as the more rain falls upon the earth, the more it softens it; so too the holy name of Christ, proclaimed by us without hesitation—the more often we call upon Him, the more it softens the soil of our hearts, filling it with joy and gladness.

42. It is also good for the inexperienced to know that we, who are heavy and bowed down to the earth in both body and mind, can overcome our enemies—those who are incorporeal and invisible, malicious and cunning in their malice, swift and light—who have been tested in the battle waged from Adam until now—we have no other way to defeat them except through constant vigilance of the mind and the invocation of Jesus Christ, our God and Creator. For the inexperienced, the prayer of Jesus Christ may serve as an inspiration and guide toward testing and knowing what is good; for the experienced, however, the very best teacher in goodness is action, testing through deeds, and tasting what is good.

43. Just as a small and innocent child, seeing someone else perform some kind of magic trick, is delighted by it and, in its innocence, follows this miracle-worker—so too our soul, being simple and good—for it was created that way by its good Lord—is delighted by the devil’s fanciful suggestions and, beguiled by them, runs to him, the crafty one, as if to a good person, like a dove to one who sets a snare for her chicks, and thus mingles her thoughts with the devil’s fanciful suggestions. If it is the image of a beautiful woman, or something else entirely forbidden by Christ’s commandments, she then devises a way to carry out what the beauty that appeared to her has inspired; and then, having come to a resolution with that thought, she carries out through her body the lawlessness she imagined in her mind, bringing condemnation upon herself.

44. Such is the cunning of the evil one, and with such arrows does he ensnare every victim. Therefore, it is not safe, before the mind has gained great experience in battle, to allow thoughts to enter our hearts—especially at the beginning, when our soul still sympathizes with demonic temptations, takes pleasure in them, and willingly follows in their wake; but as soon as they are recognized, they must be cut off immediately, at the very moment they arise and take hold. When, however, the mind, having long engaged in this wondrous work, has mastered this feat, it will discern everything within itself and acquire skill in waging such a battle, so that it will accurately recognize thoughts and, as the Prophet says, will be able to easily catch “little foxes” (Song of Songs 2:15): then one can skillfully allow them to enter, fight them with Christ’s help, expose them, and cast them out.

45. Just as it is impossible for fire and water to pass through the same channel together, so it is impossible for sin to enter the heart unless it first knocks at the door of the heart with a wicked suggestion.

46. The first is the suggestion; the second is the mingling, when our thoughts and the thoughts of the evil demons mix; the third is the conspiracy, when thoughts of both kinds conspire for evil and decide among themselves how it should be carried out; and the fourth is the sensual act or sin. Thus, if the mind, remaining sober, pays attention to itself and, through rebuke and invocation of the Lord Jesus, drives away the suggestion at the very moment of its arising, then none of what usually follows it will come to pass. For the evil one, being an incorporeal spirit, can deceive souls only through fantasies and thoughts. (Of these actions) David speaks of temptation: "In the morning I destroyed all the wicked of the earth" (Ps. 100:8); and the great Moses speaks of idolatry: "You shall not associate with them" (Ex. 23:32).

47. Mind engages in an invisible struggle with mind—the demonic mind against ours. Therefore, every moment we must cry out to Christ from the depths of our soul, that He may drive away the demonic mind and grant us the spoils of victory, as the Lover of Mankind.

48. Let the image of heartfelt stillness be for you like one who holds a mirror in his hands and gazes intently into it; and then (that is, when you begin to imitate him) you will see how both the evil and the good are inscribed in your heart.

49. Take care at all times never to harbor any thought in your heart—neither impure nor seemingly virtuous—so that in this way you may easily recognize the foreigners, that is, the firstborn sons of Egypt (meaning the passions).

50. How good, pleasant, bright, sweet, all-beneficial, clear-sighted (cheerful), and beautiful is the virtue of sobriety! Guided by You, Christ our God, and walked through with vigilance by the human mind in great humility! For it extends its branches to the sea and the depths of contemplation, and its shoots to the rivers of the sweet divine mysteries (Ps. 79: 12), and nourishes (irrigates, refreshes) the mind, which has long been scorched by wickedness—by the sweetness of deceitful, demonic thoughts and the frenzied reasoning of the flesh, in which lies death.

51. Sobriety is like Jacob's ladder, at the top of which God sits, and upon which the angels walk. It uproots all evil from us, cuts off loquacity, slander, calumny, and the entire catalog (list) of sensual passions, not tolerating even a momentary loss of its own sweetness.

52. It is this, my brothers, that we must pursue with all our hearts. But, soaring in his visions with a mind pure in Christ Jesus, let us also keep before our eyes our transgressions and our former life, so that, being crushed and humbled by the memory of our sins, we may have the unceasing help of Jesus Christ, our God, in the spiritual battle. For as soon as, because of pride, vanity, or self-love, we are deprived of Jesus' help, we are thereby also deprived of purity of heart, through which God reveals Himself to man; for, according to the promise (Matt. 5:8), the former is the cause of the latter (purity of heart leading to the vision of God).

53. A mind that does not neglect its inner work, along with other blessings that arise from constant self-discipline and self-preservation, also attains the state in which the five bodily senses do not become accomplices in the sinful temptations that come from without. Paying full attention to his virtue—sobriety—and always desiring to delight in good thoughts, he does not allow the five senses to steal from him by entering his mind through their material and vain thoughts; but knowing what deceptions arise through them, he restrains them from within with strong effort.

54. Remain attentive in mind, and you will not be overwhelmed by temptations. But if you stray from this, endure whatever comes your way.

55. Just as bitter wormwood is beneficial for those who have lost their appetite and feel aversion to food, so too is it beneficial for the wicked to endure misfortunes.

56. If you do not wish to suffer evil, do not wish to do evil either, for the former inevitably follows the latter. What a person sows, that he will reap. Thus, when we, having willingly sown evil, reap (sorrow) against our will, we must marvel at God's justice in this.

57. The mind is blinded by the following three passions: the love of money, vanity, and the love of pleasure.

58. Knowledge and faith, which are the companions of our nature, have been dulled by nothing other than these passions.

59. Rage and anger, strife and murder, and the entire catalog of other passions have become deeply entrenched in people through them.

60. One who does not know the truth cannot truly believe; for knowledge naturally precedes faith. What is said in Scripture is not said merely so that we may know it, but so that we may also do it.

61. Let us, then, begin to put it into practice. Thus, progressing gradually, we will find that hope in God, firm faith, inner knowledge, deliverance from temptations, gracious gifts, heartfelt confession, and abundant tears are granted to believers through prayer; and not only that, but also patience in the face of afflictions, sincere forgiveness of one's neighbor, understanding of the spiritual law, the attainment of God's righteousness, the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the bestowal of spiritual treasures, and everything that God has promised to believers both here and in the age to come. In a word, it is impossible for the soul to exist in the image of God except through God's grace and the faith of a person who dwells in the heart, in deep humility and undistracted prayer.

62. We have indeed received a great blessing from experience—namely, that one should ceaselessly call upon the Lord Jesus against the adversaries of the mind, if one desires to purify one's heart. And see how what I have said from experience agrees with the testimony of Scripture: "Prepare," it says, "to call upon the Lord your God, O Israel" (Amos 4:12). The Apostle also says, "Pray without ceasing" (1 Thess. 5:17). And the Lord tells us: "Without Me you can do nothing. Whoever abides in Me, and I in him, will bear much fruit. But whoever does not abide in Me will be cast out like a branch and wither" (John 15:5–6). Prayer is a great blessing, combining all blessings within itself, for it purifies the heart, in which believers behold God.

63. Since the treasure of humility is exalted and pleasing to God, and has the power to eradicate every evil within us and everything that is hateful to God, it is not easily acquired. You may well find in another person certain individual acts of many virtues, but if you seek the fragrance of humility in him, you will hardly find it. Therefore, much diligence and effort are required to acquire this treasure. Scripture also calls the devil unclean because from the very beginning he rejected this precious treasure of humility and loved pride. For this reason alone, he is called an unclean spirit throughout Scripture. For what kind of bodily impurity could a being that is entirely immaterial, incorporeal, and without parts possibly commit, that he might be called unclean for this reason? Clearly, it is because of pride that he is called unclean, and from being a pure and luminous angel, he has been called vile. "Everyone who is haughty is unclean before God" (Prov. 16: 5). The first sin, according to Scripture, is "pride" (Sirach 10: 15). When Pharaoh said, "I do not know your God, nor will I let Israel go" (Exod. 5: 2), he spoke as one who was proud.

64. There are many acts of the mind that can win for us the blessed gift of humility, provided we do not neglect our salvation; for example: the recollection of sins—in word, deed, and thought—and many other things, when mentally reviewed, contribute to humility. It also leads to true humility when one constantly reflects on the virtues of one's neighbors and extols their other natural advantages, comparing one's own to theirs. Seeing in this way clearly in his mind his own wretchedness and how far he falls short of the perfection of others, a person will naturally come to regard himself as dust and ashes, and not even as a human being, but as a mere dog, because he lags behind all rational creatures on earth in every respect and is poorer and more destitute than all of them.

65. The mouth of Christ, the pillar of the Church, our great Father Basil, says: "A great aid to avoiding sin and not falling back into the same sin the next day is—at the end of the day—to subject ourselves and all that is ours to the judgment of our conscience, so that we may see where we have erred and where we have acted correctly. This is what Job did, both with regard to himself and with regard to his children." Such daily examination sheds light on what happens to us every hour (or teaches us to examine ourselves every hour, so that we may see how we ought to act at every hour).

66. Another man,⁶⁹ , also one of the wise in divine matters, said: "The beginning of fruitfulness is the blossom; and the beginning of an active life is self-restraint." Let us therefore embrace self-restraint, and moreover with measure and balance, as the Fathers teach, and let us spend the entire twelve-hour day in keeping our minds in check. By acting in this way, with God's help and through a certain self-discipline, we will be able to extinguish and diminish evil within ourselves. For a virtuous life is attained through self-discipline, and for it the kingdom of heaven will be granted.

67. The path to knowledge is dispassion and humility, without which no one will behold the Lord.

68. He who abides ceaselessly within his inner self, always turning his thoughts there, lives a chaste life; and not only that, but he also contemplates, meditates on the divine, and prays. And this is precisely what the Apostle speaks of: "Walk by the Spirit, and you will not gratify the desires of the flesh" (Gal. 5:16).

⁶⁹ St. Nilus of Sinai.

69. One who does not know how to walk the spiritual path does not attend to passionate thoughts (that is, does not drive them away), but is constantly preoccupied only with the body—either indulging in gluttony and debauchery, or becoming sad, angry, and resentful, thereby clouding the mind, or undertaking excessive ascetic feats, thereby upsetting the heart.

70. One who has renounced worldly life—that is, a wife, possessions, and other such things—has made only the outer person a monk, but not the inner one. But whoever has renounced passionate thoughts about all these things has made the inner person—which is the mind—a monk as well. And such a person is a true monk. It is easy to make the outer person a monk, if one so desires, but it takes no small effort to make the inner person a monk.

71. Who among this kind has been completely freed from passionate thoughts and has continually been granted pure and immaterial prayer—which is the distinguishing feature of the inner man?

72. Many passions are hidden in our souls; but they reveal themselves only when their causes (objects, occasions) appear before our eyes.

73. Do not devote yourself entirely to physical training; but, having set a manageable task for the body, turn your whole mind to the inner self: “Physical training is of little value, but godliness is of value in every way” (1 Tim. 4:8).

74. When the passions are dormant—merely because either their causes (objects, occasions) have been removed or the demons have cunningly withdrawn—pride arises.

75. Humility and ascetic self-denial (ascetic bodily privations) free a person from every sin—the former by cutting off the passions of the soul, and the latter by cutting off the bodily ones. Therefore, the Lord says: “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8)—they shall see both Him Himself and the treasures within Him when they purify themselves through love and self-restraint—and this will be all the more so as they continue to deepen their purification.

76. The vantage point (observatory, watchtower) for the words concerning every virtue is the preservation of the mind, just as in ancient times David’s guard referred to the circumcision of the heart (2 Sam. 18:24).

77. Just as we are harmed by looking at what is harmful to the senses, so it is with regard to the mind.

78. Just as one who damages the core of a plant causes the whole plant to wither, so too is it with the human heart. We must be vigilant at every moment, for the predators never sleep.

79. The Lord, wishing to show that every commandment is binding and that sonship is a gift earned for people by His own blood, says: “When you have done all that is commanded you, say, ‘We are unworthy servants; for we have done what we ought to have done’” (Luke 17:10). Therefore, the kingdom of heaven is not a reward for works, but a gracious gift from the Lord, prepared for His faithful servants. A servant does not demand freedom as a reward; but (having received it) he gives thanks as one who is in debt, and (not having received it) he awaits it as a favor.

80. Christ, according to Scripture, died for our sins and grants freedom to the servants who work well for Him; for He says: “Well done, good and faithful servant; you have been faithful over a little, I will set you over much; enter into the joy of your Lord” (Matt. 25: 21). But a faithful servant is not one who relies on mere knowledge (of a servant’s duty), but one who demonstrates faithfulness through obedience to Christ, who gave the commandment.

81. One who honors his master does what he is commanded; but if he sins in any way or disobeys, he accepts as his due whatever befalls him as a result. Be both inquisitive and diligent (of course, in fulfilling the commandments); for mere knowledge alone makes a person arrogant.

82. The temptations that unexpectedly befall us providentially teach us to be diligent.

83. A star’s essence is the light that surrounds it; but the essence of the pious and God-fearing is poverty and humility, for nothing else is meant to be the distinguishing and revealing mark of Christ’s disciples except humble wisdom and a meek demeanor. The four Gospels proclaim this everywhere. Whoever does not live in this way—that is, without humility—is deprived of a share in Him who humbled Himself even to the cross and death, and who is the active Gospel lawgiver of the divine commandments, having shown us the commandments that are binding upon us (through His deeds and life, as depicted in the Gospels).

84. “All who are thirsty, come to the water,” says the Prophet (Isa. 55:1); those who thirst for God, walk in purity of mind and heart. However, one who soars high above it must also turn his gaze to the earth of his poverty. No one is higher than the humble. Just as where there is no light, all is dark and gloomy, so too, when there is no humility, all our diligent labors for God are vain and fruitless.

85. “The conclusion of the matter, listen to all: Fear God and keep His commandments” (Eccl. 12:13), both mentally and physically. If you compel yourself mentally to observe them, you will rarely need to labor physically for their sake. David says: “I have desired to do Your will, and Your law is within my heart” (Ps. 39: 9).

86. If a person does not form God’s will and His law within his heart, that is, within his innermost being, then he cannot comfortably fulfill them outwardly either. One who is not sober-minded and is indifferent is, as it were, saying to God: “I do not wish to see Your ways” (Job 21:14)—certainly due to a lack of divine enlightenment, through which one not only holds the law in one’s heart by conviction but is also strong enough to live according to God’s will.

87. Just as physical salt sweetens bread and all kinds of food, preserves meat from spoiling, and keeps it intact for a long time, so too should you understand the wise preservation of spiritual sweetness and the wondrous workings of the heart. For it divinely sweetens both the inner and outer person, drives away the stench of evil thoughts, and keeps us steadfast in goodness.

88. From attachment comes a multitude of thoughts, and from these comes evil sensual deeds. Whoever immediately extinguishes the former with Jesus will also avoid the latter. And he will be enriched with sweet divine knowledge, in which he will behold God as ever-present everywhere, and, holding up the mirror of the mind before Him, will be illuminated by Him, like clear glass held up to the sensory sun. Then, at last, the mind, having reached the ultimate limit of its desires, will rest from all other self-contemplation.

89. Since every thought enters the heart through the imagination of something sensory (and the sensory hinders the intellectual), the Divine light of the Godhead begins to illuminate the mind only when it is emptied of everything and becomes completely formless (presenting no image or form whatsoever). For that light manifests itself in a mind that is already pure, provided it is emptied of all thoughts.

90. The more attentively you listen to your mind, the more fervently you will pray to Jesus; and again, the more carelessly you watch over your mind, the further you will distance yourself from Jesus. And just as the former strongly illuminates the atmosphere of the mind, so the latter—turning away from sobriety and the sweet call of Jesus—usually darkens it completely. It is natural for this matter to be as we have said—and it cannot be otherwise. You will learn this from experience when you put it into practice. For virtue, and especially such a light-giving, sweet practice, is usually learned only through experience.

91. The ceaseless invocation of Jesus, with a certain warm desire full of sweetness and joy, causes the air of the heart to be filled with a joyful stillness through utter attentiveness. Moreover, the one responsible for the heart’s complete purification is Jesus Christ, the Son of God and God Himself, the source and Creator of all that is good. For He Himself says: “I am the Lord God, who creates the world” (Isa. 45:7).

92. The soul, being blessed and comforted by Jesus, responds to the Benefactor with a certain joy and love through confession, giving thanks and joyfully calling upon Him who has pacified it; for within itself it mentally sees how He dispels the delusions of evil spirits.

93. “And my discerning eye,” says David, “shall look upon my ‘imaginary’ enemies, and my ear shall hear those who rise up against me with deceit” (Ps. 91: 12–13). And I have seen “the retribution of sinners” being carried out by God within me (Ps. 90:8). When, however, there are no fantasies in the heart, then the mind stands in its natural order, ready to be moved toward every sweet contemplation, whether spiritual or God-loving.

94. Thus, as I have said, sobriety and the Jesus Prayer are mutually intertwined—utmost attention is part of unceasing prayer, and prayer, in turn, is part of the utmost sobriety and attention of the mind.

95. A good teacher for both body and soul is the unforgettable remembrance of death, and the practice of, setting aside all that lies in between (that is, between the present moment and the hour of death), always keeping it before one’s eyes—including the very deathbed on which we are to lie when parting from the body, and so on.

96. Brothers, one who wishes to remain unscathed at all times must not give in to sleep. But one of two things is inevitable—either to fall and perish, stripped of virtues, or to always stand guard with an armed mind; for the enemy, too, always stands with his army, lying in wait.

97. A certain divine state is born in our minds through the ceaseless remembrance and invocation of our Lord Jesus Christ, provided we do not neglect constant prayer to Him in our minds, unceasing vigilance, and the work of a gatekeeper (i.e., letting in our own and driving away strangers); but truly, we will always engage in the invocation of Jesus Christ, our Lord, in the same and consistent manner, crying out to Him with a fervent heart, that He may grant us to partake of (taste) His Holy Name (so that it may take root in our hearts). For frequent repetition is the mother of habit, both in regard to virtue and in regard to vice; and habit then reigns supreme, like nature. Having reached this state, the mind itself seeks out adversaries, like a hunting dog seeking a hare in the bushes; but the dog seeks to devour, while the mind seeks to strike and drive them away.

98. Therefore, whenever wicked thoughts multiply within us, let us interject the invocation of our Lord Jesus Christ among them; and immediately we will see that they begin to dissipate like smoke in the air—as experience has taught us. When, after this, the mind is left alone (free from distracting thoughts), let us return to unceasing attention and invocation. Let us act in this way whenever we face such a temptation.

99. Just as it is impossible to go to war naked, or to cross a great sea while clothed, or to live without breathing—so it is impossible, without humility and ceaseless prayer to Christ, to learn the mental and inner battle, and to skillfully pursue and quell it.

100. The great David, most experienced in matters of war, says to the Lord: “I will preserve my strength through You” (Ps. 58:10)—(that is, by turning to You for help). Likewise, the preservation of the dominion of the heart and of mental stillness—from which all virtues are born—comes to us through the assistance of the Lord, who has given us His commandments and who, when we call upon Him unceasingly, drives away from us that unwholesome forgetfulness which, more than anything else, destroys the stillness of the heart, just as water extinguishes fire. Therefore, O monk, do not give in to sleep born of negligence, which leads to your own death; but in the name of Jesus, cast out your enemies, and may this sweetest of names, as one wise man said, cling to your breath: and then you will know the benefit of silence.

101. When we, unworthy as we are, are deemed worthy to partake with fear and trembling of the divine and most pure Mysteries of Christ our God and King, then we will most clearly demonstrate sobriety, a clear mind, and strict attention, so that this divine fire—that is, the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, may consume our sins and our defilements—both small and great. For, upon entering us, it immediately drives the wicked spirits of malice from our hearts and forgives us our past sins; and our mind is then left free from the restless vexation of wicked thoughts. If, after this, standing at the door of our heart, we carefully guard our mind, then, when we again partake of the Holy Mysteries, the Divine Body will increasingly enlighten our mind and make it shine like a star.

102. Forgetfulness usually extinguishes the mind’s vigilance, just as water extinguishes fire. But the unceasing prayer of Jesus, coupled with unwavering vigilance, ultimately banishes it from the heart. Prayer needs vigilance, just as a small lamp needs the light of a candle (perhaps—like a lamp in a calm, windless place, so that it may burn like a candle).

103. We must take painstaking care to preserve what is precious; and truly, the only thing precious to us is that which preserves us from all evil, both sensual and mental. This is the preservation of the mind through the invocation of Jesus Christ—that is, to always look into the depths of the heart and to remain ceaselessly silent in thought—even, I would say, from thoughts that seem righteous—and to strive to be empty of all thoughts whatsoever, lest thieves hide beneath them. But even though we suffer, remaining patient in our hearts, comfort is nevertheless near.

104. A heart that is constantly guarded—one that is not allowed to accept the visions, images, and fantasies of dark and deceitful spirits—usually gives birth to light-filled thoughts. For just as a coal gives rise to a flame, so much more will God—who dwells in our hearts since our holy baptism—kindle our mental power to contemplation, like a flame on a wax candle, if He finds the air of our heart pure from the winds of malice and guarded by the watchfulness of the mind.

105. We must always keep the name of Jesus—the Christ—whirling within the space of our heart, just as lightning whirls through the air before it becomes rain. Those who have spiritual experience in the inner struggle know this well. We will wage this mental battle in the following order: the first step is attention; then, when we notice that an enemy thought has approached, we will hurl words of cursing from the heart at it with anger; thirdly, we must pray against it, turning our hearts to the invocation of Jesus Christ, so that this demonic specter may vanish at once; otherwise, the mind will follow in the wake of this fantasy, like a child beguiled by some skillful magician.

106. Let us strive, like David, crying out: “Lord Jesus Christ!”—May our throats fall silent (lose their voice); but may our discerning eyes never cease to look upward in hope “toward the Lord our God” (Ps. 68:4).

107. Always remembering the parable of the unjust judge, which the Lord told to teach us that we must always pray and not lose heart—and acting upon it—we will receive both benefit and vindication.

108. Just as it is impossible for one who gazes at the sun not to have his pupils shine brightly, so it is impossible for one who always penetrates the air of the heart not to shine.

109. Just as it is impossible to live this present life without food and drink, so too, without the preservation of the mind and the purity of the heart—which is what is called sobriety—it is impossible for the soul to attain anything spiritual and pleasing to God, or to be freed from mental sin, even if someone were to forcibly restrain himself from sinning in deed out of fear of torment.

110. Nevertheless, even those who, through a certain self-discipline, restrain themselves from sin in deed are blessed before God, the angels, and people; for “those who discipline themselves” are “the ones who seize the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 11:12).

111. This is what is marvelous about the fruits of silence for the mind: that sins, which at first knock at the mind only as thoughts—so that, if accepted by the mind, they might later become gross, sensual sins—are all cut off mentally within our inner man by the virtue of sobriety, which does not allow them to enter within and manifest themselves in evil deeds, through the guidance and intercession of our Lord Jesus Christ.

112. The Old Testament is a model of outward, sensual, and bodily deeds, while the Holy Gospel, which is the New Testament, is a model of attentiveness or purity of heart. And just as the Old Testament did not lead to perfection, did not satisfy, and did not confirm the inner man in the work of pleasing God—“for,” says the Apostle, “the law has accomplished nothing” (Heb. 7:19), but only hindered gross sins (cutting off from the heart wicked thoughts and desires to preserve purity of heart, which is a Gospel commandment higher than, for example, the prohibition against gouging out a neighbor’s eye or tooth): so understand this also regarding bodily righteousness and bodily deeds—I am speaking of fasting, abstinence, sleeping on the bare ground, standing, keeping vigil, and other such practices, which are usually undertaken because of the body and which calm the passionate part of the body from sinful impulses. All of this is certainly good, as is said of the Old Testament (that the Law is good); for it serves to instruct our outer man and to protect him from passionate deeds. But these ascetic practices are not guardians against or restraints against sins of the mind; that is, they are not powerful enough to deliver us from envy, anger, and the like.

113. But purity of heart—that is, the guarding and preservation of the mind, which is the purpose of the New Testament, if we observe it as we ought—cuts off all passions and every evil from the heart, uproots them from it, and instead instills in it joy, hope, contrition, weeping, tears, self-knowledge and knowledge of one’s own sins, remembrance of death, true humility, boundless love for God and people, and divine care of the heart.

114. Just as it is impossible for one walking on the earth not to cut through the air, so it is impossible for the human heart not to be constantly assailed by demons or not to be subject to their hidden influences, even if one were to strictly perform bodily ascetic practices.

115. If you wish not only to appear to be a monk before the Lord—good, meek, and always united with God—but also to truly be such; then strive with all your might to cultivate the virtue of attentiveness, which consists in guarding and preserving the mind and in establishing a sweet stillness of the heart and a blissful state of the soul, free from daydreams—a task you will not find in many.

116. The virtue of mindfulness is called mental wisdom. —And practice it with great sobriety and warm zeal through the Jesus Prayer, with humility and perseverance, with the silence of both the senses and the mind, with moderation in eating and drinking, and by turning away from all that is sinful; practice it skillfully through the path of the mind with discernment, and with God’s help it will reveal to you— —what you did not expect; it will give you knowledge, enlighten you, endow you with wisdom, and teach you what you were previously unable to comprehend, when you walked in the darkness of passions and dark deeds, being plunged into the abyss of forgetfulness and confusion of thoughts.

117. Just as the valleys yield wheat in abundance, so will it yield every kind of goodness in your heart—or rather, this will be given to you by our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, without Whom we can do nothing. And at first you will find Him as a ladder, then as a book in which you will read; finally, as you progress more and more, you will find Him as a city, the heavenly Jerusalem, and you will truly behold with your mind the Christ of Israel, the King of Powers, together with His Co-eternal Father and the Holy Spirit who is worshiped.

118. Demons always lead us into sin through deceitful fantasies. Thus, through fantasies of wealth and greed, they incited the wicked Judas to betray the Lord and God of all. With false dreams of bodily comfort—which is in itself insignificant—and of honor, wealth, and glory, they drew him into the murder of God, and then drove him to suicide by strangulation, securing for him eternal death—the very opposite of what they had presented to him in their dreams or deceptions, thus repaying him, the treacherous ones.

119. Behold, then, how the enemies of our salvation lead us into ruin through false dreams and empty promises. And Satan himself fell from the heavenly heights in the same way, like a bolt of lightning, having dreamed of being equal to God. Thus he later estranged Adam from God by instilling in him the dream of a certain divine dignity (omniscience); and in the same way, this deceitful and treacherous enemy usually beguiles all who sin.

120. Our hearts are filled with the bitterness of the poison of evil thoughts when, having become distracted due to forgetfulness, we are led away for a long time from the attention and prayer of Jesus. But when, out of love for the Divine and with steadfast zeal, we diligently begin to practice what has been described above (i.e., attention and prayer) in our inner sanctuary (in our inner workshop, in the heart), it is once again filled with sweetness in the sensation of being delighted by a certain divine joy. It is then that we firmly resolve to always walk in the silence of the heart—not for any other reason, but for the sake of the pleasant sweetness and comfort we feel in our soul from it.

121. The science of sciences and the art of arts is the ability to control evil thoughts. The very best remedy and art against them is to watch, with the Lord's help, for the appearance of their signs and to always keep one's thoughts pure, just as we guard our physical eyes, keenly observing with them anything that might accidentally harm them and striving in every way to prevent even a speck of dust from reaching them.

122. Just as snow does not produce a flame, nor water produce fire, nor a thornbush figs: so the heart of every person will not be freed from demonic thoughts, words, and deeds unless it purifies its inner self, combines sobriety with the Jesus Prayer, acquires humility and inner stillness, and strives with all the zeal of a mother-in-law, hastening to the front. A soul that does not heed itself is inevitably barren of good and perfect thoughts, like a barren mule; for there is no understanding of spiritual wisdom within it. Truly, invoking the name of Jesus and putting aside passionate thoughts is a sweet task that brings peace to the soul.

123. When the soul enters into a wicked agreement with the body, then together they build a city of vanity and a pillar of pride, and to dwell within it, they give rise to impure thoughts. But the Lord, through the fear of Gehenna, disrupts their harmony and separates them, compelling the mistress, the soul, to act wisely and speak words foreign and contrary to the body (the servant). From this fear, the division between them arises: "For the mind set on the flesh is hostile toward God; for it does not submit to God's law" (Rom. 8:7).

124. We must weigh our daily deeds hour by hour, paying close attention to them, and in the evening we must lighten their burden through repentance, to the best of our ability, if we desire, with Christ's help, to overcome evil within ourselves. We must also examine whether we perform all our sensory and visible deeds according to God, in the presence of God, and for God alone, so that we may not, through foolishness, be overcome by any unwholesome passions in the process.

125. If, with God's help, we gain something each day through our sobriety, we should not indiscriminately associate with others, lest we suffer harm from any seductive conversations; but rather we must despise all that is vain, for the sake of this virtue (sobriety), which is most lovely and sweet.

126. We must direct the three powers of the soul in the proper way, in accordance with their nature and in harmony with the intention of God, who created them. Specifically: the irascible power must be directed against our outer self and against the serpent—Satan. "Be angry," it is said, "and do not sin" (Ps. 4:5). This means be angry at sin—that is, at ourselves and at the devil—so as not to sin against God. We must direct the power of desire toward God and virtue, and we must place the mind as the ruler over both of them, so that with wisdom and prudence it may order them, instruct them, punish them, and rule over them, just as a king rules over his subjects. And then the mind within us, according to God, will govern them (that is, when it reigns over them rather than submitting to them). Although the passions may rebel against the mind, we will not cease to command that the mind rule over them. For the brother of the Lord says: "If anyone does not stumble in what he says, he is a perfect man, able to bridle the whole body" (James 3:2). Truly, every lawlessness and sin is committed by these three powers, and every virtue and righteousness is accomplished by these same three powers.

127. The mind becomes clouded and barren when a monk either speaks with someone about worldly matters, or mentally dwells on them within himself, or when his body and mind are vainly occupied with something sensual, or when he generally gives himself over to vanity (and frivolity). For in such a case, immediately afterward, he loses his fervor, (humility, boldness before God, and knowledge—he forgets God and God’s order): so that to the extent that we pay attention with our mind, to that extent we are enlightened, and to the extent that we do not pay attention, we are clouded.

128. Whoever daily strives for peace and stillness of mind and earnestly seeks it will easily despise all that is sensual, lest his labor be in vain. But if he deceives his conscience with any false reasoning (that it is no harm to be occupied with anything sensual), he will fall into the bitter sleep of forgetfulness, from which the divine David prays not to fall asleep (Ps. 12:4—“lest I sleep the sleep of death”). The Apostle says: “For whoever knows the right thing to do and fails to do it, for him it is sin” (James 4:17).

129. The mind returns from idleness to its proper state and sobriety if, as soon as we become aware of our cooling off, we are inflamed with zeal and, with warm diligence, restore the mind’s usual activity (sobriety and prayer).

130. A mill donkey cannot move forward while walking on the wheel to which it is tied (it walks but remains in the same place until the wheel is stopped); and the mind will not move forward toward perfection—creative virtue (that is, the sobriety that leads to perfection)—unless it brings its inner (by halting the whirl of thoughts there). For such a mind is always blind with its inner eyes, unable to see virtue and the radiant Jesus.

131. A good and strong horse gallops joyfully, having taken a rider: so the mind will rejoice in the light of the Lord when it “appears before Him in the morning” free from all thoughts (Isa. 5:4). Stirring itself up, it will move “from the strength” of the mind’s active wisdom into the wondrous “power” of contemplation and the mysteries of the ineffable, and of virtues; and when he finally perceives in his heart the immeasurable depth of the exalted divine thoughts, then “the God of gods will appear to him,” as much as his heart can contain (Ps. 83:8). Struck by this, the mind then lovingly glorifies God, the visible and the all-seeing, Who for this very reason saves the intellectual gaze that so earnestly turns toward Him.

132. The heart’s silence, wisely maintained, will behold the lofty depths; and the ear of the mind that has fallen silent will hear wondrous things.

133. A traveler, having set out on a long, rough, and difficult journey, and fearing to lose his way on the return trip, places signs along the road as guideposts to help him return home safely; and let the man walking the path of sobriety set (as landmarks) the words (heard from the Fathers), fearing the same for himself (i.e., getting lost along the way or turning back).

134. But for the traveler, returning to where he set out is a cause for joy; whereas for the sober person, turning back is the ruin of the rational soul and a sign of turning away from God-pleasing deeds, words, and thoughts. And during the deadly sleep of the soul, he will have thoughts that, like thorns, will rouse him (from slumber), reminding him of the deep darkness and lethargy into which he has fallen because of his negligence.

135. Having fallen into sorrow, despair, and hopelessness (—into hopeless extremes from which there is no hope of escape)—we must do for ourselves what David did: “pour out” our hearts and “our prayers” before God, and “declare” our “sorrow” as it is to the Lord (Ps. 141: 3). For we confess to God, who is mighty and wise enough to arrange all things concerning us, and to make our affliction—if it is for our good—light (easy to bear and easy to overcome), and to deliver us from ruinous and destructive sorrow.

136. Anger toward people that is not naturally motivated, sorrow that is not according to God, and despondency—all are equally destructive to good and sensible thoughts; but the Lord, dispelling them for the sake of our confession, instills joy.

137. Thoughts that have crept into our hearts against our will and linger there are usually dispelled by the Jesus Prayer, combined with vigilance from the depths of the heart’s contemplation.

138. We will find relief and joy in our sorrow from the multitude of unspoken thoughts when we reproach ourselves sincerely and impartially—or when we confide everything to the Lord, as if to a person (who is part of us). In every way, through these two methods, we will find peace from everything (that troubles us).

139. The Fathers recognize Moses, the lawgiver, as an image of the mind—he who sees God in the burning bush, is glorified in person, and is appointed by the God of gods as a god to Pharaoh; then he strikes

Egypt with plagues, leads Israel out of it, and gives the law. All of this, when taken allegorically, in a spiritual sense, depicts the actions and virtues of the mind.

140. Aaron, the lawgiver's brother, serves as the image of the outer man. Therefore, as we angrily bring charges against him (the outer man), let us also speak to him, just as Moses spoke to Aaron when he sinned: "How did Israel (the mind, which perceives God) justify you, that you hastened to make him an apostate from the Lord, the Living God, the Almighty (by your own thoughts, you diverted him from the sober contemplation of God) (Ex. 32: 21)?"

141. Among many other good examples, the Lord, as He was about to raise Lazarus from the dead (by saying, "Come out, young man"), also showed that we must rein in the soul with strict restraint when it, like a woman, indulges in lax sensibility and, in general, strives to establish within itself a strict (toward itself) disposition—by which I mean self-reproach—that is capable of delivering the soul from self-indulgence, vanity, and pride.

142. Just as one cannot cross the depths of the sea without a large ship, so it is impossible to drive out the evil one's thoughts without invoking the name of Jesus Christ.

143. Rebuke usually blocks the further progress of such thoughts, while invoking the name of Jesus Christ drives them out of the heart. As soon as a thought arises in the soul through the perception of some sensory object—such as a person who has offended us, or a woman's beauty, or silver and gold—or when all these things pass through our mind one after another, it immediately becomes clear that the spirits that led our heart into such daydreaming are: resentment, lust, and the love of money. If our mind is experienced, trained, and skilled in guarding itself against delusions and in seeing, as clearly as in broad daylight, the seductive fantasies and wiles of the wicked, then it can easily extinguish the devil's fiery arrows through resistance, rebuke, and prayer to Jesus Christ, preventing passionate daydreaming from drawing our thoughts along in its wake, and preventing these thoughts from aligning with the phantom of temptation—whether by conversing amiably with it and indulging in excessive musing, or by joining forces with it—after which, with a certain inevitability, just as night follows day, evil deeds follow.

144. But if our mind is inexperienced in the practice of watchful sobriety, it immediately clings passionately to whatever vision presents itself to it, whatever it may be, and begins to converse with it, receiving absurd questions and giving equally absurd answers. Then our thoughts become mingled with demonic fantasies, which, as a result, become even more rampant and multiply, so as to appear more pleasing, beautiful, and attractive to the mind that is being beguiled and ensnared. Then our mind suffers something like this: as if on some plain where gentle lambs are grazing, a dog were to appear, and the lambs, as soon as it appeared, would run up to it frequently, as to their mother, deriving no benefit from approaching it, but only, as it were, taking on its filth and stench. In exactly the same way, our thoughts, out of inexperience, rush toward all the demonic fantasies in the mind and, as I said, mingle with them, so that one might say that the two hold a council together, —to devise a plan to bring to fruition through the body what seemed so alluring and sweet to them under the influence of demonic deception. Thus, the fall of the soul is ultimately brought about within; after which, as if by some necessity, what has ripened there within the heart is then manifested outwardly.

145. Our mind is something light and gentle, easily given over to dreams and irrepressibly prone to sinful thoughts, unless it possesses within itself a thought that, like a sovereign over the passions, would constantly restrain and curb it.

146. Contemplation and knowledge are usually the guides and the driving forces behind a strict life, in that the heart, enraptured by them, comes to despise earthly pleasures and every sensual delight of life as things of no consequence.

147. Conversely, a life of vigilance, lived in Christ Jesus, becomes the father of contemplation and knowledge and the source of divine aspirations and the wisest thoughts, united with its spouse—humility—as the Divine Prophet Isaiah says: "Those who wait for the Lord will renew their strength; they will soar on wings like eagles" (Isa. 40:31).

148. It seems too strict and burdensome to people to keep their minds silent of every thought. And indeed, this is difficult and painful: for it is painfully difficult not only for those uninitiated in the mysteries of spiritual warfare to confine and hold the incorporeal within the bodily dwelling, but also for those who have been tested in the inner, incorporeal battle. But whoever, through unceasing prayer, keeps the Lord Jesus in his heart will, according to the Prophet, "not grow weary of following Him, nor desire the life of man" (Jer.

17:16), for the sake of Jesus' beauty, pleasantness, and sweetness; and he will not be ashamed of his enemies—the unclean demons that walk around him—but will “shout at them in the gates” of the heart (Ps. 126:5) and drive them back with Jesus.

149. The soul, having soared after death into the air toward the gates of heaven, will not be ashamed of its enemies there, having Christ with it; but even then, as now, it will boldly cry out to them “at the gates.” Only until the very end of its life should it not cease, day and night, to cry out to the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God; and He will avenge it speedily, according to His unfailing divine promise, which He spoke in the parable of the unjust judge: “I tell you, He will avenge her speedily” (Luke 18:8)—both in this life and after she departs from her body.

150. As you sail across the sea of the mind, take courage in Jesus; for He Himself is within you—in your heart—mysteriously calling out to you: “Fear not, O Jacob, O little one of Israel; I am your God; I will hold your right hand” (Isa. 41: 13–14). “If God is for us,” what adversary is “against us” (Rom. 8:31)? God is for us, He who has blessed those who are pure in heart and has ordained that the Sweetest Jesus, the One and Only Pure One, should divinely dwell in pure hearts and abide within them. Let us not cease, then, following the divine Paul, to train our minds for godliness (1 Tim. 4:7).

151. He will enjoy, according to David, an abundance of peace (Ps. 36: 11), whoever does not show partiality toward human beings, judging unrighteousness in his heart—that is, whoever does not accept the images of deceitful spirits and, through these images, does not devise sin, but rather, judging strictly and pronouncing a strict verdict in the earth of his heart, gives sin its due. The great and wise Fathers, in some of their writings, refer to demons as “men” because of their rationality. So too in the Gospel, the Lord says, “An enemy of man has sown this” (Matt. 13: 28), that is, he has sown tares among the wheat (meaning the devil; for He later said, “the one who sows them is the devil”). Since we do not immediately resist these evildoers, we are overcome by such thoughts.

152. If, having begun to dwell in the attentiveness of the mind, we combine sobriety with humility and join prayer with resistance, then we will walk well along the path of the mind, as with a lamp of light, bearing the revered and holy name of Jesus Christ, —both sweeping away and cleansing us from sin, and adorning and tidying the house of our heart. But if we rely solely on our own sobriety or mindfulness, we will soon, having been attacked by our enemies, fall, having been cast down. And then these most cunning and malicious adversaries will begin to overcome us in every way, and we will become more and more entangled in evil desires, as in nets—or we will be subjected to utter slaughter by them, lacking within ourselves the victorious sword—the name of Jesus Christ. For only this sacred sword, when constantly wielded in a heart cleansed of every image, is able to turn them back, cut them down, burn them, and consume them, like fire consuming straw.

153. The work of unceasing vigilance, which is beneficial to the soul and fruitful, consists in immediately discerning the fanciful thoughts that arise in the mind. The work of rebuke is to expose and put to shame the thought that attempts to enter the air of our mind through the representation of some sensory object. That which immediately extinguishes and dispels every scheme of the adversaries—every word, every dream, every idol, and every pillar of wickedness—is the invocation of the Lord. And we ourselves see in our minds their sovereign defeat at the hands of Jesus, our great God, and His vengeance on behalf of us who are humble, poor, and good for nothing.

154. Many do not realize that our thoughts are nothing other than mere imaginary images of sensory and worldly things. But when we remain sober in prayer for a while longer, then prayer frees our mind from every material image of deceitful thoughts and enables it to discern the words of the adversaries (perhaps referring to the nature of thoughts in general—what they are—or to the plans and schemes of enemies as they instill thoughts), and to experience the benefit of prayer and sobriety. “But with your eyes you look upon the recompense of the sinners”—the mental ones—and you yourself will “see” and understand (Ps. 90:8), as the blessed Psalmist David says.

155. Let us, if possible, constantly remember death; for from this remembrance springs within us the casting aside of all cares and vanities, the preservation of the mind and unceasing prayer, detachment from the body and abhorrence of sin—and, to tell the truth, almost every virtue, living and active, flows from it. Therefore, let us, if possible, practice this as continuously as our breathing.

156. The heart, having completely detached itself from dreams, will begin to give birth to divine and mysterious thoughts that play within it, just as fish play and dolphins leap in a calm sea. A gentle breeze stirs the sea, and the abyss of the heart is stirred by the Holy Spirit. “And because you are sons,” says the Apostle, “God has sent the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying out, ‘Abba, Father’” (Gal. 4:6)!

157. Every monk will doubt and waver about undertaking spiritual practice before his mind has been sobered—whether because he has not yet come to know its beauty, or because, having come to know it, he is powerless to resolve himself to it due to a lack of zeal. But this hesitation will undoubtedly dissipate as soon as he begins the practice of guarding the mind, which is called mental wisdom or the active wisdom of the mind. For then he will find the Way, Who said, “I am the Way, and the Resurrection, and the Life” (John 14:6).

158. He will waver again, seeing the abyss of thoughts and the throng of Babylonian infants; but Christ dispels even this wavering, if we continually ground our minds in Him and cast aside the Babylonian infants, dashing them against this rock (Ps. 136: 9), —thus fulfilling, as it is said, His will against them (His indignation against them). For, as the Wise One says, “Keep the commandment not to let a deceitful word go forth” (Ecclesiastes 8:5). And the Lord says: “Without Me you can do nothing” (John 15: 5).

159. He is truly a true monk who practices sobriety, and he is a true ascetic who is a monk at heart (in whose heart there is nothing but God).

160. Human life stretches forward with the passing of years, months, weeks, days and nights, hours, and minutes. Along with them, we too ought to stretch forward (toward perfection) our virtuous deeds—that is, sobriety, prayer, and sweetness of heart—in unceasing silence, right up to the very end.

161. The hour of death will finally come for us as well—it will come, and there is no escaping it; and—oh, if only the prince of this world, coming then, would find our transgressions to be small and insignificant, so that he could not justly condemn us! —Otherwise, we will weep then, though it will already be too late. For, as the Lord says, “the servant who knows his master’s will but does not do it will be beaten severely” (Luke 12:47).

162. Woe to those who have corrupted their hearts! And what will they do when the Lord comes (Sirach 2:14)?—Let us, then, brothers, devote ourselves more zealously to the work of the heart.

163. Simple and dispassionate thoughts are followed by passionate ones, as we have learned from long experience and observation; and the former serve as a gateway for the latter, the dispassionate for the passionate.

164. Truly, a person must divide himself in two by his own will; he must tear himself apart with the wisest of thoughts; indeed, he must become an irreconcilable enemy to himself. Whatever attitude one has toward a person who has grievously insulted and wronged him, we must have the same—or even a worse one—toward ourselves, if we wish to fulfill the greatest and foremost commandment, that is, blessed humility—the dwelling of Christ, the incarnate life of God. Therefore, the Apostle says: “Who will deliver me from this body of death?” (Rom. 7:24)? “For the flesh sets its mind on the things of the flesh, but the spirit on the things of the Spirit” (Rom. 8:7). Showing, then, that subjecting the body to God’s will is one of the tasks incumbent upon us, he said: “For if we judged ourselves, we would not be condemned. But when we are judged, we are disciplined by the Lord” (1 Cor. 11:31–32).

165. The beginning of bearing fruit is the blossom; and the beginning of a sober mind is moderation in food and drink, the rejection and cutting off of all thoughts, and silence of the heart.

166. When, having come to know Christ Jesus, we begin to dwell in sobriety firmly established, then first there appears to us in the mind—as it were, a lamp held by the hand of the mind and guiding us along the paths of thought; then, as it were, the moon in full light, revolving in the firmament of the heart; and finally, as the sun, —Jesus, shining with righteousness like the sun, that is, revealing Himself and His all-illuminating lights of contemplation.

167. This is what He mysteriously reveals to the mind that, with unceasing zeal, keeps His commandment, which says: “Circumcise your hearts” (Deut. 10:16). – Yes, as has already been said, careful sobriety teaches a person these wondrous truths. The Divine is impartial. Why does the Lord say: “Hear Me and understand; for whoever has, to him more will be given, and he will have an abundance; but whoever does not have, even what he has will be taken from him” (Matt. 13: 12–13); and again: “All things work together for good for those who love God” (Rom. 8: 28). Do not these virtues (sobriety and prayer) all the more hasten them toward this?

168. A ship cannot move forward without water; nor can the preservation of the mind succeed in the least without sobriety, accompanied by humility and prayer to Jesus Christ.

169. The foundation of a house is stones; but for this virtue (the preservation of the mind), both the foundation and the roof are the holy and revered name of our Lord Jesus Christ. A foolish helmsman will quickly and easily suffer shipwreck during a storm if he dismisses the crew, throws the oars and sails into the sea, and goes to sleep himself; but even more quickly will a soul be drowned by demons if, at the onset of trials, it neglects to remain sober and to call upon the name of Jesus Christ.

170. We pass on what we know through Scripture, and we bear witness to those who are willing—as we have seen along the way—if you are willing to accept what is being told to you. For the Lord Himself said: “If anyone does not abide in Me, he is cast out like a branch and withers; and they gather them and throw them into the fire, and they are burned. But whoever abides in Me, and I in him, he will bear much fruit” (John 15:5–6). Just as it is impossible for the sun to shine without light, so it is impossible for the heart to be cleansed of the defilement of harmful thoughts without prayer in the name of Jesus. If this is true, as I see (from experience), then let us call upon this Name as often as we breathe. For it is light, and those (impure thoughts) are darkness; and He (Jesus, whom we call upon) is God and Lord, while those are servants of demons.

171. It is fitting and proper to call the preservation of the mind “light-bearing,” “lightning-bearing,” “light-emitting,” and “fire-bearing.” For, truly, it is superior to even the greatest bodily virtues, no matter how many one may possess. For this very reason, this virtue ought to be called by the most honorable names, because of the radiant lights that are born of it. Those who love it are transformed—from being depraved, vile, ignorant, foolish, and unrighteous sinners—by the power of Jesus Christ into the righteous, virtuous, pure, holy, and wise; and not only that, but they also begin to contemplate the mysteries and to engage in theological reflection. Having become contemplatives, they dwell in that most pure, boundless Light, touch Him with ineffable touches, live and act with Him, for they have “tasted that the Lord is good”; so that the words of the divine David are clearly fulfilled in these first angels: “But the righteous will confess Your name, and the upright will dwell in Your presence” (Ps. 139:14). And indeed, they alone truly call upon God, confess to Him, and always love to converse with Him, loving Him.

172. Woe to the inner self from the outer; for the inner man suffers greatly from the external senses. But having suffered anything, he must use the scourge against these external senses. He who has done what is required according to the letter has already understood what is required according to the spirit.

173. If our inner man remains sober, then, according to the Fathers, he is strong enough to preserve the outer man as well. According to their same words, we and the wicked demons both commit sins together: they depict sins only in their thoughts or imaginative visions before the mind, as they please, while we sin both inwardly through our thoughts and outwardly through our deeds. Demons, lacking robust bodies, prepare torment for both themselves and us solely through thoughts, schemes, and deceptions. But if these most depraved beings were not deprived of a robust body, they would sin ceaselessly through their deeds as well, always harboring within themselves an evil will ready to commit wickedness.

174. But a heartfelt prayer to the Lord shatters them and reduces their temptations to dust. For Jesus, God and the Son of God, whom we call upon ceaselessly and without sloth, by no means allows them even to begin to implant sin in us—what is called an “attempt”—nor does He allow any image whatsoever to be shown to the mind in the mirror of thought, nor any words to be spoken to the heart. But if no image forces its way into the heart, then it will be empty even of thoughts, as we have said; for demons usually converse secretly with the soul through thoughts and teach it evil.

175. Thus, through unceasing prayer, the air of our mind is cleansed of the dark clouds and winds of evil spirits. And when the air of the heart is pure, nothing prevents the divine light of Jesus from shining within it, provided we do not become puffed up with vanity, conceit, and boastful self-aggrandizement, do not strive for the unattainable, and are not thereby deprived of Jesus’ help; for Christ hates all such things, being the very model of humility.

176. Let us, therefore, cling to prayer and humility—these two weapons, which, together with sobriety, serve as a flaming sword with which the spiritual warriors arm themselves against the demons. If we lead our lives in this way, then every day and every hour we may have a mysteriously joyful feast in our hearts.

177. There are eight principal sinful thoughts, which encompass the entire realm of such thoughts and from which they all originate. They all approach the gates of the heart, and, finding it unguarded by the mind, enter it one after another, each in its own time. When any of these eight thoughts rises to the heart and enters it, it brings with it a whole swarm of impure thoughts and, thus clouding the mind and heart, agitates the body and draws it toward committing shameful acts.

178. But whoever strikes the serpent's head (the appendix) with angry rebuke—gathering angry words as if striking the enemy's face with a fist—thereby puts an end to the battle. For, having struck off the head, he has avoided both wicked thoughts and the most wicked deeds. After this, his mind remains undisturbed: for God accepts his vigilance over his thoughts and, in return, grants him the knowledge of how to overcome his enemies and how to purify his heart from the thoughts that defile the inner man, of which the Lord Jesus says: "For out of the heart come evil thoughts, adultery, sexual immorality... These are what defile a person" (Matt. 15:19–20).

179. In this way, the soul can come to resemble the Lord in its goodness, beauty, and righteousness, just as it was created by God in the beginning to be good and righteous, as the great servant of God, Anthony, says: "When the mind in the soul is as it ought to be by nature, then the whole soul is virtue." He also said again: "For the soul to be righteous is the same as for it to have its mind in its natural state, as it was created." And a little further on, he says again: "Let us purify the mind; for I believe that, having been thoroughly purified and having returned to its natural state, it can become discerning and see beyond the demons, having within itself the Lord who grants revelation." This is what the glorious Anthony said, as the great Athanasius recounts in the Life of Anthony.

180. Every thought reproduces in the mind the image of some sensory object: for the Assyrian (the enemy), being himself a spiritual power, can deceive us only by making use of something familiar to us—something sensory.

181. Just as it is impossible for us humans to chase after birds through the air or to fly like them—because this is not natural to our nature—so it is impossible for us to rid ourselves of incorporeal demonic thoughts and freely direct the attentive eye of the mind toward God without sober, unceasing prayer. If you lack this, then you are on earth and will pursue earthly things.

182. If you truly wish to cover your thoughts with shame, you ought to remain silent and maintain a sober heart without effort; let the Jesus Prayer cling to your breath—and in a few days you will see this in practice.

183. Just as one should not write letters in the air, but must engrave them with a chisel on some solid surface so that they may be preserved for a long time: so too must we combine the Jesus Prayer with our laborious sobriety, so that the beautiful virtue of sobriety, together with Him, may always remain whole within us, and through Him be preserved in us forever as an inalienable part of ourselves.

184. Commit your affairs to the Lord, as has been said, and you will find grace, so that the words of the Prophet may not apply to us as well as to you: "You are near, O Lord, to their lips, but far from their hearts" (Jer. 12:2). No one else can truly pacify your heart from its passions except Jesus Christ Himself, who united within Himself what is far apart (that is, Divinity and humanity).

185. Both internal mental dialogues with one's own thoughts and external conversations and idle talk alike darken the soul. Therefore, those who strive to banish all that is harmful from their minds must, without pity, drive away both the lovers of idle talk—whether thoughts or people—for a most and God-given reason, namely: —so that the mind, being clouded, does not weaken in sobriety; for when we are clouded by forgetfulness (from such conversations), we lose our minds (becoming as if we had no mind at all).

186. Whoever preserves the purity of the heart with all diligence will have as his guide in this matter Christ, the Lawgiver of the heart, Who will mysteriously reveal His will to him. "I will hear what the Lord God says about me" (Ps. 84:9), says David, pointing to this. Depicting the mind's inner dialogue concerning the battle of thoughts and God's intercessory protection in it, he said: "And a man will say: 'If there is any reward for the righteous'" (Ps. 57:12). And then, expressing the decision reached as a result of this two-sided consideration, he says: "For God is their judge"—of the evil demons "on earth" in our hearts (ibid.). And in another place he says: "A man will approach, and his heart will be deeply moved, and God will be exalted"; and then "their wounds" will be counted as "the arrows of infants" (Ps. 63:7–8).

187. Let us always conduct ourselves as those "instructed in wisdom by the heart" (Ps. 89:12), breathing ceaselessly in Jesus Christ, the power of God the Father and the Wisdom of God. But if, by some chance, we should fall short and lose sight of this wise course of action, then the next morning we will once again gird up the loins of our mind and take up our task with renewed vigor, knowing that there is no excuse for us, who "know how to do good," if we do not do it.

188. Just as when harmful food, recently consumed, causes painful distress in the body, and the one who has tasted it, as soon as he feels this harm, hastens to expel it, thus remaining unharmed—so too the mind, when, having absorbed the evil thoughts it has taken in and feeling their soul-damaging bitterness, hurries to expel them through the Jesus Prayer, uttered from the depths of the heart, and cast them far from itself; through this, it avoids all harm from them, just as, by God's mercy, the teaching of others and one's own experience have enabled those of sound mind to understand this matter.

189. Combine sobriety with your breath and the name of Jesus, or the thought of death and humility; for both bring great benefit.

190. The Lord said: "Learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart" (Matt. 11:29).

191. The Lord also said: "Whoever humbles himself like this little child is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:4); "But whoever exalts himself will be humbled" (Luke 18:14). — "From Me," He says, "learn." And do you see what we are to learn? Humility. His commandment is eternal life; and this commandment is humility. Consequently, whoever is not humble has fallen away from life, and will certainly find himself in the very opposite of it.

192. If every virtue is brought about by the soul and the body, and if the soul and the body—through which, as I have said, every virtue is accomplished—are God's creation, are we not acting with extreme folly when we boast and take pride in adornments of the soul and body that are not our own? And is this not all the more so because, leaning on pride as on a reed, we set ourselves against God, whose greatness is boundless, thereby bringing upon our heads His most terrible displeasure through our extreme lawlessness and folly; for "the Lord resists the proud" (James 4:6). Instead of imitating the Lord in humility, we, through our vain and proud reasoning, enter into fellowship with the Lord's fierce enemy, the proud devil. That is why the Apostle says, "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7). Did you create yourself? If you received from God the body and soul—from which, in which, and through which every virtue exists—then "what do you boast about that you did not receive?" (ibid.) For the Lord has granted you all these things.

193. The purification of the heart, through which both humility and every blessing that comes from above are present in us, is nothing other than ensuring that harmful thoughts are not allowed to enter the soul.

194. The guarding of the mind, carried out with God's help and for the sake of the One God, once established in the soul, imparts to the mind the wisdom to perform deeds in accordance with God. It also grants its participant no small ability to order both external deeds and words according to God, with impeccable judgment.

195. The distinctive high-priestly ornament in the Old Testament—the pure gold breastplate on the chest, inscribed with the words "Holy to the Lord" (Ex. 28:36) was a foreshadowing of purity of heart, which inspires us to pay attention to the breastplate of our heart, to see if it has been blackened by sin, so that (if this proves to be the case) we may hasten to cleanse it with tears, repentance, and prayer. Our mind is something light (fleeting), and it is difficult to keep it from sinful thoughts; one might say, however, that it follows both evil and good mental musings with equal ease.

196. Truly blessed is the one whose thoughts are so closely attached to the Jesus Prayer, crying out to Him unceasingly in the heart, just as air clings to our bodies, or a flame to a candle. The sun, as it passes over the earth, brings about the day; and the holy and worship-worthy name of the Lord Jesus, shining ceaselessly in the mind, gives rise to a countless multitude of sun-like thoughts.

197. When the clouds disperse, the air appears clear; and when the passionate fantasies are dispelled by the Sun of Righteousness, Jesus Christ, then light-like and star-like thoughts are usually born in the heart, because Jesus has illuminated the air of the heart. For the Wise One says: "Those who hope in the Lord will understand the truth, and the faithful will remain in His love" (Wis. 3:9).

198. One of the Saints said: "If you are to bear a grudge, bear it against the demons; and if you are to be hostile, be hostile toward the flesh at all times. The flesh is a treacherous friend, and when it is satisfied, it wages the fiercest battle." And again: "Be hostile toward the flesh and wage war against the belly."

199. In the preceding chapters, comprising the first and second hundreds, we have described the labors of the sacred silence of the mind, presenting not only the fruit of our own research but also what the divine words of the godly Fathers teach us regarding the purity of the mind. Now, having said a little more to demonstrate the benefit of guarding the mind, we will conclude our discourse.

200. Come, then, follow me toward the attainment of the blessed preservation of the mind, whoever you may be, who love in spirit "to see good days" (Ps. 33: 12)—and I will teach you, in the Lord, the visible workings and dwelling of the incorporeal powers. The angels are never sated as they sing the praises of the Creator; nor will the mind, competing with them in purity, ever be satisfied. And just as the incorporeal (angels in heaven) do not concern themselves with food, so too do the corporeal incorporeal ones (people—those who live soberly on earth) not concern themselves with it when they ascend to the heaven of the mind's silence.

201. Just as the heavenly powers do not concern themselves with wealth and possessions, so too those who have purified the eye of the soul and acquired the habit of virtue (sobriety) do not concern themselves with the malice of evil spirits. And just as those are distinguished by the wealth of success in perfection in God, so these are distinguished by their longing and love for God, their striving and ascent toward the Divine. And they, with an insatiable longing to taste the Divine love that leads to rapture, stretching upward in their ascent (climbing the steps of spiritual perfection), will not stop until they attain likeness to the Seraphim, — and they will not rest from the sobriety of the mind and the longing for elevation until they become angels in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

202. There is no poison more deadly than that of the asp and the basilisk; and there is no evil greater than the evil of self-love. The offspring of self-love—these flying serpents—are these: self-praise in the heart, self-indulgence, gluttony, fornication, vanity, envy, and the pinnacle of all evils, pride, which casts down not only people but also angels from heaven and covers them with darkness instead of light.

203. I have written this to you, Theodulus, my namesake of silence (i.e., Hesychius), though in reality I am not a man of silence. Perhaps I have not written everything pertaining to our subject, but in every way that which God has given—God, praised and glorified in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit by all rational beings: angels and humans, and by every creature created by the ineffable Trinity, the One God, whose glorious kingdom may we also be deemed worthy to receive, through the prayers of the Most Holy Theotokos and our Venerable Fathers. To Him, the incomprehensible God, be eternal glory. Amen.

Venerable Nilus of Sinai

A Brief Account of Him

The Venerable Nilus came from a wealthy and noble family and was likely already a listener and disciple of St. Chrysostom when the latter was preaching in Antioch. His noble birth and personal virtues elevated him to the rank of prefect of the capital. But the longings of his spirit were at odds with the duties and routines of life in the capital. Therefore, in agreement with his wife—with whom he already had two children—he left the world to pursue the path of salvation more successfully in solitude, following in his mother-in-law's footsteps. Taking his son Theodulus with him, he settled on Mount Sinai; while his wife and daughter found refuge in one of the Egyptian women's monasteries. In the Sinai Desert, St. Nilus lived an extremely austere life: with his own hands, he and his son dug a cave for themselves, and while living there, they subsisted not even on bread, but on wild, bitter plants. Yet they spent all their time in prayer, the study of Scripture, contemplation of God, and labor. Although he had renounced the world, the Venerable Nilus did not cease to interact with people. From all over—, and people of every sort—people turned to him with their spiritual needs, and no one was left without the necessary guidance and edification. Even the king wrote to him, asking for prayers, and he wrote to the king, rebuking him for his injustice toward St. Chrysostom. The reverend's other writings were primarily of a moral and ascetic nature. From all that he wrote, it is evident how vast and profound his knowledge was, and how tireless his labor was in this endeavor. A special trial came upon him to test his love for God. Savage barbarians from Arabia attacked Mount Sinai and the surrounding regions; they plundered everything, killed many, and took others captive. Among the latter was Theodulus, the son of St. Nilus. This misfortune weighed heavily on the reverend father's heart—and he found no peace, especially when, on the second or third day after the disaster, news reached him that the savages had decided to sacrifice his son to the morning star—Venus—though it was unclear whether this decision had actually been carried out. But God did not allow his father's heart to be tormented for long. He soon learned that the sacrifice had not taken place and that the captives had been sold into Christian lands. He was later found in the city of Elusa, whose bishop had bought him from the barbarians along with others and was already preparing him for service in the Church—a calling for which his father, who had come to seek him out, had also been urged. Their love for the desert life did not allow them to agree to this; and the bishop, having ordained them as priests, blessed them to depart for their beloved Sinai, where they remained until the end of their lives. St. Nilus departed this life in 390; he lived in the Sinai Desert for 60 years and died around 450. His feast days are November 12 and January 13. During the reign of Justin the Younger, his holy relics were transferred to Constantinople and placed in the Church of the Holy Apostles. From the writings of St. Nilus, the “Discourse on Prayer” and the “Ascetic Discourse” were taken into the Greek Dobrotolyubie and from there into the Slavonic version. We also include the “Discourse on Prayer” in our Dobrotolyubie; but instead of the ascetic treatise, we prefer to include the treatise “On the Eight Spirits of Deception,” as well as “two collections of brief sayings” and instructions, one of which is titled “Chapters or Exhortations,” and the other, “Thoughts That Turn a Person Away from the Transient and Attach Them to the Imperishable.” – But since the Reverend Father has offered a great deal of most beneficial advice and instruction on prayer and the struggle against the passions in his other writings, just as edifying thoughts are found in abundance throughout those works—both regarding moral structure in general and, in particular, a life detached from all things: therefore, having considered that it would be unjust to deprive our Goodness-Loving of these treasures, we have decided to draw them from the aforementioned writings of the Reverend Father, placing what pertains to prayer under the heading of prayer, what pertains to the struggle against the passions under each of the eight passions, and what pertains to general edification — under the “Collection of Sayings.” In this, we follow the example of the ancients. For in the Patrologia Graeca (Migne, vol. 79), where all the writings of St. Nilus are collected, after the “Thoughts that Turn One Away from the Transient and Attach One to the Imperishable”—pp. 1249–50—there is a note stating that in the manuscript from which these thoughts were printed, there follow another fourteen thoughts, drawn partly from the treatise on “non-acquisitiveness” and partly from the treatise on the “superiority” of living in solitude over city life. These borrowings themselves have not been printed; but the example loses nothing by this. We will indicate the citations of these borrowings at the end of the articles, specifying the volume and page number—according to the edition of the Reverend’s works in Russian translation. The articles without citations are found on the same page as indicated above.

Ascetic Instructions by the Venerable Nilus of Sinai

1. A Word on Prayer

Preface

You have timely raised me up, as I lay in the burning fever of impure passions, through the touch of your God-loving writing, and you have comforted my mind, afflicted by the most shameful ailments, with consolation, blissfully imitating the great Guide and Teacher. And this is no surprise. It has always been your lot to seek what is glorious and remarkable, just as it was for the blessed Jacob. For after working hard for Rachel and receiving Leah, you seek your beloved, just as he fulfilled seven years of labor for her (Gen. 29:20–28). And I do not deny that, having labored all night, I caught nothing; but, having cast the nets at your word, I drew up a multitude of fish—not, I think, large ones, but one hundred and fifty-three (John 21: 11). And I am sending them to you in a basket of love; and in doing so, I am fulfilling your command by compiling an equal number of chapters (on prayer). I marvel at you and greatly delight in your wonderful choice, that you desired (nothing else) but chapters on prayer; and moreover, you did not merely desire that they be written down on paper, but that they be instilled in the mind through love and kindness. Since “everything is a pair, one against another,” as the wise Sirach says (42:25), do not accept them merely by the letter, but understand them in spirit as well. Do not complain about the small number of chapters, as one who knows “how to be content and how to do without” (Phil. 4:12). Indeed, do not complain, remembering that the Lord did not reject even the widow’s two mites, but accepted them more favorably than the rich offerings of many others. But above all, knowing how to maintain goodwill and love toward your sincere brothers, pray for the infirm, that he may be healed and, taking up his bed, begin to walk by the grace of Christ. Amen.

153 Chapters on Prayer

1. If anyone wishes to prepare fragrant incense, he must, according to the law, mix equal parts of “pure frankincense, cassia, onycha, and stacte” (Ex. 30: 34). These are the four⁷⁰ virtues. When they are all present in the soul in perfect perfection and equal strength, then the mind will not be betrayed (by treachery, of course, by some inner traitor).

2. The soul, having been purified by the fullness of virtues,⁷¹ brings the mind into a state of unshakability, making it capable of accepting the disposition required (in prayer).

3. Prayer is a conversation of the mind with God. What state, then, does the mind need in order to be able—without looking back (or this way and that)—to ascend to its Lord and converse with Him without any intermediary⁷² ?

4. If Moses, who intended to approach the burning bush on earth, was forbidden to do so until he had removed his sandals from his feet (Exod. 3. 5)—how then can you fail to cast aside every passionate thought when you desire to see the One who is above all feeling and thought, and to converse with Him?

5. First and foremost, pray for tears, so that through weeping you may soften the very cruelty (Greek: “wildness”) within your soul and, having confessed to the Lord your “iniquity” (Ps. 31:5), receive from Him the forgiveness of your sins.

6. Use tears as a means to obtain every petition; for the Lord rejoices greatly over you when you pray with tears.

7. When you shed streams of tears during your prayer, do not by any means become proud within yourself, as if you were superior to many. It is because your prayer has received help from above, so that, having earnestly confessed your sins, you may appease the Lord with your tears.

8. Do not, then, turn the means against passions into a passion itself, lest you further provoke the One who has granted you this grace (i.e., tears). Many, while shedding tears over their sins, have forgotten the purpose of their tears and, becoming carried away, have strayed (from the right path, or have lost their minds).

9. Stand firm in patience and pray fervently, casting aside the distractions of worldly cares and all manner of thoughts; for they disturb and trouble you, seeking to disrupt your devotion in prayer.

10. When demons see that someone has the zeal and fervor to pray as they should, they (during prayer) plant thoughts in their mind about something that seems necessary (and then withdraw), but shortly afterward they stir up the memory of it again, prompting the mind to consider it (if it is a question, to resolve it; if it is a matter, to acquire it);—and he, not finding what he seeks, becomes annoyed and grieves. Then, when he stands to pray (this zealous devotee of prayer), they remind him of what he was thinking about and what he was seeking, so that his mind, being stirred again toward understanding (what was not resolved before), renders his prayer fruitless.

11. Strive to make your mind deaf and mute during prayer; and then you will be able to pray as you ought.

12. When temptation meets you, or someone’s rebuke irritates you—so that you are moved to anger against the one who contradicted you, or even utter some unseemly word; then remember prayer and the judgment that takes place during it (over you in your conscience before God)—and immediately the unruly agitation within you will be subdued.

13. Whatever you do in retaliation against a brother who has wronged you will become a stumbling block to you (will trouble you) during prayer.

14. Prayer is a branch (of the tree) of meekness and lack of anger.

15. Prayer is an expression (manifestation) of joy and gratitude.

16. Prayer is a remedy for sorrow and despondency.

17. “Go, sell your possessions and give to the poor” (Matt. 19:21), and, taking up your cross, deny yourself (– 16:24), so that you may pray without distraction.

18. If you wish to pray with praise, deny yourself during prayer and, enduring extreme hardships, be patient for the sake of prayer.

19. Whatever sorrow you may have to endure, be patient; then you will reap the fruit of this during prayer.

20. If you wish to pray as you ought, do not let your soul be sad (or do not harbor bitterness in your heart); otherwise, your efforts (or your prayerful labor) will be in vain.

⁷¹ In the Dobrotolyubie, both the Greek and Slavonic versions read: “by fulfilling the commandments.”

⁷² In the Slavonic version: “being in the midst of nothing”—this may be better.

21. “Leave your gift there,” says the Lord, “before the altar, and go first to be reconciled with your brother” (Matt. 5:24)—and then, when you return, you will pray without distraction; for resentment casts darkness upon the mind of the one who prays and shrouds his prayers in darkness.

22. Those who harbor sorrows (griefs) and resentment within themselves, and who pray while in this state, are like those who draw water and pour it into a leaky tub.

23. If you are patient, you will always pray with joy.

24. When you pray as you should, certain matters may come to mind for which it might seem just to you to be angry with your neighbor. (Be on your guard.) – There is no anger toward a neighbor that is truly righteous. And if you look for it, you will find that the matter can be resolved well even without anger. Therefore, do everything in your power not to give in to anger.

25. Be careful, when seeking to heal another, not to remain unhealed yourself, and not to allow your prayer to be interrupted.

26. By showing mercy to others and not being angry with them, you will find mercy for yourself, prove yourself wise in your self-assessment, and be counted among those who truly pray.

27. By arming yourself against anger, you will never suffer the onset of lust; for it feeds anger, and anger disturbs the eye of the mind and damages the disposition for prayer.

28. When praying, do not limit yourself to mere outward movements and postures, but lift your mind to the spirit of prayer with great reverence.

29. Sometimes, as soon as you begin to pray, you will immediately pray well; and sometimes, even after much effort, you will not attain this desired goal; (and this is permitted to you so that) you may seek (prayer) even more earnestly and, having received it, may have a prayer that is completely sound, safe from theft.

30. When an angel draws near to us, all those who trouble us (demons) immediately depart: the mind is then filled with great joy and prays soundly. And sometimes, during the onslaught of the usual battle, the mind struggles and is prevented from rising (to godly thought and spiritual well-being). This is because it was previously tainted by various passions (it was carried away by them and tasted them). However, if it seeks more earnestly, it will find, and if it does not grow weary of striving, it will be opened to it.

31. Do not pray, “Let it be according to your desires,” for they do not always agree with God’s will. But rather, pray as you have been taught, saying, “Let Your will be done in me” (Matt. 6:10). And in every matter, ask Him in this way: for He always desires what is good and beneficial for your soul, whereas you do not always seek this.

32. Many times, while praying, I asked for what seemed good to me, and I insisted on my request, foolishly pressuring God’s will instead of entrusting to Him the better arrangement of what He knows to be beneficial for me. But after receiving what I had asked for, I would later find myself in great sorrow, precisely because I had not asked that it be better according to God’s will; for the matter turned out not to be for me as I had thought.

33. What is good, apart from God? Let us therefore entrust to Him everything that concerns us, and we will be well off; for the Giver of good gifts is certainly good Himself.

34. Do not grieve if you do not immediately receive from God what you ask for. He wishes to bestow a greater blessing upon you by causing you to stand before Him in prayer with patience for a longer time. For what could be greater than to extend one’s conversation with God and to be embraced by communion with Him?

35. Undistracted prayer is the highest act of the mind.

36. Prayer is the ascent of the mind to God.

37. If you desire true prayer, renounce everything, so that you may inherit all things.

38. Pray, first, to be cleansed of your passions; second, to be freed from ignorance and forgetfulness; and third, to be delivered from every temptation and apostasy.

39. Seek in your prayer only righteousness and the kingdom—that is, virtue and knowledge—and all else “will be added to you” (Matt. 6:33).

40. It is righteous to pray not only for your own purification, but also for the purification of every person, in imitation of the angelic order.

41. Consider whether you truly stand before God in your prayer, or whether you are overcome by the desire for human praise and strive to gain it, disguising this (unwholesome desire with a seemingly noble one) by prolonging your prayer.

42. Whether you pray with the brethren or alone, strive not merely to fulfill a custom, but to pray with feeling.

43. It is characteristic of prayer (this kind—prayer with feeling) to be deeply absorbed in reverence, tenderness, and spiritual anguish, while confessing one's sins with silent sighs.

44. If your mind wanders during prayer, then you are not praying like a monk, but are still a layperson adorning the outer tabernacle.

45. When you pray, guard your memory with all your strength so that it does not impose its own thoughts upon you; but in every way lift yourself up to a mindful presence before God (with the awareness of before whom and for what purpose you stand). For during prayer, the mind is usually greatly distracted by the memory (it brings to mind things, people, and events, and through them diverts the mind's attention from prayer).

46. During prayer, your memory brings to mind either past events, new worries, or a person who has offended you.

47. The demon is very jealous of a person who prays and uses all manner of tricks to disrupt that person's intention; therefore, he ceaselessly stirs up, through memory, thoughts about various things, and through the flesh sets all the passions in motion, so as to hinder in any way the beautiful flow of prayer (i.e., the work of prayer) and the ascent to God (the elevation of attention).

48. When the all-cunning demon, having employed many tricks, fails to hinder the prayer of the diligent (prayerful person), he then slightly lessens (his attacks), but later, when the person finishes his prayer, he takes revenge on him. For either by inflaming him with anger, he destroys that beautiful state of mind acquired through prayer, or by arousing some wordless delight (the urge to savor sensual pleasure), he mocks the mind.

49. Having prayed as you ought, expect what you ought not to—and stand firm, guarding your fruit. This is what you were set to do from the very beginning—that is, to "tend and keep" (Gen. 2:15). Why, having done your part (having prayed as you ought), should you leave unguarded what you have acquired through labor? Otherwise, you will derive no benefit from prayer.

50. All the battle waged between us and the unclean spirits is waged for no other reason than spiritual prayer, for it is utterly opposed to and intolerable for them, while for us it is salvific and beneficial.

51. Why do the demons seek to stir up in us, through their influence, gluttony, fornication, greed, anger, resentment, and other passions? So that the mind, dulled by them, may be unable to pray as it ought; for the passions of our irrational nature, once they begin to act (once set in motion), do not allow the mind to act rationally.

52. We practice virtues because they are required by nature; we submit to nature for the sake of the Word who brought it into being—the Lord). And this Word usually becomes manifest to us (is clearly imprinted in our consciousness) in the state of prayer.

53. The state of prayer is a dispassionate disposition that, through extreme love, lifts the wise and spiritual mind to great heights.

54. One who wishes to pray truly must not only master anger and lust, but also be free from every passionate thought.

55. Whoever loves God always converses with Him as with a Father, turning away from every passionate thought.

56. Not everyone who has attained dispassion is already praying truly; for such a person may still be occupied with simple thoughts (about things, without any passionate stirrings) and be distracted by their stories (perhaps by their images and various combinations thereof)—and thus remain far from God. (There are no passionate stirrings, but the mind is daydreaming.)

57. But even when the mind does not linger in simple thoughts about things, this does not yet mean that it has already reached the state of prayer: for it may be occupied with (philosophical) contemplation of these things and delve into their causal relationships. Although all these are abstractions, since they are speculations about things, they imprint their images on the mind—and lead it far away from God. (The passions are not in motion, but the mind philosophizes rather than prays: the state of scholars).

58. Even if the mind rises above speculations about material nature, it does not follow that it has already beheld the very presence of God: for it may be occupied with the knowledge of intelligible beings (of the angelic world) and be filled with them (be full of diverse thoughts and ideas about them).

59. If you wish to pray properly, you need God, who grants prayer to the one who prays. Call upon Him in prayer, saying, “Hallowed be Your name; Your kingdom come” (Matt. 6:9–10), that is, the Holy Spirit and Your Only-Begotten Son. For the Lord Himself taught this, saying that it is fitting to worship the Father “in spirit and in truth” (John 4:24).

60. One who prays in spirit and truth does not draw thoughts for the glorification of the Creator from created things, but draws from Him Himself the insights needed to sing His praises.

61. If you are a theologian, you will pray truly; and if you pray truly, you are a theologian.

62. When your mind, burning with desire for God, gradually detaches itself, as it were, from the flesh and turns away from all thoughts arising from sensory impressions or from memory, while at the same time being filled with reverence and joy, then conclude that it has drawn near to the limits of prayer.

63. The Holy Spirit, condescending to our weakness, comes to us even when we are not yet pure; and if He finds our mind sincerely praying to Him, He descends upon it and dispels the whole crowd of thoughts and images surrounding it (causing them to vanish), thereby disposing it to the desire for spiritual prayer.

64. Other spirits—both good and evil—introduce thoughts, ideas, and imaginings into the mind by influencing the body; but the Lord acts in the opposite way: by inspiring the mind itself, He instills in it the knowledge of whatever pleases Him—and through the mind, He tames the unrestrained nature of the body.

65. He who, while loving true prayer, becomes angry or holds a grudge is worthy of every reproach; for he is like one who wishes to see clearly, yet at the same time covers his eyes with dust.

66. If you wish to pray as you ought, do nothing that opposes (is hostile to) prayer, so that God, drawing near, may descend upon you.

67. When you pray, do not ascribe any form to the Divine, and do not allow your mind to be transformed into any image (or to imagine itself in any form, or for any image to be imprinted in your mind); but approach the immaterial with the immaterial—and you will be united with it.

68. Beware of the enemy’s snares: for it happens that when you pray with purity and serenity, some strange and alien image will suddenly appear to you. The enemies do this in order to lead you into conceit, by instilling the thought that the Divine has appeared to you—and further, so that you might think that, like this sudden apparition, the Divine also has quantity (occupies space, has extension, and consists of parts), whereas the Divine has neither quantity nor form.

69. When the envious demon does not have time to set the memory in motion, it then acts upon the blood and bodily fluids to use them to produce in the mind an image of something foreign and fill it with visions; and the mind, having grown accustomed to dwelling on such thoughts, is easily carried away by them; thinking that it is ascending to an immaterial and invisible realm of knowledge, it is deceived, taking smoke for light.

70. Stand guard over yourself, protecting your mind from wandering thoughts during prayer and striving to remain in a peaceful state—so that “He who is compassionate toward the ignorant” (Heb. 5:2) may come to you and grant you the glorious gift of prayer.

71. It is impossible for you to pray with purity while entangled in worldly affairs and agitated by ceaseless cares; for prayer is the setting aside of (all extraneous) thoughts.

72. One who is bound cannot flee—nor can a mind enslaved by any passion perceive the place of spiritual prayer; moreover, it is swayed and tossed about by passionate thoughts and has no firm standing.

73. When the mind finally begins to pray purely and dispassionately, then the demons attack it, no longer from the left but from the right: they present a vision as if of God’s glory, or some figurative image pleasing to the senses, so that it seems to the person as though he has already fully attained the goal of prayer. As one man well-versed in the matter (Evagrius) said, this arises from the passion of vanity, from a demonic touch upon a certain part of the brain, and from a disturbance (or inflammation) in the nerves there.

74. I believe that the demon, by touching the aforementioned part of the brain as he pleases, transforms the light surrounding the mind; from this, vanity stirs up a thought that compels the mind to frivolously attribute to itself divine and essential knowledge. Since he is not troubled by impure carnal passions, but stands pure in prayer, it does not occur to him that there might be any hostile activity at work here,—and he becomes convinced that this is indeed a divine manifestation, whereas it actually originated from a demon who, employing the utmost cunning, alters the light associated with the mind through the brain—as we have said—and shapes the mind itself (giving it a form—or causing it to imagine one thing or another).

75. The angel of God, once he appears, in a word puts an end to the enemy's activity within us and prompts the light of the mind to act without deception.

76. What is said in Revelation about the Angel—that he brings incense “to offer with the prayers of the saints” (Rev. 8:3)—I believe points to this grace, which acts through the Angel and imparts the ability to pray truly; so that the mind may finally dwell in prayer without confusion of thought, without despondency, and without timidity.

77. The vials of incense are, as it is said there, “the prayers of the saints,” which were offered by “the twenty-four elders” (Rev. 5:8). By the vial one must understand communion with God, or perfect, spiritual love for Him, in which prayer is offered in spirit and in truth.

78. When you think that during your prayer you have no need to weep over your sins, then see how far you are from God—since you are bound to abide in Him always—and you will shed the warmest tears.

79. Truly, this is so: having recognized your true state (your poverty and insignificance), you will weep with sweetness, lamenting yourself like Isaiah—as one who is “unclean and has unclean lips” and lives among such a people, that is, adversaries (of God—unclean forces or thoughts), you dare to stand before the Lord of Hosts (Isa. 6:5).

80. If you pray sincerely, you will receive full confirmation in many things, and the angels will gather around you, just as they did with Daniel, and enlighten you with the knowledge of the reasons why things happen.

81. Know that the angels inspire us to pray and stand with us in prayer, rejoicing and praying together for us. Thus, if we are negligent and entertain evil thoughts, we greatly anger them; for while they labor so hard on our behalf, we do not wish to implore God for ourselves, but by neglecting our service to God and abandoning their God and Lord, we converse with unclean demons (in our thoughts).

82. Pray peacefully and serenely; sing sensibly and cheerfully—and you will be like an eagle's chick soaring to the heights.

83. Singing psalms lulls the passions to sleep and tames the urges of bodily intemperance; and prayer attunes the mind to the intelligent activity proper to it.

84. Prayer is an activity befitting the dignity of the mind, or rather, its true use.

85. Singing psalms is an expression of manifold wisdom; and prayer is the prelude to spiritual knowledge.

86. Contemplation is a beautiful activity; it aids prayer by stirring the mind's intellectual power toward the contemplation of divine knowledge.

87. If you have not yet received the gift of prayer or psalm-singing, ask persistently, and you will receive it.

88. “And the Lord told them a parable to the effect that they ought always to pray and not lose heart” (Luke 18:1). Therefore, do not grieve or lose heart because you have not yet received it; for you will receive it in due time. The Lord added this to the parable: “If I do not fear God and am not ashamed before men, yet because this widow keeps troubling me, I will avenge her” (–5). So too, “God will soon bring vengeance to those who cry out to Him day and night” (–7). Be content, then, with diligent patience as you persevere in prayer.

89. Do not wish that what concerns you should be as you think is best, but as it pleases God; and you will be serene and grateful in your prayer.

90. Even if it seems that you are already with God, beware of the demon of lust; for he is very seductive and cunning, and strives in every way to overcome the resolve of your sober mind and to distract it from God, even when it stands before God with reverence and fear.

91. If you delight in prayer, prepare yourself for demonic temptations and patiently endure their scourges, for like wild beasts they will attack you and tear your whole body to pieces.

92. Be prepared, like an experienced fighter—do not waver, even if you suddenly see a ghost; do not be dismayed, even if a sword is drawn against you or a torch is held to your face; do not lose heart (do not be afraid), even if some hideous and treacherous apparition appears to you; but stand firm, professing the true faith, and look boldly upon your enemies.

93. Whoever endures sorrow will also be granted joy; and whoever endures hardship will not be deprived of a share in what is pleasant.

94. Be careful that the crafty demons do not deceive you with any vision. (If something like this happens,) remain composed, turn to prayer, and ask God that, if it is from Him (for your edification), He Himself may enlighten you; and if not, that He may quickly drive the deceiver away from you. And take courage; for these dogs will not stand their ground when you turn to God with fervent supplication, but, being struck invisibly and imperceptibly by God's power, they will flee far from you.

95. You must also be aware of the following trickery of the demons. Sometimes they divide themselves into groups. Some come to tempt you. And when you seek help, others enter in the form of angels and drive away the first ones, so that you may be deceived into thinking they are real angels and fall into the conceit that you are worthy of such a thing.

96. Try to be as humble and courageous as possible—and the demons' hostile attack will not touch your soul, nor will their scourge come near your body. "The Lord will command His angel concerning you" (Ps. 90:10–11) "to guard you"; and they will invisibly ward off from you every hostile act.

97. Although one who strives to maintain pure prayer will hear noise, clamour, cries, and curses from the demons, he will not be led astray in thought nor surrender to them, saying to God: "I will not fear evil, for You are with me" (Ps. 22:4), and similar words.

98. During such temptations, offer up constantly a brief but fervent prayer.

99. If the demons threaten you, saying they will suddenly appear in the air to astonish you and rob you of your mind, do not fear them and pay no heed whatsoever to such threats. They are merely trying to intimidate you to see whether you regard them as anything at all or have already completely disregarded them.

100. If you have presented yourself in prayer before God the Almighty, the Creator and Provider, why do you stand before Him so foolishly, abandoning your fear of Him—which is unshakable—and instead fearing flies and mosquitoes? Or do you not hear what the Prophet says: "You shall fear the Lord your God" (Deut. 10:20)—and also: "All fear Him and tremble at the sight of His power"—and so on (2 Chron. 36, the prayer of Manasseh).

101. Just as bread serves as food for the body and virtue for the soul, so spiritual prayer is food for the mind.

102. Pray in the sacred place of prayer not like a Pharisee but like the tax collector, so that you too may be justified by the Lord.

103. Strive not to pray against anyone in your prayer, lest you destroy what you are building by making your prayer abominable (before God).

104. Let the debtor of the "talent of darkness" teach you that if you do not forgive your debtor, you yourself will not be forgiven; for it is said, "He will hand him over to the torturer" (Matt. 18:34).

105. Set aside your physical needs during your time of prayer (before God), so that the bite of a flea, a mosquito, or a fly does not deprive you of the greatest gain that prayer brings.

106. It has been reported to us that when a certain saint stood to pray, the evil one opposed him so fiercely that as soon as he raised his hands, the evil one, transforming himself into a lion, raised his front paws and, sinking his claws into the ascetic's sides, did not retreat until the saint lowered his hands. But he never lowered them until he had finished his usual prayers.

107. Such was also, as we know, John the Little—or rather, the greatest monk—who remained in constant spiritual communion with God even as a demon in the form of a dragon coiled around him, gnawed at his flesh, and spat it in his face.

108. You have surely read the lives of the monks of Tavenisi, where it is said that when Abba Theodore was speaking to the brothers, two vipers crawled up to his feet, but he, without the slightest disturbance, arched his feet as if forming a vault and, letting the vipers pass beneath them, continued his speech to the end; and only then did he show them to the brothers, recounting the incident.

109. We have also read about another spiritual brother who, while he was praying, had an echidna crawl up and touch his foot; but he did not lower his hands until he had finished his usual prayer. And this man, who loved God more than himself, suffered no harm.

110. Keep your eyes focused during prayer, free from distractions, and, having detached yourself from the flesh and the soul, live by the mind.

111. To another certain saint, a steadfast man of prayer who lived in silence in the desert, demons appeared and, for two weeks, played with him as if he were a ball, tossing him up and catching him on a mat; yet they could not in the least divert his mind from his fervent prayer.

112. To yet another God-loving monk, as he was offering mental prayer while walking through the desert, two angels appeared and walked alongside him, with him in their midst. But he did not turn his attention to them even for a moment, lest he suffer loss in what was best, for he remembered the words of the Apostle, who says: “Neither angels nor principalities nor powers can separate us from the love of Christ” (Rom. 8:38–39).

113. Through prayer, a monk becomes like an angel, longing “to see the face of the Father who is in heaven” (Matt. 18:10).

114. By no means desire or seek to see any face or image during prayer.

115. Do not desire to see Angels, or Powers, or Christ with your physical senses, lest you lose your mind by mistaking the wolf for the shepherd and worshiping the enemies—the demons.

116. The beginning of the mind’s delusion is vanity; when the mind is driven by it, it attempts to describe the Divinity in some form or image.

117. I will say what I have already told the beginners: blessed is the mind that maintains perfect silence during prayer.

118. Blessed is the mind that, praying without distraction, receives an ever-increasing longing for God.

119. Blessed is the mind that, during prayer, is detached from material things and free from greed.

120. Blessed is the mind that, during prayer, maintains complete indifference to all things.

121. Blessed is the monk who honors every person as if he were a god after God.

122. Blessed is the monk who regards the salvation and prosperity of all as his own.

123. Blessed is the monk who regards himself as the refuse of all.

124. A monk is one who, while separating himself from everyone, remains in unity with all.

125. A monk is one who regards himself as being with everyone and sees himself in each person.

126. He who always offers his every first thought to God as a fruit of prayer.

127. Avoid all lies and all oaths, as a monk who earnestly desires to pray; otherwise, you take on a guise that is not your own in vain.

128. If you wish to pray in the Spirit, borrow nothing from the flesh—and you will not have a cloud of darkness spreading before you during prayer.

129. Entrust your physical needs to God—and it will become clear that you are entrusting your spiritual needs to Him as well.

130. If you are deemed worthy to receive the promises, you will reign. Should you not, then, in view of this, bear your present poverty with joy?

131. Do not turn away from poverty and the sorrows of life—these are the instruments (wings) of light prayer.

132. Let your bodily virtues be a pledge of your spiritual virtues, your spiritual virtues a pledge of your innermost virtues, and these a pledge of knowledge of the immaterial and the essential.

133. If, while praying against a certain thought, you notice that it subsides quickly and easily, examine the cause of this so that you do not fall into a trap and, having been deceived, become a traitor to yourself.

134. It sometimes happens that demons, having planted certain thoughts in you, themselves prompt you to pray against them and resist them—and then immediately flee—so that you may fall into delusion, imagining that you have already begun to overcome your thoughts and strike fear into the demons.

135. If you pray against any passion or any demon that is tormenting you, remember the words of the Psalmist: “I will pursue my enemies and overtake them; I will not turn back until they are destroyed. I will strike them down so that they cannot stand; they will fall at my feet,” and so on (Ps. 17, 38–39). But say this at the right time, arming yourself against your adversaries with humility.

136. Do not think to acquire virtue without first fighting for it to the point of shedding blood. According to the Divine Apostle, we must strive against sin until death, so that we may remain blameless (Heb. 12: 4).

137. It sometimes happens that, having done a good deed for one person, you suffer harm from another (through the enemy’s schemes), so that, when faced with slander, you say or do something inappropriate, and in this way squander the good you have gathered. Such is the aim of the crafty demons. Therefore, you must watch over yourself wisely.

138. When you are subjected to the demons' attacks against you, take every possible care not to fall into their bondage.

139. At night, the wicked demons themselves seek to disturb the spiritual teacher; and during the day—through people, surrounding him with unpleasant incidents, slander, and misfortunes caused by them.

140. Do not refuse to endure these rough clothes. Let them beat and trample you, stretch and smooth you; but through this, your garment becomes brighter.

141. Until you have completely renounced your passions and your mind still shows resistance to virtue and truth, you will not find fragrant incense within your heart (i.e., pure and warm prayer).

142. Do you wish to pray (as you ought)? By turning away from this world, make your dwelling always in heaven—not merely in words, but through angelic deeds and the most divine understanding.

143. If, only when in distress (facing severe temptations, in danger of falling), you remember the Judge—how fearsome and unyielding He is—then you have not yet learned to “serve the Lord with fear and rejoice before Him with trembling” (Ps. 2:11). Know that during times of spiritual joy and comfort, it is even more fitting to serve Him with fear and reverence.

144. Wise is the person who, before achieving perfect repentance, does not cease to remember with sorrow his sins and the just punishment for them in the eternal fire.

145. Let the one who remains in sin and in provoking God's wrath—and who shamelessly dares to reach for the knowledge of divine things and for spiritual prayer—accept the Apostolic prohibition that it is not safe for him to pray with his head uncovered. Such a soul, to use the words of the Apostle, “must have an angel standing over her head” for the sake of those present (1 Cor. 11:10), having clothed herself in modesty and the humility befitting a humble person.

146. Just as it does no good for a person with eye problems to gaze long and intently at the sun in the strongest light at high noon, so it does no good for a passionate and impure mind to imagine a terrifying and supernatural prayer in spirit and truth; on the contrary, the Divinity will raise up indignation against him.

147. If the One who lacks nothing and shows no partiality does not accept one who comes to the altar with an offering until he has been reconciled with his neighbor who is grieving over him (Matt. 5: 23), then consider what self-restraint and what prudence are needed to offer incense pleasing to God on the altar of the mind.

148. Do not be a lover of words or a lover of glory; otherwise, it will be evident that “sinners are at work” not “on your back” but on your face (Ps. 128:3). And you will become a laughingstock to them during prayer, drawn away and enticed by them into unfocused thoughts.

149. Attention that seeks prayer will find prayer. Nothing better follows attention than prayer, and it is prayer that deserves our utmost care.

150. Just as sight is superior to all the other senses, so prayer is more divine than all the virtues.

151. The merit of prayer lies not only in quantity but also in quality. This is shown by “those who went into the temple to pray” (Luke 18:10) and by the following words: “And when you pray, do not use vain repetitions,” and so on (Matthew 6:7).

152. As long as you pay attention only to the posture of the body befitting prayer and your mind is concerned only with the outward beauty of the tabernacle (and other external aspects of prayer... see Chapter 44), know that you have not yet seen the place of prayer, but that the blessed path to it is still far from you.

153. When, standing in prayer, you rise above every other joy, then (know that) you have truly found prayer.⁷³

154. Prayer and reading are wonderful; they put an end to the vain wandering of thoughts, restraining the mind that wanders where it ought not to, and usefully keeping it focused on this beautiful occupation without the slightest distraction (1:16).

155. Prayer prepares us for conversation with God, and through long practice in this, it brings us into fellowship with Him—with Him who accepts even the lowliest of people into His love and is not ashamed of friendly closeness with them, as long as the love dwelling within them gives them boldness (1:17).

156. Prayer detaches the mind from every thought of the sensual, lifting it up to God Himself, who exists above all things, so that we may converse with Him and boldly ask Him for whatever we wish; and in this way enables a person to live a life of purity, as one who has already been in communion with God and is soon afterward preparing once more for that communion (1:19).

157. Paul teaches us to “persevere in prayer” (Rom. 12:12), establishing in ourselves the habit of prayer through continuous practice (Col. 4:2; Eph. 6:18). He also commands us to “pray in every place” (1 Tim. 2:8), so that no negligent person may excuse himself by claiming to live far from a place of worship. Every place is suitable for prayer. God accepts those who call upon Him with a pure heart and righteous deeds, and, considering their disposition, hears their supplications, even if the place where they call upon Him, in our opinion, is no different from any other (1:20).

158. Sometimes during a vigil, one should read the psalms quickly, and at other times, one should give preference to singing the psalms. We must vary our approach, in opposition to the wiles of our enemies, who sometimes inspire us to rush through the text in haste, because our souls are overcome by despondency, and sometimes incite us to majestic, melodious singing (1, 234).

159. When an enemy thought assails your heart, do not seek this or that through prayer, but sharpen the sword of tears against the enemy. By confronting the enemy with such powerful armor, we will more quickly force him to retreat from us.

160. Love to practice manual labor—but even more so, the remembrance of prayer; for the former does not always bear fruit, whereas the latter constantly yields the fruit of its labor. Do not interrupt your prayer until you have fully fulfilled your duty of prayer, and do not heed the thought that it is time to sit down to work; likewise, when you are at work, do not become overly absorbed in your task, lest, in your haste, you disturb your heart and render it unfit for prayer.

161. A mind from which the thought of God has been stolen and which has grown distant from remembering Him sins indifferently even through the external senses: for neither the ear nor the tongue is any longer capable of serving as a guardian of such a mind, because the commitment to ascetic self-discipline has departed from within it (1, 244).

162. It happens that we strive to offer pure prayer and are unable to do so; but it also happens that we do not force ourselves, yet the soul remains in pure prayer. The former stems from our weakness, while the latter comes from grace from above, which calls us thereby to seek purity of soul, teaching us through both to not take credit for ourselves if we pray purely, but to acknowledge in this the gift of the One who grants it. “For we do not know how to pray as we ought” (Rom. 8:26). When we strive to make our prayer pure and cannot, but are instead clouded by darkness, then, with tears streaming down our cheeks, let us implore God that the night of strife may be dispelled and light may shine in our soul (1, 264).

163. The recollection of carnal desires is disturbing; for not only does it prevent us from conversing with God, but it even defiles the mind—which appears to be praying—with fantasies of vile images. It is good to remain constantly in prayer and to train the mind in conversation with God. But is this how it happens with us?—Often, distracted from the words of prayer, we follow the thoughts that lead us astray, neither rejecting them nor being distressed by them—which would be a sign of the will’s disagreement with those who suggest what is improper. Although outwardly we appear to be praying—for, with our knees bent, we seem to those watching us to be praying—in our minds we imagine something pleasant, converse amiably with friends, speak ill of our enemies in anger, feast with guests, build houses for relatives, plant trees, travel, engage in trade, are forcibly drawn into the priesthood, manage the affairs of the churches entrusted to us with great prudence, and go over most of all this in our minds, agreeing to whatever our thoughts suggest, allowing our hearts to be disposed to it as our passions please (– 2, 129–130).

164. Prayer requires that the mind be pure of every thought and admit nothing into itself that is not prayerful, even if it be honorable; but that, as one inspired by God, having detached oneself from all things, one may engage in conversation with Him alone (2, 131).

165. Whoever divides their time between manual labor and prayer tames the body through work and brings its disorderly demands under control, while the soul—which, laboring alongside the body, ultimately longs for rest—is thereby disposed toward prayer as an easier task and is led to it with zeal and vigor. For she finds comfort in the change of activity and the transition from one to another, whereas she grows weary when engaged in the same thing for a long time; she is burdened by monotony but rejoices in the variety of activities; it seems to her that by setting aside one task, she is, as it were, casting off all weariness, which is why she approaches the next with what seem to be fresh energies, as if she were just beginning to work⁷⁴ – (2, 231. 232).

166. Whoever does not love to work nourishes their passions through inactivity and gives free rein to their desires to rush toward objects that appeal to them—which is most evident during prayer; for then the mind’s attention is entirely absorbed by what occupies the heart, and it does nothing but sift through in its thoughts the suggestions stirred up by the passion that has been set in motion, instead of conversing with God and asking Him for what is beneficial to itself. Knowing this, St. Paul zealously attacks idleness and, by his apostolic authority, obliges everyone to work (2 Thess. 3:6–12). Work is an anchor for the mind and gives it a safe direction. Let storms approach from all sides, and let gusts of wind threaten to wreck the ship; thought stands firm, held steady by work as by an anchor; it may be somewhat agitated by rising thoughts, but it is not swept into danger, because the bonds that hold it are stronger than the winds that drive it (2, 232, 234).

167. Those who refuse to engage in manual labor under the pretext that one must pray ceaselessly do not, in fact, pray at all. By thinking that idleness will free the soul from cares, they entangle it in a labyrinth of inescapable thoughts and thereby render it incapable of prayer. A body engaged in work keeps the mind focused; the mind, no less than the eyes, must observe what is being done and assist the body in performing its actions without error, whereas a body at rest gives the mind free rein to wander; for during rest, passions are aroused, and with every lustful recollection they carry off the mind and take possession of it as a captive (2, 234. 5).

168. There is a supreme prayer of the perfect—a kind of rapture of the mind, its complete detachment from the sensory realm, when, through the inarticulate sighs of the spirit, it draws near to God, Who sees the disposition of the heart, open like a written book, and expressing its will in wordless images. Thus Paul was caught up to the third heaven and did not know “whether he was in the body or out of the body” (2 Cor. 12:2) (2, 235).

169. After (below) the first comes the second kind of prayer, when words are spoken, and the mind follows them with devotion, knowing to Whom it is addressing its supplication.

170. But prayer that is interrupted by (base) thoughts and mingled with bodily concerns is far from the state befitting one who prays. Such a person does not even hear himself, his thoughts wandering here and there, and he does not remember what words he is uttering. But if the one praying is like this, will the Divine ear heed that which he himself, in his distraction, does not heed? In the words of those who said, “Hear my prayer; give ear to my supplication” (Ps. 16: 1), and “Let Your ears be attentive to the voice of my supplication” (Ps. 129: 2), their entire mind was carefully focused there and did not wander off, as is usually the case with the uncontrolled thoughts of the careless (2, 236).

2. On the Eight Evil Spirits

1. On Gluttony

1. The beginning of fruitfulness is blossoming, and the beginning of an active life is self-restraint.
2. The mind that restrains the stomach diminishes the passions, but the mind overcome by gluttony multiplies lustful desires.
3. The origin of tongues is Amalik, and the origin of passions is gluttony.
4. Fire is fed by wood, and the belly is fed by food.
5. An abundance of firewood kindles a great flame, and an abundance of food nourishes lust.
6. A flame dies out as fuel runs out, and a scarcity of food dries up lust.
7. The desire for food gave rise to disobedience, and the sweet taste of it drove us out of paradise.
8. Delicious foods delight the throat, but they also feed the ever-rising worm of lust.
9. An empty stomach prepares one for vigil in prayer, while a full one induces deep sleep.
10. Sobering reflection comes with fasting, while a life of plenty and contentment plunges the mind into a deep slumber.
11. The prayer of the fasting person is like an eagle’s chick soaring high, while the prayer of the one who has feasted falls to the ground, weighed down by satiety.

⁷⁴ This chapter and the next are directed against the Euchites.

12. The mind of the fasting person is a bright star in a clear sky, while the mind of the one who has feasted is as gloomy as the sky on a moonless night.

13. Fog hides the sun's rays, and the thick vapor of consumed food clouds the mind.

14. A stained mirror does not clearly reflect the features of the image within it; and the power of the mind, clouded by gluttony, cannot receive God's knowledge.

15. Land left uncultivated for a long time produces thorns; and the mind of a glutton breeds shameful thoughts.

16. Just as one cannot find fragrance in dung, so too can one not find the fragrance of contemplation in a glutton.

17. The eye of the glutton looks for feasts, and the eye of the temperate one looks for gatherings of the wise.

18. The soul of the glutton counts the days of remembrance of the martyrs, while the soul of the temperate imitates their way of life.

19. A timid warrior trembles at the sound of the trumpet heralding battle, while the glutton trembles at the announcement of the beginning of fasting.

20. A gluttonous monk is a slave to his belly, and under its whip he pays his daily tribute.

21. A hasty traveler soon reaches the city, and a monk who practices self-restraint reaches peace of mind.

22. A slow traveler (having not reached any settlements) spends the night in the open field; and a gluttonous monk will never reach the home of detachment.

23. The burning of incense perfumes the air—and the prayer of the self-restrained is God's fragrance.

24. If you give in to the lust for filling your belly, nothing will be enough to satisfy your gluttony; for gluttony is a fire that consumes fuel and always demands more.

25. A sufficient measure (of whatever is poured into a vessel) fills the vessel, but the stomach, even when full, will not say, "Enough."

26. The lifting up of the hands put Amalek to flight, and deeds directed toward heaven overcome carnal passions.

27. Destroy within yourself everything that stirs up passions, and firmly put to death your carnal members.

28. Just as a slain enemy does not arouse fear in you, so a mortified body will not disturb your soul.

29. Just as a dead body feels no pain from fire, so the self-controlled person feels no pleasure from dead lust.

30. If you strike down an Egyptian, bury him in the sand—that is, if you conquer lustful passion, do not satisfy the body (or keep it on a dry diet); for just as what was hidden in the earth sprouts when it is watered, so too does the lustful passion hidden within the body blossom when it is satisfied.

31. A flame that has died down flares up brightly again if new dry twigs are added; and lustful desire, once extinguished, is revived by the satisfaction of the belly with food.

32. Do not take pity on the body when it begins to complain of exhaustion, nor satisfy it fully with foods it desires; for if it regains its strength, it will rise up against you and wage an irreconcilable war against you until it captures your soul and delivers you into slavery to the passion of fornication.

33. A body fed sparingly is like a well-trained horse that will never throw off its rider. A horse—held in check by the bridle—yields and obeys the rider's hand; and a body, tamed by frugal eating and vigilance, does not break free from the grasp of the thought that sits upon it, nor does it neigh, as it does when driven by a passionate impulse.

34. Overindulgence in food nourishes thoughts, and the drunkard fills his sleep with dreams (1. 248).

35. The pleasure of indulgence dies as soon as the food has passed through the throat, but in this coffin, lust comes to life.

36. The toil of cultivating one's plot of land ends in rest; but various kinds of pleasures end in burning (whether carnal here, or punitive there).

37. Whoever, through his labors, causes the bloom of the flesh to wither, thinks daily in the flesh of his own death (for the weariness of the flesh compels him to think ceaselessly of death) (1. 249).

38. Let the prudence of the heart adjust the labor of self-restraint to the condition of the body, so that when the body weakens, he himself may not suffer.

39. Let the flesh be content with the limited satisfaction of its natural needs.

40. Let your bodily asceticism be directed toward moral ends, so that you may learn to grieve in your heart (over sins) and to mourn in your soul.

41. The mother of sensuality (lust) is gluttony: for it gives rise to sensual lust and many other passions. From it, like shoots from a root, other passions sprout; and soon, having become trees equal to the one that begot them, they branch out into vices that reach up to the heavens. Thus, greed, anger, and sorrow are the offspring and growth of gluttony. First and foremost, the glutton needs money to satisfy his ever-burning desire, even though it is never satisfied; then, he must become angry at those who stand in the way of acquiring money; and when anger is powerless to act, sorrow necessarily follows (2, 73).

42. Gluttony is most closely related to the lustful impulse. And nature itself, wishing to demonstrate the kinship of these passions, has placed the organs of copulation beneath the belly, signifying by this proximity their close connection. Therefore, when this passion (lust) weakens, it does so because of the depletion of what lies above—that is, the belly; and when it intensifies and is set in motion, it draws its strength from there. But gluttony is not merely the nourisher and sustainer of this passion; it destroys all that is good in a person. As soon as it gains the upper hand, self-restraint, chastity, courage, patience, and all other virtues usually fall away and vanish from the soul (2, 76).

43. It is excellent to remain within the bounds of necessity and to strive with all one's might not to transgress them. If lust draws someone even slightly toward the pleasures of this life, then no words will be powerful enough to halt their forward momentum (in that direction). For there is no limit to what exceeds necessity; but insatiable concern and endless, unbridled restlessness multiply the labor (required to satisfy them) without measure, and feed lust, just as a flame is fed by the addition of firewood (2, 88).

2. On Fornication

1. Abstinence gives rise to chastity; gluttony, however, is the mother of lustful desire.

2. Oil nourishes the flame of a lamp; but consorting with women kindles the fire of lustful desire.

3. Just as an unladen ship is tossed back and forth by the waves, so too is an unrestrained mind tossed about by wayward thoughts.

4. Lust makes satiety its own, joins the ranks of the mind's adversaries, and fights against it to the very end alongside its enemies.

5. He who loves silence is hard to wound by this enemy's arrows; but he who mingles with the crowd receives constant wounds from him.

6. A woman's gaze is a poisonous arrow that wounds the soul and pours poison into it; and the longer this wound festers, the greater the damage it causes.

7. Whoever guards himself against these arrows does not attend crowded gatherings or wander aimlessly at festivals. For it is better to remain quietly at home and devote oneself to prayer than, thinking to honor the festivals, to become easy prey for one's enemies.

8. Avoid associating with women if you wish to remain chaste, and never give them the freedom to treat you boldly; for at first they either genuinely possess or feign a timid modesty, but later they dare to do anything. – And this becomes for you a snare leading to death, a cunningly woven net dragging you into ruin. Let them not deceive you with modest words; for in them, too, is hidden the evil poison of a beast (a beast from the abyss).

9. It is better to approach a burning fire than a young woman when you yourself are young: for when you feel the pain of the fire as you draw near, you will immediately leap away, but once you are lulled by a woman's words, you will not leave so quickly.

10. Grass growing by the water withers, and the passion of debauchery arises in the company of women.

11. Whoever fills his belly and promises to be chaste is like one who claims that straw will stop the action of fire. Just as it is impossible to hold back the rush of a spreading fire with straw, so it is impossible to stop the burning desire for immorality through satiety.

12. A pillar rests upon its foundation—and the lustful passion rests upon satiety.

13. A ship tossed by the waves hastens to the harbor, but a chaste soul seeks the wilderness. The ship flees from the dangerous waves of the sea, and the soul flees from the faces of women that bring ruin.

14. The sight of a well-dressed woman drowns one worse than the waves. From the waves, one can still swim out of love for life; but the sight of a woman, alluring as it is, causes one to neglect even life itself.

15. A desert bush is safe from the flames of fire—and the chaste man, far from women, is safe from the ignition of the passion of immorality: for just as the memory of fire does not burn the mind, so too does passion have no power when it has no fuel.

16. If you show mercy to your adversary, you will have an enemy; and if you spare this passion, it will rise up against you.

17. For the intemperate, a glance at a woman stirs up lewd passion, but for the chaste, it inclines him to the glorification of God.

18. If lustful passion remains calm when dealing with women, do not believe in the dispassion she promises. For even a dog, surrounded by a crowd, wags its tail, but when it leaves the crowd, it immediately reveals its inherent ferocity.

19. When your thoughts of a woman become dispassionate, then conclude that you have entered the realm of chastity. But when the image of her that you conjure up takes hold of your soul, then know that you are still far from this virtue. Yet even in the first case, do not dwell on such thoughts, and do not converse mentally with the image of a woman for too long; for this passion loves to return—and the danger it poses is near.

20. Just as moderate smelting purifies silver, while smelting beyond measure causes it to be lost; so too does the habit of chastity spoil the prolonged mental image of a woman.

21. Do not dwell long on the image of a person who has come to mind, lest it kindle in you the flame of sensual desire and set the threshing floor of your soul ablaze.

22. Just as a spark left in straw for a long time produces a flame, so too does prolonged remembrance of a woman kindle lust.

* * *

23. If you subdue the flesh that lusts against the spirit through ascetic labors, then beyond this age you will receive the glory promised in the Beatitudes, as one who has triumphed in battle against the one who, within your body, “wages war against the law of your mind,” and enslaves you “by the law of sin that is in your members” (Rom. 7: 23) (1, 230).

24. Understand that certain kinds of fornication are combined—physical fornication and spiritual fornication. When a fornicatory thought merges with your spirit, then your soul unites with the seductive imprint within it (1, 247–8).

25. The demon takes on the form of a woman to seduce the soul into union with him. An incorporeal demon assumes the form of a woman in order to lead the soul into fornication through lustful thoughts. Do not be carried away by a phantom that has no substance, lest you do something similar in the flesh. All those who do not repel inner adultery with the cross are seduced by the spirit of fornication.

26. Punish your thoughts with meager food, so that they may think not of fornication but of hunger.

27. Combine your tears with prayerful vigil to receive help in this true battle.

28. During the battle against lust, refuse invitations to feasts.

29. The demon of debauchery attacks the zealous ascetic warrior swiftly, suddenly showering him with arrows of passionate lust, for he cannot long endure the burning heat of the luminous fire emanating from the ascetic’s labors; and to the one who, weakened in the strictness of self-restraint by the allure of lustful pleasures, the demon gradually creeps up to converse with his heart, so that, inflamed by evil desires, it may give itself over to conversation with them, be captivated by them, and completely set aside its hatred for this sin (1, 252–3).

30. It is most dangerous when the heart has become mired in the habit of lustful pleasures, and it takes great effort to cut this (passionate) weed off at the root.

31. Do not accustom your thoughts to engaging in conversation with the delights of lust, for in the midst of passionate thoughts and movements, a fire is kindled (Ps. 105:18). By inflaming you, they will make you think that it is difficult to restrain the fire of the flesh, that you are no longer able to resist your nature—and that even if you sin today out of necessity, you will repent tomorrow as commanded. For the (Christian) law is merciful—it readily forgives the sinner who repents. At the same time, they will present to you as an example how some, after practicing abstinence, fell and repented again, lending credibility to their deceptive counsel—so that, by breaking down the resolve of your resistance with this hope of an easy return through repentance, they might turn the temple of chastity into a house of fornication (1, 253–4).

32. Behold, you who practice abstinence: do not be deceived by unknown hopes under the pretext of repentance. For many, having fallen, are immediately snatched away by death, while others were unable to rise (from their fall), bound by their habit of lustful pleasures as if by law. How do you know, O man, whether you will live or whether you will repent, that you set a limit on the years of your life?—By falling into this, you indulge your flesh, whereas you ought rather to devote yourself to the remembrance of death, so that you may more vividly picture in your heart the dreadful judgment to come, and thereby extinguish the scheming of your inflamed flesh.

33. The Creator has prescribed the same natural way of life for both us and the animals; “I give you,” God says to man, “every plant in the field; it shall be food for you and for the animals” (Gen. 1:29–30). Therefore, having received the same sustenance as the dumb creatures and, through our own ingenuity, having transformed it into something more luxurious, should we not justly be considered less rational than the dumb creatures, since the beasts remain within the bounds of nature, not violating what God has ordained, while we—human beings, endowed with reason—have completely strayed from the ancient law? For what delicacies do the animals have? What bakers and chefs, with a thousand arts, prepare delights for their meager bellies? Do they not love their ancient frugality, feeding on grass, content with whatever comes their way, and drinking water—and even that only rarely? That is why they indulge in carnal pleasures less often, not inflaming their desires with any fattening food, and not always knowing the difference between the male and female sexes. For nature grants them this desire only at one time of the year, when the natural law, as a means of perpetuating the species, has ordained that they mate to produce offspring like themselves; at other times, however, they shun one another to such an extent that they completely forget this desire. But in humans, sumptuous feasts have sown an insatiable lust for sexual pleasure, stirring up frenzied desires and never allowing the passion to subside at any time (2, 90).

3. On Greed

1. Greed is the root of all evil; like withered branches, it nourishes all other passions and prevents what has flourished from it from withering away.

2. Let anyone who wishes to eradicate the passions first uproot this source of them; but as long as greed for money remains, you will gain nothing by cutting off the branches; for even if they are cut off, they will soon grow back.

3. A monk who is greedy for possessions is like an overloaded ship, easily sunk by the waves raised by a storm.

4. A monk who is not greedy is a light traveler, finding shelter wherever he goes.

5. A monk who is not greedy for possessions is a soaring eagle, descending only when compelled by the need for food.

6. Such a one is above all temptation, scoffs at all that is earthly, and, soaring high, withdraws from all things earthly and dwells with the heavenly; for his wings are light, unburdened by cares.

7. When sorrow comes, he leaves his dwelling without grief; when death arrives, he departs from here contentedly, for he has not bound his soul with any earthly ties.

8. But the avaricious man is entangled in cares and bound like a dog on a chain; if forced to move, he carries with him the sorrowful memory of his possessions as a heavy and useless burden.

9. When death comes, he leaves the present with regret; he gives up his soul, yet his eyes never leave what he possesses—and he is dragged away by force, like a fugitive slave; he is separated from his body, but not from his possessions, for his passion holds him back more strongly than those who drag him away.

10. The sea is never filled, even as it receives many rivers, and the avaricious man’s greed is never satisfied by the wealth he has already amassed; he has doubled it—and desires to double the doubled amount again; and he never ceases to double it until death puts an end to this futile labor.

11. A prudent monk considers only the body’s needs—and fills his empty stomach with nothing but bread and water.

12. He will not flatter the rich to gratify his stomach, nor will he enslave his free mind to many masters; for his hands alone are enough to serve the body, satisfying its natural needs.

13. The non-acquisitive monk is an elusive warrior and a light-footed runner, quickly attaining “the honor of the higher calling” (Phil. 3:14).

14. A monk who is greedy rejoices in many sources of income, while the non-greedy monk rejoices in the crowns of success.

15. A monk who loves wealth works hard, while the unworldly monk spends his time in prayer and reading.

16. A monk who loves money fills his treasuries with silver, while the non-greedy one gathers treasure in heaven.

17. Cursed is the one who makes an idol and places it “in secret” (Deut. 27:15). But the same is true of the one who harbors a passion for the love of money. The former worships a false god to no avail, while the latter secretly carries the dream of wealth in his heart, like an idol.

* * *

18. The non-greedy person lives a carefree life, while for the greedy, the pursuit of wealth is a constant affliction (1, 237).

19. You will take the multitude of thoughts captive when you do not give your heart over to concerns about material things. Then you will bear your cross without distraction when you renounce the desire to own property.

20. The thought of material gain foretells old age and illness for you, so that you may divide your hope in God with your hope in possessions.

21. Let the one who has chosen the ascetic life in renunciation of the world be enveloped by faith, strengthened by love, and established by hope. Faith is not being left with nothing, but is an unshakable conviction of possessing what is most perfect, with patient hope and living love.

22. When you have renounced all things, do not heed the dark thoughts that will reproach you for your poverty, presenting to you your present circumstances—scarcity in everything, destitution, and disgrace—so that through such malice they might lead you to regret such a glorious virtue. But if you ponder the wisdom of such asceticism, you will soon find that for the very things for which you are reproached, a crown will be woven for you.

23. Let us set aside worldly affairs and turn to spiritual blessings. How long will we remain engrossed in childish games, without in the least adopting a manly way of thinking? In childhood, dice, balls, and the like serve as entertainment—and children are fond of them until they reach maturity. But when someone becomes a man, he casts all this aside and devotes himself wholeheartedly to important matters. Yet we all remain in infancy, marveling at what is proper to childhood and unwilling to concern ourselves with what is better—that which is fitting for men. Just as it is shameful to see a mature man sitting on a heap of ashes and drawing childish games in the ashes; so it is shameful—or far more shameful—to see those who have their sights set on the enjoyment of eternal blessings wallowing in the dust of earthly things, and by the incongruity of such actions bringing shame upon the dignity of their vow. The reason for this, it seems, is that we cannot imagine anything more important than what is visible; we do not realize the insignificance of present blessings and the superiority of those in the hereafter; and, blinded by the splendor of what is here regarded as honorable, we cling to it with all our desire (2, 81).

24. Let us, then, begin to renounce present goods; let us disregard property and money, and everything that draws us in and drowns our thoughts. Like a ship tossed by a storm, let us cast off the cargo so that the helmsman—the mind—and the passengers—our thoughts—may be saved. If those sailing the sea during a storm do not care about their cargo and with their own hands throw even precious items into the sea, placing possessions below life itself, then why do we not, for the sake of a better life, disregard that which drags the soul into the abyss? Why is our fear of God not as strong as their fear of the sea? They, out of love for this temporary life, do not highly value the loss of what they are carrying; but we, claiming to desire eternal life, do not even disregard trifles—we would rather perish with a worthless burden than be saved by parting with it. – Therefore, I implore you, let us cast off everything. Wrestlers do not enter the ring clothed; the rules of wrestling require them to compete naked in the arena. Whether in heat or cold, they enter the arena, leaving their clothes outside. If any of them refuses to strip, he must also refuse to wrestle. But we, having vowed to strive, not only do we not cast off our garments (possessions), but, bearing thousands of burdens on our shoulders, we enter the fray, thereby providing our adversaries with many opportunities to seize us (2:82, 83).

25. How can one fight the spirits of malice when they strike him from all sides with ease? How can one combat the spirit of greed when one is showered with money? How can one outrun the demons, stripped of all care, when one is clothed in a thousand worries? Divine Scripture says: “The naked will flee on that day” (Amos 2:16). Naked is the one who is not clothed in the countless rags of worldly cares—naked is the one whose complex thoughts about money and possessions do not hinder his speed in running: for it is difficult, even impossible, for the malicious to catch the naked one (2:83, 84).

26. One must fight naked—and not only naked, but also anointed. Being naked ensures that the opponent has nothing to grasp onto, and being anointed with oil, even if one is seized, enables one to slip from the grasp of the attacker. This is why opponents try to shower each other with dirt—so that the dust, by roughening the smoothness of the oil, will make the opponent easier to hold once seized. But what is dust there corresponds to earthly affairs in our struggle, and what is oil there corresponds to freedom from cares here (2:85).

27. To be free from cares is characteristic of the perfect soul, while to be weighed down by worries is characteristic of the ungodly soul. It is said of the perfect soul that it is “like a lily among thorns” (Song of Songs 2:2), and this signifies a soul that lives without cares amidst those who are preoccupied with many things. In the Gospel, too, the lily signifies a soul free from cares; for it is said, “It neither toils nor spins,” yet it is clothed in glory more than Solomon (Matt. 6:28). Of those who have many cares regarding the body, it is said: “The whole life of the wicked is spent in worry” (Job 15:20). And indeed, it is wicked to extend concern for the body to one’s entire life—and to show no concern for the future (2:86).

28. Need should serve as the measure of acquisition. Whatever exceeds this measure is excess, which hinders rather than helps. Just as clothing proportionate to the body serves both as a necessity and an adornment, so clothing that hangs loosely on all sides, entangles the legs, and drags along the ground—in addition to being unsightly—becomes an obstacle to all work: so too does wealth that exceeds bodily needs serve as an obstacle to virtue and is subject to great censure from those capable of investigating the nature of things (2, 87).

29. By non-acquisitiveness we do not mean involuntary poverty, which, when it befalls out of necessity, crushes the spirit and, being involuntary, is considered unbearable; rather, we mean the voluntary resolve to be content with little, acquired through self-control of thought, yet one that requires effort, and this continues until such time as practice, having become a habit, makes bearable what for a long time seemed difficult and intolerable. Not only does physical beauty entice, but the splendor of wealth stirs up desire no less strongly—and in both cases, a courageous soul is needed to resist their allure.

30. Truly, those who triumph in this arena—while their thoughts struggle and contend, using persuasive arguments as if they were physical movements, striving to prove that one must agree with the opinion of the many, and to recognize what appears good as truly good, not to reject what is, by common consent, held to be worthy of esteem, not to turn away from the possession of what has been given for use by the Creator Himself, and not to condemn in vain the acquisition of that which has been brought into being for a specific purpose, and not in vain. These ascetics are truly worthy of praise, for they have not yielded ground to their opponents, have not strayed from their path, and have not surrendered to their enemies. Having firmly established their feet upon sound judgment, they did not yield to the allure of earthly possessions; they preferred a life of simplicity to one of turmoil and, through moderation in their needs, attained peace of mind (2:99–101).

31. The ancient saints took their zeal for non-possessiveness to such an extent that they led a homeless, shelterless life, subsisting on whatever food nature provided, and finding a place to sleep wherever and however they could. They had neither a roof over their heads, nor a bed, nor a table; sheepskins served as their clothing. They zealously followed the Lord’s counsel to the letter: “Look at the birds of the air... look at the lilies of the field...” (Matt. 6:26–28). They sincerely believed that what was necessary for the body’s needs would follow of its own accord when one pleased God, the Giver of these things, and primarily sought to attain the kingdom of heaven (2:102–3).

32. But how can our life, surrounded by complete contentment in every respect, compare to the life of those blessed ones—who were not troubled by thoughts of the body or bodily things, but by a pure longing for the Divine, which ceaselessly drew them upward to the most sublime, convincing them to forget what is considered glorious on earth? They possessed nothing on earth except the body, which nature held fast to the earth; yet even that they would have wished to take with them to the place where their minds dwelt, contemplating heavenly blessings. And they would never have been torn away from that delight there, had nature not brought them back to the satisfaction of bodily needs, compelled by reverence for the One who bound the soul to the body to care for the body as well, even though they recognized detachment from it as supremely beneficial (2, 104).

33. Bodily need flows swiftly and passes; in the past it had no concern for the present, and in the present it has none for the future; it heals only the present. But the labor of virtue is a seed that yields inexhaustible fruit;—and even while it is being performed, it gladdens the conscience with the anticipation of delight, and upon departure from this world, it proves to be glorious and conducive to eternal joy (2, 105).

34. Since the path leading to the kingdom is fraught with so many difficulties—being narrow and surrounded on all sides by rapids—what is the point of burdening oneself with heaps of money and other possessions and attempting to walk this path in a way that makes it impossible to proceed? Concerns for material things, distracting and strongly drawing one downward, make a fall all the more likely, especially where the course of events demands keen and sober attention. And even with such attention, the journey rarely proceeds without stumbles, due to the difficulties on the narrow path through the rapids; but for those who have burdened themselves with the unnecessary weight of material possessions, a fall is inevitable. Indeed, the very act of acquiring possessions is already a fall (2, 111).

35. Our attitude toward material possessions is threefold: non-acquisitiveness—in its highest and middle forms—and a materialistic, acquisitive life. Their origins are as follows. In Paradise, this is what was commanded to the first man: “Gather the grass of the field” (Gen. 1:29). The dignity of the One who commanded it guarantees the complete suitability of such sustenance for the life intended for man. We may, however, add in explanation of this suitability that it was far more suitable than any other for preserving the desired refinement of those created in the image of God, so that the power of the mind might always remain unburdened and the sobriety of the mind unclouded. When, in this way, what was necessary for the body’s life was provided of its own accord, the mind did not remain idle, having all its time free from bodily labors, but was constantly drawn to spiritual contemplations, which filled it with inexhaustible joy. God Himself cultivated this disposition within him, coming to him daily of His own good will for conversation. “Such is the norm of the life proper to man!” Its essence cannot be altered or abolished; but a different manner of its visible conduct is possible—one that was made necessary by the subsequent fall. For the one who transgressed the commandment and was cast out of Paradise, God established a different way of life, in accordance with his fallen state, commanding him—who had not made proper use of his rest—to obtain food through work and labor; because he was unable to remain constantly in the service of God and in communion with Him when he had free time and was not in need of physical labor (in Paradise). For food, he was given bread earned by the sweat of his brow, and for clothing, leather tunics—thus setting a limit on greed and vanity. The original non-greed of Paradise was replaced by such modest acquisition, which, moreover, despite the toil involved, did not depend solely on him, but above all on God’s blessing. In practice, three ways of life emerged from this: some were content with modest acquisition, laboring with the sweat of their brow while trusting in God; others, having deepened their trust in God, renounced all acquisition entirely (eager to restore the paradisiacal non-acquisitiveness) and were sustained by God; a third group, having immersed themselves in all manner of labor, based their hope of having what they needed on it, while basing the security of their lives on material wealth. God was forgotten: the love of money became their god. These are the three aforementioned types of our relationship to possessions (2, 116–123—abridged).

36. The second type presented here represents conduct (primarily) befitting a rational being, namely: to spend one’s time in the service of God and to receive what is due from the treasury of God’s Providence; to trust in God’s providence and regard the earth as a gift; to serve the Creator sincerely, and to provide for the needs of creation through voluntary offerings; to be a stranger here, and to regard as one’s true home that which is prepared in heaven. The Creator prescribed this life from the beginning—and all the Saints lived this life, obeying Him (examples: Elijah, Elisha, the sons of the prophets, John the Baptist, and the Apostles) (2, 124–129).

37. Such is the “highest” form of non-acquisitiveness among the Saints. But the “middle” form of non-acquisitiveness, which follows it, is also very beneficial, as it is appropriate to the times and to necessity. Even if it cannot compete for primacy or boast of being on a par with the superior way of life, it undoubtedly holds the second degree of honor. The first Saints (with perfect detachment) lived for the soul alone and for God, who created it, attaching no importance to the body; yet even without caring for it, they had everything they needed—not gathered in advance in granaries, but received in due time from God’s good will, as from a treasury. The Saints who followed them (with moderate detachment from worldly goods), while caring for the body’s necessary comfort and striving to ensure that our animal nature—left to neglect—would not be corrupted against the will of the One who united it with us, employed their hands in work only to the extent that it was absolutely necessary to serve the body; but they spent most of their time caring for the soul, in prayer, contemplation of God, and proper pursuits, with a view to excelling in good deeds (2, 137).

38. The latter, having become entirely flesh, devoted themselves wholly to serving an earthly idol, desiring not only what was sufficient for their physical lives, but also what would show them to be no less distinguished by their abundance, so that, at least through this, they might be in the public eye. In this way, they clearly expose their folly to ridicule, taking what is reprehensible as a source of praise, and thinking thereby to draw attention to themselves and earn admiration—for which they deserve contempt and derision. For just as what is appropriate to each station provides sound grounds for approval, so what is unbecoming to a station—even if it is not bad in other respects—is highly reprehensible where it is out of place (2, 138).

39. To which group are the “middle class,” situated between the two extremes, closer?—Certainly to those to whom they are more closely aligned in their actions, and with whom they proclaim a kinship by striving to be close to them in their way of life. For since they occupy a middle rank between the two groups, they are no longer equally inclined toward both; and although they lag behind those who precede them, they follow immediately behind them, walking in their footsteps with youthful strides, and are as far removed from those who follow them as runners gradually distance themselves from those walking at a leisurely pace or standing still. As for the former and the latter—they have nothing in common. What fellowship can those who possess much material wealth have with those who are unworldly ()? What harmony can there be between those who are wise in the flesh and those who are wise in the Spirit? What common ground is there between those entangled in worldly affairs and those who serve God without a care? Some, following the Apostles, leave behind all they have acquired; others acquire what they did not have. Some remain in silence, inwardly striving for spiritual progress; others engage in every kind of struggle, fighting for money and possessions. Some contend with the spirits of wickedness for heavenly blessings, while others attack their own kind for earthly blessings. To some, Paul says, “You are to shine like lights in the world” (Phil. 2:15), shining, of course, with the glory of life and becoming, to those who see them, examples of wholesome competition; while to others it is said: “My name is blasphemed because of you” (Rom. 2:24), that is, because of you who act contrary to your calling and bear an outward appearance that contradicts your deeds (2:139–40).

40. What word, then, is not despised by one who claims to have renounced worldly life but is in fact devoted to its pleasures? Who boasts of having despised the world yet is madly devoted to worldly affairs? Who promised not to pay any attention to earthly things but proves by his actions that his promise was false? Does he claim to have bid farewell to vanity, yet never part with it?—“You have come out of Egypt”—what, then, do you still have in common with idleness? You are journeying through the wilderness, hastening toward the Promised Land; why, then, do you linger, occupied with vain tasks, becoming a sluggish traveler on this long journey? Does the path before you require such care that you wander at the crossroads, risking the danger of failing to reach rest? You have placed your hand on the plow handle—why then do you turn back, making yourself unfit for the kingdom of heaven? You have left behind the fervor of the pentecost; why then do you look back, desiring to see what is happening there? Have you taken up your cross?—then follow Christ, leaving everything behind, for Christ, with whom you have been united, desires to be loved above all else (2:141–2).

41. The body requires little comfort—take care of this comfort; for you are bound to the body for a time, so that it may be your ally in the practice of virtue and so that the soul’s progress may not encounter any obstacles. But whoever is preoccupied with oxen, counts his flocks of sheep daily, and ceaselessly tends to vineyards, groves, fields, and orchards—so much so that even the length of the day is not enough for these tasks—when and where will such a person have time to remember God? When will he find time to sing psalms? When will he pray? What time can he devote to training himself in godly contemplation? And even if he finds an opportunity to do so occasionally amid his many tasks, how will he offer the Lord a pure prayer when his mind is not detached from the things that occupy him so much? How will he observe the movements of his passions to discern the difference between yesterday and today—whether for the better or for the worse?

How will he uncover the tangled web of thoughts that constantly replace one another, making observation itself difficult? Or do you not notice how your daily tasks crush you by day, and your worry about them at night, turning a time of rest into a time of torment? For then memory—by bringing to mind who has crossed the boundary, who has harmed the crops, who has cut off the irrigation channels, who has poisoned the pasture, who is committing or has committed some other offense, and how each one persists and argues—thus drives the soul’s irritable nature into a frenzy, inciting it to vengeance, leaving no time for sleep or rest, much less for prayer, which requires great silence and long periods of free time, providing, in part, liberation from all cares (2, 142–144).

4. On Anger

1. Anger is a frenzied passion that easily provokes even the wise, brutalizes the soul, and causes one to shy away from (friendly) conversation.

2. A strong wind does not shake a pillar, and a soul free from anger will not be carried away by irritation.

3. Water is stirred up by the force of the winds, and an irritable person is agitated by reckless thoughts.

4. An angry monk is like a wild boar in the wilderness; he sees someone and gnashes his teeth.

5. Thickening fog clouds the air, and the surge of irritation coarsens the mind of the angry person.

6. A passing cloud obscures the sun, and a thought of resentment obscures the mind.

7. A lion in a menagerie ceaselessly shakes the door latches, while the irritable monk in his cell sifts through angry thoughts.

8. A calm sea is a pleasant sight, but it is not more pleasant than a peaceful state of mind.

9. Dolphins play in the calm sea, and godly thoughts arise in a peaceful state of mind.

10. A long-suffering monk is a quiet spring, providing a pleasant drink to all; but the mind of the angry one is always agitated and gives no water to the thirsty; and even if it does, the water is murky and unfit to drink.

11. The eyes of the angry person are cloudy and bloodshot, betraying the turmoil of the heart; but the face of the long-suffering person is calm, their eyes are kind, and they look straight ahead.

12. A man’s meekness is remembered by God (Ps. 131:1), and a soul free from anger becomes a temple of the Holy Spirit.

13. Christ bows His head in a long-suffering spirit, and a peaceful mind becomes the dwelling place of the Holy Trinity.

14. Foxes dwell in a vindictive soul, and beasts take refuge in a troubled heart.

15. A righteous man avoids a shameful refuge, and God avoids a vengeful heart.

16. A falling stone stirs up the water, and a harsh word stirs up a man’s heart.

17. Cast away angry thoughts from your soul and do not let irritation take root in your heart—and you will not be disturbed during prayer.

18. Just as smoke from smoldering straw troubles the eyes, so does a vindictive heart trouble the mind during prayer.

19. The thoughts of the angry are the offspring of the viper; they devour the heart that gave birth to them.

20. The prayer of the irritable is an abominable smoke; the psalm-singing of the angry is an unpleasant sound.

21. The offering of the vindictive is a worm-eaten sacrifice—and let him not approach the altars of purification.

22. The irritable person sees troubled dreams, and the angry person dreams of attacks by wild beasts.

23. The long-suffering man sees in a vision the assemblies of the holy angels, and the one who does not hold a grudge practices spiritual words, receiving the revelation of mysteries at night.

* * *

24. When the demons see that we have not been inflamed by the very heat of the insult, they then attack in silence, seeking to stir up the ruling power within us (the mind), so that we may rebel in absentia against those with whom we maintained peace when they were face to face with us (1, 229).

25. When a dispute or quarrel with a brother over some grievance ends peacefully, consider yourself to be at fault, so that in the silence of your heart you may not find a struggle of thoughts, some of which, by highlighting the insignificance of the insult, will reproach you for not even having bothered to dwell on it, while others, by emphasizing its importance, will instill regret that it was not repaid with an insult of equal measure.

26. When intense irritation deeply grieves any of the brothers in the community, then thoughts begin to flatter those living in solitude, so that, just as they have deprived the brothers of good-natured patience, they may also remove them from the path of love.

27. Whoever repels anger with good-natured patience and grief with love repels two evil, wrathful beasts with two virtues.

28. One who kneels in supplication, begging the one who has caused grief to cease his anger, at once turns both away from irritation.

29. Whoever reconciles those who are angry overcomes the very spirit of anger.

30. Whoever endures an angry person for the sake of peace is truly a son of peace (1, 230).

31. Prepare yourself to be meek and combative: meek toward people, but combative toward our enemy; for therein lies the natural use of anger—to oppose the (ancient) serpent with hostility (1, 235).

32. The meekness of the meek consists in being generous toward one's brother out of love and waging war against (the angry) thought directed against him.

33. Let the meek person also be ready to fight, not extending meekness to malicious thoughts nor extending the fight to neighbors by nature.

34. Do not turn the natural use of anger into something unnatural; that is, do not be angry with your brother, imitating a serpent, and do not associate with malicious thoughts, becoming a companion of that serpent (1:236).

35. A meek person, even when enduring something offensive, does not abandon love, but for love's sake "bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things" (1 Cor. 13:4, 7).

36. If the work of love is to be patient, then to wage war against a brother in anger is not the work of love.

37. Anger stirs up grief and animosity, but love drives all three away.

38. If you have a firm foundation in love, pay more attention to it than to what offends you.

39. He who has acquired the virtue of love subdues the passions characteristic of the wicked.

40. Whoever possesses these three virtues from the Holy Trinity—faith, hope, and love—will be a three-walled fortress, fortified by the towers of virtue like battlements.

41. Whoever is wounded by the slander of others, without attributing it to the devil as its source, encourages the enemy even more to prepare arrows against him—because his soul falls, being wounded by such slander (1, 251).

42. When enduring the greatest slander or a grievous insult, do not hold a grudge, but bless them (1, 252).

43. Whoever bears a grudge against demons does not bear a grudge against people; but whoever bears a grudge against a brother is at peace with demons.

44. Anger and hatred are a fire in the heart, but the souls of those who are forgiving are watered by spiritual dew.

45. Just as burning coals cast off sparks, so do unforgiving souls spew forth malicious thoughts.

46. Just as a scorpion's sting causes the most excruciating pain, so a vengeful soul harbors the most bitter poison.

47. When David was reviled, he said nothing in reply, but he even restrained the vengeful spirit of Abishai (2 Sam. 16:10). And you, when subjected to reviling, not only do not repay reviling with reviling, but also restrain even the one who would seek vengeance on your behalf (1, 228).

48. Endure insults patiently, and shut the door to anger with your lips: in this lies your success.

49. Do not answer those who threaten you at all, so that your silence may shut the mouths that breathe fire.

50. By restraining your own tongue, you will inflict the most acute pain on your threats and those who revile you.

51. By remaining silent, you will not be consumed by insults; but your slanderer will be deeply wounded by your silence, seeing how magnanimously you endure his insolence.

5. On Sorrow

1. A sorrowful monk knows no spiritual joy; sorrow is the despondency of the soul and arises from angry thoughts; for anger desires revenge, and failure to take revenge gives rise to sorrow.

2. Sorrow is a lion's mouth, and it easily devours the sorrowful.

3. Sorrow is a worm in the heart—and it devours the mother who gave birth to it.

4. A mother suffers while giving birth to her child, but when she gives birth, she is freed from her suffering; but sorrow causes great pain even during childbirth, and after birth it torments her no less with pain.

5. A sorrowful monk knows no spiritual joy, just as one suffering from a high fever knows no taste of honey.

6. A sorrowful monk cannot direct his mind toward contemplation and will never offer up pure prayer; for sorrow is an obstacle to all that is good.

7. Shackles on the feet hinder swift progress, and sorrow is an obstacle to contemplation.

8. One captured by barbarians is bound in chains, and one captive to passions is bound by sorrow.

9. Sorrow has no power when there are no other passions, just as shackles do not bind when there is nothing to bind them to.

10. One bound by sorrow is overcome by passions, and bears the bonds as a mark of his defeat; for sorrow is the consequence of the unsatisfaction of a self-seeking desire, and such a desire is linked to every passion.

11. Whoever has conquered desires has conquered passions; and whoever has conquered passions will not be overcome by sorrow.

12. The temperate person does not grieve over a lack of food; the chaste person, over failing to commit shameful debauchery; the non-angry person, over failing to take revenge; the humble person, over being deprived of human honor; and the non-greedy person, over suffering a setback. They have completely extinguished all such desires within themselves—which is why they feel no sorrow; for the dispassionate are not pierced by sorrow, just as an arrow does not pierce one clad in armor.

13. A shield provides safety to a warrior, a wall to a city; but dispassion provides the monk with greater safety than either a shield or a wall. For a shield is often pierced by a swiftly flying arrow, and a wall is breached by a multitude of warriors, but sorrow cannot overcome dispassion.

14. He who has overcome his passions has overcome sorrow; but he who is overcome by the sweetness of passion will not escape its bonds.

15. He who is often sorrowful yet claims to be dispassionate is like a sick person pretending to be healthy; for just as a sick person is revealed by the color of his face, so sorrow exposes the passionate.

16. Those who love the world have many sorrows, but those who despise all that is in the world are always joyful.

17. The covetous person, having suffered a loss, grieves bitterly, but the one who has renounced possessions is carefree.

18. The glory-seeker grieves when he suffers dishonor, but the humble accepts it as a companion.

19. A smelting furnace purifies unrefined silver; and sorrow for God purifies the heart that is steeped in sin.

20. Frequent smelting reduces the amount of lead—and worldly sorrow weakens the mind.

21. Darkness diminishes the vitality of the eyes, and sorrow dulls the mind's contemplative faculty.

22. Sunlight does not penetrate the depths of the water, and the heart in sorrow is not illuminated by the mind's bright contemplation.

23. Every person delights in the sunrise, yet even it brings no solace to a sorrowful soul.

24. Jaundice suppresses the sense of taste, and sorrow robs the soul of feeling.

25. Whoever despises worldly pleasures will not be troubled by sorrowful thoughts.

* * *

26. When you unite the trinity within you (i.e., spirit, soul, and body) through the bond of peace, then, having united within yourself according to the commandment of the Divine Trinity, you will hear: “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God” (Matt. 5:9) (1, 230).

27. This union of peace is great, for with it comes joy, which enlightens the eye of the mind to the contemplation of the highest goods.

28. If we acquire the joy of peacemaking in difficult circumstances, we will easily, with gratitude, ward off the sorrows that befall us and keep out the roaring demon of sorrow, who, seeking to devour the soul, attacks it most fiercely in times of sorrow, preparing a place for the spirit of despondency as well, so that together they may more powerfully darken the soul and destroy its labors.

29. Let the joy of peace be our law, written in our hearts—a joy that drives away sorrow, extinguishes anger, repels hatred, destroys vindictiveness, dispels despondency, and transforms grief into joy (1, 231).

30. Sheltered in peaceful serenity, this joy is an ocean of virtues, drowning the opposing hordes of the devil with the cross.

31. Understand also that there is a joy opposed to this one—a deceptive one—and, deceived by its shadow, do not mistake one for the other; for demons even imitate spiritual gifts so that, by misleading the mind with an illusion, they may drive it to madness. Spiritual joy arises without any external cause, finding its most sublime source in sorrow for God.

32. Sorrow for God renews the soul with tears, instills a watchful concern for the approaching death and judgment, and little by little teaches one to await them with longing (1, 232).

33. Unfulfilled desires give rise to sorrow; but prayers and thanksgiving cause them to wither away.

34. A mediating sorrow moves between those who are angry. If the one among them who comes to his senses first rises above his passion and extends a hand of apology to the other, he will drive away the bitter sorrow.

35. Sorrow is an illness of both soul and body; it takes the soul captive, while it withers the flesh, leaving it behind.

36. Sorrow arises from what is unpleasant (misfortunes, grief, distress); from sorrow comes a gloomy disposition (as they say, “he’s not in the mood”); and from both of these springs senseless quarrelsomeness (grumbling at everything).

37. If you wish to overcome sorrow and a gloomy disposition, then embrace benevolent love and clothe yourself in gentle joy.

38. Be especially grateful in times of sorrow: for through them the grace of intercession is felt more clearly. Thus, by driving away sorrow from the afflictions that befall you through gratitude, you will not dim the radiant beauty of courageous serenity.

6. On Despondency

1. Despondency is the exhaustion of the soul, and a soul in exhaustion, lacking what is natural to it, cannot stand firm and resist temptations.

2. Just as food is to a healthy body, so is temptation to a courageous soul.

3. The north wind nourishes growth, and temptations strengthen the soul’s patience.

4. A cloud without water is carried away by the wind, and a mind lacking patience is carried away by the spirit of despondency.

5. Spring dew promotes the growth of the field’s crops, and the word of God elevates the soul’s disposition.

6. The spirit of despondency drives the monk from his dwelling; but whoever has patience always abides in silence.

7. The despondent one uses visiting the sick as an excuse to go out, but in reality has his own purpose in doing so.

8. A monk in despondency is eager to serve and considers the fulfillment of his own desire through this to be a commandment.

9. A light breeze bends a weak plant, and the thought of wandering easily carries away the despondent.

10. A well-rooted tree does not bend under the force of the winds, and despondency does not afflict souls that are strong.

11. A wandering monk is like a withered desert branch; he stays in his cell for a short while, and then reluctantly sets off again for who knows where.

12. A plant that is moved from place to place bears no fruit, and a wandering monk bears no fruit of virtue.

13. A sick person is not satisfied with a single kind of food, and a despondent monk is not satisfied with a single task.

14. A lustful man is not satisfied with one wife, and a despondent monk is not satisfied with one cell.

15. The eyes of the despondent constantly turn toward the door, and his thoughts dwell on visitors; the door creaks, and he jumps up; a voice is heard, and he peeks out the window, not moving away from it until he grows bored.

16. The listless person, while reading a book, often yawns and nods off; he rubs his face, stretches, raising his arms, and, turning his eyes away from the book, stares intently at the wall; returning to the book, he reads a little, turning the pages, curious to see the end of a word, counts the pages, calculates the number of full sheets, criticizes the handwriting and the decorations—and finally, folding the book, places it under his head and falls into a not-very-deep sleep, because hunger is already beginning to trouble his soul and forces him to take care of himself as well.

17. A despondent monk is lazy in prayer and never recites his prayers.

18. Just as a sick person cannot bear a heavy burden, so a despondent person is unable to diligently carry out God's work; for the former's physical strength is impaired, while the latter has lost his spiritual strength.

19. Patience is the remedy for despondency, as is doing one's duty (despite a lack of enthusiasm) with all self-discipline, out of fear of God.

20. Set a limit for yourself in every task, and do not abandon it until you have finished; likewise, pray wisely and earnestly—and the spirit of despondency will flee from you.

21. Let courageous patience guide you in all your labors; for despondency stands against you, armed with all malice, and, watching over your labors, tests them all—and if it finds that any of them is not strengthened by patience, it makes that labor unbearably heavy (1, 233).

22. When, during the divine service, a spirit of despondency assails you, it whispers to your soul that psalm-singing is burdensome, setting laziness as an adversary against your zeal—and the “ ” urges you to hasten the psalm-singing so as to give the flesh rest, for it is, as it were, very weary for some reason.

23. When we are at a night vigil, let us not sit down during the service out of despondency; otherwise, demons will come and, gathering the chaff of thoughts, will immediately sow them in the heart.

24. Upon waking before the service, let us fill our hearts with bright thoughts, so that, having prepared ourselves with them, we may then stand during the psalm singing with an alert mind (1, 234).

25. Just as our outer self works with its hands so as not to be a burden to others, so too let our inner self work (in its own labor) so as not to allow the mind to be burdened by thoughts; for thoughts then impose their own work upon the soul when they seize it while it is idle from thoughts that are according to God (1, 235).

26. Cultivate manual labor out of love for humanity, and mental discipline out of wisdom, so that the former may serve to provide for strangers and to overcome or completely drive out sloth, while the latter may be a guide to contemplation and the complete purification of the mind from thoughts.

27. Let us not wander from place to place, but rather let us labor in silence at our tasks; for from idleness (and idleness) thoughts gain power over us (1, 238).

28. When thoughts compel us to go to a place that they had previously, through their suggestions, led us to love, they then compel us to regret it, so as to make us fickle and unproductive in everything.

29. A change of place should be undertaken for the sake of a more spiritual life, not for the sake of a more peaceful one (1, 239).

30. Patience, good cheer, and love are rewarding even in times of sorrow; but despondency, indolence, and self-love find joy in a life of ease.

7. On Vanity

1. Vanity is an irrational passion and easily creeps into every act of virtue.
2. A line drawn on water merges (and becomes invisible); so too does the labor of virtue in a vain soul.
3. A white hand hidden in the bosom—and the hidden deed shines more brilliantly than the light.
4. Ivy winds itself around a tree, and when it reaches the top, it dries up the root; and vanity grafts itself onto virtues and does not let go of them until it has stripped them of all meaning.
5. A cluster of grapes that has dropped to the ground or lies on the ground rots easily; so too does virtue perish when it clings to vanity.
6. A vain monk—a worker without pay—toils but receives no reward.
7. A leaky sack cannot hold what is put into it, and vanity destroys the reward of virtues.
8. The self-restraint of the vain is like smoke from a stove; both vanish into thin air.
9. The wind erases a person's footprints, and vanity reduces alms to nothing.
10. No matter how hard you throw a stone, it will not reach the sky—and the prayer of a hypocrite will not ascend to heaven.
11. Vanity is a hidden rock; if you strike it, you will lose your cargo.
12. A prudent man hides his treasure, and a virtuous monk hides the fruits of his virtue.
13. Vanity urges one to pray on the rooftops; but he who fights against vanity prays in his own cell.
14. A reckless man publicly proclaims his wealth and incites many to plot against him; but you, walking a path where robbers lurk, hide what you have until you reach the city of peace and there begin to enjoy your possessions safely.
15. The virtue of the vain is a crushed offering, which should not be brought upon the altar of God (Lev. 22:22).
16. Despondency weakens the strength of the soul, but the vanity of the sick makes them healthy, and the elderly stronger than the young—provided there are many witnesses to what is being done: then fasting, vigil, and prayer become easy; for the praise of many stirs up zeal.
17. Do not forsake your labors for the sake of human glory, nor exchange future glory for praise that is worthless; for human glory turns to dust, and its reputation fades away on earth, but the glory of virtue endures forever.

* * *

18. True virtue does not seek human praise nor take delight in honor—that mother of evils (1, 226).
19. The beginning of honor is the desire to please others, and its end is pride.
20. He who seeks honors exalts himself and, as such, cannot bear humiliation.
21. Let labor in virtue be an honor to you, and let sought-after praise be a disgrace (1, 227).
22. Do not seek glory from the flesh—you who have resolved to renounce the passions of the flesh—but seek what is better, and this will be your glory.
23. He who desires to be honored envies those who surpass him in glory, adding hatred to this envy.
24. Overcome by a strong desire for honor, he cannot bear for anyone to be preferred over him, but claims primacy for himself so as not to appear inferior to anyone.
25. He cannot bear for those who surpass him to be honored even in his absence—and he usually dismisses the glory of their achievements as meaningless.
26. For the glory-seeker, defamation is the most grievous wound—and he cannot help but hate the one who defames him.
27. The glory-seeker is a slave to a cruel mistress—and is sold over to many tyrants: pride, envy, jealousy, and all manner of spirits; but whoever subdues the spirit of ambition with humility drives away a whole host of demons.
28. Whoever, through humility, makes himself a servant to all, becomes like Him who humbled Himself and took the form of a servant (Phil. 2:7).
29. If you measure yourself by a small standard, you will not compare yourself with others.
30. Whoever reveals the weakness of the soul through tears will not think highly of his own labors (1:228).

31. Demons often subject the humble to humiliation and abuse so that, unable to endure undeserved contempt, they may abandon their humility; but whoever courageously endures dishonor in humility is thereby lifted even higher to the heights of wisdom.

32. Banish from within even the thought of human praise, so that you may thereby repel the self-seeking thought of vanity before it even arises.

33. When, by struggling against the causes of your passions, you overcome them, do not allow a deceitful thought to exalt you, lest, by believing it, you fall into delusion; but rather strive to see the flaws in what you have worked on, so that your success may not be tarnished by internal enemies (1, 230).

34. Others, having been praised for their success, grew complacent over time; as a result, both the praise faded away and their labors came to naught.

35. Others, hardened by pride in their deeds, began to imagine themselves to be great; meanwhile, their conscience grew increasingly calloused, the disease of vainglory intensified, and their thoughts—by diverting the soul's gaze from its wounds—plundered all their labors under the guise of praise (1240).

36. When you offer sincere repentance for your sins, the demons, while magnifying your acts of repentance, downplay your sins and often conceal them with forgetfulness, or lead you to believe that they have been forgiven—so that, by weakening your efforts, you may no longer consider it necessary to bitterly mourn your failings.

37. The sharpest weapon of the (ancient) serpent is vanity, which destroys the fruits of all our labors. But whoever prepares in advance a counter-maneuver of secret good deeds is close to cutting off the head of the devil himself (1, 241).

38. Hide the fragrance of your ascetic labors under the seal of silence, so that, if revealed by your tongue, they may not be plundered by glory.

39. Keep your tongue silent while actively pursuing the ascetic life (that is, let your deeds speak instead of your tongue); for in this way, even in silence, you will have your deeds—the worthy and trustworthy companions of your life—as witnesses. Whoever has deeds to show need not testify about themselves with their own tongue.

40. Others, having cast off the burden of their labors, try to conceal their laziness with deeds of the past, presenting—uncertainly and unconvincingly—as obvious witnesses deeds that are no longer present.

41. Just as you hide your sins from people, so hide your labors from them as well. You are ashamed to reveal your shameful deeds, lest you be subjected to reproach and humiliation—which would actually be beneficial for your soul. Be wary of displaying your labors as well, lest the sin of self-love bring ruin to your soul. If you reveal your shameful failures to God alone, do not reveal your struggles against them to people, lest they regard them as the crowning glory of victory.

42. Some, having become notorious among the people for their bad behavior, adopt a life of virtue—not to atone for their sinful failings through ascetic labors, but to silence the reproachful rumors about themselves. But if anyone engages in acts of piety solely for the sake of reputation, he serves not God but people (1. 245. 6).

43. Those who are distinguished in the ascetic life by the pallor of their faces should turn away from human praise before it comes—that is, when, even before meeting people, the enemy instills a thought of love of praise (1. 249).

44. When you have spent much time abstaining from wine, oil, and other excesses, then thoughts of praise, calculating the time, will begin to suggest to you that you should ease your labors for the sake of your body. To these malicious calculators, say the opposite—whatever may serve to thwart their intent. Thus, one of the brothers, praised by his inner thoughts for his labors in the struggle against demons, spoke the words of the Psalm: “Let those who shamed me be turned back, saying to me, ‘Well done, well done’” (Ps. 69:4).

45. Do not adorn yourself with fine garments, lest you be more clearly clothed in the demon of vanity; for it is not the beauty of garments that indicates you are clothed in the garments of virtue, but ascetic labors, like golden ornaments, bear witness to the beauty of your soul's garment (1, 256).

46. Whoever, after experiencing both the active and contemplative life, instructs the inexperienced in the art of discerning thoughts, must take care that pride in such knowledge and the desire to flaunt it for glory do not creep in.

47. One who labors most ruthlessly upon himself in performing bodily feats should not exhaust himself for the sake of praise, nor should he be exalted by glory. Otherwise, the demons, by inflating his soul with these labors and glory and stirring him to intensify his ruthlessness toward himself even further, will entice him to undertake even greater feats so that he may exalt himself even more. To this end, they engage in the following internal dialogue with him through his thoughts: “Just as so-and-so labored without sparing himself and thereby earned such a great name for himself that people still speak of him even after his death; so you, too, must ascend to the very heights of asceticism, so that you may gain glory for yourself and so that your name may become great and be spoken of with great praise even after your death (1, 268).

48. In their dreams, they elevate another to the teacher’s chair and imagine him speaking—and that public opinion grants him precedence over all those who have become renowned for their ascetic labors and their wide-ranging knowledge. Through this, they stir up in him not only rivalry but also envy toward all those whose achievements are celebrated and whose deeds are worthy of admiration, as well as whose vast knowledge is astonishing (1, 269).

49. It sometimes happens that they lull the passions of the flesh to sleep and draw impure thoughts from within with the cunning intention of making the ascetic believe that, through the austerity of his life, he has completely conquered the spirit of lust, that his heart has been purified and has drawn near to the holiness of the saints—and that he has ascended to the very pinnacle of holiness. They often compel such a person to boast to himself about his own deeds: “I did this and that; I labored in such and such a way and exhausted myself”—without, however, allowing him to add: “Not I, but the grace that is in me.” Nor do they allow him to acknowledge God as his helper in the very things for which they compel him to boast, so that, having accomplished everything in his labors through his own efforts, he might claim all the praise for himself—and through this failure to give glory to God, he sinks into the depths of blasphemy, foolishly exalting himself as self-sufficient.

50. When such glory-seeking thoughts are heard in the heart and it does not resist them, then the monk (and especially the hermit) is not far from mental corruption; then the mind is in danger of being disturbed, either by demonic dreams accepted as true, or by phantoms during vigils, or by the appearance of demons in some luminous forms. For Satan himself, to deceive us, sometimes transforms himself into an angel of light; promising that, if you bow down to him, he will grant you such and such a gift, or carry you up to heaven like a new Elijah in a fiery chariot. And it has happened that those who accepted this as true strayed from the truth and fell into madness. To avoid this, remembering the reason why ascetic labors are undertaken with love, guard your heart with every care, so that, by focusing solely on outward deeds, you may not be insidiously ensnared within by (senseless) self-exaltation (1, 270).

51. To those who practice good deeds, the Lord admonishes: “When you pray, go into your inner room, and after you have shut the door, pray to your Father who is in secret” (Matt. 6:6), and further: “When you give alms, do not sound a trumpet before you” (– 2), commanding us to avoid doing any good deed for show, as if it were a harmful act. And the Prophet, saying that “he who gathers his reward gathers it into a leaky bag” (Hag. 1: 6), shows that every labor (striving and good deed) is destroyed by the corrupt motive of vainglory—as if through a leaky pouch, passing through a heart that is not protected by humble wisdom. A heart of humble wisdom is truly a treasure house and a strongly fortified barrier on all sides, “where neither moth nor rust destroys, where thieves do not break in nor steal” (Matt. 6:20). By “worm” is meant the conceit that arises within, destroying whatever is good in people; and by “thieves” are meant the praises coming from without, which, by stirring up foolish pride, hastily plunder the spiritual treasures gathered through long toil in good deeds. For just as a worm devours the substance from which it came into being, and thieves, by undermining a wall, carry off what has been painstakingly accumulated (material goods), so too does a thought, stirred by good deeds to pride, destroy the value of those very deeds; and human praise, by undermining weak minds, (invades) and leaves nothing good there—that which was brought in from outside by lawful means (through the doors), and is then expelled by them through the ears. But let no one allow this passion to overcome him to the point that, lulled by the sweet talk of vainglory, he suffers the complete loss of all that has been acquired through hard work; but let everyone remain sober and vigilant, so as to destroy the slanderers while they are still merely undermining, before they can cause harm, striking them at the very moment of their undermining, before the sun rises—and the thought becomes deed (2, 106–7).

8. On Pride

1. Pride is a swelling (puffiness) of the soul, filled with corrupted blood; if it matures, it will burst and cause great trouble.

2. The flash of lightning foreshadows a clap of thunder, and pride foreshadows the appearance of vanity.
3. Pride lifts the proud to great heights, and from there casts them down into the abyss.
4. Pride afflicts those who have turned away from God and attribute their good deeds to their own strength.
5. Just as one who steps on a spiderweb falls through and is carried away, so too does the one who relies on his own strength fall.
6. An abundance of fruit bends the branches of a tree to the ground, and an abundance of virtues humbles a man's wisdom.
7. Rotten fruit is useless to the farmer, and the virtue of the proud is of no use to God.
8. A support sustains a branch laden with fruit, and the fear of God sustains a virtuous soul.
9. Just as the weight of fruit breaks a branch, so pride brings down a virtuous soul.
10. Do not surrender your soul to pride, and you will not see terrifying visions; for the soul of the proud is forsaken by God and becomes a delight to demons.
11. At night, the proud person imagines a multitude of attacking beasts, and by day is troubled by fearful thoughts; when asleep, he often startles awake, and when awake, he fears even the shadow of a bird.
12. The rustling of a leaf terrifies the proud, and the murmur of water strikes his soul.
13. Thus, the one who just moments ago opposed God and rejected His help is now frightened by insignificant phantoms.
14. Pride cast the archangel down from heaven and caused him to fall to the earth like lightning. But a person's humility lifts him up to heaven and prepares him to rejoice with the angels.
15. Why do you soar so high, O man, and rise above the clouds, when you are but dust and ashes?
16. Consider your nature: you are earth and ashes, and soon you will dissolve into dust; now you are exalted, but shortly you will be a worm. Why do you boast of a body that will soon decay?
17. A man is great when God helps him; but as soon as he is forsaken by God, he comes to know the weakness of his nature.
18. You have nothing good that you have not received from God. Why, then, do you boast of what belongs to another as if it were your own? Why do you boast of what has been given by God's grace as if it were your own achievement?
19. Acknowledge the Giver and do not exalt yourself too highly; you are God's creation—do not separate yourself from the Creator.
20. God helps you; do not deny your Benefactor. You have ascended to the heights of life, but it was God who guided you; you have excelled in virtue, but it was God who acted within you; acknowledge the One who has exalted you, so that you may remain steadfast at the heights.
21. Recognize your fellow human being as being of the same essence as you, and do not deny your kinship with him out of arrogance.
22. He is humbled, and you are exalted; yet the one Creator fashioned you both.
23. Do not despise the humble one; he stands firmer than you, walks upon the earth, and will not fall easily; but the haughty one, if he falls, will be crushed.
24. A proud monk is a rootless tree that cannot withstand the force of the wind; but unpretentious wisdom is a fortified city, within which one dwells in safety.
25. A blade of grass is lifted high by a gust of wind, but the proud are carried away by the delusion of madness.
26. A burst bubble turns to nothing—and the memory of the proud will perish.
27. The words of the humble are a soothing balm to the soul, but the words of the proud are full of boasting.
28. The prayer of the humble moves God, but the plea of the proud offends Him.
29. Humility is a crown to the home, and it keeps those who enter safe.
30. When you ascend to the heights of virtue, you will have a great need for protection: for if one standing on the ground falls, he will rise again quickly, but one who falls from a height is in danger of dying.
31. A precious stone is befitted by a golden setting, and a man's humility shines with many virtues.

32. Do not forget your fall, even if you repent; but remember your sin with weeping, for the sake of your humility, so that, having humbled yourself, you may necessarily cut off your pride (1:240).

33. Do not look upon the fallen with a haughty thought that exalts you, as if you were a judge, but pay attention to yourself with a sober mind—as the tester and evaluator of your own deeds (1, 245).

34. When you fall, sigh; and when you succeed, do not become arrogant. Do not boast that you are blameless, lest you be clothed in shame instead of glory.

35. One of the most eloquent men, speaking on the subject of humility, recounted the following: “A most eloquent father was struck on the cheek by a demoniac who was in the throes of a violent fit of madness; and the father, turning around immediately, offered him his other cheek, ready to receive the blow. Then the demon, struck by humility as if by lightning, cried out and immediately departed from God’s creation” (1, 259–60).

36. Just as those who descend into the depths of the earth extract gold from there, so those who descend to gold-like humility draw virtues from it (1:266).

37. St. Paul commands, “Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead” (Phil. 3:13). Whoever is so disposed is not so much exalted by what he has achieved as humbled by what he lacks in comparison to what is expected, taking care to complete what is unfinished and not turning to what is already finished; for what has been accomplished often inflates the frivolous to the point of recklessness, while what remains to be done humbles the mind with the uncertainty of whether it will be brought to completion, and causes sorrow even before it is accomplished. Therefore, the Lord, guarding those who have ascended to the heights of virtue against the temptation to pride, says: “When you have done all that is commanded you, say, ‘We are unworthy servants; we have only done what was our duty’” (Luke 17:10). Although He does not prevent us from rejoicing that our duty has been fulfilled, He does not permit us to think highly of ourselves. For He says that a debt has been paid, not a voluntary gift offered (2:112–13).

38. Pride inflates thoughts to the point of arrogance, teaches one to despise every human being and to look with contempt upon one’s fellow man as something insignificant; it drives lofty thoughts to madness, inspires dreams of equality with God, does not acknowledge the Providence and care of the All-Good God, and assumes that, as a reward for one’s deeds, one receives all the graces one enjoys as a due reward for one’s deeds; it refuses to see God’s assistance in what one does and in what one succeeds at; it considers itself sufficient for every good deed; in its conceit, it thinks it has the strength for everything, while being utterly powerless. She is a water bubble, inflated by a vain opinion of herself, which, if one were to blow on it, would turn into nothing (2, 184).

3. Exhortatory Chapters

1. Have the fear of God and love for God, and treat everyone according to the pure testimony of your conscience.

2. Believe that God Himself stands before you in all the deeds you perform each day.

3. Shun praise, but be ashamed of and reproach yourself for blame.

4. Rejoice when you practice virtue, but do not boast, lest a shipwreck occur in the harbor.

5. The more you succeed in keeping the law, the more you should acknowledge that you are far from perfection.

6. Consider the end of every undertaking before you begin it.

7. Day and night, contemplate your final day, and no love for this present life will bind you to the earth.

8. Do not associate with those whom, as you can see, the good despise.

9. Whether you act, speak, or engage in philosophical discourse, strive not to harm anyone.

10. Do not take delight in the flowers of life; they are like the blossoms of grass—as soon as you touch them, they wither.

11. Give thanks in your sorrows—and the burden of your sins will become lighter.

12. Be steadfast in temptations; for they have exposed many, even the great, as lacking steadfastness or self-control.

13. Do not criticize God’s long-suffering; for it is a universal remedy.

14. Abhor the disorder of (human) life, but do not blame God for it.

15. Let us be mindful of ourselves—then we will not condemn others; for there is much within ourselves for which we condemn others.
16. Let a prayerful psalm always be on your lips; for the mere utterance of God's name puts demons to flight.
17. Let our prayer be offered with sobriety, so that we do not ask God for what displeases Him.
18. Always remember God—and your mind will become like heaven.
19. Keep your eyes in check; for if you do not watch over them, they will wander here and there.
20. Guard your tongue; for it often reveals what would be better left unsaid.
21. Cultivate your mind with instruction in the law; for constant instruction in it uproots evil thoughts.
22. Hide your virtues, but strive to have many witnesses to your life.
23. Detest the pleasures of the flesh, for they defile both body and soul.
24. Give the flesh only what is necessary, not what it desires out of lust.
25. Do not delight in worldly pleasures; for they bind you to this life, and both of these things give rise to enmity toward God.
26. Turn away from the joys of this life; for they cause those who are on the path of life to slip and fall.
27. If you have wealth, spend it; if you do not have it, do not accumulate it.
28. Consider fasting a weapon, prayer a wall, and tears a bath.
29. Whatever sins you have committed, remember them all with lamentation; for this brings constant contrition to the soul.
30. Comfort the poor; for they make the Judge merciful toward us.
31. Share in the needs of the saints; for through them we have communion with God.
32. Enter the Church as if entering heaven, and within it speak not of, nor think of, anything earthly.
33. Consider it necessary to have enough for life's necessities; but leave the care of these matters to God.
34. Exhaust the flesh with good works, but take care that it does not collapse entirely (under their weight).
35. Drink wine as little as possible; the more you reduce the amount, the more beneficial it is for those who drink it.
36. Keep your anger in check; for when it goes beyond measure, it becomes the father of madness.
37. In times of illness, turn first to prayer rather than to doctors and medicines.
38. Honor all priests, but seek out the good ones.
39. Love God's houses, but also make yourself a part of God's house.
40. Attend church frequently, for it delivers us from external storms and turmoil.
41. What is on earth is temporary; do not grieve, then, if such things are taken from you.
42. When a thought of lust comes upon you, counter it with the shame of being seen by others and the offense to God.
43. Guard your ears and eyes; for through them all the enemy's arrows enter.
44. When you pray, lift your thoughts to God; and if, becoming distracted, they drift downward, lift them back up again.
45. The mind never ceases to produce thoughts; but drive out the evil ones and cultivate the good ones.
46. Rejoice in humility; for the height it produces is great, and it cannot fall.
47. Strive as much as is necessary to subdue the desires of the flesh; and if you grow weary, grant your body some respite—not for pleasure, but for health.
48. Drive away evil thoughts with good ones.
49. Meditate on the splendor of heavenly blessings, and no attachment to the earth or to earthly pleasures will enter your heart.
50. Believe that evil thoughts are the devil's sowing; thus they will cease, and the sower will be put to shame.
51. Guard yourself most of all against listening; for it makes the soul distracted and careless, and a careless soul easily casts off the bridle of the law.
52. The soul must be divided between work and prayer (that is, so that it is sometimes engaged in work and sometimes in prayer); then the devil will find few ways to enter our hearts.

- 53. If you stretch out your hand to work, let your tongue sing and your mind pray; for God requires that we always remember Him.
- 54. Bless every task you undertake with prayer, especially those in which you sense doubt creeping into your thoughts.
- 55. If you want the work of your hands to be divine rather than worldly, then let what you earn through them be shared with those in need.
- 56. Rejoice in the visit of the saints, for through them God is revealed.
- 57. Distinguish the truly holy by their deeds; for every tree is known by its fruit.
- 58. Always strive to learn something when you see the saints; observe their gaze and their demeanor, for both are very beneficial.
- 59. Strive to maintain a heart free from malice and a body free from impurity; for both make you a temple of God.
- 60. Thus, guard your temple as the temple of the One who created you, who will judge you, and who arranges all things so that you—His image—may be pure.
- 61. Conversations with worldly people distract the mind from God; therefore, not only should you yourself refrain from speaking with them, but you should also dissuade others from doing so.
- 62. When you are reviled, consider whether you have done anything worthy of revilement; if not, regard this revilement as smoke that quickly vanishes.
- 63. Without a contrite heart, it is impossible to be freed from passions; and the heart is brought to contrition through threefold abstinence—that is, abstinence from sleep, from food, and from physical rest.
- 64. If you are wronged in any way, resort to patience—and the harm will fall upon those who wronged you.
- 65. When you see wealth, or glory, or worldly power, reflect on their transience—and you will avoid the trap.
- 66. Endure sorrows; for in them, like roses among thorns, virtues are born and come to maturity.
- 67. Consider nothing equal in worth to virtue, for it is the image of God; therefore, it is unchanging, just as He is.
- 68. Weep for the sinner who prospers; for the sword of the Just Judge hangs over him.
- 69. Consider sloth the root of all evils; for it robs you of the good you possess and prevents you from acquiring the good you lack.
- 70. When the one who does evil is not ashamed of it, the wound grows worse—and the fall leads to despair.
- 71. Whenever you lose heart, consider what blessings are in store for the faithful—and spiritual joy will soon come to you.
- 72. The faithful must be humble before everyone; for to be humble only before some means to have false humility.
- 73. Do not prioritize anything over love for your neighbor, except in those cases where love for God is neglected because of it.
- 74. Do not become attached to anyone or show partiality contrary to God's law; for whoever prefers anyone over God makes God seem less worthy than that person.
- 75. Do not defend the wicked, for by doing so you encourage them in their evil and defile yourself by associating with their deeds.
- 76. Admonish the sinner, but do not condemn the one who has fallen; for the latter is the act of a slanderer, while the former is the act of one who desires to correct.
- 77. Strive always to hear and speak of the deeds of the saints; for this stirs the soul to wholesome competition.
- 78. If the heart is a domestic church for each of us, then we must also perform church services within it.
- 79. If a service is being held in the Church, attend it; but if not, (after singing) read the Gospel of the Apostles—and go (about your business).
- 80. Judge the glory of virtues by the saints; for their glory remains immortal even after death.
- 81. You will come to hate evil when you realize that it is the devil's flashing sword against us.

82. If you are admonishing someone who has fallen, temper your words with compassion; then his ears will be softened, and his heart will be enlightened.

83. When speaking with the saints, ask about spiritual matters; but when speaking with others, do not speak of them.

84. Always be eager to do good deeds, so that, by neglecting them, you do not depart from here as one who is only half-perfect.

85. “Run in such a way as to win the prize” (1 Cor. 9:24), that is, without stopping; for we must pursue virtue until we leave the arena of life.

86. Do not be negligent in keeping the commandments; for such people labor in vain.

87. Practice patience even before you need it, so that when the time comes, you will find its full armor ready.

88. Fight against evil thoughts and speak to them what is written in the Law (that is, in the Word of God against them).

89. With great diligence, turn your eyes away from this life, for the evil smoke rising from it stirs up the soul.

90. If some bad habit has taken hold of you, cut it away little by little—and without much effort you will pull this thorn out of your soul.

91. Love the pure God purely; and consider everything as inferior to Him, who is above all things.

92. If you wish to be a temple of God, offer God unceasing prayer as a continuous sacrifice.

93. Do not take one who lives carelessly as a counselor; for, loving what is evil, he cannot advise what is good when he does not love it.

94. Abstain from all that is perishable, and partake of the mystical supper every day; for in this way the body of Christ becomes ours.

95. When you are chastened by God in any way, do not grumble; for He chastens as a Father and is worthy of thanks as a Benefactor.

96. When you suffer dishonor, rejoice; for if it is unjust, your reward will be great, and if it is just, by remaining chaste through it, you will be spared the scourge of punishment.

97. Consider the sorrows and joys of life to be like shadows and a wheel, for they are fleeting, like a shadow, and turn, like a wheel.

98. Strive always to prosper in God; for whoever adds a little to a little will, in a short time, amass the good wealth sought by all.

99. If you wish to avoid painful torment, never speak ill of anyone; for this grieves the Divine.

100. If you wish to ward off every scourge of punishment from your home, do not speak ill of a human being—your fellow creature; for the Creator, who made him, is justly grieved by this.

101. If you wish to be above all sin, do not pry into the affairs of others; for there is much within you yourself that you accuse others of.

102. Flee from pride, O man, even if you are rich, lest you make God your enemy.

103. Love humility, even if you are great, so that you may be exalted on the Day of Judgment.

104. Do not mock others, and you will never be mocked throughout your life.

105. When you are in church, do not let your mind wander; for those who stand before the King do not laugh or let their minds wander.

106. Commit these words firmly to memory—and this will bring you glory throughout your life.

107. Strive for a virtuous life, so that you may have the courage to correct those who sin.

108. Rein in your insolence; do not rebuke anyone—lest you be condemned as one who is haughty.

109. Do not mock another’s downfall, lest you be mocked by someone you do not wish to be mocked by.

110. Observe these exhortations—and they will bring you a crown of glory.

111. Be a doer of these commandments—and they will make you honorable before people and pleasing to God; for God is pleased by these, and true service to Him is rewarded through such achievements.

112. Strive always to excel in good deeds.⁷⁵

⁷⁵ This concludes the exhortatory chapters in the Greek Patriarchal edition. The Moscow Academy’s translation adds the following chapters from the manuscript it used.

113. And a warrior, unless he has first been trained through long-term practice and tested in toil and battle, having demonstrated through experience that he can triumph over his enemies, is not glorified.

114. All the more so, before the true King of Heaven, no one is deemed worthy to receive the heavenly gifts of the Holy Spirit unless he first trains himself in the study of the holy commandments, and in this way takes up the heavenly weapon of grace itself and enters into battle against the spirits of wickedness.

115. To the extent that one succeeds in spiritual struggle, to that extent one ascends to the heights of the mysteries of the Spirit and the hidden treasures of wisdom.

116. And to the extent that one is enriched by grace, to that extent does one succeed in discerning the designs of malice, with the help of the Lord. To Him be glory and power forever! Amen. (In the Greek Patriarchal edition, the first chapters of these exhortatory chapters are as follows—and after them comes: “Fear God...” and so on.)

117. The beginning of salvation is self-condemnation.

118. It is better to throw a stone at random than to speak a word.

119. Treat everyone as you would like them to treat you.

120. Demonstrate the truth through deeds rather than words.

121. The pious person is not the one who shows mercy to many, but the one who offends no one.

122. It is better to sleep on the ground among tree leaves, with a clear conscience, than without it on a bed of gold.

123. A friend who nourishes the soul is a sweet friend.

124. Praise God with words, worship Him through your deeds, and revere Him with your mind and heart.

125. Wisdom, a good life, and nobility of character make one a priest.

126. The worst thing one can do is to grovel before everything shameful.

127. Study virtue through words, and preach it through deeds.

128. Do not merely regard virtue as a noble deed, but possess it as you ought.

129. By honoring the law, you will live according to the law.

130. A wanderer is one to whom all worldly things are foreign.

131. Do not flatter the rich, but do not provoke them either.

132. Wine strengthens the body, but the Word of God strengthens the soul.

133. Eat foods that are healthy, not sweet.

134. If you seek to please the crowd, you will become like the crowd.

135. Above all, mortify your body.

136. A hardworking person is one who never has any spare time.

137. To spew blasphemy against God is an unforgivable sin.

138. Great trouble comes from the ears and the tongue.

4. Thoughts that turn a person away from the perishable and attach them to the imperishable

1. The path to virtue is flight from the world—a good and short path.

2. One who desires the imperishable must regard all that is perishable as nothing.

3. If you desire true life, always expect human death.

4. Come to hate this present life, for you see how chaotically its wheel turns.

5. Do not covet goods whose use is fleeting and whose possession is lost.

6. Laugh at those who succeed in everything, and have compassion for those who fail in everything; for the former leads to a reward, and the latter to wisdom.

7. Strive for the patience that, as we know, the martyrs demonstrated; for we, too, are called to the martyrdom of conscience (to stand firm in the demands of conscience).

8. Put the soul above all else, and the path of virtue will then flow effortlessly; for all things are mortal, but the soul is immortal, and what is mortal must give way to what is immortal.

9. Be prepared for suffering, and you will derive great benefit from it.

10. Do not ask God for what is pleasant, but only for what is useful; for no matter how much you ask for the former, God will not grant it, and even if you somehow obtain it, it will soon vanish.

11. Do not despise poverty; for it makes the warrior in the arena of the law undistracted by anything.

12. Do not be captivated by wealth; for the cares associated with it most often separate a person from God against his will.
13. The end is near; prepare yourself, you sluggard, for the scourges.
14. The harvest is not far off; let us clear the field of the soul of its thorns.
15. Nothing is hidden from the Judge; and in vain do we strive to hide ourselves while we sin.
16. Be more ashamed before the angels—who are numerous around us—than before people, and turn away from every shameful deed.
17. Think carefully about the Judge's scales—and you will cast out of your life everything that cannot withstand the true weight (on those scales—or that proves to be counterfeit because of the admixture of foreign elements, just as, for example, a gold coin that fails to meet its standard weight due to the admixture of other elements).
18. Consider idleness and inactivity a loss to yourself, and hasten to do whatever is required of us.
19. Always reflect on the transience of this life, and nothing in it will be able to distract you.
20. Let not earthly joys—which are temporary—delight you; for they are a hook that lures and catches the soul like a fish.
21. Stand firm against temptations, showing the necessary courage.
22. Never despise a poor person who sheds tears, lest the tears of your prayer be despised.
23. Wisdom is the most excellent possession for people; but, being unique, it desires to dwell only with the one who has acquired it.
24. Virtue is God's tunic; weave it, and you will be the one who clothes the One who clothes all creation.
25. Earthly things are stolen by thieves; pursue heavenly things, which are beyond the reach of thieves' fingers (unattainable by these fingers).
26. One must renounce pleasures; for they lead to deeds that, once sobriety returns, bring lamentation.
27. Carnal thoughts must be abhorred in every way, for they corrupt the body and defile the soul.
28. Even earthly blessings are not attained without toil; why, then, do we turn away from heavenly blessings because of toil?
29. Do you wish to practice virtue without feeling the toil? Keep in mind that this toil is temporary, but the reward for it is eternal.
30. All who pine for vain (useless) pleasures should consider the brevity of their enjoyment and the length of the punishment that follows.
31. Consider everything transitory—only virtue is imperishable.
32. Disdain everything that makes a person beast-like—and do the one thing that can make you heavenly.
33. Strive for virtue; for through wisdom, it reveals Adam as a god.
34. Do you control your appetite? Then control your tongue as well, lest you be a slave to one thing and a useless free man to another.
35. Love God, and do not be more attached to your own than to Him, lest, according to His Word, you prove unworthy of Him, even though you do not desire this.
36. Endure sorrows patiently; for in them lies the crown for those who fight the good fight.
37. It is blessed to endure evil, but it is wretched to commit it; for the one who endures it is an heir of Christ, but the one who commits it is a co-heir of the devil.
38. The bread of fasting is good; for it contains no leaven of sensuality.
39. The altar of prayer is holy, for it draws the Holy of Holies near to us.
40. Do not consider justice to be the exclusive domain of virtue, for without it every deed is impure.
41. If you sow among the poor, you sow your own; for what belongs to others is more bitter than weeds.
42. The merciful man is blind if he is unjust; for he cultivates a field from which he cannot reap a harvest.
43. Always expect death, but do not fear it (or put yourself in a state where you do not fear it); for both are true marks of wisdom.
44. Bear the appearance of virtue, not to deceive, but to benefit those who see you.

45. One ought to speak well even of those who do not do good, so that, ashamed of their own words, they may begin to do good.
46. If you truly desire heaven, then the earth is nothing to you; for it prevents you from soaring toward it.
47. Do not desire to become rich out of a love of wealth; for God has decreed that the righteous should give alms “from what they have” (Luke 11:41;—from what they possess).
48. If a cup of cold water justifies the merciful, what reward awaits the one who lavishes everything on the poor?
49. Purity and compassion are the mothers of virtues; therefore, without both, one cannot serve Christ (or fight for Christ).
50. Do not neglect compassion; for it brought the Good Lord down from heaven.
51. Do not neglect purity; for through it, the Most Holy Virgin, having become the vessel of the Incarnation, bestowed upon mankind the God who became incarnate for our sake.
52. Do not say, “I will take vengeance on my enemy”; for we have a righteous Judge (and Avenger) in heaven.
53. Do not desire to live in pleasure, nor to be rich, nor to be famous; for these are the fleeting things of this life, and we were not created to perish.
54. Do not weep over the dead—this is the common path; and blessed is the one who reaches its end (without fault).
55. Weep for the sinner, not for the poor; for the former prepares a crown for himself, while the latter prepares torment.
56. Laugh at the wheel of life, spinning haphazardly; but beware of the abyss into which it casts those who fall asleep upon it.
57. Speak much with God, and little with people; but by studying the Law, you will correct both.
58. A bath that is beneficial to the soul is tears during prayer; but after prayer, remember what you wept about.
59. Do not flatter the powerful of this world; for “the mighty will be severely punished” (Wis. 6:6); and therefore they will have a Judge who is most severe toward them.
60. It is the lot of Adam (that is, fallen man) to labor (with the body, involuntarily and without reward); but by laboring in the Law, we earn our reward.
61. Eve’s descendants must suffer; but when we endure our sufferings with gratitude, then the curse is turned into a blessing for us.
62. Let your conscience be a lamp in your deeds; for it shows which are good and which are evil.
63. Let us judge ourselves—and the Judge is appeased; for He, being good, rejoices when He sees the sinner cast off his burden.
64. If we have done anything impure, let us wash it away with repentance; for we must present the image of God within ourselves as pure.
65. Let us heal the sores of our souls before they are laid bare—so that through these remedies we may avert the scourges of punishment.
66. Just as it is difficult for one who is bound to walk, so too can one who is entangled in worldly affairs not walk the path of virtue with purity.
67. We must hate sin; for then, even if someone falls into it, they will more quickly escape its snares.
68. Whoever does not hate sin, even if he does not commit sin, is counted among sinners.
69. Lament over your neighbor who sins, so that you may also lament over yourself; for we are all guilty of sin.
70. Remind a friend who has fallen of the Judge—and thereby you will anoint your own sinful wound; for such counsel is a universal remedy.
71. When you intend to say or do something, keep in mind the answer that will soon be required of you; and you will restrain yourself out of fear.
72. Fear the punishment for sin, and the chains that come with the thought of shame because of it; for the burden of both is immeasurable.
73. Both beauty and the multitude of future blessings are boundless, while present ones are but a shadow, smoke, or a water bubble.

74. Do not sow evil, for the harvest is near—and the fire awaits the sower of thorns.

75. Hypocrites, the greedy, and the pleasure-seekers are the roses of this world; but wait a little while, and you will see (instead of roses) trampled grass.

76. Every evil deed gives the devil a weapon against us; but he, armed with it, treats those who armed him cruelly.

77. Do you want to wear down your enemy? Cut off sin, and then you can mock him as you would a plucked sparrow.

78. Woe to the wicked; for when all are enlightened, he is shrouded in darkness.

79. Woe to the blasphemer; for his tongue will be tied before the Judge—and he will be unable to say anything in his own defense.

80. Woe to the lawless, for he will go before the stern Judge and the righteous Lawgiver.

81. Woe to the avaricious! Wealth will flee from him, and fire will consume him.

82. Woe to the sluggard! He will lament the time he has wasted.

83. Woe to the arrogant! When he lies in his coffin, he will learn who he really is.

84. Woe to the adulterer who has defiled the wedding garment! He will be cast out in shame from the king's wedding hall.

85. Woe to the quarrelsome and to the drunkard with him! They will be treated like murderers and punished like adulterers.

86. Woe to those who indulge in pleasures during this brief time! They fatten themselves like a calf destined for the slaughter.

87. Blessed is the one who walks the narrow path; for he will enter heaven as a crowned one.

88. Blessed is the one who rejects worldly pleasures; for the demons tremble before him.

89. Blessed is the one who is pure in heart and sincere in virtue; for he will judge the world, and will not be judged along with the world.

90. Blessed is the one who is unceasing in prayer, reading, and good deeds; such a one will not fall asleep in death.

91. Blessed is the one who leads a noble life and possesses humble wisdom; for he imitates Christ and will sit with Christ.

92. Blessed is the one whose lips never cease to speak the law; for God never departs from such a one's dwelling.

93. Blessed is the one who does good to many; for at the judgment he will find many defenders.

94. Blessed is the one whose virtue is not feigned; for the Judge's shovel will unfailingly scatter everything.

95. Blessed is the one who adorns his deeds before the fire appears, by which all will be tested.

96. Blessed is the one who hastens toward the life to come; for the present life emits the stench of decay and is drawn toward death.

97. Blessed is the one who dispenses the evil he has accumulated and stands pure before the pure Judge.

98. But the essence of the message is this: O soul, do not be careless! For soon you will stand before the scales of the dreadful judgment seat of Christ, our God.

5. Thoughts and exhortations similar to the preceding ones, drawn from other writings of St. Nilus

1. The courage of virtue is praiseworthy in times of peace, but its valor is even more praiseworthy in times of battle.

2. Virtue reveals itself not only in what it does, but also in the trials that oppose it.

3. He is dispassionate who has won the victory by enduring suffering in many battles; but he who claims to have attained virtue without battle is still passionate.

4. A heart that knows no battle is deprived of the opportunity to demonstrate virtue; for virtue derives its name from valiant deeds performed in battle.

5. Let us resolutely tear away the pleasure we derive from our thoughts, directing all our anger toward them, lest, by accepting these thoughts with pleasure, we become sympathetic even toward their objects.

6. In a person who is not silent, the soul struggles with sensory impressions, while the lover of silence, who guards his senses, struggles with his thoughts.

7. Those who have received the strength for ascetic labors through grace should guard against the thought that they possess this strength naturally on their own. The Source of all that is good in us is He who gave the Word regarding the commandments, just as the source of all that is evil is the crafty instigator of delusions. Therefore, whatever good you do, give thanks to the Source of good; but whatever evil troubles you with its temptations, attribute it to the originator of all evil.

8. As for the end of every trial (difficulty, sorrow)—give thanks to God, the Giver of all good things—so that the enemy’s malice may be put to shame by such sincerely offered thanksgiving. Whoever combines gratitude with his work will possess an imperishable treasure of the heart, having built a double wall with battlements against sin.

9. Praiseworthy is the man who has combined an active life with a contemplative one, so that the field of the soul, watered by both sources, may yield an abundance of virtues. For contemplation inspires the intellect to contemplate the most perfect things, while action puts to death “the members that are on the earth: fornication, impurity, passion, evil desire” (Col. 3:5). Therefore, one who has girded himself with the full armor of action and contemplation is well-equipped to confront demonic cunning.

10. Demons wage war against the soul through thoughts, but patience—which is more effective against them—opposes them; and when they see this mighty leader of the battle, they enter the struggle with trepidation.

11. If you wish to wage war successfully against the host of demons, then guard the gates of your soul (the senses) with solitary silence and lend your ear to the words of the fathers, so that, having thus learned to better discern the thorns of thoughts, you may burn them with anger and rejection.

12. When you heed the advice of the fathers, do not be a judge of their deeds, but one who understands and studies their sayings.

13. It is the custom of enemies to divert the questioner’s attention to the actions of the advisor, so that, by setting you up to be a strict and critical judge of him, they may deprive you of his useful counsel.

14. When advice is offered to you, do not reject it, even if you yourself are knowledgeable.

15. Whoever does not heed his father’s commandment also disregards the commandment of the law.

16. Do not speak of your fathers’ achievements merely for your own pleasure, but demand of yourself that you be the most diligent in accomplishing them.

17. He who diligently strives to discern which thought opposes which feat will be skilled in the struggle against the enemy’s deception.

18. Know that in place of the spiritual feat that is lacking in the totality of your spiritual labors, a thought has crept in—one that usually opposes it—and has usurped its place.

19. Remember to guard your heart with prudence in your ascetic labors, so that neglect of care for the better things—having stolen it—does not deliver it into captivity to thoughts. Forgetting this captivity conspires with malice (the enemy) so that, as soon as it steals the mind, malice (the enemy) may enter it more swiftly and plunder it as it pleases.

20. When one person enjoys listening to another slander someone, then both serve as instruments of two spirits that mutually aid one another: for malicious listening fuels malicious speech, and malicious speech provokes malicious listening; and both, to the heart’s ruin, love one another.

21. Shut your ears to slander, lest you sin in two ways: by accustoming yourself to a destructive passion, and by failing to restrain others from slander.

22. He who loves to mock robbing the souls of the best (among his people) like a bandit, undermining the weak-minded with slander.

23. He who flees from a tongue that slanders his neighbor will drive slander away from his own.

24. He who listens with pleasure to the slanderer draws the poison of a beast (from the abyss) into his ears.

25. May your ear not taste this bitter poison, lest you, too, offer the same potion to another.

26. Do not cloud your hearing with gossip, lest, having sold yourself to this passion, you become a slave to many passions; for once a single passion has found a place within you, it will lead other passions into the same nest (or stall); and a masterful mind becomes a slave to many passions when, having joined forces with any one passion, it completely casts aside ascetic labors.

27. Whatever in you is worthy of envy, hide it above all from the envious.

28. When your friend, regarding the good reputation of your deeds as a humiliation to himself, is stung by envy and even takes it into his head to tarnish that reputation with some reproach, be careful not to be stung yourself by allowing the bitter poison of grief to seep into your soul. Satan's aim is precisely to fan the flames of his envy and to consume you with grief.

29. But let us rather humble ourselves and honor such people "more highly" (Rom. 12:10)—striving even through a meal to soothe their spirits, which have been enraged by jealousy.

30. Someone tried to persuade a certain patient, elderly hermit to leave the desert because of his advanced age. But the elder said to him, "Stop forcing me to do this; for me—a sinner—my time of exile is not yet over."

31. When I asked him to give me a word of edification, he replied: "First and foremost, diligently seek to root the fear of God in your heart—and then you will always find within yourself the necessary word that instructs a person in wisdom."

32. This same elder, when asked about acquiring the fear of God, said this: "Whoever carefully keeps the memory of death in mind is thereby led to the fear of judgment."

33. Driven by fear, let the Divine Scriptures be your daily companion; through conversing with them, you will banish the influence of foreign thoughts.

34. Whoever, through the teachings of the Divine Scriptures, gathers a treasure of spiritual knowledge in his heart will easily drive away such thoughts from it.

35. During nightly readings at vigils, as we listen to the Divine Scriptures, let us not dull our hearing with sleep, nor surrender our soul to the captivity of thoughts; but let us pierce our hearts with the sting of the Scriptures, so that, having been brought to contrition, we may be filled with zeal for salvation and put an end to the opposing indifference.

36. Burning with love for God through remembrance of heaven, one drives every desire to please men from one's thoughts.

37. Do not send the witness of your deeds—your conscience—to a thought that despises sin and speaks sweetly of it.

38. You will not extinguish the passions of the body unless you apply to your flesh the remedy of ascetic labors that subdue its passions. Nor will you extinguish the passions of the soul unless you first fill your heart with the fruits of love.

39. Bodily passions originate from the natural needs of the flesh—and abstinence is needed against them; but passions of the soul arise from the needs of the soul—and prayer is needed against them.

40. Love is the fullness of dispassion—the eradication of passions: it brings long-suffering, cools boiling anger, instills humility, and subdues pride.

41. Love, in and of itself, has nothing except God; for God is love.

42. Clothe yourself with the fear of God rather than the fear of eternal torment—so that the fear of the fire of Gehenna may kindle within you an unquenchable zeal (for the work of pleasing God), and so that you may more quickly gain wisdom against the wickedness of your thoughts; for fear is the beginning of wisdom.

43. One who explains the deceptions of the mind from experience will not be understood by everyone, but only by those who are themselves experienced; for the path to this knowledge is the same for all: experience.

44. The school of experiential knowledge is an active life; by embracing it with the greatest diligence, we come to know ourselves, learn to discern our thoughts, and come to know God.

45. Let your deeds be the strength that calms your thoughts; for action is wiser than knowledge and speech, just as it is far more laborious; in action, words flash like lightning, but when there are no deeds, words do not shine with the power of deeds.

46. Thoughts, by piercing the eye of the soul, blind us, so that even the best of the commandments are used in the worst possible way.

47. The demons rage against those (brothers) who distinguish themselves by their obedience to their abbot, and they gnash their teeth at them, because they have combined obedience with a carefree renunciation of the world.

48. For those who are submissive to their father, the demons, seeking out all manner of pretexts, prepare distress for him; and if anger arises in this situation, they stir up resentment against him, and then, little by little, they instill oppression and hatred toward him, on the grounds that he supposedly punishes unjustly and shows favoritism; the demons do this in order to shake the soul in various ways and snatch it from the father's embrace.

49. Sometimes demons exalt ascetic labors in one's thoughts, and sometimes they belittle them as serving no purpose, so as to instill pride in some and sow despair in others. They exalt the labors of those whom they cannot lead into sloth, in order to lead them into pride; and to those who refuse to succumb to pride, they insist that their deeds serve no purpose, so that, by leading them thereby into sloth, they may plunge them into despair.

50. When our thoughts exalt our ascetic labors, let us cast them aside with contempt and humble our souls; but when they belittle these labors as serving no purpose, let us exalt Christ's mercy with all our strength.

51. To the same extent that you mortify your body, to that same extent examine your conscience. Know yourself, discerning the secret thefts of your thoughts, so that, remaining insensitive to their secret plundering, we may not be led astray by the notion that virtues are reaped solely through the austerity of life.

52. Just as gold that has not been put to use, when placed in a smelting furnace, becomes purer; so too does a novice monk, having refined his character in the monastery, become enlightened through the trials of patience. Through the brothers' commands, he learns obedience, and through the punishments of the one who disciplines him (the abbot or elder), he is prepared to have long-suffering deeply rooted within him. And if he joyfully accepts insults and comes to love humility in humiliation, then, having risen above the passions opposed to this, he will begin to shine ever more brightly with virtues, in proportion to the strength granted to him by grace.

53. The mind will find rest when, having cut off the causes of the passions, it enters into contemplation; but until the passions are cut off, it experiences both toil and danger, setting out with unsteady steps to battle its adversaries.

54. The elders highly approve of the hermit life when it is undertaken at the right time—that is, when one embarks upon it after having perfected one's virtues in communal life. And let such a person first test himself to see if he can successfully live in solitude; and if he finds this impossible for himself due to a lack of strength, let him return to communal life, lest, lacking the strength to resist the wiles of his thoughts, he lose his sanity.

55. Just as sons serve as comforters to a weeping widow, so too are ascetic labors a comfort to a fallen soul—they dispel thoughts of despair, deepen faithful repentance, proclaim the mercy of Christ, and atone for sins committed.

56. Just as a young dog attempts to snatch bread from an infant, so does a cunning thought seek to seize the mind from the heart. Therefore, let us not, like infants, be blind to the cunning of the opposing forces, lest we surrender our souls to their plunder.

57. Just as a glittering host of stars makes the sky bright, so the truth of the divine words, like a lamp brought within, illuminates a person. Therefore, let us all bear the same image of truth, for "the Lord settles those of one mind in the same house" (Ps. 67:7).

58. Just as the sun smiles upon the whole earth with its radiant rays, so love greets every soul with radiant deeds. If we acquire it, we will extinguish our passions and shine up to the heavens. You will accomplish any task as soon as you attain holy love; but when it is absent, there is no success in anything—then anger rages, manners grow coarse, and vanity mingles with labors undertaken out of pride.

59. First, one must struggle against the passions and, with great self-restraint, commit to memory what occurred during the battle; then, based on one's own experience, share with others the rules of the struggle and make victory easier for them by explaining in advance the methods for waging the battle. Others have overcome their passions, perhaps through a long and austere life, but they do not know the way to victory, because, as in a nighttime battle, they did not follow the course of the entire affair, and their minds did not discern the enemy's malicious intentions.

60. One who has tasted silence and begun to practice contemplation to some extent will not consent to bind the mind with cares for the body and, by distracting it from spiritual knowledge, turn it toward earthly affairs, when it mostly soars in the heights.

61. When the passions are subdued, enemies no longer trouble us from any quarter, and there is no need to employ defensive weapons; then one may proceed to cultivate the souls of others. But as long as the passions still reign supreme, and the battle against the wiles of the flesh continues, one must not lay aside one's weapons; rather, one must keep them constantly at hand, lest the cunning enemies turn our repose into an opportunity for attack and capture us without the shedding of blood.

62. St. Moses gives Israel this lesson when they enter the Promised Land and defeat the peoples living there: "Take care that you do not be tempted to follow them after they have been defeated" (Deut. 12:30). – This lesson is very applicable to those who, having cut off their passions, do not pay close attention to their own hearts. For in such cases, images of the past begin to arise within them like offspring; and whoever allows them the freedom to frequently fall into a domineering mindset—without forbidding them entry there—will once again open a refuge within himself for the passions after having conquered them, thus making life unsafe from strife. For passions, even when they are tamed and, like oxen, have been trained to eat hay, are prone—through the tamer's negligence—to become wild again and to fall into bestial ferocity.

63. "Cursed is the one who places an idol in a secret place" (Deut. 27:15). It is not the same thing to hide something in the ground forever as it is to place it in a secret place. What is hidden in the ground and no longer perceptible to the senses is eventually erased from memory, whereas what is placed in a secret place, though concealed from outsiders, is often visible to the one who placed it there and thus renews the memory of itself. Every shameful thought that arises in the mind and is not cast out but secretly held onto is like an idol placed in a secret place. Whoever does this is subject to the punishment prescribed by the law; for cherishing a shameful thought is the same as worshiping an idol.

64. One must not allow images that corrupt the mind to enter the heart; for if the heart is plunged into the darkness of impure thoughts, it is then drawn, as if by force and against its will, toward a passionate act.

65. The Holy Spirit wrote the lives of the saints so that everyone living a particular way of life might be led to the truth by such examples.

66. Those who have only recently been freed from the turmoil of the world should be advised to remain in silence (within the walls of the monastery or their home), and not to reopen the wounds of the heart through sensory impressions by frequent outings, nor to add new idols to their old sinful ones. This silence is difficult for those who have recently renounced the world; for then memory stirs up all the impurity stored within it, having had no leisure to do so before because of the multitude of tasks that followed one another without ceasing. But this happens only at the beginning; in time, however, silence—armed with patience—will completely free the mind from the disturbance of impure thoughts.

67. The mind of one who has only just turned away from sin is like a body that has begun to regain its strength after a long illness; since it has not yet fully recovered, even a trivial cause can trigger a relapse. Its strength is still weak; which is why one must fear that passion might return if someone gives it cause to flare up by allowing oneself to be swept up in the crowd. Ascetics who have grown strong and mature may boldly go out into the fray here; but those who are not yet able to fight should find peaceful safety in silence by remaining at home.

68. When there is true inner stillness, and not only passionate impulses but also memories of them subside, then the soul, dwelling peacefully within itself, is able to discern the images previously imprinted and lurking within it, to engage in a struggle with each of them, and to tear them from the heart. But when images come one after another, it is impossible to erase the previous impressions; for the mind is occupied with new images, which, through their ceaseless allure, cloud the soul's vision. Just as those who wish to see the riverbed dry will gain nothing by scooping out water at the very spot where, in their opinion, what they seek lies; for the emptied spot is immediately refilled by the flowing water; and when the flow of water is blocked from above, the bottom is easily revealed, since the remaining water drains away on its own, leaving the ground dry for the desired investigation: it is just as easy to drain away the imprinted images of the passions when the senses no longer provide any external stimuli; but when, like a stream, they supply new and ever-new impressions, then it is not only difficult but impossible to completely purify the soul of passionate images and impulses.

69. The prophet commands: "Exterminate the seed of Babylon" (Jer. 50:16). For us, this is a piece of advice—to eradicate these images while they are still in the wombs of the senses, so that, falling onto the soil of the heart, they do not sprout and, watered by the rain of frequent conversation with them, do not bear the fruits of evil. Another Prophet, however, even praises those who do not wait for passions to mature but destroy them while they are still like infants feeding at the breast, saying: "Blessed is he who seizes your infants and dashes them against the rock" (Ps. 136: 9). Job's words convey a similar meaning: "The ants perished because they had no food" (4:11). It is evident that the great Job, wishing to depict the insidious nature of passion, devised a complex name for it—(ant and “lion”)—composing it from the names of the mightiest lion and the most insignificant of all creatures, the ant; for the onslaught of passions begins with subtle thoughts, creeping in imperceptibly like ants, but later grows and becomes no less dangerous to the one subjected to these onslaughts than a lion’s attack. That is why the ascetic must overcome the passions when they first appear as ants, using their insignificance as bait; for if they manage to attain the strength of a lion, they become invincible and cause great distress. Here, one must by no means give them food; for their food, as has been said many times before, consists of the images of passions that enter through the senses, which nourish the passions, each one arming its own idol against the soul.

70. And in the temple, the Lawgiver arranged “latticed windows” (Ezek. 41:16)—meaning by this that those who resolve to keep their hearts pure, like a temple, just as the lattice windows there ensure that nothing unclean can enter, must shield their senses with the fear of future judgment, like a lattice that would block the entry of newly arising and intruding unclean images.

71. 71. Whoever, while struggling against irritating (passionate) sights, is able—through fear of future punishments—to bring himself into such intense conflict as one tossed about at sea struggles against the waves; that person will easily overcome those who assail him, without feeling the blows inflicted, so that he will say: “They struck me, but I was not hurt—they mocked me, but I did not take notice” (Prov. 23:35), that is, they struck me, thinking to mock me, but I did not even feel the blows, because “their arrows were like the sores of infants” (Ps. 63:8); nor did I pay any attention to their taunts, not even showing that I noticed their presence.

72. Renouncing worldly affairs is of no benefit to those who do not remain steadfast in their resolve, but are once again carried away and yield to their thoughts, and often return to what they have left behind, thereby revealing their attachment to it, like Lot’s wife, who, looking back, was turned into a pillar of salt as a warning to such people. Frequent inclinations toward that from which we have turned away will undoubtedly lead us back from a good habit that has not yet taken root; and, by weakening our drive forward, they will once again draw us entirely to themselves and force us to return to our former bad deeds. The old, bad habit will thereby grow even stronger and will hardly allow a return to the practice of good character that had been begun. For habit gives rise to practice, and practice becomes second nature; yet it is difficult to transform and change one’s nature. Look at the soul that follows its habits, how it sits upon its idols, as if nailed to them: “I cannot,” it says, “rise before you, for I am a woman by nature” (; Gen. 31:35). And the soul, which has long found rest in the affairs of this life, sits upon them as upon idols and is so bound to them that it cannot and will not part with them.

73. The saints of God fled the cities, knowing that association with depraved people is far more corrupting than a contagious disease. Elijah, having left Judea, dwelt on Mount Carmel, which was desolate and teeming with wild beasts. His disciple Elisha followed this teacher’s example in his love for the wilderness. And John lived in the Jordanian wilderness, feeding on locusts and wild honey, to demonstrate how easy it is to satisfy the needs of physical life. Perhaps Moses, too, foreshadowed something similar when he gave the Israelites the law to gather manna only for a single day; this taught that concern for one’s physical sustenance should be limited to a single day. And all the saints, “for whom the world was not worthy,” having left the inhabited world, “wandered in the deserts” (Heb. 11:37–38), fleeing the alluring vices of humanity, so that the force of their aspirations, like a torrent, would not sweep them away into the general current of worldly life, which is ruinous.

74. We are created in the image of God so that we may preserve His attributes within ourselves and, through our exemplary lives, present clear signs of God’s likeness to those who look upon us. “I,” says God, “am generous and merciful, slow to anger and abounding in steadfast love” (Ps. 102: 8; Joel 2: 13), and I uphold justice. These are the features of the divine countenance. By them is recognized the soul that has partaken of the likeness of God and has become akin to the Godhead. Driven by love for God and zealous for the fullness of godly perfection, yet bound by the constraints of the body that unites her to Him, she undertakes labor upon labor in her striving for self-purification, until she succeeds in acquiring what distinguishes the divine nature—goodness, long-suffering, kindness, and love for humanity. And then she becomes “a little lower than the angels” (Ps. 8:6).⁷⁶

⁷⁶ From the Letter to the Deaconess of Ancyra—Migne, vol. 2, p. 97.

75. Whoever flees worldly turmoil, does not allow himself to be troubled by the vanities of life, and shuns the company of frivolous and irresponsible people, spends most of their time at home in silent prayer and the study of God's Word, and on the rare occasions they leave the house is seen as dignified, meek, unirritable, compassionate, and brotherly; Who would not call such a person a true zealous servant of God, a true image and likeness of God, illuminated by the divine rays of God's goodness, and clearly manifesting his likeness to God through virtues as beautiful as the most attractive flowers?

76. These are the distinguishing traits of God—and of a person who zealously seeks to become like God: gentleness, lack of malice, lack of anger, lack of envy, charity, compassion, forgiveness, love of goodness, kindness, respectfulness, concern for the welfare of others, sociability, helpfulness, and lack of self-love; —in short, everything in which God reveals an abundance of goodness, He who “makes His sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the righteous and on the unrighteous” (Matt. 5:45). By these traits, one who strives to be an imitator of God is recognized.

77. This instruction alone would suffice to teach the devout how to live a blameless life; but, knowing how difficult it is for some to be led to this, St. Paul, through many exhortations, skillfully seeks to divert us from vanity, stirring up our zeal with various praiseworthy titles. At one point he says, “You are God's temple” (1 Cor. 3:16); at another, “Walk as children of light” (Eph. 5:8); at yet another, “Live in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Phil. 1:27); and again, “Your bodies are members of Christ” (1 Cor. 6:15); in one place he calls us “holy and blameless” (Eph. 1:4), and in another—“blameless and pure, children of God without blemish” (Phil. 2:15). He speaks of all this as if it were already within us, even though it is not yet there—so that, fearing that such praise might turn into reproach and ridicule if we do not prove to be such, we may strive with all zeal to become and remain so. Why does the Holy Apostle not limit himself to these praises alone, but also prescribes various ways and means by which we may “reach the measure of the full stature of Christ” (Eph. 4:13)?

78. First and foremost, he requires that we die and be crucified to the world, so that we may not feel even the slightest of the world's pleasures or sorrows. “You have died,” he says, “and your life is hidden with Christ in God” (Col. 3:3), wishing to show how those who are united with Christ live—those who “seek the things above” and “set their minds on things above,” who have died “to the elements of the world” and no longer live according to them. He also says, “Present your bodies as a living sacrifice to God, holy and acceptable to Him” (Rom. 6:13), desiring, on the one hand, that we die to precisely that which sets in motion the passions of the flesh that lust against the of the Spirit, and on the other hand, commanding us to live by that through which acts of virtue are performed to please God. That is why He calls those who have “put to death the members that are on the earth” (Rom. 12: 1; Col. 3:5) and those who walk “in the newness of life” (Rom. 6:4)—those who, having sacrificed their flesh, are no longer driven toward evil, nor do they remain idle in doing good deeds; for, being a living sacrifice, they have not lost the strength for this, but, like a blossoming and youthful plant, they make use of it against the long-standing hostile schemes of the flesh, no longer carried away by these foolish desires, since they have completely passed from the life of the flesh to the spiritual life, and live not by the flesh but by the Spirit.

79. To those who, though clothed in the flesh, are no longer troubled by its disorderly demands, the Apostle says: “You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit” (Rom. 8:9). For sin no longer reigned in their dead bodies, nor did it compel them by force to obey their own impulses, opposing the law of the mind and usually enslaving them to a certain law in their members; but the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus reigned, bringing them into complete obedience to Christ's commandments. In this arrangement, they not only delight in what is best for the inner man, but they also perfect him, being ready to avenge upon the body every former disobedience—which was previously permitted to please it—through efforts contrary to it, for the sake of virtue. — What, then, is this subduing, and how is it accomplished? The Apostle teaches this as follows: “Just as you once presented your members as slaves to impurity and lawlessness leading to more lawlessness, so now present your members as slaves to righteousness leading to holiness” (Rom. 6:19). Those who, being overcome by habit, are compelled to transform a bad habit into a good one know how great this effort is. The effort is great, but those who do not spare themselves succeed in this through God's grace. After many setbacks and many attempts to move forward, they finally manage to turn away completely from the evil inclinations to which they were enslaved and to turn their whole disposition entirely from the worse to the better—so that they may use all their members against hostile passions, transforming them from instruments of unrighteousness into instruments of righteousness.

80. Pay attention to the movements of your mind, observing how it conjures up memories of things, accepting the images of these things either with bias or without bias. Many yield to their passions more in their thoughts than in their actions, silently consenting to them and taking pleasure in them. Inwardly they are fallen, though no visible failings follow them. And it happens that some appear outwardly to be entirely blameless—yet they alone are aware of the vileness hidden within and blush because what is unseen is the opposite of what is seen; the truth contradicts their respectable outward appearance and causes their conscience to feel justifiable shame. How does such a person differ from a coffin when his soul harbors improper thoughts and is filled with shameful feelings? Is he not even worse than a coffin? Coffins do not retain their stench for long, as long as moisture remains in the body, but as soon as the bodily fluids are exhausted, the stench ceases; the heart, however, filled with shameful thoughts, always inspires revulsion, being more foul-smelling than a decaying body—and it alone takes pleasure in its own shame.

81. Just as pleasure and sorrow follow desire (the former following its fulfillment, the latter its unfulfillment), and desire is aroused by sensation (an impression from external things, or thoughts about them); then whoever prevents the latter (the impression, the thought) leaves no room for the former (desire and pleasure or sorrow): just as one who crushes the head of a snake trapped in a doorway leaves behind the rest of its body—which would undoubtedly have slithered freely through the doorway had the head, having pushed its way forward, found a clear passage. Such is the law of self-awareness or sobriety.

82. If anyone desires something evil, whether he satisfies his desire or not, both outcomes are equally harmful to him—that is, joy in the first case and sorrow in the second. For this sorrow is not “godly sorrow,” which, in the words of St. Paul, “brings about repentance leading to salvation” (2 Cor. 7:10); nor is this joy a joy in the Lord, as those who rejoice with a clear conscience do (Phil. 4:4). This joy is a kind of spiritual delusion instilled by a demon, since it depends not on the enjoyment of true good, but on being carried away by its illusion.

83. These are the distinguishing features of the way in which virtue guides the mind devoted to it toward possible success. Success does not seem too distant, lest it appear as though virtue seeks to intimidate with great remoteness; yet it does not stand still so that it might be seized by the pursuer—and this is so that he may not cease his zeal until death, but may strengthen his diligence throughout his life, extending it to all things.

84. Even if a whole lifetime is not enough to cultivate virtue, and those who strive for it require great self-control because of their fleshly inclinations; then, given the distraction and fickleness of our thoughts, how can we successfully complete such a long and difficult journey and protect ourselves from the wiles of our adversaries—who are numerous and invisible, and who use our passions and emotions as weapons against us, thereby bringing us down with the very things with which God’s goodness has armed us for defense against them? Therefore, we must be vigilant and not be carried away by what our adversaries use against us. It is obvious: whatever does not contribute to our success in our endeavor serves the interests of our adversaries.

85. By what thoughts should those who intend to direct their thoughts aright be guided?—Listen carefully.—David said in one passage: “The instruction of my heart is my understanding” (Ps. 48:4); in another: “I will always learn from Your precepts” (Ps. 118:16); and again: “I will learn from all Your works, and I will meditate on Your deeds” (76:13). – Do this, and your ever-restless mind will have no time to wander to what is unworthy, but will be constantly engaged in that which, when delved into, brings delight and great benefit, delighting the senses with sight and the soul with contemplation.

6. Exhortation to Monks

1. Intemperance in food nullifies fasting, while self-restraint combined with prayer repels lustful desires.

2. The love of money—the mother of idolatry—suppresses contentment, while concern for the body’s needs cuts off hope in God.

3. A wandering mind hinders the reading of God’s Word and watchful prayer.

4. Outbursts of anger subdue gentleness and psalm-singing.

5. Despondency is driven away by patience and tears, while worldly sorrow is silenced by aversion to sensual pleasures.

6. Hospitality is fostered by humility and a dislike of self-importance and of having an advantage over others. Pride, however—that ancient evil, an abomination before the Lord, that which God opposes—is subdued only by boundless humility, which declares: “I am dust and ashes” (Gen. 18:27), and also: “Unless the Lord builds the house, those who build it labor in vain; in vain do those who watch over it keep vigil” (Ps. 126:1).

7. Just as it is impossible to purify murky water without stilling it, so it is impossible for a monk to know his inner constitution without silence.

8. Just as it is impossible for a warrior to be crowned with the victory wreath without engaging in battle, so it is impossible to be a Christian without deeds of virtue.

9. Just as the pans of a scale cannot remain level when one is weighed down by a heavy load, so it is impossible to fulfill God’s commandment when carnal reasoning prevails.

10. Just as it is impossible to master a craft without practicing it diligently, so it is impossible to attain prayer without drawing near to God with a righteous heart.

11. Whoever has not attained pure prayer has no weapon for battle.

12. Whoever walks about in fine clothes yet is empty of God’s virtues is a dwelling place for demons.

13. Just as a king will not dwell in the house of a poor man, so Christ will not dwell in a soul defiled by sin.

14. Just as a neglected field is cultivated through diligent labor, so a soul that has run wild in sin is tamed if it begins to live according to God’s law.

15. Just as a rock lying deep in the sea is beyond the reach of the waves, so too will one who has excelled in virtues—and is, as it were, immersed in them—not be shaken by the devil.

16. Just as a skilled physician immediately devises a remedy for the illness at hand, so the knowledge of God, preserved (in the mind and heart), teaches its possessor how to guard himself (against falling) and to strive for what is best.

17. Just as a stream carves its own path, so too does sin, once embraced, of its own accord lead the one who has acquired it to ruin.

18. Just as a deer caught in a net has no easy way to escape, so too will the one who nurtures lusts while wallowing in his own world not escape sin; for lusts, though cunning and sweet, are bonds that are difficult to break.

19. Just as a grapevine that bears no good fruit is cut down so that it does not take up space in vain, so too will anyone who does not bear the fruits of the Holy Spirit be uprooted from the Lord.

20. Just as it is impossible for a person struck by an arrow to remain unharmed, so it is impossible for a monk who has entertained an evil thought not to be wounded by it.

21. Just as a person who has lost the right path wanders in a foreign land, not knowing where to go, so too does a person who does not believe in the consubstantial Trinity wander.

22. Just as a person, though divided into many parts, is one in nature, so too the Holy Trinity, though divided by names and hypostases, is one in nature. You cannot comprehend the nature of God, even if you were to soar toward Him on wings. God is incomprehensible, for He is our Creator.

23. Just as a vessel being fashioned does not know the nature of the one who is fashioning it, so too a person cannot know the nature of God.

24. Do not question the Trinity, but simply believe and worship, for whoever questions does not believe.

25. Acquire wisdom, not silver; clothe yourselves rather in the radiant garment of Christ our Lord than in any fine linen garment, for such possessions will be of no use on the day of death.

26. Just as fire consumes thorns, so every sinner will be devoured by eternal fire, yet cannot die; for he will suffer immortal torment.

27. There is nothing great about becoming righteous; for in that case, we will merely become what God created us to be in the beginning—very good.

28. He who does not live according to his nature does not keep God’s commandments.

29. All wisdom consists in fearing the Lord; but any teaching that does not instruct in the law of the Lord is folly and senselessness.

30. Faith and baptism alone, without righteous deeds, will not save you from eternal fire. If you have united yourself with Christ, keep His commandments; and if you believe in the future, strive to earn eternal glory and fear the fiery sword. But if you do not keep God’s commandments, do not call yourself a believer.

31. Every creature obeys God’s will; only man dares to disobey Him, “by whom all things were made.”

32. We will bring God no benefit by keeping ourselves pure, but we gain for ourselves eternal life and the enjoyment of ineffable eternal blessings.

33. Do not say, “I cannot keep God’s commandment because of an obstacle from my father, or my mother, or my wife, or my children, or anyone else”; for they will not deliver you from the wrath to come or from the worm that never sleeps. Let everyone who hinders you from seeking God and virtue be an abomination and an object of hatred to you; with such a one, “do not even associate.”
